17. With the exception of Kṣattriyas¹, no person born in a lower class should adopt the vocation ordained for the higher class under normal circumstances (lit. when not threatened with serious danger. The Kṣattriyas can adopt Brahmanical means of livelihood, except that of accepting charitable gifts). In times of danger anybody (belonging to any class) may resort to any profession (prescribed for any class).

18. A person may sustain his life by following the vocations or professions (technically) known as rta, amṛta, mṛta, prāmṛta or satyāṃrta, but should never lead a dog’s life (sva-vṛtti) (even) for preserving one’s life.

19-20. The gleaning of corn from the leftovers of field or of the marketplace is called rta; whatever is given to one unsolicited is known as amṛta; mṛta is daily begging, and prāmṛta means cultivation; trading is satyāṃrta (a mixture of truth and falsehood), while rendering service to the low-born is sva-vṛtti. A Brāhmaṇa and a Kṣattriya should always shun that ‘dog mode of life’ which is detested by all; for a Brāhmaṇa is an embodiment of all the Vedas and Kṣattriya (the ruler) is the personification of all deities.

21. Control over mind and senses, asceticism, purity, contentment, forbearance and forgiveness, straightforwardness, knowledge, compassion, fervent devotion to Lord Viṣṇu and truthfulness are the characteristics of a Brāhmaṇa.

22. Valour, prowess, fortitude, adventurous spirit, liberality, self-control, forgiveness, devotion to Brāhmaṇas, majestic graciousness and defence of the weak, constitute the characteristics of a Kṣattriya.

23. Devotion unto gods, teachers and Lord Viṣṇu, maintenance (and achievement) of three objectives in life (viz. dharma, artha and kāma), faith in Sāstras, constant effort (in making money) and skill in transactions, form the characteristics of the Vaiśyas.

¹. With the exception of Kṣattriyas, other lower varṇas (viz. Vaiśyas and Śūdras) may follow the professions of the higher classes—VJ.
24. Submissiveness, purity, faithful (lit. untreacherous) service of the master, performance of the five daily sacrifices by bowing down only (without uttering the mantras) abstention from theiving, truthfulness¹ and protection of the cattle and the Brähmana—these are the characteristics of the Śūdras.

25. The duties of women who look upon their husband as a (veritable) god are: rendering service to the husband, compliance to his wishes, friendliness to his relatives and ever-observance of the same vows as those of their husband.

26-27. A pious lady should keep the house clean by sweeping and plastering (with cowdung), and decorating it with auspicious coloured diagrams and pictures on the floor. She should adorn her person with ornaments and clean clothes and always keep the utensils etc. in the house clean and polished. She should, at every time, abide by the desires, great or small, of her husband with modesty, self-control and address him lovingly in true yet pleasant words.

28. Contented (with what she has), not covetous, diligent, knowing what is dharma (righteousness), sweet yet true in speech, careful, pious, affectionate—thus she should serve her husband who is not fallen (by committing any of the five major sins, viz. murder of a Brähmana, drinking liquor, theft, adultery with his preceptor’s wife and fellowship with a criminal of above type).

29. A woman who, as goddess Lakṣmi would do unto Lord Hari, serves her husband with a single-minded devotion, regarding him as Lord Viśnu, would like Lakṣmi in the company of Lord Viśnu, rejoice hereafter in the region of Hari (Vaikuṇtha) along with her husband who (through her devotion) has attained the resemblance of Hari (in form).

30. The means of livelihood of mixed castes² such as the antyajas (the low-born ones) anteśātyas (communities living at the farther end of a village such as cāṇḍāla, Mātaṅga and Pukkasa) are the hereditary callings followed by their respective families, provided it is not robbery and any sinful vocation.

¹ v.i. maudhya in VJ. which he explains as the cutting of hair, moustaches, nails etc.

² Śr. states that children born of a marriage between a woman of a higher caste and a man from a lower caste are pratiloma and are regarded as a low-born antyaja. Those castes are as follows: Washermen, Workers in leather, Nātas (rope-dancers), Burudas (basket-makers), Kaiyartas (fishermen), Medas (followers of degraded positions and Bhilas (Bhils—a mountain tribe).

31. In every age the dharma (the course of duties) of people is generally determined by their innate nature (according as they are predominantly sattvic, rājasa or tāmasa). Sages—the Vedic seers—have regarded that (particular) course of dharma as conducive to happiness (of persons with such natures) both here and hereafter.

32. One who follows a vocation determined as suitable to his special nature (as determined by his caste) and does his duty, goes on relinquishing that type of work suitable to his disposition) and gradually attains to the state of the attributeless atman.

33. A field which is constantly sown with seeds automatically becomes unfertile. It is unsuitable for sowing seeds again and if seed be sown, it perishes.

34. Similarly the mind, the seat of desires, becomes sated and disgusted by overindulgence in pleasures, but not by drops of enjoyments, like fire with drops of clarified butter.

35. If what has been described as the characteristic of a particular caste or class in the society be found in another person belonging to a different community, then the latter should be distinctly designated as coming under the class.

1. Śrīvēn svadharma vijnah paradharmat svanus平面īdāt /
CHAPTER TWELVE

Inquiry into the Right Conduct.

(Duties of Brahmārins and Vānaprasthas)

Nārada continued:

1. A Brahmārīn should dwell in the house of his preceptor. He should be self-controlled and comply with what is agreeable to the preceptor. He should behave humbly like a servant, and entertain very strong affection to his teacher.

2. In the morning and in the evening, he should wait upon the preceptor and worship the Fire-god, the Sun-god and other prominent deities. Observing perfect silence at both the twilight (and in the mid-day), he should repeat the Gāyatrī mantra with concentrated mind (while performing Sandhyā).

3. If (and when) called by his preceptor, he should study the Vedas (at his feet) with a perfect concentration and disciplined manner. He should bow down to his (teacher’s) feet with his head, both at the beginning and the completion of the lesson.

4. With his hair braided, he should wear a mekhalā (a girdle of muñja grass), the deer-skin and (two pieces of) cloth, the sacred thread (yajnopavita) and carry with him a staff and a kamanḍalu (water-pot of gourd) and a handful of darbha grass as prescribed (in the Śāstras).1

5. He should beg alms both in the morning and in the evening, and offer it to his teacher. If permitted, he should partake of the food, if not (as a test or a punishment or as occasionally required on days of observing fast), he should fast.

6. He should be of a good character, moderate in eating, alert and prompt (in work), of reverential faith in Śāstras and self-controlled. It is only when absolutely necessary and to that much extent only (e. g. getting alms) that he should deal with women or with those who are influenced (lit. enslaved) by women.

1. According to Śāstras, a Brāhmaṇa pupil should carry a staff of Pañāla tree, a Kṣatatriya of a Bilva tree and a Vaiśya of the Audumbara (Indian fig) tree.

7. A person other than a householder, who has taken the great vow of celibacy, should avoid all talk with young women. For the senses are (by nature) so powerful and violent that they carry away the mind of even a recluse (Yati who is expected to be perfectly self-controlled).

8. A youthful Brahmācārin (student) should not allow a personal service, e.g. combing his hair, massaging, bathing and anointing his person, done by women from his teacher’s family, especially if they are young.

9. For verily a young woman is (like) a fire and a man like pot containing clarified butter. One should avoid (the company of) one’s daughter in a secluded place, and at other times he should remain with her so long as the work or duty demands it (even in public places).

10* So long as by self-realization one has not firmly determined that his body, senses or the universe etc. are illusory

*VR (1): (So long as Īśvara keeps this body (which is the illusion of the Soul) capable of doing work, the notion of duality (viz. one is a god or a man or a Brāhmaṇa) is found to persist and leads to illusions, he should not give up the duties laid down in Sāstras.

Or

(II) Even though one realizes that his Self is distinct from his body, he, so long as he persists to live in his body, should not give up the duties prescribed for him in the Sāstras so long as he is able to discharge them.

VJ. states that the world is real and so long as God keeps the jīva in a worldly knowledge which is unreal and not true, the perverse notions shall persist and bondage of the world due to ignorance shall continue.

VC.: What danger is there to self-controlled man who has abandoned the company of relatives? (The reply:) Even though one has renounced worldly objects, so long as one has not completely wiped out one’s affinity to them from the mind, the notion of duality shall not cease to persist.

GD.: Even though a man is an anīdha (a part) of the blissful Lord, he experiences the contrariety viz. miseries of hell etc.

BP.: So long as the notion of duality persists one should not give up the duties laid down in the Sāstras.
and the jīva has not attained perfect mastery over himself by identifying himself with the Supreme Lord, the notion of duality (between a man and woman) will continue to persist (provoking thereby the desire to enjoy) through false attribution of guṇas.

11. All these (instructions contained from verses 6 to 10) are laid down for the householder, and much more so, even in the case of Saṁnyāsin (a recluse). A householder who is expected to be with his wife at particular period of time, may optionally stay with his preceptor.

12. Those who have taken the vow of Brahmcharya (celibacy) should avoid the use of collyrium, unguents, massage of the body, dealings with women, painting or viewing pictures of women, meat, spirituous liquor (in the case of those who are permitted to drink, honey in the case of Brāhmaṇas), garlands, sandal pigment and ornaments.

13. In this way, having stayed in the preceptor’s house, a dvija (a twice-born Ārya) should study and understand to the best of his ability and to the extent of his requirements, the meaning of three Vedas (Ṛk, Sāman and Yajus), along with their (six) auxiliaries and the Upaniṣads (Vedānta, philosophical treatises).

14. Having presented, if at all he can afford to do so, with what is desired by his preceptor (as “fee for the course”) and having obtained his permission, he (the student) should enter the householder’s life, or retire to the forest (for performing penance etc.), or renounce the world to wander as a Tāti (recluse), or stay with his preceptor (as a lifelong Brahmacārin).

15. He should look upon (conceive) Lord Viṣṇu as if having entered into the fire, the preceptor, himself and the elements (e.g. the earth, the fire) together with all creatures sheltered in Him; for He is their Inner Controller, even though the Lord (having already pervaded these from within and without) does not actually enter.

16. A person belonging to the order of Brahmacharya, Vānaprastha (an anchorite), a samnyāsin (a recluse) or a householder who contemplates thus (the omnipresence of the Lord), and follows the course of duties ordained for his particular āstrama (stage of life), realizes what is required to be known, and attains to the Supreme Brahman.

17. I shall now explain to you the code of conduct approved by the sages and prescribed for Vānaprasthas (anchorites), by observing which, a sage easily attains Maharloka, the heaven of sages.

18. An anchorite should not eat the product of cultivation (e.g. rice, wheat) or anything (like fruits, roots etc.), which though not a product of tillage, ripened before time. He should not partake of food cooked on fire. He should subsist on what is ripe or cooked by rays of the Sun.

19. He should prepare cara1 and purodāsa2 of corn wild growth (Nivāra) and of a permanent nature. When he procures new and fresh eatables, he should reject the old ones (stored by him).

20. It is just for the preservation of the (sacred) fire that he should take shelter in a house or cottage or a cave in mountains. He himself should bear exposure to snow, wind, fire, rain and heat of the Sun.

21-22. The anchorite with matted hair (on the head) should wear (without shaving) the hair on his body, moustaches, beard and nails and dirt (not properly washed). He should take with him kamandalu (a pot of water), deer-skin, staff, bark-garments and utensils of fire worship. The sage should thus wander in the forest for twelve, eight, four, two or one year, i.e. to that length of time which the mind does not get perverted through the (severity of) austerities.

1. cara—An oblation of rice, barley and pulse boiled for presentation to the gods and the manis. ASD. p. 204.

2. purodāsa—Boiled rice rounded into a cake and usually divided into parts which are kept in separate receptacles for offering to different deities.
23. If (after the period of stay in the forest) he finds that, owing to ill health (diseases) or old age, he is incapable of pursuing his courses of duties (as a Vānaprastha) or prosecuting his studies in philosophy, he should adopt the vow of fasting etc. (If he is capable, he should become a saṃnyāsin—a recluse).

24. (Before beginning the fast) he should withdraw and deposit the sacred fires (e. g. āhavanīya and others) within his Self. He should renounce the notions of ‘I’ and ‘Mine’, and should merge the constituents of his body in their own causes (viz. the sky, the air and other three elements).

25. A self-controlled man should merge the cavities in his body (e. g. eyes, ears, nostrils) into the sky (the element—the mahābhūta called ākāśa), his exhalations (vital-breaths) into the air, the temperature of his body into the fire, (fluids like) blood, phlegm and pus into the water and the rest (hard substances like bones, muscles etc.) into the earth—thus assigning them each to its respective origin. (Thus he should merge his gross body).

26. He should consign his speech along with the organ of speech to the Fire, even his hands and handicraft to Indra, his feet along with (the power of) locomotion to Viṣṇu, the organ of pleasure (along with the power of procreation) to Prajāpati (deity presiding over procreation).

27. (He should merge) the organ of defecation and act of excretion in Mṛtyu (the god of death) directing these organs to their proper places (viz. the deities presiding over those particular organs); his auditory sense along with (its object), sound into (deities presiding over) cardinal points; and his tactual organ along with its tactility to the ātman or wind-god).

28. Oh King, he should deposit his eyes (eye-sight) and the colours and forms (the objects of the eye) with the Sun-god, the tongue or its objects of taste such as sweet, bitter etc. in water (or god Varuṇa), and the olfactory sense along with its objects i. e. various smells, with the Earth.

29. He should merge his mind along with its desires and objects in the Moon-god, the intelligence and the objects to be grasped by it in the highest god Brahmā. He should consign actions with self-consciousness to god Rudra through whose instrumentality the activities actuated by the notions of 'I-ness' and 'Mine-ness' proceed. He should merge his chitta (reason, heart) along with Sattva in Kṣetrajña (Hiranya-garbha) and Vaikārika ahamkāra along with guṇas in the Supreme Brahmā.

30. He should then dissolve the earth into water, absorb water into fire, fire into the air and the air into the ether. The ether or Ākāśa is to be merged into the principle called ego (aham), and that into Mahat (the principle of cosmic Intelligence), and that into the unmanifested Prakṛti and that unmanifest Pradhāna into Paramātman (the Supreme Soul).

31. Having thus realized the Soul as identical with Paramātman, and nothing but indestructible consciousness and becoming free from the notion of duality, he should cease to function like fire that has consumed its own source (fuel).

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

The Code of Conduct for Samnyāsins and a dialogue between Avadhūta and Prahlāda

Nārada continued:

1. If a person is thus capable and fit (physically and mentally), he should take to the life of a vagrant recluse. Owning nothing else except his body, he should observe the rule of staying one night in a village, and thus wander over the earth, being totally desireless.

2. If at all he is to wear a piece of cloth, it should be a strip of cloth just sufficient to cover his private parts. Unless there is some serious danger, he should not take anything which has been renounced except the staff and other emblems (e.g. kamaṇḍalu-water-pot) characteristic of a samnyāsin.

1. advaya—with the faith that there is no independent absolute thing other than Hari.
3. Delighted in his own Self and seeking no shelter, he should wander all alone as a mendicant subsisting on alms. He should be friendly to all beings, serene and devoted exclusively to Nārāyaṇa.

4* He should visualize this universe in the immutable ātman (Self) who is beyond (and distinct from) cause and effect and should perceive the Self as the Supreme Brahman present everywhere in the universe, (a product) of causes and consequences.

5. During the mediate state between sleep and wakefulness, one should concentrate on the soul within, and should try to perceive the true nature of the Self. He should look upon bondage and emancipation as merely illusory and not real.

6. He should welcome neither death, which is inevitable, nor life that is transitory. But he should simply wait for the Time which brings about the birth and death of beings (and that of one's body as well).

7. He should not be attached to Śāstras dealing with topics other than ātman. Nor should he try to maintain himself by following any profession (like astrology, medicine practised by him as a grhastra). He should avoid all form of disputation. He should not persistently adhere to any party.

8. He should not attract students. Nor should he study numerous books ¹ (lest they should cause confusion or distraction). He should not undertake the exposition of some sacred text². Nor should he take up the establishment of any institution or monastery.

9. The duties etc. prescribed for the order of recluses (sannyāsins) are not meant for securing religious merit in the case of the noble-souled ones (Paramahamsas) who are of serene and equable minds (The rules are to be observed till the recluse realizes the highest wisdom). Thereafter he may continue to practise the rules (for setting up an ideal life before the public) or discard them.

* VR. asserts the Viśiṣṭādvaita position: Paramātman is distinct from the Sentient (Cid) and the Non-Sentient (A cid). By nature he is free from modifications. He (the recluse) should look upon the universe as the inseparable body of Paramātman Who is the Inner Controller.

¹ Books not dealing with Vedānta.
² Texts other than those on Vedānta—VD.

10. One whose external signs of being a recluse are not evident but continues his purpose (i.e. concentration with the Self), may, though learned, show himself (i.e. behave externally like) a mad person or an ignorant child; though highly intelligent and wise, he should appear to be dumb in the eyes of the public.

11. On this point an old historical (-cum-legendary) account has been traditionally handed down as an illustration. It is the conversation between Prahlāda and a sage Dattātreya¹ observing the Ajagara² mode of life.

12-13. While Prahlāda, the beloved (devotee) of the Lord, accompanied by a few ministers, was touring through various worlds with a view to acquaint himself with the true nature of the people, he happened to see on the top of the Sahyādri (Western ghats) on the bank of the Kāverī, some person lying on bare ground, his pure effulgence being concealed under a coat of dust covering all the part of his body.

14. By his actions, appearances, words of external emblems indicative of his caste (vāraṇa) and stage in life (āśrama), people could not recognize him who or what he was and what he was not.

15. Having bowed the sage by touching his feet with his head and having worshipped him with due formalities, the Asura, (himself) a prominent votary of the Lord, who was curious to know (the truth about) him, (the sage) asked him the following question.

16. "You have a robust body like an industrious person who enjoys a luxurious life. Wealth accrues to persons who are industrious and comforts and luxuries can be afforded by moneyed people. Indeed only the bodies of those who are given to luxurious life become corpulent and not otherwise.

¹. Vide Supra 1.3.11. The Lord incarnated as Datta, the son of Atri and Anasūyā, and taught spiritual lore to king Alarka and Prahlāda.

². Ajagara is a python which is supposed to swallow what comes its way, without making any move on its part. As described in the illustration of Dattātreya below, a person who has adopted the vow of leading Python's way of life, has just to lie on the bare ground under the sky waiting for his death without making any movement—throwing his body at the mercy of the fate. His object is to enjoy all the fruits of his karmas then and there before falling away of his body.

17. Lying supine without doing any work as you do, Oh Brahman, you obviously possess no wealth which is the source of enjoyment (of a luxurious life). If you think proper (to disclose), please tell us how your body is corpulent despite your non-indulgence in luxuries and lack of comforts.

18. Learned, capable, clever, possessing wonderfully sweet power of speech and of equable temper as you are, how is it that you lie down (doing nothing) simply looking on that other people are exerting themselves."

Nārada said:

19. Being thus questioned by Prahlāda, the king of Daityas, the great sage, being magnetized by his nectarlike speech, smilingly spoke to him.

The Brāhmaṇa said:

20. Oh foremost of Asuras! Your honour is esteemed by all great and learned people. By your spiritual insight you certainly know this, viz. the consequences of activity for (obtaining) worldly objects and of renouncing them.

21. Due to your absolute and pure devotion, the glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa always abides in your heart. He disperses your ignorance like unto the Sun dispersing darkness.

22. We (I) however, shall (try to) answer your questions according to what I have traditionally learnt (about them). For you deserve respect from those who desire to purify their hearts.

23. Being (induced) to do various actions by powerful desire which is never satiated by enjoyment of suitable objects, and thus becomes the source of the stream of births (and deaths), I was forced to take birth in various species.

24. While wandering (through various types of existence) by force of karmas, and through sheer providence, I wasbrought to the human form of existence which is a gate-way to heaven or final emancipation or to sub-human life or to human life again.
25. Having observed the frustrations and failures of married couples while performing actions for securing happiness and avoiding pain in this life as well, I retired from worldly-activities.

26. Happiness is the essential nature of the Soul\(^1\). It is manifested after withdrawal and cessation of all activities. Having perceived that enjoyments and experiences are fanciful creations of the mind I lie down (supine enjoying whatever is ordained for me by destiny).

27. Having forgotten that this blissful nature is inherent in one’s self, a man is verily enmeshed into \textit{samsāra} which is terrible (owing to birth, death and other miseries) and strange (as it consists of birth in celestial, subhuman, human and other-species).

28. He who (being ignorant of his innate blissful state) thinks of finding his object (happiness) elsewhere (outside his Self), is like an ignorant fellow who with a desire to get water (to quench his thirst) leaves water (near him but) covered with aquatic weeds and other overgrowth and runs after the mirage.

29. The body and sense-organs are controlled by Destiny. All the actions and efforts repeatedly done through their instrumentality for securing his happiness and removing his miseries by a luckless person, become fruitless.

30. (Granting that a man’s efforts are successful) what pleasure can be derived from the hard-earned wealth and desired objects obtained with great difficulty to a mortal (obsessed with the fear of death) and plagued by (lit. not immune from) three types of miseries such as bodily ailments and others.

31. I perceive the agonies and tensions of wealthy covetous persons who have no control over themselves, and who have lost their sleep, out of fear, as they are suspicious of everybody on all sides.

32. I observe that those who are anxious about their life and wealth, entertain fear from kings, robbers, enemies; their kinsmen, birds and beasts, beggers, Time and themselves, at every moment.

\(^1\) \textit{VJ.} thinks that the grace of the Lord is necessary for the realization of His bliss.

33. (Therefore) a wise man should give up longings for life and property which are the source of sorrow, infatuation, fear, anger, attachment, despondency, over-exertions and such other (troubles).

34. In this world the bee and the big python are our best teachers, for following their example we have attained renunciation and contentment.

35. I have learnt renunciation of all worldly objects from the bee, the gatherer of honey, for any other person may kill the lord and usurp the hard-earned money like honey after killing the bees.

36. Being free from all desires and with contented mind, I accept what is brought to me by providence. If not, I lie inactive like a big serpent for many days, depending on my power.

37. Sometimes I eat scant food; sometimes I enjoy a heavy meal irrespective of the sweetness or otherwise of the food. Sometime I partake of highly rich and dainty dishes and sometimes worthless food.

38. At some places I eat food, that is offered to me with respect and sometimes with irreverence. Sometimes I do justice to food after eating; sometimes I eat food by day or by night as it is offered to me by chance.

39. Remaining contented in mind, I enjoy what is ordained by fate, and I wear linen garments or silks or deer-skin or rags or any other (fabric) that is offered to me.

40. Sometimes I sleep on the bare ground; sometimes on grass or on a heap of leaves or on a slab of stone or in ashes; sometimes I lie inside a mansion on a rich bed over a precious bedstead as desired by God (or other people).

41. Sometimes I take bath with my body anointed with fragrant pigments. I put on rich garments and wear garlands and ornaments. Sometimes I ride in a chariot or on an elephant or on a horse and sometimes I wander stark-naked like an evil spirit, Oh king.

42. I neither revile nor praise people who are of diverse nature. I pray for their welfare and bless them with their union with the Almighty Lord Viṣṇu.

43. One should oblate (merge) one's notion of diversity in the mental faculty that perceives such differences, that mental faculty into mind which mistakes the unreal for the real, the mind into the sattvic ahamkāra and should absorb that ahamkāra through mahat in the Māyā regularly.

44. The sage who perceives the Reality, should merge that Māyā into the realization of his soul. Being devoid of all desires, he should establish himself in self-realization and cease all activities.

45. In this way I have described to you my way of life which is closely guarded as a secret, though it is far different from secular and Śāstric canons of behaviour. (I have thus frankly explained this to you) as you are the beloved of God.

Nārada said:

46. Having heard the code of conduct of the highest order of recluses, the Lord of Asuras (Prahlāda) worshipped him respectfully. Being pleased in mind he bade good-bye, and returned home.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

(The Duties of a householder)

Yudhiṣṭhira said:

1. Oh celestial sage, please explain to me that course of conduct by which a householder like me whose mind is clouded with attachment to house and property, will attain to the above state of emancipation (mokṣa) without difficulty.

Nārada said:

1-A (VRs' text adds): Even though you know it, you have asked this question for the good of the world, Oh king.
I shall explain to you how the duties of a householder lead one to the state of actionlessness (or attainment of Jñāna-yaga).

2. Staying in the household and performing duties (such as sandhyā, worship and five mahā-yajñas) laid down for a householder as direct offering to Lord Vāsudeva (without expecting any return for it), one should wait upon great sages in order to learn truth.

3. Devoutly listening to the nectar-like sweet stories of the incarnations of Viṣṇu during the leisure time after performance of duties he should constantly be associated with (lit. surrounded by) persons who are tranquil by nature.

4. Through companionship with saintly people, he should gradually release himself from attachment to himself, his wife, his sons etc. which are in the process of being separated from him, and should rise above them like a person awakened from a dream (does in the case of objects seen in the dream).

5. A wise man should be disinterested in and dispassionate to his body and house, but should attend to it to the extent to which it is indispensable. Simulating attachment to them, a man should transcend his status as an ordinary human being and be a recluse. Or (carry out his duties in life).

6. Being free from attachment to himself and his property, he should acquiesce in what his kinsmen, parents, sons, brothers and other well-wishers propose and desire.

7. A wise man should carry out his duties while enjoying what he gets from the heaven (e.g. crops due to rain fall), from mines (e.g. gold, precious stones etc.) and what he gets accidentally by wind fall, as all wealth is created by god Viṣṇu (and is obtained through his grace).

8. Embodied beings can lay claim to that much wealth as is just necessary for filling his belly. He who lays claims on the surplus is a thief and deserves punishment.

9. One should look upon beasts, camels, donkeys, monkeys, rats, serpents, birds and flies like one's own sons (and hence these should not be driven out of the house or fields if they enter and begin to eat), for there is very little difference between them and his sons.
10. Even though a man be a householder, he should not put in extraordinary trouble for getting the three puruṣārthas. He should enjoy what is afforded to him by providence according to its place and time.

11. He should duly share his objects of enjoyment with all down to dogs, sinners and people belonging to the lowest strata of the society (lit. who dwell at the end of a village). He should allow his wife whom he ardently claims as his own, to receive guests (unmindful of his inconvenience. ŚR warns that this should not be misconstrued).

12. He who can forego his claim on his wife for whose sake he should lay down his life or would kill his father or preceptor (if he suspects them about their contacts with her) has conquered (secured the grace of) the unconquerable Lord Viṣṇu.

13. How despicable is the body that is convertible into worms (if buried), excretion (if eaten up by carnivorous animals) or ashes (if cremated)! Equally despicable is (the body of) a wife which contributes to its erotic pleasures! How great is the Soul which pervades the whole of the sky!

14. A wise person should maintain his livelihood by food, after offering oblations to the deities in five mahā-yajñas and should relinquish the notion of his claim of what remains as surplus. Thus he would attain to the position of paramahāṁsas.

15. A man should worship the antaryāmin (the Inner Controller) daily by sharing what he has obtained in his own vocation, with gods, sages, human beings, other living beings, pitrīs and his own self.

16. If he possesses all the required materials as well as the requisite qualifications for performing sacrifices, he should worship the Lord according to the procedure laid down in the Śrauta and Kalpa Sūtras.

17. But verily, this Venerable Lord, the Enjoier of Sacrifice is not propitiated to that extent by oblation offered through the (sacrificial) fire as through (morsels of food offered to Him) through the mouths of Brāhmaṇas, Oh King.

18. One should, therefore, worship this Inner Controller (God) through the Brāhmaṇas, gods presiding over five Mahā-yajñas as also through mortals like human beings and other creatures, by offering them objects of enjoyment, according to their respective order, after (feeding) the Brāhmaṇas.

19. If sufficiently rich, a twice-born person (Brāhmaṇa, Kṣattriya and Vaiśya) should perform according to his means, the Śrāddha, i.e. Mahālaya in honour of his (departed) parents as well as their kinsmen and others, in the dark half of Bhādrapada.

20-23. He should (also) perform their Śrāddha at the time of the summer and winter solstices (ayanas), and the vernal and autumnal equinoxes (visuva), during the division of time called Vyatipāta; on the day when a tithi i.e. the lunar day begins and ends between two sun-rises (technically known as dinaksaya); during the lunar and solar eclipses; on the twelfth lunar day, and when the constellations known as Śravaṇa, Dhanisṭhā and Śata-tārakā are on the ascendance; on the third day in the bright half of Vaiśākha (i.e. on Aṣṭaka tṛtīya); on the ninth lunar day in the bright half of Kārttika (known as Aṣṭaka-nawami); on the four Aṣṭakas (eighth lunar day in the dark halves) during the seasons called Hemanta and Śīśira (i.e. on the eighth day in the dark half of the months of Mārgasīrṣa, Pauṣa, Māgha and Phālguna); on the seventh day in the bright half of the month of Māgha; on the fullmoon day when the constellation Magha is ascendant (which is in the month of Māgha) on days when the constellations associated with the names of other (lunar) months are ascendant on a full moon day, or even when the moon rises one dig in less than the full on that day; on any twelfth lunar day when the constellations Anurādhā, Śravaṇa and the three constellations beginning with the word Uttara (viz. Uttarāśadhā, Uttara Bhādrapadā and Uttara Phālgunī) are ascendant; or when the eleventh lunar day (of any month) is associated with (any of) these three constellations; (and lastly) on any day when the constellation under which a person was born or the constellation called Śravaṇa is ascendant.

24. These are very auspicious times which are conducive to the attainment of prosperity to men on these days. On these days a person should, by every means, try to perform pious acts to the best of his abilities. Thus his merits become most effectual and contribute to his longevity.
25. On these days, performance of ablutions, muttering prayer or mantra (Japa), oblations to fire, observance of a sacred vow, worship of gods and Brähmanas and gifts donated in the names of manes, gods, men and creatures bear everlasting fruit.

26. Oh King, Śrāddhas should be performed when it is the time of the purificatory rites observed in the behalf of himself, his wife or children; as well as at the time of the cremation of a dead body or on the death anniversary of a person; and at the time of any other function like marriage.

27. Now I shall narrate to you the (holy) places which enhance religious merits and other good. That is the most sacred place where a worthy and virtuous recipient is found.

28. For he (such worthy recipient) is the very image of the Almighty Lord in whom abides the whole creation—mobile and immobile. That is the hallowed spot where Brähmanas characterised by penance, knowledge and kindness dwell.

29. All the places where the image of Hari or Śāligrama is found (or wherever the worship of Lord Hari is being done) that place is the abode of blessings; and the regions through which rivers like the Gaṅgā and others celebrated in Purāṇas flow.

30. And lakes like Puṣkara and others are situated; and places inhabited by venerable sages and spots known as Kurukṣetra, Gayā, Prayāga (the confluence of the Gaṅgā and the Yamunā) the hermitage of Pulaha known as Śālagrama Kṣetra.

31. Forest like Naimisha (modern Nimsar) Kanyātīrtha (Cape Comerin), the holy bridge built by Rāma at Rāmeśvara, Prabhāsa, and Dvārakā, Vārāṇasī, Mathurā, the lake Pampā and Bindusara where stood the hermitage of Kardama the father of Kapila.

32. The Hermitage of Nārāyaṇa (Badarikāśrama), the Alakananda, Citrakūṭa where stood the hermitage of Rāma and Sitā and such other places; all principal mountain ranges such as Mahendra (Eastern Ghāṭs), Malaya (Western Ghāṭs) and others, Oh King.

33. Those are the sacred-most spots where the idols of Hari are installed. He who is desirous of blessings, should constantly sojourn at these places. Righteous duties performed here yield fruits thousand times more than what accrues at other places.

34. The foremost judges of worthy recipients and wise people have decided that in this world Hari and Lord Hari alone is the only worthy recipient. Oh Lord of the earth, everything mobile and immobile is constituted of him.

35. Accordingly, Oh King, even though gods, sages, worthy persons, such as the sons of god Brahmā and others were present at your Rājasūya sacrifice, Lord Kṛṣṇa was conclusively selected as deserving the first place in the adoration at the sacrifice, owing to his worthiness.

36. The great tree in the form of the universe (Brahmāṇḍa) is crowded with multitudes of jīvas and is very extensive, but Acyuta, being the root of that tree, Hari's worship brings gratification to all the jīvas and to one's own soul.

37. The dwellings (bodies) in the form of those of men, sub-human beings, sages and gods have been created by him. He dwells in these bodies in the form of jīva and hence he is called Puruṣa (the Dweller of habitations or Inner Controller).

38. In these bodies, the Lord is present (i.e. manifests himself) in different degrees (of intelligence, wisdom etc.). Hence, even though every man is a worthy recipient, he is proportionately so according to the manifestation of the Soul (i.e. spiritual wisdom, penance etc.) in him.

39. Oh King, wise sages took into account the mutual hatred, disregard among men in the Tretā and other ages, and have therefore instituted Hari's idols for worship, and other religious duties.

40. Some persons with perfect devotion in the worship of Hari propitiate him thereby, but to some the worship of Hari, even though performed, is not fruitful as they hate the Lord in the form of his creation.

41. Oh Lord of Kings, even amongst men Brāhmaṇa is regarded as the really worthy recipient as he bears in him the body of Hari, viz. the Vedas, along with the virtues of penance, learning and contentment.

42. Oh King, the Brāhmaṇas who purify the three worlds by the dust of their feet form really the Supreme Deity of Lord Kṛṣṇa who is the Soul of the universe.
CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Exposition of right Conduct (Concluded).

Nārada said:

1. Some Brāhmaṇas (ṛhasṭhas) are devoted to rituals prescribed for their particular āśrama, some (vānaprasthas), are bent on performing austere penance, others (brahmacārins) to the study of the Vedas, some to the teaching and exposition of the Vedas, while some to spiritual enlightenment, (as in the case of saṁnyāsins) and some to perfection in Yoga.

2. A person desirous of attaining eternally lasting merit should offer the gifts of food etc. intended for manes—(pitṛs) and those meant for gods, to persons who are solely devoted to spiritual knowledge, and in their absence to others according to their merits.

3. One should feed two Brāhmaṇas in rites connected with gods, three for ceremonies (Srāddha) intended for (pitṛs) or may feed one only in each. Even though a person is very affluent, he should not invite a large number.

4. If invitations are given on a large scale, and food etc. is distributed among relatives, conditions regarding proper place, time, piety, devotion, proper materials, worthy recipients etc. are not properly observed.

5. When proper time and place offers itself, food proper for sages and offered to god Hari, if given with proper formalities and devotion to a worthy person, yields desired objects and everlasting fruit.

6. While distributing food to gods, sages, pitṛs, beings and one's relatives, one should look upon these all as identical with the Supreme Person.

7. A person who knows the essence of dharma should not give (serve) flesh (non-vegetarian food), nor should eat it at the time of Srāddha, for there is no real gratification in slaughter of animals (flesh); for there is supreme satisfaction with the type of food proper for sages.

8. For those persons who desire to follow the right course of conduct, there is no supreme dharma other than abstinence from violence to living beings caused by thought, word and deed.

9. Some persons who are well-versed in sacrificial lore and who have spiritual wisdom, become desireless and offer the ritualistic sacrifices requiring external actions, into the fire of self-control kindled by spiritual knowledge.

10. Living beings become apprehensive on seeing a person who performs sacrifices with gross materials. (They say) “This cruel man, not grasping the spirit of the rules prescribed for Yajñas, and thirsting after my life, will surely kill me”.

11. Therefore, a person knowing the real path of righteousness should be satisfied with the hermit’s fare providentially obtained by him, and should every day carry on the prescribed daily and occasional duties.

12. A man versed in righteousness should steer clear of the five forms (branches) of adharma (impiety), viz. vidharma, paradharma, abhāsa, upamā, chala, regarding them all as adharma (impiety).

13. Vidharma is that which, though practised as a dharma, obstructs real dharma (e.g. black-magic of the tantras). Paradharma is the course of conduct ordained for another (varṇa or āśrama (e.g. Fighting in the case of Brāhmaṇas). Upadharma is the heresy opposing the Vedas (e.g. path or duties prescribed in āgama) or hypocrisy, while chala is the distortion of the text showing apparent conformity to the letter of the scriptures or quibbling.

14. The course of conduct different from the duties (prescribed by Vedas for different varṇas—classes in society—and āśramas—stages in life) but adopted according to one’s fancy (e.g. the avadhūta mode of life is (dharma-) abhāsa. Who would regard dharma which is agreeable to his innate disposition, as not conducive to his (inner) peace and prosperity!

15. An indigent person should not try to earn money either for the sake of charitable donations etc. or for the maintenance of his life. Effortless state of one who ceases from activities becomes his means of subsistence, as in the case of the (proverbial) Python.
16. How can the happiness enjoyed by a self-contented person cherishing no desires and delighted in his own self, be obtained by a person who, actuated by passion and covetousness, runs in all directions in quest of wealth.

17. All directions are full of happiness to a man who is ever contented in his mind, just as the feet protected by shoes have complete safety against gravels, thorns and others.

18. With what will not a self-contented man pull on—say even with water? Due to beggarly yearnings for the pleasures of the sex and tongue, a man behaves like a dog.

19. The spiritual power, learning, (power accrued from) penance, and glory of a discontented Brähmana leak away (and are exhausted) and his spiritual knowledge is also dissipated.

20. A person may cease to feel the sexual urge due to intensity of hunger and thirst (as these are much more powerful), he may see the end of anger when its fruit (revenge) is achieved. But he never sees the end of avarice even after conquering all the quarters and enjoying the sovereignty of the world.

21. There are a number of learned scholars of extensive knowledge, capable of dispelling the doubts of others and leaders of assemblies who have fallen down (into deep hell) through discontent.

22. One should overcome passion by foregoing the desire of love for it, anger by eschewing desire; greed, by looking upon wealth and worldly things as evil; and fear, by the perception of the truth (about the objects of fear).

23. (He should conquer) grief and delusion by realizing the distinction between the Self (ātman) and the non-self (anātman); hypocrisy, by association with the great; interruption to Yoga (mental concentration) by observing silence; and violence to other beings, by bodily inactivity (to secure merit, wealth etc.).

24. He should overcome troubles given by other beings by cherishing compassion (even towards the trouble-makers); and those caused by destiny or gods by equipoise and concentration of the mind; the ailments of the body by the force of Yoga (prāṇayāma and other Yoganic expedients); and sleep by recourse to sattvic food.

25. He should vanquish rajas and tamas by sattva, and sattva by complete withdrawal of attachment (and activity for it). A man can easily overpower all these above-mentioned through intense devotion to the spiritual preceptor.

26. The spiritual guide is verily the Venerable Lord Himself who imparts to a man the light of knowledge. But the spiritual knowledge or learning of a person who entertains the perverted notion that his preceptor is an ordinary mortal, is as useless as the bath of an elephant (which besmears itself with dust immediately after the bath).

27. For the spiritual preceptor whom people regard as merely a human being, is directly the Almighty God, the Supreme Ruler both of Prakṛti and Puruṣa (matter and the individual Soul) and His feet are sought after by masters of Yoga.

28. All the precepts ordained (for performance of sacrifices etc.) are intended for one purpose, viz. restraint of six passions (e.g., desire, anger and others or alternatively five senses and the mind). If they do not lead to the accomplishment of Yoga (viz. dhyāna, dhāraṇā and samādhi) all the above is a source of sheer (fruitless) labour.

29. Just as the rewards and procurements of agriculture and other pursuits do not bear the fruits of Yoga (viz. Final Emancipation from samsāra), the performance of sacrifices and undertakings for public welfare (e.g., construction of tanks etc.) will lead to evil results in case of a person whose mind is attached to external objects (of worldly nature).

30. He who has resolved to subjugate his mind should dissociate himself from all attachments and belongings; he should become a recluse and live alone in secluded place; eating moderately what he gets as alms.

31. One should arrange his seat in a clean hallowed level place and seat himself in an erect, stable, comfortable posture, repeating silently the sacred syllable Om, Oh King.

32. With his gaze fixed on the tip of his nose one should control one’s breath (prāṇa and apāna—inhalation and exhalation) by inhaling, suspending and exhaling his breath till his mind gives up desires.
33. A wise man should retrieve his ever-roving mind smitten with desires from whatever external object it goes and confine it into his heart.*

34. A recluse who strives to exercise such control day and night, finds in a short period that his mind attains quiescence like fire for lack of fuel.

35. When the mind, not agitated by desires and passions, and with its activities calmed down, is touched by the ecstasy of the realization of the Brahman, it never responds to external objects in sāṃsāra.

36. If a recluse who has formerly renounced his house which is a nursery of dharma, artha and kāma (three objects of human life) again takes to the householder’s life and enjoys them, the shameless fellow (is like a man who) is swallowing up his vomited food.

37. If those who have regarded their own body as distinct from Soul, mortal and reducible to excrement (if the body is eaten up by a carnivorous animal), worms (if interred in a grave), and ashes (if cremated on a pyre), highly extol it as if it is the Ātman, such persons are the vilest ones.

38-39. Avoidance of religious rites and duties in the case of grhastha, non-observance (of the vow of celibacy, studies etc.) in the case of a brahmacārin, residence in an inhabited locality in the case of ascetics performing penance, and lack of self-control in the case of recluses (sannyāsins)—all these are the accursed banes of their respective āśramas as these certainly reduce their āśramas to mockery. Out of compassion, one should neglect these fellows who are deluded by the illusive power (Māyā) of the Almighty God.

* * *

(1) Śucau deśe praviṣṭāćyā sthiraṁ āsanam ātmanah / nātyucchitām nātinīcam caññājanakaḥ / B.G. 6.11

(2) Samām kāya-sīro-grtvam dhārayannacalam śiraḥ / samprekṣyā nārsikāgam svam dīśednavalokayan / B.G. 6.13

(3) Yato yato nisarati manas caḷacakam asṭhiram / tasaḥ tato nityamaitad āśmann eva ca taḥ naḥ / B.G. 6.26
40. If a person realizes his Self as Supreme Brahman, all the traces of attachment are shaken off from his mind by that spiritual knowledge. (It is not known) with what ulterior motive or for whom does this addict to worldly pleasures nourishes his body.

41. The wise say that this body is a chariot, the senses are the horses, mind, the controller of senses\(^1\), is the reins, the objects of senses are the paths, intellect (reasoning faculty) is the charioteer, and the heart (power is the all-embracing cordage created by God.

42. The ten vital breaths\(^2\) from the axis, Dharma and Adharma its two wheels, the Soul who identifies himself with the body due to Ego (ahamkāra) is the owner (occupant) of the chariot. They say that the sacred syllable OM is the bow\(^3\), the pure Self is the arrow and Paramātman (the Supreme Soul) is the target.

43-44. Love, hatred, greed, sorrow, infatuation, fear, pride, haughtiness, disgrace, jealousy, deceitfulness, violence, envy, passion, negligence, hunger, sleep—these and the like are the enemies to be vanquished. These are born of rajas and tamas and rarely from sattva. (At the time of concentration of the mind, the appearance of ideas of doing good is also a distraction and hence inimical.

45. While yet he continues to hold the chariot in the form of human body with all its constituent parts (the sense organs) under his control, he, deriving his strength from Lord Viṣṇu, and wielding the sword of spiritual knowledge sharpened through the service of the highly exalted Souls, should put an end to all the (aforesaid) enemies. Enjoying to his utmost satisfaction the highest bliss of the Self, he should attain (perfect) tranquillity and cast off this (body).

---

1. átmānam rathinam viddhi Śarīraṁ ratham eva tu /
   buddhim tu sārathim viddhi, maṇah pragrahom eva ca /
   Indriyāṇi hayānāh viśayānī teṣu govardan ||
   — Kaṭha Upaniṣad 1.3.3-4

2. They are: Prāṇa, Apāna, Samāna, Vyāna and Udāna, Nāga, Kūrma, Krkala, Devadatta and Dhanañjaya.

46. Otherwise, these wicked horses in the form of senses and the (feeble) charioteer take the careless and unwary occupant astray to the path of Pravṛtti and land him among a band of robbers, viz., objects of sense-enjoyment. Those robbers hurl him among with the horses and the charioteer in the deep well of blinding darkness in the form of samsāra beset with the terrible fear of death.

47. Acts prescribed in the Vedas are of two kinds: Pravṛtti (leading to enjoyment of worldly life) and Nivṛtti (leading to spiritual life). By performance of Pravṛtti karma a person is born again in samsāra, while by Nivṛtti karma he attains to immortality (Mokṣa).

48-49. Ritual (like Śyenā-yāga) to destroy the enemies and sacrifices involving slaughter of animals, Agnihotra (maintenance of daily domestic sacrificial worship), Darśa (sacrifice to be performed on the New Moon day), Paurnimāsya (sacrifice on the Full Moon day), Cāturmāsya (a sacrifice to be performed at the beginning of a quarter—four monthly division—of the year), animal-sacrifice, Soma-sacrifice, Vaiṣṇava (oblations to the Vaiṣṇavas offered before taking meals) and Bāliharana (symbolic offer of food to demigods, household divinities, men and other creature) are known as sacrificial acts; while construction of temples, gardens, tanks or wells and booths supplying water to men and animals, form (what is known as) Pūrta acts. Both of these (iṣṭa and pūrta) are included under Pravṛtti karma.

50-51. (The gradual ascension of the departed soul is marked by the subtle modifications of materials of his astral body liṅga-sarīra which is supposed to be escorted by the deities presiding over), the smoke, the night, the dark half of the month, the dakṣināyana (representing the Sun’s apparent movement to the South of equator), the orb of the Moon. (After enjoying the fruit of his action, the path of descent of that jīva is through) the New Moon day, annual plants and creepers, food grains and the semen (resulting thereby)—this is the path of Pīṭras which leads to birth again. Having gone through these stages one by one, a jīva is born again in this world.

1. The belief in the journey of the Soul by the Path of Pīṭras (pīṭra.
52. A twice-born person (viz. Brähmanā, Kṣattriya and Vaiśya) who is consecrated with the sixteen purificatory rites from garbhadhāna to the funeral obsequies, oblates all his activities as sacrifice into his five cognitive senses kindled by the light of spiritual wisdom.

53. He offers (i.e. merges) the senses into the mind or the thinking faculty full of thoughts, the mind born of Vāikārika (sattvic) āhamkāra into the Speech; the speech into the body of articulate sounds (which go to form Speech), and that collection of sounds into Prāṇava OM; he should merge that into Bindu, the Bindu into Nāda, the Nāda into Prāṇa (vital breath) and Prāṇa in the Supreme (Brahman).

54-55. The path wherein the progress is watched by deities presiding over Fire, the Sun, the Day Time, the Evening (close of the day), the bright fortnight, the full Moon day, Uttarāyana (the period when the Sun appears to move to the North of the equator), god Brahmā.¹ (Brahmā’s region marks the highest point in the ascent of the departed Soul. After the termination of the person of enjoyment in the Brahman loka he proceeds to) Viśva (when the Soul identifies himself with gross matter), Taijasa (wherein the Soul merges the gross into the subtle upādhi, and with his subtle upādhi is absorbed into Kāraṇa upādhi he becomes) Prājña, (after merging of Kāraṇa upādhi he becomes) the Turiya (when he is mere witness of all the states) — all these stages being absorbed into one he becomes Pure Self, i.e. is liberated. This path is known as the path of gods (deva-yāna). Going through these stages serially, this propitiator of the (Supreme) Self being established into the Supreme Self attains to perfect tranquillity and never returns (to samsāra)² yāna) is very old. In fact the above verses echo verbatim Chāndogya Upa. 5.10. 3-6.

Also: Dhaúmo vātris tathā kṣṇah samādhi dāksaṇāyanam |
       tatra Cāndramasam āṣotir Togi prāpya navanta][

---B.G. 8.25.

1. aṣṭa jyotir ahaḥ suklaḥ samādhi uttarāyaṇam |
       tatra prayātā garbhandi Brahma Brahma-vido janah][

—BG. 8.24.

2. VJ. states that every higher stage is more blessed than the former. When he ultimately attains to the Supreme Self, he becomes established in perfect bliss whence there is no return to Samsāra.
56. He who, through Śātric point of view, distinctly and correctly understands these paths of Pitṛs and gods as created by the Vedas, does not get deluded (and does not fall down to a lower stage in life), even though he still abides in this (physical) body.

57.* For, the knower of the path factually constitutes whatever exists before the creation and after the extinction of the body; he himself is whatever is outside the body (external world to be enjoyed) and inside the body (the enjoyer of the world), what is high and low, knowledge and the object of knowledge, the world and the object denoted by it, darkness as well as light.

58. Just as a reflection, though logically disproved in every way, is supposed to be something real, so objects which are cognised by senses are imagined to be really existent. But their objective reality is difficult to be proved.

59. (Here the unreality of the body is logically proved). This "shadow" (like psycho-physical organism called

1. Is not attached to either of the paths—S.D.

* VR.: Before the creation and after the destruction of the universe in and out of the living beings during the tenure of the universe whatever exists high or low, consciousness (Jiva) and the insentient things to be known, the word and the thing described darkness (Mūla Prakti) and light (Samaśti-Jiva)—these all are Paramātman.

 VR. interprets abhāsa as (1) the visible physical body and (2) the body in the dream state and gives two explanations:

(1) The actual body though continues to be undestroyed does not deserve to be regarded as Puruṣārtha. So are the objects of senses, unworthy of pursuit as objects of human life (Puruṣārtha).

(2) Just as the body in the dream state disappears at the time of waking, so is the body in the waking state unreal as the eternal qualities of the Soul are not found therein.

B.P. and SD. seem to accept this interpretation.

V.J. states the dvātva point of view as follows:
The body which is prakṛtimba is (as per samiti texts) Vastu as the Supreme Self, abides in it. The body and other objects have a real existence as god and nobody else can create them.

 VR.: The shadow of trees etc. which are products of the elements like the earth and other elements is neither their collection nor modification; it is neither apart from the tree nor connected with it but is impermanent (aniṣṭa); so is relation of the body and the ātman. The body is not the ātman.

V.J. interprets chāyā as an aspect of state. He explains, "As none else but god has created everything in this universe it is real; for the bhūtas are neither a collection, compound or the modification of other bhūtas e.g., the earth or water etc." body which is regarded as a combination of five elements such as the earth and others) is nothing of (unrelated to) the earth and other elements; for it is neither a collection or a mixture nor a compound or modification. It is neither of them separately or conjointly. Hence, it is unreal.

60. (He now shows that the constituents making up the body are unreal). The ingredients or “the roots” of the body, viz. the five gross elements being themselves composed of components, cannot exist apart from their subtle forms (tanmātras) which form their components. And when the whole i.e. combination of constituents) proves to be unreal, the parts (or constituents) ipso facto cease to be real.

61. Objection: In case the existence of an individual avayavin is denied, the identity of the same individual at different stages in life or periods of time cannot be recognized. The reply:

When there is no difference in Paramātman, it is through similarities between the successive appearances that the mistake in identification will take place while the influence of avidyā survives. The force of Śāstric injunctions and prohibition is similar to the distinction between wakefulness and sleep, both perceived during the dream-stage1.

62* A contemplative sage who, through the realization of the Self comprehends the unity of Bhāva (thought), Kriyā (action) and Drauya (materials) of the ātman, shakes off the three dreamy states, viz., wakefulness, dream and sleep.

63. Bhāvādvaita (non-duality of thought) is the comprehension of the essential one-ness of cause and effect like that in the thread and cloth (woven out of thread), their difference being unreal.

64. Oh Yudhiṣṭhira (son of Pṛthā Kunti)! The resignation of all acts performed through the instrumentality of

1. VR.: The injunctive and interdictory orders in the Śāstric texts may be binding till this body lasts, just as the distinction between the state of wakefulness and sleep in dreams lasts till the dream continues.

2. The terms are defined in the following verses.

* VJ.: A sage who comprehends the meaning of Śāstras knows the identity (advaita) in Bhāva, Kriyā and Drauya. thought, words and deeds directly to the Supreme Brahman himself, is the Kriyādvaita (non-duality of action).

65. The Dravyādvaita (non-duality of substances) is the realization of artha and kāma (wealth, property and desire) of one's own self and his wife, children as well as all other embodied beings.

66. Except in the case of calamity (i.e. normally) one should perform one's duties with the materials the acquisition of which is permitted by whatever means, from whatever source and at whatever time and place, (to the man's class and stage in society).

67. Oh King! He who abides by these and other duties prescribed for him in the Vedas and is deeply devoted to Lord Kṛṣṇa, attains to the Lord's realm (or state of godhood) even though he be staying at home.

68. Oh King of kings! Just as you (and your brothers) tided over a series of unsurmountable difficulties by the grace of the Lord and have performed sacrifices after conquering the guardian-elephants of all quarters, so you may cross over this samsāra through the grace of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the saviour of all.

69. In the previous Māhākalpa, I was born as a Gandharva named Upabarhaṇa and was highly respected among the Gandharvas.

70. Being an amiable person with beautiful appearance, comeliness, sweet in speech and fragrance, I was a favourite with women. I was always intoxicated and extremely lascivious.

71. Once upon a time, in a sacrifice performed by gods Gandharvas (celestial musicians) and Apsaras (heavenly damsels) were invited by the Prajāpatis (Lords of creations) to chant verses in honour of Lord Hari.

72. On coming to know of that invitation, I, in the company of women, went there (drunk) singing (profane songs). Being informed of my contemptuous conduct the creators of the universe cursed with their ascetic power: "Being bereft of your glory, do you be born instantly as a Śūdra, as you have behaved disrespectfully."

73. At first I was born of a female-servant. Even in that birth through my reverential service to and association with sages who had realised Brahman, I became (lit. attained the status of being) Brahmā's son.

74. The righteous course of conduct prescribed for house-holders and which is capable of destroying sins, has been described to you in details. Following this course, a householder easily attains to the goal of a satyāsīn, viz. Mokṣa (Liberation).

75. In this world you are certainly highly fortunate inasmuch as sages who sanctify the world come to your house where the Supreme Brahman disguised in a human form resides (with you).

76. This (Lord Kṛṣṇa) is verily the Supreme Brahman who is the embodiment of the realization of the ecstatic bliss of eternal emancipation which is sought after by great sages. This venerable Lord is your beloved friend, maternal cousin, your most adorable preceptor, your (very) Soul, and the executor of your commands.

77. May this Lord of Sātvatas (Lord Kṛṣṇa) be propitious unto us—Lord Kṛṣṇa whose essential form (nature) could not be adequately (comprehended and) described with their intellectual faculties even by great gods like Śiva, Brahmā and others, and who is worshipped by us in silence, devotion and tranquillity.

Śri Śuka said:

78. Hearing the above discourse of the divine sage Nārada, the foremost one of Bharatas (Yudhiṣṭhira) was highly delighted and overwhelmed with devotional love worshipped Kṛṣṇa.

79. The sage who was duly worshipped, took leave of Kṛṣṇa and Yudhiṣṭhira. Yudhiṣṭhira was highly amazed to learn that Kṛṣṇa was the Supreme Brahman.

80. Thus the genealogy of the different dynasties of the daughters of Dakṣa have been severally described to you, and gods, Asuras, human beings and other mobile and immobile creation in the world are included in these (dynasties).
SKANDHA EIGHTH

CHAPTER ONE

Description of Manvantaras

The King (Parikṣit) requested:

1. Here (in the 7th book) I have heard from you, in details, the history of the dynasty of Svāyambhuva Manu in which were born the progenitors of the universe like Marīci and others and their progeny. Now relate to us, Oh preceptor, the history of other Manus¹.

2. Oh Brahman! Be pleased to relate to us who are (eagerly) listening, the history of all those Manu-epochs (wherein) wherever the incarnations and great exploits of Hari, the greatest of the great, are sung by the wise.

3. Do you also tell (in details), what Lord Hari, the creator and protector of the universe has accomplished in the past Manvantara, is doing in the present one, and will work in the Manu-epochs to come, Oh Brahman.

The sage (Śuka) replied:

4. In this current Kalpa (—Brahmā's day), six Manu-epochs beginning with Svāyambhuva have elapsed. Of these, the first Manvantara (Svāyambhuva) has been described to you, along with the creation of gods and other creatures, during this period.

5. The Lord incarnated as (Yajña) the son of (Svāyambhuva) Manu's daughter Ākūti to enlighten her in the righteous path and as (Kapila) the son of (the same) Manu's daughter Devahūti for imparting spiritual wisdom.

¹. GS. adds:
   v.1. the second half of this verse:
   aṣṭa dharmaḥ ca vividhāḥ ca cāturvarṇāḥ hṛtiḥ sukhaḥ

Here various courses of righteous and auspicious duties pertaining to four varṇas are described.
6. I have previously (in Skandha III) narrated to you the work done by venerable Kapila. I shall (now) relate to you, Oh Chief of Kurus, what the glorious Lord Yajña did.

7. Being indifferent and unattached to sensual enjoyment, and having abdicated his kingship, Lord Svāyambhuva Manu, the spouse of Satarūpā, entered the forest, along with his queen, to practice penance.

8. Touching the ground with one foot (standing on one leg) for one hundred years, on the bank of the Sunandā, he practised terribly austere penance, Oh Bhārata, and chanted the following (prayer):

Manu said

8A. With his vision uninterrupted, this Vāsudeva dwells in all bodies. He does not perceive the (evolution, continuance and dissolution of) universe with the help of another. He is the cause of the (sentient and nonsentient) universe. Hence his vision (and power of controlling from within).

9.  By him the universe is endowed with consciousness, but unto whom (none in) the universe (can) impart consciousness. He remains awake (as a witness) while the universe is in sleep (even during Pralaya). No creatures can know him but he knows all. (He is the ātman).

10.  Whatever is animate (and inanimate) in this uni-

* The next verses are based on Upaniṣadic texts and are known as Mantropaniṣad.

 It is the Sun which prompted by Hari gives light and heat to the universe, and from which, tapas, the root cause of all power becomes possible. Even the Sun does not know Lord Hari who remains awake while it (the Sun) sets. But Hari knows it fully—VJ.

 (i) Everything sentient and insentient in the universe has been penetrated and controlled (from within) by the Supreme Soul who is its main support. Do not think that the re is anything absolutely independent of and existing separately from Him. Everything belongs to Him. Do not covet for anything as it depends (for its very existence) upon Him only.—VR.

(ii) The whole of the universe (beginning with the Sun) consisting of the created and yet-to-be-created mobile and immobile objects in the range of Prakṛti, is the abode of the Lord (who is their creator). Therefore, verse,—the whole universe is pervaded by the Supreme Soul. Therefore you should make your living by whatever has been allotted to you by him (or what is given to you, after offering it to him\(^1\)). Do not covet another person's riches.\(^2\)

11. Resort to the self-illuminating Lord who is the abode (the Inner Controller) of all beings and yet unconcerned and aloof from them like Suparṣa (or the bird of beautiful wings, the symbol of Ātman, the companion of jīva in Upani-sads like the Muṇḍaka 3.1.1), whom though he sees all, no eye (created being) can see (as he is beyond sense-perception), and whose vision (knowledge) never vanishes, (as he is knowledge incarnate).

12. The attributes like beginning, middle and the end cannot be predicated of him (being present in all), he has none that is his own or as belonging to another. (Being all-pervading) the distinction of 'in-ness' and 'out-ness' is not-applicable to him. All these stages (of creation, subsistence and destruction) are attributable to the universe which is his manifestation. Hence, he is the Reality, the supreme truth, the great Perfect Brahman.

13. He (the Supreme Being) has the universe as his body (or he contains the universe within himself at the time of the Deluge) He has innumerable designations. He is the Absolute Ruler, the Supreme Truth, self-effulgent, uncreated, eternal ancient Being. By his (Māyā) Potency, which is also uncreated, he brings about the creation (sustenance and destruction) of this (universe). By his eternal knowledge and wisdom, he sets aside Māyā and remains actionless (in his original state as Brahman).

14. (As the Lord initiates action e.g. creation of the universe etc. just to return to actionlessness) so the sages wish

Oh mind, be satisfied, maintain yourself with whatever has been given to you by Him. Do not covet for His omniscience and absolute blissfulness. Nor long for what the Lord has given to another person—VJ.

(iii) Everything in the universe is created by the Lord for His sport. Even if you possess abundant wealth, maintain yourself like a worker getting his wages after giving the 1st priority to His service (and that of His devotees). —VC.

1. Even the wealth in your house belongs to God—GS.

2. This is a verbatim reproduction of Ḫa Upha. 1.
to undertake the religious duties with the object of attaining to actionlessness or Liberation (Mokṣa). For, a person who performs actions (dedicating them to the Lord) generally attains to Mokṣa (lit. stage of actionlessness).

15. The Supreme Lord of glorious powers engages himself in acts, but is not attached to them, for through realization (of the blissful nature) of his Self, he has all his objects achieved. Hence, those who follow him do not come to grief.

16. I (Śvāyambhūva Manu) take shelter in the Almighty Lord who (out of grace) engages himself in activities (such as creation etc. of the universe or follows the path of Veda in his incarnations as Rāma, Kṛṣṇa etc.) yet is absolutely free from egotism as he is full of wisdom. Being Perfect, he is above all cravings (for blessings etc). Being himself the Master, he is not impelled by others; he is yet steadfast in the path of action (according to the incarnation taken by him) as he has to set an example to people and he is the exponent of the path of righteousness

Śrī Śuka said:

17. Seeing him thus repeating the Mantropanisad (the mystical prayer based on Upanisadic texts) in meditation, Asuras and Rākṣasas fell upon him to devour him out of hunger.

18. The all-pervading Hari in the form of Yajña, seeing them determined to kill Manu, killed them with the help of gods known as Yāma (who were his sons), and ruled over the Heaven (as the Indra thereof).

19. The second Manu was Svārociṣa, the son of Fire God. He had Dyumat, Suṣeṇa, Rociṣmat as his prominent sons.

2. Bh.P. 12.7.15 mentions that each Manvantara is presided over by a Manu as its head, a group of gods (the Manu's sons), an Indra, seven sages and an incarnation of Lord Viṣṇu. Thus in the first Manvantara, Śvāyambhūva (the son of Brahmā) was the Manu; the gods were known as Yāma; Yajña was the incarnation of Lord Viṣṇu who officiated as Indra also; and the seven sages were Marici, Atri, Angrī, Pulaha, Kratu, Pūlastya and Vasiṣṭha.
20. There Rocana was the Indra, and the gods were (his sons) Tuṣita, and others (Toṣa, Pratoṣa, Santeṣa, Bhadra, Śānti, Iḍaspati, Idhma, Kavi, Vibhu, Svahna, Sudeva, Rocana as listed in the fourth Skandha). The seven sages, well-versed in the Vedas and the knowledge of Brahman, were Urja (son of Vasiṣṭha), Stambha (son of Kāśyapa) and others (prāṇa, Brhaspati, Datta (son of Atri), Atri, Cyavana as enumerated in the Harivamśa).

21. From the sage Veda-Śiras and through his wife Tuṣitā by name, the Lord Viṣṇu was born and was well known as Vibhu.

22. Eighty-eight thousand sages who have undertaken the vow of austerities, followed his vow of celibacy, as he was celibate since boyhood.

23. The third Manu was by name Uttama, the son of Priyavrata. He had sons prominent among whom were Pāvana, Sṛṇjaya, Yajñahotra, Oh King.

24. In that Manvantara, Pramada and other seven sons of Vasiṣṭha were the seven sages. The three groups of gods were Satya, Vedaśruta and Bhadra, and Satyajit was the Indra.

25. The glorious Supreme Lord was born from Dharma through his wife Sunṛtā and became known as Satyasena. Satyavrata gods were also born along with him.

26. As a friend of the Indra Satyajit, he killed wicked Yakṣas and Rākṣasas who practised hypocrisy and were of bad character, and also the hosts of evil spirits who harmed living beings.

27. The fourth Manu was by name Tāmasa, and was the brother of Uttama. He had ten sons such as Prithu, Khyāti, Nara, Ketu and others.

28. In the Manvantara called Tāmasa, the gods were of three groups, Satyaka, Hari and Vira, and the Lord of the Heavens was Trisikha, and the seven sages were Jyotis, Dhāma and others (namely Prithu, Kāvyā, Caitra, Agni, Dhanada, and pîvara according to Harivamśa).

29. The gods were called Vaidhṛti, as they were the sons of Vindhṛti, Oh King. They, with their own intellectual power, retained the Vedas which were lost in the course of time.

30. In that Manvantara was born Lord Hari from Harimedhas through Harini, and he rescued the big elephant from the grip of an alligator.

The King Requested:

31. Oh son of Vyasa, we are desirous of hearing from you how Hari delivered the abovementioned King of Elephants seized by the alligator.

32. Wherever the Supreme Lord Hari of most hallowed renown is sung, that story is extremely sacred, praiseworthy, auspicious and contributory to our welfare.

Suta said:

33. When the son of Vyasa was urged to continue the narration by King Parikshit, who had determined to die of starvation, Suka congratulated the king with delight and continued (his narration) in the assembly of sages who were listening with rapt attention, Oh Brähmanaś.

CHAPTER TWO

The Elephant Leader seized by the Alligator

Śri Śuka said:

1. Oh King, there was a mountain well known as Trikūṭa. The beautiful mountain was ten thousand yojanas in height and was surrounded by the milky ocean.

2. It was wide on all sides to the same extent as its height. It had three peaks of gold, silver and iron (respectively) wherewith it illuminated the milky ocean, the cardinal points and the sky.

3. (It stood radiating its charms) in all directions by its other summits which were variegated (in colours) with precious stones and mineral ores, and were covered with clusters of trees, creepers and shrubs of various kinds, and was resounded with the cascades of mountain torrents.

4. With its feet washed by the waves of milk on all sides, it makes the earth appear dark-green with its rocks and pebbles of emeralds.

5. Its valleys were resorted to by sporting Siddhas, Cāraṇas, Gandharvas, Vidyādharaś, big serpents, Kinnarās and Apsaras (celestial nymphs).

6. While its caves were resonant with the echoes of the music (of Kinnarās etc.), proud lions suspecting it to be due to the presence of a rival lion, impatiently roared back in indignation towards them.

7. It appeared picturesque (lit. was adorned) with valleys infested with herds of wild beasts of various kinds. In its celestial gardens abounding in a variety of trees, birds of sweet voice were warbling.

8. It appeared beautiful with streams and lakes of crystal waters, with banks covered with (sparkling) sand of jewels and precious stones. Their waters became highly fragrant by the bathing of celestial women in them, and the breezes blowing over them were charged with sweet scent.

9. In one of the valleys of that mountain, there is a garden called Rūmat belonging to the glorious high-soled god Varuṇa, which was the sporting ground of celestial ladies.

10-14. On all sides, it was adorned with celestial trees ever laden with fruits and blossoming flowers such as Mandāras, Pārijātas, Pātalas, Aśokas, Cempakas, mangoes (of various species), Priyālas, bread fruit (Jack-fruit) trees, Amrātakas as well as with Kramukas (arecas), cocoanut trees, date-palms, Btjāpūrakas (citrons), Madhūkas, Śāla trees, tala (palmyras) Tamālas, Aśanas, Arjunas, Ariṣṭas (soap-berries) Udumbaras (Indian fig trees), Plakṣas, banyan trees, Kimiṣukas, sandal trees, Neem trees, Koviḍāras, Saralas (pine trees?), Deodoras, grape vines, sugar-canes, plantains, rose-apples, plum-trees, Aksas, the yellow myrobolan, Emblic myrobolan trees and was surrounded by Bilva, Kapiṭṭha (wood apple tree), Jambira, Bhallātaka
(the marking-nut plant) and others. In that garden there was an extensive lake resplendent with golden lotuses.

15. "It looked excellently beautiful with the splendour of lilies and various species of lotuses such as Utpala, Kālāra and Sataptra (white, blue, and ordinary types). It was resonant with (the ceaseless) humming of intoxicated bees and with melodious notes of warbling birds.

16. It was swarmed with aquatic birds like swans, ducks called Kāraṇḍava, ruddy geese (Cakravāka) and cranes. It was resounded with the cries of water-fowls Koṣṭis and Dātyūha (the gallinules).

17-19. Its waters were covered with filaments of lotuses shaking with the movement of the fishes and tortoises. It was surrounded with trees and plants such as Kadambas, canes, Nalas (a variety of reed) and Nīpas (a kind of Kadamba), Vaṁjulaka, Kurbaka, Atoka, Śrīṣa, Kuṭāja, Aṅguda, Kubjaka, Svarṇa-yūthi (yellow jasmine), Nāga, Punnāga, jātis, miliṅkā, Śataptras, Māḍhavī Jālaka and other creepers.

It appears superbly beautiful with other trees growing on its banks, and bearing fruits and flowers throughout all seasons.

20. Once upon a time, there came in that garden the leader of a herd of elephants dwelling in the forest over the mountains. It was ranging about in the company of female elephants breaking and treading down thorny shrubs and clusters of various types of bamboos and canes (on their way).

21. Even at the scent of that King-elephant, lions, big elephants, carnivorous animals like tigers, rhinoceroses, huge serpents, white and black Šarabhas (an extinct animal more powerful than the lion), Camarī (female yaks) take to flight through sheer terror.

22. It is by its sufferance that weaker animals like wolves, boars, bisons, bears, procupines, baboons, hyenas and monkeys as well as the deer, hares range about without fear.

23-24. The elephant which was exuding the temporal fluid as a consequence of which he was attended by swarms of blackbees feeding on that intoxicating fluid, was surrounded by (a herd of) elephants, male and female, and was followed by their young ones. Being oppressed with the heat of the Sun, and scenting from a distance the breeze blowing from the lake—(and hence) laden with the pollen of lotuses—he, with his eyes rolling under intoxication and accompanied by his herd, all panting for water, speedily approached the vicinity of the lake, shaking by its huge weight the mountain on all its sides.

25. Plunging into the lake, he, with the tip of his trunk, drank to his fill the translucent, nectarlike water perfumed with the pollen of golden and blue lotuses. Bathing himself with the waters of the lake, he became refreshed.

26. The proud yet compassionate elephant, like unto a house-holder, made his female mates and young ones drink water and bathe, spraying them with the cool water by means of his trunk. Being deluded by the Māyā power of the Lord, the poor creature could not foresee the (impending) peril.

27. There, some powerful alligator, directed by the will of the Providence, indignantly caught hold of the elephant by the leg, Oh King. Finding himself caught up into this calamity by the will of the Lord, the mighty elephant exerted himself to his utmost capacity (to extricate himself from the hold of the alligator).

28. Noticing that the leader of their herd is being dragged with powerful force, and is rendered helpless, the female elephants, with their minds perplexed, began merely to shriek. The other elephants, though helping him from behind and sides, did not succeed in their attempts to rescue him.

29. In this way, while the mighty elephant and the powerful alligator were struggling, the former trying to drag the other outside the water and the latter pulling him inside, one thousand years rolled by. Finding them equally powerful, even the gods marvelled greatly at this (tough fight).

30. In this way, due to his being dragged into the water and harassed for a very long period, the energy, strength and vitality of that king elephant became greatly depleted, while the very reverse of it took place in the case of the aquatic animal (the alligator).

31. When that mighty elephant, dependent on his physical strength only thus found himself in the peril of life and absolutely helpless and incapable of rescuing himself, he pondered over for a long time, and through the will of the Lord, arrived to the following conclusion.
32. "These elephants, my own kinsfolk are not able to liberate me in this plight. What to speak of these poor she-elephants! Caught up and bound down as I am in the snare of the Providence, in the form of this alligator, I shall now approach the Supreme Lord who is the last resort of all.

33. We seek refuge in that indescribable Supreme Lord through fear of whom even the (God of) Death flies away, and who, when resorted to as an asylum, protects in every way the affrighted fugitive, vehemently pursued with irresistible force by the mighty serpent (in the form) of Death."

CHAPTER THREE

The Liberation of the Mighty Elephant

Śrī Śūka said:

1. Having thus decided by force of his reason and concentrated his mind within (the region of) his heart, he began to repeat mentally the (following) prayer which he learnt by heart in his previous birth (as Indradyumna). ¹

The Lord of Elephants Prayed:

2. (Due to my leg being caught by the alligator) I can but mentally offer my salutations to the glorious Lord denoted by the sacred syllable OM—the Lord who is the source of animation to all this intelligent (and non-intelligent) creation, who enters all bodies as their cause both as Prakṛti and Puruṣa and who is the Supreme Lord of all (including great gods like Brahmā).

3. I seek asylum unto the Self-created Being in whom this universe exists and from whom as the natural course, it is evolved and by whose instrumentality it is brought about and who constitutes the universe itself, but who is totally different from and transcendental to this phenomenal existence (the effect) as well as its cause (Prakṛti).

¹. Vide infra Ch. IV. 7-12.

4. May the self-illuminating Lord protect me—the Lord who is beyond revealing agencies (such as the eyes etc.) as their illuminator; Who as a disinterested witness, observes with his unobstructed vision, both the cause and the effect, this universe superimposed on him by his deluding potency (Māyā) both in its occasional manifested form (at the time of the creation) and the occasional unmanifested form at the time of destruction).

5* When, due to the force of time (the period of two parārdhas, the life-period of Brahmā), all the (fourteen) worlds along with their guardian deities are reduced to the state of five gross elements (of which they are constituted and when all the causes (viz. the principles such as the Mahat, ahamkāra upto gross elements) become dissolved (into Prakṛti or Primordial matter), there prevailed (nothing but) profound incomprehensible and unfathomable darkness (called Prakṛti. May that Omnipresent Lord who through its Prakṛti’s substratum) is not affected by it and who sheds his lustre all round (even beyond that darkness) protect me.

6. Not even gods and sages (with all the predominance of Sattva guṇa) could comprehend his real nature. How is it possible for a creature (like me dominated by rajas and tamas) to understand and describe it? (To gods, sages and us) his nature and course of conduct is difficult to understand and

1. Though Hari and the universe are different, He is identified with it as the universe is under His perfect control; Who is superior (and transcendental) to this phenomenal world as well as from those who have attained Liberation—VJ.

*VR. : tamas—the extremely subtle sentient material (cid-draya) that exists after the dissolution of the universe (tamaḥ tabdah niratisaya-sākṣma-dalāpanna-cid-draya-vṛct). So also BP.

Para abhivirājate—The Lord, as a controller of this tamas or subtle composite principle, exists in His glory. VR. derives para from Pt to protect.

VJ. : Para abhivirājate—Who through His form called Time, stays self-refulgent in the region least affected by and thus beyond tamas describe, like the real identity of an actor playing different roles to an ordinary spectator. May he rescue me.

JG.:—Para—In the great Vaikuṇṭha regions.

7. My asylum is that Lord for the realization of whose most auspicious nature, the exceedingly pious contemplative sages, have given up all attachment (to their wives, children and also to objects of senses like sound, fragrance etc.) and having identified their Self with the Self of all beings and thus being benevolently disposed to all, perform in a faultless manner extraordinary austerities (such as Brahmacarya—celibacy and others) in the forests.

8. The Lord is not conditioned by birth (as a consequence of past actions). He has no Karma—(bondage), no name or form (as a result of past Karmas as in the case of ordinary beings). However, for the sake of creation and destruction of the world, he assumes them from time to time by his Māyā-Potency (or will Power).

9. I bow again and again to that Supreme Lord, the Brahman of infinite potencies, Who, (though) devoid of forms, possesses innumerable forms and performs miraculous activities.

10. I pay obeisance to the Lord who is self-luminous (and as such requires no other light to reveal him); who is the witness (and hence the revealer) of all; and the controller of all beings; I bow to him who is absolutely beyond the ken of speech, mind and its powers.

11. Salutations to him who can be realized by the wise, through purity of the mind developed by cessation (of activities or dedication to the Lord) of Karmas, (and by observance of niyātī (dharma characterised by devotion); Who is the Lord (and hence the bestower) of Mokṣa and who is the blissfulness of the final beatitude incarnate.

12* I bow to him who assumes the (three) attributes sattva, rajas and tamas, and appears as serene, terrible, and immersed in ignorance; who is devoid of differentiating characteristics, equal to all, and an embodiment of pure consciousness.

VJ. classifies the various incarnations of Viṣṇu on guṇa basis and offers them salutations. He regards the last epithet—jñāna-grhena—as a refutation of the formlessness of Viṣṇu (arāpaya dhyātavām nidrayati) 13 I bow to you who are the controller of all, the only knower of the psycho-physical organism (called kṣetra), a witness (to everything). You are the source of all Jīvas, and even that of Prakṛti (the primordial cause) as you exist before all.

14. I pay my obeisance to you, who perceive all senses along with their objects; who are indicated (as the basis) by all cognitive activities; whose existence is suggested by the shadowy, unreal phenomenal existence (ahamkāra and other principles) like that of a material body by its reflection, as it is you who are reflected in every phenomenon.

15. I bow again and again to you who are the cause of everything, but yourself are without a cause; who are the wondrous cause (inasmuch as you produce the effect—viz. assuming the form of the world—without undergoing any change in you); who are the great ocean wherein all Āgamas (like the pañcarātra) and the Vedas meet (and are directed to you); who are the embodiment of Mokṣa (Liberation) and (hence) the ultimate resort of the great.

16. I salute to you who are the fire of knowledge and consciousness lying hidden in the Arany (the pieces of wood for kindling sacrificial fire by friction) in the form of guṇas; whose will (to create the universe) manifests itself through the commotion (caused by the disturbance in the equilibrium) of guṇas; who, out of your own will, reveal yourself to those who, (through the renunciation of Karmas or dedication of Karmas to God), meditate on the true (nature of the) soul and have risen above the prescriptions and prohibitions enjoined by Āgamas.

VR: interprets:
Salutations to you who (at the time of the destruction of the universe) have drunk up (withdrawn within you) the fire of the aggregate of all jīvas lying hidden in the Prakṛti

* Salutations to You to Whom the kṣetrajña (individual soul) is like a body, the Supreme Ruler of all beings, the Witness to all; Who are the Inner Controller (of all); and Who are self-existent (not created by any other cause) and are the primary material cause (of all) as well.—VR.

 VJ. reads a combination of vv. 16 and 18.
(constituted of three guṇas); whose will to create begins to function (at the time of the creation of the world) leading to the commotion in Prakṛti and jīvas; who grants Liberation (Mokṣa) to his votaries; whose being beyond the comprehension of speech and mind, stands self-revealed.

17. Hail to you who are yourself not only eternally free, but who, out of boundless grace, promptly¹ (without any idleness in such matters) and absolutely severe the bonds of Āvidyā or Saṁsāra which have fettered creatures like me, (now) completely submitted to your mercy. I bow to you who, by a part of your being, exist in all embodied beings as their inner controller² and are capable of directing them all, even though you are infinite (and spatially unlimited)

18. Bow to you who (though the inner controller of all beings) are difficult to be attained by persons who are attached to their bodies, sons, kinsmen, household, wealth and people, as you are devoid of any association with guṇas. You are constantly meditated upon in their hearts by souls unattached to their bodies, etc. I bow to you who are an embodiment of pure knowledge, the most omnipotent Ruler of all.

19. May the Lord of infinite mercy (at least) rescue me (from the clutches of the alligator or Saṁsāra)—The Lord, by worshipping whom persons desirous of religious merits, sensual objects, affluence, wealth or Liberation (from saṁsāra), gain not only their coveted goal but also have other unexpected blessings and undeteriorating (divine) body conferred upon them.

20. His votaries of unflinching constant devotion and even those who have taken refuge with the Lord (or His devotees full of spiritual wisdom) do not seek any boon (from him), but are immersed in the ocean of bliss, while singing his most miraculous and auspicious deeds.

21. I offer my hymn of prayer unto that absolutely perfect imperishable First Principle, the all-pervading highest

1. ālayāya—By resorting to whom the devotee never meets destructions —VR.

2. Svādhāna sarvatanubhṛt etc.: Who are realized as being identical with the jīva in the heart of every being as the jīva is essentially a part of your body—VR.
VIII.3.25.

Brahman, the Supreme Ruler (even of great gods like Brahmā), unmanifest and beyond the range of senses, as it is very remote and subtle, yet is accessible (to his devotees) through internal (path of bhakti) yoga.

22-24. May the Lord, manifest himself (for my Liberation)¹—

22. The Lord by whose single minutest modicum of energy (all the) gods headed by Brahmā, the Vedas, the worlds, the mobile and immobile creation of distinct (yet) infinite variety of forms, are created.

23. From that self resplendent Lord issues forth (and is again withdrawn) the stream of guṇas² and their products such as the intellect, the mind, the senses and aggregates of gross bodies (like those of gods and others), even as sparks and flames go forth from the self-shining Fire-god and rays emanate from the self-luminous sun and are withdrawn again into them constantly.

24. Verily he is neither god nor demon; neither a human being nor a sub-human creature (a bird, a beast etc.); he is neither a female nor a male nor an important person or an a-sexual being; he is neither an attribute (guṇa) nor an action (Karma); he is neither effect nor cause; he is the substratum of what is left after negating these all and yet constitutes them all (by his Māyā).

25. I do not wish (to get my body) extricated from the clutches of the alligator and) to survive here (in this body). What interest have I with this elephant-life which is enveloped internally and externally with the darkness of ignorance? I crave for emancipation (lifting up of) from that Veil of ignorance which shrouds the spiritual light of the Soul, and which cannot be destroyed merely by (lapse of) time but only by the knowledge of the (Ātman).

¹ (i) May remove all obstacles in my God-realization—VR. (ii) May relieve me from the misery of saṃśāra—V.J. (iii) SD., GD., BP. follow ŚR.

² This asserts the eternality of the stream of the universe (guṇa—sampradāhaḥ...anena jagat-Pravāhāya nityatvaṃ jñāpiṣṭam)—V.J.
26* Being thus desirous of getting liberated I (who do know the Lord) simply bow down to that all pervading spirit, who is the creator of the universe; whose body is the universe and yet who is beyond and other than it; who uses the universe as his instrument, yet is the soul of it (as its Inner controller); who is unconditioned by birth and is the highest resort of all.

27. I have bowed¹ unto the Lord of yoga (who confers the fruit of yogic practice), whom the yogins visualize in their hearts purified by burning down of their Karmas by yoga (or devotion unto the Lord).

28. I salute to you again and again. The force of your three-fold power (of three Gunas viz. sattva, rajas and tamas) is irresistible; who manifest yourself as the object of all senses; who protect those who have resorted to you for shelter and are of unfathomable powers; whose path is inaccessible to those whose senses are directed to external objects.

29. I have sought the protection of the Lord whose glory is unsurpassable and enveloped by whose Māyā power expressed as the ego-sense, this Jīva does not realize (the real nature of) his self.

Śrī Śuka said:

30. When all these gods like Brahmā and others who identified themselves with their special forms and attributes (such as four-headedness, three-eyedness in the case of gods Brahmā, Śiva etc.) did not approach (to rescue) the Lord of elephants who thus glorified the Supreme Lord as being devoid of (and hence without any reference to) any particular form or attribute,² Lord Hari, being the Soul (ātman) of all,

---

* Being desirous of removing the veil of ignorance that obscures the vision of the soul, I bow to You Who are the Wealth or the highest goal in the life (of people) in the universe, who enter the universe to protect it: Whose manifestation is not conditioned by Karmas, yet is full of good attributes; Who are absolutely inaccessible I merely bow to Him as I do not know any other way of propitiating Him—VR.

¹ The yogic way being now impossible I can simply bow to Him —VR.

² And as he has under-rated gods like Brahmā in verse 22 above —GS.
and the embodiment of the aggregate of all gods, manifested himself there.

31. Knowing that the elephant was in that distressed condition and having heard his hymn of prayer (mentally addressed to him), the Lord, the abode of the universe, equipped with his weapon the discus sudarśana and riding Garuḍa, the embodiment of the (sāma-) veda (and capable of ranging anywhere with any speed according to his will) and accompanied by celestials singing his praise, instantaneously appeared on the spot, where the Lord of elephants was (in that wretched plight).

32. Beholding in the sky Lord Hari, seated on Garuḍa and with his discus upraised (in his hand), the elephant, though greatly distressed, as he was seized by a very powerful alligator inside the lake, lifted up his trunk holding a lotus (as an offering for worshipping his feet!) and uttered with great difficulty the words “Oh glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa!” the Father (or Preceptor) of all the universe! I (reverentially) bow to you.”

33. Seeing the elephant greatly afflicted, Lord Hari, the birthless God (feeling the speed of Garuḍa as too slow) at once alighted (from Garuḍa), and immediately dragging out the elephant out of the lake along with the alligator, out of compassion, rescued the lord of the elephants from its jaws by rending them open with the discus, while gods stood simply looking on.

CHAPTER FOUR

Liberation of the Lord of Elephants

Śri Śuka continued:

1. Then (seeing the rescue of the lord of elephants), gods headed by Brahmā and Śiva, sages and Gandharvas extoll ed that mighty deed of Hari, and discharged a shower of flowers on him.
2. Celestial kettle-drums were sounded, the Gandharvas danced and sang; sages, Cāraṇas and Siddhas eulogised the Supreme Person.

3. Verily, he who was (till then) the alligator, instantly assumed the most wonderful form. He was Hūhū, the foremost among the Gandharvas, who was thus redeemed from the curse of the Sage Devala.¹

4. He bowed down to the eternal Supreme Lord of excellent renown with his head, and he chanted the praise of his worth extolling (innumerable) virtues and sacred episodes of that abode of glory.

5. Being favoured by the Lord with his grace, he was purged of all sins. Going round the Lord (reverentially) and paying him obeisance, he repaired to his own region (of Gandharvas) in the very presence of all the people.

6. By virtue of his being touched by the Lord, the lord of elephants became completely free from the bondage of ignorance, and attained to the form resembling that of the Lord (Viṣṇu) clad in yellow garments and endowed with four arms.

7. It is traditionally reported that he was in his previous birth a king of the Pāṇḍya-country well-known as Indradyumna—the foremost among the Dravida people—and devotedly attached to the austere observance of Viṣṇu-worship.

8. Once upon a time, the king who, as an ascetic, wearing matted locks of hair, was staying in his hermitage on the Malaya mountain, had undertaken the vow of silence. At the appointed hour of the propitiation of the Lord, he took his bath and began to worship with due formalities, the imperishable supreme Ruler, Lord Hari.

9. (It is reported that) by chance there arrived (at his hermitage) the celebrated sage Agastya accompanied by hosts of his disciples. Finding Indradyumna seated in solitude and remaining silent (without showing the courtsey of greeting orally) and without paying the due homage (usual formalities of receiving a guest of honour) the sage flared up in rage.

¹ ŚR. narrates the cause of the curse as follows:—Once while Hūhū was indulging in watersport with his women in a lake, the sage Devala entered the same lake for bath. Hūhū was upset and he pulled Devala by his leg. The sage cursed him to be an alligator. When entreated, Devala advised him to seize the lord of elephants that way, so that Lord Hari will emancipate him and he would be reinstated to his original position automatically.

10. He pronounced the following imprecation on the king: “This sinful, uncultured, wicked soul has today insulted a Brâhmaṇa (like me). He is dull-witted like an elephant. Let him be born in the species of elephants steeped in blinding darkness of ignorance.”

Sri Suka said:

11. Oh king! Having uttered this curse, the venerable Agastya went way along with his followers. The royal sage Indradyumna, on his part, considered the incident to be the will of the Providence.

12. He entered the species of elephants which obscures the knowledge of the self. But by virtue of his propitiation of Hari the reminiscence of his past life remained unblurred (even while he was an elephant).

13. Having thus rescued the lord of the herd of elephants and accompanied by him after elevating him to the position of his attendant, the lotus-navelled god (Viśṇu) seated on Garuḍa repaired to his region Vaikuṇṭha, while Gandharvas, Siddhas and gods were glorifying his miraculous feat.

14. This glorious deed of Kṛṣṇa (Viśṇu), viz. The Liberation of King of elephants, has been narrated to you by me, Oh great king. Listening to this leads to heaven, confers glory, removes the sins of the Kali age and destroys the effect of bad dreams of the hearers, Oh great Kuru.

15. Persons belonging to the twice-born castes desiring to secure their welfare, get up early in the morning, and purifying themselves (after taking a bath) recite this sacred narration (of the liberation of the elephant king) for obliterating the effects of bad dreams (and securing their welfare).

16. It was while all creatures were listening that the Omnipresent Lord Hari who embodies all creation, being highly pleased with the Lord of elephants, addressed the following (words) to him; Oh the best of Kurus.
17-24. Rising up at the close of the latter part of the night i.e. at dawn (known as Brāhma muhūrta), and after purifying themselves (by taking a bath), those who, with concentrated mind, remember me, you, this lake, the mountain (Trikūta) along with its caves and valleys and the forest (covering them), the clusters of canes and Kicaka bamboos, the heavenly trees, the (three) mountain peaks, the abodes of Brahmā, Śiva and myself, the ocean of milk, my favourite resort, the resplendent Śveta-dvīpa (My beloved place), the Śrivatsa mark (the characteristic curl of hair) on my breast, the Kaustubha gem, and the garland known as Vaijayanti, my weapons, the mace called Kaumodakī, the discus Sudarśana, the conch Pāñcajanya, my vehicle Garuḍa, the king of birds, Lord Saṅkarṣaṇa who is my subtle emanation, goddess Śrī (Lakṣmī) who rests on my bosom, god Brāhmā, the divine sage Nārada, god Śiva and (my devotee) Prahlāda, and all my deeds performed during my incarnations as Fish, Tortoise, Boar and others—listening to which confers infinite merit (to the hearers), the Sun-god, the Moon-god, the Fire-god, the sacred syllable OM, the Eternal Truth, the unmanifest (Prakṛti), Cows and Brāhmaṇas, the eternal path of religion (consisting of devotion unto the Lord, the daughters of Dakṣa who are the wives of Dharma, Soma and Kaśyapa, the rivers—the Gaṅgā, the Sarasvatī, the Nandā, the Yamunā, the White elephant of Indra (Airāvata), Dhruva, the Seven Brāhmaṇa Sages and great men of hallowed fame, (such as Nala, Yudhiṣṭhira, Janaka, the king of Videha)—all these being my forms, those who remember them, become free from all sins.

25. Oh dear Gajendra! To those who, after getting up at dawn (after the expiry of night), pray to me with the hymn (composed by you), I promise to keep their memory unclouded at the time of their death.

Śrī Śuka said:

26. Having addressed thus, Lord Viṣṇu (the Lord of senses) blew his excellent conch (Pāñcajanya) gladdening thereby the host of gods and mounted his carrier Garuḍa, the king of birds.
CHAPTER FIVE

Description of V and VI Manvantaras—Brahmā Hymns the Lord.

Śrī Śuka said:

1. I have narrated to you, Oh King, the sacred story of the liberation of the Lord of elephants which destroys all sinful deeds. Now listen to the account of the Manu-period presided over by Raivata.

2-3. The fifth Manu, Raivata by name, was the brother of Tāmaśa. Bali, Vindhya and others, the eldest of whom was Arjuna, were his sons. Vibhu was the Indra, Bhūtaraya and others were the gods, while Hiranyaromā, Vedāśiras, Črdhva-bāhu and others were the Sages1, Oh king.

4. Višṇu was the wife of Śubhra; with a portion of his energy, Lord Viśṇu was born of these of his own accord, along with great gods known as Viśṇus.

5. It was at the request of his spouse, the goddess Ramā (Lakṣmī) and with a view to please her that he created his realm known as Viśṇu which is highly respected by all the worlds.

6. His prowess (viz. restoring to their original position his attendants who, by the curse of Sanatkumāra, became demons called Hiranyākṣa and Hiranyakaśipu—vide Skandha III), excellences (such as friendliness to Bāhmaṇas), and his great prosperity have been described to you. (But I could not do so adequately as) he who would be able to describe the excellences of Viṣṇu fully may as well count all the particles of the dust on the entire earth.2

7-8. The sixth Manu was known as Cākṣus, the son of Cākṣus; his sons were Puru, Puruṣa, Sudyumna and others. Mantradyumna was the Indra, and the hosts of gods were headed by Āpya. The (seven) Sages were, Oh king, Haviśmat,

---

1. GS quotes Harivarāṇa and gives Devabårū, Sudhāman, Parjanya and Mahāmuni as the names of the remaining (seven) Sages of the Raivata Manvantara.

2. GS adds: The Viśṇu region being eternal, its 'creation' is 'manifestation' only.

Viraka and others (viz. Sumedhas, Anuttama, Madhu, Atināman, Sahīṣṇu).

9. In this Manvantara, the glorious Lord of the worlds appeared, by a ray of his essential nature, as Ajita, the son of Vairāja and Sambhūti.

10. By him, the nectar as secured for gods, by getting the sea (of milk) churned, while he supported, in the form of the (Divine) Tortoise, the Mount Mandara while it was whirling in the waters of the sea.

The King enquired:

11-12. Be pleased to describe to me Oh Brāhmaṇa Sage, this most wonderous deed of the glorious Lord: as to how the ocean of milk was got churned by the Lord, as also the object (said) of doing so, and why he had to support the mount (Mandara) assuming the form of an aquatic animal (a tortoise); how the nectar was obtained by gods and what else happened at that time (in connection with this event).

13. My heart which has been tormented for a long time by afflictions (of three types) does not get satiated, when you describe in details, the great glory of the Lord of Sātvatas (Krśna).

Sūta said:

14. Being thus respectfully requested, the venerable son of Vyāsa (viz. Śuka) appreciated the (king’s) query and began to describe in details the prowess of Lord Hari, Oh Brāhmaṇas.

Śri Śuka said:

15-16. When formidably assailed with sharp weapons by Asuras in battles, gods were killed in large numbers, and they did not revive, and when due to the curse of the sage Durvāsas,

1. ŠR & GS mention the following incident (from the Brahma Vaivarta Purāṇa) as the cause of the curse. Once while the sage Durvāsas was wearing a garland gifted to him by Lord Viṣṇu, Indra riding his Airāvata elephant, passed by him. Out of courtesy and with a view to bless Indra with permanent sovereignty of the three worlds, Durvāsas presented the garland to him. Out of arrogance, Indra threw it on the
the three worlds along with Indra were deprived of their glory and wealth, all sacrificial performance and other religious rites ceased to be performed.

17. Seeing this (state of affairs), the hosts of gods headed by the great Indra and Varuṇa met in a conference for mutual consultations, but failed to arrive at a conclusion.

18. All of them went to the court of Brahmā, situated on a crest of mountain Meru. Bowing god Brahmā humbly, they submitted to him all their grievances.

19-20. Observing that gods like Indra, Vāyu and others are bereft of power, energy and splendour and the people (practically) devoid of auspiciousness, and the Asuras (proportionally) better-off, he, with a concentrated mind contemplated the Supreme Person, and with a cheerful countenance, the great Venerable Brahmā addressed the gods as follows:

21. “Let us all—I who am but a portion of the Lord, and Asuras, human beings, sub-human creation like birds, beasts, trees and sweat-born beings (like lice, bugs etc.) who are the progeny of Marici (and others) who in turn are just a modicum of his energy approach for refuge to him, the imperishable Lord.

22. According to his view-point, none deserves to be killed or protected; no party is worth neglecting or supporting. It is for the creation, subsistence and destruction of the world that he assumes the attributes sattva, rajas and tamas at the proper time.

23. And the present is an opportune time for his creation and protection of the universe for which he has assumed the Sattva attribute for the creation of embodied beings. Let us therefore, approach the Preceptor of the world for protection. Being beloved of gods, he will do whatever is good for us, his devotees.”

Śri Śuka said:

24. Having thus spoken to the gods, god Brahmā, accompanied by celestials, went directly to the abode of the unconquerable Lord which lies beyond the region of darkness, Oh destroyer of enemies.

25. There, with the concentration of all his senses (including the mind), he, in the divine (or Vedic) language, addressed the following hymn of praise, to him whose essential form was not seen as yet, but about whom much was heard formerly, Oh king.

BrahmA said:

26. "We bow to the Supreme God, Who is changeless, eternally true, infinite (in time and space), beginningless, present in (everybody's) heart, unconditioned, incomprehensible quicker than the mind and beyond the range of words (indescribable).

27. We go (as a refuge) to him Who is the knower of the vital airs, the mind, the intellect and the soul; Who appears as senses and their objects; Who is devoid of sleep and is bodyless (and hence) imperishable; Who is all-pervasive like the sky, and is unaffected by the darkness of avidyā and the sunshine of ādiyā;^1 Who is free from desire and other attributes of Jīva and who manifests himself in every Yuga.

28. I seek asylum in that Deity, the Truth, which the Vedas call as the axle (the main support) of the lightening-like fast rotating wheel of life (i.e. This ever-changing body and other accessories of the Soul), owned by the Jīva (who is, in reality birthless). The wheel is propelled by Māyā (the beginningless deluding potency of the Lord). It (the wheel) has mind as its chief component and consists of fifteen spokes (viz. Ten sense organs and five vital breaths—prānas), three navas (viz. the three guṇas—sattva, rajas and tamas) and eight fellies* (in the form of eight-fold Prakṛti consisting of five elements, the mind, the intellect and the ego).

^1 VJ.—gṛdhra—covetous of everything, hence jīva who like vulture has two wings, viz. Vidyā and Avidyā.

* VJ. regards deva, asura, humans and other classes of beings as the fellies.
29* Let us bow to him Who has seated himself by the side of Jīva (as the Inner controller) or Who is seated on Gāruḍa ever ready to protect his devotees; Who is essentially pure bliss or knowledge, beyond the range of darkness or Prakṛti; Who is invisible, beyond the range of all lokas; Who is changeless and limitless in time and space; to whom wise men resort through (the chariot in the form of) the discipline of Yoga.

30. Let us pay obeisance to the Supreme Ruler Who treats all beings alike (without any partiality); Who has subdued his Māyā along with the (three) guṇas—the Māyā which nobody could cross and which has deluded the people so much (that identifying themselves with their bodies) they do not know their true self.

31. Even we, gods and sages who are created by his favourite body consisting of pure sattva, are unable to comprehend his subtle essence, though it is manifest as Light within and as existence without. How (is it possible that) Asuras and others who are dominated by other attributes viz. rajas and tamas can do so?

32. (Henceforth the vaitāja form of the Lord is eulogised). May that Lord, the Supreme person, the veritable, absolute Brahman itself, be propitious unto us—The Lord who has created as his feet, this earth which supports the four-

* VJ : I seek refuge in the supreme Deity Who is represented by the syllable (OM); Who is beyond the darkness of ignorance and prakṛti. It is beyond the ken of the world, un-revealed and limitless (or comprised of innumerable syllables). Intelligent persons worship and meditate upon Him with great devotion. He is seated on His vehicle the jīva.

ananta-pāram (i) Being an embodiment of the Vedas He cannot be comprehended by words and their connotations (ii) He is all pervading yet cannot be seen anywhere by all. They contemplate Him as an antaryāmin (inner controller)—SD. SD interprets a-Loka as ‘The realm of A i.e. Viṣṇu, Hence Vaikuṇṭha.

1. upa-suvarnam—who occupies a region full of light like gold—VR.
2. eka-varnam—
   (i) Constituted of Pure Sattva—VR, JG.
   (ii) Who is constituted of the only one syllable OM—VJ, VC.
   (iii) Constituted of Pure Bliss—GD.

Though out of His grace He created us both inside and outside with His sattva attribute, we, the gods and sages, are unable to comprehend—VJ."
fold creation of beings\(^1\) and yet is completely self dependent, and the Master of infinitely great powers.\(^2\)

33. May that absolute and perfect Brahman of immense spiritual powers be gracious unto us—The Brahman whose seminal fluid is water, of so much enormous power that it became the source of existence, subsistence and prosperity of the three worlds, as well as all guardian deities.

34. May that Lord of unlimited spiritual glory be propitiated unto us—The Lord whose mind (as declared by the Vedas) is Soma, Who is the food and hence the strength and life of celestials, and Who (due to the nourishing power of his ambrosial rays) is the ruler of the vegetable kingdom and the creator of all living beings (as they subsist on the vegetables and plants).

35 May that most glorious Lord bestow his grace unto us—the Lord whose mouth is the Fire; Who is the source (and hence the bestower) of wealth, (or who takes to gods their respective oblations offered in sacrifices), and Who is engendered for (the performance of) sacrificial rituals (prescribed in the Vedas), and Who abides in the stomach (as the gastric fire) digesting the food, and in the sea (as submarine fire) consuming its (watery) subsistence.

36. May that Lord of infinite glory be propitious unto us—The Lord whose eye is the sun-god; Who is the presiding deity of the path of gods (devayāna) leading ultimately to Liberation; Who is the very personification of the triad of Vedas (viz. ṚK, Taṣu and Ṣāman); Who is regarded as the seat of Brahman (as Brahman is meditated upon in relation to the Sun); Who represents not merely the entrance to the path of Liberation but to immortality itself; Who (however as a symbol of Time) is death incarnate (as Time terminates everything.)

37. May the Lord of unlimited powers be graciously inclined towards us—The Lord from Whose breath was born Vāyu (the air) which is the vital air (Prāṇa), who animates the \(^1\) caturvidha-sargaḥ—The four categories of beings are viviparous, oviparous, the sweat-born and the plant-world.

---

\(^2\) mahā-vibhūtiḥ—Having power over Mahā-Lakṣmī, the presiding deity of wealth. May all of us be affluent in every respect—GD.
mobile and immobile creation, and became their mental energy, physical power and potency of the sense-organs, and to whom, we, the presiding deities (of cognitive and conative senses) follow as the retinue goes after an emperor.

38. May that Deity of infinite glory confer favour upon us—The Deity from whose ears were evolved the cardinal points; from whose heart, the pores in the body, and from whose navel were created the (five) vital airs (Prāṇa), the senses and organs of the body (Indriyas), the mind and the other (five semi-vital airs1 carrying on) the functions of the body and the sky which supports these all.

39. May the Lord of unlimited glory be favourably disposed to us—the Lord from Whose strength was born the great Indra, from Whose grace the (various) gods; from Whose wrath sprang up god Śiva, the Lord of mountains; from Whose intellect came forth god Brahmā; from the apper- tures in Whose bodies were created the Vedas and the sages, and from whose generative organ, the god Prajāpati.

40. May that most glorious Lord be propitious unto us—The Lord from Whose bosom came forth the goddess Śrī (the goddess of wealth and beauty); from Whose shadow, the manes (Pitṛs); from Whose breast, Dharma (the presiding Deity of righteousness) and from Whose back was born Adharma (the evil spirit of unrighteousness); from Whose head evolved the heaven (swarga), and from Whose sportive actions, the celestial damsels (apsaras).

41. May the Lord of supreme glory bestow his grace on us—The Lord from Whose mouth sprang up the Brāhmaṇas and Vedas of mystic significance; from Whose arms were born Kṣatriyas and the power (to govern); from Whose thighs came forth Vaiśyas and skill in business of agriculture and from Whose feet were born the Śūdras and the vocation of service (other than Vedic studies)2

42. May the Lord of infinite powers be gracious unto us—the Lord from Whose lower lip came forth avarice; from

---

1. These are Nāga, Kūrma, Kṣkala, Devadatta and Dhanañjaya (vide Supra 3, 6, 9).

2. Śr notes v.l. urvev visonther abhavanikṣa śūdrāḥ 'The Vaiśya class was born from His thighs and the Śūdras from His feet.'
Whose upper lip affection; from Whose nose emanated splendour, from Whose touch, the desire to rear up and to tend animals; from Whose eye-brows sprang up Yama, the god of death; from Whose eye-lashes was born the Time-spirit (Kāla).

43. May that most glorious Lord be graciously disposed towards us—The Lord by Whose yoga-māyā, the sāstras declare are created the five gross elements, the Time (Life-Span), the destiny (effects of acts of past life), qualities\(^1\) (or the modes of Prakṛti e.g. Sattva, rajas) and this phenomenal world all of which are too difficult to comprehend, and which should be renounced by the wise as mere māyā.

44. I bow to him Whose energy (in the form of guṇas like Sattva etc.) is quiescent; Whose mind is thoroughly full of his natural supreme bliss, and hence Who is not attached (even in his mind) to the products of the guṇas created by Māyā and Whose sportive activities are like the air (which moves everywhere but is attached to nothing anywhere).

45. You being such (as described above), be pleased to reveal to us your lotus-like smiling countenance in such a way as it will come within the range of our sense of perception, for we have completely surrendered ourselves to you and are eager to have a look at you.

46. For the glorious Lord assumes different forms from time to time, according to his will (or the will of his devotees), and accomplishes feats which are beyond our capacity, Oh Omnipresent God.

47. In the case of embodied beings whose minds are attached to pleasures, their acts require great trouble (for performance) but bear little or no fruit at all (in return). But that is not the case with us who dedicate all our actions to you (We require less trouble to perform the act, and get substantial fruit in return, and it is never futile).

48. Even the slightest resemblance of action, if dedicated to the Lord, never becomes futile (but brings substantial results); for the Lord loves and wishes well of such person (who has resigned himself to him and his actions, therefore, will not be futile).

---

1. VJ. guṇāḥ etc.: devotion etc., or colours. The v.l. vāsēṣam-The Nature, Jiva, time etc.—VJ.
49. Just as watering the root of trees proves nourishing to its trunk and branches, similarly the propitiation of Lord Viṣṇu leads to the propitiation of all gods and of one's self also.

50. I bow to you, the infinite Lord whose nature and deeds are extremely difficult to comprehend; you are devoid of all attributes, and yet are the master of all qualities, and who at present are established in sattva.

CHAPTER SIX

(Mount Mandara Transported for Churning the Ocean)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Oh king! Thus praised by the hosts of gods, the glorious Lord Hari, the supreme Ruler, manifested Himself to them with the effulgence of a thousand suns rising simultaneously.

2. By that very glaring effulgence, all gods got their eyes so much dazzled that they could not perceive the sky, the cardinal points, the earth and even themselves. How could they see the omnipresent Lord?

3. The glorious god Brahmā along with Śiva, beheld that immaculate Form, dark like emerald (blue like sapphire), with eyes reddish like the interior of a lotus.

4. It was clad in bright yellow silken garment (Pitāmbara) shining like burning gold, graceful and lovely in every limb, with beautiful countenance and attractive eyebrows.

5. It was adorned with a crown crested with highly precious gems and a pair of armlets (keyūras one on each arm); Its cheeks illuminated by the bright splendour of the pendant ear-rings, added to the beauty of its lotus like countenance.

6. It was adorned with an ornamented girdle, bracelets, necklace and pair of anklets. It was wearing the decorative Kaustubha gem, the goddess Lakṣmī, and a wreath of sylvan flowers (on its breast).

7. It was attended upon by its missiles like Sudarśana and others in their personal form. Brahmā, the foremost among the gods, along with god Śiva, and with hosts of celestials, lay prostrate before him on the ground, and eulogized the Supreme Person (as follows);

Brahmā said:

8.* I offer my obeisance again and again to you of whom birth, subsistence and destruction are beyond predication; who transcends the (three) gunas; who is the ocean of (absolute) bliss attainable in the Final Beatitude; who is the subtlest of the subtle, yet whose glory is immeasurable and powers unlimited.

9. Oh Supreme Person! This form of yours is ever worthy to be adored by those who aspire after the (highest) bliss, through methods prescribed in the Vedas and tantras (like pañcarātra). Oh Creator and Protector of the universe! In this form of yours which pervades the universe, I see (simultaneously) all the three worlds as well as ourselves.

10. In you who are self-dependent, the universe abided in you at the beginning; in you, it exists in the middle and it will be absorbed in you (after its dissolution) in the end. Just as the earth persists (as the material cause) in the beginning, the middle and the end of a pot, similarly you are the beginning, the middle and the end of this universe.¹

11. Through your Māyā—potency which absolutely depends on you, you have created the universe, and subse-

*VJ: Again and again I salute to you who are Aja (Birthless-Viśnu), the creation, subsistence and dissolution of the universe, the very personification of various attributes (e.g. Ānanda, Viśiṣṭa), the ocean of bliss impossible to those who identify themselves with the physical body, and of limitless glory.

¹ VJ differs: According to VJ, God is not the material cause but the supreme cause on which other causes depend. The particle ca in VJ’s text indicates that if Brahman be the material cause even non-sentient material world would be sentient. VR. accepts God as the material cause of the universe, but God is unaffected by changes (upādānatvam et tasya nirvikāraḥ).
quently have entered into it (as its Inner Controller). The thoughtful people who are well-versed in Śāstras and who have (controlled and) concentrated their minds, perceive through their mind that you are not affected by guṇas, even though you abide in them (i.e. in the universe which is the product of guṇas in which you have entered).

12. It is a well-known fact that, by adopting proper means, men get fire from wood (by friction of wooden pieces —araṇis), nectar i.e. milk from the cows, food and water from the earth (by agriculture and digging) and livelihood by working (in a profession or vocation), similarly thoughtful people, through their intelligence perceive You in (the world which is) the product of guṇas and describe you accordingly.

13. Oh Lord! Having seen You graciously (and thus fulfilling) our desire for a long time, we feel extremely blissful as elephants distressed by forest-conflagration do, on reaching the waters of the Gaṅgā, Oh Lord with a lotus in your navel.

14. Such as You are (as described above), do fulfill our desire for which we, the guardians of the Worlds have approached Your feet. Oh Lord (the pervader of the universe from inside and outside)! You witness everything. What is there to be made known to you from outside by others?

15. To You, I, Śiva, gods (and other beings), Dakṣa (and other Lords of creation)—We all are like sparks of fire emanating from fire (and appearing distinct from fire, though originally they are one). Separate as we are, what do we know of (the way to) our welfare? Oh Lord! Be pleased to advise us what may be beneficial to Brāhmaṇas and gods.

Śrī Śuka said:

16. Being thus prayed (and extolled) by Brahmā and others, and with a full understanding of their hearts, the Lord, in a voice like the rumbling of clouds, addressed the gods who, controlling their senses perfectly, stood with folded palms.

17. Although the Lord alone was capable to accomplish the object of the gods, he, being desirous of indulging in sportful activities like the churning of the ocean and others, addressed them as follows:
The Lord said:

18. Hello! Brahman, Śiva, gods and demigods! Listen attentively to my speech, so that all of you will attain welfare and desired object.

19. You do go just now and conclude a peace-treaty with the Daityas and Dānavas who are favoured by time, till you find that growth (prosperous time) has now returned (till Fortune smiles on you).

20. When an object to be achieved is important, an alliance should be entered into, even with enemies. When once, you have accomplished your purpose, you may behave as a serpent does with a mouse.¹

21. Without any delay, efforts should be made to produce the nectar, by drinking which a being in the jaws of death will become immortal.

22-23. Having thrown all kinds of plants, grasses, creepers and herbs in the sea of milk, and making mount Mandara as the churning rod and Vāsuki (the king of snakes) as the churning rope, you churn the ocean well assiduously with My help. The Daityas shall undergo the trouble of churning while you shall reap the fruit thereof.

24. Oh gods! You agree to whatever desire the Daityas express. All objects are not successfully achieved through anger (and confrontation), as through conciliatory methods.

25. You need not be afraid of the Kālakūṭa poison that will come out of the (churned) sea (for god Śiva will drink it). You should not evince any desire or covetousness (for the objects churned out) or express any anger if Daityas do so.

Śri Śuka said:

26. After instructing the gods in this way, the glorious Supreme Person, the Ruler (of the universe) who acts according to his own free will, disappeared from their view, Oh king.

27. Having bowed down to the Venerable Lord (who had disappeared), god Brahmā and Śiva returned to their respective regions, while gods approached Bali (the king of demons).

¹ ŚR.—Just as a serpent caught in box by a snake-charmer formed friendship with a mouse outside (to make a hole into that box). When the serpent creeps out of that box, it eats up that mouse. Similarly you should behave now.

28. The praiseworthy king of Daityas who knew the opportune time when to wage war, and when to make peace, restrained his generals, who got excited at the sight of their enemies in that unprepared condition.

29. Then (the gods) approached Bali, the son of Virocana, seated (on a throne) and guarded by Asura generals, endowed with the highest royal splendour after the conquest of the three worlds.

30. The highly intelligent Indra consoled Bali with many soft words, and spoke to him everything as per briefings of the Supreme Man.

31. The (oral) proposal was acceptable to Bali and to other Asura rulers like Śambara, Ariśṭanemi and other residents of Tripura who were present.

32. Then gods and Asuras reached an agreement, and after contracting a friendly alliance, they made great efforts for obtaining the nectar, Oh tormentor of enemies.

33. Then, being arrogantly proud (of their physical strength), they (gods and demons) forcibly pulled out the mount Mandara. Shouting lustily, they with their Parigha-like long and powerful arms, proceeded to take it to the sea.

34. Being thoroughly exhausted by carrying the heavy burden, Indra, Bali and other gods and demons became unable to take it any further and helplessly left it on the way.

35. While the mountain of gold was falling there, it crushed to death under its weight many gods and demons.

36. Knowing that they (gods and demons) had got their arms, thighs and necks broken and were dispirited and nervous, the Eagle-banneered Lord manifested himself there.

37. Having seen the gods and Dānavas (demons) have been crushed by the falling of the mountain, he, by his mere glance, restored gods to life as if they were unhurt.

38. Sportively, with one hand, he placed the mountain on Garuḍa, and mounting it (Garuḍa), he went to the sea surrounded by the hosts of gods and demons.

39. Having taken down the mountain from his shoulders and placing it near the water (of the sea) Garuḍa, the best and foremost among birds, being discharged by Lord Hari, went his way.

CHAPTER SEVEN

The Churning of the Sea for Nectar

Śrī Śuka said

1-2. They (gods and demons) invited Vāsuki, the king of serpents, agreeing to give him his due share in the proceeds (lit. fruit viz. nectar arising out of that churning). They bound him round the mountain (Mandara) like a churning cord. Joyfully yet with a firm determination, they began (to churn the ocean) for the nectar. At first, Lord Hari took hold of the head-side (of the serpent) and gods followed him.

3-4. The lords of the demons did not approve of this act of the Supreme Person. We, who have mastered the Vedic lore and śāstric studies and are well-known for our noble birth and deeds, will not hold the tail, that dirty, inauspicious limb of the serpent. (Protesting thus) they stood aloof in silence. Seeing that, the Supreme Person, smilingly left off the fore part (of Vāsuki), and took hold of his tail along with the gods.

5. Having thus defined their positions, the sons of Kāśyapa (both gods and demons), began to churn the sea of milk with utmost exertion, for the sake of nectar (amṛta).

6. Oh delight (descendant) of Pāṇḍu! While the sea was being churned, the mountain being unsupported (from below), sank down into the water, due to its own weight, despite the efforts of the mighty ones (gods and demons) to hold it up.

7. Finding their manly efforts frustrated by the much more powerful Providence, they became extremely dejected at heart, and their countenances grew pale.

8. Noticing the set-back caused by the Lord of obstacles,
The Lord of infinite prowess and unfailing determination, assumed the wonderful form of a gigantic tortoise and diving deep into the water bore up the mountain (on its back).

9. Beholding the great mountain being so raised up, the gods and demons proceeded to churn up the sea. The Lord bore the mountain on its back which was, like another big continent, eight hundred thousand Yojanas in extent.

10. Supporting on his back the revolving mountain (which was set in motion and was) shaking by the velocity of the powerful arms of the chiefs of gods and demons, (the Lord, incarnated as) the First Tortoise of immeasurable power, regarded the circular motion of the mountain as pleasant scratching of his back, Oh dear King!

11. (Finding the need for still more vigorous efforts) with a view to invigorate their strength and energy, Lord Viṣṇu entered into the Asuras in his demonic form (i. e. his rājasic nature); He stimulated the power and energy of the hosts of gods by entering into them in his godly form (i. e. his sattvic nature and into Vāsuki in the form of suspended consciousness (his tāmasic form).

12. The Lord of one thousand arms stood like another king of mountains, and stabilised the big mount Mandara by placing one hand over it. The gods headed by Brahmā, Lord Śiva and Indra in the heaven eulogised him and showered him with flowers.

13. Strengthened by the Supreme Lord as pressing the churning rod from above, supporting it from below in the form of a tortoise, entering into the bodies of gods and demons, the mountain (churning rod), and the serpent (the churning cord) the gods and demons lustily and joyously churned the ocean with the great mountain so violently, that all the crocodiles (and other aquatic animals) were greatly agitated.

14. The demons headed by Pauloma, Kāleya, Bali, Ilvala, and others whose splendour and energy was marred with the fire and smoke gushing forth from the thousand fearful eyes and nostrils of that big serpent, became like the Sarala trees consumed by forest conflagration.

15. Over the celestials whose splendour was dimmed by the flaming breaths of Vāsuki and whose clothes, excellent garlands, coats and faces became smoky in colour, the clouds, under the control and (direct command) of the Lord copiously poured showers, and (cool) breezes, impregnated with the waves of the sea, began to blow.

16. When no nectar could come out from the sea, though it was vigorously churned that way (as described above), by the leaders of the hosts of gods and demons, the Unconquerable Lord began to churn it himself.

17. When the Lord, dark blue like clouds, wearing brightly shining garment of golden hue, adorned with a pair of ear-rings, flashing like lightning, with glossy wavy locks of hair on the head, wearing vanamālā (a garden of sylvan flowers), with eyes reddish like red lotus, churned the ocean, supporting the mount Mandara from below, and holding in his triumphant arms vouchsafing protection to the worlds, the serpent, he shone like another rival mountain.

18. From the ocean that was being churned and (as a consequence of which) teeming shoals of fishes, crocodiles, sea serpents, and tortoises and whales, sea elephant, alligators and whale-eater timīṅgalas got agitated, there issued forth the most deadly poison called Halāhala.

19. As that effervescent, irresistible unbearable poison of deadly force spread in each and every direction, above and below, creatures along with their leaders became terribly afraid, and for want of protection flew to Lord Sadāśiva for protection.

20. Beholding that foremost of gods seated along with his divine Consort on the mountain (Kailāsa) for the creation (or prosperity) of the three worlds, and practising penance, so agreeable to sages, for their final Liberation, and thus setting up an ideal before them, they (the celestial patriarchs) paid obeisance to him and offered their prayer.

_The Lords of Created Beings said:_

21. Oh God of gods! Oh Supreme God! Oh Creator, the very soul of beings! Be pleased to save us who have sought shelter in you, from the poison that is burning the three worlds.

22. You alone are the Almighty Ruler capable of causing bondage and emancipation of the whole worlds, the wise adore you as such, and as the father (or preceptor) who removes the afflictions of those who seek refuge in you.

23. Oh all pervading Lord! When you, through your own Potency consisting of three guṇas, undertake to create, preserve and destroy the universe, Oh self-seeing perfect Lord, you assume (severally) the appellations Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva.

24. You are that Supreme mysterious Brahman, the creator of beings, of the higher (gods) and the lower order (sub-human beings). You are the supreme soul who appear as the universe by means of your various powers (such as Sattva, Rajas and Tamas). Hence you are the Controller and Master of the Universe.

25. You are the source of the Word (Vedas) and (hence you stand self-revealed); you are the prime cause of the universe (viz. the principle mahat), the soul (the cosmic ego or ahamkāra); the three guṇas (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas) which bring forth the Vital airs (prāṇas), cognitive and conative sense-organs (indriyas) and the material object (dravya) and the essential nature (Sva-bhāva) of everything, you are the Time spirit (causing commotion and imbalance of guṇas), the will to create (kratu), the Truth, the (cosmic) Order, the righteousness. The sāstras declare that Pradhāna constituting of the three guṇas is based on (and supported by) you, (or the Prāṇava consisting of three syllables A U M reveals you) *

*This verse is variously interpreted :

(i) VR: They say that You are the authority of śāstras, the cause of the world, the Supreme Self Who is of the nature of vital breath (prāṇas), senses, the five elements (bhūtas) whose body is Time, the Brahman, The Inner Controller of all, dharma (religiousness or to be adored with piety) and the three-syllabled (AUM) prāṇava is regarded as representing You.

(ii) VJ: You are the root-cause of understanding; You are the promoter of life (senses etc), Your Will is the Truth itself; You are of the nature of existence (sat) consciousness (cit) and bliss (ānanda); You are the dharma as You preserve the (social) order; You are designated by the letter OM (as stated by upaniṣads).

(iii) SD: Kratu—Prajñā dharma—leading to worldly life.
Satya & rta—Nivrtti dharma—leading to renunciation of worldly life.

(iv) GD: satya—factual statement—Truth.

rta—sweet speech.

dharma—sacrifices and other rituals.
26. Oh Creator of the universe! Fire which represents, gods in its person (as the distributor of sacrificial offerings to gods) is your mouth; the wise know that the earth is your lotus-like feet; Time is the motion, the cardinal points, the ears, and Varuṇa (the Lord of waters) the palate, of you who are the soul (the Inner controller) of all gods.

27. The sky represents your navel; the wind, your breath, the sun, your eyes, water, (your semen; the support of all jīvas (individual souls) elevated (like that of god Brahmā) and ordinary (like those of sub-human beings), is your ego; Soma or the Moon-god, your mind, and the heavens, your head.

28. The seas symbolize your abdomen, the mountains your bones; all plants and herbs your hair; the Vedic metres seven humours in your body; the dharma as enunciated in the Vedas your heart, Oh embodiment of the three Vedas.

29. Oh Lord! the five upanisads (the sacred hymns or mantras known as Tatpurusa, Aghora, Sadyojāta, Vāmadeva, and Iśāna) from which the collection of thirty eight mantras evolve, denote your (five) faces; that self-effulgence constituting the supreme principle which is designated as Śiva is your (real) absolute state.

---

1: The text of the five mantras or upaniṣads are as follows:

(i) Tat purusāya vidmahe, Mahādevāya dhimahi /
    tanno Rudraḥ pracoadayā ||

(ii) Aghorābhīṣṭha ghorabhīya ghora-ghora-tarebhīyaḥ /
    sarvatas sarva-sarvebhīyo namas te astu Rudra-rūpebhīyaḥ |

(iii) sadyo-jānam prapaṇāṃ sadyo jātāya vai namaḥ |
    bhava bhavendī- bhave bhajasya mām bhavod-bhavo'yā namaḥ |

(iv) Vāmadevāya namo, jyeṣṭhāya namo, Rudrāya namaḥ, Kālāya namaḥ, kala- vikaraṇāya namo bala-vikaraṇāya namo, bala-praṃathanāya namas sarva-bhūta- damanāya namo, manonmanāya namaḥ ||

(v) Iśānas sarva-vidyānēm Iśvaras sarva-bhūtānāṁ, Brahmādhipatir Brahmaḥ dhiputir Brahmā Śivo me astu sadāśivam ||

VD. has given the details how these five mantras or upaniṣads are broken up into thirty-eight mantras.

For example, from the first upaniṣad Tatpurusāya evolve the following mantras:

1. Tat-purusāya vidmahe tāntyai /
2. Mahādevāya dhimahi Vidvyai /
3. tanno Rudraḥ Prātiṣṭhāyai /
4. Pracoadayā dhiṛyai /
30. Your shadow is seen in the waves of unrighteousness (such as hypocrisy, covetousness (by which destruction is caused; your (three) eyes are sattva, rajas and tamas (which bring about the creation of the universe); Oh Lord, the eternal Veda mainly composed in meters (like Gāyatrī, Triṣṭubh) stand for your glance; for you are the omniscient proponent of the sāstric lore.

31. Oh Lord of mountains! Your supreme effulgence where the modes of Prakṛti like sattva, rajas and tamas have no place, and which is nothing but the supreme Brahman transcending all distinctions and differentiations, is absolutely inaccessible to all the guardian deities of various spheres and to Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Indra.

32. That you destroyed Kāma (the god of Love), the sacrifice (of Dakṣa), Tripuras— the three cities (constructed by Maya) subdued the god of death, consumed the (Halahala) poison (which is as good as consumed as you are certain to drink it up just now) and killed innumerable trouble-makers of living beings, is not so much praiseworthy, on your part, as your unawareness of the razing down of this universe—your own creation by the sparks emanating from the fire in your own (third) eye (you remaining absorbed in deep meditation).

33. Shameless are they who talk nonsense that you are always accompanied by (your consort) Umā of whom you are (excessively) enamoured, though (actually) the pair of your feet are contemplated in their hearts by the world’s preceptors who are absorbed in the spiritual bliss of the soul. (They are certainly brazen-faced) who (glibly) prate that you are a ferocious and murderous denizen of the funeral-place when you are a performer of austere penance (as an ideal to the

1. for sanākhyātmānaḥ—Vṛ reads sāksāt Manuḥ ‘Manu’ himself Who enunciated the sāstras represents Your glance, from which originated the divine sage, by your free will.

2. Vaikanśha :—VR explains that here the Supreme Soul is eulogised. As he abides in Rudra, He i.e. the Supreme Soul is rightly regarded as inaccessible to Vaikanśha or upendra.

3. Vṛ.—states that the praise of Hara is really that of Hari, as mentioned in ‘Hari, the soul of all is pleased hereby’ sarvātmā priyāte Hariḥ). sages)! Never can such (people lost to shame) understand your sportive ways.

34. Even god Brahmā and others are incapable of accurately comprehending your essential nature, much less are they able to praise you who are all-pervading and transcendental to Prakṛti (The primordial nature) lying beyond the causal relation. How is it possible for us (the recentmost) creation of the creations (like Marici and others) of Brahmā to extol you? The prayer offered by us (to the best of our ability) is limited to our (meagre) capacity1.

35. Oh Supreme Lord! What we behold is only your (apparent) visible form, but not the transcendental one. (We however, consider ourselves blessed even with this). Though your activities are unmanifest, this manifestation of yours is meant for the weal (and protection) of the world.

Śrī Śuka said:

36. Observing the calamity of those (gods other beings) and being overwhelmed with compassion for them, the Deity, the friend of all beings, spoke thus unto his beloved consort Sati (i.e. Umā) (lest his beloved Umā should prohibit him from drinking the Halāhala poison).

Lord Śiva said:

37. "Oh! What a pity! Behold, Oh Bhavānī! What calamity has befallen these creatures from the poison Kālakūṭa, produced from the churning of the sea of milk.

38. Certainly, it behoves me now to offer protection to these who are anxious to save their lives; for the protection of the afflicted is the sole concern (duty) of those who are powerful.

39-40. Saintly persons protect (the lives of) beings by sacrificing their own lives which they regard as transient. Oh auspicious lady! Lord Hari, the soul of all (creatures), is pleased with the man who extends mercy to created beings who, being deluded by the illusive potency of the Supreme Self, become the enemies of each other. When the glorious

1. Our praise is an expression of our earnest devotion. V.J.
Lord Hari is pleased, I feel delighted along with the mobile and immobile creation. I, therefore, swallow up (the whole of) this poison. May blessings (and happy life) proceed from me to all the creatures."

Sri Śuka said:

41. Having thus persuaded his consort, Pārvatī, the glorious Lord Śiva, who confers Bliss upon (or protects) the universe, proceeded to swallow up the poison; She, too, being aware of his prowess, expressed her approbation.

42. The liquid-poison (the concentrated impurities of the churned sea) showed its power even in his case inasmuch as, it reduced his throat blue, though it became an ornament of that benevolent Deity.

43. Generally righteous persons become afflicted at the torments and troubles of other people; for that (mitigation of those troubles) constitutes the highest type of worship of the Supreme Person, the Soul of the Universe.

44. Observing the wonderful feat (of swallowing up of the deadly poison) of Lord Śiva, the God of gods who fulfills the desires of his devotees, all creatures, Dakṣa’s daughter (his consort Sati), god Brahmā and Viṣṇu eulogised him.

45. What (negligible) little poison leaked down from his palms while drinking, was conserved by scorpions, serpents, poisonous herbs and plants, cobras and other biting animals like dogs, jackals etc.).

CHAPTER EIGHT

The Lord’s Manifestation as Mohini (The Enchantress)

Śri Śuka said:

1. When the (Kālakūṭa) poison was drunk up by god Śiva (whose emblem is the bull), these celestials and demons felt (relieved and) delighted, and began to churn the sea with (redoubled) force. Out of that churning emerged Surabhi (the wish-yielding cow).

2. The sages, the expounders of the Vedas (who devote themselves to sacrifices) accepted it (Surabhi which supplied materials like milk, ghee, useful for sacrifices) for (obtaining) sacred oblations in sacrificial performances which constitutes the path of gods (leading to the region of Brahman).

3. After this came out a horse named Uccaihśravas which was radiantly white like the moon. Bali expressed his desire for it (and took possession of it) but not Indra, as per instructions given by the Lord.

4. Next sprang forth the majestic (moon-white) elephant called Airāvata which, by its four tusks (huge like peaks of mountains) eclipsed the splendour and beauty of the white (snowy) mountain, Kailāsa, (the abode) of the glorious god Śiva.

5. Out of the (churned) ocean, came out a jewel called Kaustubha, a precious stone of ruby type. Hari expressed his desire to have that jewel as an adornment for his chest.

6. Thereafter, arose the (celestial tree) Pārijāta the ornament of the heavenly region,—a tree capable of conferring eternally all the objects desired by the supplicants just as your honour (Parīkṣit) does on the earth.

7. Next to that came out the Apsaras (celestial nymphs) adorned with gold necklaces (and other ornaments), clad in excellent raiments, who delight the denizens of heaven with their charming gait, sportive movements and bewitching glances.

8. And thereafter was manifested goddess Lakṣmī, the very embodiment of Affluence (Śrī), the delight of Lord Hari (Ramā), who is (absolutely) devoted to the glorious Lord. She illumined with her splendour all the quarters (making people residing therein desirous to have affluence), even as the flash of lightening does against the crystalline reflector like mountain Sudāmā.

9. With their minds agitated by the excellence of her glorious beauty, graceful mobility, youthful age and brilliant complexion, all of them including gods, demons and human beings, cherished a desire for her (in the form of affluence as they know her to be the mother of the three worlds).

10. The great Indra offered her a highly wonderful seat, while principal rivers, in their personal form, brought sacred waters in gold pitchers (for her ablutions).

11. The earth supplied all the herbs and plants required for her ablutions: cows, the five sacred articles (such as milk, curd, ghee constituting the pañcagavya) and the spring, all kinds of fruits and flowers produced in the vernal months of Caitra and Vaishākhā.

12. (With these articles) the seers laid down the procedure of Śāstric rites for her ablutions; while the Gandharvas began to sing auspicious song (in mellifluous notes), and celestial damsels well-versed in dancing, danced and sang.

13. The (presiding deities of) clouds poured forth the sounds of musical instruments like mydaṁga, paṇava, muraja, ānaka and gomukha (various kinds of drums, kettle drums etc.) and produced notes of conchs, flutes, string instruments like vīṇā in a loud fan-fare.

14. Thereafter, while Vedic hymns were being chanted by Brāhmaṇas, elephants supporting the four quarters, bathed with gold pots filled with sacred waters, the virtuous (sacred) goddess Śrī who was holding a lotus in her hand.

15. (When her bath was over) the ocean presented her two pieces of yellow silk raiments (one for the lower part of the body and one for the upper). Varuṇa offered her the garland Vaijyantī—by sucking honey from which the black-bees got intoxicated.

16. Viśvakarmā, the progenitor, presented her with various wonderful ornaments; Sarasvatī, a necklace of pearls; and Brahmā, a lotus and serpents, a pair of ear-rings.

17. Thereafter, when the auspicious mantras for averting evils were chanted and the benedictions were given (by Brāhmaṇas)¹, the goddess Śrī took in her hand a garland of (blue) lotuses with a swarm of black bees loudly humming about it. Her exceedingly beautiful countenance beaming with a bashful smile and with the dangling of ear-rings pressed against her lovely cheeks, she set out (in search of her Lord).

¹. Kṛṣṇa-spasti-yāna—The Comm. note the pun on spasti-yāna: Śrī who has her permanent abode (ayana) on the auspicious bosom of Lord Viṣṇu (śasti).

18. With a pair of symmetrical, big breasts (closely touching each other) pasted with sandal and saffron, and a beautifully slender waist, she shone like a moving creeper of gold while she moved through the big assembly, making sweet jingling sound of her anklets.

19. She (The goddess Śrī) the embodiment of Affluence was looking out for a resort (viz. a husband) absolutely faultless, eternal and endowed with everlasting excellences, but she could not get one among the gandharvas, yaksas, demons, siddhas, caraṇas, celestials and others (in that assembly).

20. (The goddess Lakṣmi in the form of Affluence says to herself)

"Verily a person possessing asceticism has no control over his anger (e.g. the sage Durvāsas); (similarly) someone is endowed with wisdom but is not above attachment (e.g. Bṛhaspati or Śukra—the preceptors of gods and demons); some possess greatness but have no control over libidinousness (e.g. god Brahmā or Soma); how can a person (like Indra) who depends for his protection on others (or who is deprived of his position by others i.e. enemies) can be a ruler?

21. Righteousness is found in some but they lack compassion for other beings (e.g. Paraśurāma); some others have liberality but that is not conducive to Final Liberation (e.g. King Śibi); some are endowed with virility and prowess, which are subject to the ravages of Time; while the other who is (like Sage Sanaka completely free from attachment to guṇas, will have no place for (i.e. will have nothing to do with) the other person (even his wife, as he is always absorbed in meditation).

22. In some person there is a long life but they are not of amiable nature (liked by women, as, like Mārkanaḍeya, they are always self-controlled); even that virtue is found in some but the duration of their life is unknown; in some (e.g. god Śiva) there is both (longevity and amiability) but even

note: VD. explains that a great goddess like Lakṣmi possessed the knowledge of the past, present and the future. Hence she rejects persons though not present in the assembly.
he is inauspicious (as he stays in funeral grounds). And he who is exceedingly auspicious (as well as long living and lovable) but he (being self-satisfied) does not care for me”.

23. Coming to this conclusion (after deliberation), she elected as her spouse, Lord Viṣṇu (Mukunda) who was most worthy due to his everlasting excellences, absolute independence and desirelessness, who is transcendental to the guṇas of Prakṛti and was sought by all spiritual powers and (hence) was coveted by her even though he is disinterested in all.¹

24. She placed on his shoulders (round his neck) the beautiful garland of blooming lotuses, resounding with the hum of intoxicated black bees. She stood by him silently waiting (for his grace). She indicated through her eyes blooming with a bashful smile that she attained to his bosom, her permanent resting place.

25. Lord Hari, the Father of the Three worlds offered his bosom as the permanent abode to Śrī (the celebrated consort and beloved of Hari), the mother of the three worlds who was the very embodiment of affluence and fortune or the source of all prosperity and riches. Being thus established (permanently and cosily), she promoted the welfare of all her creatures, the three worlds along with their rulers, by her compassionate and benign glances.

26. There was a loud chorus of the music and melodious notes issuing from the singing and dancing of the Gandharvas (lit. the followers of celestials) along with their wives (celestial damsels) and of the musical instruments such as conchs, trumpets, and drums (which were being played in its accompaniment).

27. Showering flowers on him, all progenitors of the worlds headed by Brahmā, Rudra, and Aṅgiras began to chant the glories of the All-pervading Lord in sacred hymns descriptive of his excellences and of appropriate import.

28. Being looked upon (with Grace) by Śrī, the gods,

¹. Śr. adds: Lakṣmī thought that though Viṣṇu is not interested in others due to His immersion in eternal spiritual bliss, He would not neglect her after marriage, as He entertains the Siddhas. She would consider herself blessed in His service. There is no propriety in marrying ordinary persons.
progenitors of the worlds along with their creation, became endowed with virtuous nature and other excellences, and attained the supreme-most felicity.

29. When the Daityas and Dānavas were disregarded by the goddess Lakṣmi, they became dispirited, voluptuous, indolent and devoid of the sense of shame, Oh king.

30. Thereupon, arose the presiding deity of wine, Vāruṇi by name, in the form of a girl with lotus-eyes. The Asuras verily took hold of her, by the consent of Lord Hari.

31. As the sea was being churned by the sons of sage Kāśyapa (viz. gods and demons) with a desire to get the nectar there appeared a highly wonderful personage.

32. His (pair of) arms were long and muscular (stout); his neck was adorned with three lines as on a conch; his eyes were reddish; complexion bluish (like a cloud); youthful in age; wearing a wreath and adorned with all ornaments.

33. Clad in yellow garment, the broad-chested person was adorned with ear-rings of highly polished jewels; his hair were soft, glossy and curly. even to their ends; that charming person walked with a lion-like gait.

34. Adorned with bracelets and bearing (in his hands) a jar full of nectar, he was indeed a direct manifestation of a minute portion of a ray of the most glorious Lord Viṣṇu.

35-37 He was the well-known Dhanvantari, the Father (or revealer) of the Science of Medicine (lit. Science of life) who is a recipient of a special share in sacrificial offerings. Beholding him and the jar brimming with nectar (in his hands), all the demons, being covetous of appropriating all the products (of the churned ocean) to themselves, forcibly snatched away the jar (from him). As the jar containing nectar was thus being forcibly taken away by the Asuras, the gods, being dejected at heart sought refuge with lord Hari. Observing their pitiable condition described above, the glorious Lord who confers the desired objects to his servants (votaries), consoled them (thus): “Do not feel dejected. Both by sowing disensions among the Asuras and by assuming the form of Mohini (a charming damsel) through my deluding Yogic power, I shall accomplish your object”.

38. With their hearts burning with the desire of grabbing the nectar, there arose a quarrel among them, each clamorously saying, "I must get it first", "my priority first", "Not you", "Not you".

39. "Gods too, who contributed their labour (efforts) to achieve this (production of nectar) deserve their due share in this (nectar) just as in a Satra-yāga all the performers of the sacrifice participate equally in the merit accruing from it). This is the eternal Law."

40. Oh king! In this way the weaker demons who got jealous of the stronger ones who usurped the jar (of nectar) constantly protested to them.

41. In the meanwhile, the Supreme Ruler Viṣṇu who knows all expedients, assumed an extremely wonderful form of a young damsel (charming) beyond the power of words.

42. The form (of the damsel) was attractive to the eyes. It was blue like a lotus, in complexion, beautiful in every limb. Its ears were symmetrical and adorned with earrings. Its countenance had beautiful cheeks and a shapely nose.

43. Its waist was slender due to the heavy breasts developed by blooming youth. Its eyes looked frightened (as if) by the humming of the black-bees attracted by the fragrance of its mouth.

44. It wore on its profuse mass (locks) of hair a wreath of blooming Mallikā (a kind of jasmine) flowers. Its shapely neck was beautified by a necklace and her beautiful arms were decked with armlets.

45. It appeared enchanting due to her girdle enhancing the beauty of islet-like big hips covered with shining (spotless) cloth. A pair of anklets making a jingling sound while walking decorated its feet.

46. By its bashful smiles, dancing eye-brows and amor-rous glances, it constantly provoked passion in the hearts of the Daitya generals.¹

¹. VJ's text continues this chapter to the end of the next one. Thus SR's 9th Chapter corresponds to VJ's 8th chapter.
CHAPTER NINE

Distribution of Nectar by Mohini

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. The Asuras who renounced the spirit of mutual friendship, reproached each other (for the nectar). Adopting the ways of robbers (with a determination to secure the nectar) they were snatching the jar of nectar from each other when they happened to behold the approaching damsel (the Mohini-form of Viṣṇu).

2. “Oh what a graceful form! What exquisite splendour! What a charming youthfulness!” With such passion enkindled in their hearts, they ran up to her and began to enquire.

3. “Who are you Oh damsel, with eyes like lotus-petals? Whence have you come? What do you intend to do (What is the object of your visit)? Tell us whose daughter you are. You are as it were churning (agitating) our minds, Oh lady with shapely thighs!

4. Not that we do not know (i.e. we do know definitely) that you are not touched by the celestials, Daityas, Siddhas, Gandharvas, Cāraṇas or (even by) guardians of the worlds. How then (could it be) by human beings?

5. Oh lady with beautiful brows! Indeed! you must have been certainly deputed by the merciful Lord of the universe to give delight to the senses and minds of all embodied beings. Is it not so? or have you come of your own accord?

6. Oh proud lady with a beautiful waist! (Deputed by the Lord as you are)! As such it behoves you to bring about amity and happiness among us who, though kins, have turned out to be enemies by jealously contending to obtain one common object.

7. As the sons of the sage Kaśyapa, we are all brothers and have displayed our prowess. Be pleased to distribute the prize (the nectar) equitably, so that there will be no ground for a quarrel.

8. When approached with this request by the Daityas, Lord Hari who assumed the form of that damsel by his delu-
...Potency \textit{(Māyā)}, just laughed, and addressed them as follows, looking at them (all the while) with captivating side-long glances.

\textit{The Lord said}:

9. How is it that you, the sons of the (great) sage Kaśyapa,\textsuperscript{1} associate yourselves with a wanton woman like me?
Certainly, no wise man reposes trust in women.

10. Oh enemies of celestials! The wise people say that the friendship of wolves and especially of way-ward women who are always on the look-out for ever-new victims (and men), is momentary (and unreliable).

\textit{Śrī Śuka said}:

11. By such of her jocular and enticing remarks, the Asuras (were tempted to feel) reassured in their minds. They gave out an incomprehensible yet significant laugh, and handed over the jar of nectar to her.

12. Thereupon, taking the charge of the jar of nectar, Hari spoke in a tone brightened up with a gentle smile: “If you (unanimously and whole-heartedly) are ready to accept whatever I do, whether right or wrong, in any way (I please), (them and then only) I shall (undertake to) distribute the nectar among you”.

13. On hearing her speech, the leaders of the Asuras, incapable of comprehending the depth and significance of her words, agreed to her condition saying “Be it so”.

14. Thereupon having observed a fast\textsuperscript{2} (as per Mohini’s instruction) they took their bath. After offering oblations to the fire, and having distributed (food etc.) to cows, \textsuperscript{1}VD. dissolves: \textit{Kaśyopa-diśāda}—into \textit{Kaśya-pa-dāya-ada}—who are in the habit of and deserving to be served with wine. “Why do you want nectar?” VC. “You, sons of a great sage like Kaśyapa! The father a great sage and the sons hunt after wanton women!” This is the sarcastic joke.

\textsuperscript{2}Upoṣya—VC. states that they had already observed a fast for the auspicious act of drinking nectar. But a quarrel broke out among themselves for settling which Mohini became the mediator. After entrusting the jar of nectar to her, they took their bath.
Brāhmaṇas and other beings, they got performed the rite of Svastyayana (recitation of benedictory verses and offer of blessings) by Brāhmaṇas.

15. Wearing brand new clothes according to their (individual) choice, and gorgeously adorning their person with ornaments, all of them entered upon (and squatted) on (the seats of) Kuśa grass the ends which pointed to the east.

16-17. When the gods and demons (sons of Diti) were sitting with their faces to the east in that hall fragrant with incense, decorated with wreaths of flowers and illuminated with lamps, there entered, with the jar of nectar in hands, she (Mohini) with beautiful, round, symmetrical thighs, of gait slow due (to the weight of) her bulky hips covered with brilliant silk raiment, eyes swimming as if through inebriation, of pitcher-like big breasts, warbling (as it were) with the jingling of her gold anklets, Oh King.

18. Ogling Her, the veritable supreme Deity, as a compeer to goddess Śrī2 (or Lakṣmī in beauty), with a winning countenance, having beautiful ears adorned with gold ear-rings, shapely nose and charming cheeks, the gods and demons were completely enchanted by her glances accompanied with captivating smiles while her brassiere (the cloth cover of her breasts) slipped (exposing her breasts).

19. Considering that it is unfair to offer nectar to demons who like serpents are wicked by nature, Lord Viṣṇu did not distribute it to Asuras.

20. Arranging them both in separate rows, the Lord of the world made them sit in their respective rows.

21. Taking the jar of nectar and beguiling the demons by charming movements of brows, bashful smiles, play with garment and ornaments, sweet flattering words, he made gods who were sitting at a distance, to drink the nectar which prevents old age and death.

22. Oh King! The Asuras abided by the pledge given

---

1. Śrī-Sakhīm—GS. observes that though Viṣṇu was a male companion of Śrī, he acted like a female friend to serve the interests of his devotees.
by them. Out of covetous lust for her and feeling it below their dignity to quarrel with a lady, they kept quiet.

23. They cherished unbounded attachment and lustful longing for her and were too nervous to affect it adversely. Being restrained by the high reverence shown to them by her ("Let the niggardly gods drink first. Sensible people like you should wait a bit") they uttered nothing unpleasant.

24. Disguising himself in the garb of celestials, Rāhu entered (stealthily) in the row of gods (between the sun and the moon) and drank the nectar but was indicated (exposed with gestures) by the sun and the moon (who feared him as more powerful than they).

25. Just while he (Rāhu) was drinking, Hari (swiftly) severed his head with his discus of razor-like sharpness so his headless trunk to which nectar did not touch, fell down dead.

26. His head (however) attained immortality upon which the Birthless Lord conferred planet-hood. But cherishing (this old) enmity, he assails the sun and the moon on the new-moon-day and the full-moon-day (respectively whenever he gets an opportunity).

27. When gods had almost consumed the nectar, the glorious Lord Hari, the creator and protector of the world (renouncing his female form) reasumed his own form, while the Asura chiefs kept looking on (agape).

28. In this way, even though (the factors such as) time, place, instrument (apparatus), activity and the objective of the hosts of gods and demons were the same, there was divergence in the fruit (reaped). Out of them, gods easily obtained the fruit viz. the nectar, due to their resort to the dust of the lotus-feet of the Lord, while the Daityas did not.

29. Whatever is done by men with their life, wealth, senses, mind and words for their own person, progeny etc., becomes futile as a consequence of entertaining the idea of difference and distinction. But whatever is done by employing the same set of means dedicating them to the Lord without cherishing the sense of difference; is crowned with success like watering the roots of a tree (reaches to all its branches, leaves etc.). —
CHAPTER TEN

A Battle between Gods and Asuras

Sri Suka continued:

1. In this way, Oh King, though Dānava and the Daityas were careful and put in their best of efforts (in churning the ocean), they did not obtain the nectar because they had turned away their face from Lord Vāsudeva.

2. Having accomplished the production of ambrosia and having made his votaries, the gods, to drink of it, the Lord rode on the back of Garuḍa and flew away while all beings were simply looking on (agape).

3. Seeing the best luck (in succeeding to drink the nectar) of their enemies and being unable to tolerate it (out of jealousy), the sons of Diti (Daityas) attacked gods with their weapons uplifted.

4. With their power increased by drinking of nectar and depending on the feet of Lord Nārāyaṇa as their asylum, all the gods retaliated unanimously with their weapons.

5. There, on the shore (of the Milky Sea) was fought the fiercest and the most bloody battle called (after the belligerents as) the Devāsura battle (the report or sight of) which made the hair stand on end, Oh King!

6. There (on the sea-shore) the enemies with their minds full of wrath clashed (against each other) on the battle field and struck one another with swords, arrows and various other weapons.

7. Terrific was the noise caused by the blasting of conchs and trumpets, beating of tabors, drums and Damarus and of the trumpeting elephants, neighing horses, rattling chariots and shouting soldiers.

8. In that battle, warriors in chariots clashed with car-warriors, foot-soldiers with foot-soldiers, horses with horses and elephants with elephants.

9. Some soldiers fought riding camels, some on elephants while others on donkeys, some on white-faced bears, while others on tigers and monkeys.

10. Some fought (while sitting) on the back of Kites, vultures, cranes, on hawks and bhāsas (a kind of bird), whales (Timiṅgalaś) and Sarabhās (eight-footed animal capable of killing a lion), bisons, rhinoceros, bulls, buffalos and Arunas.

11. Some fought (riding) on the backs of jackals, rats, chameleons, hares and men; some others on goats and sheep, deer and swans, while others on hogs.

12. Some fought riding birds of land and of water and others on animals of deformed shape. Warriors on both the sides penetrated more deeply and further still.

13-15. Like two oceans swarming with sea-monsters shone the two (warring) armies of Deva and Dānava warriors with their ranks of fighters distinguished by their flags of different colours, by their spotlessly white umbrellas with highly precious handles studded with diamonds, diamond handled fans made of feathers of peacock tails and Chowries; with their upper garments and turbans waved up by winds and with their burnished armours and ornaments glittering brightly and their sharp weapons sparkling in the rays of the sun.

16-17. In this battle the commander-in-chief of the Asura force was Bali, the son of Virocana whose aerial car was called Vaihāyasya. It was manufactured by Maya and was capable of flying to any place at the occupant’s will. It was equipped with all war-materials and weapons. Oh King, it was full of wonder that it surpassed all imagination and description (or could not be accurately located due to its unpredictable and quick movements); sometimes it was visible and sometimes invisible.

18. Surrounded by the commanders of Asura forces, Bali occupied that foremost aerial car. With Chowries being waved on either side and with a white umbrella, he shone like a rising moon.

19-22 On all sides around him, in their respective aerial cars, attended various squadron-leaders of Asuras such as Namuci, Śambara, Bāna, Vipracitti, Ayomukha, Dvi-mūrdha (A two-headed demon), Kālanābha, Praheti, Heti, Ilvala, Śakuni, Bhūta-santāpa (the tormentor of all beings), Vajradāmśṭra, Virocana, Hayagrīva, Śaṅku-Śiras, Kapila, Meghadundubhi, Tāraka, Cakra-dṛk, Śumbha, Niśumbha, Jambha, Utkala, Arīṣṭa, Arīṣṭanemi, Maya, the Lord of the three flying cities and other demon (tribes) such as Pauloma, Kāleya, Nivāta-Kavaca and others.

23. Without receiving any share in the soma or nectar, they had only to undergo hardships and exertions (for churning out the nectar). All of them had mostly vanquished the gods, just at the beginning of the battle.

24. Roaring loudly like lions, they blasted their loud-sounding conchs. Perceiving his foes so proud (and confident of their strength), Indra, the killer of the demon Bala, became extremely enraged.

25. The king of heaven (Indra) who rode Airāvata, the elephant supporting the eastern direction, shone like the sun (the Lord of the day) rising on the eastern mountains with cascades (of water) gushing down.

26. Around Indra stood gods in their respective vehicles, with flags and wielding various weapons. There were the guardians of the world like Vāyu (the Wind-god), Agni (the fire-god), Varuṇa (the Lord of waters) and others along with their followers.

27. Assaulting each other violently and reviling one another in biting terms, cutting to the quick, they rushed forward challenging each other and engaged in duels.

28. Bali fought with Indra, Guha conflicted with Kārttikeya; Varuṇa contended with Heti, and the Sun-god with Praheṭi, Oh King.

29. Yama on his part combated with Kāla-nābha, Viśvakarmā verily gave battle with Maya; Śāmbara battled with Tvaṣṭr and Virocana with Saviṭr.

30. Namuci took up arms against Aparājita, the pair of Aśvini-Kumāras against Vṛṣaparvā, the Sun-god alone against the hundred sons of Bali of whom Bāṇa was the eldest.

31. Soma (the Moon-god) gave battle with Rāhu; Anil (the wind-god) with Puloman; the mighty goddess Bhadrakāli with Niśumbha and Śumbha.

32. Vṛṣākapi combated with Jambha, Vibhāvasu with the demon Mahiṣa, Ilvala along with Vātāpi with the sons of god Brahmā (such as Marici and others), Oh Vanquisher of enemies.

33. Durmarṣa fought with Kāmadeva (the god of Love), Utkala with (seven) Mother-goddesses; Bṛhaspati fought with Śukra, and Śanaiscara (the presiding deity of the planet Saturn) with Naraka.

34. Maruts contended with Nivāta-Kavaca demons, the Vasu-gods with the Kāleya-tribe of Daityas, (gods called) Viśve-devas with the sons of Puloman and the (eleven) Rudragods with Krodhavaśa serpents.

35. In this way, in the battle wherein Asuras (demons) as well as leaders of gods were fighting in duels and collectively in as body, approached one another and with the desire of gaining victory, violently struck one another with sharp arrows, swords and iron clubs and javelins.

36. They chopped off the heads of each other with (weapons called) bhustundas (a fire-arm), discuses, maces, lances, battle axes, Śaktits, Ulmukas (fire-brands) prāsas (a barbed missile) Bhallakas, (long swords), parighas (iron bars), mudgaras (hammer-shaped weapons), and bhindipālas (small javelins).

37. Elephants and horses (along with their riders), warriors riding chariots and foot-soldiers, riders of various animals and conveyances were cut down to pieces, their arms, thighs, necks and legs were hacked and hewn; their flags, bows, coats of armour and ornaments were torn and tattered.

38. Heavy dust that was raised by trampling and pounding under feet the battle-ground, and the dashing of the wheels of the chariot against it, enveloped the quarters, the sky, and the sun, but settled down to the ground by profuse flood of spouts of blood (of the wounded warriors—the spouts of blood reaching up to heaven drenching the clouds of dust).

39. That battle-field appeared bright as it was thickly strewn with heads from which the diadems and ear-rings were forcibly shaken off (and fallen), with eyes blood-shot with wrath, and tightly closed lips bitten with anger, long and stout arms decorated with ornaments and still clasping the weapons and thighs shapely like elephant’s trunk.

40. The headless trunks of the warriors sprang to their feet and (as if) perceiving through the eyes of their fallen heads, rushed on the battle-field onwards the opposing warriors with their arms uplifted in their powerful arms.
41. Bali discharged at Indra ten arrows, three at the elephant Airāvata, four (one arrow each) at the four guards of Airāvata, and one at the conductor of the elephant.

42. Just with a smile, the prompt and valorous Indra cut them in the transit with equal number of sharp Bhalla arrows, even before they could reach him.

43. Observing his excellent skill (in archery) Bali, being intolerant, took in his hand a Śakti (a dart-like missile) dazzling like a big meteor. But Indra cut it while it was in the hands of Bali.

44. Then in a serial order Bali took up a Śūla (a spear), a prāsa (a barbed missile), a tomara (an iron club) and rishi (a double-edged sword). But whatever weapon Bali took, the mighty Indra cut it all.

45. The Asura (Bali) then disappeared and created his demonic illusion. Oh King! there appeared a mountain over the head of the celestial army.

46. From the mountain fell down the trees burning with forest-conflagration, and rocks with chisel-pointed ends descended therefrom crushing the hostile forces to powder.

47. From that mountain rushed forth large serpents, cobras, scorpions, lions and tigers and boars crushing down big elephants.

49. Large roaring clouds with deep, terrific thunder and blown by stormy wind, rained live coals of fire.

50. A wide spread formidable fire driven by powerful gales and most terrible like the fire at the end of the universe, was created (with his black magic) by the demon (Bali) and it began to burn the army of gods.

51. Then there appeared all around them an ocean transgressing all its limits and looked terrible on account of the waves and whirlpools tossed by strong gales.

52. While such terrific illusions were being conjured up by Daityas, powerful in black magic, and dangerous because of their invisible movements, the celestial soldiers stood appalled and despondent.
53. Oh King! Indra and other gods did not know how to counteract this illusion when the glorious Lord, the creator of the universe was contemplated and he manifested himself.

54. With his feet tender as young leaves, placed across the shoulders of Garuḍa (of beautiful wings), he appeared clad in yellow silken garments, with his eyes like a pair of budding lotuses. He wielded eight weapons in his hands. He wore the resplendent Śrī (Śrī-vatsa mark) on his bosom, and the Kaustubha gems round his neck, an invaluable crown and a pair of priceless ear-rings as well.

55. Hardly did he enter the battle-fields the illusion conjured up by the (black magic) tricks of the Asuras disappeared by the greatness of the destroyer of all types of māyā just as a dream breaks up on the return of wakefulness, the very recollection (remembrance) of Hari, put an end to difficulties.

56. Perceiving that Hari arrived on the battle-field on his Garuḍa, Kālanemi who was riding a lion, whirlèd his javelin aloft and hurled it at him. Playfully seizing it as it was about to fall on the head of Garuḍa, he killed the enemy (Kālanemi) along with his animal with that very weapon.

57. Assaulting the Lord by whose discus the over-powerful Māli and Sumāli fell down with their head severed on the battle-field. Mālyavān (another Asura General) was about to strike Garuḍa on the head with his heavy mace when Hari, the Supreme-most Person, lopped off the head of the enemy who was roaring loudly.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

End of the Battle Between Gods and Asuras at Nārada’s Mediation

Śrī Śuka said :

1. Then, having recovered their minds (and morale from the impact of demonic illusions) through the great divine grace of the Supreme Person, Indra, Vāyu and other gods severely hit back each one of the demons who massively assailed them before, in that very battle.

2. When the glorious Indra, being enraged at Bali, the son of Virocana, raised up his Vajra (thunderbolt), all creatures cried out, "Alas! Ha Ha" (lest it should kill Bali).

3. Despising contemptuously the noble-minded, well-equipped Bali who was moving (fearlessly) in the great battle facing Indra, Indra—the wielder of Vajra, spoke to him as follows:

4. "Just as a roguish conjuror makes gullible persons as if blind-folded by his conjuring tricks (and incantations) and robs them of their money, you desire to conquer us, the masters of such Māyās (black magic and illusory tricks) with your Māyā, Oh fool.

5. Those who by their illusive powers (or by unfaithful cunning observances of vows) wish to ascend to the celestial world or desire to transcend it to go to still higher regions (viz. Liberation), I shall oust such ignorant rogues from the post occupied by them previously and definitely throw them downward still (with no hopes of rising up).

6. Oh dull-witted fellow! I, that very Indra, shall, with my Vajra (thunderbolt) of hundred joints, remove the head of yours, so adept in black magic and evil spells. Show your valorous prowess with the help of your clansmen".

_Bali responded_

7. "To those whose previous acts became fruitful through the impelling of Time (Destiny) who participate in the battle, fame, victory, defeat and death come all in due course.

8. Therefore wise, thoughtful people realize that all the above (victory, defeat etc.) are controlled by Time and they neither get elated with joy or downcast with grief. You all are, however, ignorant about this (truth).

9. Inasmuch as you regard yourself as the agent of this (victory, defeat etc.), you deserve to be pitied by good people (for your foolishness) and as such, we do not accept your words (however cutting to the quick (they be)"
Sri Suka said:

10. Having thus retorted to the Lord of gods, the valorous Bali, the vanquisher of warriors, struck again with Nārāca arrows drawn to the ear, Indra who was in retaliation previously hit back with reproachful words.

11. The god Indra who was thus reproached by the enemy who expressed (nothing but) the truth, did not however tolerate the retort like an elephant pricked with a goad.

12. Indra, the conqueror of enemies, discharged at him, his unfailing weapon Vajra (thunderbolt). And down fell Bali on the ground, along with his (aerial) car like a mountain with its wings severed.¹

13. Seeing his friend fallen down, Jambha, the friend and well-wisher of Bali, attacked Indra with a view to carry out his duty as a friend, even though his friend was fallen.

14. Riding his lion, the extremely powerful Jambha approached Indra and raising his mace (gadā) impetuously struck him on the neck and the elephant as well.

15. Stunned and tormented by the stroke of the mace, the elephant was deeply distressed and touching the ground with its knees, it fell into a swoon.

16. Thereupon, a chariot yoked with a thousand horses was brought by Mātali. The Lord of gods left the elephant and got into the chariot.

17. Expressing his appreciation at the (prompt) services rendered by the Charioteer (Mātali) smiling, Jambha, the most prominent Dānava, struck him with a burning javelin.

18. Screwing up all his fortitude, Mātali bore up the extremely unbearable pain of the dart. Greatly enraged at it, Indra sundered off the head of Jambha with his Vajra (thunderbolt).

19. Having heard from Sage Nārada, the report of Jambha being killed (in the battle), his kinsmen Namuci, Bala, Pāka rushed to the battle field in great haste.

¹ In the Vālmiki Rāmāyaña Sundara 1. 124-33 we are told that in the Kṛta age mountains had wings which Indra clipped. Only Maināka was saved by Vāyu in repayment of which obligation he allowed Hanumān to rest during his jump to Lankā and told him of the clipping.
20. Cutting Indra to the quick by biting, harsh words, they covered him with volleys of arrows as clouds would do to a mountain, with a down-pour of rain.

21. In that battle, the light-handed Bala struck simultaneously all the thousand horses of Indra with as many arrows.

22. It was certainly an achievement of a marvellous feat in the battle, when Pāka simultaneously fitted and discharged two hundred arrows and struck Mātali with a hundred and all the parts of the chariot with a hundred shafts.

23. With fifteen big arrows furnished with golden hilt, Namuci shot Indra and roared in the battle like a thundering rain-charged cloud.

24. Like clouds obscuring the sun in the rainy season, the Asuras screened off on all sides Indra, along with his chariot and charioteer, with nets of arrows.

25. Not being able to behold Indra and (considering themselves as) being leaderless and vanquished by the inimical forces, the hosts of celestials and their followers became bewildered and shrieked out like merchants in a ship wrecked on the high seas.

26. Thereupon issued out Indra along with his chariot, horses, flag and charioteer from the cage of arrows. Indra appeared brilliant like the sun illuminating the cardinal points, the sky and the earth, with his effulgence, at the close of the night.

27. Observing his army overpowered by enemies in the battle, the god, the wielder of Vajra (thunderbolt) vehemently lifted up his thunderbolt (determined) to strike down the enemy.

28. With that very eight-edged weapon he (simultaneously) sundered the heads of Bala and Pāka, striking terror into the hearts of the kinsmen who stood (simply) looking on, Oh King (Parikṣīt).

29. On perceiving their death and being overwhelmed with grief, revenge and rage, Namuci, determined to kill Indra, put forth a mighty exertion.

30. Catching hold of a javelin made of iron, furnished with gold, he attacked Indra in rage, threatening loudly, "Now you are killed". He hurled it at the King of gods and roared like a lion.

31. Even as it was dashing with terrific speed through the sky, Indra shattered it into thousand pieces with his arrows. The lord of the celestials, out of rage, struck him with his Vajra (thunderbolt) on the neck with a view to chop off his head.

32. The thunderbolt that was discharged with great vehemence did not pierce his skin. It was certainly the most wonderful that the Vajra (the thunderbolt) that killed the extremely powerful Vṛtra, was baffled by the skin of Namuci's neck.

33. Indra apprehended fear from the enemy from whom even Vajra (thunderbolt) was baffled. What has happened through the Destiny, has deluded the whole of the world.

34. It is by this thunderbolt that, in days of yore, I carried out the severance of wings of mountains which taking to their wings at will, settled anywhere on the earth, causing destruction to people, by their weight.

35. It was by this Vajra that Vṛtra, the very embodiment of the power of the austere penance of Tvaṣṭṛ, was split asunder, and also other mighty (persons) whose skin could not be scratched by all other missiles.

36. Such Vajra, when hurled by me at an insignificant Asura, became baffled and ineffective. Useless has become the spiritual energy of the Brāhmaṇa (with which it was invested): 'It has become (nothing but) a stick which I won't handle any more'.

37. To Indra who was thus pondering in dejection, a voice from heaven said, "This demon should not be killed by weapons wet or dry.

38. He has been conferred a boon by me that he would not meet death from wet or dry things. Hence, you have to think out some other expedient (for killing) the enemy".

39. Hearing the heavenly voice, Indra composed his mind and contemplated. It occurred to him (lit. he saw) that foam (of the sea) was the (real) expedient which comprises both the conditions (of being wet and dry).

40. With the foam which was neither dry nor wet (but was both simultaneously) he chopped off the head of Namuci. Hosts of sages sang his eulogies and showered the Lord of gods with flowers.

41. The chief of Gandharvas, Viśvāvasu and Parāvasu gave musical concert. Gods beat big drums and celestial nymphs danced with joy.

42. Other gods like Vāyu, Agni, Varuṇa and others destroyed their opponents with volleys of missiles, just as lions would kill the deer.

43. The divine sage Nārada who was deputed to celestials by god Brahmā, on perceiving the slaughter of Dānavas, prevented them (from that genocide, with the following words):

Nārada said:

44. “Supported as you were by the arms of Lord Nārāyaṇa, nectar was secured by you. You are also favoured by goddess Śrī (the consort of Nārāyaṇa). Hence you now cease from fighting.”

Śrī Śuka said:

45. Paying due respect to the words of the sage Nārada, they controlled the impetuosity of their rage. All of them returned to heaven, all the while being praised by their attendants.

46. The survivors of the battle carried the still unconscious Bali to the western mountain (of the setting sun) as per Nārada’s advice.

47. Śukrācārya (the preceptor of Daityas) restored to life (all the Daityas) whose limbs were intact, and necks in existence (unbroken), by means of his secret science of restoring life (saṃjīvani vidyā).

48. Bali regained his consciousness and other faculties at the touch of Śukra’s hand. Being endowed with the reality about the nature of the world, Bali suffered no depression, even though he was defeated.

CHAPTER TWELVE

Lord Śiva Fascinated by Mohini

The son of Bādarāyaṇa (Śri Śuka) said:

1-2. When god Śiva (the bull-banne red god) heard that Lord Hari infatu ated the Dānavas in a female form and made the hosts of gods to drink the nectar, he ascended his bull along with goddess Pārvatī, and surrounded by all the hosts of goblins, paid a visit to the region where god Viṣṇu (the killer of Madhu) was residing, with a view to see him.

3. God Śiva (the source of the world) who along with his consort Umā (Pārvatī) was reverentially received by the Lord (Viṣṇu) and was seated comfortably, returned his respects with compliments and spoke smilingly.

Śri Mahādeva said:

4. “Oh God of gods! Pervader of the universe! The Lord of the Universe of which you are the embodiment! You are the soul, the source and the controller of all things.

5.* Your honourable self is that Brahmaṇa which is the Reality and pure consciousness—the Brahmaṇa wherefrom proceed the beginning (the emergence), the end (the destruction), the middle (the sustenance) of this universe, but who, due to his being unchangeable is not affected by these changes; who constitutes this, the external thing (or the object to be enjoyed) as well as ‘I’, the other (the enjoyer of that object).

6. Meditative sages desirous of (attaining) the final beatitude do not seek any other blessings. They renounce attachment to both (this and the other world) and adore your lotus-feet.

7. You are that perfect Brahmaṇa, immortal, attribute-

---

1. Jagan maya—Whose body is constituted of the sentients and non-sentients in the universe—VR.
2. hetu—The efficient cause and not extraneous ones like adṛṣṭa—VJ.
   * Deleted by VJ.
    Acc. to VR. Brahmaṇa being the material cause is not different from everything else.
less and hence untouched by misery; absolutely and essentially blissful but not subject to modifications. Though one without a second, you are distinct from everything else. You are the cause of the origin, maintenance and dissolution of the universe, and the controller of all jivas. Though sought after by them, you expect nothing from them.

8. You alone are one, both gross and subtle, the cause and the effect. Just as there is no difference in the sub-effect called gold whether moulded (into an ornament) or (kept) unmodified (in its original form) it is through ignorance that difference is superimposed on you, by people. The attribution of difference is due to guṇas or modifications, and you are absolutely free from them.

9.* Some (viz. the followers of the Vedānta) regard you to be the Brahman; while others (i.e. Mīmāṃsakas) consider you to be Dharma. Some (i.e. Sāṁkhya) think you to be the Supreme Controller transcendental to both Praṇāta and Puruṣa. Others (the followers of the Pāṇcarātra school) regard you as one endowed with nine powers, while some others (followers of Yoga) know you to be the Supreme Person (Mahā-puruṣa), (while) you are changeless and self-dependent absolute.

10. Neither I nor god Brahmā (whose duration of life is of two parārthā years), nor sages of whom Marici is the chief, though created from the Sattva quality, can comprehend the (real nature of the) universe created by you (much less your real nature). Oh Lord, how can demons and human beings and others whose minds are deluded by Māyā and who

---

1. VR. regards this view as that of Vaiśeṣikas who, through ignorance, believe that this universe exists independent of Brahman.

2. VJ. takes vihata as a v.l. for vihita and states 'inasmuch as difference is overlaid on you through ignorance, it is ipso facto destroyed i.e. null and void'.

* VJ thinks that the theories about God mentioned here are held by the followers of Vedānta and of Smṛtis, Puruṣas, Paṇcarātra and by Ekāntins who regard God as Mahā-puruṣa who is changeless and absolute.

2. ŚR. enumerates the powers of the Lord as follows:

Vimalā, ut-karṣiṇī, Jhāna, Kriyā, Yoga, Prahlā, Satyā, Iśāna, Anugrahā are of inauspicious rajasic and tamasic origins, or whose behaviour is wicked due to the influence of rajas and tamas, can understand (You or Your creation comprehensively).

11. You are essentially knowledge itself. As such you know everything—(such as) all of your own work, the creation, continuance and destruction of the universe, the activities of beings, their bondage and emancipation from the mundane existence. Just as, Vāyu (the air) enters everything mobile and immobile as well as the sky, you, being the soul of everything and the very knowledge itself, pervade everything.

12. Your incarnations, while indulging in sportive activities with guṇas, have been witnessed by me. As such, I desire to behold that form of a young damsel assumed by you.

13. As we have a great curiosity, we have eagerly come to see that (female) form whereby Daityas were fascinated and gods were enabled to drink nectar.

Śrī Śuka said:

14. Being thus entreated by god Śiva, the wielder of the trident, Lord Viṣṇu gave out a hearty laugh, and replied in words pregnant with deep meaning.

The Lord replied:

15. When the jar of nectar passed (into the possession of the Daityas), the female form was assumed by me for exciting the curiosity of Daityas (and thus beguiling them) with a view to accomplish the interests of gods.

16. Oh! The best of gods! As you are curious to see it, I shall presently reveal to you that form which excites amorous passions and which is highly appreciated by passionate persons.

Śrī Śuka said:

17. While speaking thus, the venerable Lord immediately vanished at that very spot, while god Śiva, the Source of the Universe, along with his spouse Umā, waited there wistfully casting his glances in all directions.

18. Thereupon in a garden among trees blossoming with variegated flowers and reddish foliage, he saw a lovely

1. अभाद्रम राजसम् का तमसम् का वृत्तम् उपस्तिर येति ते, श्र.
damsel with a girdle round her waist clothed with a brilliant silken raiment, engaged in playing with a ball.

19. At every step she appeared as if getting broken in her waist, by the heavy weight of her big breasts, shaken by her movements of bending and rising along with the movements of the bounding ball, as well as with the weight of her precious solid pearl necklaces, and was taking her foliage-like tender feet here and there (from place to place).

20. Due to the quick (impredictable) movements of the ball in different directions, the pupils of her longish unsteady eyes appeared agitated. Her countenance appeared all the more beautiful with her cheeks shining with the resplendent pair of ear-rings and with her dark glossy tresses.

21. With her beautiful left hand she was tightening her loosened silken raiment and her dishevelling braids of hair and was hitting the ball with the other hand, she appeared as if enchanting the world with her own deluding powers.

22. Beholding her playing with the ball, the god lost his balance of mind by her side glances, accompanied with a covert smile caused by some slight bashfulness, while sporting with the ball. His mind became agitated by the exchange of mutual gazing of the woman. He became oblivious of himself, of his consort Umā and of his own attendants.

23. When the ball slipped from her hand and went to a long distance and she ran after it while the wind blew away her fine silken garment along with the girdle. And indeed (even) god Śiva stood gazing.

24. Beholding that exquisitely charming damsel with such winsome side glances and enchanting the heart, god Śiva fixed his heart on her indeed, when she showed to be enamoured of him through her ogling.

25. Being deprived of his wisdom, sense of decency and discernment, by her, and overcome with erotic passions evoked by her, he lost his sense of shame and approached her even while (his divine consort) Pārvatī stood gazing.

26. Seeing him approaching, she, being stripped of clothes, became extremely abashed. She concealed herself behind the tree laughing but did not linger (anywhere).

27. The divine Śiva whose senses (control of mind) were robbed away¹ (by the damsel) and was overpowered by passions, pursued her as the leader of elephant would follow a she-elephant.

28. Running after her with great speed, and seizing her by the locks of her hair, he dragged her near him and hugged her in his arms, despite her unwillingness.

29. Being closely embraced by god Śiva, like unto a she-elephant by an elephant, she wriggled to and fro (within his arms) and got her hair dishevelled.

30. Having extricated herself from the arms of the great god, she ran away fast, despite her big hips, as she was the Māyā (deluding potency) created by the Lord, Oh dear king.

31. Being completely overwhelmed with passion, like that by his enemy, the above-described Rudra followed the footsteps of the damsel, created by Lord Viṣṇu of miraculous exploits.

32. While running after her, the semen of Śiva of unfailing procreative capacity, went on escaping like that of a big bull-leader of a herd pursuing a fecundable cow or as that of a rutting leader-elephant running after a fertilizable she-elephant.

33. Oh ruler of the earth! The various places on earth where the seed of that great-souled god fell, became the areas of silver and gold ores.

34.* Thus in the course of his pursuit (of the damsel), god Śiva was found (pursuing her) on the banks of the rivers and lakes on the mountains, in forests and gardens and wherever sages lived.

35. When his semen was completely escaped, he realized that he had been befooled by the Māyā of God Viṣṇu and he recovered himself completely from that delusion, Oh great king.

36. They say that god Śiva who thus fully realized the greatness of Lord Viṣṇu, his own soul, and the soul of the

¹. V.J.'s v.l. pramathitendriyah—whose senses were extremely provoked.
* GS. remarks that hereby Lord Viṣṇu demonstrated to the sages how even god Śiva had fallen from his yogic status, and thus indirectly emphasized that they should keep themselves aloof from women.
Universe, did not regard it (his being deluded) as in any way wonderful in the case of the Lord of incomprehensible prowess.

37. Perceiving that Śiva is unaffected by remorse and the sense of shame, Lord Viṣṇu (the slayer of demon Madhu) was highly pleased, and assuming his male form, he addressed him thus.

The Lord said:

38. I am glad that even though you have been deluded by my (irresistible) Māyā (deluding potency) in the form of a damsel, Oh dear one! you, of your own accord, have recovered your normal state of passionlessness or ego-lessness born of devotion (which is impossible in the case of any other god. Hence I address you as) the greatest god.

39. What man, with the exception of you, whence once caught in the snare of delusion, can overcome My Māyā which brings forth various objects (of enjoyment) and becomes extremely difficult to get over, by persons lacking in self-control.

40. This Māyā consisting of attributes (viz. Sattva, rajas and tamas) functions under my control (who am the Time-spirit,) for the purpose (of creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe), by means of the parts (such as rajas, sattva and tamas). She shall not henceforth overpower you.

Śrī Śuka said:

41. In this way, he (god Śiva) who was honoured by an embrace by Lord Viṣṇu bearing the Śrīvatsa mark on the bosom, took his leave of him, (respectfully) circumambulated him and returned to his own abode along with his retinue.

42. Later on, while being eulogized by great sages, the glorious god Śiva (the source of the Universe) lovingly spoke to his spouse Pārvatī about the Māyā which was a part of the Soul (of the Universe, viz.) Lord Viṣṇu, Oh scion of Bharata.

43. "Have you observed the deluding potency of the born Supreme Person, the transcendental Deity whereby
I, prominent one of his digits (rays), became helpless and succumbed to delusion? What to speak of others who are not the masters of their own selves?

44. He is that same Eternal Ancient Person, unaffected by Time, and incomprehensible to the Vedas,—The Person about whom you enquired of me at the end of my deep yogic meditation which lasted one thousand years.”

Śrī Śuka said:

45. Oh Child! In this way has been related to you the exploit of Lord Viṣṇu, the wielder of Śāṅgā bow by whom the great mount (Mandara) was supported on his back while the ocean was being churned (for getting the nectar).

46. Never and in no way shall fail the exertions of a person who constantly chants or listens to the account of this (glorious deed of Hari), or the chanting of the glorious attributes of the Lord of excellent renown relieves one of all the troubles of saṁsāra.

47. I bow unto the feet of the Lord who though beyond the reach of the evil ones, is accessible through devotion; who, deluding the enemies of gods by assuming the disguise of a young damsel, made the foremost of gods who resorted to him to drink the nectar churned out of the (milky) sea, and who fulfils all the desires of those who approach him (for asylum).

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Description of the Future Manvantaras

Śrī Śuka resumed:

1. The present, seventh Manu is known as Śrāddhadēva. He is the son of Vivasvān. Now hear from me the names of his sons.

2. They are Ikṣvāku, Nabhaga, Dhrṣṭa, Śaryāti, Nāriṣyanta, Nābhāga and the seventh is called Diṣṭa.

3. Kāruṣa, Paruṣa and the tenth is known as Vasumān—these are the ten sons of Vaivasvata Manu, Oh tormentor of the enemies.
4. The (twelve) Ādityas, the (eight) Vasus, the (eleven) Rudras, the (ten) Viśvedevas, the (forty-nine) Maruts (wind-god), two Aśvinī-kumāras, the (three) Rbhus are (the seven grades of) gods and their Indra (ruling god) is Purandara, Oh King.

5. Kaśyapa, Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Viśvāmitra, Gautama, Jamadagni and Bharadvāja—These seven are regarded as the seven (principal) sages.

6. Even in this Manvantara, there was the incarnation of the Lord, born of Kaśyapa and Aditi. Lord Viṣṇu, assuming the form of a dwarf, was born as the youngest son of Aditi.

7. The (first) seven Manvantaras have been described to you briefly by me. Now I shall narrate to you the future ones, associated with the powers (incarnations) of Viṣṇu.

8. Vivasvān had two wives, both being the daughters of Viśvakarman. They were Sandhyā and Chāyā about whom I have spoken to you, Oh king of kings.¹

9. Some say that he had a third wife called Vaḍavā.² Out of the three wives, the children of Saṁjñā were three—Yama, Yamī and Śrāddhadeva. Now listen to the names of Chāyā’s children—

10. Sāvarṇi, the daughter Tapatī who became the wife of Saṁvaraṇa and the third son Śanaiscara (the presiding deity of the planet Saturn). The two Aśvinikumāras were the sons of Vaḍavā:

11. When the eighth Manvantara will set in, Sāvarṇi will be the Manu. Nirmoka, Virajaska and others are the sons of Sāvarṇi, Oh King.

12. Then (in the 8th Manvantara), Sutapas, Virajas and Amṛta-prabhas are going to be the gods. Their ruling god (Indra) will be Bali, the son of Virocana.

13. Having donated the whole of this earth to Viṣṇu who begged for only three paces of land (in this Manvantara), he will relinquish his eminent position of Indra (attained by

¹. Vida Supra 6.6. 40-41.
². But according to the Bh. P. Supra 6.6.40 Saṁjñā assumed the form of Veḍavā and gave birth to Aśvinī kumāras. him through Viṣṇu’s grace in the next Manvantara), and will attain to final beatitude.

14. That same Bali who was bound down by the Lord who, when pleased, installed him in the Nether world Sutala which is superior to the Svarga in splendour—still rules there like the king of the heavenly regions.

15-16. Gālava, the glorious (Paraśu-) Rāma, Aśvatthāman, the son of Droṇa, Kṛpa, Rṣyaśṛṅga and our father the venerable Bādarāyaṇa—these will be the seven sages. Even now they continue to occupy their own hermitages through their pogaic powers.

17. The Lord will incarnate with the name Sārvabhauma, from Devaguhya and Sarasvati (as his parents). The powerful Lord will wrest Indrahood from Purandara and confer it on Bali.

18. The ninth Manu will be Dakśa-Sāvarṇi who will be born of Varuṇa. Bhūtaketu, Dīptiketu and others1 will be his sons, Oh King.

19. Pāras and Marīcigarbhas and others (viz. Sudharmanas)2 will be (the three categories of) gods then. It is traditionally reported that Adbhuta will be the Indra. Then there will be the seven sages of whom Dyuṭimat3 is prominent.

20. A ray of the Lord will incarnate under the name Rṣabha from Āyuṣmat and Ambudhārā (as his father and mother). Adbhuta, the Indra, will enjoy the three worlds conquered (for him) by Rṣabha.

21. The tenth Manu will be Brahma-sāvarṇi, the great son of Upāśloka. His sons are Bhūriṣena and others while Havismat and others will be prominent Brāhmaṇa (sages).

22. Havismān, Sukṛti, Satya, Jaya, Mūrti will be (some of) the Brāhmaṇa (sages) then. Suvāsana and Viruddha are the gods, and Śambhu is the Lord of gods.

1. VP. 3.2.22 adds Dhṛtaketu, Nirāmaya, Paṇca-hasta and Pṛthuśrava to this list.
2. VP. 3.2.20-21 adds this third category and each category will consist of 12 gods.
3. The VP. 3.2.22 gives the complete list as follows:
   Dyuṭimat, Savana, Bhavya, Vasu, Medhātithi, Jyotirmān and Satya.
23. The Lord, with a part of his Self, will be born in the house of Viṣvasṛj (Prajāpati) through Viṣuści, and be known as Viśvakṣena. He will make friends (render help to Śambhu (the then Indra).

24. The self-controlled Dharma-sāvarṇi will be the eleventh Manu who will have ten sons as Satyadharma and others.

25. The (categories of) gods will be Vihaṅgamas, Kāmagamas and Nirvāṇarucis. Their ruler Indra will be Vaidhṛta, while Aruṇa and others will be the (seven) sages.

26. The ray (part) of Hari known as Dharmasetu, the son of Āryaka through Vaidhṛta, will sustain and protect the three worlds.

27. Oh King, the twelfth Manu will be Rudra-sāvarṇi and his sons will be Devavān, Upadeva, Devasreṣṭha and others.

28. Then Rādhāman will be the Indra and the (groups of) gods will be Harita and others. And the (seven) sages will be Tapo-mūrti, Tapasvin, Āgnidhraka and others.

29. A part of Hari, by name Svadhāman, the mighty son of Satya-sahas and Sūṇṛtá will protect this period of Manu.

30. The thirteenth Manu will be the self-controlled Devasāvarṇi and the sons of Devasāvarṇi are Citrasena, Vicitra and others.

31. The (classes of) gods will be designated as Sukarma and Sutrāma and Divaspati. Then Nirmoka, Tattvadarśin and others will be the (seven sages).

32. The ray of Lord Hari, the master of yoga, will be

---

1. GS quotes from the Harivaṃsa the following sages implied in ādi: Ḥaviṣmān, Vapuṣmān, Aruṇa, Anagha, Uruḍhi, Niścara and Agnītejas.

2. VP. 3.2.33 enumerates Harita, Rohita, Sumanas, Sukarman and Surāpa as the five groups (gānas) of gods.

3. The list in VP. 3.2.34 includes Tapasvin, Sutapas, Tapomūrti, Taparati, Tapo-dṛṭi, Tapo-dyuti and Tapo-dhana.

4. VP. 3.2.37-39 adds Sudharman as the third class and each class consists of 33 gods.

5. The list in VP (above) differs. It consists of Nirmohga, Tattvadarśin, Niṣprakampya, Nirutsuka, Dhṛtimān, Avyaya and Sutapas.
born as the son of Devahotra through Brhati and will procure the kingdom of three worlds to the Indra, Divaspati.

33. They say that Indra-sāvarṇi will come as the fourteenth Manu, and the sons born of him will be Uru, Gambhirabuddhi and others.

34. The (categories of ) gods will be Pavitra, Cākṣuṣa and others,1 while Śuci will be the Indra. Agnibāhu, Śuci, Śuddha, Māgadha and others will be the (seven sages).2

35. Then Hari will incarnate as the son Satrāyaṇa and Vitānā, and will be called Brhadbhānu. He will continue the course of sacrificial rituals, Oh great King.

36. These fourteen Manu periods relating to the past, present and future have been described to you, Oh king. It is by these (Manu periods) that the Kalpa comprising one thousand yugas, is measured.

37*. A person who narrates or listens to the narration of the story of the fourteen Manus will find Viṣṇu gracious unto him.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Duties of Manus and Their Functionaries

The King (Parikṣit) asked:

1. Be pleased to explain to me, Oh worshipful sage, how and by whom are these Manus and others employed for the execution of what (particular) function during the Manvantaras.

The sage (Śuka) replied:

2. Oh King! Manus, sons of Manus, Sages, Indras,

1. VP. adds Kanistha, Bhrājata and Vācāvṛddha as three categories. (i.e. in all five)—Ibid 3.2.41.
2. VP. adds Agnidhra, Yukta and Jita and completes the list of seven sages.—Ibid 3.2.42.

* A probable interpolation recorded in the Bombay edition (e.g. D.S. Yande's edition of the Bh. P.). gods—all these (five categories of functionaries) are under the control of the Supreme Person.

3. Directed by the aforesaid forms of the Supreme Person such as the incarnation called Yajña and others, Manu and other functionaries carry on the work of the world.

4. At the end of the quartet of yugas (i.e. at the beginning of the new Kīta-yuga), the sages, by dint of their asceticism and penance, saw the corpus of the Vedic texts ‘swallowed up’ by Time, through the help of which the Eternal Law (Religion) becomes known.

5. Then Manus are instructed by Hari in the path of righteousness, characterised by four feet (viz. penance, bodily and mental purity, compassion and truth). Remaining controlled in mind, they propagate the path of righteousness all over the world during their period, Oh King.

6. The protectors of the subjects (viz. the sons of Manu) themselves and through their descendants protect the path of righteousness (dharma)—and the earth—to the end of that Manvantara, while gods along with others who are eligible for sacrificial shares, enjoy their shares in the sacrificial oblations.

7. Enjoying the excellent affluence and fortune of the three worlds conferred upon him (out of grace) by the Supreme Lord, Indra protects the three worlds and sends down at will showers of rain.

8. Assuming in every Yuga, the form of Siddhas (like Sanaka) the sages (like Yājñavalkya) and masters of Yoga (like Datta), Hari teaches the paths of knowledge (Jñāna), action (Karma) and Yoga (respectively).

9. He carried out the work of creation by assuming the form of Prajāpatis (Progenitors of the world like Marīci). He kills robbers etc. by appearing as an independent monarch. And possessing different characteristics, in the form of Time, he destroys all.

10. The Lord is never perceived, though praised highly by the people who are deluded by the Māyā (consisting) of various names and forms. Nor is he realized by various systems of philosophy.

11. The measures of the minor Kalpas (forming one day of Brahmā) which are the subdivisions of the great Kalpa (the lifetime of Brahmā) have been described to you. Those well-versed in ancient lore state that this Kalpa consists of fourteen Manvantaras.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Bali's Conquest of the Svarga (Celestial Region)

The King Parikṣit said:

1. For what purpose did Lord Hari, though himself the Supreme Ruler, beg like a miserable fellow, three paces of land from Bali? Why did he bind him down even though he got his object sought for?

2. This we desire to know thoroughly as it is highly surprising to us that the Lord of sacrifices, (though) Perfect (in all respects within himself), begged like a destitute and (subsequently) bound down (with fetters) the innocent (donor).

Sri Śuka said:

3. Being deprived of his splendour, wealth as well as his life through being defeated by Indra in a battle, Bali was revived by Śukra and other members of the Bhṛgu clan, Oh king. The noble-minded Bali, with utmost faith, resorted to the Bhṛgus as a disciple, offering them whatever they desired.

4. The Brāhmaṇas of the Bhṛgu clan, endowed as they were with extra-ordinary powers and were pleased with him, consecrated him with the great sacred ablution (called aindra—Pertaining to Indra) with due formalities, (as prescribed in the Bhārata Brāhmaṇa), and desirous as he was of conquering the celestial region, made him perform the Viśvajit sacrifice.¹

¹. This order of ‘consecration’ (abhiṣeka) and performance of sacrifice is given by G.S. In the Viśvajit sacrifice the sacrificer has to give all wealth (after separating the share of the eldest son and land).
—Kane's Hist. of Dh. Śāstra II. ii. 1212, Fn. 2644.
5-6. From the sacrificial fire duly worshipped with oblations, there emerged a chariot strengthened with gold plates, horses of the same colour (green) as those of Indra, a banner blazing the emblem of a lion, a celestial bow fastened with plates of gold, a pair of inexhaustible quivers full of arrows, a divine coat of mail. His grandfather (Prahlāda) conferred on him a wreath of never-fading flowers and Śukra (his preceptor), a conch.

7. Thus with all the military equipment procured for him by Brāhmaṇas, and having got the Svastiyayana (auspicious rites) performed through them, Bali circumambulated them respectfully, paid obeisance to them and taking his leave of Prahlāda, bowed down to him.

8-9. Ascending into the celestial chariot conferred upon him by the Bhrgus (Śukra and his clansmen, by performing the sacrifice), the mighty (chariot) warrior Bali, wearing that excellent wreath, put on his armour, armed himself with the bow, the sword and tied up the (inexhaustible) quivers. With his arms radiant with gold armlets and with dazzling ear-rings (of the shape of an alligator) he shone like the fire blazing in its sacrificial place, when he mounted the chariot.

10-11. Accompanied by his retinue and commanders of (other) Daitya legions who were his equals in command, prowess and splendour, and were (as if) drinking the skies and burning the quarters with (their glaring) eyes, and leading the surrounding mighty Daitya army, he marched against the highly prosperous capital of Indra, shaking as it were the heaven and the earth (by its thumping march).

12. The city appeared beautiful with its splendid gardens and parks like Nandana and others, resonant with its warbling pairs of birds and humming intoxicated black-bees.

13. (It looked charming) with the celestial trees whose branches were heavily laden with tender foliage, fruits and blossoms of flowers, with lotus-ponds thereof, full of aquatic birds like swans, cranes, ruddy geese (Cakrāhva), and ducks and young celestials, damsels engaged in watersports with gods therein.

14. It was girt on all sides by the heavenly Gaṅgā (sandākini) as its moat. It was surrounded with fortifications of gold, shining like fire and was provided with high towers.

15. Constructed by Viśvakarmā, the entrance and doors of the houses were fitted with panels of gold while the city-gates were of crystals and all the roads were well laid down.

16. It appeared beautiful with its assembly halls, quadrangles and streets; it was full of trillions of mansions (or heavenly cars); the quadrangles were paved with precious stones and platforms were studded with diamonds and corals.

17. There young damsel's of eternal youth and unfading beauty (ever) appearing sixteen years of age, wearing purest raiment, appeared resplendent like fires ablaze with flames.

18. Breezes wafting the fragrance of wreathes of fresh flowers dropped down from the braids of hair of the heavenly damsels blow through its streets.

19. The beloveds of gods (Heavenly nymphs) pace through the streets, covered with whitish fragrant fumes of the aguru (a kind of sandal-wood) that escape through the gold-windows (of houses).

20. It was covered with pearl-canopies and flag-staffs studded with precious stones, and balconies decorated all around with bunting. It was resonant with notes of peacocks, pigeons, hummings of black-bees and appeared gay and auspicious by the sweet songs of celestial damsels.

21. It was pleasing to the mind with its sounds of mrdanga, conchs, drums and kettle-drums, as also with the sweet rhythmic sound of lutes, murajas, ṭṭṭis (kind of musical instruments) and flutes regulated to the beat of the cymbals, with dances accompanied with orchestral music and songs of demigods (such as Gandharvas, Kinnaras) and had surpassed with its effulgence, the presiding deity of lustre.¹

22. The impious, wicked, the cruel to other beings, the rogues, the proud, the lustful and the avaricious have no access to it; only those who are free from these defects can reach it.

23. (Bali) the commander-in-chief of that army, laid siege to the capital of gods with his forces and blew his tremendously sounding conch conferred on him by his preceptor, striking terror in the hearts of Indra’s women.

¹._v.l. The presiding deities of the sun and other planets.

24. Comprehending the full implications of the supreme efforts of Bali, Indra, accompanied by all the legions of gods (approached) his preceptor (Brhaspati) and spoke to him as follows:

25. “Worshipful Sir! Tremendous are the (military) preparations of Bali, our old arch-enemy. Me-thinks, they are (now) irresistible. By what energy has he become so overwhelmingly powerful?

26. None is able by any means whatever to approach him or withstand him. He is swallowing the world with his mouth, licking (as it were) the ten quarters, and burning them down by his fiery eyes. He has emerged against us like the fire of dissolution consuming the universe.

27. Be pleased to disclose to me the cause of the irresistibleness of my foe, whereby he derived this energy, mental courage and physical power and prowess and was enabled to make such tremendous efforts.

The Preceptor (Brhaspati) Explained:

28. “I know, Oh Indra, the cause of this growth of power of your enemy. It is due to the infusion of spiritual energy in their disciple by those experts in Vedic lore, the Bhrgus (in exchange of the surrender of all his property to them).

29. With the exception of the Almighty Ruler Hari neither your compeer nor you can stand before him (for confrontation) like human beings before the god of death.

30. Therefore, all of you should now quit the celestial region and go in hiding, biding your favourable time which would bring in the decline of your enemy.

31. With the spiritual power of the Brähmanaśas, he is getting stronger still and is now of irresistible prowess. (In due course) by insulting those very Brähmanaśas, he will meet destruction along with his kith and kin.”

32. Having thus received a wise counsel after mature deliberation from their preceptor who viewed (the reality of the situation in the proper perspective) gods, being capable of assuming any form they like, vacated the celestial region.
33. When the gods disappeared, Bali, the son of Virocana established himself in the capital of gods and brought under control all the three worlds.

34. Bhrгus who were affectionate to their disciple who had (now) conquered the universe, and who was devoted to them, made him perform one hundred horse sacrifices (to stabilise his Indra-hood).

35. By virtue of his greatness in the performance of one hundred horse-sacrifices he diffused his reputation, already known all over the three worlds, in all quarters and shone like the moon, the lord of stars.

36. Considering himself as one who had accomplished all his desires, the noble-minded Bali enjoyed the highly prosperous royal fortune blessed upon him by Brāhmaṇas.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Instruction in the observance of Payavrata to Aditi

Śrī Śuka said:

1. When her sons thus disappeared and the celestial regions were arrogated to themselves by Daityas (Diti's son), Aditi, the mother of gods, was tormented like a helpless person.

2. Once, rising from his spiritual meditation of a long duration, the worshipful sage Kāśyapa (Aditi's husband) visited her hermitage which was cheerless and gloomy (devoid of joyful atmosphere).

3. Oh best of Kurus! Received (by his wife) with due formalities and occupying the seat (offered by her), he spoke thus to his wife, whose countenance was mournful.

4. Oh auspicious lady! I trust nothing inauspicious has befallen1 the Brāhmaṇas in the world, of late. I believe nothing calamitous has happened to Dharma. I hope that

1. For āgatam, VR reads gavām: 'in the case of the cows as well'.
misfortune has not overtaken the people who are subject to the whims of death. ¹

5. Or was there any obstruction in carrying out righteous duties with respect to Dharma, Artha and Kāma in your household where people who do not follow the practice of yoga, get the fruits thereof (by disinterested performance of prescribed house-hold duties), Oh mistress of the household.

6. I believe guests, having visited your house, have not gone back, at any time, without being duly received with courtesies like going forth to welcome them, as you might have been engaged in household duties.

7. If new-comers visiting a house go away from it without being honoured with the offer of water at least, such houses are certainly no better than the dens of big jackals.

8. Have not the sacred fires been offered oblations at the proper time on any day by you, as your mind must have been stricken with anxiety due to my departure, Oh fair lady!

9. The Brāhmaṇa and the (sacrificial) fire by worshipping whom a householder attains to regions (like svarga) yielding all the desired objects, are verily the mouth of Lord Viṣṇu, the soul of all gods.

10. Oh high-minded lady! Are all your sons doing well and happy? I perceive through your outward expressions (like pale-facedness) that your heart is not at ease.

Aditi replied:

11. Oh Brahman! It is all well with the twice-born persons (like Brāhmaṇas), cows; so is the case with righteousness and with this person (me). Oh Lord of the house! This house (of yours) is the most excellent source of the three objectives of human life (viz. dharma, artha and kāma).

12. It is due to my devoted contemplation about your worshipful self that nothing is lacking and the sacrificial fires, guests, servants and mendicants desirous of getting something, are properly attended to.

13. Oh worshipful lord! What desire cherished in my heart can remain unfulfilled when you, the lord of creation and the guardian of the well-being of my children in this way, advise me on religious matters.

¹. VJ. takes chandāsvartinaḥ as an adj. qualifying mṛtyu implying through the god of death who acts according to whim.

14. Oh son of Marici! All these beings imbrued predominantly with sattva, rajas and tamas severally are born of your mind or body. (It is quite natural that) you are therefore equally attached to them all. But even the Supreme Lord (who creates the whole of the universe has special attachment to his devotees.

15. Oh Lord! Be pleased to think of the well-being of mine who have been serving you, Oh excellent observer of vows! We (I and my sons) have been deprived of our wealth and have been ousted from our abodes by the sons of my rival (Diti). Kindly protect us, Oh Lord!

16. Being deprived of my power, splendour, glory and place of residence by powerful enemies, I have been exiled and have consequently immersed in a sea of calamities.

17. Oh foremost guardian of our welfare! Be pleased to think out such effective device by your intellect as will enable my sons to recover them all.

_Srī Sūka said:

18. Kāśyapa who was thus entreated by Aditi, spoke to her as if with a bit of smile: “Oh how mighty is the power of Lord Viṣṇu’s delusive potency (māyā)! The whole world is bound down with affection.

19. There is absolutely no relation between the material body which is different from the soul and the soul who transcends Prakṛti. Whose and who are the husband, sons and other relatives? Delusion alone is the cause of this attachment.

20. Worship therefore the Supreme Person, the glorious Lord Janārdana, the all-pervading God who resides in the heart of all beings, and is the Father and Preceptor of the Universe.

21. Lord Hari is merciful unto the afflicted and shall grant all your desires (even if there may be some deficiencies in devotion). Unfailingly fruitful is the devotion unto the Lord (and not to any other god). This is my conviction (about the efficacy of devotion).

_Aditi requested:

22. By what procedure I should worship the Protector of the world so that he, of effective mental resolve, may grant me my desired object, Oh Brahman!

23. Be pleased to instruct me, oh best of Brāhmaṇas, in that method of worshipping the Lord whereby He will be immediately pleased with me who am sunk in despondency along with my children.

_Katyāpa said:

24. The worshipful Lotus-born god Brahmā was accosted for this by me when desirous of progeny. As narrated by him, I shall now explain to you the sacred vow that leads to the propitiation of Lord Viṣṇu (Keśava.)

25. Subsisting purely on milk during the first twelve days of the bright half of the month of Phālguna, one should worship the Lotus-eyed Lord Viṣṇu with the utmost devotion.

26. On the day preceding the new moon (when the moon rises with a scarcely visible crescent) one should besmear one's body with earth, turned over by the wild-boar, if available and take bath. While standing in the middle of the current, he should recite the following mantra:

27. "Oh goddess! You were lifted up from Rasātala (the nether-most region) by the Lord (assuming the form of) the Primitive Boar, with a view to secure a place (for living beings). I respectfully bow to you. Be pleased to absolve me of all my sins!"

28. After completing one's daily routine of religious duties, with a serene and concentrated mind, one should worship God either in an image, or on a consecrated altar or in the sun, water, fire or even in the preceptor. (For invoking the deity, the following nine Mantras are to be recited).

29. Obeisance to you the glorious Lord, the Supreme Person, the greatest of the great, the abode of all created beings, (and hence called) the all-pervading Viṣṇudeva the witness to all and everything).
30. Salutations to the unmanifest\(^1\) and the subtle, who is both Prakṛti (Primordial matter) and Puruṣa (the spirit)—pervading them as their antar-yāmin (the indwelling Principle), who comprehends twenty-four Principles\(^8\) and is the founder of the Sāṁkhya system.\(^6\)

31*. Hail to you who have two heads, three feet, four horns; who confer fruit of sacrifices etc., the possessor of seven hands, who are himself the sacrifice and the soul of the three Vedas (or are described in three Vedas).

32. I bow to you who are Śiva (all auspiciousness) and Rudra. Hail to you the (wielder) of Sakti (Power).

---

2. These principles are subsidiary causes and as his attributes they do not exist separately. VC. thinks that the 24 gunas are the categories of Vaiṣeṣikas and may mean Sāṁkhya-tattvas also.
3. VJ. reads: gunasamsthāna-hetave.
* (i). SR compares this verse with the famous description of the Fire-god Cautūrī Śrqā trayo asya pādā etc. in the RV 4.58.3 and quotes Yāska's explanation as follows:
   Two heads—the rites called prāyanīya & Udayanīya.
   The three feet—three savanas or pressing out of the soma juice which is to be done in the morning, at midday and in the evening.
   Four horns—the four Vedas.
   Seven arms—the seven Vedic metres (chandas) viz. Gāyatrī, Triṣṭubh, Anuṣṭubh, Brhati, Paṇkti, Jagatī and Uṣṇik.
(ii) VJ. has accepted the above explanation of the metaphorical description but the 2nd line: 'Salutation to Lord Viṣṇu who is the antaryāmin (ātmane) of the performers of Soma sacrifice as enjoined in the Vedas (Trayī Viṣyā).
(iii) VR. gives a totally different interpretation.
   The whole universe of name and form is an attribute of the Lord. He is metaphorically described as a bull (Viṣabha) with four horns viz., names (nouns), verbs, indeclinables and prefixes (nāma-ākhyāta-nipāta-upasargāḥ). The three feet are three divisions of time: past, present and future; the two heads are: the essential attribute (pravṛtti-nimitta) and that in which the attribute lies (taddārayuh). The seven hands are the seven cases of declension (of nouns etc.). The Lord is known through Vedas. Hence he is the soul of the Vedas. He is Viṣṇu or sacrifice (Tajāno vai Viṣṇuḥ) through whom men can extend the performance of sacrifice (tanthava).
 VR regards Viṣṇu as the antaryāmin of Rudra (and other gods) as he is the real creator, protector and destroyer of the world.
Salutation to you the master of all lokes or knowledge and the Protector of all created beings.

33. Obeisance to Hiranyakartha (god Brahma), Prāṇa
(i.e. sūtrātman, the soul of the subtle cosmic body), the soul of the universe. Hail to you, the embodiment of the highest powers acquired by yoga and the source of yoga (yogic lore).

34. Salutations to you the First (Eternal) God. I bow to you who are the witness (to everything). Hail to you the omniscient sage Narayana and to Nara who are the manifestations of Hari.

35. Bow to you whose person is dark like emerald in complexion and who have been the master of the goddess Śrī.
Salutation to you, Oh Kṛṣava, the wearer of yellow garment.

36. You are the conferer of all boons to people. Hence you are most sought for, Oh most prominent bestower of blessings. It is hence that wise men adore the dust of your feet for the final beatitude.

37. May that glorious Lord be gracious to me—the Lord who is worshipped by gods and Laks̄mī, as if they desired to have the fragrance of His Lotus-like feet.

38. Having reverentially established the presence of Viṣṇu, the Lord of Senses, before one’s self, by invoking him with these mantras, one should with faith, worship him, by offering water for washing the feet (pāda), for ācamana (sipping and rinsing the mouth) and other formalities of reception.

39. One should worship the Lord with fragrant sandal paste, flowers and other articles of worship and should perform his sacred ablution (abhiseka) with milk. He should then adore him by beautifying his person with clothes, sacred thread, ornaments and with water for again washing his feet and sipping water as ācamana, burning fragrant incense etc. before him, reciting all the while the twelve-syllabled mantra : OM NAMO BHAGAVATE VĀSUDEVĀYA.

40. If one can afford it (lit. If there is sufficient wealth), one should offer fragrant, white rice cooked

1. Sarva-vidyādhipataye—The preceptor of the knowledge which helps to achieve the four puruṣārthas—GD.
in milk, mixed with ghee and raw sugar, as an offering (nāivedya) to him, and should pour it as oblations into the sacred fire chanting the root mantra (viz. the above-mentioned mantra of twelve syllables) ¹.

41. One may give this offering (of boiled rice) to God to a devotee (of the Lord) or should eat it oneself. Having offered water as ṛcamana one should offer betel-leaves (with all the components like areca-nut powder, cardamom seeds, cloves etc.) finally.

42. One should chant this mantra (within one’s mind)
one hundred and eight times, and praise God with panygerics.
Circumambulating him by the right side, one should prostrate one’s self before him like a rod, with delight.

43. Reverentially placing on one’s own head the remnants (flowers etc.) of the worship, one should pray the Deity to retire. One should then feed at least a couple of Brāhmaṇas with rice cooked in milk (and mixed with gur etc.).

44-45. Obtaining the assent of the Brāhmaṇas who are duly honoured (by giving betel-leaves, gift of money etc.), one should partake of the remaining food in company of his dear ones. On the night of the first day, one should observe strict continence. And on the next morning, he should take bath.
Keeping himself undefiled according to the procedure laid down, and with composed and concentrated mind, he should perform the ablution of the deity with milk, and worship him (and as per details of worship given above) and thus observe the vow every day), till the period of the observance is completed.

46. Subsisting on milk-food and with full faith and devotion in the worship of Viṣṇu, one should continue to observe this vow. He should offer oblations to the sacred fire as before, and give food to the Brāhmaṇas as well.

¹. With due respect to all these commentators, the translator feels that due to the obvious influence of the Pāñcarātra on these verses, the mila-mantra must be OṂ NAMO NĀRĀYĀNĀYA and NOT OṂ NAMO Bhagavatō Vālmiki, though consistency in Mantras is essential.
47. In this way, observing the vow of ‘subsistence on milk’ from day to day, he should, for a period of twelve days, perform the propitiation of Lord Hari, offering oblations to the sacred fire, worship of the image and gratification of Brāhmaṇas (with food, gift of money etc.).

48. Beginning from the first day (of the bright half of the month of Phālguna) to the thirteenth, he should observe strict continence, sleep on bare ground and take bath three times a day (viz. in the morning, at midday and in the evening).

49. He should avoid speaking the untruth and on unholy topics (as well as with evil persons). He should refrain from pleasures of high or low order; he should abstain from injury to any being, and be absolutely devoted to Vāsudeva only.

50. On the thirtieth day, he should arrange for the ablation of Lord Viṣṇu with five substances (viz. milk, curds, ghee, honey and sugar which are collectively known as pātikae-mṛta) according to the procedure laid down in the Śāstras, and under the guidance of the experts in them.

51-52. Without any mean miserliness in expending money, he should perform the worship of Viṣṇu on a grand scale. For the sake of Viṣṇu who pervaded all light, he should cook rice in milk (mixed with ghee etc.) and with fully concentrated and serene mind he should offer oblations to the sacred fire, and through it propitiate the Supreme Man. He should also offer food of excellent quality (containing articles of six types of tastes and free from any impurity or non-vegetarian food) which may be enjoyable and gratifying to the Supreme Person.

53. He should then gratify the learned preceptor (who conducted the worship) as well as those who carried out the sacrificial part, with articles of dress, ornaments and cows. He should note that to be also the propitiation of Lord Hari.

54. Oh lady with charming smiles! One should then cater to them dainty food of high quality as also to other Brāhmaṇas who might have come there, according to one’s (financial) capacity.

55. One should then give daksīṇā (gift for performing religious rites) according to merits, to the preceptor as well as to other Brāhmaṇas. One should also gratify with food etc. all those who have assembled there, including caṇḍālas.

56. Having gratified all indigent, blind, pitiable persons with food and understanding that that gratification is the real propitiation of Viṣṇu, one should lastly enjoy the food along with one’s relatives.

57. Every day the worship of the Lord should be conducted with dancing, instrumental and vocal music, recitation of glorifying hymns and benedictory sayings and narration of the holy episodes of the Lord.

58. This is called Payōrata, the most excellent vow for propitiating the Supreme Person. What has been explained to me by god Brahmā has been communicated to you.

59. Oh most fortunate lady! By properly and correctly observing this vow, and with your heart full of purity and devotion, and mind under control, worship Lord Keśava.

60. This is traditionally regarded as the perfect (or the essence of all kinds of) sacrifice and the perfect vow (the essence of all vows). This is the essence of penance and donations which leads to the gratification of the Lord, Oh fair lady!

61. That by which god Viṣṇu, the Supra-Sensuous deity, is propitiated are the real Niyamas (restraints of the mind), and the excellent yamas (controls of bodily discipline), the real penance, gifts, vow and sacrifice.

62. Therefore, Oh fair lady, with utmost self-discipline and devotion, you observe this vow, being pleased wherewith the Lord shall soon confer your cherished boons on you.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

The Manifestation of the Lord as Vāmana

Sri Śuka said:

1. Aditi who was thus instructed by her husband Katyānā diligently observed this (payōrata) vow consecutively for twelve days, Oh king!
2. Having controlled the wild horses of her sense-organs through (the power of) her mind and with her reasoning power as the charioteer, she meditated with undivided mind and intellect upon the Supreme Person, the Controller, of the universe.

3. Concentrating her mind with her one-pointed reason on the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the soul of all beings, Aditi verily observed the Pañcarāta.

4. (On completion of the observance) Oh child Parikṣit, the Almighty Lord, the Eternal (First) Person manifested himself before her (in a form) clad in yellow garment with four arms wielding in (three of) them a conch, a discus and a mace.

5. On beholding him suddenly in a visible form, she was overwhelmed with love, and reverentially laid herself prostrate on the ground before him, like a rod.

6. She rose up and with folded palms stood before him to praise him but (being overwhelmed with love she could not do so. With her eyes overflowing with tears of joy, she remained silent. Her hair were standing on their ends all over her person, and her limbs were trembling with ecstatic joy at his sight.

7. Oh Scion of the Kuru race! The goddess Aditi looked at him affectionately as if drinking up that consort of Lākṣī, the Lord of the universe and of the sacrifice, with her eyes, while she praised him slowly in a faltering voice, full of love.

Aditi began:

8. Oh Lord of sacrifices (who confer the fruit of sacrifices upon the performers)! Oh sacrifice incarnate! Oh imperishable Lord, at whose feet holy waters (like the Gaṅga) resort, Oh Lord of hallowed glory, the hearing of whose name is auspicious¹ and whose very appearance relieves the sins and inequities of those who seek refuge in you, You are the protector of the afflicted. Be pleased to secure (our) happiness (to us).

¹ संतोषोद्वारः

The ears (of persons) who are devoted to Śāstras studies and who listen to Śāstras, become auspicious on hearing your Name, Oh Lord.—VJ.

9. I bow down to you, Oh Lord Hari who are very great, immanent in the universe, and yet assume at your free will the guṇas (the modes of prakṛti and other powers of the Māyā) for the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe, and are still self-poised (well established in your grandeur without the least disturbance), and who have completely dispelled the darkness (of ignorance, tāmas or māyā) within yourself, by your eternal, perfect wisdom.

10. The longest life-span (viz. two parārdha years like that of god Brahmā), body (possessing power, beauty etc.) as desired, unparalleled fortune, dominance in the celestial regions, the earth and the nether world, all the mystic powers attained by yoga, the three principal objects in human life (viz. dharma, artha and Kāma), and even the absolute (highest) knowledge—all these are attained from you by men, if you are pleased. What to speak of an insignificant blessing like victory over a rival (co-wife and her progeny) ?

Śrī Śuka said :

11. Oh King ! Thus eulogised by Aditi, the lotus-eyed glorious Lord Viṣṇu, who resides in the heart of all created beings spoke to her as follows : Oh scion of the Bharata race !

The glorious Lord replied :

12. Oh mother of gods ! Known to me is your long cherished desire concerning your sons, who have been robbed of their glory and fortune by their enemies, and have been expelled from their homes.

13. You long to stay with your sons who, after, thoroughly vanquishing the vain-glorious mighty Asura chiefs on the battle field, have recovered their fortune and glory.

14. You desire to behold the wives of the enemies approaching the dead bodies of their husbands and bewailing, when they (enemies of your sons) are killed in battle, by your sons, of whom Indra is the eldest.

15. You wish to see that your sons have retrieved all their glory and fortune and are extremely prosperous, and having re-established themselves in the heavenly regions, are enjoying themselves in sports.

16. Oh goddess! In my opinion those leaders of Asura forces are, for the most part, now invincible; for they are now protected by favourable time and spiritually powerful Brähmaṇas (or spiritually powerful Brähmaṇas are gracious unto them). Application of prowess, (even on my part) will not be conducive to happiness, under these circumstances.

17. In spite of this, Oh noble lady, an expedient (to restore your former glory etc.) must be thought out by me inasmuch as I am gratified by your observance of the (payovrata) vow. My propitiation which results in conferment of the desire motivating it, should not prove futile.

18. By the correct observance of the payovrata vow, I have been properly worshipped and agreeably praised by you, for the protection of your children. Establishing myself in the austere penance (the procreative energy) of Kaśyapa, the Son of Marici (your husband), I shall assume your son-hood by a ray of mine, and shall protect your sons.

19. Conceiving in your mind that I, of such (as is at present) form, am abiding in your husband, attend to your husband, the sinless lord of creation, Kaśyapa (and get conceived).

20. This secret should never be divulged to another person under any circumstances, even though you are interrogated. Everything will turn out well, but this secret of gods must be thoroughly guarded, Oh divine lady.

Śrī Sūka said:

21-22. Having addressed (her) thus, the Lord (immediately) disappeared on that very spot. Being bestowed with an extremely rare boon viz. the birth of Lord Hari through her, Aditi, feeling as if her object had been accomplished, be-took herself to her husband with great devotion. Kaśyapa verily came to perceive that through his meditational yoga.

23. The sage of unfailing insight (knowledge) cognised the penetration of Lord Hari’s ray within him. (Though to him both the devas and asuras, being his sons were equal) he, with his mind serene and concentrated, deposited in Aditi that semen (charged with Hari’s rays and) conserved through a long penance, just as the wind (to which all are equal) places (frictional) fire in the wood.

24. God Brahmā, knowing the presence of that eternal glorious Lord in Aditi’s womb, began to praise him, in esoteric terms.

God Brahmā said:

25. Victory to you, Oh glorious Lord who are widely extolled in the Vedas and are of mighty prowess! My salutation to you, the protector of the Brāhmaṇas (and the Vedas). I bow to you again and again, you, the master of three guṇas.

26. I bow to you who were in the womb of Pṛśni (i.e. Pṛśni’s son) and are revealed in the Vedas. You are the Maker of all, and contain all three worlds in your navel. You transcend the three worlds and still as antaryāmin (in-dwelling-soul) you enter and stay within all living beings and are all-pervading.

27. You who are called the Supreme Person of infinite powers, are the beginning, the end and the middle of the universe. Oh Ruler of the Universe! Being the Time-Spirit you carry away with you everything in the universe like a deep stream of water sweeping away everything that falls into it.

28. Verily, you are competent to create all beings, mobile or immobile as well as even the Lords of creations. Like a boat unto a person about to drown in water, you are the main supporter of gods (residents of the celestial world) who have fallen from the heaven, Oh Lord!

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

The Lord incarnates as Vāmana. Visit to Bali’s sacrifice

Sūrya Sūka said:

1. The Lord whose glorious acts and powers were thus extolled, by god Brahmā and who is above birth and death manifested himself through Aditi, in a form endowed with four arms wielding (in each) a conch, a mace, a lotus and a discus, clad in yellow garment and with eyes wide like a lotus.

2. Bright dark-blue in complexion, and with the splendour of his lotus-like face enhanced with the lustre of his alligator-shaped ear-rings, the Supreme Person, with the Śrīvatsa mark on his chest, was adorned with bracelets, armlets, a shining diadem, a girdle and a pair of beautiful anklets.

3. Irradiated with his special splendid Vanamālā (wreath of forest flowers) resonant with a swarm of humming bees and with the Kaustubha gem suspended from his neck, Lord Hari dispelled with his splendour the gloom in the house of Kaśyapa, the Lord of Creation, with his effulgence.

4. At that time, the cardinal points became clear and bright; lakes and ponds became translucent; all the creatures became jubilant; the seasons exhibited their characteristic efflorescence; joy reigned in the heaven, the mid air, the earth, gods (whose tongue is fire), kine, the three twice-born classes and mountains.

5. On the twelfth day of the bright half of the month of Bhādrapada when the moon was within the mansion called Śravaṇa, and the auspicious time was the Abhijit (the first anta of Śravaṇa), the Lord incarnated (on the earth) and all constellations of stars (e.g. Āśvini), planets etc. (by their auspicious influence) indicated his descent to be beneficial.

6. That twelfth day (of the bright half of Bhādrapada), when the sun attained the meridian, and the birth of Lord Hari took place, is known to people as Vijaya (the victorious).

7. Conchs were blown and big drums, kettle-drums, tabors and pāṇavas (a kind of musical instrument) were sounded. There was the tumultuous sound of various musical instruments.

8. The celestial damsels being highly delighted danced and prominent Gandharvas (like Hāhā, Hūhū) sang. Sages, gods, Manus, manes and fire-gods extolled the Lord.

9-10. Hosts of Siddhas and Vidyādhāras, along with Kimpūras and Kinnaras, Čāṇas, Yaksas and rākṣas, supāras (eagles), best of serpents, and the attendants of gods sang and danced. Highly extolling the Lord, they showered flowers on the hermitage of Aditi and its premises.

11. Beholding that Supreme Person as born from her womb, Aditi was astonished and was transported with joy. Amazed at the assumption of a human form by his yogic Maya Power, even Kaśyapa, the Lord of Creation hailed him 'May you be victorious'.

12. With that very form, decorated with ornaments and endowed with weapons which Hari, of unmanifest consciousness, manifested to them, he (instantly) transformed Himself in a dwarf Brāhmaṇa boy like a wonderfully active actor, while the parents were simply looking on.

13. Seeing (the transformation of the Lord as) the dwarf Brāhmaṇa boy, all great sages were delighted and with Kaśyapa, the Lord of creation, as their head, got performed all the religious rites and observances (from those beginning with the birth e.g. jātakarman and other).

14*. While his sacred thread ceremony (Upanayana) was being performed, the sun-god (the presiding deity of Gāyatri Mantra) taught him the Gāyatri Mantra; Brahaspati, the preceptor of gods, gave him the sacred thread, and Kaśyapa, the cord of mūlāja grass to be tied round his waist.

15*. The Earth-goddess conferred the skin of black-antelope on him, while Soma, the Lord of plant and herbs offered the sacred staff. The mother covered his nudity with a piece of cloth, and heavens gave an umbrella to the Lord of the Universe.

16*. God Brahmā presented him a water pot (of gourd or wood) and the seven sages, the darbha grass. The goddess Sarasvatī gave a rosary of beads to the Immortal Supreme Soul.

17*. When his initiation-ceremony (sacred-thread-inves-

---

14-17* The list of deities who presented Vāmana different articles differs in other Purāṇas. Thus in Matsya P. 245-85 we find the black antelope skin given by Brahmā, the sacred thread by Brahaspati, the sacred staff by Marici, Kamaṇḍalu by Vasistha, a bunch of Kuśa grass by Aṅgiras, rosary of beads by Pulaha, a pair of white garments by Pulastya. The four Vedas, Sāmkhya, Yoga and other Sāstras attended upon Vāmana.
titure ceremony) was over, Kubera, King of Yakṣas gave him a begging-bowl with words "This is for him". And the veritable Mother-goddess Saṭī (Umā) herself served him the alms.

18. Thus honoured by all, the newly initiated eminent Brāhmaṇa boy, with his splendid Brahmanic (divine) effulgence, surpassed the whole assembly of Brāhmaṇa-sages.

19. The twice-born buy instituted the sacred fire (on the altar) enkindling it, duly worshipping it by placing the Kuṭa grass around it in their proper places (paristīrya), and oblated into the fire the sacred sticks (daubed with ghee—the samīḍha).

20. Having learnt that Bali, of enormous wealth and power, was engaged as a sacrificer in a horse-sacrifice conducted by the Brāhmaṇas of the Bhṛgu clan, he (Vāmana) concentrating in himself all the power, proceeded (from the hermitage of Aditi) to that place (of Bali’s sacrificial hall), bending down the earth at every step, on account of his weight.

21. The sacrificial priests of the Bhṛgu clan who were conducting the best of sacrifices (viz. a horse-sacrifice) of Bali on the northern bank of the Narmadā, at a spot called Bhṛgu-Kacchaka (near modern Broach in Gujarat), beheld him (Vāmana) approaching them, brilliant like the sun risen just near them.

22. Oh King, their glory being eclipsed by the effulgence of Vāmana, the priests conducting the sacrifice, the sacrificer Bali and the members of the sacrificial assembly began to conjecture (among themselves) whether he (Vāmana) was the Sun-god himself or was the Fire-god or the (great) sage Sanatkumāra himself, coming with a view to observe the sacrifice.

23. While the Bhṛgus along with their disciples were thus variously expressing their surmise about him, Lord Vāmana carrying with him his umbrella, sacred staff, and water-bowl full of water, entered the pandal of the horse-sacrifice.

24-25. Noticing the entry of Lord Hari, a dwarfish Brāhmaṇa boy with the (outward) appearance of a Brahmacāvin assumed with his Mayā powers, having the zone of Mulāja-grass tied round his waist, and wearing as an upper garment a deer-skin in the fashion of the sacred thread (over his shoulder) and matted hair, the Bhṛgus along with their disciples and fires (fire-gods) as well, shrank before his divine lustre, and standing up to honour him, accorded unto him reception with all the due formalities.

26. Overjoyed to see his charming personality worth seeing, with limbs proportionate to his form, the sacrificer himself offered him a suitable seat.

27. According him courteous welcome, Bali washed the feet of the Lord, and worshipped him who is attractive to the minds of those who have abjured all attachment.

28. Bali, the knower of the path of righteousness, placed (sprinkled) on his head the water with which he washed his feet, and hence had become most auspicious and capable of removing all the sins of the people, and which Lord Śiva (the Lord of mount Kailāsa) the god of gods and the wearer of the crescent of the moon on his forehead, received on his head with utmost devotion.

Bali said:

29. (Hearty) welcome to you. I pay my obeisance to you. Oh Brahman! (Be pleased to tell us) what we should do for you. Oh noble Sir, I deem that you are the very embodiment of the penance of all Brāhmaṇa sages.

30. (Fully) satisfied are all our fore-fathers today. Our family and house have been purified. This very sacrifice has been successfully performed inasmuch as your worship has visited our house.

31. The sacrificial fires of mine whose sins have been completely annihilated by the waters used for washing your feet, stand properly worshipped with oblations, according to scriptural injunctions. This land of our has been purified by your tiny feet, Oh son of a Brāhmaṇa!

32. Oh son of a Brāhmaṇa! Methinks you have come to seek something. Be pleased to accept from me whatever you desire, Oh Brahmacārin! Oh most worshipful Brāhmaṇa!
Duly accept from me either the earth, gold, a well-furnished house, delicious food and drink or possibly even a girl or prosperous villages, horses, elephants or chariots, Oh Brāhmaṇa.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

Vāmana's request for three paces of Land—Sukra's opposition

Sṛt Suka said:

1. Hearing the above-mentioned speech of Bali, the son of Virocana, which was in accordance with the prescribed path of righteousness, pleasing yet true, the glorious Lord was pleased with him. Welcoming him, He spoke.

The glorious Lord said:

2. Oh Lord of men! This speech of yours is courteous, true, worthy of your family (traditions), full of righteousness contributory to your glory, as the descendants of Bhṛgu race are your guides in matters temporal, while in matters spiritual your quiescent grand-father, the eldest member of the family (viz. Prahlāda) is your authority.

3. No such niggardly person was born in this family who ever refused to donate (anything) to Brāhmaṇas or was so miserly as going back upon his promise to give.

4. Never there was any such coward king in your family who at the time of religious donations turned this face against persons who, deserving the gift, had requested for it, or who, at the time of battle, showed their backs to worthy foes who challenged them in fight. In your family, Prahlāda shines forth in his unsullied faultless glory like the moon in the firmament.

5. In this family was born Hiraṇyākṣa who, armed with his mace, travelled alone over this earth for the conquest of all directions i.e. of (the entire earth) and did not meet any rival (equal to him in valour).

6. When faced by him (Hiraṇyākṣa), at the time of lifting up of the earth (from the rasāataka), Viṣṇu (in the Boarincarnation) vanquished him with great difficulty, but frequently remembering his great bravery, did not regard himself as the victor (subsequently).

7. Hearing the report of his (Hiraṇyākṣa's) death, his brother Hiraṇyakaśipu got enraged and went, of yore, to the region of Hari, for killing the slayer of his brother.

8. Beholding him (Hiraṇyakaśipu) rushing toward himself with a spear in hand, like the god of death, Viṣṇu, who knows the (suitability of) Time, and is the foremost one among the masters of marvellous illusive powers, pondered over the matter.

9. 'Wherever I go, he will certainly follow me as the (god of) death does unto living beings. I shall, therefore, enter his heart, inasmuch as his vision is confined to external things (or affairs').'.

10. Taking this decision, Viṣṇu, with a disturbed mind (as a matter of fact, with a calm and undisturbed mind) concealed his subtle body in the breath of the enemy who was rushing at him, and entered his body through his nostrils (without being known by him), Oh ruler of Asuras!

11. Having ransacked his vacant residence and not being able to find him, the warrior got enraged and roared loudly. He searched for Viṣṇu, the heaven and the earth, the cardinal points and the sky, the subterranean regions and the seas, but could not find him anywhere.

12. As he did not perceive him, he said positively, "The whole of the universe has been closely searched by me. The murderer of my brother must have certainly gone to the place (viz. the region of death) from which no man returns (he being ever liberated from Samsāra must have returned to his original nature which is brahma-hood).

13. In this world, the persistence in enmity continues only so far i.e. to the extent of, the death of, the (inimical) embodied beings. Anger (the cause of enmity) which is engendered through ignorance is fostered by egotism.

1. As a matter of fact for knowing Him (GS).
2. māyāvināh sarah—The bestower of boons like liberation from samsāra.—Vēj.
3. Viśu—One devoid of knowledge (vigatam brah jñāna jñeyam)—VD.
14. Your father Virocana, the son of Prahlāda was so devoted to Brāhmaṇas that when so requested by celestials in the disguise of twice-born ones (Brāhmaṇas), knew their real nature (as enemies), and still conferred his lease of life upon them.

15. Your worship resorted to the righteous course of conduct followed by householders, Brāhmaṇas, your valorous forefathers and others of wide reputation.

16. Oh Lord of Daityas! You are the foremost one among the bestowers of boons. From you, I seek a small piece of land three paces in length measured with my feet.¹

17. Even though you are a liberal Lord of the earth, I do not seek anything else from you, Oh king! For a learned person who accepts a gift just limited to his (actual) requirements, does not contaminate any sin.

Bali said:

18. Oh Brāhmaṇa's son! Your words are commendable in the case of the aged. You are, however, a child, of childlike (undeveloped) intelligence², as such, you do not know your self-interest.

19. Having propitiated me, the sole supreme ruler of the world, with courteous words, you seek only three paces (feet) of land, out of lack of intelligence³ or knowledge, when I am capable of gifting a continent.

20. A person who approaches me (for a gift) should not (have the occasion or need to) approach another for begging. Hence, Oh Brāhmaṇa boy! Accept from me freely, at will⁴ as much land as is sufficient for you to maintain your livelihood (decently).

¹ This motif of the Vāmana story is traceable to the Vedic symbolism of Viṣṇu measuring out three lokaś in three strides. Vide RV 1.22.17 also 1.154.2, 1.155.4. Vāmana is the unmanifest principle, while Viṣṇu or Viśeṣa manifest.

² ŠR states that as a matter of fact the 2nd line should read: taśam bālo-bālīśa-maṭiḥ “You are a-bālīśa—whose intelligence is fully developed and as such you consider the interests of your devotees and seek no personal interest.” (As you are perfect there is no scope for any personal want).

³ ŠR: the words in the end line yo’ buddhimāṇ should be split as ‘yo Buddhaḥmin, “Intelligent as you are” etc.

⁴ Kāśīm—By stretching your stride as much as possible—ŠR.
The Lord replied:

21. All the desired-most objects (or lands) that are available in the three worlds cannot be enough to satisfy a person who has not subdued his senses or the mind, Oh King!

22. He who is dissatisfied with three feet of land, cannot have his desire fulfilled with an island—continent consisting of nine Vargas (sub-continents), as he will crave to possess all the seven island-continents.

23. We heard the report that Prithu, the son of Vena\(^1\), Gaya\(^2\) and other kings who were the Lords of the seven continents (dvipas) never reached the end of their thirst for more, despite their possession of the hoards of wealth and desired objects.

24. A contented person leads a happy life with whatever comes to his lot by chance, while a discontented person who has no control over himself, is never satisfied even if the three worlds be possessed by him.

25. It is said that non-contentment with reference to wealth and objects of enjoyment, is the cause of the transmigration of man in this world, and that contentment with what one happens to get by (one’s predestined) luck, is the way to emancipation (from samsāra).

26. The spiritual glory of a Brāhmaṇa who is satisfied with what he obtains through chance, enhances. It, however, is extinguished through lack of contentment, like fire with water.

27. Prominent among the bestowers of boons as you are, I, hence, seek only three feet of land from you. I shall have my purpose (of depriving you of everything) accomplished.

1. Voīya—Prithu, son of Vena. He was churned out of the hand of the dead body of Vena. He “milked” the earth of food-stuffs. His reign was a golden period. He performed a horse-sacrifice. Installing his son Vijitāśva on the throne, Prithu retired to forest and performed penance and merged in paramātman.

—Mbh. Śānti 59.98-128; 227. 49-56.

VP. 1.22, The Bh. P. Sāpra 4th skanda.

2. Gaya—An ancient king-sage (rājārṣi) who performed many sacrifices (Mbh. vana 75.18). He gifted away all land to Brāhmaṇas (Mbh. Śānti 237.25). He earned reputation and wealth by visiting sacred places and temples in India. (Mbh.Vana. 94.18).
with that much only. For the desirability of wealth is limited to the extent of its usefulness.

Śrī Śuka said:

28. When addressed thus, Bali laughingly spoke, 'Take it as much as desired'. He then took in his hand his jar of water to donate the land (with due religious formalities) to Vāmana.

29. Śukra, the foremost among the knowers (of politics) apprehending the (inner) design of Viṣṇu, forewarned his disciple who was about to gift the land to Viṣṇu.

Śukra said:

30. Oh son of Virocana! This dwarf is no other than the eternal divine Lord Viṣṇu who is born of Kaśyapa and Aditi, with the object of accomplishing the purpose of gods.

31. I do not approve of the promise given by you without foreseeing the consequent calamities (implicit in your promise). A great disaster has befallen the Dāityas.

32. This Hari who has assumed the form of a Brahma-cārin through his delusive powers (māyā) will dispossess you of your position, sovereignty, fortune, splendour, world-wide reputation and learning and pass it on to Indra.

33. Assuming his cosmic form, co-extensive with the universe, he will occupy all these (three) regions with three steps. Having conferred everything that you own, upon Viṣṇu, how are you going to exist, oh fool!

34. Where is the space left for the third foot when the all-pervading Viṣṇu covers the whole of the earth in one foot, and the heaven with another, and occupies the intervening space by his body? (Thus you cannot fulfill your promise.)

35. Me-thinks your permanent place lies in the hell, the destination of those who do not redeem their pledge, since even you will not be able to fulfill your promise.

36. They (i.e. the wise) do not commend that gift as good if it endangers the means of livelihood of the donor. For in this world, charitable gifts, performance of sacrifices, austere penances and religious acts can be performed by persons with means of subsistence.
37. A person who divides his wealth in five shares (and invests it) for the purpose of religious acts, glory, getting economic return, personal pleasure and provision of one's relatives, becomes happy here and hereafter.

38. If you feel uneasy about the break of promise hear from me, Oh best of the Asuras! the decision of the seers of the Rigveda on this point (about truth and falsehood). Whatever is promised by uttering the sacred syllable Om, is the truth and whatever is denied by expressing a 'No' is untruth.

39. It is sung (in the Śruti texts) that one should know that truth is the flower and fruit of the tree of this body. When the tree does not survive that (viz. the fruits and flowers i.e. the truth) ceases to be. Hence, anta (viz. not giving away all one's possessions) is the root-mainstay of the body.

40. Just as a tree that is uprooted, dries up and dies in a short time, so does the body which has lost its support of anta, undoubtedly dry up soon.

41. The Vedic text parāg riktam etc. means that which is expressed by the assenting syllable Om carries away wealth to a long distance, and leaves one incomplete (bereft of wealth).

A person verily becomes poorer to that extent to which he agrees to give by uttering the syllable Om (yes). A donor who agrees to give everything to the mendicant cannot find sufficient for his personal enjoyment (subsistence).

42. Therefore, the term 'No' which is regarded as anta means fullness to oneself (as his wealth is unspent), and adds to his wealth (as due to the consciousness of his deficiency, he tries to get more wealth from others). But if a person who makes a false statement all the while by saying 'No' (refusing to give), gets a bad name, and is as good as dead though breathing.

43. False statements are not condemnable when made to women (while courting), in jokes, in arranging marriages, for obtaining one's livelihood, for saving one's own life in danger, in protecting cows and Brāhmaṇas and where violence (to another) is anticipated.
CHAPTER TWENTY

Manifestation of the Cosmic Form by Viṣṇu

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Bali, the Lord of the household, who was thus addressed by his family-preceptor, remained silent for a moment and (weighing the consequences) with careful mind, he submitted as follows:

Bali said:

2. What has been stated by your worship, is true. It is the duty of householders to see that the wealth, enjoyment (of life) good reputation and the means of livelihood are not adversely affected by anything.

3. Having promised the Brāhmaṇa once that I shall give, how can I, the descendant of Prahlāda, out of greed for wealth, refuse, like a gambler, to give.

4. The earth has verily said: There is no greater heinous unrighteousness than falsehood. I am capable of bearing anything else except a man given to uttering falsehood.

5. I am not so much afraid of the (tortures of) hell, poverty, ocean of misery, displacement from (my present) status and even death, as I am of cheating a Brāhmaṇa.

6. In this world, wealth (and as a matter of fact) everything else abandons a dying man. (Why should not one give it away while alive? If only a part is given and the recipient Brāhmaṇa is not satisfied, the gift becomes fruitless). What is the propriety of that charitable act unless the recipient Brāhmaṇa is satisfied thereby?

7. Righteous souls like sage Dadhyañc, king Śibi and others accomplish the well-being of creatures by sacrificing their lives which are so difficult to give up; what consideration is there for the earth and other things (which are less important than life)?

1. A famous sage, Son of Bhṛgu—Handed over his body to gods for preparation of Veṣṭra (the weapon of Indra) out of his bones,—Mbh. Vana 190.21 Śalya 51.29-32.

2. An ancient royal sage who submitted his body to a hawk (Indra) to save a dove (fire-god)—Mbh. Vana 197. 21.28.
8. Time has swallowed up the enjoyment of the earth and the position in the next world of the kings of Daityas who (while alive) enjoyed the earth and were ever successful in war. But (it could) not do so to the glorious renown achieved by them on the earth, Oh Brāhmaṇa.

9. Oh Brāhmaṇa Sage! Those who lay down their lives without retreating from the battlefield are easily available, but not so the donors who, when approached by worthy recipients, reverentially give away their wealth.

10. Poverty and affliction in consequence of satisfying the desires of (ordinary) supplicants, appear grateful to a magnanimous and merciful soul. Need it be said that it is much more so in cases like yours who know the Brahmans or Vedas? Hence, I shall bestow upon the Brahmaćārin what he wants.

11. Let him be Viṣṇu, the bestower of boons whom your worshipful self, conversant with the procedure laid down in the Vedas, so reverentially worship by performance of various kinds of sacrifices (with Soma or without Soma) or let him be an enemy. I shall confer upon him the land desired for by him, Oh sage!

12. Even if he unrighteously binds me down—an innocent sinless person, I shall do no harm unto him, a cowardly enemy disguised as a Brāhmaṇa.

13. If he be really Viṣṇu of hallowed renown he would not forfeit his fame (by deceiving me thus). He will take away the land by killing me on the battlefield or lie down killed by me.

Śri Śuka said:

14. The preceptor Śukra, being impelled by Providence, pronounced the following curse upon his noble-minded disciple who placed no faith in his words, and would not abide by his command, but wanted to be true to his promise.

15. “You who are highly conceited as being learned and obstinate, and show disregard to us by transgressing our orders, shall, in no time, fall down from your royal splendour”.

16. Though cursed thus by his preceptor, the great Bali did not swerve from the truth and worshipping Vāmana, he gave away the land with due formality of pouring water (from his right palm in solemn confirmation of the gift).

17. The royal consort Vindhyāvali, adorned with a costly pearl necklace, came there and brought a gold jar full of water to wash Vāmana’s feet.

18. The sacrificer himself gladly washed the glorious feet of the Lord, and sprinkled on his head, the waters which are capable of sanctifying the whole of the universe.

19. In the heaven, all the hosts of gods, Gandharvas, Vidyādharas, Cāraṇas applauded that act of worship, and extolled the Asura King and his straightforwardness and overcome with joy, showered flowers over him.

20. Thousands of kettledrums were sounded; Gandharvas and Kimpuruṣas sang that a most difficult act has been done by this noble-minded Bali, in that, he knowingly bestowed the (sovereignty of the) three worlds upon his enemies.

21. That dwarf form of that infinite Hari, comprising as it is of three guṇas, miraculously expanded to such an extent as to include that earth, the heaven, the cardinal points, the space between the heaven and the earth, cavities and hells, oceans, the sub-human beings, human beings, gods and sages and everything else.

22. Bali along with the sacrificial priests, the president of the sacrificial assembly, and its members, saw on the body of the Great Spirit comprising of all the guṇas, the whole of the universe made up of three guṇas, and consisting of elements, the senses with their objects (of enjoyment), the mind and the jīvas (individual souls).

23. Bali whose army was like that of Indra espied on the cosmic form of the Lord the rasātala (the sub-terranean regions) at the sole of his feet, the earth resting on his feet, mountains on the shanks, birds on his knee-joints, the group of wind-gods (marutṣ) on the thighs of the Supreme Person.

24. He beheld the two twilights (deities presiding over the dawn and the dusk) on the garments of the all-pervading Lord, the lords of creation in his genital organ, Asuras of which he was the chief in the anus, the firmament in the navel, the seven seas in his sides, and the string of constellations on the chest of the Lord of very colossal strides.

25-26. Oh Child! He saw (the presiding deity of Dharmu in the heart of the slayer of Mura (Viṣṇu), Rta (Divine Law) and Satya (Truth) on his breasts, the Moon-god in the mind, the goddess Śrī with a lotus in her hand resting on his bosom, and all the Sāma-hymns, articulate sounds in his throat, all the celestials with Indra as their chief on his arms. the cardinal points in his ears, and the heaven on (the crown of) his head, the clouds in the mass of his hair, the vital breath in his nostrils, the Sun-god in his eyes, and the Fire-god in his mouth.

27. He saw the Vedas in his speech, Varuṇa the Lord of waters in his palate, the interdicting and prescriptive parts (of the scriptures) in his eye-brows, the day and night on his eyelashes, Anger on his forehead, greed on the lower lip of the Supreme Person.

28. Oh King! He saw the passion of Love in his sense of touch, water in his semen, Adharma (the spirit of unrighteousness) on his back, sacrificial activity in his steps, Death in his shadow, Māyā in his laughter, and various species of herbs in the hair on his body.

29. The warrior Bali beheld the rivers in his arteries, rocks in the nails, god Brahmā in his Buddhi (intellect), the hosts of gods and sages in his vital breaths, all creatures mobile and immobile on his person.

30. Perceiving all this universe resting in the Person of the Lord, all the Asuras lost their consciousness, Oh child!

The Sudarśana discus of unbearable velocity, force and effulgence, the Śāṅga bow twanging like rumbling clouds.

31. The Pāṇcajanya conch of deep sound like the roar of thunder, the mighty mace of Viṣṇu called Kaumodakī, the sword called Vidyādhara (otherwise known as Nandaka) paired with a shield called Śatācandra (as it was set with hundred moonlike studs), and the two excellent quivers with inexhaustible stock of arrows, (all in personem).

32. His chief attendants headed by Sunanda, accompanied by the guardians of the worlds, waited upon the Lord. Adorned with shining diadem, armlets, a pair of alligator-shaped ear-rings, the Śrī-Vatsa mark, in foremost of all jewels Kaustubha, girdle, clad in yellow silk garment.

33. Adorned with the Vanamālā (a wreath of forest-flowers) hovered round by bees, the Divine Lord of mighty strides, shone in great brilliance.

Oh King! He covered the earth of Bali with one foot; He occupied the sky with his body and the quarters with his arms.

34. As he covered the celestial region with another step there was not the slightest space left for the third as the second step of the Lord of wide strides extended higher and higher beyond Maharloka, Janaloka, Tapaloka up to Satyaloka—the region of god Brahmā.

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

Bali Bound Down

Śrī Śuka said:

1. On beholding that the foot of the Lord had reached (his region) satya-loka and finding himself enveloped in and the effulgence of his region eclipsed by the brilliant lustre of his moon-like (toe-) nails, lotus-born god Brahmā and also great sages like Marici, sages of great vows (of life-long celebrity like Nārada) and yogins (of the path of knowledge) like Sanandana, came forth to receive him.

2. (The presiding deities of) the Vedas and the subsidiary Vedas (viz. āyur-veda the science of medicine, Dhanur-veda the military science, Gāndharva veda the science of music, Sthāpatya veda the science of Engineering), Niyamas and yamas,1 science of Logic (Śāṅkhya and Mīmāṃsā), History (viz. the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata), six auxiliaries of Vedas,2 Purāṇas and Sanhitās (sacred texts like Pāncarātra Saṁhitā, Brahma-saṁhitā, Garga-saṁhitā and others) who had burnt down their impurities of sins by the fire of spiritual knowledge enkindled by the wind of Ṭoga, approached and bowed down at the foot of the Lord, by virtue of meditating which they would attain to the region of god Brahmā which is not accessible by the path of Karmas (religious, ritualistic acts).

3. Thereupon, the lotus-born god Brahmā, of extremely pure reputation, brought water to worship Viṣṇu’s foot raised upto his region. Devoutly worshipping his feet, he sang out his praise, for he himself was born out of the lotus that adorns his navel.

4. The water that was poured out of the Ṛamanḍalu (water-jug) of god Brahmā, for washing the feet of the Lord of mighty strides, and being purified thereby, became the heavenly river in the sky. Like the pure hallowing renown of the Lord, it sanctifies the three worlds as it falls from the sky, and flows through them from the heavens.

5. God Brahmā and other protectors of the worlds, along with their followers, reverentially brought articles of worship to their Lord who had withdrawn his all-pervading form in a limited personality (viz. that of Vāmana).

6. With water brought for worship, with garlands of flowers and divinely fragrant sandal-paste and pigment, with burning of fragrant incense and lights, parched grains of paddy, unbroken rice, fruits and sprouts.

7. With songs of praise, shouts of victory announcing his prowess and greatness, with dancing performances, playing of musical instruments and presentation of vocal music and sounds of conchs and kettle drums.

8. Jāmbavān, the king of bears, with the speed of the mind, proclaimed with beating of drums in all directions, the victory of the Lord and the great festive occasion.

9. Finding that under a deceitful pretext of a request of three feet of land, the entire earth was taken away (fraudulently) from their master who was engaged in a sacrifice, the Asuras flared up and said to each other.

10. “Certainly this is not even a Brāhmaṇa by mere caste, (even a lowly Brāhmaṇa will not commit such a fraud).
He is Viṣṇu, the prominent one among the masters of illusive powers (and conjuring tricks). Disguising himself as a Brāhmaṇa, he desires to accomplish the objective of gods.

11. We stand cheated of everything by this enemy who assuming the disguise of a Brahmacārin came for begging, while our master has laid down his powers of punishment during the period of this sacrifice.

12. Being a person vowed to observe (perpetual) truthfulness, and especially when consecrated for performing sacrifice, it is not possible to utter falsehood for our master who is friendly to Brāhmaṇas full of compassion.

13. It is, therefore, our sacred duty to kill him (Vāmana) and serve the cause of our master.” Saying thus the followers of Bali, Asuras, took up their arms.

14. Thus being enraged, all of them, armed with spears (śūla) and sharp-edged steel-bars1 (patṭiśa) rushed to strike at Vāmana (the Dwarf), even though Bali did not wish it.

15. Seeing the generals of the Daitya army attacking Vāmana, Viṣṇu’s attendants laughed at them, and thwarted them (Asuras’ attack) with their arms uplifted.

16-17. Nanda, Sunanda, Jaya, Vijaya, Prabala, Bala, Kumuda, Kumudākṣa, Viśvaksena, the king of birds—Garuḍa, Śrutadeva, Puṣpadanta and Sātvata—each of them possessing the strength of ten thousand elephants, advanced to kill the Asura army.

18. Seeing his people being massacred by the followers of Viṣṇu, and remembering the curse of Śukra (his preceptor), Bali prevented them from fighting, although they were enraged.

19. “Oh Vipracitti! Oh Rāhu! Oh Nemi! Listen to my speech! Please do not fight; retreat. This period is not favourable unto us.

20. Oh Daitya comrades! No human being is powerful enough to overcome Him with human prowess, as he is the master (chief cause) who distributes pleasure and pain to all creatures.

1. patṭiśa lohadando yastikṣṇadhāraḥ kṣuropamah—Vaijayanti quoted in ASD p. 310.
21. The glorious Lord who was formerly in favour of our prosperity and against that of the celestials, is today disposed to do quite the reverse of it.

22. No person can verily overcome the Time-spirit by physical power, expert advisers, intelligence, fortresses, mystic formulae, medicine etc. and by expedients like sāma, dāna, danḍa and bheda).

23. These attendants of Hari have many times been vanquished by you, when Fortune was favourable to you. Today those very attendants are roaring after vanquishing you in the battle.

24. If the Providence becomes favourable (again), we shall again defeat them. Therefore wait for the favourable Time, which will turn to be advantageous to us.”

Śri Śuka said:

25. Hearing the directive (speech) of their leader, the generals of the Daitya and Dānava forces, beaten by the attendants of Viṣṇu entered the Rasātala (nether world).

26. On the very day of extracting Soma juice in the sacrifice, Garuḍa, king of birds, the son of Tārkṣya, informed of the desire of the Lord¹, bound down Bali with the noose cords of Varuṇa.

27. When the king of Asuras was thus being taken prisoner by Viṣṇu of superior power, there arose a loud outcry on earth, in the sky and in all directions.

28. Glorious Lord Vāmana addressed to Bali who, though bound down by the noose of Varuṇa and bereft of royal splendour, was of balanced and stable mind, and of noble reputation, Oh King!

29. “Oh Asura! you have given me three paces of land. The entire earth (world) has been covered by two steps, Please provide space for the third.

¹ ṢR explains: The Lord wanted to shower grace on Bali by depriving him of all his property and freeing him from his egoistic claim on his body. Or the Lord wanted to lower Bali's position to exhibit Bali's greatness etc.
30. As this entire land as far as the sun warms it by its rays, and the moon and the stars illuminate it, and as far as the rain-god was sending showers of water, was yours.

31. With one step I have covered the region of the earth, the sky and the quarters by my body, the celestial regions were covered by the second step as witnessed by you.

32. If you are not able to give what is promised, it is inevitable that your stay should be in the hell. Hence, you do enter the hell as approved of by your spiritual preceptor.

33. All the aspirations of that person fail. The celestial region is far away (from him). He falls down into hell who deceives a person seeking his help, by failing to give what is promised.

34. Proud of your riches as you were, you deceived me with the words "I shall give you" (three paces of land). Suffer, therefore, for some years in hell as a punishment for uttering falsehood."

CHAPTER TWENTYTWO

A Dialogue between Bali and Vāmana

Śrī Suka said:

1. Oh King! Even though Bali was thus (humiliatingly) insulted by the glorious Lord and though he was made to swerve from the truth, Bali remained firm in mind, and gave this dignified reply.

Bali submitted:

2. Oh god of excellent renown! Your worship regards the promise given by me as false. (It is you who fraudulently disguised yourself as a dwarf at the time of begging, and deceitfully manifested a different form at the time of the implementation of promise). In spite of this, I shall be true to my word so that I should not be regarded as a cheat. Be pleased to place your third step on my head (as the possessor of wealth is more valuable than the wealth possessed.) Oh Prominent one among gods!

3. Displaced as I am from my (sovereign) position, I am not so much afraid of hell or of being bound down with (Varuṇa's) noose, or of insuperable calamities or of financial difficulties or of any punishment from you as from ignoble reputation (viz. Bali was a deceitful person).

4. Methinks punishment meted out by the worthiest person is the most praiseworthy reward to men, as neither mother nor father nor brother or friends can deal such punishment.

5. In the guise of an enemy, you are certainly the highest preceptor (and hence benefactor) of us, the Asuras, inasmuch as you gave an insight in this fall to us, who were blinded by pride and arrogance caused by different factors (such as valour, wealth etc.)

6. As it is wellknown, many Asuras, by cherishing deep rooted enmity to You attained to that high position (emancipation from Sansāra) which only yogins with unserving devotion can reach.

7. Hence, I feel neither much ashamed nor afflicted that I have been taken prisoner and have been bound down with the noose of Varuṇa, by your worship of miraculous feats.

8. My grand-father, Prahlāda who is highly esteemed by your devotees, and whose excellent reputation of saintliness is manifest, was subjected to various cruel tortures by his own father Hiranyakasipu, because he was your enemy.

9. What is the use of the body which abandons one ultimately (at the time of death)? Of what worth are the robbers, designated as one's own people (e.g. sons, kith and kin), who take away our property? Of what purpose is the wife who is the cause of transmigration in the Sansāra? What is the use of houses to a mortal? It is sheer waste of life here.

10. Having come to this definite decision, my eminent grand-father (Prahlāda) of unfathomable wisdom, and the prominent-most saintly person, disturbed by the company of worldly people, resorted to your lotus-like feet which are eternal and which offer immunity from fear (from any quarter), even though you were the destroyer of his relatives and partisans.
11. It is through sheer good luck that I too am brought to the presence of Yourself—You who are the destroyer of both subtle and gross bodies (of beings and thus grant liberation) and that I am forcibly made to give up my wealth (and glorious position). And it is wealth (and position) that deprives man of his judgement and makes him incapable of understanding the uncertainty of life, due to its being within clutches of death.

_Sri Suka said:_

12. While he (Bali) was addressing thus, Prahlāda, beloved of the glorious Lord, appeared (on the scene) like the full moon above the horizon, Oh foremost of Kurus!

13. Bali, having an army like that of Indra, noticed his grand-father, of majestic stature, charming appearance, with eyes large like (a pair of) lotuses, with long arms (reaching his knees), clad in yellow silken garments, bright dark in complexion yet radiant in his native effulgence.

14. Bali, being bound down with the noose of Varuṇa could not offer him worshipful reception as before. He reverentially bowed him with his head, and with his eyes full of tears, he hung his head with shame1 (as he remembered his egoistic actions).

15. Seeing the Protector of righteous persons sitting there, and being attended upon by his followers like Sunanda, Nanda and others, the noble-minded Prahlāda approached him and paid obeisance to him, placing his head down on the ground, while his eyes were over-whelmed with tears, and hair stood on their ends (through ecstasy).

_Prahlāda said:_

16. It is fortunate (and not derogatory) that the exalted position of Indra that you yourself bestowed on Bali has been retaken from him by you. I consider that great divine grace has been shown unto him (Bali) in that he has been relieved of his fortune which infatuates the mind and bewilders the soul.

1 GS attributes this to Bali's sense of guilt for forgetting the teaching of Prahlāda about humility and his disparaging remarks to Vāmana.
17. By wealth, even a self-controlled learned person gets deluded (and forgets the essential nature of the soul, even though known previously). How can an ordinary person comprehend properly the course leading to the realization of the soul, when possessed of wealth? Hence I offer my obeisance to you (who have rendered a gracious obligation on Bali by divesting him of his wealth and glory), Oh Nārāyaṇa, the controller of the Universe and witness unto all the worlds.

Śrī Śuka said:

18. It was in the very presence of Prahlāda who stood with folded palms that god Brahmā (who emerged from the golden egg) addressed Viṣṇu, the slayer of demon Madhu, Oh King!

19. Seeing her husband so bound down, Bali’s saintly wife (Vindhyāvalī), was overwhelmed with fear. With folded palms, she bowed down to Vāmana (the younger brother of Indra), and with face drooping down in supplication burst forth in appeal (And god Brahmā respected her by giving her the priority in communicating with the Lord).

Vindhyāvalī appealed:

20. You have created these three worlds (the earth, the heaven and the subterranean region) for your own divine sport. But other persons of perverted mentality arrogate proprietary rights over it (as did Bali when he says that he has donated the three worlds as a gift and shall redeem his pledge by offering his head for the third step when as a matter of fact, he is not the master of his body, much less of the universe). You are the creator, protector and destroyer of the universe. To such as you are, what these shameless persons in whom the sense of being independent agents has been implanted by you (through your Māyā), are capable of offering? Oh Lord! Be pleased to be gracious unto dull-witted Bali and setting him free from bonds, protect him.

God Brahmā said:

21. Oh Creator of living beings! Oh Controller of all creatures! Oh God of gods immanent in the Universe! Be pleased to release Bali, as he is deprived of everything and he does not deserve confinement.

22. He has gifted to you the entire earth and the higher worlds that he acquired through his pious actions. Everything owned by him including his body has been donated by him to you, without the least flinching of the mind.

23. If a person with sincere and guileless mind, offers water for washing your feet and worships them devoutly with (simple) dūvā (Panic) grass he attains to the highest place (Liberation from saṁsāra or a place in your region, Vaikuṇṭha). Then why does Bali who has gifted to you the three worlds gleefully without the least hesitation, should suffer this calamity?

The Lord replied:

24. Oh Brahman! I take away the wealth (fortune etc.) of a person to whom I show my Grace. For being infatuated with wealth and power, a person becomes bereft of humility and shows disrespect to the world and (even) to me.

25. It is only by a lucky chance that the individual Soul, not being his own master and passing through various species of existence according to the fruits of his action, happens to be born as a human being.

26. It should be regarded as my Grace in that particular respect, if he, in the human stage of life, is not affected by pride for his lineage, achievements, youth, beauty, learning, authority, affluence and such other circumstances (and I am not constrained to deprive them of wealth etc.).

27. My devotee should not get infatuated with pride and feel lack of humility due to high birth etc. which are obstractive to the attainment of final bliss.

28. This Bali, the leader of Dānavas and Daityas and capable of enhancing their glory, has vanquished the unconquerable Māyā (deluding power of the Lord) and hence, he is not infatuated even in distress.

29-30. He has been deprived of his wealth, dislodged from his sovereign position, insulted, reproached and fettered by his enemies, abandoned by his kith and kin, and subjected to torture, remonstrated and cursed by his spiritual preceptor, but he remained firm in his vow, and did not deviate from the truth. True to his word as he is, he did not swerve from the truth, despite my misleading him by specious arguments about Dharma (righteousness).

31. A position very difficult even for immortal celestials to attain, has been conferred upon him by me. (But as he desired Indra-hood) he will be the Indra under my protection in the period (Manvantara) presided over by the Manu Sāvarṇi (after which he will attain that position).

32. Till then, let him live (as a ruler) in Sutala which is constructed (more beautifully than the celestial region) by Viśvakarman (the architect of gods). There, under my gracious surveillance, the residents are not subjected to anxieties, diseases, fatigue, laziness, defeat (from internal or external enemies) or other troubles.

33. Your Majesty Indrasena (Bali)! May good betide you! Accompanied by your relatives and kinsmen, proceed to Sutala—a region worthy of being aspired after even by celestial beings.

34. Even the Lokapālas (Protectors of the worlds) shall not (be able to) vanquish you. What of others? My discus (Sudarśana) will put an end to the Daityas who will (dare to) transgress your commands.

35. I shall protect you along with your followers, retinue and property, in every respect. You will always find me present there, Oh great warrior!

36. If any demoniac ideas occur to you due to the company of Dānavas and Daityas, they shall immediately disappear at the sight of my glory and prowess.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

_Bali, free from bonds, enters Sutala_

_Sri Śuka said:

1. The magnanimous Bali who was highly respected by all righteous persons, joined his palms, and with his eyes flowing with tears and throat choked with emotion, submitted in faltering accents to Lord Viṣṇu, the ancientmost person who addressed him (as reported in the previous chapter).

_Bali said:_

2*. How wonderful! Even an attempt made to offer you obeisance was efficacious enough to accomplish the blessings coveted by your devotees who resorted to you for protection. This unique Grace has never been obtained by the protectors of the world as well as by gods (who are of Sattvic disposition) before. It has been conferred upon a wretched asura (of a rājasic nature).

_Srī Śuka said:_

3. Having addressed thus, Bali, bowed down to Lord Hari, god Brahmā along with Śiva. Being free from bondage, Bali was highly pleased and he entered the Sutala region along with his Asuras.

4. Restoring (the kingdom of) the celestial region to Indra in this way, and having thus fulfilled the desire of Aditi, the Lord ruled over the whole of the world.

5. Seeing that his grandson Bali, the scion of his family, freed from bondage and the recipient of the Grace of the Lord, Prahlāda, full of devotion spoke as follows:

_Prahlāda said:_

6. Neither god Brahmā, nor goddess Srī or god Śiva ever received such a Grace. How can others (Indra etc.) obtain it? You whose feet are worshipped by persons adored by the world have become the protector of the fortress of us, the Asuras.

7. Oh Lord that affords shelter! Brahmā and other celestials have attained greatness (prosperity and power) by virtue of their enjoyment of the honey in the lotuslike feet of yours. (I, however, wonder) why we, of crooked behaviour and belonging to ferocious races, are made the recipients of your gracious look.

*SD: If mere attempt to bow down is so efficacious, how much more fruitful must be the worship etc. of Lord Hari.
8. Oh how miraculous are your acts and behaviour! You have created the worlds as the sportive activity of your inconceivable yoga-māyā; you are omniscient, nay the veritable in-dwelling soul of all, and hence, view all equally. Even though you are fond of your devotees, there is no partiality in your nature, you are just like the wish-yielding tree, by nature.

The Lord replied:

9. Child Prahlāda! May you be blessed! Go happily to your residence in Sutala along with your grandson, and enhance the happiness of your kith and kin.

10. You will always see me there standing with a mace in hand, and the bonds of your karmas will be snapped by the highest bliss of seeing me.

Śrī Śuka said:

11-12. With their palms folded and head bowed down, pure-minded Prahlāda, the Supreme Commander of all the Asura forces, along with Bali, respectfully accepted the command of the glorious Lord. Circumambulating the Eternal Person, they bowed again, and with his permission entered the ‘Great cavity’ (of Sutala), Oh King.

13. Thereafter, Oh King! Lord Viṣṇu whose abode is cosmic waters, and who removes the sins of his votaries, spoke to Śukra who was sitting near, among the sacrificial priests, in that assembly of experts in Vedas.

14. “Oh Brahman! Do you now make up for the interruption and deficiency in the sacrificial act that was being performed by your disciple. Whatever defects remain in religious performances are rectified even by the look of Brāhmaṇas (much more so if actually performed by them).”

Śukra replied:

15. How can there be any deficiency in ritualistic performance, where you, the presiding Lord of all religious acts, the master of sacrifice who confer their fruit on performers, the sacrifice itself incarnate, are worshipped with complete devotion?”
16. The recital of Your Name rectified all the defects arising out of (wrong pronunciation and intonation of) mantras (Vedic verses to be chanted at the time of sacrifices), wrong ritualistic procedure, in-opportuneness of time and unsuitability of place or in the provision of materials for sacrifices.¹

17. Still, however, as, Oh Mighty Lord, You insist on it, I shall carry out your behest. For what constitutes obedience to your commands, is (in itself) the highest beatitude of human beings.

Śrī Śukra said:

18. Gladly accepting Hari’s mandate, the worshipful sage Śukra, with the assistance of other Brāhmaṇa sages, rectified the deficiencies in Bali’s sacrifice.

19. In this way, having begged the earth (as well as celestial regions) from Bali, Lord Hari disguised as a dwarf, gave back to his brother, the great Indra, the celestial region (as well as the earth) which was usurped from him by his enemies.

20-21. Then for accomplishing the pleasure of Kaśyapa and Aditi, and for the well-being of all creatures, god Brahmā, the head of all the Protectors of the world (Prajāpatīś) together with gods, sages, manes and Manu and his sons with Dakṣa, Bhṛgu, Aṅgiras, as well as with Kumāra and god Śiva, crowned Vāmana as the King (and protector) of all the worlds, and the guardians of the worlds.

22-23. For the sake of the prosperity of all, god Brahmā installed Vāmana, the younger brother of Indra as the protector of all Vedas, gods, dharma (righteousness), glory, affluence, auspicious vows and of the celestial regions as well as of Mokṣa (Liberation of Samsāra). Oh King, all created beings thereby felt extremely delighted.

24. Then with the approval of god Brahmā, Indra accompanied by the Protectors of the world, placed Vāmana at their head, carried him to heaven, in a suitable celestial car.

¹ Cf. the famous verses quoted by VD.

_yosya smṛtya ca nāmoktaye tapo-yajña-kriyādīṣu /
nyānah sambārṇatāh yāt: tāṁ vande hariṁ acyutam //
25. With the sovereignty of the three worlds restored to him, and being free from fear due to his being protected by the arms of Vāmana, Indra who was endowed with supreme glory, felt highly delighted.

26-27. Eulogising that extremely miraculous great deed of Viṣṇu and praising Aditi, god Brahmā, Śiva, Kumāra, sages headed by Bhrigu and others, and masses, all beings, Siddhas, all beings moving in aerial cars, repaired to their respective abodes, Oh King.

28. I have recounted to you everything pertaining to the episode of the Lord of Mighty wide Strides which destroys all the sins of the listener to this story, Oh delight of the Kuru family!

29*. A mortal being who presumes to recount completely and exhaustively the glories of Lord Viṣṇu with mighty wide strides, is like unto a person who would count all the particles of dust on the earth. About such a person the seer of the mantra (RV. 1.1.54.1 etc.) asks, ‘Is there born now or likely to be born (in future) such a person (who can do so)? (The answer is ‘No’).

30. A person who listens to the account of this incarnation of Lord Hari, the god of gods of miraculous deeds, attains to the highest stage (of Liberation from Samsāra).

31. If this story is recited repeatedly during the performance of religious observance to propitiate gods, masses and men, the learned declare that that observance is auspiciously well-done.

*Viṣṇor nukah viṣṇāṇi pra vocam
—RV 1.154.1a; AV. 7.26.1a
VS. 5.18a, TS. 1.2.13.9a etc.
CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

The Fish Incarnation of Lord Viṣṇu*

The King said:

1. Venerable Sir! I now desire to hear from you the story of the first incarnation of Lord Hari of miraculous exploits, wherein he assumed the form of a fish, through his deluding potency (Māyā).

2. Why did the Supreme Lord, like one subject to (laws of) Karma, assume the form of a fish which is disgusting to the world, as being of tāmasic nature and unbearable.

3. It behoves you, Oh worshipful Sir, to tell us everything in details (as it took place), as the actions of the Lord of hallowing renown, are conducive to the happiness of all people.

Sūta said:

4. When requested thus by Parīkṣit (One protected by Viṣṇu i.e. Krṣṇa\(^1\)), the venerable Śuka, the son of Bādarāyaṇa,

*The deluge is a part of race-memory in different parts of the world. It testifies to the sub-mergergence of some parts of the world under water, at some distant period in the past, and the memory persisted among Hebrews, Assyrians, Hindus etc. The different periods of such deluges in different parts of the world (for example the Noaic Flood which lasted for about 371 to 376 days was in West Asia round Mt. Ararat (The Old Testament-Genesis Chs. 6, 7, B.) Also vide T.A. Bryant's The New Compact Bible Dictionary, pp. 176-178; 403-4 Special Crusade Edition), while the Indian deluge was in the Himalayan region and it lasted throughout one Kalpa, shows that there was really no universal flood, though it appeared to be so to the people in the affected area which was their "world" in ancient times. In India the deluge is described in the Satapatha Br. 1.8.6 the MBH Vana 187, Agni P. 2, Matsya P. 1 & 2. The Satapatha tradition seems to be the earliest and is followed by MBH where Manu, the saviour of the fish, was at Badari and the locale of the flood was the Himalayan region, but with the Bh. P., King Satyavrata, the saviour of the fish (and a future Manu) was a Draviḍa King who got the fish in the river Kṛ́ta-mālā in Tamil Nadu. The brief statement in the Agni P. makes Manu perform penance on the bank of Kṛ́ta-mālā, while in the Matsya P. 1. 17-18 Manu went to Malaya (Kerala) where in his own hermitage the small fish fell above. The symbolism of the fish is explained by V.S. Agrawala P.-a study, pp. 4-8 with which one may not agree, as it presumes an advanced knowledge in Embryology in that Purāṇic era (Gupta Period).

\(^{1}\) Vide Supra 1.12.7-11.
began to narrate the history of Lord Viṣṇu as he acted in the form of a fish.

Śrī Śuka said:

5. (The object of incarnations in general :) When the Almighty Lord desires to protect cows, Brāhmaṇas, gods, righteous persons, the Vedas and the laws of Dharma (righteousness) and Artha and other Puruṣārthas, he assumes a body.

6. (This incarnation is not disgusting.) The Supreme Lord moves like vital airs through higher and lower beings. But Himself being transcendental to guṇas (attributes), he is not affected by the guṇas of Prakṛti and hence by the highness or lowness of status.

7. At the close of the last Kalpa (known as Brāhma), there was a periodic deluge caused by (the sleep that overcame) Brahмā. At that time, Oh King, the worlds known as Bhū (this earth) and other (higher) worlds were submerged under the sea.

8. A mighty demon called Haya-grīva (one with the neck and head of a horse) who was in the vicinity of Brahmā, carried away the Vedas which (unconsciously) escaped from the mouth of Brahmā who was overcome with sleep under the influence of Time, and desired to go to bed.

9. Noticing that (clandestine) act of Hayagrīva the king of Dānavas, the glorious Supreme Lord Hari, assumed the form of a small glittering fish.

10. In that Kalpa, a great royal sage, by name Satya- vrata who was absolutely devoted to Nārāyaṇa, was practising austerities, subsisting on water only.

11. That very person (who was then called King Satya- vrata) is well known as Śrāddha-deva, the son of Vivasvat and was installed as Manu by Lord Hari, in this great Kalpa.

1. While commenting on verse No. 46, ŚR raises there a pertinent point as to the nature of this Deluge. He states that as the world was submerged within seven days without the usual draught of 100 years, and having fire from above (the sun) and from below (Śeṣa’s poison), this must be an illusory deluge shown to Satyavrata by the Lord. This has been echoed by GS. on this verse and by VD elsewhere.
12. One day while he was offering libations of water (to sages and manes) in the river Kr̥tamālā, a certain tiny fish was noticed in the water in the hollow of his folded palms.

13. Satyavrata, the King of Dravida land, was about to drop the small fish along with the water in the cavity of his folded palms.

14. To that extremely compassionate king, the fish piteously implored, "Oh king, kind unto the afflicted! How is it that you are throwing a poor helpless creature like me, into the waters of river when I am afraid of aquatic animals who kill their own species.

15. Not knowing that it was Lord Viṣṇu who, out of affection, assumed the form of a fish to confer Grace on him, he made up his mind to Protect the tiny fish.

16. Hearing the piteous appeal of the fish, the merciful king placed it in his water-jar (Kamaṇḍalu) and carried it to his hermitage.

17. Growing there in that jar of water (Kamaṇḍalu) in one night, and finding the space therein insufficient, she said to the king.

18. "I am not able to accommodate myself in this jar (Kamaṇḍalu) with difficulty. Be pleased to provide for me sufficiently spacious abode, wherein I can live comfortably."

19. He took the fish out of that jar (Kamaṇḍalu) and placed it in a big earthen pot for waterstorage (or a well). When thrown therein it grew to the dimensions of three cubits within a mukhātra (48 minutes).

20. (The fish requested :) "This reservoir is not sufficient to accommodate me comfortably. As I have adopted you as my protector, please provide me with a more spacious place.

21. Bringing that fish from the reservoir, the king threw it into a lake. Occupying the whole (expanse of the) lake with its body, it grew into a monstrous fish.

22. (The fish requested) "I am an aquatic animal, Oh king! The waters of this lake are not sufficient for my comfortable stay. Be pleased to place me in a pool of inexhaustible storage of water, making arrangement of my safe transit to it.”

23. Thus requested, the king carried the fish to various pools of inexhaustible stores of water (each bigger and deeper than the former). When the fish went on growing coextensive with the expanse of the lake, he threw it at last, into the sea.

24. While he was being thus deposited into the sea, he spoke to the king as follows: “Oh heroic king! It is not proper that you throw me here, as extremely powerful alligators and other aquatic animals will eat me.”

25. Being deluded by the fish with the expression of charming words, Satyavrata enquired, “Who are you who beguile us in the form of a fish?”

26. Never such aquatic animal possessing such (miraculous) power and capacity has been seen or heard by us, inasmuch as you fill a lake of one hundred yojanas (i.e. 800 miles) in extent, in a single day.

27. Certainly you must be the Imperishable, glorious Lord, Nārāyaṇa or Hari Himself who assumed the form of an aquatic creature for showing Grace unto living beings.

28. Oh Supreme-most Person! I bow to you who are the Master of the creation, protection and the destruction of the Universe. Oh all-pervading Lord! You are the real self, the goal and the refuge to us, your votaries, who approach you for protection.

29. All your sportful incarnations are meant for the prosperity and well-being of created beings. I wish to know the main purpose for assuming this form by your worshipful self.

30. Oh Lotus-eyed Lord! Seeking resort to your feet—you who are the friend and dear soul of all—shall never be futile, as to those others who look upon the body as their soul. For you have manifested your miraculous form to us.

Śrī Śuka said:

31. To king Satyavrata who was addressing him in this way, the lord of the Universe who assumed the body of a fish as he desired to sport in the ocean of deluge at the end of Yuga (which was about to take place), but who, being fond of his exclusive, unflinching votaries, wished to accomplish the good of king and spoke as follows:

The Glorious Lord said:

32. Oh vanquisher of enemies! On the seventh day from today, all the three worlds, viz. the terrestrial world, the celestial region and space (aerial region) between the two, will be submerged in the ocean of deluge.

33. While the worlds will be sinking in the waters of the deluge, a spacious boat despatched by me will approach you.¹

34-35. In the meanwhile, you take with you all herbs and plants and seeds of various types (both of inferior and superior qualities) and surrounded by seven sages and accompanied by all varieties of animals, you will board that spacious ship and shall fearlessly sail over the one undivided ocean² completely devoid of light but illuminated with the effulgence of sages (to guide you).

36. While the boat will toss hither and thither by strong gales, I shall be near you. You moor it fast to my horn with a big serpent (Vāsuki, as a rope).

37. Oh King! While the night of god Brahmā lasts, I shall move (through the ocean) dragging the ship with you and the sages on board.

38. In reply to your well-reasoned questions, you will find revealed in your heart, through my Grace, my real greatness, which is designated as Supreme Brahman?.

39. Having instructed the King in this way, Lord Hari disappeared. Satyavrata waited for the period about which Lord Viṣṇu forewarned him.

¹ In the Bible story of the Flood or Deluge, God gave Noah exact instructions for building the Ark (Genisis 6.14-16). God led Noah and his family as well as pairs of animals into the Ark and shut the door of the Ark (Genisis 7.16). In MBH Vana 187.31 the king is asked to build a strong ship.

² Ekārṇava—The original ocean of infinite waters, the source of cosmic creation. In Bh. P. supra 3.8.29, it is called yugānta-kona. In Har. the terms Mahārṇava, Ekārṇava, Agādha, Stabdha Salīla are
40. Spreading the darbha grass with their points towards the east, the royal sage sat with his face to the North-East meditating over the feet of Lord Hari in the fish-form.

41. Then the ocean was seen overflowing its boundaries and inundating the earth on all sides, and seemed to be increasing in volume by the heavy downpour from great clouds.

42. While musing over the command of the Lord, he saw the arrival of a boat. Taking with him all the plants and herbs, he boarded the ship along with the prominent Brāhmaṇa sages.

43. Being pleased with him, the sages advised him: "Oh King! Meditate upon Lord Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa). He will be our saviour from this calamity, and bring about our happiness."

44. Thereupon when the Lord was contemplated upon by the King (as per advice of the sages), there appeared in that vast ocean, a golden fish with one horn and body one hundred thousand yojanas in dimensions.

45. Having moored the ship to the horn of that fish with the serpent (-King Vāsuki) as the rope, as per previous instructions of Lord Hari, the King felt highly delighted, and praised Lord Viṣṇu (The slayer of the demon Madhu) as follows:

_The King said:_

46.* Your Lordship is our highest preceptor¹ Who confer on us Liberation from Samsāra—we, whose² knowledge

⁰SR. shows that this is not only not the Final Deluge (mahā- pralaya), but not even a periodic one. But just as sage Mārkandeya was shown the scene of Deluge in this very (Vaivasvata) Manvantara, King Satyavrata was shown the Deluge with a view to initiate him in the spiritual knowledge. BP, however, controverts this and basing himself on Laghu-Bhāgavata subscribes to the theory of two fish-incarnations just as there had been two boar-incarnations.

adastro piśācārṣaḥ abhavati kalpe tvaṁ varāhanā deva samhāraṁ ghnānādā nāma smṛtiḥ /

He further quotes Pradyumna for support. The main objection of SR i.e. the impossibility of a real Deluge within seven days, without any famine etc., is not met by the critics of SR.

1. Parama guruḥ bhavān: The seven sages were Satyavrata's preceptors and the Lord was the preceptor of these sages. Hence the Lord is the "Grand-sire" (preceptor) of Satyavrata—VC.

2. antāyāvaliṇī, samvadāḥ: whose knowledge about the supreme soul and soul as they are, is obscured by our date-less ignorance whereby we wrongly identify the body with the soul—VR. By 'ātma-sāmkhyā' VJ, understands 'the knowledge of the Supreme Soul' JG. interprets 'ātman' as the Lord's Deluding Potency (Māyā).
about the soul is screened (and hence obscured) by Nescience (avidyā) which is beginningless, are subjected to suffer the three types of afflictions in this Samsāra rooted in that very Nescience. It is through your Grace that we take shelter in You¹ and attain to realize You.

47. This category of beings (subject to the cycle of births and deaths) is ignorant (as he identified body with the soul) and is fettered with (and hence subject to the fruits of) his actions. With the desire of enjoying pleasures (derivable from objects of senses), he performs acts with great pains. By adoring you the wrong notion (consisting of the identity of the body and the soul or ‘in doing Karma’) is shaken off. May he, being our preceptor, cut off the knot of false notion (or attachment) in our heart.

48. May that Imperishable Supreme Ruler (of the Universe), our preceptor’s preceptor be our preceptor, by serving (adoring) whom, a person (desirous of Liberation from Samsāra) purges the tāmasic dirt from himself and regains its original (blissful) character just as a lump of gold or silver becomes purified of the dross, by being blown into the fire and recovers its original colour and nature.

49. I seek asylum in that Supreme Lord (whose Grace is so unlimited that) not even one out of ten thousand parts of his Grace, the gods, preceptors and all people combined together can, by themselves, show to a person (their devotee).

50. Just as a sightless person is called upon to lead the blind, a spiritually unenlightened person is made the preceptor of ignorant people. Like the light of the sun, you are self-illuminating and providing light to all our senses or are (capable of direct perception). Hence, we have sought you as a preceptor and guide, with the desire of knowing our way and destination.

51. A (spiritually ignorant) person imparts wrong instructions to another person (leading to wealth and gratification of lust) whereby the follower is sure to land in the insuperable darkness (in the form of Samsāra). You, however, impart eternal unfailing knowledge (of the soul) in the light of which, a person can easily and definitely attain to his (spiritual) goal.

¹. yadreçhayèkapastā : To whom people attain to after resorting to and through spiritual preceptors.—VR. VR. insists that it is through God’s Grace that one comes in contact with spiritual preceptors. But VJ thinks that the very birth in the human species is due to His Grace secured by meritorious acts in the previous births.

52. To all the people in the world, you (alone) are certainly a friendly well-wisher, the beloved Supreme Ruler, the very soul, the preceptor, the spiritual wisdom itself and the goal to be realized. But people of 'blind' intellect and understanding, who are deeply rooted in worldly desires, cannot see you even though you exist in their very heart.

53. For the sake of spiritual awakening and guidance, I resort to you, the Almighty Ruler, adorable even to gods and worthy of being sought by all. Oh Lord! Cut asunder the knots (of egotism, ignorance etc.) in my heart, with your words shedding light on the (spiritual) truth and reveal unto me your own self.

Śrī Śuka said :

54. To the king who was praying thus, the glorious Lord, the ancient-most person who was sporting in the ocean in the form of a fish, imparted the highest truth.

55. He revealed to the royal sage Satyavrata the divine compilation of Purāṇa¹ (known as the Matsya Purāṇa) dealing with the Sāṅkhya system of Philosophy, and the science and practice of Yoga, and also instructed him in the secret lore about the soul.

56. Seated on board the ship along with the sages, the king listened to the discourse on the real nature of the soul and the Eternal Brahman so expounded to them by the glorious Lord as to leave no (shadow of) doubt about it.

¹. The Matsya p., in its preamble, (ch. 2.22-24) makes Manu ask the Fish all the topics covered in a purāṇa e.g.

utpattim pralayaḥ caiva vamśān manvantarāni ca /
vamśiyānu-caritaḥ caiva bhuvānasya ca vistaram //

But MBH Vana 187 is silent on this point. The word matsya- purāṇa etc. in 187.57 means 'the episode of Fish incarnation' narrated in MBH.-
57. To god Brahmā who was awakened after the end of the Pralaya (Deluge), Lord Hari restored the Vedas after killing the demon Hayagrīva.

58. That King Satyavrata who was thus blessed with discriminating knowledge and spiritual wisdom, has become Vaivasvata Manu in this Kalpa, through the Grace of Viṣṇu.

59. He who listens to the great story consisting of the dialogue between the royal sage Satyavrata and Viṣṇu who, through his Māyā, assumed the form of a horned fish, stands absolved of all sins.

60. A person who, every day, extols this incarnation of Lord Hari, finds that all his desires are accomplished here, and he attains to the Final Beatitude (hereafter).

61. I do bow unto the Lord who is the cause of everything and who disguised himself as a fish\(^1\) in the cosmic waters of the Deluge, and killing the demon (Hayagrīva), restored to Brahmā the corpus of the Śruti texts which were stolen away from his mouths (by Hayagrīva) when his (Brahmā's) powers became dormant in sleep and who imparted the knowledge of Brahma to Satyavrata and the seven sages.\(^2\)

---

1. GS. on the authority of VC. states that this fish of a curved body is called ṅaṅi in common parlance.

2. Curiously enough as a phala-śrutī of this skandha, VD quotes a purānic story of a king Viṣṇujit who was absolved of the sin of killing a Brahmaṇa by listening to the VIII Skandha of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa.
SKANDHA NINTH

CHAPTER ONE

The story of King Sudyumna

The King (Parikṣit) requested:

1. All the Manu-epochs (Manvantaras) described by you and the (account of) glorious heroic feats of Lord Hari of infinite prowess and energy, achieved during those epochs as narrated by you, have been heard by me.

2-3. I learnt from you that he who, at the end of the last Kalpa, was the royal sage named Satyavrata, the King of Dravidas (or Draviḍa country), attained spiritual knowledge by worshipping the Supreme Person, has verily become a Manu (Śrāddhadeva), the Son of Vivasvat; I have also heard from you the (history of) his sons, the kings, of whom Ikṣvāku was prominent.

4. Be pleased to describe to us in details, Oh Brahman, the history of the race and the deeds of those belonging to that line, separately, as we are ever eager to listen to them, Oh highly blessed sage.

5. Kindly relate unto us the heroic exploits of all those kings of hallowed (or sanctifying) renown who belonged to the past, who will rule in future and who belong to the present age.

Sūta said:

6. When accosted in these words by king Parikṣit, in the assembly of the exponents of Vedas and Brahman, venerable Śuka, the expert in the highest form dharma\(^1\) proceeded to narrate in details.

---

1. This dharma is ‘the extolling the excellences of the Lord’ according to VR, while ‘Protection of the subjects is the dharma of crowned kings’ (Vṛ).
Śri Śuka said:

7. Oh chastiser of enemies! Listen to the main events in the history of the race of Manu (in brief), for it will not be possible to describe it in details for centuries together.

8. At the end of the Kalpa, there was only the Supreme Person, who is the Soul of all beings high and low. There was neither universe nor anything else.

9. From his navel sprouted forth the calyx of a gold lotus wherein was born the self-created four-faced god Brahmā, Oh mighty king.

10. From his mind was born Marīci and from Marīci was born Kaśyapa. From Kaśyapa and his wife Aditi, the daughter of Dakṣa (Prajāpati) was born a son called Vivasvat.

11. From Vivasvat and his wife Śāmjñā was born Śraddha-deva, the Manu and through his wife Śraddhā, the self-controlled eminent Śraddhadeva begot the (following) ten sons:

13. It is reported that in the beginning, when Manu was childless, the worshipful and (spiritually) powerful Vasiṣṭha performed a sacrifice, in honour of Mitra and Varuṇa.

14. In that sacrifice, Śraddhā, the wife of Manu who was observing the payo-vrata vow, approached the Hotṛ-priest, paid obeisance to him and begged for the birth of a daughter.

15. The Hotṛ (the reciter of Vedic mantras in a sacrifice) who was directed by the Adhvaryu (the officiating head sacrificial priest), was brooding over the request of Śraddhā. The Brāhmaṇa (contemplating over her request) with full concentration of mind, offered oblations while uttering the mystic word—Vasāt (and propitiated the fire).

16. As a consequence of the dereliction of duty on the part of the Hotṛ (the reciter of mantras), a daughter named Ilā was born. Not being much delighted at the sight of the daughter (when the sacrifice was performed for the birth of a son), Manu addressed the preceptor (as follows):

17. "Worshipful Sir, what is this that the act (of sacrifice) performed by the expert exponents of Vedas has led to the contrary result? Ah! What a pity! There should not have been such a reversal (in the fruit) of Vedic Mantras.

18. You are experts in the knowledge and sacrificial application of the Mantras and are self-disciplined. You have burnt down all your sins by your austerities. What is the cause of the failure of this expectation. This is as impossible as falsehood in the case of gods. (Just as what gods think or say turns out to be true, your will power should have similarly prevailed)."

19. Hearing this (complaining) speech (of Manu), the worshipful great-grandfather Vasistha came to know the transgression committed by the reciter of mantras (Hotr) and replied to Vaivasvata Manu (the son of the Sun, Vivasvat).

20. "This frustration of your expectation is due to the dereliction of duty on the part of the Hotr. Yet by virtue of my spiritual power, I shall accomplish your object of having a good son".

21. The adorable Vasistha of great renown, determined thus and with the desire of securing manhood to Ilæ prayed Lord Visnu, The Eternal Person.

22. The glorious Lord Hari, The Ruler (of the universe), being pleased with Vasistha, conferred on him the boon sought for (by him). In virtue of that boon, Ilæ became Sudyumna, the foremost among men.

23. On one occasion, riding a horse of Sindhu breed, and accompanied by a few ministers, he went on a hunting expedition in a forest, Oh great king.

24. Clad in an armour and arming himself with a beautiful bow and extremely wonderful arrows, the hero went to the northern direction, in pursuit of the game (a deer).

25. It is reported that the prince entered a forest on the foothills of mount Meru, where the glorious Lord Siva sports amorously with his Spouse Uma.

1. It should have been grand-father’s grand-father as can be seen from the following genealogy of Suka from Vasistha:

Vasistha—Sakti—Parasara—Vyasa—Suka but if pra-pitamaha is to be defended (as VD does it) by saying that the father and the son are to be regarded as one as per the Sutri text Samaiva patandma’ri, the chain of identity will reach to Suka also.
26. Hardly did Sudyumna, that vanquisher of inimical warriors, enter the forest, when he found himself transformed into a woman and the horse into a mare, Oh king.

27. Noticing a change of sex in themselves, all his followers became dejected at heart and began to stare at each other.

King Pariksit asked:

28. Oh venerable Sir! How is it that the region came to acquire such power? Who made it so? Be pleased to answer this query, as our curiosity has become intense.

Sri Suka said:

29. On one occasion, sages, who were strict observers of sacred vows, came to that region (Ilavrta) to pay visit to god Siva, the lord of mount Kailasa, dispelling darkness from all quarters (with their spiritual lustre).

30. Having seen them, goddess Parvati, who was then ungarmented, got extremely abashed, and quickly getting up from her consort's lap, put on her raiments immediately.

31. Noting the union of the divine couple in amorous enjoyment, the sages instantly turned back and proceeded to the hermitage of Nara and Narayana.

32. Then, with a desire to satisfy his divine beloved, the glorious god Siva announced: 'Whoever enters this region, shall (automatically and instantly) turn into a veritable woman.

33. Hence all males avoid going to that forest since then. She (Sudyumna, now a woman Ilà) went on wandering from one forest to another, accompanied by her retinue.

34. Now beholding that excellent young woman surrounded by ladies, (leisurely) wandering on the precincts of his hermitage, god Budha (the presiding deity of the planet Mercury) conceived an amorous passion for her.

35. That lady with beautiful eyebrows, in her turn, reciprocated his love and sought him, the son of King Soma, as her husband. He begot on her a son named Pururavas.

36. We hear it reported that King Sudyumna of Manu's race who was thus transformed into a woman, happened to remember Vasiṣṭha, his family preceptor.

37. (As soon as he was thus remembered, Vasiṣṭha appeared on the scene). Seeing that sad plight of Sudyumna, Vasiṣṭha was overwhelmed with compassion. Being deeply moved, and wishing to restore the manhood of Sudyumna, he approached (appealed to) god Śaṅkara.

38. Being pleased with Vasiṣṭha and with a view to grant his prayer as well as to retain the veracity of his own utterance, the glorious god Śiva spoke as follows, Oh King.

39. 'Sudyumna who is born of your race, shall be a man for one month and a woman for another month alternately. May he protect the earth at his will, under this arrangement'\(^1\).

40. Having accomplished his desire of restoration to manhood through the grace of his preceptor, he ruled over the earth under the above-mentioned arrangement. But his subjects did not approve of it.

41. He got three sons, Utkala, Gaya and Vimala. They became righteous rulers of the Deccan (the southern region including Mahārāṣṭra).

42. With the ripeness of the age, King Sudyumna, the ruler over pratiṣṭhāna\(^2\) handed over (the kingdom of) the earth to (his son) Purūravas, and went to forest (for performance of penance).

---

1. The story is briefly mentioned in MBH. Ādi 75.16, Anu 147. 26, Liṅga P. 1.65.

2. Most probably Jhūst opposite to Allahabad across the Gaṅgā. Mentioned in MBH Vana. 85.76. According to Liṅga P.I.65 the kingdom of Ikyvāku was divided among Sudyumna’s sons, while according to Vasiṣṭha’s advice, the son of Ilā (the female transformation of Sudyumna) Purūravas, was given Pratiṣṭhānapura as he had no hereditary rights on the kingdom of Ikyvāku. But Bh. P. 9.2.2 shows that Ikyvāku was born, when Sudyumna left for the forest.

D.P. Mishra’s conjectural identification of this Pratiṣṭhāna with ‘Ortospāna’ (near Kabul—‘nearer Bactria, the home province of Purūravas’) of Greek writers deserves consideration. Vide studies—Proto. Hist. of Ind. pp. 116-17.
CHAPTER TWO

History of Karuṣa and other four sons of Manu

Śrī Sūka said:

1. When his son Sudyumna thus left (for the forest), Manu, the son of Vivasvat, being desirous of begetting a son performed penance for a hundred years, on the bank of the Yamunā.

2. Thereafter he worshipped Lord Hari (by performing a sacrifice) for (male) progeny; and he had ten sons, Ikṣvāku being the eldest, all resembling himself.

3. Manu’s (eighth) son, Prśadhra, was entrusted with the duty of protecting the cows, by his preceptor (as Vasiṣṭha found him competent to tend the bulls). Vigilantly he tended the cows at night, remaining alert in the posture called Virāsana (kneeling on one knee).

4. On one occasion, while it was raining at night, a tiger made its way into the cowpen. Cows which were lying there, got panicky and springing to their feet, ran about in that enclosure.

5-6. The powerful tiger seized one of the cows, and she, overwhelmed with fear, screamed loudly. It is reported that when Prśadhra heard that screaming in agony, he rushed in haste in that direction, with a sword in hand. In the darkness of night, when even stars were invisible due to clouds, he unwittingly chopped off the head of a tawny coloured cow, believing it to be a tiger.

7. The tiger too got its ear severed with the end of the sword in that stroke, but escaped in extreme panic, dripping blood all the way.

8. Prśadhra, the destroyer of inimical warriors, who believed that the tiger had been killed, found, at the close of night, to his sore grief, that a reddish-brown cow had been killed by him, in the (darkness of) night.

9. To Prśadhra who has unknowingly committed the sin of killing a cow, Vasiṣṭha, the family preceptor (instead of charging him the expiatory rite or procedure for such unwitting acts) pronounced the following imprecation: “In consequence of this (thoughtless) act, you shall be not even the vilest of Kṣatriyas but a veritable Śūdra.”

10. When cursed in this way by the family preceptor, the great warrior accepted it (respectfully) with folded palms. He observed the vow of life-long celibacy—a vow so esteemed by sages.

11. Being exclusively and absolutely devoted to the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the absolutely pure (blemishless), transcendental, universal Spirit, he became a friend and a well-wisher of all beings, impartial to all.

12-13. Completely devoid of attachment, with a serene mind, and with all senses under full control, bereft of all possessions, maintaining himself on whatever came to him by chance (without asking for it), fixing his mind in the Supreme Soul, satiated in spiritual knowledge¹, and absorbed in meditation, he roamed about the earth, presenting an appearance of a blind and deaf dunce.

14. Leading this way of life, he happened to enter a forest where, seeing the outbreak of forest-conflagration, he silently allowed his body to be consumed by it and became one with the transcendental Brahman.

15. And the younger son Kavi² (even as a child) had no desire for worldly objects. Renouncing the kingdom along with the relatives, he enthroned the self-effulgent Supreme Person in his heart and repairing to the forest, even in his boyhood, ultimately attained to the Supreme Brahman.

16. From Karuṣa, the son of Manu, was descended the Kṣatriya clan called Kāruṣas who ruled over the northern regions, were friendly to Brāhmaṇas and devoted to righteousness.

17. The Kṣatriya clan called Dhārṣṭa was born from Dhṛṣṭa but attained Brāhmaṇahood (Brahmanical virtues and way of life) on the earth. In the race of Nṛga, Nṛga had a son Sumati whose son was Bhūtajyoti to whom was born a son, Vasu.

¹ v.1. jhāna-hṛṣṭa—Delighted in spiritual knowledge.
² VJ. takes Kavi ‘wise’ as the adj. qualifying Pṛṣadhra and treats this verse as a further elucidation of the above (12-13) verses. (akṣomeva viṣṇupati).
18. Vasu had a son Pratika whose son Oghavān was the father of a son called Oghavat and a daughter named Oghavati whom Sudarśana married.

19. Citrasena who was born from Nariṣyanta had a son called Dakṣa. Dakṣa's son was Miñḍhvān of whom was born Kūrca who had a son called Indrasena.

20. Indrasena's son was Vitihotra who got a son named Satyaśravas who, on his part, had Uruśravas as his son. Devadatta was born from Uruśravas.

21. The venerable fire-god Agni himself was born as a son of Uruśravas, and was called Agnivesya. He became famous as a great sage Kānina or Jātukarṇya.

22. From Agnivesya descended a Brāhmaṇa clan known as Agnivesyāyana, Oh king. The race of Nariṣyanta has been thus described in details. Now listen to the line of Diṣṭa.

23. Nābhāga, another son of Diṣṭa (different from the one to be described later) became a Vaiṣya by following the profession (agriculture, cow-tending etc.) of that class. His son was Bhalandana whose son was Vatsapriti.

24. Prāṃśu was the son of Vatsapriti. Prāṃśu's son is well known as Pramati; whose son was Khanitra, Khanitra's son was Cākṣuṣa, the father of Vivimśati.

25. Rambha was the son of Vivimśati. Rambha's son was the religious Khaninetrā, and Karandhama was Khaninetrā's son, Oh great king.

26. His son was Avikṣit. His son Marutta became a sovereign of the whole of the globe of the earth—the same sovereign for whom the great yogin, Saṁvartta, the son of sage Aṅgiras, performed sacrifices.

27. Nobody else has ever performed a sacrifice so gloriously as did Marutta. All the utensils therein were of pure gold, and whatever other materials were used in his sacrifice, were auspicious and beautiful.

28. Indra (drank so much Soma in that sacrifice that he) became inebriated and Brāhmaṇas were oversatisfied with the gifts (dakṣiṇa). Maruta-gods served food (in that sacrifice), and

---
1. Vide infra ch. 4.
2. VR. reads 'Śvamitra'.
3. VR. reads 'Dambha'.
the whole fraternity of gods (Viśvedevāḥ) were the members of the sacrificial assembly.¹

29. Marutta had a son called Dama whose son was Rājayavardhana; his son was Sudhṛti and Nara was born as a son of Sudhṛti.

30. His son was Kevala whose son was Bandhumān of whom was born Vegavān. Bandhu was his (Vegavān's) son. Of Bandhu was born the king of the earth Trṇabindu.

31. Being an abode of praiseworthy qualities, a prominent heavenly damsel Alambuṣā resorted to him (as his wife), and bore him a number of sons and a daughter known as Iḍavidā (v. 1. Ilavilā).

32. The sage Viṣravas begot on her a son known as Kubera (the donor of wealth). From his father who was a master of yogas, Kubera received the Supreme Lore (about the soul).

33. The sons of this king were Viśāla, Śūnyabandhu, and Dhūmraketu. Viśāla was the founder of a dynasty and built the city of Vaiśāli.

34. His (Viśāla's) son was Hemacandra, whose son was Dhūmrākṣa. From his son Samyama were born Kṛśāśva and Devaja².

35. From Kṛśāśva was born Somadatta who, by performing horse-sacrifices, worshipped the Supreme Person, the presiding deity of sacrifices³ and attained to the foremost (highest) goal through the support of the master of yoga.

---

¹ This is nothing but an echo of:
marutaḥ pariṃśāro maruttasyāvasan grhe /
āvikṣitasya kāma-prer viśvedvāḥ sabhāsada iti //

The same is repeated in MBH Droṇa 55.43-44.

² But according to VR & VJ, Dhūmrākṣa's son was Sahadeva and Kṛśāśva was Sahadeva's son.

³ Īdāspati (1) The Supreme Person to be propitiated by performing Īdā Homa—VR.

(2) Overlord of the earth (Īdā)—VR.

(3) The Lord who gives us food—VJ.

(4) The Lord bestower of the Power of speech—VJ.
36. Somadatta's son was Sumati, whose son was Janamejaya. These rulers of the kingdom of Vaiśāli held up the glory (glorious tradition of Tṛṇabindu).

CHAPTER THREE

The story of Cyavana and Sukanyā

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. It is reported that Manu's son, king Śaryāti was the master of the Vedic lore and it was he who, in the sacrificial session of the Aṅgiras, authoritatively explained the procedure of the ritualistic course of the second day (of that session).

2. He had a daughter Sukanyā by name, whose eyes were beautiful like lotuses. Accompanied by her, he went to the hermitage of the sage Cyavana.¹

3. Surrounded by her maids (of honour), she was leisurely wandering in the forest enjoying the sight of beautiful trees, when she happened to notice a pair of glow-worm-like luminous objects, in the hole of an ant-hill.

4. Impelled by her fate, she, in her childish innocence, perforated the pair of shining objects with a thorn, and blood flowed profusely out of them.

5. That very moment instantly, there was obstruction in the lower passage of his soldiers (stoppage of the excretion and urination). Observing that, the royal sage was astonished and enquired of his men.

¹ A sage of Bhṛgu Clan. MBH. Vana chs 122, 123 & 124 give how he was blinded by Sukanyā and was pacified when Sukanyā married him, and how at his request the celestial physicians Aśvinikumāras rejuvenated him in consideration of a share in Soma-drinking, and how he petrified Indra's arm when in protest against Aśvinikumāra's share in Soma, Indra attacked with his Vajra. The story is repeated in the Devī Bhāgavata Skandha VII. Chs.2-7. In that story Sukanyā deliberately perforates the eyes of Cyavana in spite of his warning. A number of verses are common to MBH. Vasa, the Bh.P. and the Devī Bhāgavata, possibly all borrowing from a common source which supplied the story background for RV.1.116 (A hymn to AŚVINS).

6. ‘Has any of you given offence or done wrong to Cyavana, the descendant of the Bhrugas. Obviously, someone of us must have profaned his hermitage’.

7. Being terrified, Sukanyā confessed to her father. “Something has been done by me in ignorance, inasmuch as a pair of glittering objects were unknowingly pierced by me”.

8. Hearing the words of his daughter, Śaryāti was seized with fear. He slowly tried to appease the sage, lying hidden in the ant-hill.

9. Having ascertained the desire of the sage, the king gave (in marriage) his daughter to the sage. Having thus extricated himself from the scrape, and taking his leave (of the sage), he proceeded to his capital cautiously.

10. Having obtained the extremely wrathful Cyavana as her husband, Sukanyā who (studied and) understood his mental proclivities, won him over by meticulously careful obedience.

11. After a lapse of some time after this, the twingods Aśvinikumāras visited his hermitage. Worshipping them (with due formalities as guests), he earnestly requested, “Oh ye celestial physicians! Be pleased to restore to me my youth.

12. Even though you are not eligible to share the Soma-juice, I shall bear you both gobletfuls of Soma in the Soma sacrifice. Be pleased to bestow on me that youthfulness and beauty, covetable to young damsels.”

13. “Assuredly” approved the foremost of physicians rejoicing at his offer. “May your worship be pleased to plunge in this pool created by Siddhas.”

14. With these words, Cyavana, whose body was stricken with old age and was all over covered with protuberant veins, and appeared repulsive due to his wrinkles and grey hairs, was made to enter the pool by the pair of Aśvin gods.

15. There emerged three men (from that pool)—all bewitchingly beautiful, captivating to women, adorned with lotus-garlands and ear-rings, clad in rich garments, resembling each other in form.
16. Finding them all resembling each other in form, resplendent like the sun, the chaste lady Sukanyā, being unable to distinguish as to who her husband was, sought refuge with Aśvinikumāras (to help her in knowing the husband, by standing apart).

17. Being pleased with her fidelity to her husband, the Aśvinikumāras pointed out her husband. Taking leave of the sage, they left for the celestial region, in their heavenly car.

18. One day, king Śaryāti, intending to perform a sacrifice, went to the hermitage of Cyavana, and found a man glorious like the Sun, by the side of his daughter.

19. When the daughter bowed down to him (to pay respect), the king was not much pleased in his mind about her, and instead of giving the usual benedictions, censured her.

20. “What have you intended to do? Your husband, a sage respectfully saluted by all the world, is deceived by you, inasmuch as abandoning the aged husband falsely approved by you, you have resorted to a way-farer as your paramour, you unchaste woman!

21. How is it that your mentality stooped to such low wickedness? Otherwise, you are born in a noble family of righteous persons, and this is a vile stigma on the family. You have lost your sense of shame and are harbouring a paramour, hurling thereby the families of your father and husband into the dark depth of hell.”

22. To her father who was thus indicting her, Sukanyā, of pure gentle smiles, replied slightly laughing, “Father! This is your son-in-law Cyavana, the delight (or descendant) of Brgru”.

23. Then she reported to her father how he (Cyavana) came to regain his youth and beautiful looks. Full of astonishment and being extremely pleased with her, he embraced his daughter.

24. Cyavana made the heroic king Śaryāti to perform a Soma sacrifice, in which by dint of his personal ascetic powers, he bore a cup of Soma to the pair of Aśvinikumāras, even though they were not entitled for a share in Soma till then.
25. The irascible Indra was instantly enraged and raised his Vajra (thunderbolt) to kill him. But Cyavana, a descendant of Bhrgus, petrified Indra’s arm along with the Vajra.

26. Thenceforth, all of them (gods) agreed to give a share in Soma juice to Áśvinikumāras who, being physicians, were previously excluded from the oblations of Soma to them.

27. Śaryāti had three sons—Uttāna-barhis, Ānarta and Bhūrīśeṇa. Revata was born of Ānarta.

28. Building a city called Kuśasthali, in the middle of the sea, he occupied it and ruled over the country called Ānarta (and adjoining territories), Oh subduer of enemies.

29-30. One hundred excellent sons, of whom Kakudmin was the eldest, were born to him. Taking with him his daughter Revatī, Kakudmī went to god Brahmā for consulting him for a suitable husband to his daughter. The region of Brahmā was then open. As a musical concert of Gandharvas was going on, he did not get opportunity (to speak to god Brahmā) and waited for a moment.

31. After the conclusion of the musical programme, he bowed down to god Brahmā (the first created god), and told the object of his visit. Hearing that, god Brahmā laughed loudly and said.

32. “Oh King! Suitors that you had in your mind, have already been swallowed up by Time long ago. We do not even hear of their sons, grandsons, great-grandsons. Nay, not even their gotras (races).

33-35. The time calculated as thrice nine (i.e. twenty-seven) revolutions of the group of four yogas has now elapsed. Therefore, now you go back and offer this jewel of a daughter to the extremely mighty Baladeva, the ray of the God of gods, and a jewel among men. The glorious Lord, the creator of all beings, the chanting and hearing of whose name is meritorious, has incarnated on the earth by his own amṛta (ray) for lightening the burden of the earth”. When thus commanded, he bowed down to the unborn god Brahmā, and returned to his capital which was already abandoned by his brothers, out of fear of yaksas, who were scattered all over the quarters (different parts of the earth).
36. Having given in marriage his extremely beautiful daughter to the mighty Balarāma, the king repaired to the hermitage of Nārāyaṇa, known Badari, to perform austerities.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Account of Nābhāga and Ambariṣa

Śrī Suka continued:

1. Nābhāga was the son of Nabhaga. He was the youngest (of the brothers), the most learned and wise, and had spent (an unduly) long time as a celibate (in his teacher’s hermitage). When he returned (from the hermitage of the preceptor and demanded his share of the ancestral property), they gave him their father (a commitment of father’s maintenance) as his share of hereditary property, (as they have shared among themselves the whole of their father’s estate presuming that Nābhāga would remain life-long celibate, and never return).

2. “Brothers! What have you allotted as my share (in the ancestral property)?” (Nābhāga asked). (We forgot you then or Hearing of your renunciation, no share was set aside in the division of the property). ‘Now, however, we give father (maintenance of father) as your share”¹ (replied the brothers). (Nābhāga went to his father and told him), “My elder brothers have allotted you as my share in the family property, dear father”. The father told, “Do not place any faith in their words, Oh child”² (I am not a property to be enjoyed, but am a life-long commitment for maintenance).

¹ “Let us go to father. If father asks us to give you a share, we shall”—VR.
² VJ reads: bhajāna pitarām: ‘If you want a share, go to your father, propitiate him and ask for your share. We also shall come and ask him’.

2. Do not entertain any desire for a share in the family property
—VR. VJ.
3. (But for your maintenance, I advise). These (neighbouring) intelligent descendants of the Aṅgiras family are now engaged in a sacrificial session (of a long duration). But on every sixth day, they get confounded about the exact procedure ordained for the sacrifice, Oh learned son.

4-5. You teach those noble-minded (great-souled) Brāhmaṇas the two hymns (sūktas) celebrating the Viśvedevaś. When (after completion of the sacrifice), they will ascend to heaven, they will bestow upon you all their wealth that remains unspent after the sacrificial session. Hence you approach them (the Aṅgiras). He abided by his father’s advice. They donated to him all the wealth that remained after the sacrificial session and went to heaven.

6. While he was about to accept that wealth, a certain man, of black complexion (Rudra), came from the north and claimed, “All this wealth in the premises of this house is mine”.

7. Then replied the descendant of Manu, “This is mine inasmuch as it is given to me by the sages (who performed the sacrifice)”. “Let this question (dispute) between us be referred to your father.” Accordingly Nābhāga asked his father.

8. (His father replied), “On a certain occasion, sages have offered all that remains in the sacrificial hall as Rudra’s share. The god deserves (has a rightful claim on) the whole of that wealth.”

9. (On return) Nābhāga bowed to him (Rudra) and reported, “Oh Lord! My father said that all this is your property. Oh Brahman! I propitiate you by bowing (apologizing with) my head low respectfully.

10. Rudra said, “Since what was spoken by your father was according to (the canons of) religion and you too speak the truth, I shall impart to you, the seer of Vedic mantras, spiritual knowledge about the Eternal Brahman.

10A. One should never, even under duress, speak the untruth. Nor should one covet another man’s property. I

1. The Sūktas are:
(1) idam itthā raudraḥ gṛtavācaḥ — RV.10.61.1
(2) ye yājñena daśṭidhāyā samaktāḥ — RV.10.62.1

2. Vide Sūtra Bh.P. 4.6.53. ŚR supports this by the Śruti text: ucchyasat-bhāgo vai rudrāḥ.
I am extremely pleased with truthfulness and a truthful person is liked (desired) by me.

11. Please accept this wealth, the remainder of my sacrifice, which is granted to you". Saying this the glorious Lord Rudra, who is kind to the truthful, disappeared.

12. He who remembers this sacred story with full concentration, both in the morning and in the evening, becomes blessed with spiritual wisdom, well-versed in the Vedic mantras, and attains his good (Liberation from Samsāra) or the true knowledge of Ātman as it is.

13. From Nābhāga was born Ambariṣa who was an eminent devotee of Lord Viṣṇu and had realized fully the Brahman. He was so virtuous that even the imprecation of the Brāhmaṇa Durvāsas which was never ineffective before, could not touch him.

The King (Parīśat) asked:

14. Worshipful Sir! I am eager to hear the story of that intelligent royal sage against whom the Brāhmaṇa’s curse (in the form of the destructive female deity) which is irresistible, could not prevail.

Śrī Suka said:

15-16. The highly fortunate Ambariṣa inherited the earth with all its seven continents, inexhaustible fund of wealth, and incomparable power and glory in this world—all of which is extremely difficult for men to attain. But he regarded all this as unreal as a dream. He understood correctly the perishability of wealth, and that it ultimately leads man to darkness (of hell).

17. He attained to such a supreme devotion to the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, and so much friendly affection toward his pious devotees, as to regard this universe as a clod of earth—(what to speak of his kingdom?)

18. He engaged his mind (in meditating) on the lotus-like feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa, his speech in singing of the excellences of Lord Viṣṇu (Vaikuṇṭha), his hands in services e.g. cleansing

1. As ŚR. points out this story of Nābhāga is based on a legend of the same person recorded in the Bahūre Brāhmaṇa.
the temple of Hari and such other duties, and his ears (sense of hearing) in listening to excellent stories of the Imperishable Lord.

19. He employed his eyes (faculty of seeing) in beholding the images and shrines of god Viṣṇu (Mukunda), his tactile sense in embracing the persons of the servants of gods, his olfactory sense in smelling the fragrance of the Tulasi leaves dedicated to his feet, and his tongue (sense of taste) to what is offered to the Lord.

20. He used his feet in walking to the holy places hallowed with Lord Hari's feet, his head to bow down to the feet of god Viṣṇu (Hṛṣikeśa), his own desire in the humble services of the Lord, and not for the fulfilment of his worldly desires—All he did for enhancing his fondness or devotion to those who have resorted to the Lord of excellent renown.

21. In this way, he dedicated all his acts and round of duties to the glorious Lord Viṣṇu, the Supreme Ruler who bestows the fruits of the performance of sacrifices, every day. Placing his faith in the presence of the Lord in all beings (or beings devoted to Viṣṇu with their heart and soul¹), and according to the advice of those who were devoted to the Lord and Brāhmaṇas (like his family preceptor Vasiṣṭha), he ruled over the earth.

22. He worshipped the Supreme Ruler, the presiding Deity of the Sacrifice, by performing horse-sacrifices in which all the 'limbs' (detailed parts of the sacrifice) were duly conducted and sumptuous sacrificial fees were paid befitting his great affluence. He performed these sacrifices under the guidance of great sages like Vasiṣṭha, Asita and Gautama in a desert place called Dhanva in the opposite direction of the current of the river Sarasvati, (changing the venue of sacrifice along its banks from its mouth towards its source upwards.)

23. In his sacrifices, the sacrificial priests and members of the sacrificial assembly were so richly attired (and adorned), and through wonder or meticulous care in carrying out their

¹ GS, GD quote the ideal devotion of gopts in this context:

"ten-manaskās tadālāpās tad-vīcēyās tadāmikāh!
Mad-gundāneva gīyantiyo nāyāngādṛḍhī susmaruḥ !!"

Bh.P.10.30.44
duties, they forgot to wink and looked like the celestials (in form, dress, ornaments and unwinkingness).

24. The heavenly region which is so dear to immortal gods was not coveted by his men, as (subjects) they constantly listened to and sang the glorious deeds of Lord Viṣṇu of excellent renown.

25. To them (his subjects) who visualized Lord Viṣṇu in their hearts, objects of pleasure which are not easily accessible even to Siddhas (who are endowed with mystic powers), did not fascinate and gladden, as they (objects of pleasure) are (as if) thrown into the shade by the essential blissfulness of self-realization (enjoyed by them).¹

26. In this way the king, by his path of devotion combined with austerities, propitiated Lord Hari by abiding by the ordained course of duties, and gradually dissociated himself from all attachments.

27. He developed the sense of unreality of (and hence did not cherish any attachments to) his palaces, queens, sons, relatives, excellent elephants, chariots, horses, foot-soldiers, his inexhaustible (quantity of) jewels, ornaments, arms etc. and to his unlimited treasures.

28. Being pleased with his unflinching single-minded devotion, Lord Hari assigned to him, for the protection of his servant (devotee) his discus Sudarśana which struck terror in inimical forces.

29. With a desire to propitiate Lord Kṛṣṇa (Viṣṇu), the hero, along with his chief queen of a similar pious disposition, undertook the vow of observing a fast on the Dvādaśī day (viz. twelfth day of the dark and the bright half of every lunar month), for the period of one year.

30. At the close of the observance of the vow, in the month of Kṛṣṭīka, he observed fast for three previous consecutive nights. On one Dvādaśī, he took his bath in the Yamunā and worshipped Lord Hari in the forest-grove of the (demon) Madhu (the site of future Mathurā).

¹ Not that Ambariṣṭa did not desire the objects of sense-pleasure due to their scarcity. They were in abundance as they were impelled and brought about by His essential greatness, though they were difficult for even Siddhas to obtain. He, however, was not enamoured of them as he saw Lord Viṣṇu in his heart—VJ.

31-32. After performing the ablution of Hari according to the procedure laid down for the Mahābhīṣeka (royal coronation type ablution or a bath in which two thousand palas of gold is gifted) along with abundantly rich variety of accessories and ornaments, sandal paste, flowers, offerings and other articles of worship, he adored Lord Viṣṇu with a mind completely absorbed in him, and worshipped highly virtuous Brāhmaṇas even though they had already accomplished their desire.

33-34A. He donated and sent to the houses of pious Brāhmaṇas six hundred million cows of good disposition and attractive appearance, all young and yielding milk in abundance. Their horns were encased in gold and hoofs plated in silver, and all were covered with rich cloth. They were gifted along with their calves and other necessary accessories (such as bells, pots for milking etc).

34B-35. Having first fed Brāhmaṇas with sweet and wholesome dish of excellent quality, and with the permission of those Brāhmaṇas who received their desired objects he (King Ambariṣa) was making preparations of breaking his fast, when there arrived an unexpected guest who was no other than the venerable sage Durvāsas himself.

36. The king received his guest respectfully, by rising from his seat and proffering a respectable seat and other articles of worship, and bowing down to his feet, he requested him to take meals.

1. In the vow known as Ekādaśī-vrata, one has to take no meals at night on the 10th day, to observe complete fast on the 11th day and after breaking fast in the morning of the 12th day, observe fast at night.

2. mahābhāga:

VD, quotes a definition of mahābhāga Brāhmaṇas tapo-vidyā-dayā-yuktā hari-niṣṭhaika-cetasah pratighaṁ-nirūttaṁ ye mahābhāga dvijāṁ smṛtāṁ

‘Those who are engaged in penance, learning and merciful activities and whose minds are solely and unflinchingly devoted to Lord Hari, and who have ceased to accept gifts, are regarded as mahābhāga (highly virtuous) Brāhmaṇas.'
37. Gladly accepting the invitation, he went to perform the prescribed religious duties (of the mid-day). Contemplating over the Supreme Brahman, he plunged in the holy waters of the Yamuna.

38. (As it is necessary to break the fast of ekadasī during the period of dvadasī and) as only half of a muhūrta (twenty-four minutes) remained of the dvadasī day to expire in which one has to conclude the fast, the king, who was conversant with the religious technicalities, consulted the Brāhmaṇas (as to what righteous course be adopted) in that critical condition (involving conflict of duties).

39. (The king placed his dilemma before the Brāhmaṇas): (On the one hand) there is sin in transgressing a Brāhmaṇa (if I take meals before feeding the invited guest), and (on the other hand) it is sinful not to break a fast during the dvadasī period. (Advise me) what course would be conducive to my good, and unrighteousness should not touch me.

40. I shall conclude the observance of the fast by sipping water only. For taking of water has been declared by Brāhmaṇas as breaking the fast but at the same time it is no eating at all."

41. Coming to this conclusion, the royal sage took in some water, and waited for the return of the Brāhmaṇa contemplating in his mind the Imperishable Lord (Viṣṇu) all the while, Oh best of Kurus.

42. After finishing the necessary religious duties (of the midday), sage Durvāsas returned from the bank of the Yamuna. He was greeted by the king. But he knew by his intellectual (intuitional) power, the action of the king (viz. breaking of the fast by drinking water).

43. With his limbs quaking through intense wrath, and with his face crooked with knitting of brows (in anger), and being extremely angry, he expostulated the king who stood with folded palms (respectfully).

44. "Oh! Look at the transgression of the established religious practice committed by this wicked fellow maddened

1. ŚR. quotes Śruti text in support:

apośnīti tannāvāstītam naiñāstītam / with his wealth, who regards himself as God and is devoid of any devotion to Viṣṇu.

45. Having extended an invitation to receive his hospitality to me who came to him as an unexpected guest, he himself took his meals without serving me food. (To the king) I show you forthwith the consequence of your misdeed."

46. Saying these words and extremely flared up with rage, he pulled out a matted hair (from his head), and created out of it a female spirit, (fierce) like the fire at the time of the destruction of the universe (to kill him).

47. Seeing the female evil spirit rushing toward him with a sword in hand, emitting fire, and making the earth quake under her feet (as she advanced), the king did not at all stir from his place.

48. The discus Sudarśana that was previously commissioned for protecting his servant (Ambariṣa) by the Noble-souled Supreme Person, burnt down that evil spirit even as a fire would burn an angry serpent.

49. When Durvāsas saw that all his efforts (against Ambariṣa) became infructuous, and that the discus was advancing towards him, he got frightened and ran in different directions, to save his life.

50. The discus of the Lord closely pursued him even as a forest conflagration with its flames thrown up follows a serpent. Observing it so close behind him, he took to his heels with a desire to enter one of the caves of mount Meru.

51. He fled to different quarters, the sky, the earth, the nether-world, the (seven) seas, to guardian deities of different regions, and to the celestial region. But wheresoever he ran, he saw the Sudarśana of unbearable splendour close on his heels.

52. When he could not find a protector anywhere, he became terrified at heart, and trying to seek asylum, approached god Brahmā appealing to him, "Oh Creator (of the Universe)! Oh self-born god! Protect me from the discus of Hari—the unvanquished god.

Brahmā said:

53. At the close of the divine sport (of the creation etc. of the universe), at the end of the period called dviparārdha
(when Brahmā’s span of life ends), my own sphere, along with the whole of the Universe shall vanish (come to an end), by mere contraction of the brow of god Viṣṇu, the Soul of the Time-Spirit wishing to burn it all.

54. I, god Śiva, Dakṣa, Bhṛgu and others, and prominent Lords of created beings (Prajāpatis), rulers of goblins and of gods—all of us being subject to his Command, bear on our heads (most respectfully), the divine law for the welfare of the world. (Hence our inability to give you asylum).

55. Being thus refused protection by Brahmā, and being scorched by the discus of Lord Viṣṇu Durvāsas approached god Śiva on mount Kailāsa, for seeking asylum.

Śri Rudra said:

56.* We cannot prevail against the Supreme Lord, oh child. In that Supreme Ruler great gods like god Brahmā who comprise the universe in their body, are nothing but ordinary jīvas; there are thousands of other such Brahmāṇḍas which are born as well as dissolved in the course of time. We are just wandering in transmigration in them.

57-58. I, Sanatkumāra, Nārada, the worshipful god Brahmā, Kapila, the sage Apāntaratamas,¹ Devala, Dharma,

*(i) We are not capable of protecting you against the discus of the Lord Who deserves to be sought after by us. In this universe we who regard ourselves as masters of (our) regions, are wandering (like insects). Thousands of such Brahmāṇḍas appear, when He wills to create, and are dissolved, when He wishes to withdraw—VR.
(ii) We are powerless in affording you protection. At the time of creation numerous deities like me are born from Hari, the Perfect Bliss and are no more at the time of the destruction of the Universe. There are crores of other such Brahmāṇḍas which form the bodies of so many Brahmās in which we and unintelligent beings wander in transmigration. May that Supreme Ruler be your Saviour—Not we—VJ.
(iii) Therefore you seek resort in that Lord Viṣṇu—SD.
(iv) tīla—Term of endearment as Durvāsas was a part of ray of god Śiva—GD.

1. A great sage born when god Viṣṇu uttered the word bhāj. He was absolutely free from the inner darkness or ignorance about the soul. Hence his name is also known as Sārvasvata as he was born out of the speech (Sarvasvai) of the Lord.

—MBH, Śantī 349. 38-39.
Āsurī and other leaders of Siddhas who are perfect in wisdom (have seen the other end) of whom Marīci is prominent, all of us are enveloped in Māyā, and we cannot comprehend his Māyā.

59. This is the weapon of the Supreme Ruler of the Universe. It is unbearable and irresistible even to us. You seek refuge in Lord Hari. He will make you happy.

60. Being thus disappointed, Durvāsas went to the region of the Lord called Vaikuṇṭha where Lord Viṣṇu abides along with goddess Śrī.

61. Scorched with the fire emanating from the weapon of the unconquerable Lord, he fell trembling at the feet of Viṣṇu and appealed, “Oh Imperishable, Infinite Lord! You are the goal aspired after by the righteous. Oh Almighty God! You are the protector of the Universe. Oh Protect me who am an offender.

62. Being ignorant of Your Supreme glory, an offence against your dear one has been committed by me. Be pleased to absolve me of that sin, as even a being in hell is released by uttering Your name (what of wiping out this sin?).

_The Lord replied:_

63. Oh Brāhmaṇa! I am completely under the control of my devotees. I am like one who has no self-dependence. My heart is won over and hence is in possession of my righteous devotees, and I am the beloved of them.

64. To my devotees, I am the Supreme goal, (hence) apart from my righteous devotees, I do not covet even my person (myself), or even (my consort) Goddess Śrī¹ who is absolutely faithful to Me.

65. How can I abandon (to their fate) my devotees who have renounced their wives, homes, sons, kith and kin, their very life, property, (their good in) this world and the next, and resorted to me as their protector.

66. These righteous people who have completely dedicated their hearts to me and entertain impartiality of outlook to all, have enthralled me by their devotion, even as good wives do by their devotion to virtuous husbands.

¹—The highest glory of eternal six excellences—VD.
67. So thoroughly satisfied are they in rendering service to me that they do not long for the four types of Liberations such as Salokatā—co-residence with the Lord in his region and others¹ which are easily available by my worship. How can they covet for other positions or things which are subject to ravages of time.

68. Righteous people (are so beloved to me that they as if) constitute my heart. I am (reciprocally so much dear to them that I form) their heart. They do not recognize anything beside me. Nor do I know anything else than them.

69. I shall therefore tell you a remedy. Listen to it, Oh Brāhmaṇa. You should verily approach him (Ambariṣa) on account of whom the act of violence has rebounded against you. The energy discharged against pious people boomerangs against and harms its own author.

70. Asceticism and learning are both for the spiritual good of the Brāhmaṇas but those very powers when mishandled by the indisciplined ones produce the contrary results.

71. Hence, Oh Brāhmaṇa! May good betide you. You go to King Ambariṣa, the son of Nābhāga. Apologize and seek forgiveness of that great king. Then alone you can get peace and relief.

CHAPTER FIVE

Protection of Durvāsas. The story of Ambariṣa Concluded

Śrī Suka said:

1. Being thus commanded by the glorious Lord, Durvāsas who was afflicted by the discus Sudarśana, returned to Ambariṣa, and sought protection at his feet (by touching them) remorsefully.

1. The remaining three are: Samīpatā—Proximity to the Lord, Sarāpatā—resemblance in form with the Lord, Sauyajyata—complete identification or absorption in the Deity.
2. Observing the act (of supplication and touching his feet) by Durvāsas, Ambariṣa felt ashamed at the touch of his feet (by the sage), and being overwhelmed with deep compassion, prayed to the missile of Lord Hari.

Ambariṣa prayed:

3. You are the glorious Fire-god, the Sun-god, Soma (or Deity presiding over the moon), the Lord of luminaries (constellations of stars, planets). You are (the elements like) water, the earth, the sky, the air. You are the subtle elements and the senses (or the objects of the senses and fire etc. function due to your power).

4. Oh Sudarśana! I pay my respects to you who are of thousand spokes and so dear to The Imperishable Lord. You are the destroyer of all missiles, and protector of the earth. May you be propitious to the Brāhmaṇa.

5. You are the righteousness (dharma) itself, the Divine Law (ṛta) and the Truth (incarnate). You are the sacrifice, and you are the presiding Deity of the Sacrifice who enjoys the oblations. You are the protector of regions, the soul (the Inner Controller) of all; you are the splendour and energy of the Supreme Person.

6. Oh beautifully centred discus! (Nobody being able to glorify you adequately) I simply utter the word “Bow” to you who are the defender of the injunctions of the Divine Law (ominous and destructive like) a comet unto the unrighteous and the Asuras, the Protector of the three worlds, endowed with purest splendour, of quick speed like the flight of thought and of miraculous deeds.

7. Oh Lord of speech! By your splendour (constituted) of righteousness, darkness of ignorance obscuring the vision (or the knowledge of the Deity) has been dispelled, and the light (of god-realization) has been flashed and preserved, for the noble-souled righteous people. This entire universe, gross or subtle, high or low has been lighted by you (through the sun, the moon and other luminaries). Your greatness is simply unfathomable.

8. Oh Invincible one! when discharged by the blemi-

1. V.l. Śīja : the (army) of mighty Daityas and Dānavas.
shless Lord, you enter the army of the Daityas and Dānavas and severing (incessantly) their arms, bowels, thighs and feet and necks, you shine irresistible in battles.

9. Oh protector of the world! You who overcome all (enemies in battle), have been commissioned by the wielder of the mace (Lord Viṣṇu) for the annihilation of the wicked. Therefore, for the sake of the prosperity of our family, be pleased to grant welfare (protection) to the Brāhmaṇa (Durvāsas). That will be your grace unto us (otherwise we shall be responsible for committing the sin of killing a Brāhmaṇa)

10. If a charitable gift has been donated (by us), or a sacrifice has been performed, or our righteous duty has been properly executed, or if our family regards Brāhmaṇas as our gods, may this Brāhmaṇa be free from his distress.

11. If the glorious lord, the sole abode of all excellent qualities be pleased with us due to our looking upon (regarding) all beings as possessing souls like us ( or his Spirit), may this Brāhmaṇa get rid of his distress and anxiety.

Śrī Śuka said:

12. While the king was thus praying to Viṣṇu’s discus Sudarśana, which was scorching the Brāhmaṇa on all sides, it subsided at the request of the king.

13. Being relieved of the scorching heat of the fire of the missile (Sudarśana), Durvāsas felt comfortable. Bestowing on him the highest blessings, he praised the king.

Durvāsas said:

14. “Oh! How wonderful! I have witnessed today the magnanimity of servants of the Infinite Lord in that you wish for the well-being of a person who has offended you, Oh king.

15. What is difficult to be achieved for those righteous persons or what is impossible to give up in the case of those noble-souled persons, who have treasured up (and made their own) the glorious Lord Hari, the leader of the Sātvatās.

16. Can there be any deficiency or unfulfilment in the case of the servants of the Lord of the hallowing feet (to which even holy rivers resort for purification) by listening to the name of whom a man is absolved of all sins and impurities.

17. Oh King! I am highly favoured by you in that, exceedingly merciful as you are, you ignored the wrong done by me, and have completely saved my life.”

18. The king who did not take any food but waited in expectation of the sage’s return, clasped his feet, conciliated him, and made him accept the meal.

19. Having enjoyed the hospitality and the food that was suitable to all tastes and (thus) gratifying all desires) and was served with respect and care, he felt himself thoroughly gratified, and courteously requested the king to take his meals.

20. “I am thoroughly pleased with you, and have been laid under great obligations by the sight, touch, conversation as well as by the hospitality-offered with full devotion to the Lord—of a great votary of the Lord (like you).

21. The celestial damsels will often sing of this noble behaviour (act) of yours (in heaven), and this earth (the whole world) will extol this highly hallowing glory of yours.”

_Sri Suka said:

22. Having thus praised the king, Durvāsas who was highly satisfied, took his leave of him and through ethereal space went to the region of Brahmā which lasts for two_Parārđha years._

23. A complete year elapsed since the departed sage Durvāsas did not return. It is reported that during this period, the king who longed to see him returned, subsisted simply on water.

24. After the departure of Durvāsas, Ambarīṣa ate the (remnant of the) food that was rendered extremely holy by being partaken of by the Brāhmaṇa (Durvāsas). Pondering over the calamity on Durvāsas and his final release and his own fortitude, he considered all that being due to the power of the Supreme Person.

25. The king Ambarīṣa who was thus endowed with such ennumberable excellent qualities, continued in his devotion of the Lord by dedicating all his acts suitable to his own caste and stage of life to the Supreme Soul, Brahman designated as Vasudeva. By virtue of such (firm) devotion, he came to regard all positions upto the part of god Brahma as hellish.

1. _ghaukaṁ—where dry rationalists have no place—GS.

26. In course of time, Ambarisha entrusted his kingdom to his sons whose disposition and character were similar to him, and entered the forest. Concentrating his mind wholly on Vasudeva, his own soul, he destroyed (became free from) the current of gunas viz. Samsara or transmigration of the soul.

27. He who glorifies this sacred story of king Ambarisha or ponders over it, becomes a devotee of Lord Vishnu.

27A. Those who listen to the story of the noble-souled Ambarisha, all of them attain to Liberation from Samsara through the devotion to and by the Grace of Lord Vishnu.

CHAPTER SIX

History of Ikshvaku's Posterity*

The Story of Saubhari

Sri Suka said:

1. Virupa, Ketumana and Sambhu were the three sons of Ambarisha. From Virupa was born Prashadava whose son was Rathitara.

*This chapter gives the first twenty generations of the Solar race:

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{Manu} & \quad \text{Ikshvaku} \\
\text{Nimi} & \quad \text{Vikuksha} \quad \text{alias} \quad \text{Sahas} \\
\text{Janaka} & \quad \text{Dandaka} \\
\text{Sahas} & \quad \text{Puraanjaya (Kakutstha)} \quad \text{Anenas} \quad \text{Prthu} \quad \text{Viwchara} \\
\text{Candra} & \quad \text{Yuvalava} \quad \text{Sabasta} \quad \text{Sabasti} \quad \text{Bhadaiva} \quad \text{Kuvalaya} \\
\text{(Dhundhumara)} & \quad \text{Drshtra} \quad \text{Haryalva} \quad \text{Nikumbha} \quad \text{Barhahalva} \\
\text{Krta} & \quad \text{Senajit} \quad \text{Yuvalava} \quad \text{Mandhata} \quad \text{(Trasaddasyu).} \end{align*}
\]
2. When requested for the continuation of the family of Rathitara, Aṅgiras begot by the wife of Rathitara who was childless, a number of sons, possessing the lustre of the Vedic lore.

3. Though these were born from the wife of Rathitara, they were known as belonging to the family of Aṅgiras (instead of that of Rathitara); they became the leaders of other sons of Rathitara as they were Brāhmaṇas endowed with the characteristic qualities of Kṣatriyas.

4. While Manu was sneezing his son Ikṣvāku was born from his nostrils. Of the hundred sons of Ikṣvāku, Vikukṣi, Nimi and Daṇḍaka were the eldest.

5. Of these one hundred sons, twentyfive became monarchs in (the principalities lying in) the east of Ārāvarta, twentyfive became rulers in the West (of Ārāvarta), three in the middle (of that tract), and the rest in other directions (north, south and other directions).

6. Once, on the occasion of aṣṭaka-Śrāddha Ikṣvāku ordered his son, “Oh Vikukṣi! Hurry up and bring meat suitable for the purpose of Śrāddha. Don’t delay, please.”

7. Saying ‘Be it so’ (in compliance of his father’s order), the hero went to the forest, and killed beasts suitable for religious rites. Being fatigued and hungry, he unwittingly ate a hare.

8. He brought the remaining flesh to his father. When Ikṣvāku requested the family preceptor (Vasiṣṭha) to sprinkle it with water, he refused saying that it was contaminated, and hence unsuitable for religious rites.

9. Having ascertained from his son the perpetration of the (sacrilegious) act as reported by his family preceptor the king, out of anger, exiled from his land, his son who violated the restrictions of the rite.

1. The sacred land between the Vindhya and the Himālayas—ŚR.
2. (A Śrāddha to be performed on the seventh, eighth, ninth and the thirteenth day of dark and bright halves of the lunar months).

GS quotes:

saptamāyādi-trayam caiva tathā caiva trayodasa!
cetasas tatāṅkād prakāthā svapanaśajā vīdayataḥ!!
10. The king discussed with his preceptor Vasiṣṭha about the nature of the Truth. As a consequence of it, Ikṣvāku became established in Jñāna-yoga (path of knowledge). And casting off this physical body, he attained to what was the highest (Brahman).

11. Vikukṣi who came to be known as Śaśāda (the eater of a hare) returned after the demise of his father, and while ruling over the earth, he worshipped Lord Hari with (the performance) of sacrifices.

12. His son Puraṇjaya (conqueror of a city) was called Indravāha (one borne by Indra), and was also named as Kukutsthā (one seated on the hump of a bull). Now listen to (what) deeds earned for him these designations.

13. At the end of the Kṛta Age (or at the beginning of the Tretā age)¹, there was a battle between gods and Dānavas—a battle that was fierce like the Pralaya, at the end of world. This hero (Puraṇjaya) was sought as an ally by gods who were defeated by Daityas.

14. (‘I shall kill the demons if Indra agrees to be my mount’ on this condition) Indra was sought to be a mount. According to the advice of Lord Viṣṇu, the god of gods and the soul of the universe, Indra assumed the form of a big bull (to carry Puraṇjaya).

15. Accoutered in a coat of mail and armed with a celestial bow and sharp arrows, he, being eager to fight, mounted the bull and occupied his seat on its hump, while he was being extolled by gods.

16. Strengthened with the spiritual energy of Lord Viṣṇu, the Inner Controller, the Supreme Soul, he besieged the town of the Daityas in the west, with the army of gods.

17. He engaged them in a fierce battle which made hair stand on end. Whosoever of the Daityas dared to face in the battle, he despatched them to the god of death with his bhalla arrows.

18. While the Daityas were being killed, they avoided the range of the flight of his arrows which were unbearable like the fire that consumes the universe at the end of yugas and fled to their region (the subterranean world).

¹. Kṛtā — Both the meanings of the pun on Kṛtā are accepted.

19. Having conquered the splendid city and all its wealth, the royal sage gave it all to Indra, the wielder of the thunderbolt. Hence he was designated with the epithets (mentioned above).

20. Puranajaya had a son called Anenas (the sinless). His son was Prthu whose son was Visvarandha (v. l. Visvagan-dha) His son was Candra whose son was Yuvanásva.

21. His son was Sábasta who built the city called Sábasti. Bhradaśva was the son of Sábasta; thence (the next generation) was Kuvalayásva.

22. For achieving the well-being of sage Utañka, the powerful king, surrounded by his twenty-one thousand sons, killed the demon called Dhundhu.

23. He, thereby, became celebrated as Dhundhumára. All of his sons except the three who survived, were burnt by the fire that emanated from the mouth of Dhundhu.

24. The surviving sons were Dr̥hásva, Kapilásva and Bhadrásva, Oh descendant of Bharata. Dr̥hásva’s son was Haryaśva whose son is remembered at Nikumbha.

25-26. Barhaṇásva was the son of Nikumbha. His (Barhaṇásva’s) son was Kṛśáśva whose son was Senajit. To him was born Yuvanásva who, being childless, repaired to the forest, along with his hundred wives, in despair. The merciful sages took pity on him, and with great concentration of mind, they conducted for him a sacrifice, specially dedicated to Indra.

27. (Once) being thirsty at night, the king entered the sacrificial hall. Finding all the Br̥hmaṇas in the hall asleep, he himself drank the water consecrated with mantras (and meant for the queen).

28. On getting up (at dawn), the Br̥hmaṇas found the pitcher of (consecrated) water empty. Then, Oh king, they enquired whose work it was that the water meant for begetting a male issue, was drunk.

29. Then, having come to know that it was drunk by the king who was (as if) impelled by God, they bowed down to the Almighty Lord (with the words) “The power of the Providence is really Supreme and irresistible”.

30. It is reported that after the expiry of the due period (of nine months), the son of Yuvanāśva who (later) became the sovereign monarch of the globe of the earth, was born splitting open the right side of his belly.

31. 'The child is incessantly crying'. Whom will it suck?' asked the Brāhmaṇas anxiously. 'He will suckle me. Oh child, do not cry; saying this, Indra (who was propitiated with a sacrifice for its birth) put (in his mouth) his index finger (which was dripping with nectar.)

32. Through the grace of gods and that of Brāhmaṇas, his (Māndhātṛ's) father did not die. Yuvanāśva attained to the Final Beatitude, there (in that very hermitage) through his penance.

33. Indra gave him Trasad-dasyu (The terror of evildoers) as another epithet. For enemies of gods and men like Rāvana and others trembled at the mention of his name and were perturbed.

34. In due course, Māndhātā, the son of Yuvanāśva became the universal monarch, and being infused with the Spiritual power and glory of the Imperishable Lord (Viṣṇu), solely ruled over the world consisting of seven island-continents.

35. A knower of the Self as he was, he performed a number of sacrifices with liberal gifts and dakṣinās, and thereby worshipped the Supreme Deity of the sacrifices, the Lord who represents all gods (in his person) and who, through his being the inner Controller of all antaryāmins is beyond the ken of senses.

36. Materials of sacrifices, mantras (recited in the course of the sacrifice), the sacrificial procedure, the sacrifice proper, the performer of sacrifice and priests participating in the sacrifice, the merit accruing from the sacrifice, time and place of sacrifice—all these are his constituents. (In fact, the whole of the universe is constituted of him. Him he worshipped through sacrifices.

37. The point at which the sun rises, to the point where it sets—the whole of the region lighted by the sun is regarded as the land (kingdom) of Māndhātr, the son of Yuvanāśva.

1. The child which wishes to suck the breast of his mother is incessantly crying—VJ.

38. The king begot on Bindumati, the daughter of Saśabindu, (three sons, viz.) Purukutsa, Ambariṣa and Muca-kunda, the yogin. Their fifty sisters sought the sage Saubhari as their husband.

39-40. Submerged in the waters of the Yamunā, and practising austere penance, Saubhari happened to observe the happy state of the king of fishes engaged in coition (with a female partner), and he was affected with that passionate desire, and (approaching the king) requested him for a girl. (The king) replied, “Oh Brahman, you can freely have any daughter, provided she selects you of her own accord voluntarily.

41. The sage realized the ruse and said to himself, ‘Considering that I, being far advanced in age, grey-haired, covered with wrinkles, with a head unstable and shaking (all the while), will be repulsive and disagreeable to women, I have been (politely) refused by the king.

42. I shall make myself so (attractively) beautiful that I shall be covetous even to celestial nymphs; not to speak of daughters of lords of human beings. The spiritual master (Saubhari) became thus determined (and by his power of asceticism, he became so actually).

43. He was ushered in by the chamberlain, in the richly magnificent and luxurious harem reserved for the princesses. And Lo! That one suitor was sought after and courted as a husband by all the fifty princesses.

44. Throwing to winds (forgetting) their mutual sisterly affection, there arose a great controversy among them about securing him (as a husband). Their hearts being fixed upon him, each one of them argued, “He is suitable in beauty and form only to me, and not to anyone of you (at all)”.

45-46. Saubhari, well-versed in the Ṛgveda (and master of powerful mantras) enjoyed for a long period his life with them (the princesses of Māndhāṭr) in mansions furnished by the power of his inexhaustible penance, with invaluable paraphernalia and furnishings such as highly costly beds, seats, rich clothes, ornaments, baths, articles of beautifications (pigments etc.), sweet dishes, wreaths and flowers, waited upon by men and women adorned with precious ornaments, and resonant with warbling birds, humming bees and singing panegyrists. He revelled with them delightfully in various gardens studded with pools of translucent waters, and in parks full of scented flowers (like Kalhāra).

---

1. Saubhari—The story, how the old sage Saubhari married all the fifty daughters of the emperor Māndhātr seems to be popular in the epic period, and is found in Viṣṇu P. 4.2.3, Garuda P. 1.198. In fact the whole of that chapter seems to be based on this chapter of the Bh.P.

47. Observing his affluent state of house-holder’s life, Māndhāṭā, the master of the entire earth consisting of seven island-continents, was so astonished that he ceased to feel the obstinate pride of universal sovereignty.

48. Although he was enjoying various objects of pleasure with deep attachment to his houses which were full of various kinds of pleasure\(^1\), Saubhari did not feel sated like a fire fed with drops of ghee.

49. On one occasion, while he was sitting (all alone), Saubhari, the great preceptor of Rgveda, became conscious of his ascetic degeneration (spiritual oblivion) caused by his observation of the sexual pleasure of the fish.

50. ‘Alas! Look at the ruinous fall of mine—an ascetic of pious conduct, conforming strictly to vows, due to my noticing (the sexual intercourse of) the aquatic animals, under waters, my asceticism\(^2\) which I observed for a long time, was lost.’

51. A person desirous of liberation from Samsāra, should, with all his heart and soul, avoid association with all who follow married life. He should endeavour not to permit his senses to external objects. Leading a life in solitude, he should fix his mind on the Infinite Ruler (of the universe). If occasion arises, he should associate himself with saintly persons who observe vows (of celibacy etc.) and are devoted to the Lord.

---

1. VR. reads mānd-mukhāh : ‘Through many sets of senseorgans’. assumed various bodies simultaneously to enjoy through multiple-sets of senseorgans, all the objects of pleasure fully.

2. brahma—Brahman, the Supreme Spirit I used to meditate upon for a long time past, was completely forgotten—VR.
52. I was an ascetic without any companion. But due to my association with the fish under water, I became fifty (by marrying fifty wives\(^1\)). (By procreating hundred sons per wife) I became five thousand. I cannot reach the end of desires about them, or I do not see any limit to my wishes relating to man and wife, or this world and the next. I have lost my judgment due to the gunas of Māyā. I have come to believe that achievement of worldly objects are the real goal in life.

53. Continuing in the householder’s stage of life for some (more) time, he felt disinclination (to that life), and adopted the life of a Vānaprastha (nyāsa). He repaired to the forest and was followed by his fifty wives who looked upon their husband as God.

54. The self-controlled sage performed there a severely austere penance which reduced his body (to a skeleton), and got absorbed along with the fires (like gṛhapatya) into the Supreme Soul (and was liberated from samsāra).

55. Noticing the absorption of their husband in the Supreme Brahma, his wives too followed him through his spiritual power (and attained Liberation from Samsāra) just as flames become extinguished with a subsided fire.\(^2\)

---

CHAPTER SEVEN

The Story of King Hariścandra

Sri Suka said :

1. The celebrated Ambariśa, who was the most excellent son of Māndhārī, was adopted as his son by his grandfather.

1. GS : I assumed fifty forms for simultaneous association with fifty wives.
2. VJ’s Text does not end this chapter here.
3. This chapter deals with the following generations of Kings of the Solar race:

Māndhārī (mentioned in the last ch.) → Purukūta → Trasaddāsya II → Anarapya → Haryāva → Aruṇa → Tribhandhana → Satyavrata alias Trīṣhāku → Hariścandra → Rohita

This line is confirmed in the VP. 4.3.

The rivalry between Vāstūśas and Viśvāmitras is as old as the Ayuḍhas. Here the story is based on the famous Sunahśeṣa legend in the (Yuvanāśva). His (Ambariṣa's) son was Yauvanāśva whose son was Hārīta. These are the three important members (and the first three branches of the Māndhāṭṛ family).

2. Narmadā (a Nāga princess) was given by her Nāga brothers to Purukutsa (the eldest son of Māndhāṭṛ). As directed by the serpent-King (Vāsu), she took him (Purukutsa) to the nether-world called Rasāṭala.

3. Infused with the spiritual energy of god Viṣṇu, Purukutsa killed Gandharvas who deserved to be slain. He received a boon from the Nāgas that those who remember this story (of emancipation of Nāgas from Gandharvas) would be immune from the fear of serpents.

4. Purukutsa's son was Trasaddasyu (the second) who was the father of Anaraṇya. His son was Haryaśva whose son was Aruṇa. Aruṇa's son was Tribandhana.

5-6. Tribandhana's son Satyavrata became celebrated as Triśaṅku. He was reduced to the status of a Cāndāla by the curse of his father, but by dint of the spiritual power of Viśvāmitra, he ascended heaven along with his (physical) body, where he is still seen in the sky. When he was made to fall with his head downward by gods, he (Viśvāmitra) stopped him in the mid-air by the spiritual force (of Viśvāmitra).

7. Triśaṅku's son was Hariścandra on account of whom a continuous fight lasting for many years took place.

Aitareya Brāhmaṇa. The way in which this Hariścandra treated Varuṇa is different from that of the Hariścandra who sold himself to keep his promise to Viśvāmitra. Two contradictory legends are grafted on the same Hariścandra! The MBH and VP corroborate the 'Triśaṅku' legend!

1. 'Trasad-dasyu' is the name of Māndhāṭṛ also. Vide supra. 9.6.33
2. ŠR. explains: He is called Triśaṅku—one in whom are embedded three darts in the form of three offences, viz. abduction of a Brāhmaṇa girl from her marriage pandal, killing the cow of his preceptor Vasiṣṭha, eating meat before its consecration with water. He quotes a verse from the Hariścandra enumerating these transgressions:

\[ \text{pitū saḥ paritōṣa gurudogdvrikadhaṣṭa ca} \]

\[ \text{aprodhitopayogāśca trividhas te vasiṅgramoḥ} \]

3. This refers to the persecution of Hariścandra by the sage Viśvāmitra who deprived Hariścandra of everything as a sacrificial fee for conducting a Rājasūya sacrifice. When Vasiṣṭha learnt of this, he cursed Viśvāmitra to be a crane (Aḍṭ) while Viśvāmitra retaliated by imprecating him to be a heron (baka). They fought for years in these forms—ŠR.
between Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra in the form of birds (viz. a crane (āḍi, Viśvāmitra) and a heron (Vasiṣṭha).

8. He (Hariścandra) being issueless became dejected in mind. On the advice of Nārada, he resorted to god Varuṇa with the request, “Oh Varuṇa, Bless me with a son.

9. “If he grows to be a warrior, I shall worship you by sacrificing him to you”. ‘Be it so’, replied Varuṇa in granting him the boon. And a son called Rohita was born to him, through the grace of Varuṇa.

10. Varuṇa demanded, “Now a son is born to you, worship me by sacrificing that child”. Hariścandra replied, “When a (prospective) victim crosses the first ten days of his life, it becomes fit for sacrificial purpose.”

11. When the time limit of ten days was over, Varuṇa arrived and asked the king to worship him (with that child). Hariścandra replied, “It is after dentition that an animal becomes fit for sacrifice.”

12. “(After the dentition of the child, Varuṇa appeared again and) said, “Now that the teeth have appeared, do you worship me with the child?” “But the victim will be fit for sacrifice when its teeth have fallen.”

13. (Varuṇa appeared again and (demanded, “The teeth of the sacrificial animal have fallen, now worship (me with him)”. “But a victim becomes pure when its teeth grow again,” replied Hariścandra.

14. “Now that (the teeth) have grown again, sacrifice it now to me”, said Varuṇa. To him replied Hariścandra, “Oh King! When a Kṣatriya victim is (of the age of) wearing an armour, he is regarded as a pure animal fit for sacrifice.”

15. In this way due to affection for his son and with his mind overpowered with (paternal) love, he went on deceiving by postponements (of sacrifice), and the god waited.

16. Rohita who, by then, came to know what (type of) act his father intended to do, and desirous of saving his life, escaped to the forest with a bow in hand.

17. Having come to learn that his father is possessed by Varuṇa and has developed mahodara (a disease called ‘Dropy’), Rohita was returning to the capital when Indra forbade him to do so (lest he should be sacrificed).
18. Indra advised Rohita to travel all over the earth, as visiting the holy places and ablutions in sacred waters are meritorious, and Rohita stayed in the forest that year.

19. Assuming the form of an old Brähmana, Indra visited him in the second, third, fourth and fifth year and tendered him the same advice.

20. Having wandered in the forest for the sixth year, Rohita returned to his capital (and on way) purchased the middle son (the second son by name Šunahšepa) from Ajigarta (of the Bhrgu clan).

21-23. Handing over Šunahšepa as a sacrificial animal to his father, Rohita bowed down to him. King Hariścandra of great glory, worshipped Varuṇa and other gods with human sacrifice and became free from dropsy, and his stories came to be sung in the assemblies of the great. In that sacrifice Viśvāmitra was the high priest (hotṛ), the self-controlled (or one who has realized the self), Jamadagni officiated as adhoaryu, Vasiṣṭha became the Brahmā, and the sage Ayāśya sang the Sāman hymns. Being pleased with him, Indra gifted to him a gold chariot.

24-25A. The greatness of Šunahšepa will be recounted later on (in ch. 16). Being highly pleased to notice the resoluteness deriving its strength from firmness in truth of both the king and the queen, he (Viśvāmitra) imparted to them the unobstructed knowledge of the ultimate truth.

25B-27*. (In meditation) fusing his mind (the root-

* The gists of the explanations of different commentators are as follows:

(1) VR. : Hariścandra in his meditation identified the mind with the earth and the earth with water... so on up to Tāmasic Ego into Pradhāna which contains Mahat in itself. Having contemplated the Intelligent principle in it (i.e. by contemplating the pratyagātman as being characterised by devotion-cum-knowledge — upāsanāmaka-vidyā-vidiṣṭam pratyagātmanam anusandhāya ityarthah[)], and burning down by that knowledge the wrong notions of the identification of the body with the soul, absolute independence of ātman (svatāntvāṁbhimāna-rūpam), and discarding it by realising the limitations of that aspect of devotion-cum-knowledge, and becoming free from the bondage of karmas (merits and sins), he realised his blissful nature of the soul which is beyond description (either as a man or a god or a sub-human being etc. or in usual terms of name and form), stayed in his own essential nature (transcend sin etc.).
cause of Samsāra\(^1\) into the earth (which is another designation for food which constitutes and hence modifies the mind\(^8\)), the earth into water, water into fire, fire into the air, the air into ether or space, and that into the Tāmasic aspect of Ego (which is the source of all elements), the Tāmasic ego into the mahat (the principle of cosmic intelligence), but of the intellectual and objective aspects of the Ātman, he contemplated the intellectual or knowledge aspect into the Mahat ignoring the objective aspect, and thereby burnt down completely the Nescience (that obscured the soul). Through his intelligent consciousness of the absolute bliss of Nirvāṇa, he transcended that aspect also, and completely severed off the bondage (such as identification of the soul with the body), and stood in his own essential nature which is beyond the range of description and abstract reasoning.

(II) VJ : Agreeing with ŚR about the procedure of merging of the mind into the earth etc. upto Mahat which is presided over by the four-faced god Brahmā, wherein lies the Intelligent principle of which the presiding deity is Sarasvatī; contemplating over this and destroying all the bondages, he stayed in his natural stage of knowledge and blissfulness which is beyond my i.e. human power of description or reasoning capacity.

(III) SD : The fickleness of the mind depends on the food eaten. Thus the mind being identical with the food which grows out of the earth and hence one with it for the control of the mind, he meditated it as identical with the earth. This procedure goes upto Mahādātman : but SD states mahādātman means Pradhāna which is the soul or cause of Mahat. Jñānakalā=Buddhi, ‘Intelligence’. Though it is jāda (unconscious), it is associated with the knower i.e. Jīva and hence called Jñānakalā. Contemplating over the distinction between jīvottan and buddhi and burning down (dispelling) the ignorance i.e. the false identification of the soul with body, mind, intelligence etc., and thus discarding intelligence and distinguishing Pradhāna from the self, he became liberated from bondage of karmas.

(IV) BP. takes jñānakalā as the power of knowledge of jīva (jñānakalā-vācyā-jīvanā vidyā-sakti / Hence—upāsanāvisīśa-prathyagātma.

1. mano-mūlo hi samādraḥ ! Śruti text quoted by ŚR and GS.
2. anna-mayam he saumya manah ! —Chāndogya up. 6.6.5 6.7.6.

— quoted by commentators.
CHAPTER EIGHT

The Story of King Sagara

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Harita was the son of Rohita; from Harita was born Campa who built up the city of Campā. Campa’s son was Sudeva whose son was Vijaya.

2. Vijaya’s son was Bharuka (Bhiruka, Ruruka in other purāṇas). From him was born Vṛka whose son was Bāhuka. This king, being deprived of his kingdom by his enemies, repaired to the forest along with his wife.

3. When the queen was about to immolate herself in fire along with the (body of the) old king who died, she was prevented (from ascending the funeral pyre) by sage Aurva who knew about her pregnancy.

4. Having come to know of this (her pregnancy), she was administered poison (mixed) with food by her co-wives (to kill her alongwith the child). But he (the son) was born along with it (poison). Hence, this highly glorious son was named Sa-gara (born with poison).

1. This chapter deals with the following rulers of the solar race in a chronological order:
   Rohita (mentioned in ch.7) → Harita → Campa (also known as Caṅku in Vāyu P. 3.88.119 and other purāṇas) → Sudeva → Vijaya → Bharuka → (also called Ruruka, Karuka, Bhiruka in other purāṇas) → Vṛka → Bāhuka → Sagara → (Asamañjasa → Amuṭumān mentioned only). The Matsya group of Purāṇas (viz. Matsya, Padma and Agni) drop all kings between Rohita and Vṛka, possibly being unimportant.

2. The Sagar legend is very popular with all the purāṇas, vide Vāyu 3.88.123-167, Brahmadāta III. chs 47-55, Matsya briefly in 12.39-43, Śiva-Ūmā Samhitā. 38.29-57, and Textual similarity (including repetition of identical verses) in three different groups of purāṇas leads one to assume a common source which though not extant now, can be reconstructed.

3. A site at a distance of four miles to the west of Bhagalpur. It was the capital of Aṅga, of which Karna was the King at the time of MBH. Even then, it was a place of pilgrimage (MBH. Vana 85, 14-15). It is full of ancient Buddhist and Jain relics as it was sacred to both the sects due to the association of the founders of their sects and other famous teachers of their sects. The Chānd Saḍāgar and Behulā episode is supposed to have happened here and a fair in honour of Behulā is held here.
5A. Sagara became a universal monarch. It is his sons who excavated the sea (and hence it became known after them as Sāgara).

5B to 7A. He conquered Tālajaṅgas¹, Yavanas², Sakas³, Haihayas⁴ and Barbaras⁵, but to honour the promise given by his preceptor Aurva, he did not massacre them, but caused them to wear loathsome dress and appearance; some were got clean-shaven; some were left with beards and moustaches only (with no hair on the head); some had only hair on the head (but with clean-shaven face); some had only half-shaven heads; some were made to remove the under-garment, while others, of the upper garment⁶.

7B & 8. In accordance with the guidance in yoga given by Aurva, he (sagara) worshipped by horse-sacrifices Lord Hari, the very Soul of all Vedas and of gods, who was his own self and the Supreme Ruler. God Indra stole away the sacrificial animal (the horse consecrated for sacrifice), and let free (to wander all over the earth).

9. In compliance of their father’s command, the proud sons of (Sagara’s queen) Sumati, excavated the earth on all sides, in search of the horse.

1. A famous Kṣatriya clan known after its founding father Tālajaṅga, a descendant of Śaryāti—MBH. Anu 30.7 also Vana 106.8
   It was one of the five clans of Haihayas.
2. The Ionians; the Indo-Greeks who settled in the former NWF. provinces and the adjoining parts.
3. Sakas or Scythians came from the valleys of the Oxus and the Jaxartes and they conquered a part of Western India and settled there.
4. Haihayas were a branch of the Yādava clan. They ruled at Māhiṃmatī, near modern Māndhatā in Nimar District M.P., on the Narmadā.
5. D.C. Sircar identifies these as a people of the country called Varvara or Barbara which lay in the lower valley of the Indus, where the city of Barbara was probably founded by Alexander. Sircar rejects S. Levi’s identification with Barbaria of the Periplus, the Coast of Somali on the Gulf of Aden. (SGAMI p. 233). The close association of Šakas and Barbaras in Purāṇas suggests their geographical proximity, which rules out S. Levy’s suggestion of its location in Africa.
6. This is an explanation of the fashions of dress and hair-cut of these extra-Indian tribes, whose war-like qualities (Kṣatriyatva) are tacitly admitted, but are relegated to non-Indian status.
10.11. They saw the horse in the north-eastern direction near the sage Kapila. “Here is the thief, the horse-lifter, who sits with his eyes closed. Let this wicked fellow be killed forthwith.” Shouting thus, those sixty thousand (sons of Sagara) with their arms lifted, attacked him when the sage opened his eyes.

12. (Firstly) Being deprived of their good sense through the deceptive influence of Indra and now being (as good as) dead through the transgression (insult) committed by them against a great personage (like the sage Kapila), they were reduced to ashes in a moment by the fire that emanated from their own bodies.¹

13. It is not correct to say that the sons of the emperor were burnt down through the wrath of the sage (Kapila). How can Tamas in the form of anger be imagined in the case of that sage who was abode of pure Sattva (undiluted by Rajas and Tamas) and whose person purified the whole universe? It is as impossible as the sticking of the particles of the earthly dust to the sky.

14. It is his promulgation in the form of Sāṅkhya system of philosophy, which serves here as a strong and safe boat by means of which a person desirous of Liberation (from Samsāra) crosses this sea in the form of Samsāra which is so difficult to cross, and is a road (destined to) death. How can there exist at all the sense of difference (as between a friend or a foe) in the omniscient sage who is no other than the Supreme Lord?

15. He who is (wrongly) called Asamañjasa (‘unreasonable’ but was actually very reasonable and virtuous) was the son of the king (Sagara) born of his queen Keśini. His son named Arṣumān engaged himself in achieving his grandfather’s interest.

16. Asamañjasa showed himself outwardly as being unreasonable. He was in his former birth a yogi who deviated from his yogic path on account of evil association, and was born now with the recollection of the past life. (He dissociated himself from all).

¹ According to Siva P. Umaśamhitā 38.53-54. only four sons, viz. Harṣaketu, Suketu, Dharmanatha and Pañcajana were spared.
17. He used to behave in a manner censured (by people) in this world, and committed acts unliked by his kith and kin. (For example) he hurled children in the Šarayu while they were playing and thus harassed the public.

18. As he conducted himself in this way, he was abandoned (transported beyond his kingdom) setting aside his parental affection. By his yogic power he showed them all the children alive and then he departed (from Ayodhyā).

19. Having seen all the children returned alive, hale and hearty, the citizens of Ayodhyā were astonished Oh King! But king Sagara was however, filled with remorse.

20. Amśumān, being commanded by the king to find out the sacrificial horse, went along the path dug out by his uncles and perceived the horse near a heap of ashes.

21. Seeing there Lord Viṣṇu in the form of a sage named Kapila, sitting nearby, Amśumān folding his palms and bowing down respectfully, prayed him with concentrated mind.

Amśumān prayed:

22*. Neither through his concentration of mind in spiritual meditation nor through his capacity of abstract reasoning could Brahmā, even to this day, either perceive you or comprehend you as being transcendental to himself.¹ How is it possible for others like us, who belong to different species

*(i) VR.: Not even yogins can clearly realize, even to this day, the essentially true nature of you, the Supreme Soul, in spite of their attempts through concentration of mind in spiritual meditation or through their reasoning capacity. How can other persons like us who are not yogins but are creations of Hiranya-garbha (god Brahmā) and others, who, in their turn, are products of your mind, body, intellect, comprehend your true nature.

(ii) VJ.: The unborn god Viriṇci (Brahmā) could not, to this day, perceive you to be a part or ray (amīla) of the Supreme Soul. Due to your infinite nature, he cannot correctly comprehend you directly or indirectly through his power of mental concentration in spiritual meditation. How can others—other than Viriṇci—who are devoid of meditational power and reasoning capacity, comprehend you? For these derive their knowledge through their sense-organs which are presided over by Marici and other Lords of creations, who, in their turn, are the products of Viriṇci's body and mind.

¹ simanah param—Brahmā's predecessor, father, Lord Viṣṇu.
of beings (such as gods, sub-human beings and human beings), and who, being later creations from his mind, body and intellect (and as such are the products of Sattva, Tamas and Rajas), are devoid of the light (of spiritual wisdom), to realize or comprehend you.

23*. The embodied beings\(^1\) (such as gods, men) whose understanding is deluded by your Māyā and who, being dominated by the three guṇas (sattva, rajas and tamas) can cognize (lit. get light of wisdom on) external objects only, do not know you, (even though you) abide in them (as their Soul, the Indwelling controller). What they perceive are only products of guṇas, the objects of senses, while they are in the waking and dreaming states, and utter darkness (total ignorance), when (immersed) in deep sleep.

24. How can an ignorant person like me reflect upon you who are an embodiment of knowledge (and hence not an object of knowledge), and capable of being contemplated only by sages like Sanandana who have by their power (or since their very inception) destroyed the guṇas of Māyā, and the resultant notion of difference and delusion.

25. We salute to you, the Ancient-most Eternal Person Whose assumption of the (present) body is for the sake of \(\textit{i)}\) VR.: The corporeal beings, being under the dominance of three guṇas, see i.e. brood over guṇas or objects of senses, or perceive the body which is the product of tamas i.e. pradhāna, but not the indwelling soul, as they can cognize external objects only.

---

(ii) VJ.: The embodied beings are classified according to the dominance of three guṇas viz. sattva, rajas and tamas. Out of them, human beings, being dominated by rajas, are intent on the first three objectives of human life (dharma, artha, Kāma) and hence perceive objects of senses, and are not interested in Mokṣa. The Asuras are dominated by Tamas, and have their minds deluded by Māyā, the binding power of Hari, and they see, i.e. experience the blinding darkness of hell. These are ignorant about their soul, and do not perceive Lord Viṣṇu who dwells in them.

1. dehabhājaḥ—Gods, men etc. who identify their bodies with the Soul—GD.

\(\textit{VJ.}\) : Who are not affected by the guṇas of Māyā (e.g. Sattva) and are devoid of Karmas and the material body (evolved out of guṇas); who are different from Brahman (sat) and material atoms (asat); your assumption of the body being for showering grace on the people (by imparting knowledge) and not as a result of karmas. Hence, you are above miseries.
imparting spiritual wisdom, but Who, (as a matter of fact), are absolutely free from (the laws of) cause and effect or from merits and demerits, and are devoid of (material) body, actions (karmas), name and form which are the products of the gunas of Māyā, Oh Serene Sage.¹

26. In this world, a creation of your Illusive Power (Māyā), people whose intellect is deluded by their being steeped in lust, greed, envy and infatuation, presume that houses and other objects of senses are real and wander in Samsāra.

27. Oh glorious Lord! The very Soul of all beings! Today, simply by seeing (meeting) you, the strong bondage (lit. cord) of our delusion (in identification of the body with the Soul), which is the root-cause of our desires (for objects of pleasure), actions (striving for securing them), the sense-organs (the tools of such actions), is cut asunder.

Śrī Śuka said:

28. The illustrious sage Kapila whose glory was thus eulogised, blessed Ānśumān mentally, and addressed to him as follows, Oh King.

The glorious sage (Kapila) said:

29. "Oh child! This is the horse, the (consecrated) sacrificial beast of your grand-father. It may (now) be taken away (by you). These are your forebears who are reduced to ashes, and deserve (need) to be purified by the waters of the Gaṅgā and by nothing else."

30. Ānśumān circumambulated Kapila, and securing his grace by bowing him down with his head, brought the sacrificial horse. Sagara completed the remaining part of the sacrifice with that (consecrated) animal.

31. Having entrusted the kingdom to Ānśumān, Sagara who became free from all cravings and from bond of attach-

¹. OR (1) Oh Sage, who have subdued Māyā and have been devoid of gunas.
   (2) Oh Sage in whom Māyā, its gunas (and their products etc.) have been quiet and ineffective—ŚR.
ment (or the false identification of the body with soul) attained to the highest goal (Liberation from Samsāra) by following the spiritual course taught to him by the sage Aurva.

CHAPTER NINE*

This chapter describes the Solar race from King Amśumān to Khaṭvāṅga. The genealogy (or rather the chronological order of kings) is as follows:

Amśumān → Dilipa → Bhagiratha → Śruta → Nābha → Sindhu-dvīpa → Ayutāyu → Ṛtaparṇa → Sarvakāma → Sudās → Saudāsa (Kalmāśa-pāda) → Aśmaka → Mūlaka (Nārikavaca) → Daśaratha → Aidiāvīda → Viśvasaha → Khaṭvāṅga (Bh.P. omits the name of King Ambariṣa Nabhāgi, the descendant of Śruta, vide ṚP. 4.4.36, Śiva P. Umā 39, 9-10 Vāyu P. 3.88, 169-71.)

1. The Descent of the Gaṅgā is another popular legend recorded in the MBH. Vana. chs. 108, 109; Bhīṣma 6.28-50; Vālmiki Rāmayana—Bāla Sargas 43-44; Brahmāṇḍa P. II.56. 94-50. It is probably a race-memory how three generations of the Solar race tried to irrigate the parched plains of the kingdom of Ayodhyā.
4. (She replied:) "Is there anyone capable of sustaining my force while I descend on the earth. Otherwise, I shall penetrate the crust of the earth and go down to Rasātala, the 6th sub-terraneal region, Oh King.

5. Besides, I am not willing to go to the earth. Men will wash of their sins in me. Where (and how) can I absolve myself of that sin? Some remedy on this should also be considered, Oh King."

Bhagīratha said:

6* "Righteous persons who have renounced actions (for obtaining worldly objects), and have controlled their sense-organs, and persons devoted to the contemplation of Brahman, (or prominent knowers of Brahman), are themselves capable of purifying the world. By the contact of their body (while bathing in you) they will annihilate your sins, as Lord Hari, the destroyer of sins, abides in them.

7. God Rudra, who is the very Soul of corporeal beings, and in Whom is woven this universe, warp and woof, as threads are interwoven in a piece of cloth, will bear your force."

7A. Having heard this speech of Bhagīratha, Gaṅgā advised, "In that case, propitiate the great god Śiva, for sustaining the velocity of my waters."

8. Having spoken thus,¹ the king propitiated god Śiva by his penance. Within a short period (of penance), Lord Śiva was also highly pleased with him.

9. Granting the prayer of the King with the words, "Be it so", Lord Śiva who is always benevolent to the world, carefully bore on his head the Gaṅgā whose waters are hallowed by the feet of Hari.

*VJ : Pious persons endowed with quiescence, self-control etc., completely free from desires (for heaven, pleasures etc.), thoroughly devoted to meditation of Brahman and thus established in Brahman and purifiers of the world, will annihilate your sins by their physical contact (e.g. washing hands or feet in your waters or by ablutions).

VR and GD. : As Lord Hari, the destroyer of sins, abides in them, the question of transfer of your sins by them to others does not arise, as Hari annihilates the sins altogether.

¹: v.l. : tāc chrutāḥ—Hearing this—VR.
10. The royal sage Bhagiratha led Gaṅgā, the purifier of the Universe, to the spot where the bodies of his fore-fathers (great-grand-uncles), lay reduced to ashes.

11. (Closely on the heels of) Bhagiratha who rode (in advance) in a chariot speeding with the velocity of the wind she rushed after him, hallowing the countries or regions (through which she flowed), and bathed the burnt-up sons of Sagara (with her waters).

12. The sons of Sagara, though struck down by their offence against a Brāhmaṇa (sage Kapila), attained to the celestial regions simply through the contact of her waters with their ashes.

13. Merely by the contact of her waters with the ashes to which their bodies were reduced, the sons of Sagara ascended the heaven. What need be said in case of those who observe religious vows and serve her with faith?

14. What has been glorified above about (the hallowing power of) the heavenly river is not very miraculous, inasmuch as She springs from the lotus-like feet of the Infinite Lord (Viṣṇu) and puts an end to Samsāra.

15. Concentrating their minds properly with faith in Him, pure-minded sages shed off their contacts with (and attachment to) the three guṇas of Prakṛti (and its product—their body,—misidentified with the soul)—which is so very difficult to cast off—and have instantly attained identity with Brahman.

16. Śruta was born from Bhagiratha who had another son named Nābha. His son was Sindhudvīpa from whom was born Ayutāyu.

17. Ayutāyu’s son was Rūtpaṇa, a friend of Nala who, in exchange of imparting the secret technique of the play of dice to Nala, learnt from him the equestrian science (the secret of managing horses). His (Rūtpaṇa’s) son was Sarvakāma.

18. From his loins was born Sudās whose son was the husband of Madayanti, Oh King. People called him Mitraśaha, and rarely as Kalmāṣapāda. He became a demon through the curse of Vasiṣṭha, but remained issueless in consequence of his own act.
King (Parīkṣīt) asked:

19. We wish to know the reason or the occasion of the pronouncement of the curse by preceptor Vasiṣṭha on the great-souled son of Sudās. Be pleased to narrate it to us, if there be no secret about it.

Śri Śuka said:

20. As the tradition goes, king Saudāsa (the son of Sudās) happened to kill a certain demon, while on hunting expedition. He allowed his brother to escape. He (the Rākṣasa’s brother) went away with a determination to wreak revenge.

21. Remembering the offence (of killing his brother) committed by the king, and disguising himself as the cook of the king in the palace, he dressed human flesh and presented it for service to the king’s preceptor Vasiṣṭha, who came there to dine.

22. Perceiving easily that a prohibited article of food (human flesh) was about to be served to him, the venerable sage flared up in rage, and cursed the king, “You will turn into an ogre by this improper act of yours.”

23. Having come to know that, that act (serving of human flesh) was committed by a demon (and that the king was innocent), he limited the duration of his curse to (a period of twelve years. But (in the meanwhile) Saudāsa took water into the hollow of his joined palms and was ready to counter-curse his preceptor (who uttered the unjustifiable imprecation).

24. He was however prevented (from cursing his preceptor) by (his queen) Madayanti. The king found that all the cardinal points, the sky, the earth were all instinct with life. (And lest he should injure living beings), he let the water be charged with wrathful mantras, fall on his own feet (and thus justified his epithet—mitra-saha, indulgent towards friends).

25. Changed into a demonic state, and with both of his feet turned black (by the water charged by him with a curse), he happened to see a forest-dwelling couple of Brāhmaṇas in the act of sexual intercourse.
26. Overpowered with hunger, he caught hold of the Brāhmaṇa, when his wife helplessly appealed to him, "Your honour is not a born ogre. You are veritably a great hero (a chariot-warrior) belonging directly to the race of Ikṣvākus.

27. Oh warrior! You are the husband of Madayanti. It does not behave you to perpetrate unrighteous deeds. Be pleased to restore to me who am desirous of having a child, the Brāhmaṇa, my husband, who has not accomplished his purpose.

28. Oh King! This human body is capable of securing all the objects (purusārthas) in human life. Hence the destruction of this body is called the total destruction of all purposes.

29. This Brāhmaṇa is learned and endowed with asceticism, virtuous character and other qualities. He desires to propitiate Brahmā which is designated as Mahā-purusa (Viśnu) who abides in all beings as their Inner Controller, but lies obscured in them on account of guṇas.

30. This being the case, how does this prominent Brāhmaṇa sage deserve death at the hands of a great royal sage like you, even as the death of a son at the hands of the father, Oh knower of the righteous path?

31. Your worship is respected by the righteous. How do you approve of the death of the righteous, sinless (innocent) Śrotṛiya who is well-versed in the Vedas (or innocent like a child in the womb), any more than killing of a cow.

32. If he is to be your victim, please devour me first, inasmuch as I shall not live without him for a minute, and am as good as dead.”

33. Disregarding the piteous appeal of the helpless bewailing Brāhmaṇa woman, Saudāsa deluded by (his preceptor’s) curse, devoured the Brāhmaṇa, as a tiger would prey upon a beast.

34. Finding her impregnator (husband) eaten up by a cannibal, the Brāhmaṇa woman lamented herself. Flying in a rage, the chaste lady uttered the imprecation on the king.

35. "You wicked fellow! Inasmuch as my husband has been devoured by you while I was afflicted with sexual desire, your death too is indicated to follow while engaged in sexual intercourse, you foolish one.”
36. Having thus cursed king Mitrasaha, the woman who was determined to attain to the region of her husband, consigned to flames his bones in a burning fire, and followed the course of her husband (by immolating herself to fire).

37. When freed from the curse at the end of the twelfth year, he (Saudāsa) proceeded to have sexual intercourse (with his queen), but the queen who knew well the imprecation of the Brāhmaṇa lady prevented him from that attempt.

38. Thenceforth, he gave up all pleasures with women and he remained issueless by this act. It was with his consent that the sage Vasiṣṭha begot an issue on queen Madayanti.

39. For seven years she carried the foetus and did not deliver. Vasiṣṭha then hit her abdomen with a stone, and the son so born came to be known as Āśmaka.

40. From Āśmaka was born Mūlaka who was protected on all sides (from Paraśurāma) by women, and hence he is called Nāri-kavaca (women-armoured). He is called Mūlaka as he was the root of further pro-creation of the Kṣatriya race, when it was being exterminated by Paraśurāma.

41. From Mūlaka sprang forth Daśaratha of whom a son, Aśvatthāma was born. His son was King Viśvasaha whose son Khaṭvāṅga became the sovereign ruler of the world.

42. Being entreated by gods, the invincible king killed a number of demons in the battle. Learning (from gods) that only one muhūrtā (48 minutes) of his life is left, he hurried back to his capital (in a celestial car) and concentrated his mind on the Supreme Lord.

43. (He mused to himself). Neither my life nor my sons, nor my wealth nor the earth, nor my empire or my queens are dearer to me than the Brāhmaṇa race who form our family-deities.

44. Not even in my childhood, my mind ever took delight in unrighteousness. I did not look upon anything other than the Lord of hallowed reputation (Viṣṇu) as the reality.

45. A boon of my choice was offered for bestowal on me by gods, the rulers of the three worlds. But as I contemplate on the creator of all beings, I do not seek any object of desire.¹

¹ As the boon will come in the way of my realization of the Lord —VR. Gd. BP.
46. The celestials themselves have got their minds and senses distracted (by objects of senses), and do not realize the beloved, eternal Soul who stays established in their own heart. Need it be said that human and other beings, characterised by rajas and tamas, can never do so.

47. I shall give up, through deep devotion to the Creator of the Universe, attachment to guṇas (the product of guṇas viz. the object of senses) which has been firmly fixed in the mind, by the very nature of things, but which are the creation of the Illusive Power (Māyā) of the Lord, and hence are as unreal and transitory as the city of Gandharvas in the sky, and take asylum in him.

48. Having determined thus by his reasoning capacity and intellect, which was attracted towards himself (and thus possessed) by Lord Nārāyaṇa, he discarded ignorance and the consequent false notions of the identity of the body with Soul and attained to his essential nature (which is Brahma-hood).

49.* (The state) that is the Supreme Brahman which is very subtle but not a void though it is as good as intangible, as it is beyond the rage of expression, and which the devotees of Lord Viṣṇu sing as the glorious Lord Vāsudeva.

Any act except the propitiation of Hari, is not acceptable to me as it is not conducive to Liberation—VJ.

1. hitvāṁyabhāvam ajñānam—Having given up his body.—VR.

*VJ. : The stage to which Vedantins call the Supreme Brahman, the yogins describe as very subtle, beyond the ken of senses like the sky. Some non-vedic thinkers (viz. the Buddhists, especially the followers of Mādhya-miki school) assume it as void; but it is really positive (and not void) and which the followers of the Pāñcarātra school (Śātvatas) call Lord Vasudeva.

JG. With his intellect (mind) possessed by Nārāyaṇa, Khaṭvāṅga attained to Brahmā's region in a mūhūrta.

2. BP. aśūṇya—(i) Proved as positively existent and not non-existent like horns of a hare.

(ii) Śūnya is destitute of guṇas, attributeless. a-śūṇya means full of infinite excellences, conducive to the good of all or devoid of guṇas which deserve to be discarded.

Sva-bhūva : The brahmabhūva implies devoted service to the Lord as of a chaste woman to her husband.
CHAPTER TEN

The Story of Rāma

Śrī Suka continued:

1. To king Khaṭvāṅga was born Dirghabāhu, whose son was Raghu of extensively spread renown. From him sprang the emperor Aja of whom Daśaratha was born.

2. When earnestly prayed by celestials this glorious Lord Hari, directly and entirely composed of Brahman itself, divided Himself in four parts, and was born as Daśaratha's sons under the designations Rāma, Lakṣmana, Bharata and Śatrughna—himself in its entirety as Rāma and as his rays (artha) in Lakṣmana, Bharata and Śatrughna.

3. His life and works have been described in details and also heard by sages who have clearly understood the Truth.

1. This chapter covers only five generations:
   Khaṭvāṅga (mentioned in ch. 9) → Dirghabāhu → Raghu → Aja → Daśaratha → Rāma.

2. The Rāma legend is one of the most popular ones in Brahmanism, Buddhism and Jainism. Limiting ourselves to Brahmanical Sanskrit epics or Purāṇas, the most important source is Vālmiki's Rāmāyaṇa. Its critical edition (M.S. University, Baroda) shows that the Rāma legend is better preserved in the MBH Vana 274-293 (also ch. 148-152, Sabhā 50, Drona, 59) than in the vulgate of Vālmiki Rām. The spurious nature of many cantos, the Bāla and Uttara Kāṇḍas, is now established. We find Rāma legend in Padma P., Pātala khaṇḍa chs. 1-68 (Rāma's Aśvamedha), and ch. 116-117 (a slightly different version in prose and verse); Garuḍa P.I.143, Nārada P. I.79.7-26; II. 75, Agni P. Chs. 5-11; Skandha P. Brahma khaṇḍa—Dharmāraṇya ch. 30; Vāyu P. III.88, 183, 197; Devi Bhāgavata III. chs. 21-30 and in Upapurāṇas like Nṛsinha chs. 47-52, Saura ch. 30 and later versions like Adhyatma and Ānanda Rāmāyaṇas. The Rāma problem is extensively studied by Indian and Western scholars. (vide A.D. Pusalkar: Studies in Epics and Purāṇas, pp. 189-205). A comparison of Rāma legend in the Bh.P. with those in the above Purāṇas is beyond the scope of this work. But the special feature of the legend in the Bh. P. is the non-mention of fire-ordeal of Sītā after the conquest of Lāṅkā, and at the time of horse-sacrifice afterwards. After her abandonment by Rāma, Sītā does not return to Ayodhya, but after entrusting her children to sage Vālmiki, meditating on Rāma she enters in a cavity in the earth never to return.

3. *This whom you have witnessed in your mother's womb—GS.

4. *The main subject or import of the Vedas—VJ.
The story of the Lord of Sītā might have been listened by you many times.

4. May that Lord of the Kosala (country) protect us—the Lord who gave up his kingdom for honouring the pledge given by his father, and wandered from forest to forest on his lotus-feet that were too tender to bear the touch of the palms of his beloved Sītā (who pressed and massaged them to relieve their fatigue), and whose fatigue from journey was soothed by the leader of the monkeys (Hanumān or Sugrīva), and his younger brother Lakṣmaṇa; the Lord who constructed a bridge at the request of the deity presiding over the ocean, which was terrified at the display of his frowning eyebrows, excited by his wrath at the separation from his beloved, caused (by Rāvaṇa who was incited to do so) by disfiguring of Śūrpaṇakhā (by Lakṣmaṇa’s mutilating her nose and ears), and thus who was like a conflagration to the forest (in the form) of the wicked (demons).

5. During the sacrificial session of Viśvāmitra, prominent demons and nocturnal predators like Mārica and others were (single-handedly) despatched by him while Lakṣmaṇa was simply witnessing.

6. In the hall specially erected for Sītā’s free election of her (prospective) husband, wherein were assembled eminent warriors of the world, Rāma, like unto a cub of an elephant sportively picking up a sugar-cane, lifted up the formidable bow of god Śiva which required three hundred bearers to bring it (at the hall), strung it, drew it and broke it in the middle, oh King.

7. Having won (as a prize) Śrī, the beautiful goddess of prosperity, who had already a place of honour on his bosom,—but is now called Sītā, who was eminently suitable to him in beauty, virtues, disposition, age and form, Rāma, on his way (to Ayodhya), humbled down the overbearing pride and arrogance of Parasurāma, the chief of Bhrigu who extirpated the Kṣatriya race from the earth thrice seven times.

8. He honoured with his head (bent low) the order of his henpecked father who was bound by the noose of truthfulness (pledge to grant two boons to Kaikeyī who now demanded kingdom for her son and banishment of Rāma to forest). With his spouse, he relinquished his kingdom, wealth, his beloved relations (like his mother etc.), friends and palace and left for the forest just as a yogin who has renounced all attachments, would give up his body.

9. While (armed) with an irresistible bow in his hand, he went about leading a hard life (in the forest as a model for mankind to follow), he got mutilated the features of the wicked-minded sister of Rāvaṇa (viz. Śūrpaṇakhā who wanted to devour Sītā with a view to enjoy amorous life with Rāma etc.), and killed fourteen thousand of her kinsmen of whom Khara, Trisīras and Dūṣaṇa were prominent.

10. Being enticed away from his hermitage on seeing a miraculous (golden) form of a deer (assumed by Mārīca), who was so deputed by the Ten-necked demon Rāvaṇa whose passion (for Sītā) was inflamed by listening to the description of Sītā’s beauty, Rāma quickly slew Mārīca with an arrow, even as god Rudra (or Vīrabhadra) despatched Dakṣa (or Lord Nṛsiṃha killed Hiraṇyakaśipu), Oh Lord of men.

11. When, during his absence (from the hermitage) in the forest, the princess of Vīdeha (Sītā) was abducted by the vilest demon Rāvaṇa like a wolf (stealthily carrying away a sheep), Rāma, being separated from his beloved, wandered in the forest with his brother Lakṣmaṇa simulating pitiably helplessness demonstrating (to the world) the tragic fate of those who are attached to women.

12*. Rāma, whose feet are adored by gods Brahmā and Śiva even though he assumed the human form, then performed (like a son) the prescribed formal obsequies of Jaṭāyu (the king of vultures) who laid down his life (in attempting to free Sītā) for Rāma’s sake; he then slew the demon Kabandha.

1. VJ. quotes a ‘Smṛti’ text which denies the possibility of affliction in the omnipresent Almighty Rāma. He feigned affliction for the public.

2. He was originally a Gandharva Prince Viśvāvasu who was blessed with immortality by god Brahmā. He arrogantly attacked Indra who, with his Vajra squeezed his head and thighs into his body. When he beg-(whose head was in his chest and who attempted to seize Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa with his hands); he made an alliance with the monkeys. When Vāli was killed, He learnt the whereabouts of his beloved (Sītā). He then reached the shores of the ocean (near Laṅkā) with his forces of monkey chiefs (Sugrīva, Hanumān etc.).

13. (When, even after a fast of consecutive three nights, the presiding deity of the sea did not present himself, Rāma flared up in anger). The sea (its presiding deity) with alligators and aquatic animals in whom got panicky and bewildered, at the cast of his side-glance in apparent anger, and with its roar hushed up in terror, assumed a (human) form and taking on his head articles of worship approached his (Rāma’s) lotus-like feet and spoke as follows:

14. “We, dull witted fellows, did not know you definitely to be the Immutable, Eternal (First) Person, the overlord of the Universe, Oh Supreme Lord. You are the Lord of Prakṛti (the source of guṇas), from the Sattva-guṇa out of which are evolved the celestials, from the rajas, the prajāpatis (Lord of creation) and from tamas, the goblin-leaders and other evil spirits.

15. May you be pleased to cross me at your sweet will. Do kill Rāvaṇa, the excretion of Viśravas who makes the three world shriek (in fear). Regain your consort, Oh hero! (Although my waters will not obstruct your movements) do construct a bridge here for the spread of your glory which (future) kings, conquerors of the quarters (world) reaching here, will sing.”

16. Having constructed a bridge across the sea with mountain peaks of various sizes, covered with trees the branches of which were shaken off by monkey chiefs, Rāma, the foremost in the Raghu’s race, under the supervision and guided for livelihood, he was given two long arms and a mouth on the belly. He was asked to stay near Mātangaśrama in Krauḍicārāṇya—a part of Daṇḍakārāṇya. When Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa came after Jāśyū’s funeral, he caught hold of them. Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa cut his hands. He asked who they were and then told them his life story and fell dead. When they cremated his body, a Gandharva King (Kabandha’s former self) rose in the air, advised Rāma to go to Sugrīva for more information about Sītā.—

Vālmiki Rām.: Aranyā Kṛṣṇa—Sargas 70-72.
ance of Vibhiṣaṇa, and accompanied by the forces of Vānara chiefs like Sugrīva, Nīla, Hanumān, entered Laṅkā which was already burnt by (Hanumān) previously.

17. Like a river churned up by herds of elephants, the city of Laṅkā was in a state of commotion when its playgrounds, barns and granaries, treasuries, doorways, city gates, assembly-halls, roofs, balconies and pigeon-cots were barricaded and besieged by the armies of the monkey-chiefs, and platforms, flagstaffs, gold-vases (on either sides of entrances) and public squares were destroyed.

18. Observing the state of siege, the king of Rākṣasas (Rāvana) despatched against them all his followers like Nikumbha, Kumbha, Dhūmrākṣa, Durmukha, Surāntaka, Narāntaka and others, and his sons Indrajit, Prahasta, Atikāya, Vikampana and others, and finally (his brother) Kumbhakarna.

19. Accompanied by Sugrīva, Lakṣmaṇa, Hanumān, Gandhamāda, Nīla, Aṅgada, Jāmbavān the bear, Panasa and others, Rāma marched against the Rākṣasa army impenetrable on account of its weaponry like swords, spikes, bows, prāsas (darts), double-edged swords, lances, arrows, iron clubs and long swords.

20. Aṅgada and all the generals of Rāma's forces fell upon the Rākṣasa army consisting of battalions of elephants, infantry, chariots and cavalry, and engaged them in duels and struck them down with trees, rocks, maces and arrows, as their Lord Rāvana had lost his auspicious luck by the touch of Sītā (in abduction).

21. Perceiving the destruction of his armies, Rāvana, the king of Rākṣasas, got enraged. Ascending his aerial car Puśpaka, he attacked Rāma who rode resplendent in a resplendent chariot brought from the celestial region by Mātali (the charioteer of god Indra). Rāvana struck Rāma with sharp arrows with horse-shoe-shaped heads.

22. Rāma scolded him: "You, excretion of a man-eater! During our absence our beloved was taken away by you, a wicked fellow, even as a dog (steals away things when the house-owner is away). To you, a shameless fellow, I, like the god of death of irresistible power meting out the punishment to the perpetrator of a sin for his act, shall award the fruit of your detestable action, just now.”

23. Reproaching Rāvaṇa thus, Rāma shot his arrow that was already fixed on the bow. It pierced Rāvaṇa’s heart as if with the impact of the thunderbolt. Like a meritorious person whose balance of good acts is exhausted, Rāvaṇa fell from his aerial car, with blood gushing out of his ten mouths, while his partisans cried out ‘Alas!’.

24. Thousands of Rākṣasa women (whose husbands were killed) along with Mandodarī (Rāvaṇa’s chief queen) came out of Laṅkā and rushed to the battle-field wailing loudly.

25. They embraced their respective relatives who were struck down by Lakṣmaṇa’s arrows. Beating themselves (their breasts with their own hands), those helpless ladies lamented loudly.

26. “Alas ! Oh Rāvaṇa ! Oh Lord ! The terror of the world ! Undone we are ! Bereft of you, now trampled over by the enemies, to whom can Laṅkā look up for protection ?

27. Oh highly blessed glorious Lord ! Being overwhelmed with the passion of love, you did not estimate and anticipate the potential superforce of Sītā’s virtue whereby you have been reduced to this wretched condition.

28. Widowed is Laṅkā and we as well, Oh delight of your family ! Your body has become now food for vultures, your soul fit for hell.”

Sri Suka said :

29. Under instructions from Rāma, the king of Kosalas Vibhīṣaṇa performed the prescribed funeral rites known as ‘sacrifice to manes’, of his relatives.

30. Thereafter, the glorious Lord Rāma caught sight of Sītā sitting under a Śimśipā tree, in the retreat of the Asoka forest. She was emaciated and suffering from the (mental) agony, due to her separation from him.

1. Although commentators like GS., VR., GD. and BP. insist that those thousands of Rākṣasa women went to the spot where Rāvaṇa fell, the above translation is justifiable as correct, in view of the next verse—
The translator
31. Perceiving his most beloved wife in that helpless condition, Rāma was moved with compassion, even though her lotus-like face began to blossom with delight, at the sight of his own self.

32-33-34-A. Having conferred on Vibhiṣaṇa the sovereignty over Lankā, and Lordship over the Rākṣasas, and the life-span of a Kalpa (a period of the life span of fourteen Manus), the glorious Lord placed her in the aerial car Puṣpaka and accompanied by brothers (Lakṣmaṇa and adopted brother Sugrīva) and Hanumān, Rāma ascended Puṣpaka. As he had completed the vow (of forest-dwelling for fourteen years), he returned to his capital (Ayodhyā), being showered on the way with flowers offered by the presiding deities of various regions, and his glorious deeds being joyously sung by gods like Brahmā and others.

34-B-36. When Rāma heard that his brother put on bark-garments only, and subsisted on barley seeds boiled in cow’s urine, had grown matted hair and slept on bare ground with Kuśa grass spread over it, being extremely merciful by nature, he was deeply distressed.

37-39. Hearing of the arrival of his elder brother Rāma, Bharata took over his head the pair of wooden sandals (given to him as a token of love by Rāma) proceeded from his camp at Nandigrāma, along with citizens, his cabinet ministers and family preceptors. With vocal and instrumental music and in company of knowers of the Vedas loudly singing Vedic hymns, with flags of guilt edges and chariots plated with gold, and decked with beautiful banners of various colours, with gold caparisoned noble horses and warriors clad in gold armours, with artisans of different guilds and prominent courtesans and servants following on foot, and taking with him the royal insignia (such as white umbrella, chowries etc.), and valuable articles of various kinds (as presents), Bharata fell at his feet with his heart melted in tears of affection.

40. Bharata placed before him the pair of Rāma’s sandals (carried on his head so far), and stood before him with folded palms, and eyes full of tears. Rāma embraced him with his arms for a long time bathing him with waters that flowed from his eyes.

1. Modern Nandgaon, close to Bharata Kūnda, eight or nine miles South of Fyzabad (U.P.)—N.L.De—GDAMI, p. 138.

41. Rāma along with Sītā and Lakṣmanā paid personal obeisance to the worthiest of the Brāhmaṇas, and he (in turn) was bowed down by his subjects.

42. Seeing that their (real) lord had returned after the lapse of a long period, the subjects of northern Kosala, waving their upper garments and showering them with flowers, danced in joy.

43. Bharata carried the pair of sandals (of Rāma); Vibhīṣaṇa along with Sugrīva wielded chowries (cāmaras) and a fan (on his either side); Hanumān, the son of the wind god, held up the umbrella.

44. Śatrughna (the youngest brother of Rāma) held a a bow and a pair of quivers, Sītā, a waterpot of gourd, Āṅgada, the sword, Jāmbuvān, the king of bears, his gold plated shield, Oh King.

45. Occupying a seat in the Puṣpaka, attended to by prominent courtesans (mentioned above), and extolled by bards, the glorious Lord Rāmacandra shone like a rising moon in the midst of planets, Oh King.

46-47. Greeted by his brothers, Rāma also entered his festive capital city. Entering the palace, he paid due respects to the wife of his preceptor (or Kaikeyī and Sūmitrā), his own mother, Kausalyā, the preceptors and elderly persons, his friends and younger (brothers etc.), and was worshipped by them in return. Sītā, the princess of Videha, and Lakṣmanā paid respect with due formalities.

48. Just as (dead) bodies get up after the return of the vital principle (life), the mothers were as if inspired with life when their sons returned. They placed their respective sons on their lap, and bathed them in the flood of their tears, and shed off their grief (of separation for their sons).

49. Having got removed (cut off) Rāma’s matted locks of hair, the preceptor Vasiṣṭha, along with elderly persons, sprinkled over him the waters of the four seas, holy rivers etc., as the coronation ceremony even as Brhaspati did, as per procedure laid down in Sāstras, to Indra.
50. Having taken a full bath including his head (the matted hair whereof were dressed off), Rāma, attired richly and adorned with wreaths of flowers and ornaments, appeared resplendent with his elegently dressed and richly adorned (younger) brother and his consort Sītā.

51. When respectfully requested with a bow (to occupy the throne) by his brother Bharata, Rāma accepted the throne and protected in a fatherly way, his subjects who were devoted to their righteous duties according to the characteristics of their respective class in society (vāṇa) and stage in life (āśrama). The subjects on their part regarded him as their father.

52. While Rāma, a king, expert in Dharma (Law and righteous duties of everyone) ruled and brought happiness to every being, the period of his reign was like the Kṛta Age (the Golden Age) even though actually the Age called Tretā was then, current.

53. (During his reign) forests, rivers, mountains, sub-continents, continents and seas—all yielded whatever was desired by the subjects, Oh prominent Bhārata.

54. While Rāma, (the incarnation of) Lord Viṣṇu was the king, there was no trouble from anxieties, diseases, old age, fatigue, pain, sorrow, fear, exhaustion. Even death did not take the toll of unwilling persons.

55. Strict in the observance of the vow of having only one wife throughout his life, leading a pious life of a royal sage, and of pure character, he himself performed strictly his duties as a householder, teaching thereby (a model life) to the world.

56. By her deep love, obedience, pious character, disciplined modesty, intelligence and bashfulness, the chaste queen Sītā who understood the mind of her Lord, captivated Rāma’s heart.
CHAPTER ELEVEN

The Story of Rāma (concluded)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. The glorious Lord Rāma who was educated in his preceptor's academy, worshipped his ownself, viz. the Supreme Lord (Viṣṇu) who represents all gods in his person, by performing sacrifices with excellent materials.

2. (When the sacrifice was concluded), the Lord donated as sacrificial fee the eastern direction (eastern part of his empire) to the Hotr (the sacrificial priest who recites the mantras from the Rigveda), the Southern quarter to the sacrificial priest called Brahmā, the Western part to the adhvaryu (reciter of Sūktas from the Yajurveda), northern direction (northern part of his empire) to the priest that sang Sāma hymns in the sacrifice.

3. To his preceptor (Vasiṣṭha), he gave as grant the remaining portion of the land at the centre, considering a Brāhmaṇa who is devoid of any craving or desire, deserves all this.

4. In this way he was left with his clothes and ornaments (that were on his person), while the queen Sītā (princess of Videha) had only those ornaments which were essential for a lady whose husband is alive (the rest, she distributed to Brāhmaṇa ladies).

5. Perceiving this affection of the Lord who treated Brāhmaṇas as gods, the Brāhmaṇas were highly pleased and with their hearts overwhelmed with affection, returned all the gifts to him and said:

6. "Oh illustrious Lord! What is it that you have not given to us when entering into our hearts you dispel the darkness (of ignorance) by your effulgence, Oh ruler of the world.

7. We bow down to you, Oh Rāma who regard Brāhmaṇas as gods, and whose intelligence (i.e. knowledge) is boundless and unrestricted. You are the leader of those

1. ācāryavān, cf.
   ācāryavān puruṣo veda—Chāndogya up. 6.14.2
2. Conducted by excellent sage like Vasiṣṭha—VR.
possessing excellent renown. Your feet are being meditated upon by sages and recluses”.

8 Once upon a time, while Rāma went about in disguise and unnoticed at night, with a desire to know the pulse of the public, he overheard somebody speaking with reference to his queen Sītā.

9. “I would not accept you a wicked, unchaste woman who lived in the house of a stranger. Rāma, an exorbitant doter of that woman Sītā, might be retaining her, but I am not Rāma to have you again.”

10. In this way, Sītā was abandoned by her husband who was afraid of the myriad-tongued, ignorant, un placative public. She arrived at the hermitage of Vālmīki, the son of Pracetas.

11. Then being pregnant, in due course, she gave birth to twins—sons who came to be called Kuśa and Lava. The sage Vālmīki performed their purificatory rites (jātakarma).

12. Lākṣmaṇa had two sons known as Āṅgada and Cītraketu (Candraketu, Cakraketu), and Bharata’s sons were Takṣa and Puṣkala, Oh protector of the earth.

13-14. The sons of Śatrughna were Subāhu and Śrutasena. During the course of the conquest of directions (i.e. of the world) Bharata slew Gandharvas by tens of millions and collecting their wealth, he handed it over to the king Rāma. Śatrughna slew the demon Lavaṇa¹, the son of Madhu and built up a city called Mathurā, on the site of Madhuvanā.

15. Sītā who was forsaken by her husband, entrusted both of her sons to the sage (Vālmīki), and meditating upon the feet of Rāma, she entered into the bowels of the earth—so goes the tradition.

16.* Hearing of that news (about Sītā) and remembering of her various excellent virtues, (even) that glorious Lord Rāma was not able to restrain his grief, despite his attempts (to suppress it) by force of reason.

17. The attachment between men and women in this way brings (in its train) fear and affliction everywhere—even in the case of rulers of the world. What needs be said of ordinary persons whose minds are fixed on their house-hold (or of a common house-holder whose mind is attached to his house and property).

¹ Although Bh.P. calls him a demon, it means an unfriendly king, for his father Madhu was not a demon (vide infra 9.24.5).
*Deleted in V.J.’s text.

18. Thereafter the Lord (Rāma) led a life of strict continence, and continued to offer oblations to the sacrificial fire, for thirteen thousand years, without any interruption.

19. Leaving behind him in the heart of his devotees who meditate upon his foliage-like tender feet which were (once) pricked with thorns in the Dāndaka forest, Rāma then repaired to his own self-luminous region.

20. Rāma assumed this (human) form as a sport at the request of gods. His prowess (or essential nature) is free from (i.e. has no) equals or superiors. (Glorification of feats like) the destruction of Rākṣasas with multitudes of missiles or the construction of a bridge across the sea are no great praise in the case of Rāma. (It was only his sportive action). Were the monkeys his real helpmates in exterminating the enemies? (No).

21. I seek asylum with Rāma, the chief of Raghus, as my protector, whose pure glory efficacious enough to destroy all sins and serving as decorative ornaments to the elephants supporting the cardinal points (i.e. has spread all over the world)—is sung even today by sages (like Mārkaṇḍeya) in royal courts (as that of Yudhiṣṭhira), and whose lotus-like feet are adored by the crowns of the rulers of the celestial world (e.g. Indra), and Lord of wealth (Kubera) or by Protectors of the earth).

22. All the residents of the Kosal country by whom he was touched, seen, seated (by the side) or followed, attained to that region (Mokṣa) where persons expert in yoga go.

23* Oh King! A person who treasures up in his mind the story of Rāma, (heard) through his ears, and exercises

*VJ: ‘By merely listening to the name of Rāma, one becomes free from the bondage of karma. He quotes the following verse indicating how the whole world was imbued with Rāma, when Rāma was ruling:

rāmo rāmo rāma iti sarvesām abhavattadā /
saro Rāma-mayo loke yadd Rāmas toa pālayat //
This verse is quoted by VD also. control over his passions, becomes free from the bondage of Karmas (and is liberated from Samsāra).

The King (Parīksit) asked:

24. How did the glorious Lord Rāma behave with his brothers and relatives? How did he conduct himself? How did they (his kith and kin), his subjects and citizens of Ayodhyā (reciprocally) behave with their ruler?

Śrī Śuka replied:

25. When the coronation was over, Rāma, the sovereign ruler of the three worlds, directed his brothers to conquer (and protect) all the four quarters (i.e. countries all over the world). He granted audience to all his people, and looked after the capital city along with his attendants.

26. With its streets besprinkled with water perfumed with sandal etc. and with fragrant drops of ichor exuded from the temples of elephants in rut, the city appeared to be exceedingly intoxicated with rapturous joy at the return of its master.

27. It was beautified with gold domes (lit. pitchers) set on the crests of mansions, towers, assemblies, shrines, temples as well as with flags.

28. (The city was decorated) with (auspicious) arches erected with banana trees surrounded by (branches of) arecanut trees, (or decorations consisting of bunches of fruits and plantains) banners of fancy cloth, mirrors, canopies and wreaths of flowers.

29. With articles of worship (and presents) in their hands, citizens approached him at various places and conferred blessings on him and prayed, "Be pleased to protect the earth which you lifted up formerly (in your boar-incarnation)".

30. Perceiving (hearing) that their Lord had arrived after a lapse of a long period, his subjects—both men and women—left their household duties, and with a desire to see him directly, climbed up to the tops of their houses, but though their eyes remained unsatisfied with viewing the lotus-eyed Rāma, they showered him with flowers.

1. Vāśita-gāmiva—like a cow overwhelmed with passion
31-32. Thereafter, the Lord entered his own residence which was once occupied by his predecessor-king. It was rich in unlimited treasures of every kind, and was furnished with invaluable articles of furniture, coverings etc. It was beautified with doors the thresholds of which were of coral, and with rows of pillars of Vaidūrya (cat’s-eye) gems, reflecting (mirror like) floors of emeralds and walls of shining crystals.

33-34. It was decorated with garlands of various colours and kinds, with banners and buntings, with cloths, gems canopies and pearls brilliant like intelligence or at places the columns of vaidūrya (cat’s eye) were decorated with brilliant pearls and equipped with all beautiful covetable objects. It was full of fragrance of incenses and lights and was decorated with flowers. It was provided with the services of men and women who being beautiful like gods, enhanced the charm of ornaments (they put on) themselves.

35. It is reported that in that palace the glorious Lord Rāma, the chief of spiritually wise persons who find bliss in their own self, enjoyed himself with his affectionate darling Sitā.

36. Rāma whose foliage-like tender feet are contemplated upon by men, enjoyed for a great number of years all the pleasures at the proper time, without causing any violation of righteousness.

CHAPTER TWELVE

The Description of Ikṣvāku’s Race¹ (concluded)

Śrī Suka said:

1. From Kuṣa’s (Rāma’s son’s) loins sprang up Atithi who gave birth to Niṣadha, whose son was Nabha. Nabha’s son was Puṇḍarika from whom was born Kṣemadhanvā.

¹. This chapter gives a chronological statement of the kings in the Ikṣvāku family which will end with Sūmitra (118th king), as follows: (The list differs in some respects from Pargiter’s Table of Royal Genealogies in AIHT.)
2. His son was Devānīka who had a son called Anīha, whose son was Pāriyātra. His son was Bala from whom was born Sthala\(^1\) (Cala), and his son Vajra-nābha was born from an aṁśa—ray—of the Sun-god.

3. His son was Khagaṇa from whom Vidhṛti was born as a son. From Vidhṛti sprang Hiraṇyanābha who became a preceptor of \textit{yoga} and a pupil of Jaimini.\(^2\)

4. It was from Hiraṇyanābha that the sage Yājñavalkya of Kosala got instructions in \textit{yoga} pertaining to the science of the soul (spiritual lore), which leads to the attainment of great mystical powers (\textit{siddhis}), and cuts asunder the knot of ego or ignorance in the heart.

5. Hiraṇyanābha's son was Puṣya from whom was born Dhruvasandhi. His son was Agni-varṇa, the father of Śīghra who had Maru as his son.

6. It is this Maru who, having perfect mastery over \textit{yoga}, is still residing at a village called Kalāpā\(^3\) and at the end of Kali Age, he will revive the extinct solar race again.

Kuṣa→Atithi→Niṣadha→Nabha→Puṇḍarikā→Kṣema-dhanvā→Devānīka→Anīha→Pāriyātra→Bala→Sthala→Vajranābha→Khagaṇa→Vidhṛti→Hiraṇyanābha→Puṣya→Dhruvasandhi→Sudarṣana→Agnivarṇa→Śīghra→Maru→Praṣruta→Sandhi→Amarṣaṇa→Mahavān→Viśvasāhva→Praṣenajit→Taṇḍaka→Bṛhadabala (contemporary of Pāṇḍavas, but an ally of Kauravas; killed by Abhimanyu)→Bṛhadgaṇa→Urukriya→Vatsavṛddha→Praṭivyoma→Bhānu→Divāka→Sahadeva→Bṛhadaiśva→Bhānumān→Pratikāśa→Supratikā→Marudeva→Sunakṣaṭra→Puṣkara→Antarikṣa→Sutapā→Amitrajit→Bṛhadvāja→Barhis→Kṛtañjaya→Raṇañjaya→Sañjaya→Śākya→Śuddhoda→Lāṅgala→Praśenjit→Kṣudraka→Rañjaka→Suratha→Sumitra (kings from Bṛhadabala onwards ruled in the Kali Age).

1. GS.GD.BP. take Bala & Sthala as father and son. B.P. specifically states: \textit{Balasya Sthala-nāmā putro' bhavat ityarthā.}

2. Can this be the author of the Śūtras of Purvamimamsā or the pupil of Vyāsa as Hiraṇyanābha's 14th descendant Bṛhadabala was a contemporary of Pāṇḍavas? He is probably some ancient sage of the same name.

3. \textit{Kalāpā-grāma}: A village situated near Badarikāśrama vide \textit{Bh. P.} 10.87.7. From Nārada P. II. 67.6 it appears that Nārada and other sages were residents of this place. Here Maru and Devāpi, the last kings of the Solar and Lunar races, perform penance and wait to re-establish their dynasties at Ayodhya and Hastināpura after Kalki, the tenth incarnation of Viṣṇu, has established social and religious order. According to the
7. Maru’s son was Pra-Suśruta (or Suśruta), whose son was Sandhi, his son Amarśaṇa, who gave birth to Mahasvān, from whom was born Viśvasāhva.

8. Viśvasāhva’s son was Prasenajit whose son was Takṣaka; his son was Bṛhadbala who was killed in the battle by your father (Abhimanyu).

9. These are the kings of the Ikṣvāku race in the past. Now listen to the names of kings who are yet to come in future. Bṛhadbala will have (?) a son by name Bṛhadraṇa¹.

10. Bṛhadraṇa’s son will be Urukriya, whose son will be Vatsa-vṛddha; from him will spring Prativyoma whose son will be Bhānu; Bhānu’s son will be Divāka the leader of the celestial army.

11. Divāka’s son will be the great hero Sahadeva whose son will be Bṛhadaśva of whom will be born Bhānumān. Bhānumān’s son will be Pratikāśva whose son will be Supratikā.

12. From him will be born Marudeva, whose son will be Sunakṣatra. Thence will be Puṣkara whose son will be Antarikṣa; his son will be Sutapas, the father of Amitrajit.

13. From him will be born Bṛhadraja, whose son will be Barhis; thence Kṛtaṇjaya, whose son will be Raṇaṇjaya; thence will be born Saṇjaya.

14. From him will be born Śākya; of him Śuddhoda from whom in turn will spring Lāṅgala; thence will be Prasenajit from whom will be born Kṣudraka.

15. From Kṣudraka will spring Raṇaka who will have a son called Suratha. Suratha’s son Sumitra will be the last scion—These will be the kings descended in the race of Bṛhadbala.

16. The race of Ikṣvākus will end up with Sumitra for when he ascends the throne, the race of Ikṣvāku will be terminated and extinct in the Kali age.

Vāyu P. 91.7, Kalāpa is near Meru where Purūravas and Urvasī honey-mooned. N.L. De on the authority of Qol. Raper locates it near the source of Sarasvatī—a tributary of the Alakanandā, in Badrinath in Garhwal—GDAMI P 84.

¹ If Bṛhadbala is killed by Abhimanyu, Bṛhadraṇa must have been born after the Bhrāta war at the most, while Śuka is narrating these two generations after the Bhrāta war—The Translator.
CHAPTER THIRTEEN

The Description of the Race of Nimi

Śrī Śūkra continued:

1. After commencing the session of a sacrifice, Nimi, the son of Ikṣvāku invited Vasiṣṭha to officiate as a sacrificial priest (rtei). He, on his part, replied, “Oh king! I have been already requested by Indra (to conduct his sacrifice).

2. After completing his sacrifice, I shall return (to look after your sacrifice). Wait till then for me”. The house-

1. This chapter gives the genealogy of Nimi, the second son of Ikṣvāku, the original founder of the Janaka dynasty of Mithilā. The genealogy is practically the same as in Vāyu P. 91 and Viṣṇu P. 4.5.1-34. It is as follows:

Nimi → Janaka alias Mithi (Vāyu P. 89.5) → Udāvasu → Nandivardhana → Suketu → Devarāta → Bhadratha → Mahāvīrya → Sudhṛti → Dhṛṣṭaketu → Haryaśva → Maru → Pratīpaka → Krṣṭiratha → Devamīḍha → Viṣṇa → Mahādhṛti → Krṣṭirata → Mahārāj → Svarparomā → Hrṣavarama → Strādvaja (Sītā’s father) → Kuśadhvaja → Dharmadhvaja →

\[ \text{Krṣṭadhvaja} \quad \text{Mitadhvaja} \]

\[ \text{Kesidhvaja} \quad \text{Khāṇḍikya} \]

\[ \text{Bhānumān} → \text{Śatadyumna} → \text{Śuci} → \text{Sanadvaja} → \text{Urdhvaketu} → \text{Aja} → \text{Purujit} → \text{Ariṣṭanemi} → \text{Śrutāyu} → \text{Supārvaka} → \text{Citraratha} → \text{Kṣemardhi} → \text{Ariṣṭambara} → \text{Satyaratha} → \text{Upaguru} → \text{Upagupta} → \text{Vasvananta} → \text{Yuyudha} → \text{Subhāṣana} → \text{Śruta Jaya} → \text{Yājya} → \text{Ṛta} → \text{Śunaka} → \text{Vitābhaya} → \text{Dṛśī} → \text{Bahulāśva} → \text{Krṣṭi} → \text{Mahāvaśī}. \]

2. Nimi (v.l. Nemi) is a famous philosopher-king more popular with non-Brahmanical sects which are anti-sacrifice and pro-recluse types of life. Restricting ourselves to the Brahmanical purāṇas, we find the Nimi-legend in Matsya. P. 61.32-34, Vāyu P. 89.1-4. (The whole chapter tallies with the Bh.P.), Viṣṇu P. 4.5.1-15 (the whole prose chapter seems to be the basis of this ch. in the Bh.P.), Vālmiki Rām. Uttara. 55.4-21 and canto 57. The curse-episode whereby Nimi left off his physical body and refused to return seems to be an effort at popular etymologies of the capital town “Mithilā” of the country ‘Videha’, and the word ‘Nimiṣa’ (winking of the eyes). The special feature of the Mithilā kings was their expertise in philosophy and yoga which as Viṣṇu P. 4.5.34 puts it: prāyogaite ēṣma-vidyād-rayime bhūtāḥ bhagāntum. Generally these kings resorted to the science of the Soul (spiritual lore).’ The Bh. P. in the last verse of this ch. endorses the same view, “though it gives the credit to the grace of Yājñavalkya, the expert yogin.”
holder (Nimi, the performer of the sacrifice) kept silent. He (Vasiṣṭha) finished the sacrifice of Indra.

3. Nimi, himself a thoughtful philosopher, knew how life is transitory and proceeded with the sacrifice with the help of other sacrificial priests, while his preceptor did not return (was absent).

4. The preceptor returned after concluding Indra's sacrifice. Perceiving this disobedience on the part of his disciple, he cursed: 'Let the body of Nimi who conceitedly regards himself as a learned man, fall'.

5. Nimi reciprocated the imprecation of his preceptor who violated the path of righteousness: ‘May your body fall, as you do not know what is dharma due to covetousness’.

6. With these words Nimi, who was proficient in spiritual lore cast off his body. My great grand-father Vasiṣṭha was born of Urvāśī from Mitra and Varuṇa.

7. Preserving Nimi’s body in fragrant balms, the great sages, at the conclusion of the sacrificial session, spoke to the celestials who assembled there for the sacrifice.

8. “If ye Lords are (propitiated and) pleased, the body of the king be resuscitated”. “Amen! Be it so”, said the gods. The soul of Nimi resorted to his liṅga-Śāstra and spoke loudly, “Let me have no bondage of the physical body”.

9. Being afraid of separation from it, sages do not wish to have any contact (or union) with the body, but they devote themselves to the lotus-like feet of Hari (to escape from Samsāra).

10. I am not desirous of re-entering into the body which brings misery, grief and fear. It is because of the physical body that the death threatens the jīva on all sides and the peril of death is everywhere, as the fish have water on all sides.

Gods said:

11. “Oh incorporeal Nimi! May you live at your free will in the eyes of embodied beings.” Nimi thus took his place in the bodies of creatures, and is indicated by the opening and closing of eyelids.

12. Considering the fearful consequences of anarchy on the human beings, the great sages churned the body of Nimi and a son was born of him.

13. On account of this miraculous birth (or by being the founder of a dynasty), he became known as Janaka and was called “Vaideha” as he was produced from a life-less body or an incorporeal being, and ‘Mithila’ (‘Mithi’ in other Purāṇas) as he got his birth out of churning (of Nimi’s body). And the city of Mithilā was built up by him.¹

14. Janaka’s son was Udāvasu of whom was born Nandivardhana; his son was Suketu (Sukeśa) who gave birth to Devarāta, Oh King!

15. From him was born Bṛhadratha, whose son was Mahāvīrya, the father of Sudhṛt; from him sprang up Dhṛṣṭaketu; his son was Haryaśva, whose son was Maru.

16. Maru’s son was Pratīpaka whence was born Kṛti; his son was Devamīḍha whose son was Viśruta, the father of Mahādhṛti.

17. His son was Kṛtirāta whose son was Mahāromā; his son was Svarṣaromā from whom was born Hrasvaromā.

18. From him sprang up Siradhvaja, who while ploughing the earth for sacrifice, Sītā (the consort of Rāma) was born (discovered) at the point of the ploughshare. He is hence remembered as Sirā-dhvaja² (one whose plough gave him celebrity like a flag).

19. From him was born Kuśadhvaja, whose son was Dharmadhvaja. He (Dharma) had two sons called Kṛtadhvaja and Mitadhvaja.

20. From Kṛtadhvaja, Keśidhvaja, and from Mitadhvaja, Khaṇḍikya were born. The son of Kṛtadhvaja was expert in the spiritual lore, Oh King.

¹ Cf. Vālmiki Rām.—Uttara 57. 19 & 20.
² VD. quotes a legend from Adbhuta Rāmāyana, according to which Sītā was originally in the womb of Mandodari who deposited the foetus in the Kurukṣetra (?) and was discovered by Hrasvaromā.
21. Khāndikya was proficient in the path of action (karma-mārga), but being afraid of Kesidhvaja, he ran away (leaving his country), Kesidhvaja had a son called Bhānumān whose son was Sudyumna.

22. His son was Śuci, whose son was Sanadvāja; from Sanadvāja was born Ģrdhvaketu whose son was Aja, who had Purujit as his son.

23. His son was Ariṣṭanemi whose son was Śrutāyu; his son Supārśvaka gave birth to Citraratha, whose son Kṣemardhi was the king of Mithilā.

24. From him Samaratha whose son was Satyaratha; from him sprang Vpaguru whose son was Upagupta who was an ānśa of the Fire-god.

25. His son was Vasvananta, whose son was Yuyudha, from whom was born Subhāṣaṇa; his son was Śruta whose son was Jaya, the father of Vijaya. His son was Ṛta.

26. From him was born Śunaka, whose son was Vītahavya, from whom was born Dhṛti. From Dhṛti was born Bahulāśva, whose son was Kṛti noted for great self-control.

27. These are verily the kings of Mithilā who were all proficient in the Science of the Soul (Spiritual lore) through the grace of Yājñavalkya the master of yōga. Even though they led the life of householders, they were above the conflicting pairs like pleasure and pain, etc.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN
The Description of the Lunar Race

Śri Śuka Said:

1. After this (description of Mithilā kings), now listen to the hallowing race of Soma (the moon-god), in which will be glorified celebrated kings of auspicious fame, like Purūravas, the son of Ilā (Aila), Oh King.

1. Although Purūravas is regarded as the son of Ilā, Manu’s daughter, it is probable that this human founder of the Lunar race hailed from Ilā-ṛta, the region round-about mount Meru.

Madiye tvāldūtanā nama mahā-Meroḥ samantaḥ /—Matsya P. 113.19.
21. Khāṇḍikya was proficient in the path of action (karma-mārga), but being afraid of Kesidhvaja, he ran away (leaving his country), Kesidhvaja had a son called Bhānumān whose son was Sudyumna.

22. His son was Suci, whose son was Sanadvāja; from Sanadvāja was born Īrdhvaketu whose son was Aja, who had Purujit as his son.

23. His son was Ariṣṭanemi whose son was Śrutāyu; his son Supārvāka gave birth to Citraratha, whose son Kṣemardhi was the king of Mithilā.

24. From him Samaratha whose son was Satyaratha; from him sprang Vpaguru whose son was Upagupta who was an anta of the Fire-god.

25. His son was Vasvananta, whose son was Yuyudha, from whom was born Subhāsaṇa; his son was Śruta whose son was Jaya, the father of Vijaya. His son was Rta.

26. From him was born Śunaka, whose son was Vīthavaya, from whom was born Dhṛti. From Dhṛti was born Bahulāśva, whose son was Kṛti noted for great self-control.

27. These are verily the kings of Mithilā who were all proficient in the Science of the Soul (Spiritual lore) through the grace of Yājñavalkya the master of yoga. Even though they led the life of householders, they were above the conflicting pairs like pleasure and pain, etc.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

The Description of the Lunar Race

Śrī Śuka Said:

1. After this (description of Mithilā kings), now listen to the hallowing race of Soma (the moon-god), in which will be glorified celebrated kings of auspicious fame, like Purūravas, the son of Ilā (Aīla),¹ Oh King.

1. Although Purūravas is regarded as the son of Ilā, Manu's daughter, it is probable that this human founder of the Lunar race hailed from Ilā-Rta, the region round-about mount Meru.

Madhye tvirdītyah namā mahā-Meroḥ samantotah /—Matsya P. 113.19.
2. The creator (god Brahmā), born out of the lotus which was grown out of the deep pool-like navel of the Supreme Person of innumerable (lit. thousands of) heads, had a son called Atri, who was equal to his father in excellent qualities.

3. Wonderfully enough a Son called Soma was born out of his tears of joy, and hence he became an embodiment of nectar. He was appointed as the protector (or king) of Brāhmaṇas, (medicinal) plants and herbs and hosts of constellations and stars, by god Brahmā.

4. After conquering the three worlds, he worshipped Lord Viṣṇu by performing a Rājasūya sacrifice. Out of high notions about self-importance, he forcibly abducted Tārā,¹ the wife of Brhaspati.

5. Even though he was repeatedly and earnestly requested by Brhaspati, the preceptor of gods, out of arrogance, he refused to restore her (to Brhaspati). On this issue was fought a battle between gods and demons.

6. Out of hatred against Brhaspati, Śukra along with Asuras, espoused the cause of Soma, the Lord of stars, while god Śiva surrounded by his hosts of goblins took the side of Brhaspati, his preceptor’s son.²

7. The great Indra, accompanied by all the hosts of gods, followed his preceptor (Brhaspati). Thus, for the sake of Tārā, a great battle was fought, resulting in the destruction of gods and demons.

8. The Creator of the Universe (god Brahmā) was then appealed to in this matter by Anāgiras (Brhaspati’s father). Brahmā threatened Soma and made him restore Tārā to her husband who found her to be pregnant.

9. (Brhaspati ordered Tārā): “Cast off, uproot from my field (i.e. get aborted) what has been sown there by others

Roughly this corresponds to the region round modern Pamirs. Purūravas and his descendants had contacts with ‘gods’ who are now identified as Aryans who inhabited the northern part of Pamirs or Uttara Kuru—vide D.P. Mitra—Proto. Hist. of India, ch.I.

1. This is a symbolism, rooted in the vedic doctrine of Soma. For details vide Agrawal—M.P. A study, pp. 130-31.

2. God Śiva’s preceptor was sage Anāgiras, the father of Brhaspati

—SR—
(or enemies), oh wicked-minded woman. I shall not reduce you to ashes as you are a woman, and I am desirous of having an issue (through you), oh good lady!"

9A. To her was born a son of golden complexion, the destroyer of Dasyus (or evil beings).

10. Overwhelmed with shame, Tārā delivered a son who was lustrous like gold in complexion. And both Bṛhaspati, the son of Aṅgiras, and Soma desired to have the son as his own (as a kṣetrajña son—born of his field, viz. wife in the case of the former, and as a vīryajña son—born of his own semen—in the case of the latter).

11. While they (Bṛhaspati and Soma) were wrangling vociferously, "This (son) is mine and not yours", sages and gods enquired (of Tārā), but through sense of shame, she kept mum.

12. Enraged at the sham modesty of his mother (Tārā), the son exploded, "Why don't you speak, you woman of immoral behaviour? Confess to me immediately your sin".

12A. (Although you deserve that punishment) I shall not burn you to ashes (with a curse) for concealing your sinful act (as after all you are my mother). But god Brahmā censured the audacious reviler in her presence.

13. God Brahmā then invited her aside, and consoling her in camera, he (sympathetically) enquired. With great hesitation and slowly, she confessed in a low tone, "Soma's." And immediately Soma took possession of the child.

14. The self-born god (Brahmā) gave the child the name Budha (the intelligent and wise). By the penetrating intelligence and deep wisdom of his son Budha, the moon-god, the king of stars, became highly delighted.

15-16. As already narrated (vide Supra 9.1.35) 'Puru-sravas was born of Budha and Ilā. On hearing of the personal charms, excellences, generosity, nobility of character, affluence

1. And as there is no son to ensure the continuity of my family—VR.
2. v.l. janaka-prabham—was like his father in complexion and beauty.
3. With due respect to these annotators, I fail to understand why god Brahmā took Tārā into confidence to ascertain who was the real father of the child.—The Translator.

* This verse is noted by VR also.
and deeds of valour as extolled by the celestial sage Nārada in the palace of Indra (the king of gods), the celestial nymph Ürvaśī was afflicted by shafts of the god of love, and she approached Purūravas.¹

17. Being reduced to the status of human beings due to the curse of Mitra and Varuṇa, and hearing (the report that) that great personage was beautiful like the god of Love incarnate, she mustered sufficient courage, and presented herself to his presence.

18. With his eyes fully blooming with great joy at her sight, and with his hair standing on their end (with ecstatic delight), the king spoke to her softly in winsome words.

_The King said:_

19. Welcome is your arrival, Oh beautiful lady. Be pleased to take a (comfortable) seat. What can we do for you? Enjoy yourself fully with me. Let our mutual enjoyment of love last for innumerable years.

_Ürvaśī replied:_

20. "Whose mind and eye will not be attracted by and fixed on you, oh charming Prince? Having caught a glimpse of

¹ This story (of Purūravas and Ürvaśī) is an elaboration of the dialogue between Purūravas and Ürvaśī recorded in RV. 10.95. Many verses from that _Sūkta_ are assimilated _verbatim_ in the Bh.P. e.g. RV. 10.95, 1, 14, 15. The textual similarity has been noted by all commentators. VJ. however is more elaborate in this respect. Even an ordinary reader will hear the echo of RV.10.95.1 (repeated in _Satapatha Br._ 11.5.1-6)

`hayē jāye manasaḥ tiṣṭha ghore / vacāhī mitrā kṛṇavāhāi nu //`

in _Bh.P._ 9.14.34

`aho jāye tiṣṭha tiṣṭha ghore na tyaktum arhāsi /
mahī traṁ adyāpyamivṛthyā vacāhī kṛṇavāhāi //`

If we accept the hypothesis of Rajaram Shastri Bhagawat who, in 1907, showed in his _Key to Interpret Veda_, that Devas were a race of men and Indra their leader’s designation (and there is no reason to disbelieve it as scholars like R.N. Dandekar, D.D. Kosambi endorsed it independently), and M. Ali’s identification of Kirghizia, Samarkand (Sogdiana of the Greeks) and Turkemenistan with _Deva-loka_ (The Geography of the Purāṇas, pp. 63-83), the contract marriage between a lady from Ur (Ürvaśī) and a king hailing from Ilāvṛta—Aila Purūravas, appears quite a human episode with historical basis. The geographical vicinity of his kingdom to Deva-loka made it possible for him and his descendants to fight as allies of Indra.
your bosom (lit. having approached your bosom) I become overpowered with the desire of enjoying life with you, and lose the control over my mind.

21. Oh King! Be pleased to protect the two lambs as my pledges. Oh respecter of the respectable! I shall enjoy life fully with you. For he who (by his qualities of beauty etc.) appears praise-worthy (to a woman) is remembered (ordained in the Śṛuti texts) as acceptable to women.

22. Oh warrior King! My food will consist of ghee only. And I shall not see you without clothes except on the occasion of sexual intercourse.” The noble-minded king agreed to the conditions.

23. “Oh what elegant form! How noble sentiment, that enchants the entire humanity! What man will not attend upon a goddess who presents herself of her own accord.”

24. In her company she offered him all pleasures worthy of him. The eminent person (king Purūravas) enjoyed with her at will, and to the full, in the pleasure gardens of gods such as Caitrarātha (the garden of Kubera).

25. Enjoying amorous pleasures with the goddess (or the queen) whose person was fragrant like lotus-filaments, and being enraptured by the sweet smell of her mouth, he revelled many years delightfully with her.

26. Not seeing Urvaśī (in his court) and feeling, “My assembly does not look very charming without Urvaśī,” Indra directed Gandharvas (to bring her).

27. Approaching at dead of night when the world was steeped in darkness, and through their Māyā, they stole the two rams which were pledged for safe custody with the king, by his queen Urvaśī.

28. Hearing the bleating of her son-like rams, as they were being carried away, queen Urvaśī lamented loudly, “I am undone by this sheepish husband, lacking in manliness but posing vaingloriously as a hero.

29. Trusting in him, I am ruined and despoiled of my children (—like lambs) by robbers. Like a woman who is full of fear at night, he sleeps terror-stricken at night, and poses himself as a man when it is (broad) day (—light).
29A. Let me be free! Leave me immediately! Take away your arm that clasps around me. He is too timid to leave me, and cunning, and addicted to licentious sexual pleasure only."

30. Being pierced with these verbal shafts, and like an elephant pricked with goads, he caught hold of his sword and sallied forth in rage, in the dead of night, even though he was naked.

31. The Gandharvas let go the two rams, but flashed out light like lightning, when she caught a glimpse of her husband in a nude state, coming with the two rams (and thus left him).

32. Not finding his wife in the bed, Purūravas, the son of Ilā, became despondent. His heart being fixed on her, he was beside himself (with affliction). He ranged over the world (in search of her), like a mad man.

33. (In the course of his wanderings, one day) he happened to see her along with her five female companions with their countenances blooming with delight, on the bank of the Sarasvati, in Kurukṣetra. Purūravas addressed her the following (persuasive) charming words (recorded in the Sūkta, RV 10.95 which is adapted here as follows):

34. "Oh my beloved wife! Do stop awhile, wait. Oh cruelhearted one! It does not behove you to abandon me without giving me pleasure of your company to my satisfaction (or unsated as I am of the pleasures of your company, you ought not to relegate me to terrible misery). Let us (at least) have some (heart to heart) talk."

35. If this beautiful body of mine which has been drawn away to such a far off distance by you, be not the recipient of your favours, it will fall down dead here only.

---

1. Cf. RV 10.95.1.
2. Cf. RV.10.95.14. V.J. reads Sudevo'yam for Sudeho'yam, which opens RV 10.95.14 (Sudevo atra prapatet). V.J. explains the Ṛk rather than this verse Sudeva—This human body which is the tool or means of getting knowledge (gati-laksana-jñāna-sādhanam).

VR. explains the v.l. Sudevo'yam: Here Purūravas addresses his own soul—the Inner Controller. He construes gṛdhra (greedy, voracious) as the adj. qualifying Ṛkas—wolves in the form of sense-organs which afflict the individual soul.
and wolves and vultures will prey upon it, Oh my queen (Oh goddess).

Urvâsî replied:

36. Do not die. You are a man (as such you must be courageous). Let not these wolves (in the form of passionately craving senses) devour you today (Control your senses). The heart of women like the heart of wolves is friendly to none.¹

37. Women are merciless, cruel, jealous and mind no risk for the object of their love. Even for a trifling matter, they will kill their trustful husband or unsuspecting brother.

38. After inspiring confidence in gullible persons (through deceitful behaviour), they snap asunder all friendly relations. The unchaste women, being wantonly wayward in behaviour, hunt (long) after a new lover (every now and then).

39. My lord, at the end of the year, you will stay with me for one night. You will have other children also, (in addition to the one I carry).

40. Noticing that the queen was pregnant, he returned to his capital. At the end of the year, he came back again to find Urvâsî, as the mother of a hero.

41. Full of delight to have her again, he spent that night with her. Then finding him disheartened at the prospect of impending separation, Urvâsî advised him:

42. “You propitiate these Gandharvas (by praise), and they will be pleased to give me unto you.”

Being pleased with his laudatory prayer, the Gandharvas donated him a fire-vase (for fire-worship which will lead him to the region of Urvâsî) Oh King. (Being blinded with passion) he believed that fire-vessel to be (the means of securing) Urvâsî, and roved in the forest with it, only to discover it to be a vase for carrying fire, and not Urvâsî.

43. Depositing the vase in the forest, he returned to his palace, and contemplated throughout the night on Urvâsî. In

¹. The verses echo the text of RV. 10.95.15 while VV. 36-39 explain it. Cf.

 xưa-vajra mát myôd, mát pra pâôto má tod upkáso aśîkaâù u kṣan / na vai striaudmî sakhyâmî santí sâldopâêmî hṛdayâneśhâ //—RV. 10.95.15 the meanwhile (the Kṛta age ended and) the Tretā Age set in, and the knowledge of trinity of Vedas which contained prescriptions, for the ritualistic performance of sacrifices, revealed itself in his mind.

44. Returning to the spot (in the forest) where the fire vase was kept (by him), he noticed an asvattha (Peepal) tree grown out from the ‘womb’ of the Śami tree. With a desire to attain to the region of Urvāśī, he made two aranīs (churning sticks) out of them (with a view to enkindle fire by friction).

45. Reciting the mantra ‘Urvāśyāṁ urasi Purūravāḥ’ (Purūravas is on Urvāśī), the powerful king contemplated the lower piece of arañi (churning stick) as Urvāśī and the upper arañi to be himself, and the intermediate piece between them as their issue (son), (the king churned out the fire while saying the mantra prescribed for such frictional fire).

46. By that friction of churning was enkindled a fire (flame) which is called Jātaveda (that from which wealth and every enjoyable object is produced). It was consecrated by the method prescribed in the three Vedas. It assumed three forms⁴—āhavanīya, gārhapatiya and daksināgni. As it, with its three forms, leads to the celestial regions, it was adopted as his son by the king Purūravas.

47. Wishing to attain to the region of Urvāśī he, (Purūravas), worshipped with that sacrificial fire (produced by attrition from aranīs) the glorious Lord Hari, who is the presiding Deity of sacrifices and is Supra-sensuous and who represents all gods in His Person.

48. Formerly (in the Kṛta Age), there was only one Veda viz. the sacred syllable OM which formed the basis of all speech; there was but one God Nārāyaṇa and no other; there was only one Fire (and not three) and only one caste viz. Haṁsa.

49. (In the Kṛta Age), all people had the predominance

1. These are the three forms of householder’s perpetual sacrificial fires: The āhavanīya is the eastern. The Gārhapatiya is another perpetual fire transmitted from one generation to another and from this, fires for sacrificial purposes are lighted; the daksināgni is the sacred fire placed to the south.
of _Sattva_ and hence were devoted to spiritual meditation. In the Tretā Age, _rajas_ being the dominant quality, the path of ritualistic acts based on the three Vedas became evolved.
Since the time of Purūravas, when the Tretā Age dawned, there came into existence the trinity of the Vedas (and the path of ritualistic action based on them), Oh King. As the King accepted the Fire-god as his son (i.e. maintained the sacrificial fire like unto his son), the king attained to the realm of Gandharvas.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

The Story of Paraśurāma. Sahasrārjuna Slain

Śri Śuka said:

1. Purūravas, the son of Ilā, had six sons by Īrvaśī, Oh
   King. They were Āyu, Śrutāyu, Satyāyu, Raya, Vijaya and Jaya.

2. Śrutāyu’s son was Vasumān; Śrutaṅjaya was Satya’s son. Raya’s son was Eka, and Jaya’s son was Amita.

3. Vijaya had a son called Bhīma whose son was Kañcana from whom was born Hotraka. His son was Jahnu who took all the waters of the Gaṅgā in his folded palms, and drank up the whole river. Jahnu’s son was Puru, whose son was Balāka and his son was Ajaka.

4. From him (Ajaka) was born Kuśa who had four sons
   Kuśāmbu’s son was Gādhi.

5. A Brāhmaṇa called Rcīka sought Gādhi’s daughter, princess Satyavatī in marriage. Considering that the bridegroom was unworthy of her, king Gādhi spoke to Rcīka of the Bhṛgu clan:

6. “We belong to the race of Kuśa, and as such one thousand horses white and bright like the moon, but with one black ear be given as the dowry for the girl.”
7. When he was thus replied, he understood the intention of Gādhi. Having approached Varuṇa, he brought and delivered the required horses of the said description and married that lovely princess.

8. The sage Rṣiṇka was solicited by his wife and by his mother-in-law both of whom were desirous of having a son. He prepared Caru—an oblation of rice, barley and pulse boiled in butter and milk for presentations to gods—consecrated them severally—the one, for his wife, with Brāhma mantras, and the other, for his mother-in-law, consecrated with Kṣātra mantras. And then the sage went for having his bath.

9. In the meanwhile (during his absence), Satyavati, was requested by her mother (to give her) the Caru (sacrificial boiled rice) meant for Satyavati herself, considering that to be superior. She gave that Caru (meant for herself) to her mother, and ate the one apportioned for her mother.

10. On learning of this (exchange of Carus), the sage told his wife, “Alas! What grievous mistake you have committed! Your son will be a terrible chastiser (like god of death), and your brother will be a prominent knower of Brahman (the Vedas or the Supreme Deity).

11. Propitiated by persuasive prayer that such eventuality should not materialise, sage Rṣiṇka of the Bhrigu clan said, “If so, your grandson will be of that nature”. Then Jamadagni was born.

12. Then Satyavati was transformed into a very sacred river Kausāki, the sanctifier of the world. The tradition goes that Jamadagni married Renuka, the daughter of (King) Renu.

13. They say that several sons like Vasumat and others were begotten on her by the sage Jamadagni of the Bhrigu clan. The youngest of them born was the great celebrity Rāma (Parāśu-rāma).

14*. They say that he was a ray (aśita) of Vāsudeva (Lord Viṣṇu) and the exterminator of the Haihaya clan. He

*The Bh.P. contains two main legends from the life of Parashurama viz. 1. The slaying of Kārtavirya or Sahasrārjuna and 2. Beheading his mother and brothers and reviving them.

The legends of Parashurama narrated here are found in MBH Adi. 2.4-7 64.4; Aśamādhyika chs. 29 & 30 and in Brahmāṇḍa P. II.36-40.
is said to have rendered this earth devoid of Kṣatriyas twenty-one times.

15. He destroyed the wicked Kṣatriya race turned inimical to Brāhmaṇas, and constituted as if a burden to the earth. Even on the slightest provocation or commission of a slight offence, he killed the Kṣatriyas enveloped by (i.e. full of) rajas and tamas.

The king (Parīkṣit) asked:

16. What offence against that glorious sage (Parāśurāma) was committed by Kṣatriyas of uncontrolled nature that led to the repeated extermination of the entire Kṣatriya race (by him)?

Sri Suka narrated:

17. Arjuna, a prominent Kṣatriya and the ruler of Haihayas (a branch of Yādavas) propitiated Datta (Dattatreya), a partial (āṁśa) incarnation of Lord Nārāyaṇa, by rendering to him various acts of service (and worship).

18-19. Through him (Datta’s grace), he secured a thousand arms, unassailable formidability against the enemies, uninterrupted and insuperable power of senses and organs, splendour, affluence, glory, prowess, fame, physical strength, mastery over yoga including supreme spiritual powers characterised by the capacity to assume atomic size etc. His movements and speed being thus unimpeded, he moved about the world free as a wind.

20. While sporting in the waters of the Narmadā, in company of (lit. surrounded by) jewel-like (charming) women, and wearing the Vaijayanti wreath (of nine well-known gems) he, being intoxicated with pride, obstructed the course of the river with his one thousand arms.

21. (Rāvana was on his expedition of the world conquest and was camping on the bank of the Narmadā, near Māhīṣmati, Sahasrārjuna’s capital and was then engaged in worship). Finding his encampment flooded with the waters of the river flowing in the opposite direction, Rāvana, the tenheaded demon, who regarded himself as the only hero in the world, did not tolerate that (display of) prowess (by Sahasrärjuna).

22. When Rāvaṇa (tried to attack him during the water-sports and thus) offended Sahasrärjuna, he (Rāvaṇa) was sportively seized in the very presence of women, and was kept captive like a monkey at his capital Māhiṣmati and was (ultimately) let off as a worthless fellow.

23. On one occasion, while Arjuna was on a hunting expedition in an impassable forest, he perchance, happened to come to the precincts of the hermitage of the sage Jamadagni.

24. Through the grace of his Kāmadhenu (wish-yielding cow), the sage whose wealth was (nothing but his) penance, however, offered a warm reception (with due formalities) to the king, his ministers, men in his army and even the animals that carried them.

25. Finding the affluence of the sage far surpassing his own, the warrior who was accompanied by his Haihaya clansmen, cherished covetousness for the wish-yielding cow which was essential for maintaining sacrificial fires (agni-hotra), and did not appreciate the warm hospitality.

26. Out of arrogance and pride, he commanded his men to take away the sage’s cow of plenty (which yielded milk, ghee etc. as oblations to sacrificial fires), and they forcibly carried off the screaming cow and her calf to (the king’s capital) Māhiṣmati.

27. After the king’s departure, (Paraśu)-Rāma arrived at the hermitage. Being informed of the act of wickedness of the king, he got enraged like a serpent that is hit.

28. Equipping himself with his formidable axe, a bow with quivers and a shield, the irresistible hero rushed after him like a lion chasing a king elephant of a herd.

29. As Arjuna was entering his capital, he noticed the prominent Bhṛgu, Paraśurāma bearing a bow and armed with arrows and an axe, wearing a black deer-skin and with matted hair resplendent like the sun, rushing (after him) with an irresistible force.

30. (To oppose him) Arjuna directed seventeen very formidable divisions (aksauhiṇī)\(^1\) consisting of elephants, chariots, cavalry and infantry equipped with maces, swords, arrows, javelins, Sataghnis (a rocket-like missile or a cylindrical block of wood studded with iron pikes) and darts or lances (Saktis). But the glorious Lord Rāma singlehandedly slaughtered them all.

\(^1\) For the details of the strength of an aksauhiṇī vide Bh.P.VII.I.P. 71 ftn. No. 271.

31. In whatever direction, Rāma, the destroyer of hostile forces, moved with the velocity of the wind and mind, striking down with his axe, there fell down on the ground enemies with their arms, thighs and necks chopped off and their charioteers and animals slain.

32. Perceiving that his army is laid low on the battlefield in the mire caused by streams of blood, with their shields, flags, bows and bodies minced down by the axe and shafts of Rāma, the Haihaya King Arjuna, rushed forward in rage.

33. Now Arjuna (being thousand-armed) simultaneously fitted shafts on five hundred bows in order to discharge them at Rāma. But Rāma, the undisputed leader of all whoever wielded missiles, with one bow in his hand at once—synchronously—cut down all Arjuna’s bow and arrows with his shafts.

34. In that fight, while Arjuna was rushing towards Rāma uprooting rocks and trees with his (numerous) hands (to hurl them at Rāma), Rāma forestalled him and quickly cut down his arms like the hoods of serpents, with his axe of a hard and sharp edge.

35. After lopping off all his arms, Rāma chopped off Arjuna’s head like the peak of a mountain. When their father was thus killed, Arjuna’s ten thousand sons ran away in panic.

36. Rāma, the subduer of hostile forces, restored the cow (essential for the maintenance of Agnihotra) along with her calf. Returning to his hermitage, he duly presented the afflicted cow to his father.

37. Rāma, described to his father and brothers (Arjuna’s moves) and his exploits; but the sage Jamadagni (disapprovingly) remarked:

38. “(Dear) Rāma! Oh Rāma of mighty arms! You have committed a sin. You have unnecessarily killed a king (a god among men) who represents all gods in his person.

39. Oh dear child! We are Brāhmaṇas! We have become objects of veneration and worship through forbearance, just as god Brahmā, the creator of the world, has attained to the status of Paramēṣṭhī (the supreme ruler of the world) through forgiveness.

40. It is on account of forgiveness and patience that the Brāhmanic glory shines like the splendour of the sun. Even glorious Lord Hari, the Ruler of the Universe, become seasily pleased with persons of forgiving spirits.

41. Slaying of a king whose head is consecrated in coronation, is more heinous than that of killing a Brāhmaṇa.
Oh child! Now expiate your sin by bathing in holy waters, devoting your mind (all the while) to Lord Viṣṇu (Acyuta).”

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

The Story of Parāsurāma1 (concluded)

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. Rāma who was thus admonished by his father, consented (with words) “Be it so”. After spending one year in visiting holy places, he returned to his hermitage, Oh princes of the Kuru race!

1. The legend of Parāsurāma ends in this chapter. The Bh.P., like the MBH, seems to be composed under the influence of Bṛgu and this legend may be called the Bṛgu version of the feud between the Bṛgu and Haihayas. Bṛgu (Gk: Phrugas) as the name of the clan suggests, probably hailed from Phrygia in Western Asia Minor. From the Purānic accounts, they seem to have settled on the Western Coast in India and Bṛguaccha (Broach, Gujrat), Śūpāraka (Sopārā, Thana District, Maharashtra) appear to be the centres of their settlement. They were a sea power. Till the time of Kṛtavīrya (Arjuna’s father), Bṛgu and Haihayas seemed to be on good terms. But the Haihayas’ policy of expansion had long back alarmed Bṛgu, and their leaders contracted matrimonial alliances with the royal houses of Kānyakubja and Ayodhyā by the marriage of Rcika and Jamadagni with the princesses thereof.
Arjuna, Kṛtavīrya’s son was an able, ambitious ruler. He seems to have raided Jamadagni’s ‘hermitage’ (1)—if a centre which can receive and feed a king and his army in a royal way, and if its affluence surpasses a sovereign emperor’s palace, can be called so—probably to forestall Bṛgu
2. On one occasion, when Reṇukā went to the Gaṅgā (for bringing water), she happened to see Citraratha, the king of Gandharvas, adorned with a wreath of lotuses, sporting with celestial nymphs (in the water).

3. Reṇukā who came to the river to fetch water, conceived just a passing longing for Citraratha, and forgot the time fixed for the Homa (sacrificial worship) while gazing at the sporting king.

4. Realizing the delay caused thereby, and being afraid of the sage’s (Jamadagni’s) curse, she hastened back, kept the pitcher of water before him, and remained standing with folded palms.

5. Gathering the faithlessness of his wife, the sage got enraged and commanded, “Oh sons! Kill this sinful woman”. Despite this order, none obeyed.

6. Rāma who was fully aware of the powers of the sage through his spiritual meditation and penance, promptly despatched his brothers along with his mother, when directed to do so by his father.

7. Jamadagni, the son of Satyavatī, was pleased with him (Paraśurāma) and asked him to seek a boon. Rāma re-designs just on the borders of his kingdom. Though under the able leadership of Rāma, the northern allies of Bhrgus including kings of Vaiśāli, Videha, Kānyakubja and Ayodhyā defeated Haihayas probably in twenty-one battles, and though Rāma was able to kill Arjuna in a surprise attack while the latter was returning from his hunting expedition, the Bhrgus had ultimately to migrate to the north India and spread along the southern part of the western coast of India. Whatever may be the actual historical facts of this traditional feud, it was not a contest between Brāhmaṇas and Kṣatriyas on caste basis, as some misrepresent it. For, right from the days of Cyavana Bhārgava, Bhrgus had marriage alliances with Kṣatriyas, and Rāma’s mother, Rāma’s grandmother (Rečika’s wife) were Kṣatriya princesses. The real cause was economic and political rivalry, and attempts of Haihayas to spread their kingdom to the Doab and other parts of northern India. After Paraśurāma’s retirement, Haihayas consolidated their position in Malwa, Rajastahan and Western India and carried their raids against Ayodhyā, Kānyakubja, Kosal and Kāśī. As irony of fate would have it, the last Haihaya prince Vitihotra on the throne of Benares, had to seek refuge with a Bhārgava sage and Viti-hotra became a Brāhmaṇa. Him little is heard about Haihayas—Vedic Age, pp.283-87 (History and Culture of Indian People Vol.1).
quested the boon that all those who had been killed, should be restored to life, and should not remember who slew them.

8. Immediately they got up hale and hearty as if from a sound sleep. Rāma had killed his kith and kin (mother and brothers), as he had known the spiritual power of his father.

9. Oh king! The sons of Arjuna who, being vanquished by the valour of Rāma, had fled, continued to brood over the killing of their father (by Rāma) and found no mental peace anywhere.

10. On one occasion, when Parasurāma along with his brothers had left for the forest, they (the sons of Arjuna), desirous of avenging (for the killing of their father by Rāma), found a (favourable) opportunity, and entered the hermitage.

11. Determined to murder Jamadagni, they saw the sage sitting with his mind concentrated upon the glorious Lord of excellent renown, in the sacrificial hall, and killed him.

12. Though piteously entreated by the helpless mother of Parasurāma, those hard-hearted dregs of the Kṣatriya community, forcibly severed his head and carried it away.

13. Overwhelmed with grief and deep anguish, and beating herself with her own hands, the chaste lady Reṇukā screamed loudly, “Oh Rāma! Rāma! come (quickly) Oh child”.

14. Hearing from afar, a distressful call “Oh Rāma”, Rāma hastened to the hermitage to find his father killed.

15. Overwhelmed and confounded with sorrow, rage, impetuosity, affliction and intense grief, Rāma bewailed “Oh saintly father! Oh righteous-most sire! Leaving us behind here, you proceeded to heaven.”

16. After lamenting thus, Parasurāma entrusted the body of his father to his brothers. Taking his axe with him, he determined to exterminate the Kṣatriya race entirely.

17. Sallying forth to the city of Māhiṣmatī, the splendour of which was already lost due to the murder of a Brāhmaṇa (Jamadagni), he built up (as it were) a huge mountain c? the heads of the sons of Sahasrārjuna in the heart of the city.

18-19. With the blood of those (Haihayas), he created a terrible river which aroused fear in the heart of the enemy.
of Brāmaṇas. When the Kṣatriyas had taken to wicked (inauspicious) ways, he made the murder of his father as a cause of action and completely annihilated the Kṣatriyas thrice seven times\(^1\) from the earth, and caused (the creation of) pools of blood\(^2\) in Samantapāṇcaka (Kurukṣetra) Oh King.

20. Recovering the head of his father (taken away by the sons of Arjuna), he joined it to the trunk of his father’s body. Keeping it on the Kuśa grass, he worshipped by performing sacrifices, the Deity, his own Soul, who represents all gods in his person.

21. (It is verily reported that) as daksinā (gift for performance of sacrifices), he gave the eastern quarter (the eastern part of the earth) to the Hotṛ, the southern quarter to the Brahmacā, the western direction to the Adhvaryu and the northern direction to the Udgāty.

22. To others he donated (lands in) the intermediate quarters, and the central portion of the earth to sage Kaśyapa, Āryāvarta (region between the Himalayas and the Vindhya mountain) to the sacrificial supervisors (upadraśtas) and the land lying beyond that to Sadasyas (judges or superintendents of sacrifices).

23. Having washed off all his sins in the conclusive ablution at the end of the sacrifice in the river Sarasvati, the embodiment of the Veda, he shone resplendent like the sun with clouds dispelled.

24. Having regained his (spiritual) body characterised by pure consciousness, Jamadagni became the seventh star\(^3\) in the sphere of sages in the sky (Ursa Major), and was worshipped by Rāma.

25. (It is said that) verily this son of Jamadagni, the glorious Rāma of lotus-like eyes, will be the propagator of the

---

1. ŚR informs us that according to tradition, Renuka beat her breast twenty one times, and hence Rāma destroyed Kṣatriyas as many times.
2. VR. states that the v.1 bradda nova is wrong, as the place is called S(y)amanta-paścaka and not S-novuka and the MBH. Adi. records S-paścaka as the name 2.4-11.
3. VC. gives the list of seven sages presiding over the seven stars in the constellation Ursa Major as follows: Kāśyapa, Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Kīrvāṇastra, Gautama, Bharadvāja and Jamadagni.
Vedas—one of the seven sages, the authorities over the Vedas—in the coming Manvantara.

26. Even today he resides on the Mahendra mountain. He has laid down the rod of punishment, and is now perfectly serene in mind. His deeds are being sung by Siddhas, Gandharvas and Cāraṇas.

27. In this way, the glorious Lord Hari, the Ruler of the world, the very Soul of (all beings in) the Universe incarnated Himself in the Bhṛgu clan, and lightened the burden of the earth by killing several times the Kṣatriyas (or lords of men).

28. Gādhi (the King of Kānyakubja) begot a son (Viśvāmitra) whose superb majestic personality was brilliant like a blazing fire. By virtue of his asceticism and austere penance, he transcended his Kṣatriya status and attained the glory of Brahmanism.

29. Viśvāmitra had a hundred sons. Out of them Madhucchandās was the middle, but all of them are known by the same (group) name Madhucchandās, Oh King!

30. Having adopted as his son Śunahśepa, the son of Ajigarta of the Bhṛgu clan, who was given to him by gods and hence named as Devarāta, he told his sons, “Let this (Śunahśepa) be regarded by you as your eldest (brother).”

31. It was verily the same person who was sold as a human ‘sacrificial beast’ (victim) for the sacrifice of Ḫariścandra and who through his prayer to gods and Lords of creation (like Varuṇa) was released from the bondage of cords (that tied him to the sacrificial post).

32. He who was protected and given by gods in the sacrifice offered to Varuṇa, came to be known as Devarāta among the Gādhi family and that ascetic was known as Śunahśepa in the family of Bhṛgus.

33. The brothers who were elder than Madhucchandās did not approve of it (the order of Viśvāmitra to recognize

1. As ŚR. points out, this explains why Devarāta is one of the Pravars of the Kauśika Gotra, even though as a rule a Pravara belongs to the same Gotra.
3. e.g. Śuktas like RV. 1.25.
Devarāta as their eldest brother). The enraged sage cursed them, "Ye wicked fellows! Be ye all mlecchas (outcast barbarians)".

34. It is reported that, thereupon Madhucchandas along with his fifty brothers submitted, "we shall accept the status and abide by whatever you command us."

35. To the seer of Vedic mantras (Śunahśeṣapā) they told him, "We are all your younger brothers." And thus they recognized him as their eldest brother. Viśvāmitra (being highly pleased) said to his sons, "As you have maintained my respect as your father, and have made me worthy as a father with heroic sons, may you all be blessed with progeny".

36. "Oh descendents of Kauśika family, this Devarāta is one of you (as a scion of your family); obey his orders." Viśvāmitra had also other sons viz. Aṣṭaka, Hārīta, Jaya, Kratumat and others.

37. In this way the Kauśika family came to be divided into different branches through the sons of Viśvāmitra, and it had another different Pravara due to the adoption of Devarāta.¹

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

The Lunar Dynasty—The Descendants of Āyu, the Son of Purūravas²

Sri Suka said:

1-3. Āyu who was the son of Purūravas, had the following (five) sons—Nahuṣa, Kṣattravrddha, the valiant Raji, Rambah and Anenas. Now, Oh emperor, listen to the

1. It appears that there had been different Viśvāmitras in widely distant ages. e.g. Viśvāmitra, the father of Śakuntalā, Viśvāmitra the teacher of Dalāratha’s son Rāma, Viśvāmitra the contemporary of Hariścandra, Jamadagni and Śunahṣeṣapā, and Viśvāmitra and the Dāśarājha. The Purāṇas, however, have rolled these distinct personalities into one, and have caused confusion and chaos among the students of Purāṇas. It is true that there was some rivalry between the Viśvāmitras and Viśiṣṭhas in the RV, but the Purāṇas have added a lot of new material unknown to the Vedas and the Brāhmaṇas.

2. This chapter gives the genealogy of Purūravas—especially of the minor branches from Āyu, the son of Purūravas. The history of the descendants of the following four sons of Āyu viz. Kṣattravrddha, Rambah, Raji and Anenas is given in this chapter. The history of the main line from Nahuṣa is detailed in the following chapters.
genealogy of Kṣattravṛddha: He had a son Suhotra, who had three sons—Kāśyā, Kuśa and Gṛtsamada. From Gṛtsamada was born Śunaka whose son sage Śaunaka was the most prominent authority on the Rgveda (among its followers).

4. Kāśyā begot Kāśi, whose son Rāṣṭra was the father of Dirghatamas. Dhanvantari, the founder of the science of Medicine (Āyurveda) was the son of Dirghatamas.

5. He was a ray (aṃśa) of Lord Vāsudeva, the receiver of offerings in sacrifices. His son was Ketumān who gave birth to Bhimaratha.

6. From him (Bhimaratha) was born Divodāsa whose son Dyuman was also remembered as Pratardana. He is also called Śatrujit, Vatsa and Rādhvaja. He is celebrated as Kuvalayāśva as well. Of him were born Alarka and others.

7. No king other than Alarka enjoyed (the sovereignty over) this earth for sixty-six thousand years and still preserved his youthfulness (throughout this period).

8. To Alarka was born Santati whose son was Sunītha. From Sunītha sprang up Suketana whose son was Dharmaketu; of him was born Satyaketu.

---

Purūrvas — Urvasī

- Ayu
- others already described
- Nahuṣa
  - Kṣattravṛddha
    - Suhotra
      - 500 sons
        - Rabhasa
          - Suḍḍha
            - Akrīya
              - Śuci
                - Trikakud
          - Śaṅkarāja
            - (3)
      - (1)
  - Kāśyā
    - Kuṣa
      - Gṛtsamada
        - Śaṅtāraja
          - (2)

(1) Kāśyā→Kāśi→Rāṣṭra→Dirghatamas→Dhanvantari→Ketumān→Bhimaratha→Divodāsa→Pratardana→Alarka→Santati→Sunītha→Suketana→Dharmaketu→Satyaketu→Dhṛṣṭaketu→Sukumāra→Vitihotra→Bharga→Bharga-bhūmi.

(2) Kuṣa→Prati (Kṣatra)→Saṅjaya→Jaya→Krta→Haryāva→Shahadeva→Jaya (-sena)→Saṅkṛti→Jaya→Kṣaṭradharmā

(3) Gṛtsamada→Śunaka→Śaunaka.
9. Satyaketu’s son was Dhṛṣṭaketu of whom was born Sukumāra, the lord of the earth; his son was Vitihotra whose son was Bharga; his son Bhārgabhūmi became a king.

10. The above-mentioned kings are the descendants of Kāśi in the lineage of Kṣattravṛddha.

(Now the genealogy of Rambha, the fourth son of Āyu). The son of Rambha was Rabhasa whose son was Gambhīra from whom was born Akrīya.

11. Through Akrīya’s queen started the line of Brāhmaṇas. Now listen to the line of Anenas (the fifth son of Āyu). Anenas’ son was Śuddha of whom was born Śuci. His son was Trikakud, also known as Dharma-sārathi.

12. Of him was born Śānta-rayas who being selfcontrolled (or knower of the Soul) had almost accomplished his objective (viz. Final beatitude and was not interested in continuing his race). Raji (the third son of Āyu) had five hundred sons, endowed with immense prowess.

13-16. Entreated by gods, Raji slaughtered the demons and restored the celestial kingdom to Indra. But Indra being afraid of Prahlāda and others, again returned the kingdom of heaven to Raji, clasped his feet and placed himself under Raji’s protection (as his son). When the father (Raji) died, his sons, even though solicited (by Indra), refused to return the celestial kingdom to him. (On the contrary) they appropriated to themselves shares oblated in sacrifice (for Indra). Bṛhaspati, then offered oblations to fire (with malevolent purpose against the sons of Raji and made them stray from the path of religion) and Indra slew them one and all as they swerved from the path (of righteousness) and not a single son (of Raji) survived.¹

From Kuṣa, the grandson of Kṣattravṛddha, was born Prati, of whom sprang up Saṅjaya whose son was Jaya.

17. Jaya’s son was Kṛta, of whom was born the king Haryavana. His son was Sahadeva, who begot Hīna, whose son was Jayasena.

18. Jayasena’s son was Saṅkṛti whose son Jaya, who, himself a great (chariot-) warrior, followed religiously ordained path of Kṣattriyas. The kings belonging to the line of Kṣattravrddha have been described. Now listen to the genealogy of Yayāti, the son of Nahuṣa.

¹. This episode is confirmed in the Vīyu P.92.76-99; Matsya P. 24. 34-48.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

The History of Nahuṣa’s Line—The Story of Yayāti

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Just as an embodied being is endowed with six senses (five senses plus the inner organ, the mind) King Nahuṣa had the following six sons—Yati, Yayāti, Saṁyāti, Āyati, Viyati and Kṛti.

2. Being aware of the consequences of the acceptance of the rulership of a kingdom, Yati did not desire sovereignty offered to him by his father, for (he knew that) by shouldering kingship, a person does not realize his own self.

3. When, due to his misdemeanour towards Indra’s queen, Indrāṇi, Nahuṣa was dethroned from his position (as the ruler of the celestial world) and was converted verily into a boa-constrictor by the Brāhmaṇa-sages, Yayāti became a king.

4. Appointing his four younger brothers to govern over the kingdom in four directions (each in one direction), he married the daughter of Śukra (the preceptor of Asuras) and

1. The Yayāti legend—the exchange of Yayāti’s age with the youth of his son and his memorable words at the return of the youth and reacceptance of his age at the time of renunciation:

na jātu kāmaḥ kāmānām upabhogena sāmyati / ḥaṁśā kṛṣṇa-nartmeva bhūya evāhvaṁvadhate // have been immortalized in MBH. Adi, chs. 76-81, Matsya P. chs. 30-35 Padma P. Bhūmi. chs. 76-83 (with a Vaiṣṇavite colouring), the Vēyu P. ch.93. The legend in its modern garb is still very popular and a Marāṭhi novel on this legend received a Bhāratiyā Jānāpāṭha Award—the most honoured and coveted prize in India, this year. of Vṛṣaparvā, the king of Asuras and thus protected the earth (from his capital).

King Parīkṣit enquired:

5. The venerable Śukra was a Brāhmaṇa sage while Yayāti, the son of king Nahusā, was a Kṣattriya by caste. Why and how could such an irregular marriage against the caste-order between a Kṣattriya man and a Brāhmaṇa girl come about?

Śri Suka replied:

6-7. On one occasion, in the company of a thousand lady-friends and Devayāni, the preceptor’s daughter, Śarmiṣṭhā, the princess of the great Dānava king Vṛṣaparvā who, though of the weaker sex was imperious by nature, was promenading in the pleasure garden of her capital which was full of blooming flower-trees, and charming with pools, the sandy banks and lotus beds of which were full of sweet humming of bees.

8. Arriving at a pool of water, those lotus-eyed girls left their silken garments on its bank and engaged themselves in water sports sprinkling each other with water.

9. Perceiving that god Śiva accompanied by his Consort Pārvatī, was riding that way on his bull, the ladies forthwith rushed out of the water, and hastened to put on their garments, out of bashfulness.

10. Not knowing that the garments belonged to the preceptor’s daughter, Śarmiṣṭhā wore it, thinking it to be her own. Getting enraged thereby, Devayāni spoke as follows:

11. “Oh! Behold the impropriety of this slave-girl in that, like a bitch carrying away the oblation (meant for gods) in a sacrifice, she wore the garment which was to be put on by us.

12. By us Brāhmaṇas (like god Brahmā, Prajāpati like Marici) has been created this universe through the power of our asceticism and penance; we constitute the mouth of the Supreme Person (i.e. we are born from god’s mouth and as such are superior to all, as he gets propitiated when we are feasted to our satisfaction). By us the light of the Supreme Brahman is conserved (as an object of adoration) in our hearts, and the blessed path of Vedic religion is shown by us.

13. To us (Brähmaṇaś) the Lords of gods, protectors of the world, and even the most purifying, glorious Lord Viṣṇu, the Soul of the Universe and the abode of goddess Śrī, pay homage and praise.

14. And among such Brähmaṇas, we are the descendants of Bhṛgu. Her father, a demon, is our disciple. This unchaste girl has put on the dress meant for us like a Śūdra bearing (reciting) the Veda—(a privilege of the twice-born castes).

15. Thus attacked, Śarmiṣṭhā who angrily sighed heavily like a hissing female serpent, bit her lips and retorted to the spiritual preceptor's daughter who was reproaching her with words of abuse.

16. "Oh! Beggar-maid, ignoring your own (menial) position, you are vainly boasting yourself. Do you not wait at our house-(door) like a crow or a dog (for crumbs of food)?"

17. Having reproached the good daughter of her preceptor with such and other harsh words, Śarmiṣṭhā snatched away all her cloths and pushed her into a well.

18. It is traditionally told that when Śarmiṣṭhā returned home, Yayāti who was on the hunting expedition, wanted to drink water, and happened, by chance, to come to that well where he saw her (Devayāni).

19. The merciful king gave his upper garment to the girl who was stark naked, and holding her hand by his own, he lifted her out of water.

20. Devayāni, the daughter of Uśanas (i. e. Śukra) spoke to the king in words steeped in genuine love: "Oh King! You have accepted my hand, Oh conqueror of inimical cities!"

21. "As my hand has now been accepted by you once, let no one else now take it. This relation of ours is ordained providentially and not through human agency, Oh valiant warrior. It is hence that I could have this sight of yours while clinging to the (walls of the) well."
22. Oh King of powerful arms! No Brāhmaṇa is destined to accept my hand due to the (reciprocal curse of Kaca the son of Brhaspati whom I imprecated initially).\(^1\)

23. Yayāti found that the unexpected event was brought about by his destiny and being conscious that now his heart was attached to her, accepted her proposal.

24. When the valiant king departed, Devayāni went to her father crying (all the while) and reported to him all that was said and done by Śarmiṣṭhā.

25. The glorious sage Śukra was deeply agitated at heart. Disparaging the profession of a priest and commending the way of life of a pigeon (which freely gathers its food in the forest—technically known as Uśccha-vṛtti—“maintenance by gleaning”), he went out of the city (Vṛṣaparvā’s capital) along with his daughter.

26. Knowing that his intention is to conspire and bring victory to the enemies viz. gods, Vṛṣaparvā propitiated his preceptor by falling prostrate at his feet on the way.

27. The glorious Śukra, the descendent of Bhrigu whose anger lasts hardly for half a moment, spoke to his disciple Vṛṣaparvā, “Oh King! Let the desire of her (Devayāni) be satisfied because I cannot brook to let her alone.”

28. When Vṛṣaparvā agreed with the words, “Be it so”, and awaited (to hear Devayāni’s desire), Devayāni disclosed what was in her mind. “Wherever I shall go after being given away by my father in marriage, let her (Śarmiṣṭhā) follow me along with her companions (as attendants).”

29. Realizing the peril (involved in the departure of Śukra) to her people, and the importance of the matter, she (Śarmiṣṭhā) along with her thousand lady-companions, attended upon Devayāni like a menial.

---

1. According to MBH. Ādi. chs. 76-77 Kaca, the son of Brhaspati could successfully learn the Saṁhitā Vidyā from Śukra through the special favour of Devayāni. At the time of departure Devayāni proposed to marry him. But he rejected her on the ground that being his preceptor’s daughter she is like a sister to him. Enraged at this, Devayāni cursed him that his vidyā will be futile. Kaca reciprocated the curse (that no Brāhmaṇa would marry her).
30. Having given in marriage his daughter along with Śarmiṣṭhā to Yayāti, the son of Nahuṣa, Śukra warned him, “Oh king! Never take Śarmiṣṭhā to share the bed with you.”

31. On one occasion, seeing Devayāni blessed with a son, the chaste lady Śarmiṣṭhā, at the period proper for conception, courted her friend’s (Devayāni’s) husband secretly (for children).

32. The king, being well-versed in Dharma-śāstra, realized it to be his sacred duty to comply with the request of the princess (Śarmiṣṭhā) who solicited him for progeny, and he followed the course ordained for him by Destiny, though he remembered the warning of Śukra.

33. Devayāni gave birth to Yadu and Turvasu, while Śarmiṣṭhā, the daughter of Vṛṣaparvā, had three sons—Druhyu, Anu, and Pūru.

34. Learning about the pregnancy of the Asura princess from her husband, proud Devayāni, being offended with her husband (through jealousy and pride), was overwhelmed with rage and proceeded to her father’s house.

35. The passionate king followed his beloved to reconcile her with words of appeasement and winsome promises, but was not able to please her, even by shampooing her feet.

36. Flying in rage, Śukra cursed him, “You liar! Woman-addict! Let the decrepitude of old age which disfigures men overtake you, you stupid fellow!”

37. Yayāti urged, “Oh Brāhmaṇa Sage! I am not till today sated with enjoyment of pleasure with your daughter”. (Śukra replied) “In that case, you may exchange it (your old age) with the (youth of) anyone else who is willing to accept it.”

38-39. Having secured this arrangement (as a way out of the curse), Yayāti addressed to his eldest son: “Oh my child Yadu! Please accept this decrepitude of age caused by your maternal grand-father, and give me your youth in exchange. Dear child! I am not yet satisfied with enjoyment of pleasures. I would like to enjoy for a few more years, with your youth.”
Yadu replied:

40* "I dare not accept and live with the old age which overtook you in the middle of life, (for) a man cannot attain to desirelessness without an actual experience of the worldly pleasures first."

41. Turvasu, Anu, and Druhyu were then requested (one by one) by the father. But they did not know what was righteous and regarded transient things (like youth) as eternal, and refused his proposal, Oh scion of Bharata.

42. He requested his son Pūru who was the youngest in age but seniormost in virtues. "Oh child! It does not behove you to refuse my request as was done by your elder brothers".

Pūru said:

43. "Oh lord of men! What man on earth is capable of repaying fully the obligations of his father, the procreator of his body, and through whose grace one can attain the highest (objective in life)?

44. The best son is he who accomplishes the task in anticipation of the expectation of his father. The mediocre is one who complies when expressly told by his father. The lowest type is he who obeys but with irreverence. And he who disobeys is the excretion of his father."

45. In this way, Pūru gladly accepted the old age of his father. With his youth, Yayāti also enjoyed pleasures at his sweet will.

46. As a lord of the seven continents of the earth, he protected his subjects well like a father, and with his senses unimpaired, he gratified his desires (by enjoying pleasures) to his heart's content.

47. His beloved Devayāni every day heightened his love by affording pleasures to him by her thought; word and deed, and by offering objects of enjoyment in privacy.

* Yadu was very pious (infra 10.1.2). VC defends Yadu's disobedience thus: Yadu wanted to devote himself to the services of the Lord at the earliest. That mental stage is possible only after actual experience of worldly pleasures for some days. Acceptance of Yayāti's age would postpone that mental stage and consequently the life devoted to the services of the Lord. Between service to the Lord and disobedience to father, the former is preferable according to Dharma. Marvellous defence!
48. By performance of sacrifices with profusely liberal gifts, Yayāti worshipped Lord Hari (Destroyer of all miseries and sins) the Presiding Deity of sacrifices, the God who represents all gods in Himself, and is an embodiment of all Vedas.

49. On Hari is superimposed this universe as a row of clouds on the sky and which, like a dream or an illusion or a fancy now appears to be different (in names, forms etc.) and now ceases to be (in dreamless sleep or after the deluge of the world).

50. Enthroning in his heart the Almighty Lord Vāsudeva who is abiding in the hearts of all as the Indweller, he (Yayāti) worshipped the subtlemost Nārāyaṇa without cherishing any desire for blessings.

51. Yayāti, the emperor of the entire earth, did not feel sated even though he enjoyed pleasures for thousands of years through his (five) wicked senses of which his mind was the sixth.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

Yayāti's Retirement and Final Emancipation

Śrī Śuka said:

1. (While) Yayāti, the woman-dominated addict, was enjoying the pleasures of senses in this way, he became aware of his spiritual fall (negligence of the Self) and being disenchanted (with worldly pleasures), narrated the following parable to his beloved Devayānī.

2. "Oh Devayānī! Please listen to this history of a passionate person on this earth, whose life and conduct were just like mine, and whose lot was deplored by self-controlled people residing in forests.

3. A certain goat, while seeking all alone for an object dear to him, in a jungle, happened to see a goat fallen into a well as a result of her fate.
4. Cherishing lust for her, the goat thought out a way to lift her up and digging out the earth on the bank with the tips of his horns, he made a way out for her.

5-6. It is said that after getting out of the well, the beautiful she-goat loved him (as her husband). Observing that she had selected a stout, finely bearded, lovable he-goat possessing great venereal strength and expert in the art of sexual intercourse, a number of other she-goats desirous of having a mate, wooed him. That he-goat possessed as he was by the devil of sexual passion, excited the passion of that flock of she-goats and revelled with them all alone, and thus failed to realize and think about his own self.

7. Seeing him enjoying himself with another most beautiful she-goat, the female-goat that formerly suffered a fall in the well, did not tolerate that act of the he-goat.

8. Being distressed, she left her mate who was wicked-hearted, a false lover posing as a friend, and professing love only for a moment, but really given to the gratification of his senses, and went to her master.

9. Even that goat too, being a woman-addict, felt aggrieved and followed her to reconcile her, but in spite of his bleating with erotic eloquence he failed to win her over on the way.

10. There, her master, a certain Brāhmaṇa, castrated the dangling scrotum of that goat. But in the interest (of the she-goat), he, being a master of (such) expedients sewed back the amputated limb.

11. Having got his testicles (along with his capacity of sexual enjoyment) restored, the goat, though enjoyed pleasures for a long time with the she-goat found in the well, does not feel satiated with sexual pleasures even today.

12. In the same way, Oh lady with beautiful eyebrows, I, a person of poor intellect, am chained down by your love, Oh gracious lady. Being infatuated by your charms, I do not know (the nature of) my Self.

13. All the food-grains, all gold, animals and women cannot yield satisfaction (to the degree of satiation) to the mind of a person subjected to cravings and passions.

14. Never, never does passion get satiated with the enjoyment of its sense-objects. (On the contrary) like a fire fed with oblations of ghee, it grows again in intensity.

15. When one does not cherish inauspicious attitudes (e.g. of hatred, partiality) to living beings, and looks upon all with equality, all the directions are full of bliss to him (i.e. he is blessed with happiness from all quarters).

16. A person desirous of happiness (untarnished by misery), should instantly give up thirst (for happiness) which is difficult to get rid of by evil-minded persons, and which does not get worn out even if one’s body gets withered with age, and which is a source of endless misery.

17. A person should not sit very close in privacy (lit. share the same seat in private) to his mother, sister or daughter. For the senses (as a whole) are so powerful that they lead astray even a wise (learned) man.

18. It is for complete one thousand years that I have been enjoying repeatedly and incessantly the objects of pleasures. Still every time (I enjoy them), the hankering after them grows (apse).

19. Therefore giving up this (thirst for enjoyment) and concentrating my mind on the Brahman and freeing myself from the pairs of opposites (pleasure-pain etc.) and the notion of egotism (I and mine), I shall lead a life in forest.

20. Knowing the unreality (momentariness) of what is seen (the kingdom or pleasures in this world) and what is heard (from the Vedas about the pleasures and positions promised in the next world), one should not brood over them or enjoy them. For, in that lies the transmigration of the soul, and the loss of (the real knowledge of) the soul. Such a knower realizes the Atman”.

21. Having addressed thus to his wife (Devayâni), Yayâti, the son of Nahuša, returned his youth to Pûru, and becoming free from desires, accepted the decrepitude of his old age from him.

22. He appointed Druhyu to rule over the South-eastern region (of his kingdom), Yadu in the South, Turvasu in the west and Anu in the north.

23. Having consecrated Pûru, the worthiest of them all, as the sovereign ruler of the earth and the subjects, he placed the elder brothers under his control and then repaired to the forest.

24. Just as a bird leaves its nest as soon as it gets full-fledged, he instantly shed off the six-fold objects of pleasures enjoyed through his senses and mind, for a considerable number of years (or) controlled his senses and mind.

25*. Freeing himself completely from all attachments and shedding off his subtle body constituted of three guṇas by virtue of his spiritual power of self realization, the celebrated king Yayāti became absorbed¹ in the Supreme Brahman unsoiled by Māyā (or any impurity) and designated as Vāsudeva—a state attained by the devotees of the Supreme Lord.

26. Hearing that parable, Devayāni regarded it as an incentive to follow a path of renunciation, and a jocular story told out of agony of separation between a man and his wife.

27-28. Realizing that the association of friends and relatives is brought about by Māyā (according to their karma)¹ and is controlled by the Almighty Lord, and thus is as temporary as those of travellers attending a watering place (to drink water on the way), Devayāni, the scion of the Brāhgu race, gave up attachment to everything and everywhere regarding it as unreal as dreams. She concentrated her mind on Kṛṣṇa (i.e. Lord Viṣṇu) and shuffled off her (subtle) body (and became liberated).

29. I bow to you the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the cause of the Universe, the abode of all beings (or the Inner Controller of all) perfectly serene and all-pervading. Salutations to you.

---

* VJ. By his direct perception of the Self, he shed off his egotism caused by three guṇas or the threefold misery caused by them and became liberated—a stage reached by following the Bhāgavata dharma.

¹. VR. He approached the stage of Mokṣa, for according to the Mahābhārata, he spent some period in the celestial world.
CHAPTER TWENTY

The History of Pūru’s race—Birth of Bharata

Śri Śuka said:

1. I shall now narrate to you the history of Pūru’s line wherein you are born, Oh descendant of Bharata. In this family sprang up many royal sages and Brāhmaṇas who propagated their own lines.

2. Janamejaya was born of Pūru; Janamejaya’s son was Pracinvān. His son was Pravīra who begot Namasyu. To him was born Cārupada.

3. Sudyu sprang from Cārupada; Sudyu had a son Bahugava; thence was born Samyāti; his son was Ahamyāti whose son was Raudrāśva.

4-5. Raudrāśva begot on a celestial nymph Ghṛtāci ten sons viz. Rteyu, Kukṣeyu, Sthāṇḍileyu, Kṛteyu, Jaleyu, Santateyu, Dharmeyu, Satyeyu, Vrateyu and the youngest known as Vaneyu—even as ten sense organs (both conative and cognitive) are evolved from the chief vital air, the Soul of the world.

6. From Rteyu was born Rantibhāra. He had the following three sons viz. Sumati, Dhruva and Apratiratha. Kaṇva was the son of Apratiratha, Oh King!

7. Kaṇva’s son was Medhātithi. From him were originated Praskanva and other Brāhmaṇa clans. Sumati had a son called Raibhya, and Duṣyanta was regarded as his son.

8-9. While on a hunting excursion, (king) Duṣyanta happened to visit the hermitage of Kaṇva. Having seen a beautiful damsel beautifying the surroundings with her effulgence, and enchanting like the Māyā of the Lord, he instantaneously got infatuated. And though surrounded by some of his soldiers, he spoke to that charming lady.

1. This chapter gives the following descendants of Pūru up to Vitatha as follows:

The story of Duṣyanta, Śakuntalā and the birth of Bharata is given in details in MBH Ādi. Chs. 69-74.
10. Overjoyed at her very sight, he felt all his fatigue relieved. Tormented by sexual passion, he smilingly asked her, in soft words.

11. "Who are you, Oh beautiful lady (with eyes like lotus-petals)? Whose daughter are you, Oh charming damsel? what is your object in staying in a tenantless forest?

12. Oh lady of a beautiful waist! As I perceive it, you are obviously a girl from a royal family. For the mind of the descendants of Pūru, hardly finds delight in unrighteous paths."

Saṅkuntalā replied:

13. "As the venerable sage Kaṇva knows it, I am the daughter of Viśvāmitra, abandoned by my mother Menakā in the forest. What should we do for you, Oh warrior?

14. Be pleased to take a seat, Oh lotus-eyed one, and accept our hospitality. Enjoy the boiled rice of wild paddy. You may stay here, if it pleases you."

Dūṣyanta said:

15. "Oh lady of beautiful eyebrows! Born as you are in the line of Kuśika, all this (hospitality) is quite proper and natural. Maidens of royal families select of their own accord, their life-mates"

16. When she consented to it, he married Saṅkuntalā duly according to Gāṇḍharva custom prescribed (for Kṣatriyas) in Dharmāṇāstra, as the king was expert in the knowledge of what should be done at particular time and place according to Dharma.

17. The royal sage of unfailing procreative capacity, deposited his semen in her queen. Next morning he returned to his capital. In due course, she was delivered of a son.

18. Kaṇva carried out the appropriate religious rites of the boy, in the forest. With his tremendous strength, the child used to catch hold of lions and played with them.

19. Taking with her, her son who was born of a portion of Lord Hari, and was of invincible prowess, the excellent lady sought the audience of her royal consort.

20. When the king did not accept his wife and child, though both of them were blameless and irreproachable, an incorporal voice from heaven announced, while all beings were listening.

21. "The mother is simply a receptacle. The son belongs to his father alone, of whom he is born. Nay, the father is himself (no other than) the son. Therefore, Oh Dusyanta, bring up your son. Do not neglect Śakuntalā.

22. Oh King, a son who propagates the line of the family takes away his father out of the abode of Yama. You have deposited Bharata in the foetus (i.e. you are the real father). What Śakuntalā stated is the truth.

22A. Bring up your son Bharata who is imbued with a ray of Vāsudeva. He is friendly towards Brāhmmins, true to his promise, capable of knowing and appreciating virtues and excellences and enhancing your reputation.

22B. He is possessed of superior energy, is generous, grateful and ready to wait upon the elders." Hearing this incorporeal voice from the heaven, the king accepted his son.

23. When the father (Dusyanta) expired, he (Bharata) became an emperor of great renown. The great glory of Bharata who was born from the ray of Lord Hari, is still eulogised on the earth.

24. He had the sign of discus on right palm and that of a lotus on the soles of his feet. That powerful king, the sole emperor of the earth was consecrated (on the throne) by the performance of Mahābhīṣaka. He performed many sacrifices.

25. With fifty-five sacrificial horses he performed (horse) sacrifices along the course of the Gaṅgā (from its source to the sea) with Dīrgha-tamas (the son of Mamata) as his sacrificial priest.

26. Along the course of the Yamunā, he tied seventy-eight sacrificial horses (i.e. performed seventy-eight horse-sacrifices on the bank of the river as it flows to join the Gaṅgā), liberally distributing wealth (among the Brāhmaṇas).

1. v.l.: In case of dispute between the father and the mother both claiming the child, the father’s claim is upheld by Yama (Dharmaśattra).
2. Cf. MBH Ādi. 74. 110-111. is verbatim the same.

bhastṛā mādī pitaḥ putro yena jītaḥ sa eva saḥ bhārasya putreṇa Dusyantā māmamastuḥ śakuntalāṁ retodhāḥ putre unnavati noradeva Tamakṣapīti

The sacred fire of Bharata, the son of Duṣyanta was set up on an exceedingly excellent place where the thousand Brāhmaṇas (engaged in the sacrifice) divided among themselves cows (gifted by Bharata), each receiving his share of thirteen thousand eighty-four (Badvā) cows.

27. Having thus tied to the sacrificial post one hundred and thirtythree horses, he sprang a surprise on the earthly kings. The son of Duṣyanta surpassed gods with his affluence, and he became one with Viṣṇu who is adorable to gods.

28. At the conclusion of the sacrificial ritual Maṇāra (or at a sacred place called Maṇāra), he donated as gift, fourteen lakhs of elephants of the mṛga type black in colour, with their white tusk plated with gold.

29. No king of the past could accomplish the great eminence of Bharata. Nor can kings of the future do so any more than one can reach the celestial world by hands.

30. During his expedition for the conquest of the world, he defeated the tribes Kirātas, Hūnas, Yavanas, Āṇḍras, Kaṅkas, Khaṇas and Śakas and killed the Mleccha kings who were inimical to Brahmins or Vedas.

31* By sending messengers, he restored to the gods, the celestial damsels who were formerly abducted to Rasātala by Asuras, after vanquishing the gods and occupying various parts of that region.

32. While he ruled, both heaven and earth supplied desires and needs of his subjects. His sovereignty extended all over the world for thrice nine thousand (27000) years.

1. SR quotes the definition of badva: iyaṁ ca badva-saṁkhyaś slokeṇa sanghyate:

   catur-dasaṁṁ maṁ saṁbadhiṁ-satāṁ-sakah /
   badvam caturśityagra-sahasrāṁ trayodaśa !

2. No commentator from SR to BP is sure of the exact significance of the word maṇāra. VJ: 'At the conclusion of a particular observance (vratā) called Maṇāra.' All of them state that {alternatively} Maṇāra is the name of a holy place.

3. The elephants are of the three types: bhadra, manda and mṛga.

4. Cf. Ait. Br. 8.23.3. VD. regards these elephant-types as belonging to the region of the Himalayas, Vindhya and Sahyādri respectively.

* Vanquishing the Asuras, he repatriated gods to their respective regions and restored to their husbands the celestial damsels who were carried away by demons called Panis—VJ.
33. The tradition goes that the emperor realized that his sovereignty the fame of which had spread over all the worlds, his imperial glory and affluence, his unchallenged authority and implicit obedience to commands, nay even his life and sense-organs were unreal and so he renounced the world.

34. He had three queens all from the state of Vidarbha. When he remarked that his sons did not look like him, they, being afraid of being abandoned by him (suspecting their character), killed them all.

35. When his family line was (in the danger of being) extinct, the Marut gods gave him Bharadvaja as a son, when the emperor was propitiating them with sacrifice Marustoma (forgetting a son).

36. When Mamatā, the wife of his brother (Utathya), was pregnant, Brhaspati attempted to have a sexual intercourse with her, and was prevented (by the child in the womb with strong loud protests). He (Brhaspati) cursed the child in the womb (to become blind). He discharged per force his semen (in her), but the blind child in the womb prevented its entry by his foot. The seed that fell out on the ground assumed the form of a child.

37. To Mamatā who wanted to give away that child as she was terribly afraid of being abandoned by her husband, gods spoke the following verse which contains the etymology of the name of the child (which is nothing but the quarrel between Brhaspati and Mamatā each throwing the responsibility of bringing up that child on the other).

38. (Sr. records this controversy between Mamatā and Brhaspati as follows)

(Said Brhaspati : ) "Oh foolish woman ! Nourish (this child). (If you say that you are afraid of your husband that is baseless as) this child is born of us two brothers (by me through the Kṣetra viz. the wife of my brother)!" (Replied Mamatā) "Brhaspati! You nourish this child because he is born of us two (when you raped me)") Saying these words (bhara dvāja) both the parents went away (abandoning the child). Hence he is called Bhara-dvāja.
39. Though urged by gods (to bring up the child), they thought him as a useless son and abandoned him. The Maruts nourished the child and it was given to Bharata when his family was going to be extinct. (Vitatha should be regarded as the name of Bharadvāja, after his adoption by Bharata).

CHAPTER TWENTYONE

The Race of Bharata. The History of Rantideva

Sūta said:

1. Vitatha (Bharadvāja) had a son Mānyu who begot (five sons) viz. Brhatksattra, Jaya, Mahāvīrya, Nara, Garga. Nara's son was Saṅkṛti.

2. Saṅkṛti had two sons—Guru and Rantideva, Oh delight of the Pāṇḍu family! The glory of Rantideva is eulogised in this world as well as in heaven.

3-4. By giving away wealth which came his way without efforts (like the sky) thinking it to be momentary, he became hungry and destitute of everything (including provision even for the evening). While the hero suffered hardships along with his family, fortyeight days passed during which he could not get even water to drink. In the morning (of the fortyninth day), he happened to get by chance ghee, rice cooked in milk, (saṃhyāva) (an article of food consisting of wheat-flour, raw-sugar, ghee and milk) along with water.

5. He whose family was distressed and trembling due to utter starvation and parched with thirst, was about to partake of it (the food) when a Brāhmaṇa guest arrived, just at the time of their breaking the fast.

1. As Śr points out, although Bharadvāja was originally a Brāhmaṇa, he became Kṣatriya after his adoption by Bharata. He is thenceforth known as Vitatha and he continued Bharata's race.

2. The Rantideva episode and especially his refusal to attain to Mokṣa but wish to live here in order to relieve the misery of all beings (vv 12, 13 below) are similar to the Bodhisattva ideal of Buddhists.
6. As he visualized Hari everywhere (and in everybody), he received the Brāhmaṇa with reverence and faith, gave him his share of food. The Brāhmaṇa took his meal and went his way.

7. While he was about to partake of the remaining food which was distributed among themselves, another stranger—now a Śūdra—arrived. He gave him the portion of the food so distributed, contemplating all the while on Lord Hari, Oh king of the earth.

8. When the Śūdra departed, another stranger surrounded by a pack of hounds approached him and requested, "Oh King! May food be served to me along with my dogs, who are hungry".

9. The king received them kindly and gave to him respectfully whatever food that remained with him, and bowed to the dogs and the master of those hounds.

10-11. Now some water, just sufficient to quench the thirst of one person, remained. While he was about to drink it, a Cāndāla came up and requested, "Give water to me who am a low caste person". Hearing his pitiful request uttered with great pains and exhaustion, the king who was deeply moved and tormented with compassion, uttered the following nectar-like speech.

12. "I do not seek from the Almighty Lord the highest position attended with eight spiritual powers (e.g. Anima, Laghima, etc. detailed in the Yogasūtras), nor emancipation from saṁśīra; I would rather prefer to dwell in all beings and undergo sufferings for them, whereby they may be free from miseries.

13. By offering water which was essential to save the life of an unfortunate creature who craved for life, my personal hunger, thirst, exhaustion of limbs, distress, languor, grief, despondency and delusion—all have disappeared."

14. Expressing such nobility of heart, the king who was compassionate by nature and full of fortitude, gave that water to the Cāndāla, though he himself was on the point of death through thirst.

15. To him, the Lords of the Three worlds (e.g. God Brahmā and others) who bestow fruits on those who seek them, and who visited him in those illusory forms (a short while ago) under instructions from Lord Viṣṇu, revealed themselves to him.

16. The king being entirely free from attachments, cherished no desires. Bowing down to them all, he concentrated his mind on glorious Lord Vāsudeva with utmost devotion, and sought no boons from them.

17. Concentrating his mind on the Almighty Lord as the only support, and cherishing no desire for any fruit (in return) therewith, Māyā the deluding potency of the Lord constituted of three guṇas (automatically) dissolved (disappeared altogether) like a dream, in the case of Rantideva, Oh king.

18. By virtue of close association with him, all yogins who followed closely Rantideva (i.e. his path of intense, selfless devotion) became absolutely devoted to Lord Nārāyaṇa.

19-20. From Garga was born Śini who begot Gārgya. In this way, a Brāhmaṇa family-line started from a Kṣatriya race. From Mahāvīrya sprang Duritakṣaya whose sons were Trayāruṇi, Kavi and Puṣkarāruṇi. They attained to the state of Brāhmaṇahood. Brhat-ksattrā had a son, who built the city of Hastināpura.

21. Hastin begot Ajamīḍha, Dvimīḍha and Purumīḍha. The descendants of Ajamīḍha were Brāhmaṇas like Priyamedha and others.

22. From Ajamīḍha was born (another son) Brhadīṣu whose son was Brhad-dhanu. His son was Brhatkāya whose son was Jayadratha.

23. He (Jayadratha) begot Viṣada from whom sprang up Senajit. His sons were Rucirāśva, Drḍhahanu, Kāśya and Vatsa.

24. Rucirāśva’s son was Pāra whose son was Prthuṣeṇa. Pāra’s son was Nipa to whom were born a hundred sons.

24A. Among them one was Aṇuha, the eldest was Satyaka, Oh King.

25. That Nipa begot on Kṛtvī, the daughter of Śuka¹,

¹. ŚR. VR. VO. BP. quote from HV (Harivamśa) ch. 18 and explain that when Śuka left home even before his upānayana (investiture of the sacred thread) ceremony, to lead a perpetually celibate life, he left Brahmadatta. That yogi procreated through his wife Gau (Sarasvati) a son called Viśvaksena.

26. According to the advice and guidance of sage Jaigīśavya, he wrote a work on the yoga-system. He begot Udaksvan from whom sprang Bhallāda. These are the descendants of Brhadiṣu.

27. Dvimiḍha had a son called Yavīnara whose son was Kṛtimān by name. His son was Satyadhṛti whose son Drḍhanemī was the progenitor of Supārśva.

28-29. From Supārśva was born Sumati whose son was Sannati. His son was Kṛti who learnt yoga under Hiraṇya-nābha, and sang the six earlier sanhitās of the Sāma-veda1 (divided them separately). He begot Nīpa from whom was born Ugrāyudha. His son was Kṣemya; his son Suvīra from whom was born Ripuṇjaya.

30. His son was Bāhurātha. Purumiḍha (Dvimiḍha's younger brother) had no child. Ajamiḍha begot on Nalini, a son called Nila whose son was Śānti.

31. From Śānti was born Suśānti, whose son was Puruja, from whom Arka was born. His son was Bharmyāśva who had five sons beginning with Mudgala.

32-33. Yavīnara, Brhadiṣu, Kāmpilya and Saṅjaya were the (remaining four) sons (of Bharmyāśva). Bharmyāśva said, "These five sons of mine are capable (and enough) to behind his shadow for the consolation of his father who married and had five sons and one daughter. The daughter is named Kṛiti-mati and not Kṛtvi as here. Devī Bhāgavata I.19.39-43 rejects the shadow theory and states that as per Janaka's advice Śuka married pīvāri, a daughter of Pītra and had four sons (names differ from the HV), and a daughter Kṛtī who was married to Anu, the son of king Vibhrāj. I think JC is correct in regarding this Śuka as a different person, not so much because JC quotes the authority of the Brahmaudvaivarta P. where Śuka is said to have been born as a boy of twelve years, who, renouncing the world, straightway walked out of home, but the tenor of the text of the Bh.P., shows that according to Śuka the narrator of the Bh. P. this Śuka, father of Kṛtvi, is altogether different, merely a name-sake.

1. V.l. jagan dvi-sat—Twelve earlier sanhitās of the Sāma Veda (BP) and BP quotes VP which credits him with saying (mastering and teaching) twenty-four sanhitās:

   Hiranya-nābha yogam adhyāpayāmāna/yajcaturvimśatim prāya-sāmnām cakāra sanhitām // protect five countries. And hence they came to be known as Pāṇcālas. From Mudgala originated a clan of Brāhmaṇas named Maudgalya.

34. A twin was born of Mudgala, the son of Bharmyāśva; (out of the twin) the male child was Divodāsa and the female child, Ahalyā. She had from (her husband) Gautama, a son called Śatānanda.

35-36. Śatānanda’s son Satyadhṛti was expert in Military Science. His son was Śaradvān. They say that at the sight of Urvaśī, the seed of Śaradvān (emanated and) fell on a clump of reeds. From the semen was produced an auspicious twin. Finding the twin children during the course of hunting, Śantanu picked them out of compassion. The male child came to be known as Kṛpa, while the female child Kṛṣṇa became the wife of Droṇa.

CHAPTER TWENTYTWO

The History of the Lunar Race.1 The Royal Dynasties of Pāṇcāla, Magadha and Kuru

Śrī Suka said:

1-2. From Divodāsa was born Mitreyu, whose sons were Cyavana, Sudāsa, Sahadeva and Somaka. Somaka had a hundred sons of whom Jantu was the eldest, and Pṛṣata, the youngest. His son was Drupada whose daughter was Draupadi, and sons were Dhrṣṭadyumna and others.

1. This chapter gives the genealogies of the following branches of the lunar race:

i. Pāṇcālas A. South Pāṇcālas

B. North Pāṇcālas
Ajamidha→Nalini→Nīla→Sānti→Suśānti→Puruja→Arka→Bharmyāśva→Mudgala→Divodāsa→Mitreyu→Cyavana→Sudās→Sahadeva→Somaka→Jantu→Pṛṣata→Drupada
3. From Dhṛṣṭadyumna appeared Dhṛṣṭaketu. These are the descendants of Bharmyāśva, also known as Pāncālakas or Pāncāla. Ajamītha had another son Ṛṣaṇa from whom was born Saṃvaraṇa.

4. Saṃvaraṇa begot on Tapati, the daughter of the Sun-god, Kuru, the Lord of the Kurukṣetra. Kuru had Parikṣit (the first, an ancestor of the hearer of the Bh. P.) Sudhanu, Jahnu and Niṣadhāsva as his sons.

5. From Sudhanu was born Suhotra whose son was Cyavana, his son was Kṛti, the father of Uparicara Vasu. From him were born Brhadratha and other sons.

6. (Out of them) Kuśāmba, Matsya, Pratyagra, Cediṇa, and others were the rulers of the Cedi country (Modern Bundelkhand and the region roundabout). From Brhadratha was born Kuśāgra whose son was Rṣabha.

7. Rṣabha begot Satyahita, whose son was Puṣpavān. His son was Jahu. Brhadratha had two parts (of a child) born by another wife.

8. Those parts were thrown away by the mother. A demoness Jarā, out of sport had joined them muttering the words ‘Live! Live. And lo! A son called Jarāsandha (one joined by Jarā) appeared.

9. Of him was born Sahadeva whose son was Somāpi, who begot Śrutāśravas. (Out of the sons of Kuru) Parikṣit was childless. The son of Jahnu was Suratha.

2. Magadha

Vasu Uparicara→Bṛhadratha→Kuśāgra→Rṣabha→Puṣpavān→Satyahita→Jahu→Jarāsandha→Sahadeva→Somāpi

3. Paūravas

Bharata adopted Bharadvāja and named him ‘Vitatha’→Manyu→Bṛhatkṣatra→Hastin→Ajamītha→Ṛṣaṇa→Saṃvaraṇa→Kuru→

Dvimiḍha

Parikṣit I→

Jahnu→Suratha→Vidūratha→Sārvabhauma→Jayasena→Rādhika→Ayuta→Krodhana→Devāṭithi→Ṛṣya→Dilipa→Pratipa→Santana→Vicitravrīya→Dhṛtarāṣṭra→Yudhīṣṭhira→(Abhimanyu)→Parikṣit II (the remaining line is a prediction).

4. Dvimiḍhas

Dvimiḍha→Yavinara→Kr̥timān→Satyādhi→Dṛḍha-nemi→Supārīva→Sumati→Sannatimān→Kr̥ti→Nipa→Ugra-yudha→Kr̥cmya→Suvira→Ripuñjaya→Bahiratha.
10. Suratha's son was Vidūratha, from whom was born Sārvabhauma. His son was Jayasena, whose son was Rādhika; from whom appeared Ayuta.

11. From him sprang up Krodhana whose son was Devātithi. His son was Rṣya, from whom was born Dilīpa. He had a son Pratipa.

12. He (Pratipa) had three sons—Devāpi, Śantanu and Bālhika. Devāpi abdicated his ancestral throne and repaired to forest (for his spiritual advancement).

13-14. (After Devāpi's departure to forest) Śantanu who was formerly designated as Mahābhiṣa (a great physician), came to the throne. Whomsoever he touched with his hand—even if he be old—got rejuvenated again. And the old man got immediate and complete relief (from all ailments). By virtue of this (miraculous) gift, he was called Śantanu. When the rain-god did not rain for twelve years in his kingdom,

15. Śantanu was advised by Brāhmaṇas that inasmuch as he, though a younger brother, enjoyed the kingship (superseding his elder brother) and had become a parivettā\(^1\) (a usurper), and for the prosperity of the capital and the kingdom, he should immediately restore the kingdom to his elder brother, Devāpi (when alone it will rain).

16. When thus addressed (advised) by Brāhmaṇas, he conciliated him (Devāpi) and persuaded him to accept the kingdom. Devāpi, however, was made to go astray from the path of Vedas by the words of Brāhmaṇas who were deputed by his ministers (especially by his minister (Aśma-rāva).

17. When Devāpi spoke blasphemously about the Vedas (and their teachings), the god Indra released the showers (as Devāpi proved apostate to the Vedic religion, and ceased to have a right to rule). Devāpi (realized his mistake and adopted the path of yoga and resorted to Kalāpagrāma.

---

\(^1\) ŚR quotes the following definition of Parivettā from a Smṛti text:

\[
\text{dārā'gnihotra-samyojana kurute yo' graja shīte} \\
\text{parivettā sa vijñapab, pariśitti ta pūrvaśe} \\
\]

He who accepts a wife as Agni-hota (fire-worship) before his elder brother does so, is called pariśitti and the brother so superseded pariśitti.
18-20. When Lunar race gets extinct in the Kali age, he will (re-) establish it at the advent of the next age. From Bāhlīka was born Somadatta who had three sons viz. Bhūri, Bhūrisāvras and Śala. Śantanu’s son by Gaṅgā was the self-controlled Bhīṣma who was the most eminent among all the experts in dharma-tāstra, a great devotee of the Lord, a wise and learned person, a leader of a battalion of warriors by whom even Parśurāma (his preceptor in the science of arms) was pleased with his art and skill in fighting. Śantanu begot on Śatya-vati, the daughter of the chief of Dāśas, a son called Citrāṅgada.

21. Her younger son was Vicitra-virya. Citrāṅgada was killed (in a duel with a Gandharva, called Citrāṅgada). Through her, from Parāśara, descended directly a digit or a ray of Lord Hari as her son (in the person of Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana).

22-24. The sage Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana is the protector of the Vedas from whom I learnt this Śrimad Bhāgavata. In supersession of his own disciples such as Paila and others (vide Supra 1. 4. 21-22), the venerable sage Bādarāyaṇa preferred me, his son, as I was very serene by nature and recited (taught) to me this esoteric and sacred text (viz. the Bhāgavata Purāṇa). Then Vicitrāvīrya married two princesses of Kāśi, Āmbā and Ambālikā both of whom were taken away by force (by Bhīṣma) from their svayamvara. Vicitrāvīrya was too much attached to them, and caught phthisis and died (in his youth).

25. When requested by his mother (Satya-vati), Bādarāyaṇa (Vyāsa) procreated from the fields (i.e. wives) of his childless brother (Vicitrāvīrya)—Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Pāṇḍu and Vidura.

1. According to MBH Adi 63.50-69 she was the daughter of king Uparicara Vasu (vide V.5 above) developed in the womb of a celestial nymph Ardrikā, cursed to be a female fish. She was brought up by the chief of fishermen and known as ‘Satya-vati’ due to her uprightness and moral virtues.

2. ŚR. quotes a religious injunction that one has to comply with such requests when instructed by elders.

3. Vidura’s mother was not Vicitrāvīrya’s wife, but a maid servant of the widowed queen Ambikā who deputed her as her substitute to Vyāsa —MBH-Adi 1.94-96.
26. Dhṛtarāṣṭra had a hundred sons by his wife Gāndhārī. Of them, Duryodhana was the eldest. They had also a daughter, by name Duḥsalā.

27. To Pāṇḍu who was prohibited from sexual intercourse by a curse, three great (chariot-) warriors, the eldest of whom was Yudhiṣṭhira (Bhīma and Arjuna being the next two) were procreated on Kuntī from Dharma (the god Yama-dharma), the wind-god and Indra.

28. Nakula and Sahadeva were born from (the loins of Aśvinī-kumāras) through Mādri (Pāṇḍu’s second wife). Draupadī had five sons,) one from each of her five husbands)—all of them your uncles (or who were the manes in their former life).

29-31. (Through Draupadī) Prativindhya was born from Yudhiṣṭhira; Śrutasena, from Bhīma; Śrutakīrti from Arjuna, Satānīka from Nakula. Śrutakarmā was the son of Sahadeva. The other sons of the Pāṇḍavas were as follows: Yudhiṣṭhira begot Devaka on Paurāvī; Bhīma had Ghaṭotkaca by Hiḍimbā and Sarvagata by Kāli. Vijayā, the daughter of Parvata, gave birth to a son Suhotra from Sahadeva.

32. Nakula begot Nirāmitra on Kareṇumati. So also Arjuna had Irāvān from Ulūpi and Babhruvāhana by (Citrāṅgadā) the princess of the Maṇipura king. But he was adopted as a son by his (maternal) grandfather (as that was the condition precedent of the marriage, technically called putrikāsuta)"}

33. Your father Abhimanyu was born of Subhadrā. He was a hero who vanquished all ati-rathis (a chariot-warrior who defeats innumerable enemies on the battlefield). You are born of Uttarā from him.

34. When all the Kauravas were slain, (Aśvatthāman) the son of Droṇa discharged the missile called Brahmāstra.

1. VR., GD., BP.VD. quote the condition:

   abhrātiṣkām praddhāvāmi tubhyah kanyān asankṛtām /
   aṣṭadhiḥ yo jāyate putrāḥ sa me putro bhavisyati //

   ‘I give in marriage my daughter duly decorated with ornaments, on condition that, as she has no brother, the son that will be born to her will be my son.'
You were rescued alive from the god of death by the spiritual prowess of Lord Kṛṣṇa.

35. Oh child! You have the following four sons, the eldest of whom is Janamejaya, the rest being Śrutasena, Bhimasena and Ugrasena—all of whom are valiant.

36. Knowing that you have met death from Takṣaka’s bite, he (Janamejaya) will get enraged, and will commit as oblations to fire, serpents in the serpent-sacrifice.

37. Having conquered the earth on all sides, and appointing Tura, the son of Kavaṣa, as the sacrificial priest, Janamejaya, the performer of aśvamedha (horse-sacrifice), will worship the Lord by performance of many sacrifices.

38. Janamejaya’s son Śatānīka will learn the three Vedas as well as the knowledge of religious rites from Yājñavalkya, the technique of the use of missiles (from Kṛpa), and the knowledge about the self (the spiritual science) from Śaunaka.

39. His son will be Sahasrānīka whose son will be Aśvamedhaja; his son will be Asīma-Kṛṣṇa, whose son will be Nemi-cakra.

40. When Hastināpura will be washed away by the floods of the river (Gaṅgā), he will settle down at Kauśāmbī (Kosam, near Allahabad). He will have Citraratha as his son, of whom a son Kaviratha will be born.

41. From Kaviratha will appear Vṛṣṭimān (as the son) from whom will be born king Mahipati. Sunītha will be his son. He will have a son Nṛcaksus whose son will be Sukhinala.

42. His son will be Pariplava, whose son will be Medhāvi who will have Sunaya as his son. Thence will be born Nṛpaṇjaya, from whom will be Dūrva, who will beget Timi.

43. From Timi will be born Bṛhadratha whose son will be Sudāsa, the father of Śatānīka. From Śatānīka will spring Durdamana whose son will be Bāhinara.

44. His son will be Daṇḍapāṇi who will beget Nimi. From him will be born king Kṣemaka. In this way the lineage of Brāhmaṇa-cum-Kṣatriya (Lunar race from which Brāhmaṇa and Kṣatriya races started) which has been honoured and praised by gods and sages has been described to you.

45. When the lunar race reaches king Kṣemaka, it will be extinct in the Kali age. Now I shall describe to you the future kings of the Magadha country.

46. The son of Sahadeva (Jarāsandha’s successor—son) will be Mārjāri whose son will be Śrutaśravas. Thence will be Ayutāyu, whose son will be Niramitra.

47. His son will be Sunakṣatra, from whom will be born Bṛhatseṇa—his son will be Kṛmajit. Thence will be Śṛṇijaya, from whom will appear Vīpṛ, the father of Suci.

48. Then will follow Kṣema whose son will be Suvrata. His son will be born Dharmasūtra whose son will be Śama. Thence will be Dyumatsena from whom will be born Sūmati, whose son will be Subala.

49. Thence will be Sūnītha of whom Satyajit, the father of Viśvajit will be born. From Viśvajit will be born Rupuṇḍjaya. The kings of Bṛhadṛatha dynasty will reign for one thousand years.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

The History of the Dynasties of Anu, Druhyu, Turvasu and Yadu

Sri Śuka continued:

1. Anu (the son of Yayāti) had three sons—Sabhānara, Caksu and Parokṣa. From Sabhānara was born Kālanara, whose son was then Śṛṇijaya.

1. For the clear understanding of the Purānic history the genealogies of different branches of the Lunar race are given below: These names indicate Successors to the thrones—not necessarily sons.

Anu→Sabhānara→Kālanara→Śṛṇijaya→Janamejaya→Mahāśīla→Mahāmanas→Uśīnara→Śibi→Kaikeya

— I Branch

Titikṣu→Rucṛadratha→Hema→Sutapas→Sutapā-Bali→Aṅga→Khanapāna→Diviratha→Dharmaratha→Romapāda→Caturaṅga→Prthulakṣa→Campā→Bṛhatrāman→Bṛhadṛatha→Bṛhadībhānu→Bṛhanmanas→
2. His son was Janamejaya, who begot Mahāsiṣa and his son was Mahāmanas. UŚīnara and Titikṣu were the sons of Mahāmanas.

3-4. UŚīnara had four sons—Śibi, Vana, Śami and Dakṣa. Śibi’s four sons were Vṛṣādarbha, Suvira, Madra and Kaikenya. Titikṣu’s son was Ruṣadratha, and his son, Hema. Hema’s son was Sutapas from whom Bali was born.

5. On the wife of king Bali (who was childless), the sage Dirghatamas begot six sons beginning with Aṅga, Vaṅga, Kaliṅga and also those called by the names Suhma, Puṇḍra and Āndhra.

6. These six established principalities in eastern provinces were known after their names (respectively). From Aṅga was born Khanaṇa whose son was Diviratha.

7. His son was Dharmaratha whose son Āetraratha had no issue. He was also known as Romapada and was a friend of Daśaratha (king of Ayodhya).

8-10. Daśaratha gave his daughter Śaṅtā (in adoption) whom Rśyaśrīrga married. When Indra did not release showers of rain, beautiful courtesans enticed away that son of a female deer, by means of dancing, vocal and instrumental music, coquettish behaviour, embraces and presents and brought him (to the king). By conducting a sacrifice (Iṣṭi) in honour of Indra, he (propitiated Indra and) secured progeny

Jayadratha → Vijaya → Dḥṛti → Dḥṛtavrata → Satkarman → Adhiratha → Karna → Vṛṣasena

_Druhyu-s_

Druhyu → Babhrī → Setu → Ārabha → Gāndhāra → Dharma → Dṝta → Durmanas → Pracetā → Prācetas

_Turvasu-s_

Turvasu → Vahni → Bharga → Bhānumān → Tribhānu → Karandhama → Maruta → Duṣyanta.

_Tadu:

_Haṁaya Branch_

Yadu → Sahasrajit → Śatajit → Haṁaya → Dharmanetra → Kunti → Sobaṇi → Mahiṣman → Bhadrasena-ka → Durmada → Dhanaka → Kṛtvirya → Arjuna → Jayadhvaja → Tālajāṅgha → Vitihotra

_Tadu : Main Branch_

Yadu → Kṛṣṭa → Vṛjīvan → Svāhi → Ruṣeku → Āetraratha → Śaśa-bindu → Pṛthuśravas → Dharma → Uṣanas → Rucaka → Jyāmagha → Vidarbha.
to Romapāda (who was childless). Daśaratha who was issue-less was also blessed with children by a similar sacrifice. Cauto-rāṅga was born from Romapāda, whose son was Prthulākṣa.

11. Prthulākṣa had (three) sons viz. Brhadṛath, Brhat-karmā and Brhadbhānu. From the first (Brhadṛatha), was born Brhan-manas, from whom Jayadratha appeared.

12. He begot on Sambhūti (a son called) Vijaya from whom appeared Dhṛti. Thence Dhṛtavrata whose son was Satkarmā, from whom was born Adhiratha.

13. While playing on the bank of the Gaṅgā the king found a son encased in a (floating) box, abandoned by Kuntī, as he was born before her marriage. Being issueless, he brought him up as his son.

14. Vṛṣasena was the son of Karna who became a king. Druhyu (another son of Yayāti) had a son called Babhru, whose son was Setu.

15. His son was Ārabdha; his son, Gāndhāra, whose son was Dharma. Dharma’s son was Dhṛta of whom Durmanas was the son. His son was Pracetās who had a hundred sons.

16. They became the rulers of the Mlecchas, and established themselves in the northern region. Turvasu (another son of Yayāti) had a son called Vahnī of whom Bhaga was born. His son was Bhānumān.

17. His (Bhānumān’s) son was Tribhānu whose son was the noble-hearted Karandama. His son was Marut. He was childless and adopted Duṣyanta of the Pūru line, as his son.

18-19. That Duṣyanta, being desirous of (one more) kingdom, returned again to his family (as Pūru’s descendant). I shall now describe to you the dynasty of Yadu, the eldest son of Yayāti—a dynasty of great religious merits and capable of removing sins. A man who listens to the account of the (family-line of) Yadu is absolved of all sins.

20-21. It was in this dynasty that the Supreme Soul incarnated, assuming a human form. It is reported that Yadu had four sons—Sahasrajit, Kroṣṭṛ, Nala and Ripu. The son of the first (Sahasrajit) was Śatajit. He had (three) sons—Mahāhaya, Veṇuhaya and Hāihaya.

22. Hāihaya’s son was Dharma, whose son was Netra, the father of Kunti. From Kunti was born Sohaṇji whose son was Mahiṣmān; his son was Bhadrasena.

23. Bhadrasena's sons were Durmanda and Dhanaka, the father of Kṛtavīrya. Kṛtāgni, Kṛtavarmā and Kṛtajāha also were the sons of Dhanaka.

24. Arjuna, the son of Kṛtavīrya became the lord of seven continents. He became extremely proficient in Yoga through the grace of Dattātreya, himself a ray of Lord Hari.

25. Other rulers of the earth cannot definitely reach the status of Kārtavīrya, in point of performance of sacrifices, munificent donations, asceticism, spiritual (yogic) powers, scholarship, valour, victories etc.

26. For eighty five thousand years, with unabated strength...

26A. Arjuna ruled his kingdom always remembering Lord Hari. with no diminution in wealth of memory, he enjoyed the inexhaustible (fund) of objects of six senses (including the mind, as the sixth).

27. Out of his thousand sons, only five survived the battle (with Paraśurāma). They were Jayadhvaja, Śūrasena, Vṛṣabha, Madhu and Ürjita.

28. From Jayadhvaja was born Tālajaṅgha, who had hundred sons. The family of Tālajaṅghas was destroyed by the prowess of Sagaras (the Aurva).

29. Vitihotra was the eldest of Tālajaṅgha's sons. Of Madhu (the son of Kārtavīrya Arjuna) was born Vṛṣṇi. Madhu had hundred sons of whom Vṛṣṇi was the eldest. Hence the family came to be known after Vṛṣṇi.

30. Hence they came to be designated as Mādhavas, Vṛṣnis and Yādavas, Oh king. Of Kṛṣṇa, the son of Yadu, appeared Vṛjinavān.

31. He had a son Svāhi whose son was Ruṣeku. His son was Citraratha from whom was born a great yogin Śakabindu

1. v.l. anāṣṭa-Vṛṣṇu-smaranah — who never forgot to remember Hari any time.
2. VR. notes a v.l. according to which 'Vitihotra's son was Madhu from whom Vṛṣṇi was born'. The text here creates some confusion, in this half line.
3. JUruṣaṇku, according to V.R. He notes 'Kuṣeku' as a v.l. of great affluence and luxurious life, as well as endowed with great moral virtues.

32. He was the master (possessor) of fourteen great jewels and the sole sovereign ruler of the entire globe of the earth and of very great renown. He had ten thousand wives.

33-34. By them he procreated a million sons. Of these, six were very prominent. Out of them, the son of Prthuṣravas was known as Dharma. His son was Uśanas, a performer of one hundred horse-sacrifices (āsvamedhas). His son was Rucaka who had five sons. Listen (to their account).

35-36. They were called Purujit, Rukma, Rukmeṣu, Prthu and Jyāmagha. Jyāmagha who married Śaibyā, was childless, but he dared not take another wife through the fear (of Śaibyā). Once he brought from the enemy's house a girl for enjoyment. Seeing her in (her husband's) chariot, Śaibyā got enraged with her husband.

37. 'Who is this girl made to occupy my place in the chariot, you deceitful rogue'? (demanded Śaibyā). When he replied, "Your daughter-in-law", she smiled and spoke.

38. "I am a barren woman. How can a co-wife be my daughter-in-law?" "Oh queen! She will be suitable for marriage to the son who is to be born of you".

39. (ŚR gives a dramatic description of the situation).
The king was perspiring and quaking through the fear of his wife. But he had all the while propitiated the fraternity of gods—Viśvedevas—and his manes, who approvingly blessed him)
'Amen', said the Viśvedevas and manes. After some time Śaibyā became pregnant (even after her menopause), and was

---

1. ŚR. quotes from Mārkaṇḍeya purāna the following list of jewels (i.e., excellent things): An elephant, a horse, a chariot, women, an arrow, treasury, a garland of flowers, dress, wish-yielding tree, a Śakti (javelin), a noose, a gem (i.e. Ruby diamond), an umbrella and an aerial car.

2. VD. accepts this v.i. of ŚR:

   tasya patni-sahasraya dasāsan sumahāyaṣṭāḥ

I accepted it as it is more clear than patnisahasrāṇāṃ dasāṇām delivered of an auspicious son called 'Vidarbha', and he married the chaste girl who was already accepted as a daughter-in-law.¹

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

The History of the Race of Yadu²

Śri Śuka said:

1. Vidarbha begot on her (Bhojyā) two sons by name Kuṣa and Kratha, and the third one Romapāda who was the delight of the Vidarbha family.

1. All commentators quote Parāśara who declared Jyāmagha as the most hen-pecked husband. But even Parāśara in VP.4.12.12 remarks: 'About Jyāmagha (his henpeckedness) the following verse is recited', so the verse:

bhārīvaśyās tu ye kecid bhavisyantyathavā mṛtāh!
tesām tu Jyāmaghaḥ sreṣṭhaḥ Śaibyāpatir abhūn nṛpah||
—VP.4.12.13 seems to be a traditional quotation.

2. The genealogies of the royal houses described in this chapter are given in order to clarify their mutual relations: They are the successors to the throne, not necessarily the sons of the predecessor

(1) CEDI (Vaidarbhas or Kaiśikas)
Vidarbhā→Kuṣa→Romapāda→Babhru→Krṣṭī→Uṣiṇa→Cedi→Caidya etc.

(2) CEDI-PA-S (Vāsavas or Cedipas)
Vasu-Uparicara→Cedipa or Pratyagra→Damaghoṣa→Śisupāla→Dhṛṣṭikṛṣṇa

(3) TĀDAVAS
Vidarbhā→Krṣṭī→Kunti→Dhṛṣṭi→Nivṛti→Daśārha→Vyoman→Jimūta→Vikṛti→Bhimaraṇa→Navaraṇa→Daśārha→Śakuni→Kāmba→Devarāja→Devakṣatra→Madhu→Kuruvaśa→Puruhotra→Anu I→Āyu→Sātvata.

(4) SĀTVATAS
Sātvata→Andhaka I→Kukura→Vahni→Kapotaroman→Viloman→Anu II→Andhaka II→Dundubhi→Ardyota→Punarvasu→Āhuka→Ugrasena→Kamsa
2. Romapāda’s son was Babhru, from whom was born Kṛti. His son was Usika from whom proceeded (the line of) kings like Caidya and others (i.e. Damaghoṣa etc.)

3. Kratha (the second son of Vidarbhā) had a son called Kuntī, from whom was born Dhṛṣṭi (Viṣṇi) whose son was Nirvrṭi (Vidhrīti). From him sprang a son named Daśārha, whose son was Vyoma.

4. His son was Jīmūta whose son was Vikṛti, the father of Bhīmaratha. His son was Navaratha, from whom was born Daśaratha.

5. From his son Śakuni was born Kerambhi from whose loins appeared Devarāta. His son was Devakṣatra. From him was born Madhu, whose son was Kuruvaśa of whom was born Anu.

6-8. Anu’s son was Puruhotrā whose son was Āyu from whom Sātvata was born. Sātvata had seven sons—Bhajamāna, Bhaji, Dipta, Viṣṇi, Devavṛdha, Andhaka, Mahābhotoja, Oh noble king! Bhajamāna’s sons were Nimloci, Kīṅkiṇi and Dhṛṣṭi, through one wife, while by another wife, he had three sons viz. Śatājit, Sahasrājit and Ayutājit, Oh Lord.

9-11. Babhru was the son of Devavṛdha in eulogizing whom the following couplet is recited:

(5) SATVATAS
Sātvata → Mahābhotoja → Bhajamāna II → Vidūratha → Śūra I → Śini → Svayambhoja → Hṛdika → Devamiḍha → Śūra II → Vasudeva → Kṛṣṇa

(6) VRŚNIS
Viṣṇi I married to Gāndhārī :→ Sumitra → Nimna → Sattrājita → Prasena Bhaṅgakāra → Sahākṣa.

Viṣṇi I married to Mādrī : → Yudhājita → Viṣṇi II (Pṛṇi)
Śvaphalka → Citraka
Akrūra etc. → Pṛthu etc.
Viṣṇi I → Devamiḍha → Śūra II → Vasudeva → Kṛṣṇa → Sāmba → Vajra.

Viṣṇi → Śini II → Satyaka → Yuyudhāna → Jaya → Kuṇi → Asaṅga → Yogandhara.

Viṣṇi I — Śini I.
“Just as we hear from far afar, so we see (them) from near. Babhru is the greatest among human beings while Devāvrḍha is just like gods (lit. equal in comparison with gods). Through the spiritual guidance of Babhru and Devāvrḍha fourteen thousand and sixty-five men attained immortality (liberation from saṁśrā.).”

Mahābhōja (the seventh son of Sātvata) was pious, and religious-minded. Kings born in his family-line were (known as) Bhojas.

12. Vṛṣṇi’s son was Sumitra, whose son was Yudhājit, Oh chastiser of enemies. His son was Śini who had Anamitra as his son. From Anamitra appeared Nimna.

13. Satrājit and Prasena were the two sons of Nimna. Another Śini, a son of Anamitra had a son Satyaka.

14. Satyaka’s son was Yuyudhāna whose son was Jaya from whom was born Kuṇi. His son was Yugandhara. Anamitra had another son named Vṛṣṇi.

15. Vṛṣṇi had two sons—Śva-phalka and Citraratha. Śva-phalka begot on Gandini twelve famous sons (in addition to Akrūra), but Akrūra was the foremost of them all.

16-17. (The names of those sons are :) Āsaṅga, Sārameya, Mṛdura, Mṛduvid, Giri, Dharmavṛddha, Sukarmā, Kṣetropeka, Arimardana, Śatrughna, Gandhamāda and Pratibāhu. They had a sister called Sucīrā. Akrūra also had two sons—

18. Viz. Devavān and Upadeva. Citraratha had sons such as Prithu, Vidūra and many others—all descendants of Vṛṣṇi.

19. Andhaka¹ had four sons : Kukura, Bhajamāna, Śuci and Kambilabarhiṣa. Kukura’s son was Vahni, whose son was Viloma.

20. He had a son Kapotaroma whose son was Anu. His friend was Tumbaru (the famous celestial musician. From Anu was born Andhaka, from whom was born Dundubhi. His son was Aridyota, the father of Punarvasu.

21. Punarvasu had a son called Āhuka, and a daugh-

¹ On the strength of VP.4.14.12 ṢR gives the name Andhaka, though Bh.P. does not mention his name.
ter named Ahukī. Ahuka’s sons were Devaka and Ugrasena. Devaka had four sons:

22. Viz. Devavān, Upadeva, Sudeva, Deva-vardhana. They had seven sisters such as Dhṛtadeva and others, Oh King!

23. (In addition to Dhṛtadeva) the sisters were Śāntideva, Upadeva, Śridēva, Devarakṣiṭa, Sahadeva and Devaki all of whom Vasudeva (Krṣṇa’s father) married.

24. Kaṁsa, Sunāma, Nyagrodha, Kaṅka, Śaṅku, Suhū, Rāṣtrapāla, Śṛṣṭi and Tuṣṭimān were the sons of Ugrasena.

25. The daughters of Ugrasena were Karśā, Karśavatī, Kaṅkā, Šarabhū, Rāṣtrapālikā, and they were the wives of Vasudeva’s younger brothers.

26. Śūra was born of Vidūratha (the son of Citraratha). His son was Bhajamāna of whom was born Śini. From him was born Svayambhoja whose son was Hṛdika.

27. Hṛdika’s sons were Devabāhu, Šatadhanu, and Kṛtavarmā. Śūra (sena) was the son of Devamīḍha (who, as explained by ŚR on the strength of Parāṣara i.e. VP to be the fourth son of Hṛdika¹). Māriṣā was Śūra’s wife.

28-30. He begat on her ten sons of spotless character viz. Vasudeva, Devabhāga, Devāravas, Anaka, Śṛnjaya, Šyāmaka, Kaṅka, Šāmika, Vatsaka, Vṛka. They call Vasudeva, the father of Hari (lit. the source of Hari’s birth), as Ānaka-dundubhi, as the celestial kettledrums (dundubhis) and still bigger drums (Ānakas) were sounded at his (auspicious) birth. And their five sisters Pṛthā, Šrutadevā, Šrutakīrti, Šrutaśravas.

31. And Rājādhidevi were his five daughters. (Pṛthā’s) father Śūra gave her in adoption to his friend Kunti who was childless.

32. From the sage Durvāsas whom she pleased (by her services), she obtained the lore (mants:as) of invoking gods (Devahuti Vidyā). For testing the efficacy of that lore, she invoked the lustrous sun.

Devamīḍhasya yaḥ Śacro nāma Putras tasya Devamīḍha Hṛdikasyāvā sutas tathāha Parāṣaraḥ / and quotes VP. 4.14.24 etc.
33. She was astounded to see the (sun)-god appearing instantly in her presence. (Being embarrassed, apologetically) she said, "It is just for testing the efficacy of the lore that the mantra was used. Excuse me, Oh god, and (kindly) go your way."

34. 'The sight of gods is never fruitless, Oh lady! I shall beget a son for you, and see to it that your virginity is unimpaired, Oh girl of beautiful waist!'

35. Assuring her thus, the sun-god impregnated her and returned to the firmament. She instantly gave birth to a son who was (brilliant) like another sun.

36. Being afraid of a public censure, she abandoned him (in a box) in the river. Your really valorous great grandfather Pându married her.

37. Vṛddhaśarmā of Kāruṣa dynasty married Śrutadevā of whom was born Dantavakra, one of the Diti's sons (viz. Hiraṇyākṣa) who was formerly attendant of god Viṣṇu, called Vijaya but cursed by the sage (Sanaka).

38. Dhṛṣṭaketu of Kekaya family wedded Śrutakirti and had five sons in the Kekaya family.

40. Śiṣupāla was her (Śrutaśravā's) son. Thus the (account of his) birth is narrated. By Kamsā, Devabhāga had two sons, Citraketu and Brhadbala.

41. Devaśravas had by Kamsavatī two sons—Suvīra and Iṣumān, while Anaka begot on Kaṅkā (two sons viz.) Satyagit and Purujit.

42. Śrījaya procreated from Rāṣṭrapāli, Vṛṣa, Durmaṛṣaṇa and other sons, while Śyāmaka had Harikeśa and Hiraṇyākṣa by Śūrabhūmi.

43. Vatsaka begot on a celestial nymph Miśrakeśi, Vṛka and other sons, while Vṛka had by his wife Durvāksī sons such as Takṣa, Puṣkara, Śāla and others.

44. By Sudāminī, Śamika had Sumitra, Arjunapāla and other sons, while Kaṅka begot on Karṇikā, Rtaḥhāman and Jaya.
45. Ānakadundubhi (Vasudeva) had Pauravi, Rohini, Bhadrā, Madirā, Rocanā, Ilā and Devaki (and others) as wives. Out of them Devaki was prominent.

46. By Rohini, Vasudeva procreated Bala, Gada, Sāraṇa, Durmada, Vipula, Dhruva, as well as Kṛta and others.

47. Vasudeva’s sons by Pauravi were Subhadra, Bhadravāha, Durmada, Bhadra as well as others beginning with Bhūta, all together being twelve (in number).

48. Nanda, Upananda, Kṛtaka, Śūra and others were the children of (Vasudeva’s wife) Madirā, while Kausalyā gave birth to one son Keśin, the delight of his family.

49. Rocanā bore (to Vasudeva) Hasta, Hemāṅgada and other sons. He begot on Ilā, Uruvalka and other chiefs of Yadus.

50. Ānakadundubhi (Vasudeva) had only one son Viprṣṭha from Dhṛtadevā, while the sons of Sāntidevā were Śrama, Pratīsruta and others, Oh king!

51. Ten kings beginning with Kalpavarsa were the sons of Upadevā; while Śridevā had six sons viz. Vasu, Hamsa, Suvaṃśa and (three) others.

52-53. By Devarakṣitā, he got nine sons such as Gada and others. While he begot eight sons on Sahadevā. Of them, Puruviṣruta was most prominent. Just as God Dharma procreated eight Vasus, the noble-minded Vasudeva begot on Devaki eight sons.

54. They were Kṛtimat, Suṣeṇa, Bhadrasena, Rju, Sammardana, Bhadra and Saṅkarṣaṇa who was Śeṣa, the Lord of Serpents.

55. Their eighth son was verily Lord Hari himself. And the highly fortunate Subhadrā, your grand mother was their daughter, Oh King!

56. Whenever there is deterioration in righteousness and waxing of sinfulness, the glorious Lord Hari incarnates himself.¹

57. Oh King! No cause except his will-power (Māyā) can be attributed for the appearance or deeds of the Lord

¹ Cf. yadā yadā hi dharmasya glānir bhavati Bhāratā |
abhyutthānam adharmasya tadātmānān svāmyaham || Bh. GĪTĀ who is the all-pervading Lord of the universe, the Supreme-most, detached and impartial Witness.

58. The activity of the Lord through his Māyā brings about the birth, continuation and destruction of the jīva (an embodied soul). The recession of Māyā is his Grace, which leads to self-realization.

59. He endeavoured to lighten the burden of the earth which was being over-run by Asuras in the guise of kings leading Akṣauhinīs of army.

60. The glorious Lord Viṣṇu (Slayer of demon Madhu) accompanied by Saṅkarṣaṇa (Balarāma) achieved feats which the Lords of gods could not comprehend, even by thought or imagination.

61. For conferring grace on his devotees, he spread his hallowing glory which will also remove the misery, sorrow and ignorance of those who will be born in (the impending) Kali age.

62. Having but once slightly tasted with the joined palms in the form of ears, from the sacredmost stream of his glory, which is sweet like nectar to the ears of the righteous people, a person shakes himself free from tendencies to Karmas.

63-64. Lord Kṛṣṇa whose sportive acts were ever eulogised by (the members of the clans like) Bhojas, Vṛṣnīs, Andhakas, Madhus, Śūrasenas and Daśārhas as well as Kauravas, Śṛṅjayas and Pāṇḍavas, delighted the entire humanity with his affectionate smiles and glances, with his sublime speech and his valorous sportive actions and personality, charming in every respect.

65. Drinking (as it were) with their eyes, his countenance appearing most beautiful with ears ornamented with alligator-shaped ear-rings and with brilliant cheeks, a face beaming with graceful sportive smiles, an eternal seat of ecstasy—men and women steeped in delight, are never satiated but grow angry with Nimi (who causes winking and thus deprives them of their happiness and joy).

1. VC. insists that these were cowherd women of Vṛṇḍāvana and not others, and men were Kṛṣṇa’s mates like Subala and quotes Ujjvalanilāmaṇi as an authority on this.
66. He manifested himself with his own form, but later on assuming the human form, he went from his father's house to Vraja. He enhanced its prosperity. He killed all the enemies; he married a number of wives and begot hundreds of sons through them. He worshipped the Supreme person (who is himself) by performing numerous sacrifices, and promulgated thereby the Vedic path that leads to him, amongst the people.

67. Desiring to reduce the heavy burden of the earth, he struck down with his glance the legions of kings in the battle resulting from the internal feuds of the Kuru clans, but (gave credit of victory to Arjuna) by proclaiming the victory (as if) won by Arjuna; he then enlightened Uddhava in the secrets of the highest Truth, and retired to his Supreme Abode.
THE BHĀGAVATA PURĀṆA

PART IV
CONTENTS

SKANDHA X

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapters</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. Kaṁsa kills Devaki’s Sons</td>
<td>1255</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. The Lord’s descent in Devaki’s Womb</td>
<td>1263</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. Description of the Birth of Śrī Kṛṣṇa</td>
<td>1270</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. Yoga-Māyā’s Prophecy and Kaṁsa’s Order to Slaughter all Children</td>
<td>1278</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5. Celebration of Kṛṣṇa’s Birth : Meeting of Nanda and Vasudeva</td>
<td>1283</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6. Pūtanā emancipated</td>
<td>1287</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7. Destruction of the Cart and Tṛṇāvarta</td>
<td>1293</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8. Kṛṣṇa’s Sports—Display of Viśvarūpa</td>
<td>1299</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9. Grace upon the Gopi (Yaśodā) ; Kṛṣṇa tied to the mortar.</td>
<td>1305</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10. Uprooting of Arjuna Trees—Redemption of Nalakūbara and Maṇigrīva</td>
<td>1308</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11. Exodus from Gokula—Destruction of demons Vatsa and Baka</td>
<td>1315</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12. Slaying of Aghāsura</td>
<td>1322</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13. Infatuation of God Brahmā</td>
<td>1329</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14. God Brahmā eulogizes Kṛṣṇa</td>
<td>1339</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15. Slaying the demon Dhenuka</td>
<td>1351</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16. Expulsion of Kāliya</td>
<td>1358</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17. Rescue from the Forest Conflagration</td>
<td>1371</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18. Slaying of the Demon Pralamba</td>
<td>1375</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19. Swallowing up of a Forest-Conflagration</td>
<td>1378</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20. Description of the Rainy Season and the Autumn</td>
<td>1380</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21. The Song of Gopīs (Coward-women)</td>
<td>1388</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>22. Coward-maids pray to Kātyāyanī—Kṛṣṇa’s carrying away their garments</td>
<td>1395</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23. Spiritual Emancipation of the wives of Brāhmaṇa Sacrificers</td>
<td>1401</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24. Prevention of Sacrifice to Indra</td>
<td>1409</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
25. Lifting up of Mount Govardhana | 1416
26. Conversation between Nanda and Cowherds | 1420
27. Indra Coronates Kṛṣṇa | 1423
28. Nanda rescued from Varuṇa | 1428
29. Lord Kṛṣṇa’s Rāsa with Gopīs | 1431
30. Search after Kṛṣṇa | 1443
31. Gopī’s song (prayer for Kṛṣṇa’s return) | 1449
32. Kṛṣṇa comforts Gopīs | 1453
33. Description of Rāsa Krīḍā | 1458
34. Sudarśana emancipated and slaying of Saṅkhacūḍa | 1465
35. Gopī’s song in pairs of Verses | 1468
36. Akrūra deputed to bring Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma to Mathura | 1472
37. Slaying of Asuras Keśin and Vṛnom | 1480
38. The arrival of Akrūra to Gokula | 1484
39. Akrūra returns with Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma | 1491
40. Akrūra’s Hymn (in praise of the Lord) | 1498
41. Kṛṣṇa’s arrival at Mathura | 1503
42. Description of the wrestling Arena | 1510
43. Killing of the elephant Kuvalayāpīḍa | 1514
44. Slaying of Kaṁsa | 1519
45. Restoration of preceptor Sāndiḍpiṇi’s son | 1525
46. Uddhava deputed for consoling Nanda | 1533
47. Uddhava’s Discourse on the Real Nature of the Lord | 1539
48. Visit to the Houses of Trivakra and Akrūra | 1551
49. Akrūra’s Mission to Hastinapura | 1556
50. Settlement at the Fort of Dvārakā | 1560
51. Mucukunda’s Eulogy of the Lord | 1571
52. Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma escape to Dvārakā : Balarāma’s marriage. Rukmiṇī’s letter to Kṛṣṇa | 1580
53. Rukmiṇī’s Marriage : Rukmiṇī carried away by Kṛṣṇa | 1588
54. Celebration of Rukmiṇī’s Marriage | 1595
55. The story of Pradyumna’s Birth | 1603
56. The story of Syamantaka Jewel | 1608
57. The story of Syamantaka Jewel, Murder of Satrājīt for Syamantaka, Akrūra allowed to retain it. | 1614
| 58. | Espousals of Lord Kṛṣṇa | 1620 |
| 59. | Narakāsura slain | 1628 |
| 60. | Conversation between Kṛṣṇa and Rukmiṇī (A Sweet Quarrel) | 1637 |
| 61. | Aniruddha's marriage | 1647 |
| 62. | Aniruddha taken captive by Bāṇāsura | 1652 |
| 63. | Bāṇa Vanquished Aniruddha brought to Dvārakā | 1657 |
| 64. | The story of Nṛga | 1663 |
| 65. | Balarāma's visit to Gokula—the course of the Yamunā diverted | 1669 |
| 66. | Slaying of Puṇḍraka and others | 1674 |
| 67. | Balarāma slays Dvīvīda | 1679 |
| 68. | Hastināpura dragged by Balarāma | 1682 |
| 69. | Śrīkṛṣṇa's Household life | 1688 |
| 70. | Kṛṣṇa's Daily Observances; Deputation from Captive kings of Jarāsandha | 1694 |
| 71. | Śrīkṛṣṇa's visit to Indraprsthā | 1700 |
| 72. | Jarāsandha slain | 1707 |
| 73. | Return of Kṛṣṇa and others to Indraprastha | 1712 |
| 74. | Yudhiṣṭhira's Rājasūya: Śiśupāla slain | 1717 |
| 75. | Dicomfiture of Duryodhana | 1723 |
| 76. | Fight with Śālva | 1728 |
| 77. | Slaying of King Śālva | 1733 |
| 78. | Dantavaktra and Vidūratha slain: Balarāma's Pilgrimage | 1740 |
| 79. | Balvala Killed: Balarāma's Pilgrimage | 1747 |
| 80. | The story of the Brāhmaṇa Śrīdāman | 1752 |
| 81. | The story of the Parched Rice: | 1758 |
| | (The story of Śrīdāman continued) | 1758 |
| 82. | Meeting of Vṛṣṇis and Gopas of Vṛndavana | 1763 |
| 83. | Narration of their Marriage. Episodes by Kṛṣṇa's Consorts | 1770 |
| 84. | Vasudeva's Sacrifice | 1777 |
| 85. | Restoration of his Elder Brothers by Kṛṣṇa from the Realm of Death | 1787 |
86. Elopement of Subhadrā : The lord’s Grace on Śrutadeva 1796
87. Hymn of praise by the Vedas 1804
88. God Rudra saved 1826
89. Supremacy of Viṣṇu Vindicated 1831
90. The Song of Queens : Resume of Kṛṣṇa’s sports 1841

APPENDIX—Additional verses in VJ’s Text 1851
SKANDHA TENTH

CHAPTER ONE

The King (Parikṣit) said:

1. Your worship has been pleased to narrate the detailed account of the Lunar and Solar dynasties and also the extremely wonderful exploits of kings, born in both these families.

2. (You have also described) especially the race of Yadu, of extremely pious nature. Oh the best of Sages! Do you now be pleased to describe to us the great deeds of Lord Viṣṇu who incarnated in his family, along with his part-manifestation (aṁśa viz. Balarāma).

3. Please recount to us in details all those deeds that the Almighty Lord, the Maker (Protector) and the Soul of all beings, performed after incarnating in Yadu’s race.

4. What man other than a slaughterer will desist from (listening to) the recital of the excellent attributes of Lord Kṛṣṇa, of auspicious glory—glory constantly sung by those who are freed from the influence of desires (and are liberated), a specific remedy for (release from) samsāra, and extremely pleasant to the ears and the mind.

5. Using Him (Kṛṣṇa) as a raft, my grandfathers (i.e. grandfather Arjuna and granduncles such as Yudhiṣṭhira), crossed the ocean in the form of the Kaurava army, so difficult to tide over, due to its being infested with monstrous whales in the form of unrivalled (chariot-riding) warriors like Bhīṣma and others, the vanquishers of even celestials in battles, contemptuously treating it (the ocean-like army) like a (shallow) depression caused by a calf’s hoof.

6. And armed with a discus (Sudarṣana), He entered the womb of my mother (Uttarā) who sought his refuge and protected this body of mine—the seed for the continuity of the races of Kuru and Pāṇḍava—while it (my body) was being scorched by the missile (Brahmāstra) discharged by Aśvatthāman, Dronā’s son.
7. Oh learned sage, be pleased to recount to me (for my benefit), the glorious exploits of him (Krṣṇa) who has assumed human form through his Māyā-power, and who pervades all embodied beings internally and externally, and who, as an Inner Controller and as a Destroyer (Time-Spirit)—severally dispenses Liberation to the spiritually-minded (“inner-seers”) and death, i.e. saṁsāra, to those with worldly propensities.

8. Balarāma alias Saṅkarṣaṇa was (first) stated by you to be the son of Rohiṇī (vide supra 9.24.46). How could he be connected with the womb of Devaki (vide supra 9.24.54) without assuming another body?

9. Why for did glorious Mukunda (Lord Krṣṇa) migrate from his father’s residence to Vraja? Where (in what places) did the Lord of Sātvatas (gods or a clan of Yadus) settle down with his kinsmen?

10. What were the activities (lit. did he do) of Keśava while residing at Vraja, as well as in Mathurā, the city founded by demon Madhu? Why did he personally kill Kaṁsa, his mother’s brother who, as such, did not deserve it.

11. After assuming human body, for how many years did he stay at Dvārakā along with Vṛṣṇis (Yādavas)? How many were the consorts of the Lord?

12. Oh Omniscient Sage! It behoves you to describe in details to me, a faithful devotee, this and every other deed performed by Krṣṇa.

13. Though I have given up even drinking of water in this (life-long) fast, this extremely unbearable hunger does not torment me, as I drink the nectar of Hari’s stories flowing from the moon-lotus in the form of your mouth.

Śūta said:

14. Oh Śaunaka, having listened to the laudable inquiry, the worshipful son of Vyāsa (Śuka) who was the foremost among the votaries of viṣṇu, complimented king Parikṣit (one protected by Viṣṇu) and commenced to extol the life and episodes of Lord Krṣṇa, which destroy the sins and impurities of Kali (Or which remove the miseries of saṁsāra.)
Śrī Śuka said:

15. Oh foremost among saintly kings! Your mind has been properly directed, inasmuch as the utmost and firmest devotion to the stories of Vāsudeva has been engendered in you.

16. Inquiries about the stories of Vāsudeva certainly purify all the three persons concerned, namely, the reciter, the inquirer and the members of the audience, just as water washing his feet i.e. the Gaṅgā (Or the water washing Śālagrāma) purifies all.

17. Mother Earth which was overburdened with the crushing weight of millions and millions of the hosts of Daityas who assumed the guise of arrogant kings, sought refuge to god Brahmā.

18. Taking the form of a depressed and piteously lowing cow and with her face overflowing with tears, she approached god Brahmā’s presence and represented to him her grievous plight.

19. Realizing the piteous condition of the earth, god Brahmā accompanied by the three-eyed god Śiva and other gods, came to the shore of the milky ocean, along with her.

20. After reaching there, he with perfect concentration of mind, praised in terms of the Puruṣa-Śūkta the Supreme Person, the Lord of the world, the god of gods, the absolutely blissful Enjoyer of sacrifices.

21. Listening to the voice uttered in the sky while he was meditating (upon the Lord), god Brahmā spoke out to the celestials, “Oh immortals, hear from me the words of the Supreme Person and comply immediately with them. Let there be no delay.”

22. The affliction of Mother Earth was already understood by the Supreme Person before we appealed to him. You should now take birth in the Yadu Clan, in your part-manifestation, while the Lord of gods will walk over the earth, reducing its burden through his potency called Time.

23. The glorious Supreme Lord will directly manifest Himself in the house of Vasudeva. Let the heavenly damsels be born (on the earth) to minister to his pleasures.
23—A. VR’s text adds:

As commanded by him, let the sages be made to assume the form of cattle for the purpose of propitiating Lord Viṣṇu by yielding him milk, Oh gods.

24. The self-effulgent thousand-faced Lord Śesa imbued with a part of Vāsudeva, will be born as the elder brother, with a view to catering to his pleasures.

25. The divine Yoga-Māyā of Viṣṇu who has deluded the world, has been commanded to take birth in part-manifestation for fulfilling his mission.”

Śrī Śuka said:

26. Having directed the hosts of gods in this way, and consoling the Earth in reassuring words, god Brahmā, the Ruler of Prajāpatis, repaired to his exalted region.

27. In former times, Śūrasena, the chief of the Yadu clan, ruled over the territories of Mathurā and Śūrasena, while residing in the city of Mathurā.

28. Thenceforth, Mathurā became the metropolis of all kings of the Yādava dynasty. In that city, the glorious Lord Hari ever exhibits his presence in a special way.

29. In that city, on one occasion, Vasudeva, son of Śūra, whose marriage with Devakī was celebrated, ascended the chariot with his newly wedded wife, to proceed to his place after marriage.

30. Karṇa, the son of Ugrasena, being desirous of pleasing his sister (cousin), took over the reins of the horses, surrounded by hundreds of gold-plated chariots.

31-32. At the time of departure, Devaka who was fond of his daughter, gave, as wedding presents, four hundred elephants caparisoned with gold chains, fifteen thousand horses, eighteen hundred chariots and two hundred comely maidservants, adorned with gold ornaments.

33. As the procession of the bride and the bridegroom started, conchs, clarionets, drums and kettle-drums were sounded simultaneously in the most auspicious manner.

34. On the way, an incorporeal voice from the sky addressed Karṇa who was holding the reins: “Oh foolish fellow, the eighth son from the womb of her whom you are conducting, shall slay you”.
35. Being thus warned, the wicked sinful fellow, who was a disgrace to the Bhoja family, with a sword in hand, seized his sister by her braids of hair and proceeded to kill her.

36. The great-souled Vasudeva pleaded in conciliatory terms with the cruel, shameless perpetrator of disgraceful deeds.

Vasudeva urged:

37. You possess virtues extolled by the brave and are the glory to the Bhoja family. As such how is it that you (attempt to) kill your sister on the festive occasion of her marriage.

38. (If you say that you are doing so as a precautionary measure), death is born along with the body of all creatures, Oh warrior! Death is inevitable to all creatures, whether it may be today or at the end of hundred years.

39. When the body is on the point of dissolving in five component-Elements (i.e. at the time of death), the Soul residing in it automatically, under the force of his karmas (as good as) obtains another body and quits his previous frame.

40. Just as a man while walking, stands with his one foot established on the earth, while the other paces forward, or just as a caterpillar leaves the (previous) blade of grass only when it catches the hold of another, similarly does an embodied being, caught in the current of karmas.

41. Just as a person whose mind is obsessed with a strong desire, and who is mentally brooding over the objects of his desires, with his mind deeply impressed by what he has seen or heard, seems to realize it in dreams, and identifies himself with it, for getting himself (his body in the waking state). So does the soul attain his new body quitting the old one.

42. To whatever modification of five bhūtas created by Māyā that the mind consisting of various emotions and passions feels impelled by destiny, and flows to it, and is attached at the time of death, the soul abiding in the body identifies itself with it and passes into that form along with the mind.

42a. Being impelled by Destiny, the mind, consisting of emotions and passions, feels impelled to, flows to and is attached to (at the time of death) whatever modifications of the five Bhūtas created by Māyā, the soul abiding in the body identifies itself with that form, and passes into it along with the mind.
43. Just as a luminous body (e.g. the Sun or the Moon) which, when reflected in water in an earthen container, appears to move or change according to the speed of the wind that ruffles the liquid reflecting medium (though actually—the original luminary—does not shake), so does the embodied soul, through attachment, enter the bodies or forms created by his own Māyā and is overcome with delusion.

44. Therefore, a person being so conditioned but seeking his own welfare, should not do wrong to anyone. For there is fear to the wrong-doers from others (such as god of death, the person wronged etc.).

45. This poor girl, your younger sister, is just like a daughter to you (or a lifeless doll). It does not become you who are kind to the helpless, to kill her who has just completed the marriage rites.

Śrī Śuka continued:

46. Oh descendant of Kuru! Even though admonished with conciliatory words and words inspiring fear (of dire consequences), the relentless Karīsa, following the ways of demons, did not desist (from his determination).

47. Observing his firm determination (to kill Devakī), Vasudeva thought for a while how to avert this imminent danger for the time being, and devised the following expedient for it.

48. (He thought to himself:) “An intelligent person should try to avert death to the utmost limit of his intellectual and physical abilities. So if, despite these, it could not be warded off, no blame will be attached to him.

49. I shall rescue this helpless girl by promising in exchange handing over of her sons to Death (viz. Karīsa who is going to kill them), provided the sons are born or he (Karīsa) does not die in the meanwhile.

50. Or might not the contrary take place (i.e. my son might kill him), unscrutable are the ways of the Providence; for the imminent may be averted and what is averted may happen again.

51. Just as, in a forest conflagrations, there is no apparent cause (except Fate) for its coming in contact with a parti-cicular tree or remaining aloof from another, so also in the case of a created being, the cause of its being—associated or dissociated with a particular body is very difficult to be comprehended.”

52. Having carefully considered (this problem) to the best of his intellectual capacity, Vasudeva respectfully addressed the wicked fellow, with (apparently) great esteem.

53. Simulating a blooming lotus-like (cheerful) countenance, in spite of his heart full of pain, he smilingly spoke to that hard-hearted and shameless fellow.

_Vasudeva said:_

54. Oh gentle-natured Kaśī! There is certainly no fear to you from this girl as has been intimated to you by the incorporeal voice from the sky. I shall handover to you her sons from whom you apprehend danger.

_Srī Śuka said:_

55. Kaśī, who properly understood the significance of Vasudeva’s words, desisted from killing his sister (Devakī). Even Vasudeva who was pleased, extolled him and entered his palace.

56. After a lapse of time, in due course, Devakī who was devoted to the Lord who is the soul of all deities and was permeated with the divinities, gave birth to eight sons and a daughter, one every year.

57. Vasudeva who (by nature) was intensely agitated to act falsely, handed over with great pains his first born son, Kīrtimāna, to Kaśī.

58. What is there which a truthful person (like Vasudeva) cannot endure? Is there anything which the knowers of the truth (that the Lord alone is the reality) long for? (Did Vasudeva think that Kaśī would spare his child when hand- ed over personally? No.). There is nothing which the wicked would not do. (How is it that Devakī parted with the child?) What thing would they not sacrifice who cherish Hari in their hearts?

59. Seeing the equanimity and firmness in truth of Vasudeva Kaśī was highly pleased with him and spoke to him smilingly: Oh King.
60. "Let this boy return (to his mother) as there is no danger from him to me, as my death has been ordained from your eighth child."

61. Taking back his son in compliance of Kaṁsa's words, Vasudeva returned home. He was however not happy over the words of that wicked Kaṁsa of uncontrolled mind.

61A. Additional verse in VJ.'s text:

Then the divine sage Nārada, the son of Brahmā, called upon Kaṁsa, and conferring with him privately spoke as follows.

62-63. "Whatever cowherds of whom Nanda is the chief, there are in Vraja and again all their women and all Vṛṣṇis headed by Vasudeva and Yādava women of whom Devakī is the foremost—all the kinsmen, relations and friends of both Nanda and Vasudeva who are loyal to Kaṁsa—are mostly gods. (while) those who are the followers of Kaṁsa.

63—A. VR.'s text adds:

Are verily all asuras who trouble the world."

64. (Considering that the Lord would not incarnate earlier by Kaṁsa's such peaceful attitude) Nārada approached Kaṁsa and advised him as above, apprising him of the endeavours made (by god Brahmā and others) for the annihilation of Daityas who became a burden to the earth.

65. On the departure of the sage, Kaṁsa looked upon all Yadus as gods and every child born of Devakī as Viṣṇu intent upon slaying himself.

66. Fettering Devakī and Vasudeva in chains, he imprisoned them in their house and killed every new-born child, fearing him to be god Viṣṇu.

67. Generally, the kings on the earth who are covetous and thirsty after the lives of others, kill their mother, father, brothers and all friends as well.

68. Realising himself to be the great asura Kālanemi whom Viṣṇu had formerly killed, born here again, he commenced hostilities with Yādavas.

69. Being endowed with enormous power, he arrested his father Ugrasena, the king of Yādavas, Bhojas and Andhakas and took over the government of the Śūrasena region.
CHAPTER TWO

The Lord's descent in Devaki's womb

Śri Śuka continued:

1-2. Aided by asuras like Pralamba, Baka, Cānūra, Ṭṛṇāvarta, Agha (the great devourer), Muṣṭika, Ariṣṭa, Dvivida, Pūtanā, Keśi, Dhenuka and forming an alliance with other asura kings like Bāna and Bhauma, and with the support of Jarāsandha, the king of Magadha, the mighty Kaṁsa began to harass Yadus.

3. Hard pressed by him, they migrated in disguise to different countries, viz. Kurus, Pāṇcālas, Kekayas, Śālvas, Vidarbhās, Niṣadhas, Videhas and Kosalas as well.

4-5. Some of his relatives, however, continued to serve him obediently. When Kaṁsa, the son of Ugrasena, killed six sons of Devaki, a part of the lustre of Lord Viṣṇu, known as Ananta, became the seventh child entering Devaki's womb who enhanced her joy and grief at the same time.

6. Being cognisant of the fear caused by Kaṁsa to Yadus, his proteges, he commanded his Yoga-Māyā (as follows):

7. “Oh auspicious goddess! Do you go to Vraja adorned with residence of cowherds and cows (by their affluence)? There, in the settlement of cowherds headed by Nanda dwells Rohiṇī, the wife of Vāsudeva. His other wives too being apprehensive of Kaṁsa have gone underground (stay in secret places)."

8. In the womb of Devaki lies my part-manifestation known as Śeṣa. Taking him from her womb, transfer him to Rohiṇī's womb.

9. I shall then become her son by my part-manifestation (with my full powers) while you will be born of Yaśodā, the wife of Nanda.

10. Recognizing you as the supreme dispenser of boons to persons desirous of progeny and bestower of boons granting all

1. To substantiate the statement Krṣṇastu bhagavān svayam (Krṣṇa is the Almighty Lord himself) ŚR. gives different explanations of amśabhāga. VT. and others endorse ŚR. but Brahma Purāṇa accepts Krṣṇa as ‘part-manifestation’.
desires, people will worship you with incense, offerings of food and other presents.

11-12. People will erect temples for you on the earth and will designate you with various names such as Durgā, Bhadrakāli, Vijayā, Vaiṣṇavī, Kumudā, Caṇḍikā, Kṛṣṇā, Mādhavī, Kanyakā, Māyā, Nārāyaṇī, Īśānī, Śāradā and Ambikā.

13. Due to his being taken out of the womb of Devaki (and transfer to that of Rohiṇī), he will be known as Saṅkarṣaṇa. As he would give delight to the world, he would be called Rāma, and Bala on account of his eminence among the mighty people.

14. When commanded by the Lord thus, she accepted it with the words, ‘Yes! That will be done’. After circumambulating him, she went down to the earth, and executed his orders.

15. When the child from the womb of Devaki was transferred to that of Rohiṇī by the goddess Toga-nidrā, citizens of Mathurā sorrowfully talked about the miscarriage of Devaki.

16. And the Almighty Lord, who is the soul of the universe, and gives assurance of safety to his votaries, entered the mind of Vasudeva¹, with all his divine potencies in their fullness.

17. Being surcharged with (lit. bearing) the glorious presence of the Supreme Person (Lord Viṣṇu), Vasudeva resplendent like unto the Sun, became unapproachable and unassailable to all created beings.

18. Thereupon, like unto the (eastern) direction bearing the moon, the delighter of all, queen Devaki, resplendent with pure sattva conceived in her mind—when conveyed through psychological process (vedha-dikṣā) by Vasudeva—the Lord, the auspiciousness of the world incarnate², whose potencies are undiminishing, and who as the indwelling Soul of all, was already present in her.

¹. And not through usual physiological process—ŚR.
². Or: The Lord who, though omnipresent, assumes a limited body for showing His grace to His devotees—ŚR.
19. Like unto the flame of a lamp enclosed by an earthen pot, or like deep scholarship of a narrow-minded person who refuses to impart it (to others), Devaki, though, now the abiding place of the Lord who is the abode of all the universe, did not shine superbly (failed to give delight to the world at large, though she herself enjoyed the ecstasy of the presence of the Lord), as she was (then) imprisoned in the palace of Kamsa, the king of Bhojas.

20. When Kamsa perceived that Devaki, bearing in her womb the invincible Lord Visnu and beaming with pure smiles, illuminated the whole (prison-) house with her effulgence, he said (to himself), “This is Hari who, intent on robbing me of my life, has certainly entered her (Devaki’s) womb, like a lion entering a den, for never before did she appear so brilliant.

21. “What immediate remedy should I now adopt in this matter today? For determined as he is on accomplishing his purpose (viz. serving the interest of gods), he would not desist from his prowess (in killing me, when he is born. Should I finish with Devaki just now, before he is born?—But even a selfish person does not wreck his reputation and prowess by such a deed). For this murder of a woman, my own sister in pregnancy, will forthwith spoil my reputation, prosperity for all time to come and (will affect even) my life as well.

22. He who lives by perpetrating extreme atrocities is as good as dead even during his life-time. People at large pronounce curses upon him while alive. When his body falls dead, he will surely go to the hell of blinding darkness, the destination of those who identify their Souls with their bodies.1

23. Reasoning with himself thus, the mighty Kamsa desisted (of his own accord) from his darkest design (of killing Devaki). Cherishing inveterate enmity to Lord Hari, he continued to await his birth.

---

1. V. J.'s text reads:

dhe mste tom anu hyartha-kama
Taomalah gaur abhimnino dhruvom /

When the body of the man who identifies with his Soul becomes defunct his objectives viz. artha, kama, his pure reputation, knowledge and emancipation (moksa) are surely lost to him.
24. Pondering over Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the senses, (suspecting that he may manifest himself at any moment and kill him) while sitting, lying, standing, eating, moving about and drinking, Kāṁsa saw that the whole world was pervaded by Him.¹

25. Gods Brahmā and Śiva accompanied by sages like Nārada and others (such as Sanaka, Sanandana) and gods along with their attendants arrived at that place, and glorified the Lord who showers all desired boons.

The gods said:

26.* We resort as a shelter to you who are of true resolve; to attain to whom, truthfulness is the only highest means; who exist and are the reality in the past, present and future (before the creation, during the subsistence and after the destruction of the universe); the cause and the source of the three elements—the earth, water and fire (aggregatively known as saṁ—) and the wind and the ether (collectively called tyāt in Tait. Upa 2.6.1); who reside in them as antaryāmin; who are the truth of the truth (the highest Reality even after the dissolution of the universe); who are the promulgator of truthful speech and impartially equable vision (towards all) and the embodiment of truthfulness.

¹. Kāṁsa was made to think of Him by Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of senses, in all states and actions in life for manifesting himself to Kāṁsa whom he thus perceived that the world is full of Kṛṣṇa—VB.

* VR. : We have sought shelter in You Who carry out what is avowed by you and are hence of real resolve; Who are distinct from the real world consisting of the sentient (cid) and non-sentient (acid); Whose body consists of three real entities—Prakṛti, Puruṣa and Time(kāla); Whose wish is carried out as you are the controller of the whole world comprising of Prakṛti (Puruṣa etc); Who are the source of the real prapañca consisting of the intelligent and non-intelligent (cid and acid); Who abide in the highest part of the sky; Who are the real of the reals; Who are the director of the Moon (the path of righteousness) and the Sun (truthfulness); Who are the embodiment of the unmodifiable reality.

VJ. : We sought refuge in You Who are the embodiment of perfect Bliss and Knowledge; absolutely distinct from the Earth and other elements; Who are the main gist of the three Vedas; the source of Prapañca which is a reality; abiding as antaryāmin in the world, a reality; the director and donor of the spiritual wisdom and happiness to the world—a reality; Whose blissful essential nature is unaffected.
27.* The primeval tree in the form of (visible) universe has one base (viz. Prakāṭi), two fruits (viz. pleasure and pain), three roots (viz. the guṇas, sattva, rajas and tamas), four kinds of secretions (viz. the objectives of human life, religion, property and wealth, sensual desires and liberation), five attributes (the sense organs), six folds or states (viz. birth, existence, growth, ripeness, decay and destruction or natural affections viz. hunger and thirst, grief and delusion, old age and death), seven kinds of barks (the constituents of the body viz. skin, blood, flesh, albumen, bone, marrow and semen), eight branches (the five elements—bhūtas, the mind, the reason and the ego), nine hollows (the ‘gates’ of the body, viz. two sockets of eyes, two cavities of ears, two nostrils, the mouth, the organs of urination and defecation), ten leaves (the vital airs—prānas), two birds (the individual Soul and the Indwelling Supreme Soul).

28. You alone are the cause of the (above-mentioned tree in the form of) phenomenal universe; You are its resting place (after its dissolution), and You are its protector. Those whose minds (knowledge or wisdom) are clouded by Your Māyā (the deluding potency), look upon you as many, but not so those who possess spiritual wisdom.

29. You are essentially knowledge and consciousness (the internal controller of all). Repeatedly You assume forms for conferring happiness on the mobile and immobile creation. Your forms are purely sāttvic (unadulterated with rajas and tamas). They bring happiness to the righteous and mete out destruction to the wicked.

30. Oh lotus-eyed god, some persons who have fixed their minds through concentration on you, the embodiment of

---

* (1) VR. interprets ādi-ūrksa as ‘the corporeal body’ and its eight branches are hands, feet, neck, chest and stomach and the ‘leaves’ are ten objects of senses.

(2) VJ. regards the universe as ‘the eternal’ tree which has Hari as its one (the sole) support, two fruits (viz. puṇya and pāpa—merit and sin); the three roots are vyāhritis, vedas or states); four results are heaven, hell, darkness (tamas) and emancipation; five special roots are vital airs (prānas). The rest of details are like ŚR. Hari destroys this tree. Hence Hari’s supremacy.
pure sattva, easily cross the ocean of saṁsāra (as is done by the great) by the raft in the form of your feet as if it (saṁsāra) were as insignificant as the shallow footprint of a calf.

31. Oh self-effulgent Lord! Having themselves crossed the extremely impassable, terrible ocean of saṁsāra, those devotees of unbounded friendliness to all creatures have (however) gone to the other side (of saṁsāra) leaving behind them the boat in the form of your lotus-like feet (i.e. the path of devotion); for you are gracious unto the righteous.

32. Oh lotus-eyed god! Those others who follow the path of knowledge and regard themselves as emancipated, get their minds and intellect corrupted due to their lack of devotion to you (or whose mind is clouded, though they are clever in disputations). These persons, attaining with great difficulty to a high state (e.g. birth in a noble family), fall down therefrom, as they feel no respect for your feet.

33. Never do your devotees who have cherished deep affection to you, deviate from the right path that way, Oh Lord of Lakṣmī! Protected on every side by you, they dauntlessly move about trading over the heads of the commanders of armies of obstacles and impediment, Oh Lord.

34. For the sake of preservation of the world you assume an absolutely pure—sāttvic—body which bestows the desired boons (puruṣārthas) to embodied beings, and wherewith people (belonging to different āśramas—stages in life) worship you by studying the Vedas, performance of religious rituals, Yogic practices, austere penance and deep meditation (worship of the Lord is impossible in the absence of a corporeal form).

35. Oh creator of the universe! Had you not assumed this absolutely pure sāttvic form of yours, the Supreme direct knowledge which thoroughly annihilates ignorance and the notion of difference resulting from it, could not be engendered at all. Your worship can only be inferred (and not realized directly) by the light shed by guṇas (or the cognitive senses) as a particular guna can become in a special way and with a particular person, a source of light or knowledge. (When you are worshipped through your pure sāttvic form and the mind becomes one with you, God realization takes place through your grace).
36. Your name and form along with your excellences, deeds and births cannot be comprehended fully and described (as they are divine and super-natural). You are the direct witness of everything, but your nature can only be inferred (and not directly perceived) by the mind and the Vedic words. But Oh self-effulgent Lord! Your votaries, however, do realize you directly while they are engaged in their acts (of worship and meditation).

37. He who during the performance of his activities has his mind concentrated on your lotus-like feet by hearing, singing, reminding others and contemplating on your auspicious names and forms, does not deserve to be born again (in saṁsāra).

38. Fortunately, Oh Hari! The heavy burden of this earth which represents your foot, has been removed by the birth (avatāra) of Your Lordship. It is our good luck that we shall now see the earth impressed with your auspiciously-marked beautiful foot-prints and the heavens showered with Your mercy.

39. Oh Lord! Verily we cannot conceive any other reason, except your own pleasure, of assuming a form (birth) that You, the unborn are born. Oh Lord You are eternally free and a shelter from fear. Birth, continuation in life and death in the case of individual Souls are brought through avidyā (ignorance about you).

40. Oh Lord! Now be pleased to protect us and the three worlds and relieve the earth of its heavy burden as you did (in the past) by incarnating Yourself in the form of a fish, a horse (Hayagrīva), a tortoise, a man-lion (Nṛsiṁha), a boar (Varāha), a swan, a Kṣattriya (Rāma), a Brāhmaṇa (Para-śūrāma) and a god (Vāmana). Our salutations to You, Oh the best and foremost of Yadus.

41. (Addressing Devaki):

"Oh mother (Devaki)! It is really a good luck that the Supreme Person, the veritable Almighty Lord himself has entered your womb with his aṁśa (divine powers which are his parts), for the sake of our welfare. Let there be no more fear from Kaṁsa, the king of Bhojas whose death is imminent. Your son will be the protector of Yadus".
Śrī Śuka said:

42. Having thus eulogized the Supreme Person whose nature is distinct from the visible universe, the gods headed by Brahmā and Śiva returned to heaven.

CHAPTER THREE

Description of the Birth of Śrīkṛṣṇa

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. Now came the most auspicious time full of all blessings when the constellation Rohinī presided over by god Brahmā, the son of Viṣṇu, was at the ascendant and all constellations of stars (like Aśvini and others), planets and stars assumed peaceful aspects.

2. All the directions became clear and propitious (despite the continuation of the rainy season in the month of Śrāvana) the sky became illumined with innumerable clusters of stars shining unobscured; the earth with its towns, villages, settlements of cowherds and mines revelled in auspicious festivities.

3. The waters of the rivers became crystal clear; the lakes were blooming with lotuses; the rows of forest trees laden with bunches of flowers were resounded with swarms of the sweetly humming bees and cooing of birds.

4. A pure, cool breeze wafting sweet fragrance blew delighting in its touch; the sacred fires maintained in the houses of the twice-borns (automatically) burst into flames.

5. With the exception of demons like Kamsa, the minds of all the creatures and those of gods became filled with delight. When the birthless (Lord Viṣṇu) was about to incarnate, kettle-drums were being sounded in the celestial region.

6. At that time Kinnaras and Gandharvas burst forth singing, Siddhas and Cāraṇas sang prayers; ladies of the Vidyādhara clan danced along with celestial damsels.
7. Overwhelmed with joy the gods and sages showered (heaps of) flowers; following the roaring of the seas, clouds gave forth a low rumbling sound.

8. At midnight when the darkness tormenting the people was thickening, Lord Viṣṇu, the Indweller of the hearts of all, manifested himself in his own complete divine form, like the full moon rising in the East, through Devaki who was like unto a goddess.

9-10. Vasudeva saw that wonderful child of lotus-like eyes, endowed with four arms, bearing a conch and wielding aloft a mace and a discus (and a lotus); having (on his chest) the Śrīvatsa mark (of curl of golden hair), with the Kaustubha gem (hanging from his neck but) beautified by his neck; clad in yellow silken garments, possessing the charming complexion of rain-bearing cloud; his profuse locks of hair bathed in the lustre of his crown and ear-rings studded with invaluable vaidūrya-gems (lapis lazuli); resplendent with his exquisite and valuable zone, armlets, bracelets and other ornaments.

11. With eyes blooming wide open with amazement, Vasudeva beheld Lord Hari (born as) his son. With his mind confused with rapture on that happy and auspicious occasion of Kṛṣṇa’s incarnation, he (Vasudeva) was overcome with (lit. bathed in) delight, and gave ten thousand cows as gift to Brāhmaṇas.

12. Now realizing the child who illuminated the lying-in-chamber with his splendour, was Lord Viṣṇu, the Supreme Person, Vasudeva of pure heart, who, due to his awareness of Viṣṇu’s prowess completely lost his fear, began to praise him with folded palms, and body bent low in humility, Oh scion of Bharata.

(Having first embraced the Lord as his son)

Vasudeva said :

13. How blessed I am that I have seen you directly —you the Supreme Person, transcendental to and distinct from Prakṛti, absolute wisdom and supreme bliss incarnate, and (as inner controller) the witness of all minds and intellects.

14. (As a matter of fact you never entered the womb of Devaki for) you are factually of such absolute nature as is described above. Having evolved this universe consisting of three gunās through your creative potency called Māyā, at the beginning of creation, you have not really entered into it (for the Lord is infinite and the universe is limited); you are, however, presumed to have entered it (as a Puruṣa and the omnipresent Inner Controller).

15. Just as these unmodified elementary principles (such as mahat, Ahamkāra) are in existence at the beginning of the creation, and are severally incapable of creation though endowed with different properties and powers, they give rise to the universe after combining with their evolutes.

16. Having come together (synthesizing) with their (sixteen) evolutes, they create the universe and appear to have entered into it; but due to their existence prior to the creation (as its cause), their (later) entry is an impossibility. (Similarly, the Lord existed before Devakī and his appearance to have entered her womb is not a reality).

17.* In this way, even though your revered self exists along with the objects which are cognisable through senses (the true nature of which is) inferrable through perception of sense-objects you are not perceived along with those objects, directly (as the senses can perceive only their specific objects and God is not such an object); (for you, being unconditioned and all-pervading, the distinction of being inside or outside is inapplicable to you. You are everything and the indwelling Soul of all, the self-abiding real essence. (Hence your entry in the womb of Devaki is not a reality).

* (1) VR. : Though you abide in all creatures like gods, men—the products of guṇas—you are not affected by their limitations. You are above modifications, essentially of unlimited knowledge and blissful nature. You are un-enveloped i.e. of unlimited knowledge. Being all-pervading and the cause of all the distinction of being ‘in’ and ‘out’ is not applicable to you. As you are the independent Inner Controller, antaryāmin, the limitations of the body do not affect you.

(2) SD. emphasizes that the direct vision of God is due to His grace and He is beyond the ken of senses.

(3) VT. : As you are always loving to your devotees, you have come to us as a son which is the highest reward (of our devotion).
18.* He who presumes real independent existence—as distinct from the Soul—in the case of objects perceived by him (or by the Soul) is an ignorant person. For when these objects (i.e. the world) are subjected to investigation, they are (found to be) of verbal nature and essentially unreal. He who acknowledges the unreality as a distinct reality is (certainly) a dullard.

19. Oh all-pervading Lord! They say that the creation, preservation and destruction of the universe proceeds from you who are above all guṇas, (and hence) desireless (and performing no acts), and subject to no modification. As you are both Brahman and the Supreme Ruler, there is no contradiction in transcendence to modifications and the creation etc. of the universe. For though the activity is carried out by guṇas, it is ascribed to you as guṇas (ultimately depend on you only).

20. You who are of such a nature (as described above) verily assume, through your Māyā potency, pure white complexion (Brahmā form) full of the principle of rajas for the creation of these worlds, and a dark complexion (Rudra form) through tamas for the destruction of the universe.

21. Oh all-pervading Lord, the supreme Ruler of all! (how gracious of you it is that though Your avatāra is an impossibility in the real sense of the term), You have incarnated yourself in my house (despite its being a prison-cell), with a desire to protect this world. You will annihilate the hordes led by millions of Asura chiefs passing under the name of Kṣatriyas.

22. Oh Lord of gods! Hearing (the prediction) of Your birth in our house, this villainous fellow (Karṇa) has (cold-bloodedly) killed your elder brothers. Learning your incarnation directly through the reports of his servants, he will just now rush here with uplifted weapons.''

* VJ. : In the absence of the support of Vedic texts, it is untenable to admit the conclusion of the ignorant that you are identical with the body or the senses simply because of Your presence in them. For the Supreme Man (Lord Viṣṇu) has accepted (or revealed) the super-human faultless Vedic texts which dispel all doubts.
Sri Suka said:

23. Now, seeing that this son of hers bore the characteristics of the supreme person (Lord Viṣṇu), Devākī who was (erstwhile) afraid of Kaṁsa, (now) smiled happily and began to pray him:

Devākī said:

24. (How can there be any danger to you) who are verily the Lord Viṣṇu himself, the Illuminator of the aggregate of intelligence, senses and other psycho-physical organisms: and who are that indescribable Reality whom the Vedas declare as the unmanifest primordial cause, the Supreme Brahman, pure consciousness transcending all guṇas and modifications, absolute existence attributeless, and devoid of activity.

25. When at the end of the period of two parārđhas (which terminates the life-time of Brahmā), by the velocity of time, the universe dissolves and all the gross elements (Mahābhūtas) are absorbed into their primordial subtle form (viz. ahamkāra which in its turn is absorbed into the principle called mahat) and the principle mahat is merged in the unmanifest (pradhāna which is absorbed in you), You alone remain behind (remaining cognisant that the Pradhāna lying merged in You is to be re-awakened) and hence you are designated as the Residue (Śeṣa) or the complete whole (aṭeṣa).

26. The wise say that this mighty time as described above which begins with a nimesa (twinkling of the eye) and extends (through cycle of years) to the end of dviparārdha (Brahmā’s life) and which controls the cyclic course of the universe, is your own sportful activity, Oh Director of the Prakṛti! I seek your protection—You who are the Supreme Ruler and the abode of security.

27. A mortal, being apprehensive of the serpent (in the form) of death, and running about all the world (for security against death), failed to find a place free from fear. Today having attained to your lotus-like feet through an unexpected stroke of good luck (and through your grace), he reposes in peace and security. It is (now) Death that runs away from him.
28. Of such nature as You are, protect us (your devotees) who are afraid of the terrible son of Ugrasena; for you are the rescuer of your devotees (servants) from fear. Let not this divine form of yours which is worthy of being the object of meditation, be manifest to the gross physical eyes of human beings.

29. Let not that wicked Kaṁsa know of your birth from me, Oh Madhusūdana (slayer of the demon Madhu). Being naturally timid, I am terribly afraid of Kaṁsa, for your sake.

30. Oh soul of the universe! May you withdraw this Superhuman form with four arms furnished with the superb splendour of conch, discus, mace and lotus.

31. That your Lordship, the Supreme Person who contains within yourself all this universe in extenso at the end of the cosmic night (during Pralaya), should get himself accommodated in my womb is certainly a wonderful imitation of the human (ways of the) world."

_The Lord said:_

32. "Oh chaste lady! In your previous birth in the age of Svāyambhuva Manu, you were Prśni and this sinless Vasudeva your husband, was then a Prajāpati named Sutapas.

33. When both of you were directed by god Brahmā to create progeny, you subdued all your senses and performed a very austere penance.

34. Enduring in due course, all the inclemencies of the seasons such as rains, storms, solar rays, snow-fall and heat, you completely washed off the impurities of the mind by breath-control.

35. Subsisting on withered leaves and merely on air and actuated with the desire to obtain your cherished objects from me, you were determined to propitiate Me with a serene mind.

36. Thus rolled by twelve thousand divine years, while both of you, with your heart fixed on Me, were performing a very difficult and austere penance.

37-38. Being continuously contemplated upon in the heart with faith, devotion and asceticism, I was highly pleased with you and manifested myself before you in this very form with a desire to fulfil your cherished objects, Oh sinless one,
When I, the foremost bestower of boons, told you to ask Me for a boon, the boon for having a son like Me was sought by you.

39. Though both of you had not tasted the conjugal and other pleasures of ordinary sensual objects and were childless, you did not seek for Emancipation (from the world) as you were deluded by My divine Māyā.

40. When I disappeared from your view and you, having secured the boon of getting a son like Me and thus accomplishing your cherished desire, you indulged in enjoying sensual pleasures.

41. Finding that nobody else in this world is comparable to Me in goodness of nature, generosity and other virtues in this world, I Myself was born as your son and became known as Pṛśni-garbha.

42. And again of you both (as Aditi and Kaśyapa) I was born of Aditi from Kaśyapa and was famous as Upendra and also as Vāmana due to shortness of stature.

43. Now even in this third incarnation, I am verily born with that very form again of you both (who are former Aditi and Kaśyapa). In this way, my word has been kept, Oh pious lady.

44. I have revealed this form of Mine to you in order to remind you of my previous births (from you); otherwise the knowledge about my real being is not possible through the semblance of human form. (Now as desired by you, I shall assume the form of a human baby).

45. Thinking of Me constantly as your son as well as contemplating upon Me as Supreme Brahman and loving me affectionately, both of you will attain to the highest state in relation to Me.

45-A. (Viṇḍāvana edition adds)

If you are still afraid of Kaṁsa, quickly take me to Gokula and bring (as substitute) My Māyā who has been born from (the womb of) Yaśodā.”

Śrī Śuka said:

46. Having spoken thus, Hari became silent. With his Māyā power, the Lord immediately became an ordinary human babe, while the parents were simply looking on (with wonder).

47. Thereupon, when Vasudeva, the son of Śūra desired to go out of the lying-in-chamber taking his son with him (and was about to start) as directed by the Lord, Yoga-Māyā, though (herself) birthless, was born of Nanda’s wife.

48-49. By Yoga-Māyā the gate-keepers were deprived of all their consciousness and functioning of their senses and even the citizens were steeped in deep sleep; all the gates (of the palace prison) which were closed by huge doors secured with iron chains and bolts automatically flung open at the approach of Vasudeva carrying Kṛṣṇa (on his head) like darkness dispersing at the appearance of the Sun. The rain cloud showered with a gentle rumbling and the serpent Śesha (closely) followed him, warding off the rain-water with his hoods spread over his head (like an umbrella).

50. While Indra, the god of rains, continuously poured showers of rain (and even though) the river Yamunā (the presiding deity of which was Yamunā, the younger sister of Yama—the god of death) covered with foam created by waves set up by the velocity of the swiftly-moving deep flood and was full of hundreds of fearful whirlpools, afforded passage (to Vasudeva and Kṛṣṇa) as the Sea did to the Lord of Lakṣmī (Lord Śrī Rāma) formerly.

51. Arriving at Nanda’s Vraja, Vasudeva found that all the cowherds were deeply buried in sleep. Placing his son on the bed of Yaśodā, taking up her daughter (in exchange), Vasudeva returned home (his palace-prison).

52. Placing the daughter on the bed of Devakī, Vasudeva put the iron fetters on his feet and remained confined as before.

53. And Yaśodā, Nanda’s wife was vaguely conscious of having delivered a child, but she was so exhausted and had her memory (so much) clouded under delusion, that she did not discern the sex of the baby.
CHAPTER FOUR

Yoga-Māyā’s Prophecy and Kāṁsa’s Order to Slaughter all Children

Śrī Śuka said:

1. (After the return of Vasudeva) all the gates of the outer and inner apartments became closed as before. Hearing the cry of the baby, the palace guards became wide-awake.

2. They, on their part, (promptly and) hastily approached Kāṁsa, the King of Bhojas, and reported (to him) Devaki’s delivery of that (eighth) child which he was expecting anxiously.

3. Springing up hurriedly from the bed and bewildered at the thought that that (child) was his (veritable god of) death, he, with tottering steps and dishevelled hair, rushed hastily to (Devaki’s) lying-in-room.

4. To her brother (Kāṁsa), the pious, divine, (yet) miserable lady piteously addressed. “This is your daughter-in-law, Oh blessed brother. She may be the eighth child (but) it is not proper that you should kill a female (child).

5. Dear Brother! Impelled as you were by Destiny, a number of my children brilliant like fire, were killed by you. Be pleased to give (spare) this one daughter to me.

6. Oh mighty king! Am I not your miserable younger sister who am bereaved of all my sons? Unfortunate as I am, it behoves you, Oh dear brother, to spare this last child for me”.

Śrī Śuka said:

7. (Although) he was thus implored by Devaki while hugging the child to her bosom and weeping piteously like a most helpless woman, the wicked fellow sternly rebuked her and snatched away the baby from her.

8. His affection (for the sister and niece) being uprooted (superseded) by his (vile) self-interest, he seized the new-born daughter of his sister by her feet and dashed her against the surface of a slab.
9. Flying off from (the grip of) of hands, she rose up to the sky and (stationing herself in the sky), the younger sister of Kṛṣṇa manifested herself as a goddess with eight mighty arms wielding weapons.

10. She was adorned with heavenly garlands, garments, pigments, jewelled ornaments and wielded (in her arms) a bow, a spear, an arrow, a shield, a sword, a conch, a discus and a mace.

11. She was being praised by Siddhas, Cāraṇas, Gandharvas, Apsaras (divine damsels), Kinnaras and serpents who offered her rich, sumptuous presents. She spoke:

12. “You dunce! What have you gained by killing me? Your destroyer, your adversary in the former birth, is born somewhere (in an unknown place). Do not unnecessarily kill helpless, innocent children.”

13. Having warned him thus, the goddess (disappeared). The venerable goddess Māyā is known under many names and is worshipped in many shrines, bearing different names.

14. Kaṁsa was extremely flabbergasted to hear her pronouncement. He set Vasudeva and Devakī at liberty and apologised in humility:

15. “Alas! My sister! Oh my brother-in-law! Like a cannibal preying on his own child, many a son of yours has been killed by me, a wicked sinner.

16. For being so, (a sinner) bereft of mercy, for disowning my friends and relatives, for being virtually dead though breathing (merely alive), I do not know to what infernal region I shall be taken as in the case of a slayer of Brāhmaṇas.

17. Not only mortals but even the celestials also speak untruth. Putting faith in them, I, a wicked sinner, killed my sister’s children.

18. Oh high-souled ones! Do not lament for your sons who reaped the fruit of their previous deeds. Creatures are at the mercy of the Providence. They do not live or are not together (at the same place) for ever.

19. Just as in this world earthen articles are created out of and (after destruction) become one with the earth, but the earth itself persists (unmodified), similarly in the process of creation and destruction of physical bodies the Soul undergoes no modifications.

20. Misapprehension about the nature of the Soul arises in him who does not understand the Reality as it is. That leads to the notion of difference (contrary to the real nature of the Soul). Thus there is no end to samsāra and to the union and separation from the body (i.e. the cycle of births and deaths).

21. Inasmuch as every creature has inevitably and helplessly to reap the fruit of his actions, Oh blessed sister, do not grieve over (the death of) your sons, even though they were killed by me.

22. So long as a person does not cognize the real nature of his Self and identifies his body with the Soul, and (wrongly) regards himself as being killed or being the killer, that ignorant fellow is subject to the role of being the subject or object of suffering.

23. Saintly persons are compassionate to the afflicted and the poor. Please do forgive me for my wickedness.” With these words and with his face overflowing with tears, he clasped the feet of his sister and her husband.

24. Being reassured by the words of the daughter of Devaki, Karīsa, as a testimony of his personal affection to them, released Vasudeva and Devaki from chains (prison).

25. Due to the (sincere) regrets and repentance of her brother, the wrath of Devaki was pacified, and she gave him leave (to go). Vasudeva smiled and spoke to him:

26. “Oh highly fortunate Karīsa! It is exactly as you say. The notion of creatures that they are identical with the body is born of ignorance, and that is the cause of the difference in regarding this as one’s own and that as another’s.

27. Persons possessing differentiating outlook and sense of distinction and suffering from grief, joy, fear, malice, covetousness, delusion and pride do not perceive the self-existent Reality (God) who brings about the destruction of beings through their mutual action (against each other), caused by their passions.”
Śrī Śuka said:

28. Thus sincerely addressed by kindly disposed Devakī and Vasudeva, Kaṁsa took leave of them and returned to his palace.

29. When the night was over, Kaṁsa summoned his ministers and reported to them everything that had been said by Yoganidrā (the trance—sleep of Lord Viṣṇu).

30. Hearing the narration of their master, the demons (sons of Diti), the (sworn) enemies of gods, who cherished deep anger against the celestials, but were not foresighted spoke to him.

31. “If this be the case, Oh Lord of Bhojas, we shall verily massacre today all children of ten days or less (dwelling) in cities, towns, cowherds’ camps and (such) other places.

32. What can the gods do with all their endeavours. They are cowards on the battlefield. They live in perpetual terror of the twanging of your bow-string.

33. Being beaten on all sides with volleys of arrows discharged by you, they, being anxious to save their lives, deserted the battlefield and took to their heels.

34. Some gods in their wretched plight laid down their arms and stood with folded palms, while others with their loin-cloth untucked and hair on the head untied and dishevelled announced, “We are afraid.”

35. You do not strike at those (enemies) who have forgotten their arms and missiles or have lost their chariots or are terror-stricken or are attending to something else or have turned away (from the battlefield) or have their bows broken or have given up fighting.

36. What can gods, the warriors in peace times and boastful outside the battlefield, do (to harm us)? Of what account is Hari who lies in concealment or Śiva who dwells in a forest? Why care for Indra of poor strength or Brahmā (always) absorbed in penance?

37. We, however, think that gods due to their (inborn) enmity, should not be ignored. Therefore, deploy us, your obedient servants to dig out and destroy even their roots.

38. Just as a disease in the body, if neglected, strikes deep roots and becomes impossible to be cured or the senses if uncontrolled and ignored (become unmanageable), so the enemy, if ignored, grows in strength and cannot be dislodged.

39. Viṣṇu is the root (the main stay) of all gods. Where there is Viṣṇu, there abides the eternal righteousness (dharma). The roots of the dharma are the Vedas, cows, Brāhmaṇas, asceticism and sacrifices with donation of liberal gifts.

40. Therefore, Oh King, we shall kill by all (possible) means Brāhmaṇas, the reciters of the Vedas, the ascetics performing penance and those continually engaged in sacrificial acts, and cows yielding all the materials for sacrificial oblations.

41. Brāhmaṇas, cows, the Vedas, penance, truthfulness, control of senses, serenity of mind, faith, mercy, endurance and the sacrifices constitute the body of Hari.

42. For he is the Supreme Ruler of all gods, the enemy of Asuras, the indweller in the hearts of all. All divinities including Lord Śiva and the four-faced god Brahmā depend on him as their support (root). Hence extirpation (through persecution) of sages is really the only means of killing him.”

Śrī Śuka said:

43. Having thus conferred with his wicked ministers, the evil-minded Kaṁsa who was enmeshed in the snare of Death, considered massacre of Brāhmaṇas as conducive to his good.

44. Having commissioned Dānavas who were naturally disposed to persecute others and who could assume any form at will, for harassing the good people in all directions, Kaṁsa entered his palace.

45. Constituted as they were by predominantly rājasic nature, and with their minds deluded by tamas, they started their campaign of hatred of the good as their death was imminent.

46. Serious violations of the great destroy one’s span of life, prosperity, glory, righteousness, (attainment of) heavenly regions, and all other blessings.
CHAPTER FIVE

Celebration of Kṛṣṇa’s Birth: Meeting of Nanda and Vasudeva

Śrī Śuka said:

1-2. Delighted at the birth of a son, the noble-minded Nanda too took a bath, got purified and adorned himself. He sent for Brāhmaṇas well versed in astrology and made them recite the Svastīyayaṇa (prescribed benedictory Vedic hymns) and got the jāta-karma ceremony of his child, as well as the worship of his forebears (pītṛs) and gods duly performed according to precepts.

3. As a gift (on this joyous occasion), he presented to Brāhmaṇaṇas two-hundred thousands of richly adorned cows, and seven mountain-like heaps of sesamum seeds covered with streams (large quantities) of precious stones and gold-cloth.

4.* Some material things become purified by passage of time (e.g. the earth), some by ablution (e.g. our body), or washing (e.g. things covered with dirt), some by special rites (e.g. the foetus), some by penance (e.g. senses), some by sacrificial performance (e.g. Brāhmaṇaṇas), some by charitable gifts (wealth), some by contentment (mind), while the soul is purified by (meditation and) knowledge of the Self.

5. Brāhmaṇaṇas, Sūtas, Māgadhas and Vandins uttered auspicious blessings; musicians sang; drums and kettle-drums were frequently sounded.

6. All the entrances, enclosures, and interiors of the houses of Vṛjaṇa were well-swept and properly besprinkled (with

1. VC. quotes the Bhaviyottara Purāṇa and states the best ‘Sesamum mountain’ consists of ten droupas, medium of five, and the lowest of three droupas.

* Examples in the bracket are supplied by SR.

2. Normally sūtas are the reciters of Purāṇa; Māgadhas are bards reciting the glories of royal dynasties; Vandins are clearheaded persons making observations suitable for the occasion.

sūtāḥ paurāṇikāḥ proktāḥ, Māgadhā vamśa-saṁsakāḥ |
Vandinas tvamala-prajñāḥ prastōna-sadṛṣṭotayah//

But VJ. states: Sūtas sing the eulogies composed by themselves, Māgadhas sing compositions of others, while Vandins read panyegers from books.
water). It (the Vraja) was decorated with flags and buntings of different colours, banners, wreaths, arches of (silken) raiments, and tender leaves.

7. The oxen, cows and heifers (grown up calves) were smeared with oil mixed with turmeric power. They were painted with various colours, and adorned with peacock feathers, wreaths, cloths and gold chains (round the neck).

8. Adorned with valuable garments, costly ornaments, coats and turbans, the cowherds came to visit (Nanda) with various kinds of presents in their hands.

9. On hearing the news of the birth of a son to Yaśodā, the cowherd women were delighted, and they beautified themselves with costly garments, ornaments and (the make-up of) collyrium etc.

10. The beauty of their lotus-like faces was enhanced with the decoration of saffron-paste like unto filaments heightening the beauty of a lotus. In spite of their heavy buttocks, they hastily went with presents (to Yaśodā) heaving their heavy breasts (while going).

11. Wearing ear-rings set with well-polished jewels, necklaces of gold-coins about their necks, and clad in wonderfully wrought garments of various colours the gopa damsels proceeded to the palace of Nanda showering on the way flowers dropped from the braids of their hair. They appeared (lit. shone) most beautiful with bangles round their wrists, their swaying ear-rings and dangling necklaces on heaving breasts.

12. Invoking blessings (of God) on the child, “May you protect the child for a long time”1 they sprayed the (assembled) people with water mixed with oil and turmeric power and sang lustily. (Or : they sang in a high pitch the praise of the Unborn—Krṣṇa).

13. On the great festive occasion of the coming of Lord Krṣṇa, the Infinite, the Supreme Lord of the universe, a variety of musical instruments were played on.

1. Or : May you protect us forever—VR and others.

This interpretation is obviously illogical and out of context with the sentence, “Invoking blessings on the child”.
14. The merry cowherds joyously sprayed and besmeared one another with curds, milk, ghee and water and they threw (balls of) butter at each other.\(^1\)

15-16* For the propitiation of Lord Viṣṇu and for the well-being of his son, the noble-minded Nanda presented to the cowherds garments, ornaments and wealth in the form of cows (or kine, gold and silver). The generous-hearted Nanda respectfully worshipped Sūtas, Māgadhas, Vandins and others who lived by their arts, skills or crafts (e.g. astrologers, dancers etc.), and conferred upon them their (respective) desired objects.

17. Welcomed by Nanda, the chief of cowherds, Rohiṇī, who was highly fortunate (as she was to be witness to the sportive activities of Lord Kṛṣṇa from his childhood) was adorned with very costly (heavenly-type). Lower garment and other clothes, garland and necklace and was moving about in Nanda’s palace (particularly in that reception).

18. Thence forward the Vraja of Nanda became blessed with prosperity in every respect as it was turned into a pleasure garden for the sporting of goddess Lakṣmī due to its becoming the abode of Hari, Oh King.

19. Having instructed the cowherds to take care of and protect the Gokula, Nanda went to Mathurā to pay his annual tribute to Kāṁsa, Oh Parīkṣit (the best of Kuruś).

20. Having learnt (from the public) that his brotherly Nanda had come and having (reliably) known that Nanda’s (official) work of payment of tributes was over, Vasudeva repaired to his lodging place (the parking ground of wagons).

21. Seeing him (Vasudeva) come, he promptly sprang to his feet as a body (in an unconscious stage) does on the return of life (or consciousness). Being overjoyed and over-

---

1. Or : Thickly besmeared one another with butter, they tried to throw each other on (the slippery) ground.—VT.

* ŚR : The noble-minded Nanda presented to cowherds as also to Sūtas, Māgadhas, Vandins and others who lived by their skill in arts, crafts, etc., garments, ornaments, kine and wealth.

For the propitiation of Lord Viṣṇu and the well-being of the child, the generous-minded Nanda honoured others (visitors, guests etc.) by bestowing on them their desired objects.
whelmed with affection, he flung his arms round his dearest friend to embrace him.

22. Oh Protector of the People! When Vasudeva was respectfully received, comfortably seated and was honoured with the enquiry about his health, he, with his mind deeply attached to both of his sons, courteously addressed Nanda as follows:

23. “Brother! It is indeed fortunate that a darling child has been born to you who were childless till this advanced age and had lost hopes of getting an issue.

24. It is due to sheer good luck that you have met me today like one born again in this whirling cycle of Saṃsāra. For the sight of dear ones is very rare.

25. Oh dear friend! The staying together of intimate friends (howsoever dear but) following varied professions, is not possible like unto the coming together of floating logs of wood (etc.) in a stream of water but which are swept away by the current.

26. Is the Gokula (Vṛndāvana) where you are now dwelling accompanied (lit. surrounded) by your friends and relatives favourable to the cattle? Does it abound in plenty of water, grass and plants? Is it free from disease and epidemics?

27. Oh brother! Does my son (Balarāma) who regards you to be his father and is dearly fondled by you and your wife, doing well along with his mother, in your Vraja?

28. For, the threelfold objective of human life (viz. dharma, artha and kāma) is prescribed (as beneficial) insofar as they are shared with one’s kith and kin. But if they suffer distress, that threelfold purpose of life does not contribute to happiness.”

Nanda said:

29. “Alas! Many of your sons born of Devaki have been killed by Kaṁsa. And only the youngest daughter survived—even she flew to heaven.

30.* It is definite that people in this world have their end in the unseen (according to their destiny. When good

* VR: All people definitely find their end in the unseen (as destined along with happiness and misery). The destiny is the ultimate supreme controller. He who realises that pleasure and pain are always due to his destiny, is always equable and serene in prosperity and adversity.
fortune, blessing one with the pleasure of having sons etc., ceases to smile, one is bereaved of them). The destiny is supreme. (If one is separated from one’s sons, the destiny reunites them). He who knows that the destiny is the reality about Ātman (and as such is the ever constant cause of pleasure and pain) does not get bewildered.”

Vasudeva said:

31. “The annual tribute has been paid by you to the king, and we have seen (each other). You should not stay here any longer, for omens indicating calamities are seen at Gokula.”

Śri Śuka said:

32. Thus advised by Vasudeva, Nanda and other cow-herds, taking leave of him, mounted on carts drawn by bullocks and returned to Gokula.

CHAPTER SIX

Pūtanā emancipated

Śri Śuka said:

1. On his way (back to Gokula), Nanda pondered that the words of Vasudeva might not be untrue. Being apprehensive of impending calamities, (mentally) he sought refuge in Lord Hari.

2. Deputed by Kaṁsa, the terrible, infant-killer Pūtan moved about, killing babes and infants in cities, towns, cow-herd-settlements (on her way).

3. Wherever, people, while attending to their duties, do not listen to (recite etc.) the names and deeds of the Lord of Sātvatas (Krṣṇa) which are capable of annihilating demons, there and there only, ogresses (and other evil spirits) prevail.

4. One day, that Pūtanā who was capable of coursing through the sky, flew (through the sky) to the Gokula ruled by Nanda. Assuming the form of a young beautiful woman through her witchcraft, she entered the Gokula as the wantonness was capable of assuming any guise, and moving into any house she pleased.

5-6. On seeing that beautiful damsel the braids of whose hair were adorned with jasmine flowers (interwoven therein), whose slender waist was (as if) crushed between her big buttocks and heavy breasts, who was clad in rich garments, whose face was beautified with the locks of hair lustrous with the radiance of the brilliant swaying ear-rings, who with her charming smiles and sidelong glances captivated the hearts of the inhabitants of Vraja (who hence failed to extern her), and whom, due to her wearing a blooming lotus in hand, the Gopa women thought to be goddess Lakṣmī incarnate, who had come to see her Lord (and they kept silent in awe and respect, instead of barring her entrance).

7. Pūtanā, that infant-killer evil spirit, roving in search for babies, came by chance to the house of Nanda, and saw the child Kṛṣṇa who was the exterminator of the wicked, but was lying in bed with his immeasurable innate glory veiled, like fire covered under ashes.

8. Recognizing her to be the evil spirit which kills infants, the Lord of the mobile and immobile creation lay quiet with his eyes closed. And she placed the Infinite Lord, her very death, on her lap, as a stupid person would do to a sleeping serpent, mistaking it for a rope.

8A. Even though he was the Supreme Ruler of the universe the Lord, playing the part of a child, spoke nothing. But the fiendess was unaware that he was the lord Hari who by his very nature knows directly all the activities of the world.

9. Finding suddenly within their house that superb accomplished lady behaving (externally) most affectionately and in a charming way, even though her heart was sharp (cruel like sword encased in a charming scabbard, both the mothers (Yaśodā and Rohini) were stupefied with her effulgence and stood agazing (instead of preventing her).

10. The terrible demoness placed the child Kṛṣṇa on her lap and suckled him at her breast full of indigestible virulent poison. Thereupon, with indignation, the Lord squeezed hard her breast with his hands and sucked it along with her life.

1. VJ.’s text interperses one verse here.

11. Being crushed in all her vital parts, she cried out "Let me go, enough of it, leave me". With her body drenched in perspiration and with her hands and feet thrown in convulsions and with distended eyes, she wailed loudly.

12. By her extremely loud and deep cry, the earth along with the mountains, and the heavens along with the planets, were shaken. The netherworld and all the cardinal points were reverberated with the Sound. People being afraid of the discharge of Vajra, fell down on the ground.

13. Oh King, the demoness who, being excruciatingly afflicted at the breast, thus fell dead, reverting to her original form with her mouth agape and her hair, hands and feet stretched near the cowpen even as Vṛtra fell when struck down with Vajra (thunderbolt).

14. Even while it fell, her (giant) body crushed to powder trees within an area of twelve miles. It was the most astonishing sight, Oh king of kings.

15-17. The cowherds—men and women—whose hearts, ears and heads were already rent asunder with the terrible roars and yells of the demoness, were struck with terror to see her fearful body with a mouth raged with a terrible set of tusks long like the poles of ploughs, with nostrils resembling mountain caverns; breasts huge like (a pair of hillocks, her reddish hair terribly dishevelled, her eyes deep like dark wells, her buttock terrifically big like sand dunes, her arms, legs and thighs resembling dams (around) her belly looking like a dried up, waterless pool.

18. Seeing the child playing fearlessly on her bosom, the cowherd-women, in their bewilderment, quickly came to him and picked him up.

19. They, also with Yaṣodā and Rohini ensured the (future) safety of the child on all sides, against evil spirits (and such other mishaps) by performing the ceremony of waving of the cow's tail round the child and other rites.

20. They bathed the child with the urine of a cow and besmeared it with dust raised by her hoofs. And by applying cowdungs to twelve (different) parts of his body\(^1\) pronouncing simultaneously twelve (different) names of the Lord, they ensured his safety (by this spiritual talisman).

21. (The Gopa women, being bewildered, forgot that they have to get themselves so consecrated before applying the talisman to the child. When they recovered....)

They performed the ācamana (sipping of water uttering the names of God for self-purification), made the bija-nyāsa (assignment of the various parts of the body to deities accompanied with the uttering of some ‘seed-letters’ and corresponding gesticulations) first on both of their hands and parts of their body, and then followed the same procedure of the ‘placement of seed-letters’ on the body of the child (as follows):

(The Gopa women said)

22. “May Aja (the birthless Lord) protect your feet! May Maṇiman\(^2\) (the Indweller of the jīva.) guard your knees;

1. VB. enumerates the parts of the body to be so daubed with cowdung, as follows:

Lalāṭam bāhumūle ca hrdayam nābhi-pārīvakam |
kaṇṭhaḥ skandhau kaṭir mūrdhā stanau ceti vidur buddhāḥ

Forehead, arms, chest, navel, throat, shoulders, waist, head and the nipples on the chest. And names of god Viṣṇu to be uttered are the first twelve names out of the twenty-four names uttered at the beginning of Sandhyā vandana.

VT. quotes from the Padma Purāṇa the procedure which is as follows:

The particular aspect of the Lord is visualized as consecrating and abiding in that particular part of the body.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Part of the body to be daubed</th>
<th>Name of the Lord to be uttered at this time</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Forehead</td>
<td>Keśava</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abdomen (but KD. : Navel)</td>
<td>Nārāyāṇa</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chest</td>
<td>Mādhava</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Throat</td>
<td>Govinda</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Right side (but KD. : right arm-pit)</td>
<td>Viṣṇu</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Right arm</td>
<td>Madhusūdana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neck (but KD. : right ear-bottom)</td>
<td>Trivikrama</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Left side (but KD. : Left arm-pit)</td>
<td>Vāmana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Left arm</td>
<td>Śrīdharā</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neck (but KD. : Left ear bottom)</td>
<td>Hṛṣīkeśa</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Back</td>
<td>Padmanābha</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Waist (but KD. : near the neck)</td>
<td>Dāmodara</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

2. v.l. maṇiman—the wearer of the Kaustubha gem—KD.
Yajña, your thighs; Acyuta, your loins; Hayagrīva (horse-necked Lord), your abdomen; Keśava, your heart; Iśa (the Supreme Ruler), your bosom; Inā (The Lord), your throat; Viṣṇu, your arms; Urukrāma, your mouth; and Iśvara (the Supreme Lord), your head.

23. May the wielder of (Sudarśana) discus protect you at the front, and the Bearer of the (Kaumodakī) mace, at the back; May the slayer of Madhu and Ajana (the birthless Lord) each bearing a bow and a sword, protect you on both the sides; May Urugāya (the Lord sung by many) bearing the conch (Pāñcajanya), at the four corners (points intervening between quarters); Upendra (Vāmana), overhead; Tārāśya, on the ground and the Supreme Man wielding a plough, on all sides.

24. May Hṛṣikeśa protect your senses; Nārāyaṇa, your vital breaths; the Lord of Śvetadvīpa, your heart (the seat of intellect); the Lord of Yoga, your mind.

25. May the son of Prāṇi protect Your understanding; the Supreme Lord, Your ahamkāra (ego); may Govinda protect You while You are playing; Mādhava, while sleeping.

26. May Vaikuṇṭha guard You while walking; the Lord of Śrī, while sitting. The enjoyer of sacrifices, the terror to all evil spirits, while (You are) eating.

27-29. (All evil spirits like) Dākinī, Yātudhāni, Kuśmāṇḍas, the wicked spirits troubling young infants, Bhūtas, Pretas, Piśācas, Yakṣas, Rākṣasas and Vināyakas, Koṭarā, Revatī, Jyesṭhā, Pūtanā, Mātykās and others; Unmādas (spirits causing insanity,) and Apsmāras which trouble the body, senses and vital breaths; the evil spirits that frighten in dreams, the great calamitous portents, and those wicked spirits that seize the old and the young all these which are terrified at the mention of Viṣṇu’s name—may all these wicked spirits be destroyed.”

Śri Śuka said:

30. When the safety of the child was secured in this way (by performing the above-mentioned rites) by the Gopa women, bound to him with ties of affection, the mother suckled him and put him to bed.
31. In the meanwhile, Nanda and other Gopas (cow-herds) reached Vraja from Mathurā. They became extremely astonished to see the (enormous) body of Pūtanā.

32. (They said to each other) "How wonderful! Certainly a veritable seer or a master of Yoga (in his previous incarnation) must have been born (in the form of Vasudeva). For that very calamity has been seen by us as was predicted by Vasudeva.

33. (Then) the inhabitants of Vraja hacked down that (Pūtanā's) body with axes and threw the pieces at a distance and burnt it limb by limb on pyres of logs of wood.

34. There arose (a column of) smoke fragrant like that of aguru sandle wood, out of that burning body, the sins of which were instantaneously annihilated, the moment Kṛṣṇa sucked (the life out of) it.

35. (How wonderful!) Pūtanā, the blood-sucking demoness, the infant-killer in this world attained to Mokṣa by giving suck to him, despite her intention of killing him.

36. How much more would they who dedicate with faith and devotion their most beloved objects to Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Lord, attain to Mokṣa as did his deeply attached mothers.¹

37-38. When the Lord traversed Pūtanā's body with his feet which are enshrined in the hearts of his devotees, and are adorable to those (gods like Śiva and Brahmā) who are themselves worshipped by people, and sucked her breast, she, in spite of her being a demoness, attained to heaven, the destination (after death) of his mothers. What more need be said of those cows and mothers (Gopa women) the milk from whose breasts and udders was sucked (so fondly) by Kṛṣṇa? They must definitely attain to his abode.

¹. ŚR. explains the plural form 'mothers' when Kṛṣṇa had actually two mothers—Yaśodā and Rohini—by referring to Ch. 13 infra in which Kṛṣṇa is said to have assumed the forms of cowherd boys and calves when god Brahmā stole them away for one year and Kṛṣṇa in these forms was sucked by the Gopa women (the mothers of his abducted companions) and by cows (of those stolen calves). Thus those innumerable Gopa-women and cows became ipso facto his mothers.
39. For the glorious Lord, the son of Devaki, the dispenser of Final Emancipation and all other blessings, drank to his heart’s content the milk flowing (out of their breasts) through maternal affection.

40. They who have incessantly looked upon (and thus meditated upon) him as their own son, shall never revert to Samsāra, the cause of which is ignorance.

41. Having smelt the fragrance of the smoke issuing from the funeral pyre (of Pūtanā), the inhabitants of Vraja (who were then away from home) returned to Vraja enquiring, “What it is this (fragrance) due to? Whence is it coming?”

42. Hearing from the cowherds the account of the arrival of Pūtanā etc., her death and the safety of the child, they were extremely wonderstruck.

43. Taking up the child (in his arms) as if he had returned from the jaws of death, the noble-minded Nanda smelt him on the crown of his head, and was overwhelmed with joy, Oh best of Kurus.

44. A man who will listen with faith this wonderful account of the liberation of Pūtanā, a sportive achievement of Lord Kṛṣṇa in his childhood, will develop love and devotion to Govinda.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Destruction of the Cart and Tīrṇāvarta

Śrī Śuka said :

*0.A In this way, achieving a number of feats (like the liberation of Pūtanā, by way of sportive activities as a child) which brought joy and happiness to Gopas and their wives, Viṣṇu, the exterminator of the wicked, grew up in the house of Nanda.

*0.B Thus (as narrated in the previous chapters) grew up in Nanda’s house Kṛṣṇa (Viṣṇu), the destroyer of the wicked people, giving delight day and night to the cowherds and their wives.

 The Vṛndāvana edition includes the above verses from the texts of VR. and VJ.

_The King (Parikṣit) urged:_

1. whatever (sportive) acts the glorious Lord Hari, the Supreme Ruler, does in whatever incarnation (like the Fish, the Tortoise etc. the accounts of which are narrated by you) they are pleasing to the ear and fascinating to our minds, Oh Master.

2. May it please you to favour us by narrating that very fascinating account (of Lord Hari’s deeds), by listening to which (the feeling of) despondency and the various cravings (which generate it) fade away (leaving no trace behind), the mind gets purified in a short time, and devotion unto Lord Hari and friendly feelings towards his votaries are engendered.

3. Do you describe to us any other marvellous deed of Kṛṣṇa as a child who, after his descent in the human (form and) world, enacted (imitated) the ways of human beings.

3A. (VJ.’s text and Vṛndāvana edition)

Oh Master! You are gracious unto us. So out of mercy towards me, be pleased to describe in details (Kṛṣṇa’s sportive acts in childhood) which (completely) annihilate all sins, Oh past-master in Dharma!

Śrī Śuka said:

4. One day (at the end of the third month), when the constellation (Rohiṇi) that presided at the birth of Kṛṣṇa was in ascendance, and coincided with the ceremonial festive ablation to celebrate the infant’s (Kṛṣṇa’s) turning in the bed was to take place, the chaste lady Yaśodā performed the rite of auspicious bathing of the child in the assemblage of Gopa women (who visited her house for this occasion), while musical instruments were played, songs were sung and benedictory _Mantras_ were being chanted (by Brāhmaṇas).

5. When the infant’s bath and toilet were over, and Brāhmaṇas who were duly honoured with liberal gifts of (sumptuous) food, garments, garlands and cows of their choice, pronounced the auspicious benediction (with Vedic _Mantras_), Yośodā (the generous wife of liberal Nanda) seeing her child’s eyes closing in sleep, gently put him to bed (in a cradle under a cart).

6. With her mind full of enthusiasm on the festive occasion of Kṛṣṇa's turning in bed, the noble-minded lady, who was busy in receiving with honour the inhabitants of Vraja who came to (congratulate her) on that occasion, did not hear the crying of her child who, wishing to suck his mother, kicked up his tiny feet.

7. Being hit by the small feet, delicate like tender shoots of the baby that was lying beneath, the cart was overturned with its upside down, and all the pots of bell-metal containing various liquid delicacies (and other sweets) were crushed and the wheels, the axle tree were overturned and its yoke shattered.

8. Noticing it (the overturned position of the cart) Yaśodā and other women of Vraja who assembled there for the festive occasion (of Kṛṣṇa's turning in the bed) and Nanda and other cowherds as well, were perplexed at that marvellous sight and wondered, "How this cart could automatically be overturned?"

8A. (VR. and VJ.'s text and VN Edn.)

Speaking thus and arguing about its cause in a perplexed manner, the people of Vraja surrounded the cart in a distressed mood, as it were.

9. Childern (playing nearby) told the Gopas and their wives whose minds were confused and uncertain (about the cause of overturning of the cart)—

"There is absolutely no doubt that it was overturned with the foot (kick) by this (Kṛṣṇa) while crying".

10. But the Gopas disbelieved it as mere prattle of children, as they did not know the immeasurable might of that baby.

11. Taking up her son, Yaśodā who suspected the trouble of evil spirits, made Brāhmaṇas to recite the benedictory Vedic hymns (to drive out the spirits), and to bless the child, and gave him suck.

12. Brāhmaṇas offered oblations to fire (to propitiate the presiding deities of planets).¹ When powerful Gopas assembled (the parts of) the cart as before along with the metal pots of dairy products etc., they worshipped it with curds, unbroken rice-grains, Kuša grass and water¹ (as that was the symbol of their calling and the abode of Lakṣmī).

¹ Or: the offerings of bali (cooked rice) were distributed to eight directions—ŚR.

13. “The benedictions uttered by those who are truthful by nature and completely free from jealousy, falsehood, hypocrisy, intolerance, violence and pride, never become fruitless.”

14-15. With this conviction, the cowherd Nanda took up the child and got it sprinkled with water sanctified with sacred mantras from the Sāma, Rg and Yajur-Vedas, by the best of Brāhmaṇas. Making the Brāhmaṇas pronounce the prescribed benedictory hymns (Śvastyayana) and offering oblations to fire, Nanda with a serene mind, gave them a heavy feast (of rich, delicious articles of food).

16. For the all-round prosperity of the child, Nanda donated to them cows possessing all good (and auspicious) qualities, adorned them with cloth, garlands and necklaces of gold coins. And Brāhmaṇas, on their part, pronounced blessings to the child.

17. It is obvious that whatever benedictions are pronounced by Brāhmaṇas who are well-versed in Vedas and devoted to God shall never turn out to be fruitless.

18. On one day, the pious lady seated the child in her lap and was fondling him. But (suddenly) she was not able to bear the weight of the Baby, as if it was heavy like a mountain peak.

19. The cowherdess being oppressed with the burden (of the child), was astonished and placed him on the ground. She contemplated on the Supreme Lord not knowing that the whole universe is contained in his body and set about her work.

20. A demon called Trāvarta in the service of Kaṁsa was specially detailed and deputed (to kill Kṛṣṇa). Assuming the form of a whirl-wind, he carried away the child that was sitting.

21. He enveloped the whole of Gokula with a cloud of dust and blinded the eyes (of the inhabitants). He made the quarters and intermediate points tremble with his extremely terrible roar.

¹ Or: with unbroken rice mixed with curds and sprinkling water with Kuša grass (VT.)
22. For an hour or so the whole of Gokula was covered with (a cloud of) dust and darkness. Yaśodā could not see her son at the place where she kept him.

23. Being assailed by sand particles wafted by Trāvārta, nobody could see himself or another person in that blinding confusion.

24. Thus not being able to find the trace of her son in the heavy downpour of dust caused by the whirlwind of vehement velocity, the helpless mother (Yaśodā), brooding over him, tenderly began to bewail in the most pitiable manner, and dropped down to the ground like unto a cow bereaved of her calf.

25. When the vehemence of the stormy wind and of the dust-shower abated, the Gopīs (cowherd-women) heard the lamentations of Yaśodā. Not finding Nanda's son there, they were extremely tormented at heart, and broke out crying with their faces flooded with tears.

26. Having assumed the form of a whirlwind, Trāvārta carried away Kṛṣṇa to the skies. But in consequence of his having been compelled to bear the (unbearably) stupendous weight of Kṛṣṇa, he could not proceed further (beyond a certain height) and his velocity abated (to a stand-still).

27. Due to his extraordinary weight, the Asura thought him to be a mountain. As he was tightly gripped at the throat by him, he could not disengage himself from that wonderful (superhuman) child.

28. Being tightly clasped at the throat with extraordinary pressure, he was rendered motionless. His eyes came out of their sockets. With an indistinct groan he fell dead on the ground at Vraja, with the child dangling from his neck.

29. The bewailing women who assembled there saw the terrible demon falling from the sky on a rock, getting all his limbs shattered like the city (Tripura) cleft by the arrow of Rudra.

30. Astonished to see Kṛṣṇa dangling on the chest of the demon, they picked him up and restored him to his mother. Finding him safe and sound in body though carried away through the sky by the demon, and getting him back unscath-ed from the jaws of death, Gopīs and Gopas headed by Nanda were verily filled with rapturous delight.

31. "Oh! How miraculous! This child, carried by the demon, and (practically) brought to its end (death), has come back safe! While the blood-thirsty wicked (demon) was killed under the weight of his own sins, and a pious soul is saved from fear due to his even-ness of attitude (towards all).

32. Oh! What austere penance, what adoration to Lord Viṣṇu, what charitable acts in public interest (like building of temples or tanks), what sacrificial performances, what deeds benevolent to living beings have been done by us that (by virtue of which) the child which was as good as dead, has been fortunately restored to us, bringing delight to us, his kinsfolk."

33. Amazed at the frequent recurrence of such miracles in that big forest (Gokula), Nanda highly esteemed the (parting) words of Vasudeva.

34. One day the beautiful lady (Yaśodā) placed the child on her lap, and being overcome with motherly affection made him suck her breast overflowing with milk.

35-36. When his sucking was almost over, she was caressing his face which was beaming with graceful smile. And Lo! Oh King! When he yawned she saw the following in his mouth:

The sky, the firmament above and the earth below, host of luminaries, the cardinal points, the Sun, the Moon, the fire-god, the wind-god, oceans, continents, mountains and their daughters (i.e. rivers), forests and the mobile and immobile creation.

37. Perceiving suddenly the whole of the universe (in his mouth) she was seized with trembling. The lady with eyes resembling those of fawns, closed her eyes, and stayed greatly astonished.
CHAPTER EIGHT

Krśna’s Sports—Display of Viśvarūpa

Śri Śuka continued:

1. At the request of Vasudeva, Garga, the family priest of Yadus, noted for rigid asceticism, visited Nanda’s Vraja, Oh king.

2. He (Nanda) was highly pleased to see Garga. He stood up to show respect to him and folded his palms. He worshipped him, lying prostrate before him, regarded him to be Lord Viṣṇu.

3. When the sage was properly received and comfortably seated, Nanda, pleasing him with sweet words, asked, “Oh Brāhmaṇa, what service should I render to you who are self-accomplished (and want nothing).

4. Oh venerable sage! Visits of great people like you contribute to the supreme good to persons who are attached to their households and are distressed in their minds. They never turn out to the contrary.

5. You have directly compiled a treatise on the science of astrology (lit. the movements of luminaries) which is beyond the range of senses. It is by that that a man knows his past and future.

6. You are foremost among the knowers of the Vedas. You should, therefore, perform the purificatory rites of these two boys; for a Brāhmaṇa is the preceptor of all people, by his very birth.”

Garga said:

7. “I am the family priest of the Yadus and I am known over the world as such. If I were to consecrate your son with religious rites, they will regard him as the son of Devaki.

8-9. Kāṁsa is wicked by nature. The friendship between you and Vasudeva (is also well known). Kāṁsa has heard the words of Devaki’s daughter that the eighth born (womb) of Devaki cannot be a female. If taking into account all these, he (Kāṁsa) gets suspicious, and if he were to kill (your son), it will be our blunder.”
Nanda replied:

10. “Please perform the purificatory rites proper for members of the twice-born castes, invoking heavenly blessings with benedictory hymns. Please do so secretly at Gokula, without being noticed even by my own people.”

Śri Śuka said:

11. Thus requested (by Nanda), the Brāhmaṇa who himself was desirous of it performed the naming ceremony of the two boys (the sons of Rohini and Yaśodā) secretly, remaining himself unnoticed.

Garga said:

12. “This son of Rohini will be called Rāma as he will delight his friends with his amiable excellent qualities, and he will be known as Bala due to his superiority in strength. They will call him Saṅkarṣaṇa due to his capacity to draw together and unite dissenting Yadus (Garga does not want to disclose the transfer of Balarāma from the womb of Devakī to Rohini due to which he was really called Saṅkarṣaṇa).

13. As to this (second son), he assumed human forms in every Yuga with three different complexions, viz., white, red and yellow for each, successively. Now he has assumed the dark complexion. (Hence he will be known as Kṛṣṇa).

14. Formerly, this son of yours was sometime born in the house of Vasudeva. Hence the wise (knowers of this fact) will designate him as Vāsudeva, the glorious.

15. Numerous are the names and forms of this son of yours suitable to excellent qualities and marvellous deeds. I know them (all), but not the common people.

16. This delight of Gopas and Gokula (i.e. Kṛṣṇa) will bring prosperity to you all, and you will easily surmount all calamities with his help.

17. In times of yore, while anarchy prevailed, he protected pious people who were harassed by rogues and robbers, and when strengthened by him, they (righteous people) vanquished the miscreants.

18. Just as those who side with Viṣṇu are not vanquished by Asuras, those fortunate persons who (passionately) love him are not overpowered by enemies.

19. Therefore, Oh Nanda, this son of yours is a compeer of Lord Nārāyaṇa¹ in excellent qualities, splendour, glory and prowess. Therefore, please take care of him with very minute attention.²

20. When Garga returned home after instructing Nanda thus (or addressing Lord Kṛṣṇa), Nanda was so highly delighted that he considered himself blessed with all well-beings.

21. In a short while, Rāma and Keśava began to creep on their hands and knees and sportfully went round Gokula.

22. While they crawled speedily even in the moist places of Vraja, dragging the pair of their legs (behind them), there arose a sweet tinkling sound of the tiny bells of their girdles and anklelets. Their minds being delighted with the jingling sound, they followed the passers-by (a few steps) only to return to their mothers, as if in bewilderment and fright.

23. Their two mothers with their breasts spontaneously overflowing with milk due to motherly affection, embraced in their arms their sons who looked charming with their bodies besmeared with mud. They enjoyed ecstatic delight while gazing at their (sons’) countenances beaming with bewitching smiles and tiny tender teeth when they were sucking the breasts.

24. When they attained to the age when the sports of boys become attractive to women to see, the damsels of Vraja witnessed how both of them, holding the tails of calves were dragged behind them hither and thither. Forgetting their household duties, they burst out laughing and were transported with joy.

25. When their mothers found it impossible to restrain their extremely active and playful sons from horned beasts, fire, animals of sharp teeth, sharp lethal weapons, water, (carnivorous, cruel) birds and thorns or even to attend to their household duties, they experienced a great mental (strain of) distraction.³

26. After a short time, Oh royal sage, Rāma and Kṛṣṇa

¹. To whom Nārāyaṇa bears resemblance by his attributes—JG.
². Śr. regards this as the highest point of their domestic happiness.
began to move about easily on feet, in Gokul, without rubbing their knees (against the floor).

27. Then, in course of time, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa accompanied by Balarāma began to play with boys of his own age, enhancing the joys of the women of Vraja.

28. Observing the charming boyish pranks of Kṛṣṇa, the cowherd-women came in a body (to his house) and actually spoke (complained) as follows within the hearing of his mother.

29. “Sometimes he untethers the calves untimely (before the milking time of cows allowing the calves to drink up all the milk). If scolded, he (derisively) laughs. Inventing novel ways of stealing, he drinks up the sweet and tasty curds and milk stolen by him. Sometimes he distributes it to the monkeys. If the monkey does not partake of it, he smashes the jar (or milk or curds). If he gets no material (to eat), he gets angry with the infants (people in the) house and goes away setting the infants (in the house) crying.

30. If the jar (of milk, curds or butter) is (kept hanging) beyond the reach of his hands, he constructs contrivance with the help of wooden seats and mortars. Knowing the contents of the pots suspended in slings, he strikes holes into the pots. In a dark room he uses like a lamp his own person, decorated profusely with jewels—he does all this at a time when the Gopa women have their minds fully engrossed in performing their household duties.

31. In this way, he commits acts of nuisance such as passing urine and leaving excretions in our cleansed houses. Having perpetrated such mischiefs and using all devices of stealing, he sits near you like an innocent boy of good behaviour”.

Even though such complaints were lodged by women who gazed at his beautiful face with terrified eyes, Yaśodā full of smiles did not feel inclined to chastise him.

32. On one occasion, while cowherd-boys headed by Balarāma were playing, they complained to the mother (Yaśodā) that Kṛṣṇa had eaten earth.

33. Thereupon, Yaśodā who was anxious about his well-being and health), caught Kṛṣṇa by his hand and rebuking him, while his eyes assumed bewildering look (as if) through fear, she spoke:
34. ‘You naughty boy! Why did you eat earth secretly? These your playmates tell me and this your elder brother also says the same.’

35. ‘No mother, I did not eat earth. All these are liars. If (you still think that) they tell the truth, you look into my mouth personally.’

36. ‘If that be the case, open your mouth.’ Thus ordered, the glorious Lord Hari of unlimited supreme powers, and who, out of sport, had assumed the form of a human child, opened his mouth.

37-38. She (Yaśodā) beheld therein the universe consisting of mobiles and immobiles, the ethereal dome, the cardinal points, the sphere of the earth along with the mountains, continents and oceans, the wind, the fire (of lightning), the moon, the stars, the (whole of the) planetary system, (elements like) water, fire, wind and the sky, (the presiding deities of) the senses and the mind, subtle elements and the three guṇas.

39. Seeing in the body, nay in the gaping mouth of her child, this marvelous universe consisting of a variety of organisms produced by (factors like Souls, Time, Nature, Destiny and Mind as well as the whole of Vraja including herself, she was seized with terror.

40. (She bemused) ‘Is this a dream or an illusion created by the Lord? Or is it a fantasy—a delusion of my own mind? Or is it the innate divine power of this very child of mine?’

41. Hence I bow down to the feet of the Supreme Lord, which are extremely difficult to comprehend and the real nature of which cannot be grasped easily by the intellect, mind, deeds and words; which are the basis of the universe and through the instrumentality of which and from out of which the universe is manifested.

42. He (that Supreme Lord) is my refuge by whose deluding potency (Māyā) arise perverse notions such as ‘I am (Yaśodā)’, ‘This is my husband’, ‘This (Kṛṣṇa) is my son’, ‘I am that chaste lady who protect the whole property of Nanda (the Lord of Vraja)’, ‘All the cowherds—men and women along with the wealth of cattle—are mine’.”

43. The Omnipotent Supreme Lord cast over the Gopālady who had thus realized the truth, his deluding Vaiṣṇava (divine) charm which filled her with maternal affection for (her) son.

44. Instantly the Gopa-lady lost her memory (regarding the real nature of the Lord). She placed her son on her lap. Her heart overflowed with intense affection as before.

45. She began to look upon Hari as her own son—Hari whose glory is being sung by the three Vedas, Upaniṣads, Sāṅkhya and Yoga systems and by Sātvatas (or votaries of the Lord).

The King said:

46. Oh Brāhmaṇa Sage! What highly meritorious act did Nanda perform so as to deserve such great fortune? What did the highly fortunate Yośodā do that Lord Hari sucked her breasts?

47. While the (real) parents of Kṛṣṇa could not witness the childly sports of Kṛṣṇa which wipe out the sins of the world and which are still extolled by the wise and learned people.

Sūka replied:

48. When Droṇa, the foremost of Vasus, along with his wife Dharā was intent upon executing the orders of god Brahmā, he requested that divinity.

49. “When we are born on the earth, may we entertain the highest devotion to Hari, the Supreme God, and the Lord of the universe—devotion through which a person easily and certainly overcomes evil destiny in this world.”

50. ‘Let it be so’, replied the glorious god (granting his prayer). The illustrious Droṇa was born in Vraja and became well-known as Nanda. And the above-mentioned Dharā (his wife) became ‘Yośodā’.

51. Hence, out of all Gopa men and women, that couple entertained the most intense and passionate devotion to the glorious Lord Viṣṇu (Janārdana) who became their son, Oh descendant of Bharata.

52. In order to carry out (and fulfil) Brahmā’s boon (to them), the Omnipresent Lord Kṛṣṇa along with Balarāma lived at Vraja and brought delight to them all, by his sportive activities.
CHAPTER NINE

Grace upon the Gopi (Yaśodā)

(Kṛṣṇa tied to the mortar)

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. One day, when the female servants were directed to do some other work, Yaśodā, the wife of Nanda, began to churn the curds personally.

2. At the time of churning the curds, she recalled whatever acts of her child were sung there in Vraja and she herself sang them.

3. Wearing round her big waist (loins) a silk garment fastened with a zone, and with her pair of shaking breasts that were overflowing with milk from maternal affection for her son, with her ear-rings set in motion as well as her bangles moving about her forearms, fatigued with pulling the churning rope to and fro and her face bedewed with drops of perspiration, the handsome lady went on churning while jasmine flowers continued to drop from the braids of her hair.

4. Approaching his mother who was engaged in churning (the curds), Śrī Hari, desiring to suck her, caught hold of the churning rod, and awakening her maternal affection for him (by is gestures etc.), he stopped her churning.

5. On his climbing up to her lap, she began to suckle him at her bosom overflowing with milk, through affection, and to gaze at his countenance which was beaming with smiles. But when the milk placed on the oven (for boiling) was about to overflow, she went in haste, leaving him alone, still unsatisfied.

6. Flared up with indignation, he bit his quivering ruddy lips with his teeth and smashed the pot for churning curds with a piece of stone (used for grinding condiments etc. on a slab of stone). Shedding false tears, he entered the interior of the house and began to eat butter clandestinely.

7. After getting down the (pot of) well-boiled milk, the Gopa-lady re-entered (the churning-room) only to find that pot of curds smashed. Knowing that to be the act of her son and failinî to see him there, she just laughed (it away).
8. Observing that her son was standing firmly on the base of an overturned mortar, giving freely to a monkey the butter kept on a swing, and looking about with his eyes through caution and fear, lest somebody should detect the theft, she stealthily approached him from behind.

9. Seeing his mother clearly with a rod in her hand, he hastily got down from the mortar and ran away as if in fear. The Gopa-lady pursued him, but failed to overtake him whom even the minds of yogins impelled and attuned through the force of penance (and concentration) do not reach (even though they are capable to do so.)

10. Running after him, the beautiful mother (lit. mother of beautiful waist) whose speed was impeded by her bulky, moving hips and who was, as it were, followed by the flowers dropping from her braid of hair loosened by the speed (of her running), ultimately caught hold of him.

11. Holding by the hand, she threatened to beat Kṛśṇa, who was crying for having committed that offence, and was rubbing his eyes with his hand whereby the collyrium (applied to his eyes) got spread all over and who was looking up (to his mother) with eyes bewildered and agitated with fear.

12. Perceiving that her son was terrified, Yaśodā, who was extremely affectionate to her child, threw away the stick. It is traditionally reported that being unable to comprehend the prowess of Kṛśṇa, Yaśodā wished to bind him with a rope.

13*-14. In relation with him there is neither inside nor outside, neither before nor behind; but he is in front and at the back, outside and inside the universe; (nay) he is the universe itself. Presuming such unmanifest supra-sensuous Lord who had assumed a human form, to be her child, the cowherd-woman tried to bind him with a rope to the mortar, as one would tie down an ordinary human child.

15. While binding her child with a rope for his mischief, the cowherd lady found that it was short by two-fingers

* VJ. : There is nothing self-existent and self-dependent as he is everywhere. Since he exists from eternity to eternity nothing pre-exists him or outlasts him. He exists before and after the universe, and is immanent and transcendent to the world. He is the universe as everything is within his power.
(about an inch or so). So she added to it another piece (of rope).

16. When that (additional) string fell short, she tied yet another piece. In this way, whatever additional piece (of string) she brought, it too fell short by two fingers (about an inch).

17. While Yaśodā was putting together all the ropes in her house (and still it fell short by two fingers), all the Gopāwomen laughed; and she too joined them smiling, but felt amazed at it.

18. Noticing the over-exhaustion of his mother whose body was bathed in perspiration, and the wreaths of flowers from whose loosened braids of hair were falling down, Kṛṣṇa, out of compassion for her, allowed himself to be tied.

19. In this way, dear Parīkṣit! was demonstrated his subjection to the control of his votaries by Hari, even though Kṛṣṇa is absolutely self-dependent and has the whole of the universe along with its rulers, under his control.

20. Neither (his son) god Brahmā nor (his very Soul) Lord Śiva nor the goddess Lakṣmī who clings to his person, was recipient of such grace as was enjoyed by the Gopi (Yaśodā) at the hands of that bestower of Mokṣa (Liberation).

21. The glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa who is (i.e. has assumed the form of) the son of Yaśodā is not so easily attainable to the ascetics who identify themselves with their bodies and to those who possess spiritual wisdom, as to those who are devoted to him and identify themselves with him.¹

22. While his mother Yaśodā was engrossed in carrying out her household duties, Lord Kṛṣṇa noticed that the pair of Arjuna trees were in their former birth, two Guhyakas, the sons of Kubera, the bestower of wealth.

23. They were known as Nala Kūbara and Maṇigrīva. Endowed with great splendour as they were, they were reduced to the state of trees, through the curse imprecated by Nārada due to their pride.

¹. vl. ātma-potānām | Who make him their only raft to cross Samsāra —VR., VJ.
CHAPTER TEN

(Uprooting of Arjuna Trees—Redemption of Nalakūbara and Maṇigrīva)

The King (Parikṣit) enquired:

1. Worshipful Sage! Be pleased to narrate (to us) the reason of the pronouncement of imprecation on them (viz. Nalakūbara and Maṇigrīva by (Nārada). What was their reproachful act which aroused the ire¹ of that divine sage.²

Śrī Śuka replied:

2-3. On becoming the attendants of god Rudra, those two sons of Kubera, grew puffed up with vain gloriousness. Drunk with the liquor called Vāruṇī, thoroughly inebriated with their eyes rolling through intoxication, they, in company of singing women, were strolling through a pleasure-garden in the vicinity of mount Kailāsa, and through woodlands full of blossom, on the banks of the Mandākini (the Gaṅgā in heaven).

4. Entering the waters of the Gaṅgā which were beautified by blossoming lotus-beds, they sported amorously³ with young damsels, like unto a pair of he-elephants with she-elephants.⁴

5. By the will of the Providence, the worshipful divine sage Nārada happened to see the pair of gods there, and perceived them to be intoxicated (and speaking vulgarly), Oh descendant of Kurus.

¹. tumas—(i) Ignorance which is the cause of anger—SS. (Sudarśan Śūri)

(ii) aroused the Tamo-guṇa (in Nārada), the effect of which is anger—VJ.

2. v.l. in VR. : yena vā devarśiḥ kutiḥ ‘which enraged the divine sage’.

3. KD. being a born poet gives a graphic description of various love-sports indulged in by them.

4. VB. enumerates a series of sinful mistakes and grievous offences committed by Nalakūbara and Maṇigrīva in VV. 2-4, and shows that the curse by Nārada was inevitable and a perfectly just punishment meted out to them.
6. Seeing him, the celestial damsels felt ashamed at their nudity, and were afraid of being cursed. Instantly and quickly they put on their garments. But not so the two Yakṣas (whose godliness disappeared due to their being drunk), and they stayed on stark naked (despite the persistent requests of the celestial nymphs).

7. Observing that those two sons of god Kubera were inebriated with wine, and blind with arrogance of affluence, he (Nārada) with a view of showering grace on them, intended to pronounce an imprecation, and spoke (lit. sang) as follows:

Nārada said:

8. In the case of a person who indulges in the enjoyment of objects of pleasure, no other effect of rajo-guṇa (such as the pride of heredity or of scholarship) is powerful enough to cloud his understanding and good sense as the pride of one's affluence. For wherever this form of vanity predominates, women, wine and gambling are found associated with it.

9. Where such pride of wealth is dominant, animals are ruthlessly slaughtered by such merciless persons of uncontrolled mind who (wrongly) regard this transient perishable body as immune from decrepitude of old age and above mortality.

10. Though this body is designated as god (among men—nara-deva or on the earth—bhūdeva), it is ultimately reduced to what are called worms, excretion and ashes. Does the person who harms living beings1 for the sake of his body, know his own interest? Does he know that such violence leads to hell?

11. Does this body belong to the employer (who gives food or money for its maintenance), or to the procreator (or father), or to the mother (who conceives it and nourishes it during childhood), or the maternal grand-father (who adopts it by putrikā dharma stipulations), or to the mighty (who compels forced labour), or to the purchaser (in the slave-market when presented for sale), or to fire (which consumes it when cremated), or to the dog (when it lies unclaimed and uncremated)?

1. Vṛtakā takes bhūta-dhīrk as 'a person acting against Brahman by indulging in talk of being identical with Brahman, but SS., VR., VB. etc., follow SR in interpreting bhūta as 'a living being'.
12. Knowing that this body is the common property (of all as stated above), and that it comes out of and vanishes into something unmanifest, what wise person other than an ignorant fool, regard it as his real self, and would kill living beings (for its sake).

12A. Vf.'s text adds here, again a verse composed of 9b and 10a above.

13. Poverty is the best (sight-recovering) collyrium to wicked persons blinded with the pride of affluence. A poverty-stricken person correctly realizes that all others are like himself (experiencing the same pleasures or pangs of life).

14. Just as a person, part of whose body is pricked with a thorn, does not wish similar pain to other creatures, as he realizes the equality of other creatures by their gestures expressing pain. But such understanding sympathy is not found in those who have no experience of being pricked.

15. Being devoid of obdurate egotism, a poor person becomes free from all forms of pride here. The severe hardships that come to his lot, by the will of the Providence, serve as a great austere penance (Hence poverty is conducive to final Liberation).

16. The senses and organs of a poverty-stricken person whose body gets over-emaciated with starvation, and who longs to have food (sufficient to keep body and soul together), become too much dried up and feeble to commit injury (and consequently the desire for violence also disappears).

17. Saintly persons who regard all as equals (with impartiality) associate themselves only with the poor. It is in the company of the righteous that he destroys all his thirst (passion for having worldly objects), and in a short while becomes absolutely pure.

18. What interest have the righteous saints who possess equanimity and equal regard to all, and yearn for the attainment of the feet of Lord Viṣṇu, in the wicked people who are

1. Cf viṣayā vinivrastante nirdhārasya dehinaḥ /
   —BG. 2.59

2. v.l. ārād hi siddhyati, 'attains final Liberation within a short time'
   —Vf.
arrogantly proud of their wealth, and who resort to sinful company and hence deserve to be ignored?

19. I shall, therefore, relieve the pride born of ignorance of these two woman-addicts of uncontrollable mind, blinded with the pride of wealth, and now inebriated with the sweet liquor Vāruṇī.

20-21. Inasmuch as, these two, though the sons of an (exalted) protector of the sphere (Kubera) are too steeped in tāmas (arrogance begotten of ignorance) to be conscious of their nudity, and are haughtily vainglorious (to remain so even in my presence), these deserve to be (nude, unbending) immobile trees so that they won't behave so again. They will, however, through my grace and favour, retain the memory (and consciousness of their guilt and punishment) even in that immobile stage.

22. After one hundred celestial years, they, who had by then acquired devotion (unto Vāsudeva), will attain to the presence of Lord Vāsudeva, and shall be restored to the celestial status.

Śri Śuka said:

23. After pronouncing the imprecation thus, the divine sage went to the hermitage of Nārāyaṇa, while Nalakūbara and Maṇigrīva were transformed into the twin-Arjuna trees.

24. To make good the veracity of the words of the sage (Nārada) who is the prominent one among his devotees, Lord Kṛṣṇa slowly went to the spot where the twin Arjuna trees grew together.

25. “The divine sage Nārada is the most beloved of me. These (twin-Arjuna trees) are the sons of Kubera. I shall now accomplish what has been sung (prophesied) by the noble-souled sage”.

26. With this aim in view, Kṛṣṇa crawled in between the twin-Arjuna trees. By the mere entry of his person between them, the mortar fell crosswise.

27. The trees were vehemently uprooted by the child, with a rope tied round its belly, while it was dragging the mortar after him. They fell down with a terrific crash, their trunks, leaves and branches were heavily shaken by the forcible pull exerted by the Supreme Lord.

28. Irradiating all direction with their dazzling lustre, emerged the two Siddhas like fire emanating from trees. Bowing down with their heads to Kṛṣṇa, the Lord and protector of the entire universe, they, now absolutely free from egotism, praised him with folded palms.

29.* "Oh Kṛṣṇa! Oh Supreme Brahma in human form! Oh great yogin (whose infinite power is unimaginable), you are the primordial ‘Supreme Person’. Brāhmaṇas (i.e. persons who have realized the Brahman or are experts in the Vedas) know that the universe both manifest and un-manifest is your form.

30. You are the One, the controller of the body, vital breaths, the ‘I-ness’, senses and organs of all beings. You are the glorious Lord Viṣṇu, whose form (sport) is the time-spirit, and who is the imperishable Absolute Ruler.

31. You are the Subtle Prakṛti constituted of the three guṇas—sattva, rajas and tumas. You are the (evolute of Prakṛti called) Mahat-tattva. You are the witness, the Puruṣa—the Inner controller of all beings who know all the modifications and changes in all beings.

* (1) VR : Your subtle body (composed of both cit and acit (is the cause of which your gross body (consisting of cit and acit) is the effect.
(ii) VJ : The universe is full of your presence, but does not limit your power or nature. You are the Supreme Brahma who pervade the universe.

K.D.: You are the First Cause as both Prakṛti and Puruṣa were evolved (lit. brought to light) from you.

 (1) VR. :— You are not only the material cause (upādānakārana), but also the instrumental or efficient cause (nimittakārana) of the universe. As the Controller of bodies of all beings, you are the cause of subsistence of the world, and as the Time-spirit you are the destroyer of the world—but though a cause, you undergo, no change or modification.

(ii) VB. This verse describes how the Lord pervades all forms from the adhi-daivika point of view.

The time spirit on which depends rulership, affluence (aistvarya) is not merely the sport or activity of the Lord, but the Lord himself.
32.* It is not possible that you can be perceived through the modifications of Prakṛti (e.g. intelligence, ‘I’-ness, cognitive and conative senses), or through the guṇas (modes of Prakṛti) which lie within the ken of perception. What being in this world, enveloped as he is in the product of guṇas (viz. his physical body), is capable of realizing you who were already in existence before the creation (of the Univeٍrse).

33. Obeisance to you glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the Creator (of the Universe), the perfect Brahman who have concealed your great glory by means of guṇas which are illumined by your own effulgence.

34. You are (really) incorporeal. But your incarnations in corporal frames are perceived by their various heroic feats which are too unparallel or unequalled and of too supreme excellence to be found in those associated with and conditioned by corporal forms.

35. You, the Lord of all auspicious blessings¹, are such (as described above). At present your Lordship has descended in this incarnation with a part of your divinity², for the prosperity and emancipation of the entire world.

*(i) (VJ) : Hari alone is capable of perceiving himself. He cannot be seen by Brahmā and other deities or Jīvas presiding over the evolutes of Prakṛti like mahat āhamkāra etc. Deities who are always near him like Śrī, Durgā etc. can perceive him to some extent. Products of Prakṛti (e.g. things in the world) are perceptible to senses, but are incapable of seeing the Brahman.

(ii) VT : You are endowed with natural qualities like mercifulness etc. which undergo no change or modifications, as can be actually experienced. You cannot, however, be realized as you actually are. Who though properly possessed of qualities like bhakti (devotion) and though your actions have taken place in Nanda’s Gokula and as such are famous, is capable of realizing you and your litās adequately?

(iii) VC : It is through your Grace that you can be visualized, otherwise you are always invisible.

 VT : regards this as salutation to the deities in the two manifestations (Vyūhas) of the Pañcarātrins. Thus the 1st manifestation is Vāsudeva, Vedās is Saṅkarṣaṇa, the creator of the world.

1. : VT. The Lord who confers whatever is desired by the devotees.
2. aṁśa-bhāgena etc., :

(i) VR : You have incarnated along with your part (or ray) Balarāma for the creation and prosperity of the world.
36. Salutation to you The Supreme bliss! Hail to you the supremely auspicious Lord, the son of Vasudeva, the blemishless happiness incarnate, the Lord and protector of Yadavas and Gopas.

37. Be pleased to allow us, the two servants of your follower (Rudra), to go, Oh Perfect Lord! It is through the Grace of the Sage Narada, that we had the good fortune of (being blest with) the sight of your glorious Lordship.

38. (May our previous nature not reappear). May our speech be engaged in extolling your excellent qualities and actions; our ears in listening to your stories; our hands be devoted to do your work, and our mind in musing over and remembering your feet; our head bowing to the world which is your abode, and our sight in seeing saintly persons who are but your form.

Śri Śuka said:

39. The glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the ruler of Gokula who remained tied down to the mortar with a rope, laughingly spoke to the two Guhyakas who had glorified him thus.

The Lord replied:

40. It was already known to me that the sage Narada of a compassionate heart had favoured you with his grace, in degrading you (to the status of trees), by uttering an imprecation on you, who were blind with the arrogance of affluence.

41. Just as no obstruction (from darkness etc.) to the sight of man can remain when the sun appears, no bondage (of sin or saṁsāra) can exist at the sight of righteous Souls who

(ii) VB : incarnated with a part of your (original self):
amśena bhāgena ca . . . avatirṇaḥ

(iii) VJ : bhāgena-amśena VJ. insists that Kṛṣṇa is an incarnation of Nārāyaṇa, the Supreme Lord.

(iv) VT : The dogma of Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavas is that Kṛṣṇa is not a part-incarnation, but the Lord (bhagarāṇ) Himself, as stated in V. 33 above: tasmāi . . . Kṛṣṇas tu bhagarāṇ svayam! ityādau prasiddhyā

The same is implied here though VT. is silent on these words in the texts.

(v) KD : takes anśa as ‘Kṛṣṇāṁśa’—entirety.
have realized the ātman (and possess equanimity of mind), and have thoroughly devoted their hearts to me.

42. Oh Nalakūbara (and Manigrīva)! Now that unswerving devotion toward me is enkindled in you, do you proceed to your own abode. The most covetable supreme devotion unto me which terminates the saṁsāra, has now been generated in you.

Śrī Śuka said:

43. Being thus addressed, they both circumambulated the Lord tied to the wooden mortar. They repeatedly prostrated themselves before him (to show respect), and with his leave, proceeded towards the North.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

Exodus from Gokula—Destruction of demons Vatsa and Baka

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Hearing the crashing sound of the falling (Arjuna) trees, cowherds headed by Nanda (thinking it to be a roar of thunder) rushed to the spot, afraid as they were of a thunderbolt, Oh prominent Kuru.

2. They saw the twin Arjuna trees fallen to the ground. They were bewildered as they could not guess the cause of that fall which was quite obvious.

3. It was the child who was dragging the wooden mortar tied to it with a cord. (But not believing in it) they got distressed as to who did it, what could be the cause of that wonder or whether it is an evil portent.

4. The boys (who were present there) reported, “It (the uprooting of the trees) has been done by him (Kṛṣṇa) who going between the trees dragged the mortar, which lay athwart the trees. We also saw two divine figures (rising from the fallen trees).”
5. They did not believe in the report of the boys. The sceptics reasoned with themselves the impossibility of uprooting the two big trees by the child, while a few others had some reservations in their minds (as they remembered Kṛṣṇa's previous feats).

6. It is traditionally reported that seeing his own child tethered with a cord and dragging the mortar, Nanda with his countenance beaming with a smile, set him free.

7. Glorious Lord (of the Universe) though he was, he sometime danced like a child, sometimes sang loudly and behaved like a wooden doll under the control of the Gopīs (cowherd women), when they encouraged him with their clapping of hands and coaxings.

8. Commanded by them, sometimes he would bring articles like a wooden stool, a measure or a pair of wooden sandals, and sometimes he would swing up his arms bringing delight and affection to his own people (his devotees).

9. To the people who recognize him (as God), he, thereby demonstrates his subservience to (the will of) his servants. The glorious Lord thus brought great joy to (i.e. in the life of) people in Vraja through his child-like playful activities.

10*. Hearing the vendor's cry, "Oh people, purchase fruits", Kṛṣṇa rushed to him quickly with food grains (in the hollow of his palms to give in exchange of fruit), desirous of

*Verses 10-20, both inclusive, are not commented upon by ŚR and VB. (as they obviously do not recognize them as a part of the text), but VR., VJ., VT., JG., VC. have recognized them as an integral part of the Bh. P. and have annotated on them. VT. notes that though there are variations in the order of these verses, the Gauḍīya Sampradāya text is followed.

Though it is not possible to present a concordance of the various text-traditions of the Bh. P., the complexity of the problem can be indicated by comparing ŚR. and VJ.'s text here. Ch. XI in ŚR. is Ch. XII in VJ. In this Chapter after the 9th verse, the order of vv in VJ. is as follows:

I. Vv 10-18.

21-29 (in ŚR.) : From Gopa-vṛddhā mahot-pātān...upto bhavatāṁ yudi... getting the fruits, though he himself is the bestower of fruits (of actions, prayers, etc.) to all.

11. The fruit-seller-woman filled with fruits (the hollow of the) palms of his hands from which grains were slipping down (through the gap between them) and the basket of fruits was filled with precious stones.

12. On one occasion, queen Rohini called (Bala-) Rama and Krishna, the uprooter of the Arjuna trees, who were engrossed in playing with children on the bank of the river.

13. When both the sons being deeply interested in play did not come back despite her calling, Rohini sent Yasoda who was so much affectionate to her child.

14. Yasoda, with her breasts overflowing with affection for her child, repeatedly shouted for her child who along with his elder brother was playing with the children beyond the (usual) time-limit.

15. "Oh Krsna, Krsna of lotus-eyes! Child! Come up and suck at my bosom. Enough of playing. You must be feeling fatigued with hunger and exhausted with exertions in playing, my sonny.

16. Oh Rama! Come quickly with your younger brother. Oh child. It is very early in the morning that you had a breakfast. You must take food now, Oh delight of the family.

17. Oh Dasara! Nanda, the head of this Vrindavana is about to take his meals is waiting for you. Do come and bring joy to us both. Oh boys! You return to your houses.

18. Your body has been covered with dust, Oh child!

II. 19A (extra verse) tac chrutvaaka-dhiyo gopah sarve Nanda pritamah |
Upa-nanda-loco vijan pratinandya ghan jayuh || 19.

Vs. 20-28

III. 12-20 (in Sr) :
Sarit-stranam Krsnam kreuvaatvatho adhyam (?)

IV 29A
(Additional verse) :
atha Sandah samahyata gopanidam abhaasala |
Sueto Vrndavanam yamo yatata bharatha maitre

V The remaining 30 verses from tac chrutvaikodhiya gopah sadhu sadhuvit vadinah/ etc. are common to Sr. & VJ. This is the XII ch, in VJ.
Go and take your bath. The star, presiding over your birth, is in the ascent. Get purified by bath, and give cows to Brāhmaṇas.

19. Behold your play-mates. They have been washed and well-adorned by their mothers. You also take your bath, have your meals, and after getting well-adorned, go to play.”

20. In this way, Yaśodā whose mind was bound with the ties of maternal affection, regarded, Kṛṣṇa, the crown of all as her child. She took both Rāma and Kṛṣṇa by hand, and brought them to her house, and made them perform the auspicious rites.

Śuka said:

21. Observing extremely ominous portents in the Brhadvana (Gokula), elderly Gopas (cowherds) like Nanda and others met in a conference and deliberated the measures to be adopted in the interest of Vraja.

22. Out of them, a cowherd called Upananda, who was senior to others in wisdom and age, and who was endowed with a penetrating insight into the exigencies of the time, place and things (situation), and a well-wisher of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa advised as follows:

23. “We, the well-wishers of Gokula should now migrate from this place; for, terrible portents of an evil nature forbidding destruction of our children are visiting this place.

24. This child Kṛṣṇa certainly had a miraculous escape with great difficulty from the ogress (Pūtanā), the slayer of children. It was surely through the grace of Lord Hari, that the cart did not fall on Kṛṣṇa.

25. He was carried away to the skies, the region of birds, by a demon in the form of a whirlwind. He fell on a rock, but was protected by great gods (our deities).

26. It is sheerly due to the protection afforded by Lord Acyuta that this child or any other boy should not die on getting in between the (Arjuna) trees (as they crashed).

27. Before Vraja is not overtaken by any calamity indicated by these evil portents, let us repair to some other place along with our children and followers and attendants.
28. There is a virgin forest tract called Vṛndāvana which along with its sacred hills, pasturage, trees and plants, is suitable to our cattle and fit to be a happy settlement to our milkmen, women and cattle.

29. Let us, therefore, shift there, this very day. Get our carts and vehicles ready. Be quick (No delay please). If you so approve of it, let our wealth, the herds of cattle, go ahead in advance."

29A. VJ.'s text adds:

Having heard the speech of Upananda with concentration of mind (and attentively), all the cowherds of which Nanda was the leader, approved of it, and repaired to their houses, Oh King.

29B. Then Nanda summoned together all the Gopas and directed (spoke) as follows:

"Tomorrow we shall go from this place to Vṛndāvana. Be prepared. Don’t delay."

30. Unanimously approving his speech, all Gopas exclaimed “That’s right! Very good”. They got their respective conveyances ready with their effects, packed and loaded.

31. Having put into their carriages the aged persons, young children and their women-folk along with utensils and other accessories, the Gopas who were all alert carried bows already strung, in their hands.

32. Keeping their wealth of cattle in their front in advance, accompanied by their family priests, they started on their journey with a flourish of blowing horns and sounding trumpets on all sides.

33. Mounted on chariots, the Gopa women of lovely complexion, with fresh application of saffron-paint to their breasts, wore strings of gold coins round their necks, and put on excellent garments, they felt supremely happy and sang the sportive acts of Kṛṣṇa.

34. So also Yaśodā and Rohiṇī occupied the same carriage, and were eager to hear the sportive acts of their dear children, shone (brightly) with Kṛṣṇa and Rāma (on their laps).

35. Entering Vṛndāvana which was pleasant in all seasons, they, with a crescent-shaped formation of their vehicles, set up the habitation (for them and the cattle), semicircular like unto the half disc of the moon.

36. Beholding the forest of Vṛndāvana, the Govardhana hill (nearby), and the sand-banks of the Yamunā, the hearts of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa surged with great joy.

37. In this way, giving delight to the inhabitants of Vraja with their child-like sportive activities and sweet lisping, they, in due course, began to tend calves.

38. In the vicinity of their habitation, and in the company of cowherd boys, they tended the calves, taking with them various articles of play.

39-40. Sometimes they played on flutes. Sometimes they used fruits of the Bilva tree or of the Emblic Myrobalan (āmalaka) for throwing as balls; sometimes they played kicking those with their feet, making a tinkling noise of small bells (of the anklets); sometimes they imitated the cattle with two-three boys as the tender of cattle, sometime they played the part of bellowing and fighting bulls. Sometimes they imitated the cries of birds like swans and peacocks. In this way they roved simulating ordinary children.

41. On one occasion, while both Rāma and Kṛṣṇa were pasturing the calves along with their friends, a demon came there, with the intention of killing Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma.

42. On seeing him assume the form of a calf and mix with the herd of calves, he (Kṛṣṇa) pointed him out to Balarāma, and slowly approached the demon, posing as if he knew nothing about him.

43. Catching hold of him by his hind legs and tail, and whirling him round, he hurled him lifeless to the top of the wood-apple (Kapittha) tree. The huge-bodied demon (who assumed his demonic form at the time of death) fell down along with wood-apples which were made to fall (with the impact of the huge dead body).

44. Astonished to see him fall, all children cried out, "Bravo! Well-done!" Gods being highly delighted, showered flowers.

45. The sole protectors of all the worlds became the two tenders of calves, and with the breakfast in their wallet, roamed about leading the calves in their charge to pasture.
46. On one occasion, all the cowherd boys wanted to take their respective herd of calves to water. They went to a tank\(^1\) of water, made the calves to drink and they also drank of it.

47. The boys saw there standing a monstrous creature like unto a peak of a mountain sundered by (Indra's) thunderbolt, and slipped (of the mountain) and they got terrified.

48. It was verily a powerful demon called Baka who assumed the form of a stork. Swooping down suddenly, the powerful monster with a sharp beak, swallowed up Krśṇa.

49. Perceiving Krśṇa swallowed up by a big crane, children like Balarāma (but not Balarāma) became stupefied like organs and senses of the body in the absence of the vital breath.

50. But Baka had to vomit out Krśṇa, the son of a cowherd (Nanda), but (as a matter of fact) the father of god Brahmā, the creator of the world, as Krśṇa burnt like fire the root of his palate. Finding him unhurt, Baka again attacked Krśṇa with his bill, to kill him.

51. As Baka, the friend of Kāṁsa, rushed at him, Krśṇa, the protector of the righteous\(^2\), caught hold of him by the two halves of the bill, and while the children were looking on, tore him up like a blade of grass in a sportive way, and brought delight to residents of the celestial world.

52. The denizens of heaven then showered the slayer of the demon Baka with jasmine and other flowers from the celestial garden Nandana, and praised him, expressing delight by blowing of conchs, and sounding of drums, beholding which the cowherd boys stood agape with amazement.

53. On finding Krśṇa safely released from the mouth of Baka and return to the playground, children like Balarāma and others, like unto senses would do to the vital breath, embraced him and felt relieved and happy. Collecting their calves together, they returned to Vraja and reported (sang) that exploit (of Krśṇa).

\(^1\) VT. locates it to the east of the Nandiśvara hill, near the spot now known as baka-sthāna.

\(^2\) v.l. satāṁ gatiḥ 'The final abode of the righteous'—VT.
54. Astonished to hear it, Gopa men and women, who had an intensely loving regard for him, gazed him with eager (lit. thirsty) eyes, as if he had returned from the land of the dead.

55. They said, “how wonderful yet pitiable that this child should have so many mortal enemies. However, it is they who suffered the evil consequences, as they spelt terror to others previously.

56. Howsoever terrible-looking the demons be, they dare not and cannot overpower him at all. Approaching him with a desire to kill, they themselves get destroyed like moths in fire.

57. Oh! The words of those who are conversant with the Brahman, never prove to be untrue. What the worshipful Garga predicted has been exactly found to be true (by experience).”

58. In this way, recounting with joys the stories of Kṛṣṇa and Rāma, Nanda and other cowherds passed their time happily and did not experience the agonies of saṁsāra.

59. In this way, they (Kṛṣṇa and Rāma) passed their childhood at Vraja in child-like sports such as hide-and-seek, constructing dams in play, jumping like monkeys and the like.

CHAPTER TWELVE

Slaying of Aghāsura

Śrī Śuka said:

1. One day, intending to have his break-fast (first meal) in the woods, Hari got up early in the morning and woke up his fellow cowherd boys (tending the calves) by the charming sound of his horn, and proceeded from Vraja with calves going in front.

1. VJ.’s text omits this and the next two chapters. The omission is noted and the chapters are annotated by SS., VR., VB., JG., and VG. who express their disapproval of this omission. But VT.’s tirade against this omission is vehement.
2. Immediately, at that clarion-call rushed forth joyfully thousands\(^1\) of affectionate young boys simultaneously, equipping themselves with slings, sticks, horns and flutes, each driving his own herd of thousands of calves.

3. It is traditionally reported that making their own calves join the herd of innumerable calves of Kṛṣṇa, and grazing them, they diverted themselves in children’s games at various places.

4. Although they were already adorned (by their mothers) with glass-beads, Guṇjā seeds, precious stones and gold ornaments, they decorated themselves with fruits, tender foliage, bunches of flowers, feathers and coloured earths.

5. They stole the slings and other objects belonging to each other, and when detected, they threw them at a distance. Boys who were sitting there threw them still further laughing all the while, returning them (to the respective owners when they were on the point of shedding tears).

6. If Kṛṣṇa had gone to a distance to observe the beauty of the forest, they vied with each other in touching Kṛṣṇa first and enjoyed themselves (in this competition).

7. Some played on the flutes; some blew their horns, some sang humming (hummed) in tune with black-bees, some imitated the sweet notes of the cuckoo.

8. Some ran with the shadows of the (flying) birds; some walked beautifully like royal swans; some sat down with the cranes, while others danced with peacocks.

9. Some pulled monkey’s tails dangling down from branches of trees, while others climbed trees along with the tails in hand. Some were making wry faces at monkeys while others were jumping from one branch to another (like monkeys).

10. Hopping with frogs, some became drenched with the waters of the streams and waterfalls; some were laughing at their own shadows (while making faces at one’s own reflection), while others cursed their own echoes.

11. In this way, the cowherd boys who amassed a vast fund of merits (in the past), played with Kṛṣṇa who was to the knowers the veritable Brahmaṇ, with all the realization of the \(^1\) Innumerable—: atsānam bālānāṁ ca asaṁkhya-yutvam uktam—VT., VG.

absolute bliss, the Supreme Deity to the devotees who dedicated themselves to his service, and a human child to those who are under the influence of Māyā or Ignorance.

12. Is it possible to describe the blessedness and good fortune of the inhabitants of Vraja unto whose ken of perception he presented himself in person? The Lord, the dust of whose feet cannot be obtained (and attained to) by the self-controlled yogīs who have performed austerities for many past lives.

13. Now (on one occasion), a powerful demon named Agha who could not tolerate the sight of their happy games, attacked the demon whose vulnerable point i.e. death was eagerly watched over even by immortals who had been anxious to safeguard their lives (from him), even though they assimilated (drunk) nectar (and hence had no fear from death).¹

14. Seeing the Gopa children of whom Kṛṣṇa was the leader, the demon Agha, the younger brother of Baki (Pūtanā) and Baka (the demon killed by Kṛṣṇa), who was deputed by Karīsa (to kill Kṛṣṇa) said to himself, “This is the slayer of my brother and sister. To avenge them both I shall now kill Kṛṣṇa along with his army (of cowherd boys).

15. When these (Kṛṣṇa and his cowherd companions) are killed (and thus are made as if propitiatory libations of sesamum seeds and water to my departed brother and sister), all the residents of Vraja are as good as dead. Why worry

¹. Or ŚR.: The sight of their happy games which even gods who have drunk nectar are anxious to realize in their hearts, to sustain their life thereby.

Life is not really fruitful by drinking nectar but by drinking the ambrosia of the Lord’s name and by remembering and contemplating the sports of the glorious Lord.

K.D.: Gods who attained immortality by drinking nectar wish to take a birth as mortals on the earth, and participate in singing the eulogy of Kṛṣṇa’s exploits.

VT. takes amara as ‘Liberated beings who, being free from gross and subtle bodies, are immortal’. Though they have imbibed amṛta or Mokṣa, they desire to take a Lilāvigraha (sportive body) to participate in Hari’s sport.

According to Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavism, a soul does not lose his individuality in the Mokṣa stage.

about the Physical body when the vital breath (life) is departed? And all those who live (as human beings) have (i.e. consider) their children as their very life."

16. Having made up his mind thus, wicked demon assumed a gigantic body of a boa-constrictor one yojana (eight miles) in length and stout like a big mountain, and with a desire to swallow them all, he lay motionless on their path, with his flabbergasting cavelike mouth kept wide open.

17. His lower lip lay on the earth, while the upper lip touched the clouds; the mouth between them appeared like a vale; his fangs were like summits of mountains, and the interior Part of his mouth was full of darkness; his tongue was like a broad road; his breath was like a tempestuous blast, while his enraged red hot eyes were (scorching) like a forest-conflagration.

18. Beholding him in that form, all regarded it as a beautiful landscape of Vṛndāvana. And in a sportive mood they fancied its semblance to the open mouth of a boa-constrictor.

19. (The children began to talk about it as follows: "Ah! How wonderful! Tell us friends, if this animal like formation (living mountain) standing before us, does or does not resemble the open mouth of a gigantic wicked serpent anxious to devour us all?"

20. (Another boy) "Really! The cloud reddened with rays of the sun looks like his upper lip, while the earth grown red through the reflection (of the cloud) looks like the lower lip."

21. (The third boy) "Look here! The mountain Caverns on its right as well as on the left are as if competing with the jaws; and the rows of lofty mountain-summits as it were vie with its fangs.

22. The broad and long road is vying with its tongue, while the darkness pent up in between the peaks, emulates the darkness in the internal part of its mouth.

23. Look here! The fierce blast of wind heated by forest fire feels like its breath, and the bad odour of animals burnt in that forest fire stinks like the flesh of animals in the stomach of a serpent.
24. "Will he swallow us all if we enter his mouth? In that case, like Bakāsura, he will meet his death in a moment at the hands of Kṛṣṇa". Saying so, and looking at the fascinating face of Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of Baka, they all entered (that mouth) laughing loudly and clapping their hands.

25. Hearing the mutual discussion—which was far removed from reality—of his friends who were ignorant of the factual state of things, Kṛṣṇa knew that that was really a demon simulating the form of a serpent, as the Lord is present in the hearts of all creatures. The Lord made up his mind to prevent his companions from entering the demon’s mouth.

26. In the meanwhile, the children along with the calves entered into the bowels of that demon. But they were not swallowed up by that ogre who remembered the slaying of his dear ones, and was expecting the entry of the slayer of Baka viz. Kṛṣṇa.

27. Lord Kṛṣṇa, who affords protection to all, was moved with compassion to see the helpless children and calves who had no other saviour, and who having slipped out of (the protective control of) his hands, had become the victims of the gastric fire of the demon. He was surprised at the working of the Providence.

28. "What should be done now? How both the objects viz. the termination of the life of this wicked (demon) and averting the death of these pious innocents, can be achieved?" Pondering over this problem, and knowing the expedient, the omniscient Hari entered his (Aghāsura’s) mouth.

29. At that instant, gods who were behind the curtain of clouds, shrieked in terror bewailing ‘Alas! Alas’, while the demonic friends of Aghāsura of whom Karṇa was prominent, exulted in joy.

30. Hearing those (cries and shouts of joy), the Imperishable glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa instantly increased himself in huge dimensions into the throat of that demon who desired to crush to powder Kṛṣṇa along with children and calves.

31. All the passage of breath of that huge-bodied monster was choked, and his eyes shot out of their sockets. He was writhing on all sides. His breath being completely obstructed in his lungs, forced its way out through an aperture in the crown of its head called Brahma randhra.

32. When all the vital breaths of the demon passed out that way, Lord Kṛṣṇa revived to life with his nectarine look, all his friends and calves who were as good as dead, and came out of the mouth of the demon again, along with them.

33. A mysterious and powerful light setting ablaze (as it were) all the ten directions, with its brilliant effulgence, rose from the huge body of the serpent. It waited in the firmament for the coming out of the Lord (from the serpent’s mouth) and (immediately) entered his person while all the residents of the celestial world simply looked on in amazement.

34. Overjoyed at the accomplishment of their purpose by Kṛṣṇa, the jubilant gods offered their worship by showering flowers, the celestial damsels, through dancing, Gandharvas, experts in vocal music, with singing, those well-versed in instrumental music, by playing on their instruments, Brāhmaṇas (like Nārada) through singing hymns of praise, and his attendants and followers (like Garuḍa and others) with shouts of victory.

35. Hearing in the vicinity of his abode (Satya Loka) the auspicious and joyous sounds of wonderful hymns of praise, instrumental and vocal music and shouts of victory, god Brahmā, immediately came to the spot and was wonder-struck at the glorious feat of the Lord.

36. Oh King! When the hide of that weird boa-constrictor became dry, it served for a long time as a hiding place in playing (like a big cave) to the residents of Vraja.

37. Witnessing the exploit of Hari, as a child of five years, in rescuing them from death (from Aghāsura) and the demon-serpent from death (involved in rebirth in Samsāra), the cowherd boys of Vraja told to each other of it in his sixth year with equal astonishment.
38. That even a demon like Agha should get his sins absolved by his touch, and should get absorbed in him—an attainment extremely difficult for the unrighteous, is not to be wondered at in the case of Hari who has assumed through his Māyā, the form of a human child, but who is (really) the Creator of all beings, great and small.

39. Even if the semblance of the personality of the Lord is once installed in one’s heart in meditation, it leads to the attainment of divine position. What indeed would he not give to Aghāsura in whom he had actually entered, as he had warded off Māyā by the eternal realization of the bliss of his Divine self.¹

Sūta said:

40. Oh Śaunaka and other Brāhmaṇas! Having heard this wonderful story of his saviour, king Parikṣit, who was a gift (whose life was protected in womb) by Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Yādavas, found his heart fascinated with it, and again requested Śuka, the Son of Vyāsa, to narrate the same sacred story about him.

The King (Parikṣit) submitted²

41. Oh Brāhmaṇa Sage! You said just now that what was done by Hari in his childhood stage of five years, was sung by the cowherd boys in the sixth year (in the paugaṇḍa stage)³. Now could an act done at a distant time, can be regarded as done in the present time.

42. Be pleased to narrate to me, Oh Great Yogin, as I feel great curiosity about it. How can it be possible unless it is due to the deluding power (Māyā) of Hari, Oh preceptor.

43. Though we are (after all) ordinary Kṣatriyas we are the blessed-most persons in this world, inasmuch as we can

1. Here ends the XIII Chapter in VR.
2. Ch. XIII in VR. begins here.
3. The following are names of different stages in life: childhood Kaumāra to the end of the 5th year, boyhood (Paugaṇḍa) to the end of the 10th year Adolescence (Kiśora, to the end of the 15th year, Youth after the 15th year (Yauwana).
repeatedly drink the hallowing nectar in the form of stories of Lord Kṛṣṇa from you.

Sūta said:

44. Oh the most excellent devotee of the Lord! When thus queried, Śuka, the son of Bādarāyaṇa who lost his senses (i.e. consciousness), due to his immersion in contemplation about Kṛṣṇa when reminded of the Lord by Parīkṣit’s question, slowly regained his consciousness of the external world (with difficulty), and began to narrate.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Infatuation of God Brahmā

Śrī Śuka said:

1. A good query has been made by you, Oh highly fortunate king. By listening to the stories of the Lord again and again, you bring new charm to them (by your intelligent questions), Oh best of Hari’s votaries.

2. It is the nature of the righteous persons who assimilate only the essentials, that, just as the topic of young damsels is ever fresh and fascinating to gallants¹, the auspicious stories of Lord Acyuta (who never slips from rasa appear with fresh sweetness every moment to them, though their speech, ears and minds are devoted to them).

3. Listen to me attentively, Oh king, for I am disclosing to you a secret; for preceptors confide what is even confidential and most hidden, to their loving disciples.

4. Having saved the cowherd boys from death in the mouth of the demon Agha in the aforesaid manner, the Lord brought them to the sandy bank of the river, and spoke as follows:

¹. If an extremely disgustible object like a woman can become an object of ever fresh sweetness and love, what need be said about the glorious Lord—VT.
5. “Extremely beautiful is this bank of soft, clean, stainless sand, so spacious and suitable for our sports, oh friends! It is encircled by beautiful trees, rendered fascinating by the echoing notes and humming of bees attracted here by the sweet smell of blooming lotuses.

6. Let us have our meal here. It is high time now as the day is considerably advanced and we are oppressed with hunger. Let the calves drink water and leisurely graze the grass nearby.”

7. Approving of his proposal, (lit. saying ‘so be it’), they led the calves to drink water and set them to graze in the green pasture. Untying their slings (and opening their tiffin-boxes), they enjoyed the lunch with the Lord in great delight.

8. Sitting together closely round Kṛṣṇa in a number of circular rows, and all of them facing him with their eyes blooming fully, the boys of Vṛja shone (looked brilliant) like lotus-petals grown round the pericarp (of that lotus).

9. Some improvised flowers and leaves as dining plates, some tender leaves and shoots, some fruits, some their walletslings, some barks and slabs of stones (for plates), and they enjoyed their meals.

10. (Even though each boy participated something of the dishes, others had brought) each boy severally showed (by gestures etc.) the special taste of his own dish, laughing himself and making all others laugh. (In this way) all took their meals with the Lord (who also tasted something of the dish brought by each of them).

11. The presiding Deity and the Enjoyer of sacrifices as he was, he indulged in child-like sports, and with his flute between his belly and his pitāmbara (silken loin cloth) and his horn and cane under the left arm (pit), and holding a soft morsel of boiled rice mixed with curds and (choice eatable) fruits held in between his fingers of his left hand, he occupied a

1. VC. explains that it was Kṛṣṇa who, being ‘possessed of hands, feet, eyes, heads and faces in all directions’ (sarvataḥ pāni-śādaṁ tat sarvato'ksis-tiro-mukhāṁ) faced each of them, making each elated to feel that he alone had the privilege of facing him directly—a blessing denied to others.

KD. : The boys lost their individuality in Kṛṣṇa (13.24-28).

2. Belt-like garment round the waist. (KD).
central position in the circle of his friends, and made them to laugh by cracking jokes—And gods from the celestial regions simply looked on (envious that they are not lucky enough to participate).

12. As the cowherd boys whose minds were absorbed in Lord Kṛṣṇa were having their repast, the calves, being allured by luxuriantly grown pasture, strayed away deep into the woods, oh scion of Bharata.

13. Perceiving that they were overwhelmed with fear (at the straying away of calves), Kṛṣṇa, the terror to the terrors of the world, reassured them, saying, “Friends, (Don’t worry—lit. cast aside all your fears). Please do not disturb your meal. I shall fetch all the calves here”.

14. With these words, while the morsel of boiled rice mixed with curds was in his hand, Kṛṣṇa went in search of his calves over the mountains, in caverns, in bushes and thick jungle.

15. God Brahmā (the lotus-born god)¹ who formerly stood in heaven to witness the release (of the cowherd boys and calves) from Aghāṣura and was greatly astonished, desired to see another sweet feat of the Lord who assumed the form of a child through his Māyā power, and he lifted up the calves and abducted the cowherd boys, and carried them to some place and vanished himself.

16. Not being able to find the calves, and failing to see the cowherd boys on the sandy bank, Kṛṣṇa searched for both of them all round.

17. Not finding either the calves or their protectors (cowherd boys) anywhere within that forest, Kṛṣṇa who knows everything in the Universe, understood it to be the work of god Brahmā.

18. Thereupon, with a view to bring joy to the mothers of the cowherd-boys (by restoring their children and calves), as well as to god Brahmā (by allowing the boys and calves to remain in his charge), Kṛṣṇa, the Maker and the Controller of the Universe, converted himself both (into the cowherd boys and the calves).

¹. Vṛ. suggests a pun on jala (ʃa) due to the interchangeability of -d- and -l-. A lotus is born out of jala (water) which is jada (wanting in intelligence) and god Brahmā is born out of that knowledgeless inert being called lotus. Hence his own intelligence shares the stupidity of its heredity.

19. Having exactly changed him into the same size and number of small bodies of the cowherd boys and calves, with same proportion and size of their limbs like hand, feet etc., taking with them the same (number and size of) sticks, horns, flutes, decorative leaves on the head, slings and wearing the same clothes and ornaments, and assuming the same goodness of nature (or character), accomplishments, name, form and age as well as their ways of sporting etc. (of each individual), the birthless Lord Kṛṣṇa, being thus identical with all forms, shone there as a concrete illustration, proving the veracity of the Vedic text: “Everything in the universe is pervaded by Viṣṇu.”

20. Having converted himself into the form of calves which were tended back by his ownself in the form of cowherd boys, and playing with his own forms, Kṛṣṇa, the self and the self of all, entered Vraja.

21. Having taken the respective calves separately to their own houses, and tying them into their respective stalls, he entered the respective houses of the cowherd boys and stayed there in their form, oh King.

22. Rising hurriedly at the sound of the flutes, the mothers (of the cowherd boys) raised them up and hugged them fast in their arms. With their breasts overflowing with milk of motherly affection which was sweet like nectar and inebriating, they suckled the Para Brahman mistaking him for their children.

23. Observing the time-schedule of games etc., during different parts of the day, and returning in time in the evening at the usual time, Kṛṣṇa (the consort of Lakṣmī) in the form of a cowherd boy) was fondled and treated with shampooing, bathing, anointing (with sandal paste, pigments etc.), decorating (with ornaments), evil-warding rites, applying the decorative mark (tilaka) on the forehead, feeding (with dishes) etc. (by the Gopīs). He also filled them with great joy by his sportive winsome ways.

24. Thereupon the cows returned hurriedly to their own pens, and inviting their respective calves by their specific lowing-calls, suckled them with milk overflowing from their udders, licking the calves (all over), every now and then.

25. The maternal affection of the kine and the Gopīs towards him (in the form of calves and cowherd boys), was the same as before, except that their affection grew more ardent, and Hari’s behaviour towards them as (their) child was the same as before, but there was no delusion (in Kṛṣṇa’s relation with them, as was in the case of their real children).

26. (In this way) for one year, the affection of the residents of Vraja towards their children grew gradually every day (as they were the parts amāsas of the Lord), but in the case of Kṛṣṇa it developed in an unprecedented way and became unlimited (as he was the amātin—the Lord himself).

27. In this way, protecting and being tended himself in the form of calves, by himself, in the capacity of cowherd boys, he sported himself for one year, in the forest, as well as in Vraja.

28. One day, while it was some five or six days to complete the period of a year, Kṛṣṇa, along with Balarāma entered the forest, while they were tending the calves.

29. The cows which were grazing grass on the top of the Govardhana hill saw from afar their calves pasturing near Vraja.

30. As soon as the herd of cows saw them, they being overpowered with affection for the calves, forgot themselves. They rushed by a path difficult to be followed by their protectors (cowherds). Like bipeds (due to fast running on all fours), with their necks contracted towards their humps and with tails raised up, they dashed on speedily bellowing (all the while), and with milk oozing out of their udders, all the way.

31. Coming down to the foot of the Govardhana hill, the cows, though they had their own calves, suckled them with the milk from their udders, licking the bodies of the calves (with such intense eagerness) as if they wanted to swallow them.

32. Being extremely angry at their disgrace and inability in restraining and controlling the cows, and making their way with great difficulty through the inaccessible hilly track, they saw their sons, along with the calves.

33. With their hearts submerged in (i.e. overwhelmed with) affection at the sight of their children and with filial love surging in them, they forgot their anger, and raising their children with their arms and embracing them, they smelt on the crowns of their heads and were enraptured.

34. Then the grown-up Gopas who felt extremely happy at the embrace of their children, withdrew slowly with a heavy heart from that place with tears gushing out at their memory.

35. Observing the intense longing and love growing every moment in the heart of Vraja (people and the cows) for their children (and calves), though weaned away from their mother's breast, Balarāma failed to understand its reason and began to think:

36. "It is really wonderful that the affection of the people of Vraja—and I am no exception to it—towards their children is increasing in intensity by leaps and bounds as never before, as it did in the case of Vāsudeva, the soul of the whole of the universe.

37. What infatuation is this? Whence has it emerged? Is this delusion caused by gods, men or demons? Most probably it must be the deluding potency of my Lord and of none else, as it enchants even me (No other Māyā has this power of deluding me)."

38. Giving deep thought to the matter, Balarāma, of the Dāśārha clan, saw through his spiritual eye (lit. the eye of knowledge) that all the calves and his cowherd friends were the Lord Kṛṣṇa himself.

39.* (Balarāma asked Kṛṣṇa)—"These (cowherd boys) are not the rulers of gods. Nor are these (cows) the sages (as I know them to be). It is you who appear in these different forms. Be pleased to tell me, how all this took place." The Lord briefly explained which Balarāma could grasp correctly.

39A. \textit{VR.’s text adds}:

(When Brahmā returned after hiding the cows and cowherd boys to \textit{Satya loka}) Even Brahmā was disallowed by

*(1) SS. Balarama wanted to know how the Lord though one became many. Here SS. quotes \textit{Tait-Upan. 2.5 vijñānāh ca vijñānāh ca Satyān ca sāntam ca satyaṁ abhavat}.

(2) \textit{VR.} ‘Be pleased to tell how you who are the one, came to be many.’ Kṛṣṇa explained that as stated in the Vedas, He accomplished it through His Will. Balarāma came to understand it now.
his own doorkeepers who were deluded by Kṛṣṇa who assumed the four-faced form and occupied his (Brahmā's) seat in the satyaloka, and he had to go back.

40. When the self-born god (Brahmā) returned in a quarter of a moment or half (the time of winking of eyes) according to his measure of time which amounted to one human year, he saw Hari playing as before with all his companions, even at the end of the year.

41. "Whatever number of children there was in Gokula along with the calves—all of them are stupefied and lying in the bed of my Māyā-power and none of them has awakened.

42. Who are these and whence have they come as they are other than those who are under the spell of my deluding power? They are the same in number and have been playing with Kṛṣṇa (Viṣṇu—the all-pervading Lord) for a period of one year.

43. Pondering for a long time on these differences (between children under his spell and those playing with Kṛṣṇa), the self-born god Brahmā could not, even with difficulty, distinguish between those (children and calves) who were real and who were not.

44. Thus in his attempt to delude Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa) who transcends all delusion, yet is deluding the whole universe, god
Brahmā found himself enchanted by his own deluding capacity.

45. Just as the darkness caused by a drop of mist (becomes absorbed in the darkness of night, and like the light emitted by the fire-fly gets merged in the broad day-light, similarly lower type of māyā (deluding power) when used against a superior person loses its effectiveness and is lost to the user.

46. And Lo! While god Brahmā was looking on, in a moment all the cowherds appeared dark as cloud in complexion and wearing silken yellow garments.

47. (They were) endowed with four arms wielding in each hand a conch, a discus, a mace and a lotus; (they were) wearing crowns, ear-rings, pearl-necklace and wreaths of sylvain flowers.

48. (They were) adorned with Śrī-vatsa (a curl of golden hair on the right bosom), armlets (aṅgada) and a pair of bejeweled bracelets marked with three lines like conchs, on their wrists.

48A. VR.’s text:

With their chest beautified by Śrī-vatsu and with kaustubha gem-ependant round the neck, they appeared shining with anklets, bangles, girdles and rings.

49. All over their persons, from head to foot, they were beautified with wreaths of tender, fresh Tulasi offered to them by highly meritorious (devotees).

50. With their smiles bright like the moon-light (the whiteness of which represents the sattva-guna, whose function is the protection and preservation of the world) and with their side-long glances from their reddish eyes (the reddishness of which stands for the rajo-guna the function of which is the creation of the world), they looked like the creators and protectors of the desires of their votaries (they fulfilled whatever desire aroused in the heart of their devotees) with the help of sattva and rajas.¹

51. They were adored severally by means of dancing, singing and offering many other courses of worship by all embodied beings, mobile and immobile, from Brahmā’s own self to a clump of grass, all endowed with a corporeal form.

52. They were waited upon all around by mystic powers like aniṃā (power of becoming atomic in size) and by potencies such as Māyā, Vidyā and by twenty-four principles (enumerated by Saṅkhyaśas) beginning with Mahat (—all assuming the forms of persons).

53. They were also attended upon by the Time-spirit² (which sets in motion the process of creation by disturbing the balance of the guṇas of Prakṛti), Nature, Saṃskāras (latent desires or proclivities), Desire (for enjoyment), Activity, the three guṇas—all assuming corporal forms, with their glories eclipsed by the Lord.

54. All of them were embodiments of the one absolute essence consisting of reality, knowledge and infinite bliss. Their greatness and glory were incomprehensible even to those who have obtained the vision of Upaniṣadic knowledge.

¹. They appeared like Protectors with their white sattva-like smiles and shone with their reddish side-glances like creators by the reddish-rajās guṇa—ŚR.

². C. Kaḷāḥ svabhāvo niyati ruddhyecō etc.—ŚV. U. 1.2

55. It was only once that Brahmā espied that all those forms were identical with the Supreme Brahman by whose light the universe both mobile and immobile, animate and inanimate stands revealed.1

56. Thereupon, when god Brahmā, out of great curiosity and wonder, directed his eyes elsewhere (towards himself or to his seat on the swan, he was so over-whelmed by the spiritual effulgence of the Lord that all his eleven sense-organs (five conative, five cognitive senses and the mind) became dazed and motionless; And he stood still and silent like a statuette of a secondary deity by the side of the presiding deity of that settlement (Vraja).

57. When Brahmā, the Lord of Sarasvatī (the goddess of learning) who was incapable of comprehending Lord Kṛṣṇa's (or the Supreme Brahman's) special glory and greatness, became confused about Brahman which is beyond the reach of logical reasoning, and is thus incomprehensible—Brahman which stands resplendent in its perfect bliss; is far above and beyond Māyā, and is unborn, and can be known only through the Vedaṅgic (Upaniṣadic) texts which describe It in the negative terms (neti, neti—'It is not so, It is not such'), and he could not even perceive the manifestation at all, Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Unborn Lord immediately understood god Brahmā's perplexity, and drew off the curtain of his Māyā.

58. Thereupon god Brahmā whose vision to view the outside world was restored, opened his eyes with difficulties like a person brought back to life from death, and verily saw again this whole universe along with himself.

59. Immediately he cast his eyes around in all directions and found stretched before him the (vista of) Vṛndāvana forest abounding in treec providing the means of subsistence to people, and with desirable objects² (necessities of life) in plenty.

2. SS., VT. interpret 'samapriya' as :

(i) Vṛndāvana, Govardhana etc. Liked by Lord Kṛṣṇa or (ii) along with Lord Kṛṣṇa who was dear to goddess Lākṣmi (mā).
60. In that forest, men, deer and other animals who are (normally) inimical by nature, lived together as friends, and from which hatred, covetousness (and other passions) had disappeared due to the presence of Kṛṣṇa.

61. (ŚR.) brings out the full significance of every attribute of Kṛṣṇa thus:

And Brahmā, the highest deity in the Universe, perceived the Lord acting before him the part of a child born in the family of cowherd—The Lord who, though without a second, was searching for calves, though absolutely one, was (trying to find) his friends (cowherd boys), though endowed with unfathomable knowledge, was attempting to search them (as if he did not know); though he was Infinite and omnipresent, he was looking around; though he was the Supreme Lord, he was behaving like a child, and though the Brahman himself, he held a morsel of food in his hand.

62. As soon as he beheld it, Brahmā hastily alighted from his mount (swan) and lay prostrate before him like a stuff of gold on the ground. Touching his pair of feet with the crest of his four crowns, he paid respects to him and bathed his feet with his holy tears of joy.

63. And repeatedly remembering the great glory of the Lord witnessed by him up till now, he rose again and again to lay prostrate at his feet for a long time.

64. Thereupon, rising up gradually, he rubbed his eyes. Looking up intently at Hari but with a bent head, he folded his palms and with great humility and concentration of mind, he, with his body trembling with emotions and in a faltering voice, chanted the praise of the Lord.
CHAPTER FOURTEEN

God Brahmā eulogizes Kṛṣṇa

Brahmā said:

1. I submit my eulogium unto you, Oh praiseworthy Lord (in the form of) the child of the cowherd Nanda—The Lord whose personality is dark-blue like a rainy cloud, in complexion; (who is) clad in silken garments resplendent like lightning; whose sublimely charming face appears glorious with ornaments of Gaurā seeds and a crest of peacock feathers; (who is) adorned with wreaths of sylvain foliage and flowers; whose splendid beauty is enhanced with a morsel of food (in the left hand), a cane and a horn (under left arm-pit) and flute and other emblems and whose feet are soft and tender.

2. Even though I am (god) Brahmā (the creator of the world), I am not really competent to comprehend even with my mind concentrated (inwardly) this corporeal form of yours which you have revealed to me for showering your Grace on me1—a form you assumed at your sweet will (or as desired by your devotees) but is not composed of elements2 (gross or subtle). Much less can I comprehend directly you who (being transcendental to guṇas) are absolute bliss of The Self.3

3. Oh Lord! Unconquerable as you are in the three

1. SS. It is impossible for me to comprehend any form you assume in your incarnations, and the greatness of your attributes, unless you, who are the absolute truth, bliss and consciousness condescend to enable me to do so, out of grace.

2. ŠN. (Śrīnivāsa-Sūri)—A follower of Rāmānuja :—The personality of the Supreme Self (God) is never composed of elements:

na bhūta-saṅgha-samsthāno dehosya paramāmnanaḥ | quotes Śrīnivāsa-Sūri (ŚN). It is through His Grace that His all-pervading sentient-cum-nonsentient personality can be grasped with pure mind.

3. VB and GD. : Eulogy is the description of greatness. But even though you, out of grace unto me, have assumed this form, it is impossible for me to comprehend even this, with all the capacity of pure mind concentrated within. Need it be told that it is impossible for me to comprehend the greatness of your self of absolute existence, consciousness and bliss.
worlds, you appear conquered by those (devotees) who, giving up all efforts in attaining knowledge, lead their life reverentially paying their respects with their body, speech and mind, to your stories (spontaneously recounted by the righteous), as they come to their ears without leaving their homes (but by remaining in the company of those pious devotees). (What is the propriety in exerting for knowledge?)

4*. Nothing else but sheer exertions only like those who engage themselves in pounding merely the outer husk of grains (which contains no grains and as such yield no food-grains at all by this labour of pounding), is the resultant lot of those who, neglecting the path of devotion which is the fountain head of all blessings in the form of material prosperity here and liberation from Samsāra hereafter, undergo troubles to attain mere knowledge only, Oh Omnipresent Lord!

5. Oh Infinite Lord! In days of old, in this (very) world, a number of yogins (who failed to attain spiritual wisdom by the path of yoga) dedicated all their desires and activities unto you, and obtained the knowledge of their self only through Devotion awakened in them by the resignation of their activities and desires (to you), and by virtue of listening to your stories, and thus they easily attained to your Supreme Nature (Godhead), Oh Acyuta.

6. It is, however, possible, Oh Almighty Lord, to comprehend your glory properly by the pure-souled ones (who have thoroughly controlled their senses) through their personal realization of the self, who is above modifications and

* (i) SS., VR., SN. The pursuit of the Self by following the path of knowledge (brushing aside the path of devotion) results in nothing but mere afflictions as stated in BG 12.5:

Klesādīraka-tras teśām aṣya kāṅsaka-cetasām /

(ii) VB. : Bhakti (Devotion) is like the Wish-yielding-gem (Gītāmāni). It confers knowledge of the self as well. But mere pursuit of self-knowledge is sheer affliction and does not bear any fruit (Klesāyuktah, na tu phalayuktah). It does not yield secondary or unessential fruit or even incidental (praśāntika) fruit.

(iii) KD. interprets bhakti (devotion) as abheda bhakti (in which the distinction between the devotee and God disappears). Bhakti itself is the essential knowledge (Bhakti tecī mukhya Jñāna), and people reached nirvāṇa (Liberation) through bhakti only (14.4.31-89) transcends all forms, for it is self-illuminating (and as such is beyond objective perception in "this—that relation") and not by any other way.

7. Has anyone ever been able even to calculate (and estimate) your attributes when you are verily their actual support and controller—especially when you have incarnated for the well-being of the universe by manifesting innumerable qualities? Nobody, even if he be so exceptionally competent and clever as to count minutely all the particles of the (dust on the) earth, or the dew-drops in the sky, or the luminous particles in the rays of the sun, in a span of many births.¹

8. He who, eagerly and anxiously waiting for your compassion and grace, experiences (in a detached manner), the fruits of his (past) actions and leads a life of complete reverential submission unto you, in thought word and deed, becomes a partner in the State of Liberation⁸ (as if it is his ancestral property).

9. Oh Almighty Lord! Look at this wicked foolhardiness of mine. Extremely insignificant as I am (before you of whom I am born) like a flame of fire emanating from (the universe consuming) conflagration, I, with a view to see the exhibition of my magnificent grandeur, tried to cover (delude) even you with my mayā when you are the Infinite, Eternal, Supreme Self, the Deluder of the deluders.

10. Hence, Oh Imperishable Lord, be pleased to forgive me who am born of rajas and therefore steeped in ignorance. Under the false notion that I am the real Supreme Ruler independent of you, I became blind by my arrogant ignorance of being the real birthless creator of the universe. Therefore this person (I, Brahmā) may please be regarded as deserving your grace (pity) as he (I) has a protector in you.

11. What am I after all, but an insignificant being invested with a body of seven spans (according to my humble

---

KD—Sukalpa—Span of life extending over innumerable births.

2. J.G.B. (JG.'s Brhatkrama-sandarbha): Become an attendant (pārśada) of Viṣṇu in this very life.
measure), and confined in a momentary perishable small pot-like egg called the world, covered with the sheaths of tāmas i.e. Prakṛti (Primordial matter), mahat (cosmic intelligence), ahamkāra (cosmic ego), elements like the ether, air, fire, water and earth? How infinitely great is your glory?¹ The pores (of the skin) of whose body are like ventilators through which innumerable egg-like universes (each as big as mine) flow in and out like atoms. How can I stand any comparison with you? (Being extremely insignificant, compassion may kindly be shown to me of your own accord (Sanātana Gosvāmi’s Bhāhat Tōṣāṇī).

12. Oh Lord, transcendental to sense perception!² Does the raising of feet by the foetus become an offence against the mother? (No. On the contrary the mother is happy to feel that the child in her is alive and kicking. Hence whatever has been committed by me, does not constitute an offence). Is there anything described as being existent or non-existent outside your bowels?² (It behoves you to forgive all my offences with a motherly affection, as you have announced yourself (in BG.9.17) to be the father, mother and protector of the universe).

13. The traditional scriptural statement that Brahmā, the unborn god, was verily born of (lit. sprang from) the stalk of the lotus forming the umbilical cord of the navel of Nārāyaṇa lying on the cosmic waters of the deluge, caused by commingling all the seas, at the end of the three worlds, is not false. Am I not thus born of you Oh Lord?

14* Are you not Nārāyaṇa? Yes, you are Nārāyaṇa inasmuch as you are the soul of all embodied creatures, who ¹ Adhokṣaja: As I owe all the power of my senses etc. to you, no act committed by me be taken as an offence—VT.

² All the sentient and non-sentient universe born of you and ultimately is being absorbed in you, is insignificant like an atom and is within you—SS.

*This verse gives or rather implies different popular etymologies of ‘Nārāyaṇa’. SR gives them as follows

Nārāṁ Jivasamūhaḥ, ayanam ātrayaḥ—
thus form your dwelling place (and nāra means the aggregate of living beings). You are Nārāyaṇa as you are the Lord who preside over and promote life in all beings, and being the witness to the entire universe, you alone know them all. You are the Nārāyaṇa—the Deity that abide in (and thus are the basis) of all the twenty-four principles evolved out of Nara, as well as waters—your abode for reposing, which is the evolute of Nara who is also your part. Even your reposing on water is also not true, but your māyā, as your form is indiscernible.

15. (Your form is beyond accurate determination or ascertainment, for) If your form which is the basic support of the world, reposed on cosmic waters in reality, how is it that I could not see it at that time when I tried for one hundred years to explore through the lotus-stalk out of which I came, (the source of my birth), Oh Lord of inconceivable power. Or why

(i) Nāra—aggregate of all beings; ayanam—abode. Hence one who dwells in all bodies as their soul.
(ii) Nārasya ayanam praṇītiḥ—The source of the Promoter of all the aggregate of jīvas.
(iii) Nāram ayas—You know the aggregate of all beings. ay—to know.
(iv) Nāra—that which is produced from Nara.
Nāra—water. Nārāyaṇa is one who dwells in or reposes on water.

The above etymologies are supported by SS., VR., etc. SN. quotes the following verses in support of the above etymologies.

nārāṇām ayanatva ca Nārāyaṇa iti smṛtaḥ / nāra-sabdena jivāṇām samūhaḥ pratyote budhaiḥ// tetām ayaṇa-bhūtatvā Nārāyaṇa iti smṛtaḥ / nāro narāṇām saṅghātās tasyāham ayanam gatiḥ / tenāsmi munibhir nityām Nārāyaṇa iti smṛtaḥ // cetanā cetanāṃ sarvām Viṣṇor yad caturīcyate / nāroh tadāyaṇam cedam yasya Nārāyaṇas tu saḥ //

VT. states that God’s reposing on cosmic water is not illusory (māyāka), because it, being a sportive act (līlā) of God, is real.
SG. explains, god Brahmā was so over-whelmed with the spiritual feat (of assuming the form of calves, cowherd boys etc.) that he regarded Lord Kṛṣṇa as greater than Nārāyaṇa, “Oh Kṛṣṇa you are not Nārāyaṇa, Oh Lord of the totality of Brahmāṇḍas (all the universe) is only your part or a ray?”

According to SG. Kṛṣṇa is the real, complete Supreme Person (Kṛṣṇas tu pūrṇa purnottamaḥ) was it that it became clearly visible to me in my heart when I performed severe penance and why was it that it instantly disappeared.1

16. It is here only in this your incarnation (as Kṛṣṇa) that you have clearly demonstrated the illusory nature of this entire external universe to your mother, by manifesting it completely in your abdomen, Oh dispeller of Māyā.

17. Just as this entire universe including yourself appears present in your bowels, it is also manifested the same way even outside your bowels. Is this (double manifestation) possible except through your deluding potency.

18. Has not the illusory nature of this universe with the exception of your own self, been demonstrated to me by you even today?—At first (before I stole away the calves and the cowherd boys from Vraja) you were one. Then you assumed the forms of all your friends and calves from Vraja. You then revealed yourself in as many four-armed forms which were worshipped by all as well as by me. Then you became as many universes. You still remain the sole same Infinite Brahman without any second.2

19. To persons who are ignorant of your real nature,3 you, the all-pervading Lord abide in Prakṛti and you spread your Māyā at your free will, and appear (though one as many) as if you are myself (i.e. god Brahmā) at the creation of the Universe,

1. VB: As I am your son the parental relation requires mutual sights. How is it that I could not see you often?

2. V.B. In the ultimate analysis nothing but Brahman without a second remains and nothing else.

3. SG. The forms of calves and cowherd boys assumed by you were not illusory. Although whatever forms you manifested were discernible as separate, you are the second-less Brahman who baffle (all attempts at) discernment. What remains is your own self, the Brahman characterised by Truth, Knowledge, infinite Bliss.

3. JG.—Those who do not comprehend your greatness call this all as Māyā and not the working of your yogic power which is indescribable. The process of creation, protection or destruction of the world or assumption of the forms of calves and cowherds is not jugglery or Māyā, but your real sport at your free will.

Padavi—The path of devotion (SG., VG.) and anātmani—‘In the body.’
as yourself i.e. Viṣṇu for its protection, and as the three-eyed god Śiva, at the time of the dissolution of the universe.

20. Oh Creator and Controller of the Universe! Unborn as you are, you incarnate among gods (e.g. Vāmana), sages (e.g. Vyāsa), as well as among men (e.g. Rāma and Kṛṣṇa), sub-human beings (e.g. beasts as in the Boar incarnation) and aquatic animals (the Fish and Tortoise incarnations) for subduing the pride of the wicked, and showering grace on the righteous and saintly people\(^1\), Oh Lord!

21. Oh Supreme Lord! The receptacle of infinite powers (like knowledge, power, energy etc.)! The In-dweller in the hearts of all! Who knows (or is capable of knowing) the nature, time, place, extent of your sportive acts in which you indulge, after spreading out (exhibiting) your Yogic (deluding) Potency, in these three worlds, Oh Master of Yoga.

22. Hence, though this entire world which is of unreal nature like dream-experience, devoid of intelligence and full of endless, innumerable miseries, appears and disappears in You who are infinite, eternal bliss and knowledge incarnate, and through Māyā it seems to be real and possessing your characteristics.

23. You are the only one Self (ātman) abiding in the bodies of living beings, the ancient-most, real, self-refulgent, infinite, first and foremost, eternal, imperishable person of unobstructed blissfulness, untainted (by any blemish or Māyā), perfect, without any second, free from limitations and immortal.

24. Those who, through correct upaniṣadic mystic vision obtained from the sun-like spiritual preceptors, properly comprehend you as being of the above description, as the self-abiding in all beings, and as their own soul, easily cross this ocean of Samsāra (metem-psychosis) which is (as a matter of fact) unreal.

25. In the case of those who do not comprehend the ātman (The Self) in its essential nature, the entire world or Samsāra is created due to this lack of understanding. But through realization and enlightenment (about his nature) the samsāra disappears again, as the appearance and disappearance of the body of a serpent (super-imposed through ignorance) on a rope (does before and after realization of the real nature of the rope).

\(^{1}\) Pari-trāṇāya sādhūnāṁ vinātiṣya ca duṣkrtām

—BG.4.8

26. The bondage of samsāra and Liberation from it, are terms which, as a matter of fact, are instituted through ignorance. They are not separate entities distinct from the reality characterised by truth and knowledge. When considered against the background of the absolute transcendental Paramātman of eternal consciousness, they cease to have separate existence, as do the day and night in the (sphere of the) sun.

27. How pitiable is the ignorance of these ignorant people that they consider you, their real self, as other (different from themselves), and their body as their very self. And thus they think that their real self is to be searched for outside in external objects.

28. Oh Infinite Lord! Righteous people really seek you within the body (which is composed of matter and the spirit), by discarding that which is 'Not-that' (non-self). Can pious men of accurate judgement arrive at that correct conclusion, that the rope lying near (which was mistaken for a serpent) is certainly a rope, unless they have negated the wrong superimposition of a serpent over that rope (through ignorance).

29. It is, however, he (your devotee) who is blest with the slightest grace of the pair of your lotus-like feet, who understands the real nature of the glory and power of the Lord, and not a person who is searching for it for a long time (but has not been favoured with your Grace), Oh Lord!

30. Oh Protector (of the universe)! May I be blessed with that great luck, whereby in this very life (of Brahmā) or in any other birth, even in sub-human beings, I shall be one of your devotees, and serve your foliage-like tender feet?

31. Oh! How highly blessed are the cows and women of Vraja, the nectarine milk from whose udders and breasts is sucked with extreme delight (and satisfaction) by you in the form of calves and (cowherd) boys, Oh! Omnipresent Lord, to whom even sacred sacrifices have not been able to give gratification (to that extent) even till today.
32. How surprisingly admirable (and enviable) is the good luck of Nanda and the cowherds of Vraja, that they have a friend in you, the eternal perfect Brahman, the embodiment of the highest bliss.

33. (As it is simply beyond the capacity of anyone to describe it) let the greatness of the fortune of these cowherds be kept aside for the time being. But we eleven-god Śiva and others (the presiding deities of sense-organs) are exceptionally fortunate, for, through the cups in the form of the sense-organs (of these cowherds), we constantly drink the exhilarating and inebriating sweet nectar-like honey of your lotus-feet, (How much more blessed are the cowherds of Vraja who can enjoy your personal charms through all their senses, if our single organ medium is so enchanting!).

34. It will be an exceedingly high fortune to be born in any species (even as humble grass) here, in this forest (of Vṛndāvana), especially in Gokula, where one may have the (good luck) of bathing (from head to foot, all over the body) in the dust of the feet of any one (of the devoted inhabitants) from Gokula; for their entire life is the Lord Mukunda Himself, the dust of whose feet is still sought after by the Vedas.

35. As Pitānā merely through her assumption of the guise of the good (pretending motherly affection to you) was brought to your region along with the members of her family, our mind is baffled in trying to guess what fruit other than yourself, the highest possible reward in the world, you can confer on these residents of Vraja whose homes, wealth, friends, beloved relatives, their selves, sons, life and mind are completely dedicated to you (and are meant for you), Oh Lord.

36. Oh Lord Kṛṣṇa! So long as people do not become yours (your votaries), passions like desire, hatred etc. act as

1. ŚR gives the following list of organs presided over by deities. The mind (the moon god), buddhi—intellec (Brahmā), ahamkāra—ego (Śiva), the auditory sense (dīg-dvētā—deities presiding over the cardinal points), the tactile sense (Vāyu—the wind god), the sight (the sun gods) the sense of taste (Varuṇa—the Lord of waters), the olfactory sense (Asvini Kumāras), organ of speech (Agni—the fire god), hands (Indra), feet (Upendra). The organs of excretion and urination seem to have been excluded in the Bhāgavata verse and the inclusion of god Brahmā and Śiva are substituted to make up the number eleven.
thieves (to deprive them of their merits or spiritual wealth) and the house serves as a prison and infatuation works as fetters.

37. Oh Lord! Even though you are transcendental to the world and as such have nothing to do with the worldly life, you play your role in this (worldly) life for enhancing the raptu-turous joy of people who have submitted to you for resort.

38. I have nothing to say about those who (pose that they) know you. Let them. (In fact, they are deluded in thinking that way). But as far as I am concerned, your glory is beyond the ken of my mind, body (senses) and speech.

39. Oh Kṛṣṇa! Be pleased to grant me leave (to depart).
You know everything, Oh Omniscient Lord. You are the protector of the world. This world and this person (both of which I wrongly regarded as mine) are now offered to you.

40. My respectful obeisance to the end of this Kalpa
(the duration of my life) to you, Oh Lord Kṛṣṇa who cause delight to the lotus (in the form) of Vṛṣṇi clan, who bring flow-tide to the sea in the form (i.e. enhance the prosperity) of the earth, gods, Brāhmaṇas and the cows; the dispeller of the darkness of the pseudo-religious hypocrites, the destroyer of the demons on the earth and adorable to gods (right) from the sun.

Śrī Śuka said:

41.* After offering his hymn in praise of the Supreme Lord in this way, god Brahmā (the creator of the Universe) circumambulated him thrice (out of respect), and bowing down to his feet, he returned to his region which is adorable to and desired by all.

42. The Lord granted permission to god Brahmā who was born of him (and was therefore, pardoned his audacity to test the Lord). He brought back the (original) calves to the sandy bank of his choice (for the common dinner with the cowherd boys in that picnic) where his companions were (already waiting) as before.

*VT, notes that Kṛṣṇa by his silence, refused god Brahmā's request to stay in his vicinity and indicated that one must execute one's prescribed duties during the tenure of his office—yāvad adhikāram avasthitir adhikāripām
43. Though the children were separated from Kṛṣṇa, the very lord of their life, for one complete year, they thought it to be only half a moment due to the effect of the illusive power of Kṛṣṇa, Oh king.

44. What do they not forget in this world when the mind is infatuated with the Māyā Potency of the Lord? The whole world under its deluding influence often forgets itself.

45. His companions greeted Kṛṣṇa, "Welcome for your speedy return. Not a single morsel has been eaten by us (during your absence). Have a hearty meal."

46. Laughing (loudly at the welcome) Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of sense organs, had his meal with the cowherd boys. He showed them the skin of the boa-constrictor, and returned to Vraja from the forest.

47. With person attractively decorated with peacock feathers, flowers and variegated mineral colours and exultant at the fanfare of the transporting sounds of flutes whistles of leaves and horns that were loudly blown, and shouting at the calves while tending them, Kṛṣṇa whose looks brought delight to the eyes of the cowherd women, entered Vraja, while his companions singing his hallowing glory, followed him.

48. The children sang in Vraja: "By this child, the delight of Yośodā, a big serpent was killed today and we were saved from it".

King Parīkṣit enquired:

49. Oh Brahman sage! Be pleased to explain to me how was this unbounded abundance of love which was never before exhibited (by the inhabitants of Vraja) even to the children born to them, was possible in the case of Kṛṣṇa who was born of another.²

---

1. SG., as an alternate explanation, introduces Rādhā here. yad vā Śrī-Kṛṣṇaika-priyāyā bhagavatyāh Śrī Rādhādevyāh tān netrānām eva viśeṣatas taddarśanotsavasiddheḥ

2. vide Supra 13.26.
Sri Suka explained:

50.* Oh King! One’s own self (atman) is the most beloved to all created beings. Others such as children, wealth etc. are dear, because they are beloved to the self.

51 One does not cherish that much love to one’s progeny, wealth, house etc. which (being dependent on their feeling of mine-ness) is called their own, as one has for one’s body (which is identified with the self), by all embodied beings, Oh Great King.

52. To persons who believe in the identity of the body and the (indwelling) Soul, their own body is the dearest to them and not so much the children etc. which come after it (or are connected with it), Oh best of Kṣattriyas.

53. (If, instead of believing in the one-ness of the body with the soul) this body shares the feeling of ‘mine-ness’ (is regarded as different from the soul yet ‘mine’) it would not be so intensely loved as the soul itself. For when this body is being worn out, the desire to live grows stronger.

54. Hence one’s own self is the most beloved to all embodied beings. It is for the sake of the Self that all this world mobile and immobile, exists.

55. Do you know that this Kṛṣṇa is the soul of all embodied beings. It is for the good of the world that he, through his Māyā power, appears to have assumed a corporal form.

56. To those who know the Reality, everything mobile and immobile in this world, is Kṛṣṇa.

1. VR. atman = The Supreme Self.

* For vv. 50-54 cf. na vāre patyuh Kāmāya patiḥ priyo bhavati / atmanas tu kāmāya patiḥ priyo bhavati/ etc.—Bṛhad. Upan. 2.4.5.

 VB. The feeling of love for one’s own body, due to the ‘I’ness attributed to it by those who identify the body with the soul, is stronger than that (which one feels) for one’s progeny or wealth with which ‘mine-ness’ is associated.

2. SG. and VT. read: jīvitaśa abaliyasi: The desire to live is not so strong as the person’s ego is eliminated through discriminatory (philosophical) thinking.

3. SS. quotes tadd-ananyatvam-abhyāsābhyāsā-badśādhibhyāh BR. S.2.1.15) (0.14 according to Śaṅkara) in support of Kṛṣṇa’s person comprising everything sentient and non-sentient in the universe.

Also cf. Infra 11.2.41.
manifestation of the the Almighty Lord and there is nothing else (than he).

57. Of all things that exist, their essence lies in their cause and Lord Kṛṣṇa is the ultimate cause of all these causes. Hence, tell me if there is anything apart from him.

58. To those who resort to the boat in the form of the foliage like tender feet of Kṛṣṇa, (the slayer of demon Mura) of hallowing reputation—the final abode of the great (sages) (saints etc.)—the ocean of samsāra is as shallow as the footprint of a calf. They attain to the highest region (vaikuṇṭha) from which they never revert to the Sāṁśāra, the region of miseries.

59. Whatever I have been asked by you here as to show what was done by Hari in his stage as a child was proclaimed broadcast in his boyhood, has been completely narrated to you.

60. By listening to or by glorifying how Lord Kṛṣṇa (The Slayer of demon Mura) played with his chums, his slaying of the demon Agha, his repast on the meadow, his assumption of non-phenomenal forms and the sublime hymn of praise sung by god Brahmā, a person attains everything that he desires.

61. In this way, they both (Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) passed their childhood at Vraja, in child-like sports such as hide-and-seek, playful construction of dams, jumping like monkey (from one branch of a tree to another).

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Slaying the demon Dhenuka

Śrī Suka continued:

1. And after attaining the paugana stage (boyhood from the age of six to nine), those two brothers (Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa) were approved (by Nanda and others) as suitable for the job of tending the cows. While grazing the cows and their

1. VT. quotes Padma P. which states that during their childhood, Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma tended calves. On their attainment of the sixth year, from the 8th day of the bright half of Kārttika, they became bona fide cow tenders. Hence that day is now known as Gopasātami.
calves in company of their friends, they rendered the region of Vṛndāvana extremely sacred, by their foot-prints.¹

2. On one occasion, playing on his own flute, accompanied by Balarāma and surrounded by cowherds singing his glory, Mādhava (Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Lākṣmī as well as the spring) tending his herd of kine in front of him, and desirous of indulging in sports, entered a forest blossoming with flowers and affording a good pasture suitable to the cattle.

3. Observing that the (Vṛndāvana) forest was resounded with the sweet notes, sound and humming of birds, beasts (or deer) and bees, and was wafted with a breeze cool due to its contact with pools with waters translucent like (the pure) minds of the great, and fragrant with lotuses, the Lord set his heart to play there.

4. Perceiving at every place, trees glowing with the beauty of reddish foliage and touching their feet with their heads—top branches—heavy with a burden of fruits and flowers, Kṛṣṇa, the Primeval Person, slightly smiled out of delight, and addressed his elder brother.

_The glorious Lord said:_

5. Oh! How wonderful! Carrying the presents of fruits and flowers on their heads (top branches), these trees bow down their heads (branches) laden heavily with fruits to your lotus-feet which are adored by the immortals, with a view to absolve themselves of the sin or ignorance (tamas)² which caused their birth as trees, Oh prominent God.

6. These (humming) bees, singing your glory that purifies all the world, are resorting to you at every step—you the Ancient-most Person. Most probably, these are the hosts of sages who _Suklaśṭomi Kārttikeya smrtā Gopāśṭami būdhaiḥ /

taddinād Vāsudevaḥ bhūd gopah purvah tu vatsopah //

1. Cowherds used to go bare-footed. Hence the imprints of Kṛṣṇa's feet on the soil of Vṛndāvana—VT.

2. VT. argues that it was ignorance but they deliberately accepted birth as a tree in Vṛndāvana forest, as god Brahmā made a similar request in his prayer (Supra 14.34)

VB. regards these three verses 5, 6 and 7 as if prayers from the trees, bees, birds and beasts.
are prominent among devotees, and they do not let you miss—their personal Deity—even though you lie concealed in the (Vṛndāvana) forest, Oh sinless one!

7. On your arrival at their home, the peacocks are dancing joyously; the female deer, overwhelmed with joy are giving you delight with their oglings like unto cowherd women (of Vraja), and the flocks of cuckoos welcome you with their sweet cooing. Blessed are these forest-dwellers. For such is the nature of the saintly persons.

8.* Blessed is the earth today; and also the blades of grass and plants touching your feet, and the trees and creepers gently pricked by your nails (to pluck leaves or flowers), and the rivers, hills, birds and beasts that have been viewed at with kind looks, and the Gopi girls who are hugged to your bosom (between your arms) for which even the goddess of beauty, (Lakṣmi) longs.

9. Being delighted at least at the sight of Vṛndāvana
(the beauty of which is described above), Lord Kṛṣṇa enjoyed himself along with his companions, while grazing the cows in the pastures on the river bank, in the vicinity of the (Govardhana) mount.

10. Adorned with garlands and accompanied by Balarāma (Saṅkarṣaṇa), he used to burst out into singing in imitation of the sweet humming of bees intoxicated with the honey sucked by them, while his followers were extolling his feats in song.

11. Sometimes he imitated the rapturous notes of swans, and sometimes he danced mimicking the dancing peacocks, provoking his companions to laughter.

11-A. Vṛndāvana edition adds

Sometimes he imitated the chattering of the parrots in

---

1. VJ. regards that words śīkhī & Kokila also mean ‘sages—one with matted hair’, and the gods Brahmā (ka) Śiva (u) and others.

*This verse is No. 19 in VJ’s Text (in which this ch. is No 13) and is spoken by Śri Śuka.

2. Saṅkarṣaṇa is used to indicate that Balarāma being non-different from Kṛṣṇa, joined him in singing—VT.

3. P. 565Footnote. Source not given but VT’s text comments on this verse and not on V. 11 above.
sweet indistinct words. Sometimes he sweetly cooed in imitation of the warbling and cooing of cuckoos.

12. Sometimes, in a voice deep and sonorous like the rumbling of clouds, and extremely fascinating to the cows and cowherds (alike), he would affectionately call out (by names) cows that have strayed away to distant pastures.

13. He used to imitate the notes and cries of birds like Cakora (a fabulous bird subsisting on lunar rays), Krauña (a curlew or heron), cakravāka (the ruddy goose), Bhāradvāja (a sky-lark) and also peacocks, and sometimes behaved or shrieked like animals terrified at tigers and lions.

14. Sometimes by shampooing his feet and rendering other services (like fanning), Kṛṣṇa would remove the fatigue of his elder brother, Balarāma, exhausted with playing, and lying with his head on the cushion-like lap of a cowherd boy.

15. Sometimes holding each other by hands, they (Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa) laughingly applauded the cowherd boys who were dancing, capering, singing, prattling and wrestling with each other.

16. At times, being exhausted with (physical) exertions in wrestling, he used to lie on different beds of tender leaves (prepared by his companions) at the foot of trees, placing his head on the cushion-like laps of (elderly) cowherd-boys.

17. Some cowherd boys kneaded the feet of the great-souled Lord while other sinless ones fanned him with fans made of tender leaves.

18. Others whose hearts (lit. intellect) were steeped in love and devotion for him, sang gently and in sweet low tone beautiful songs suitable for the occasion, and pleasing to him (or songs pertaining to his feats), Oh Great King!

19. In this way, Kṛṣṇa, by his Māyā, had concealed his course (i.e. real divine nature) and played his role as a cowherd

1. VT. states that by His Māyā power, Kṛṣṇa lay on all the beds leading each group to believe that Kṛṣṇa was honouring the bed prepared by them.

VB. explains that Kṛṣṇa did so for the sages who were occupying the feet of trees and his beds were the heart of yogins where he lay and he showed his preference and respect to cowherd boys by placing his head on their laps.
boy by his acts (sports and behaviour). The Lord whose foliage-like tender feet were caressed by goddess Lakṣmī played like a rustic boy with rustics, though occasionally he behaved like the Almighty Lord.

20. A certain cowherd called Śrīdāman was a bosom friend of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa and so were other cowherd boys like Subala, Stoka. Kṛṣṇa spoke to them with friendly affection.

(VJ. reads: Śrīdāman spoke to Subala, Aśoka, Kṛṣṇa and other cowherds out of friendliness).

21. "Oh Rāma! Balarāma of mighty arms! Oh Kṛṣṇa, the destroyer of the wicked! Not far from this place, there is a great dense forest thick with rows of palmyra trees."

22. Abundant fruits lie fallen and have been falling there, but they are all monopolised by Dhenuka of wicked soul.

23. He is a demon of mighty prowess, Oh Rāma! Oh Kṛṣṇa! Assuming the form of a donkey, he lives surrounded by members of his tribe (donkeys), all of whom are equal in strength to him.

24. Being afraid of that cannibal who feeds on human beings, the tract of forest is not visited by men and is also avoided by herds of beasts and flocks of birds.

25. Very delicious and sweet smelling fruits untasted by us lie there. And it is the sweet fragrance of those fruits that has filled the air all around, and we perceive that here also.

26. Oh Kṛṣṇa! Be pleased to give those to us whose hearts are enamoured of their odour. A very strong yearning urges us, Oh Rāma. We make a move if you approve of it.

27. Hearing the request of his friend and with a desire to accomplish their wishes, those two mighty gods laughed heartily, and proceeded to the Palm forest accompanied by the cowherds.

28. Balarāma entered the forest and by violently shaking the palm trees with his arms like a young elephant, he made the fruit drop down by his physical power.

1. VT, locates it with 'Tālasi' or 'Tāraphara'. It is to the southwest of Mathura at a distance of 8 miles from Govardhana.
2. v.l. atiiliya—of extremely ferocious nature—VJ
29. Hearing the sound of the falling of fruits, the Asura in the form of a donkey, rushed to the place making the earth along with mountains tremble and quake.

30. Rushing at Balarāma, the powerful demon kicked with his hind legs on the chest of Balarāma, and braying loudly the wicked fellow ran away to some distance. (moved hither and thither around Balarāma).

31. Approaching Balarāma again, the donkey stayed with its face away from Balarāma, and in violent wrath, he flung his hind legs (struck with his hind hoofs) Balarāma, Oh King!

32. Catching hold of both his legs with one hand, Balarāma violently whirled him and when the demon died due to that terrible whirling, he hurled him to the top of a tall palm tree.

33. Being struck (with the carcass of that donkey), the big palm tree with heavy (palm-fruit laden) head crashed, and shook heavily the adjoining tree which fell down, despatching its neighbouring tree to the same fate.

34. Being struck down by the impact of the dead body of the donkey which was sportively hurled by Balarāma, all the palm trees shook heavily, as if swept down by a violent hurricane.

35. This is not miraculous in the case of the glorious Lord Śeṣa (who incarnated as Balarāma) the Ruler of the universe, in whom the universe is woven warp and woof, like a piece of cloth into the threads, Oh dear child!

36. The whole tribe of Dhenuka, the donkeys which flung in rage due to the killing of their brother, dashed at Rāma and Kṛṣṇa.

37. As they attacked, both Rāma and Kṛṣṇa held them by their hind legs, and flung them easily to the tops of the tall palm trees, as if in sport.

38. Littered over with heaps of palm fruits, the tops of the palm trees, and the dead bodies of the demons, the surface of the earth looked like the sky overcast with clouds (red, white and blue in colours).

39. Hearing of their marvellous feat, gods and others (such as demigods, celestial damsels etc.) let down showers of flowers on them, played on the divine musical instruments, and praised them highly.

40. Then the forest being thus rid of Dhenuka, people being free from fear, enjoyed (ate) to the full, fruits of those palm trees, and the cattle grazed in the pasture fearlessly.

41. Kṛṣṇa whose eyes were large like lotus-petals, and the hearing and singing of whose glory is hallowing and meritorious, entered Vraja along with his elder brother Balarāma, in company of his cowherd followers who were glorifying and praising him.

42. The cowherd women rushed out in crowds to welcome and see with eager eyes, Lord Kṛṣṇa, looking charming with sylvain flowers and peacock feathers adorning his curly locks of hair, overlaid with dust raised by (the hoofs of) cows, of beautiful eyes and bewitching smiles, and who was playing on his flute while followed by cowherds singing his glory.

43. Drinking with their black-bee-like eyes the honey (i.e. charm) in the lotus-like countenance of Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa), the damsels of Vṛaja got subsided their fever of separation from him during the day time. Kṛṣṇa, on his part, entered the cowpen after duly receiving their worship, welcome (consisting) of bashful smiles, ogling with side glances and modesty.

44. Yaśodā and Rohiṇī who were very fond and affectionate to their sons, poured their benedictions suitable to the occasion to their heart’s content.

45. They whose fatigue of journey (while tending the cows) was removed by bath, massage etc. in the forest, were dressed in beautiful clothes, and were adorned with excellent garlands, perfumes (sandal paste) etc.

46. They partook of the sweet dish served to them by their mother, and after being caressed by them, they went to sleep in excellent beds, and enjoyed sweet, happy sleep at Vraja.

47. In this way, Lord Kṛṣṇa used to move in the Vṛndāvana. On one occasion, unaccompanied by Balarāma, but in company of (lit. surrounded by) his friends, he went to the Yamunā.

48. There, being tormented with the heat of the summer and oppressed with thirst, the cows as well as cowherds drank the river water polluted due to the contamination of poison.
49. Being deprived of their discretion and judgement by the Providence, immediately after sipping the poisonous water, they all fell dead, by the side of the water. Oh best of Kurus.

50. Finding them verily reduced to that condition, Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the masters of Yoga, restored his proteges to life by his glance that (as if) showered nectar.

51. Recovering their consciousness immediately, all of them rose up from the brink of the water and gazed at each other with amazement.

52. They came to understand that their restoration to life after death by drinking poison was the result of the gracious look of Kṛṣṇa (Govinda), Oh King Parikṣit.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Expulsion of Kāliya

Śrī Suka said:

1. Perceiving that the (waters of the) Kṛṣṇa (i.e. Yamunā) had been poisoned by a black serpent (Kāliya), the Almighty Kṛṣṇa, desirous of purifying it, expelled him (from that place).

The King (Parikṣit) asked:

2. May it be kindly narrated to me as to how Lord Kṛṣṇa caught hold of (and subdued) the serpent in the interior of the unfathomable waters (of the Yamunā), and (secondly)

1. Those whose knowledge was affected by the power of the sportive activities of the glorious Lord—VT.

2. Jiva Gosvami, in saṣṭ-sandarbha (in Kṛṣṇa-sandarbha) explains that Gopas being attendants of the Lord did not die by the poisonous water. This is simply to show that they are human beings as the Lord behaved as a human incarnation.

tad bhāgavata iva nara-līlāpāyikatayā praṇāścitam iti mantaṃyam

For details vide De—Vaishnava Faith and Movement, pp. 55-56. VJ. regards this a bit allegorical indicating that the poison of samsāra does not affect the devotees of Hari (vide Intro. to ch. 16).
a serpent is not an aquatic animal; how could he make his abode in the interior part of water for ages together, Oh learned Brähmaṇa.¹

3. Who will feel satiated while drinking the nectar of the noble deeds of the glorious omnipotent Lord of absolute free will, while he was acting his role as a cowherd, Oh Brähmaṇa Sage?

Śrī Śuka said:

4. In the Yamunā, there was a certain pool, the haunt of Kāliya, the waters whereof were boiling with the serpent's fiery poison and even the birds flying over it, fell dead (due to poisonous vapours).

5. Beings, mobile and immobile, on the banks of that river, succumbed to death at the touch of the wind charged with the poisonous spray, while blowing over the ripples of that deadly water.

6. Kṛṣṇa, whose incarnation was for the subjugation of the wicked, considered how the real power of the snake lay in its virulent venom and that it had polluted the river with its contamination. Climbing up a very tall Kadamba tree (on the bank of the Yamunā²), he tightened his girdle and striking his arms (as if challenging Kāliya to fight) jumped down into the poisonous water.

7. The pool of the serpent, the voluminous waters of which were swelled with venom discharged by the serpent, extremely agitated by the vehemence of the plunge of the Supreme Man, dashed up overflowing on all sides to a distance of hundred bows (i.e. four hundred hastas or cubits) in terrible

¹. VT. supports this meaning of 'Vipra' by quoting Yājñavalkya—janmană, Brāhmaṇo jīryah, saṃskārair dvija ucyate /
vidyā yāti viprataṁ tribhiḥ śtrīrya-lakṣaṇam /

². ŚR. & VR. explain that that Kadamba tree did not get dry by Kāliya's poison due to contact of nectar while Garuḍa was carrying it away from the custody of gods (Mbh. Adi. 33) VB. states that Garuḍa used to perch on it, waiting for Kāliya to come out so that he would kill it. The tree was thus preserved for Kṛṣṇa. VT. states it was Lord Kṛṣṇa's tree—as if identical with him (Śrī-Kṛṣṇa-ṛkṣatādi) and was protected by Lord Kṛṣṇa for his sports.
waves saturated and bitter with poison. But there is nothing miraculous in this in the case of the Almighty Lord (of infinite strength).

8. Hearing the thunderous sound of water agitated by the strokes of the mighty arms (of the Lord) who was sporting with the prowess of a supreme powerful elephant, and perceiving it as an attack on his abode, and unable to tolerate it, the serpent (whose eyes functioned also as ears) advanced rustling against Kṛṣṇa, Oh dear King!

9. Biting him in all tender parts, twisting himself, he enclosed completely in his coils the Lord who looked extremely beautiful, delicate and effulgent like a cloud; (who) was adorned with Śrīvatsa mark and was dressed in raiment of bright golden hue; who, with a bewitching, smiling face and with feet tender like the pericarp of a lotus, was sporting (in the water) with absolute fearlessness.

10. On seeing Kṛṣṇa caught in the coils of the serpent and no movement of his being visible, his dearest chums, the cowherds, who had dedicated to him their own selves, their belongings, family and even desires, became extremely distressed, and dropped down with their minds maddened with grief, sorrow and fear in succession.

11. Fixing their gaze at Kṛṣṇa and extremely distressed cows, bulls and heifers began to bellow; they stood there as if weeping through fear.

12. And at Vraja, very ominous and terrible portents of three-fold character indicating imminent danger appeared on the earth (e.g. seismic disturbance), in the sky (e.g. raining of meteors or blood), and to persons (throbbing of the left-side in the case of men and right side in the case of women).

13. Noticing the evil omens and learning that Kṛṣṇa unaccompanied by Balarama had left for grazing the cattle, the cowherds of whom Nanda was prominent, were overwhelmed with fear.

14. Being ignorant of the real (omnipotent) nature of Kṛṣṇa, they concluded from the omens, the death (or fatal calamity) of Kṛṣṇa. As they regarded him as their very life, and had set their hearts on him, they became submerged in grief, sorrow and fear.
15. Young and old, men and women who followed the vocation of cowherds (or were extremely affectionate) being eager to have a look at Kṛṣṇa, proceeded from Gokula in a sad melancholy mood.

16. Perceiving them so nervous and terrified, the glorious Lord Balarāma who knew the prowess of the younger brother, laughed heartily, but spoke nothing.

17. In search of their beloved Kṛṣṇa, they followed the track indicated by his foot-prints bearing the special marks of being the supreme Lord, and they reached the bank of the Yamunā.

18. On the way, and in between the foot-prints of cows and others, they carefully observed the foot-prints of the Lord characterised by the marks of a lotus, a barley seed, a goad, the thunder bolt and a banner, and they proceeded quickly, dear Parīkṣit.

19. Noticing from a distance Kṛṣṇa entwined in the coils of the serpent, and being merged motionless in water in the interior of the pool, and the cow-herds fallen in a swoon on the bank and the piteously lowing all around, they became sorely distressed, and lost their consciousness.

20. With their hearts deeply attached to the infinite Glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, and cherishing the memory of his warm-hearted friendship, charming smile, meaningful glances and pleasing words, the Gopīs (cowherdesses) were extremely tormented with grief to find their most beloved (Kṛṣṇa) trapped in the coils of the serpent, and looked upon the three worlds bereft of their beloved, as totally desolate and interestless.

21. Shedding profusely tears of grief, the cowherdesses who were equally grieved like Yaśodā, closely held her back (from following Kṛṣṇa in the Pool as her heart followed her child. They were recounting the stories of Kṛṣṇa so beloved in Vraja. With their eyes riveted on the face of Kṛṣṇa, they stood there like lifeless bodies.

22. Noticing that Nanda and others whose very life was Kṛṣṇa, entering the pool of water, glorious Lord Balarāma who knew the prowess of Kṛṣṇa, prevented them from doing so.

23. Observing that the whole of his Gokula including women and children entirely depended on him for shelter and was extremely grieved for his sake, Kṛṣṇa who followed the role of mortals, stayed for about a muhūrta a short while (about 48 minutes) in that entrapped condition, and emerged out of the coils of the serpent.

24. His body being oppressed by the (internal) pressure of the expanding dimensions of Kṛṣṇa's body, the enraged serpent freed Kṛṣṇa from his coils, and raised his hoods breathing out violently poison from his hissing nostrils, and was staring at him with eyes motionless yet hot like a frying pan, and mouth emitting flames of fire.

25. Like Garuḍa, the king of birds, watching for an opportunity (to pounce on his prey), Lord Kṛṣṇa sported with the serpent which was constantly licking the corners of its mouth with its forked tongue, and whose eyes sending forth extremely virulent poisonous (flames of) fire, and wheeling round the serpent, he made it whirl around itself.

26. When all the energy (and prowess) of the serpent became exhausted in whirling round itself, Kṛṣṇa, the First (Eternal) Person bent down its raised shoulders (i.e. neck, with his hands), and mounted on its broad hood. With his lotus feet extremely red and refugent with their contact with the heaps of jewels on the heads of the serpent, the First Teacher of all arts began to dance.

27. Observing that the Lord intends to dance and is about to commence it, all his (servants—celestial artists like) Gandharvas, Siddhas, gods, Cāraṇas, heavenly damsels (apsarās) suddenly, promptly and with loving devotion presented them—

1. Śirah sa Kṛṣṇo jagrāha
   Stahastend'vanamya ca—Harivahṣa, quoted by VT., VC also VB.

2. VB. raises the question how the Holy Lord rode on an inauspicious reptile and replies that firstly, being the creator of all, the problem of inauspiciousness does not arise, and secondly, He is habituated to sleep on a serpent (Śeṣa) as (Śeṣa-āditya)

3. v.1.—amṛta-Kalidhi-guruḥ—VJ. who is the Supreme Master of the moon of nectarine rays.

4. VB.—The following are the functions of the celestials on such occasions: Gandharvas, to sing; Siddhas, to shower flowers; sages, to compose hymns of praise; Cāraṇas, to play on musical instruments and apsarās celestial damsels to dance. But the procedure of dancing viz. Nāṇḍi, followed by scattering of flowers etc. was upset by the suddenness of the Lord's decision to dance.
selves there with drums, tabors and musical instruments, flowers, singing the songs of his praise.

28. Dear Parikṣit! During the course of dancing (at every beat), the Lord who wields a rod to punish the wicked, struck down and scalped with the stroke¹ (so that the next kick in the dancing beat should be more painful) the unbending hood of the hundred and one hooded serpent which was whirling round and round, and was on the point of death. Profusely vomiting blood through his nostrils and mouths, the serpent became utterly depressed in spirits.

29. During the course of his dance, Kṛṣṇa kicked and bent down whatever head (hood of the serpent) was raised by the serpent that was profusely emitting poison through its eyes, and was hissing (through nostrils) with rage, and thus subdued it. Looking upon him as the Most Ancient Person (Lord Nārāyaṇa on the bed of the coiled body of Śeṣa), he was devoutly worshipped with (the showers of) flowers (by Gandharvas).

30. With its umbrella-like hoods being crushed and wounded by the violent and unearthly dance, and vomiting blood profusely out of its mouth, the serpent, all the limbs of whose body were shattered², remembered the Ancient Person Nārāyaṇa, the Father (Creator) of the mobile and immobile creation, and mentally resorted to him for refuge.

31. Finding their serpent-husband collapsing under the infinite weight of Kṛṣṇa carrying (innumerable) worlds in his abdomen, and his umbrella-like hoods crushed and shattered under the strokes of his heels, its distressed wives with dishevelled hair and clothes and ornaments in disorder approached him.

32. Being overwhelmed with anxiety (for their husband) the wives of Kāliya, holding their babies³ in their hands in front of them, prostrated themselves on the ground before the Lord, the Creator of all beings. With an earnest desire to absolve their husband from sin, and to secure the deliverance of their sinning husband from the hands of the Supreme Lord (also), the pious ladies folded their palms, and sought asylum in him who affords protection to all.

¹ V.B. Kīṁcana prahāra-mātram k-roti, Kīṁ tu mamarda —pādena mardanam api karoti, yathoparatāni tru ga cchati, dvitiyoprahāre adhikanyathā— janaṁ stham/

² VB : crushing of hoods etc. is the expiation of external sins and vomiting blood is absolving of internal sins. When both types of sins were purged, Kāliya remembered God.

³ v.l. pūraskṛtārthaḥ—Who have already worshipped him (agre kṛta-pūjanaḥ)—VJ.

The serpent's wives submitted:*

33. "As your incarnation is intended for the chastisement of the wicked (and for showering Grace on the righteous), the punishment meted out to this (Kāliya) who has committed sinful acts, is quite just. You entertain equal impartial outlook and attitude towards your enemy as well as to your sons. It is with a view to confer good fruit (or your Grace, or Eternal Happiness) that you inflict punishment (proportionate to the nature of the offence.)

34. As a matter of fact, the punishment inflicted (on Kāliya) is a blessing and a favour (in disguise), conferred on us all, for your chastisement of the wicked absolves them of their sins. Your wrath is regarded (by us) as a blessing and a favour bestowed (by you), as it destroyed all the sins of this embodied being (Kāliya) whose state of being a serpent was due to those sins.

35. (We really marvel) how great austere penance (as per correct procedure) must have been practised in former life by Kāliya, himself remaining free from pride, and giving due respect to others, or what righteous acts out of compassion to

1. VT. states that there was a small island in the middle of Kāliya's pool in the Yamunā.

*ŚR. states the analysis of this panegyric as follows:

(1) Acquiescence in the punishment meted out to Kāliya (6 verses).
(2) Hari's praise (10 verses), (3) Prayer to Lord Hari (5 verses).

VB's analysis is slightly different.

KD. shows that five characteristics of peaceful negotiations (śāma) are seen in the appeal of Kāliya's wives as follows (1) Relation of Just punishment proportionate to offence (śambandha) V. 34; (2) Benefit:labha v. 35; (3) obligation—upakrti, v. 36; (4) Non-difference v. 37-8; (5) Praise of virtues—gopakirtana Vv. 39ff.

2. Otherwise your incarnation will be of a negative character—VT.

3. SS.—Even your wrath is a form of your Grace."
all beings, must have been performed by him then, that you, who support the life of all, have been pleased with him.

36. We simply cannot understand what meritorious acts entitled him to the privilege of touching the dust of your feet, with a desire to receive which, the most charming goddess Lakṣmī, giving up all pleasures, performed austere penance for a long time, observing strict vows, Oh Gracious Lord!

37. Those who have attained the dust at his (the Lord’s) feet, do not covet for (a life in) the celestial regions, or the position of the sovereignty over the whole of this world, or the post of god Brahmā, or the rulership of the subterranean regions, or mastery over the mystic powers secured through yoga, or the Liberation from sāṃsāra whence there is no return (to sāṃsāra).

38* Oh Lord! Though this serpent-king is born of tāmas (viz. of the ignorant race of serpents), and is of wrathful nature, he could attain (‘the bliss of being favoured with the dust of your feet’ ‘the touch of your feet’ ‘the direct visualization of your person’) that which is attainable to others only with great difficulty and by desiring to secure which, corporeal beings whirling on the wheel of sāṃsāra, realize all desirable prosperity including liberation from sāṃsāra.

39 Salutations to You, the Almighty Lord of incomprehensible excellences, the dweller in the bodies of all beings (as Their Inner Controller), yet undiscernible (or All-pervader). You are the support of all elements like the sky (the wind, water etc.), or the abode of all beings. You are eternally existent as cause of all, but are transcendental to causal relation.

40. As the treasure house (or the source) of all knowledge and consciousness, you are perfectly full of them. You are the Brahman of infinite power, devoid of (and transcendental to) all attributes and immutable, the regulator and motivator of

*KD. : By riding over the heads of our husband, you became his crest-jewel and in a way both of you became one. Nay, our husband became in a way superior to the Lord who became a head-ornament of Kāliya. This is the abheda—(identity) stage in sāman (peaceful negotiations)

The next ten verses form the guṇa-kīrtana (eulogy of excellences), the next stage is sāman (peaceful negotiations)—KD.

1. Kāraṇadītīkṣa (ŚR)
Prakṛti (or possessor of Supernatural Potencies). We bow to you.

41. (We pay obeisance to) you who are the (very embodiment of) Time-Spirit, the support of (the potencies of) Time, the witness to different divisions of Time; you are the universe itself as well as its Director, creator as well as its (material and instrumental) cause.

42. Hail to you who constitute all the elements (both gross and subtle), all the (ten) cognitive and conative sense-organs, the (five) vital breaths, the mind, the intellect and the heart. You keep yourself shrouded from the jivas due to their ego (ahamkāra) comprising of three guṇas.

43. We bow to you who are infinite, subtle (and hence beyond the ken of perception and therefore) not subject to changes or modifications, and the Omniscient. (Due to your Māyā) You are the subject of various theories (such as you exist, do not exist, are Omniscient, non-omniscient, bound in samsāra, absolutely free, one, many). You are the power that is described in the words as also the power of description inherent in words.

1. Kālīya—One who is like a Wish-yielding cow to his devotees—VJ
2. Due to ‘difference-cum-non-difference’, and ‘Duality-cum-non-duality relations’, this is explainable—SD.
3. bhūtātmane—
   (i) VR. To him who enters in and controls all the beings (Brahman as nīyānta). This verse brings out the causal relation between the subtle and gross sentient-cum-non-sentient aspects of Brahman as well as body-cum-soul relation. (evam śūkṣma-cidāc-cit-sūkṣma-Brahmaḥ sthūlāvasthā cidāc-cit-sūkṣma-bhūtaḥ tayoḥ kārya-kāraṇa-bhāvaḥ...śaṅkavāyāmānāhā ṣaṁbhu-vṛttam)
   (ii) VT.—to him who inspires consciousness i.e. gives knowledge of beings (Jñāna-pradāya)
4. VJ. reads v.l. nirguṇenābhīmaṇena
   You, whose glory remains concealed through ignorance (ajñānena) which is not born of guṇas like sattva (sattvād-guṇa-janmahätvam).
5. nānāvādānaurodhāya—(i) Established despite various theories—SS.
   (ii) Common to all theories—VJ.
   (iii) God appears according to one's views (yathā nirūpyate tathā Bhagavān bhavati—VB
6. Vācyavādāca-takta-yā—Both meaning and word derive their power from you.—VT.
44. Salutations to you who are the Source of the means or instruments to arrive at correct knowledge\(^1\); Absolute Wisdom\(^2\) (independent of any source of knowledge); the source of Scriptures (i.e. whose breath are the Vedas).\(^3\) We salute again and again to you who are both participation in and withdrawal from the worldly activities, and the Veda itself\(^4\) (which prescribes both types of injunctions).

45. We bow to you Kṛṣṇa, the embodiment of the highest bliss, whose nature is to draw away (i.e. to absolve) the sins of his devotees, whose fourfold forms or manifestations (vyūhas) are Rāma i.e., Saṅkarṣaṇa, Vāsudeva (of pure sattva), Pradyumna, of the highest splendour (and possessor of Supreme affluence), and Aniruddha, comprehensible only to the wise—you who protect your votaries bestowing them with grades of liberation such as Sāyujyata etc.

46.* Obeisance to you who illuminate the internal organ by presiding over its four aspects—mind, reason, the intel-

---

1. Pramāṇa-mālā (i) The source of perception or cognition (lit. the eye of the eye etc.)—ŚR.
(ii) The source and support of the Vedas, the authority of which rests on you.—VB.
2. Kavaye: (i) The knower of the past, (present) and the Future —VJ.
(ii) Whose form is the Word or the material cause of the Word—VB.
3. Śāstra-yonaye: cf.: (i) Śāstra-yonitvāt ! Brahma Śātra 1,1,3
(ii) arṣya mahālo bhadṛasya niḥsa stalk etad yad Rgvedo Tajur vedah sāma vedo’ttharavo‘girasah.
---Bṛha. Up. 4.5.11
(i) Knowable through śāstras i.e. The Vedas—VJ.
(ii) Hence whose testimony are the śāstras or the accurate conception about whom is found in śāstras—VT., SD.
4. nigamāya—The promulgator of Upaniṣadic knowledge—SS., VR.
* (i) VR: Salutations to you who enhance the attributive intelligence (dharma-bhūta-jñāna) of your devotees and reduce or diminish the knowledge of your non-devotees by shrouding them (as it were) with Māyā constituted of three guṇas who are indicated through the function of the mental faculties comprising of guṇas; the witness of the hearts of all beings simultaneously; the eternal self-illuminating light of knowledge.
(ii) VJ: We bow to you who shed light on sattva and other guṇas, as also on knowledge, devotion etc. (of the devotees); who dwell in the Prakṛti constituted of guṇas; whose existence is deduced through knowledge received through sense-organs; the self-knowing witness to all guṇas.
lect and the ego, in the form of four manifestations—vyūhas—(mentioned above); who shroud yourself under those guṇas and shine forth as many; who are indicated and perceived through the functions of the internal organ (mentioned above), who are merely the witness to the mental faculties or aspects (referred to above), yourself remaining self-knowing yet beyond the ken of perception.

47. Oh Lord! The Prompter of Senses! May our obeisance be paid to you whose greatness and working are beyond the comprehension (of our intellectual capacity), but are implicit as the cause of every phenomenon. You are the silent sage revelling in your own blissful self.

48.* We bow to you who are conversant with the ways (courses) of the high and low (or the gross and the subtle) and preside over them all; who are both transcendental to and immanent in the Universe, and its witness as well as the cause.

49. (Beings are under your control. How can you hold them responsible for their nature or behaviour) Oh Lord! Though perfectly detached, you wield the eternal power called

1. Sarva-Vyākṣta-siddhayet (i) You are the source of everything and everyone such as gods etc. that are manifested and the controller of senses—VR.

(ii) The source of the manifestation of the world of name and form (nāma-rūpātmaḥ jagat sarvaḥ vyākṣam, tasya siddhir utpattir yena)—VJ.

2. munayet etc. (i) You observe complete silence inspite of your mercifullness in protecting jivas (creatures) from three types of miseries, and your superiority to the world from god Brahmā to a clump of grass—VR.

(ii) The All-knowner who never speaks anything irrelevant or false—VJ.

*Salutations to you who know the state or condition of both the cause and the effect; who stand above them all; who are different from jivas yet are called viśva due to your presence in them—VJ.

(ii) We bow to you who know the causes of the gross and the subtle. You are the basis of the Universe which is superimposed on you. You are free from the conditions known as viśva, tajasa etc. Knowing that Kṛṣṇa was pleased with the fiftyfive epithets given to him in praise, the serpent's wives argue that the nature of a being is created as such by the Lord and hence Kālīya is not guilty as he acted according to his nature for which the Lord is responsible.—KD 16.46. 607-622.

3. Who are above the states called Viśva, tajasa etc. but still appear to be a part and parcel of it through Māyā—ŚR.
Time, and bring about the creation, preservation and destruction of this universe by means of guṇas (of Prakṛti). You carry on your fruitful sportive activity by awakening with your glance the various (latent) propensities in the nature of all creatures.

50* All these forms of quiet, turbulent and stupid natures found in all the three worlds, are the toys in your sports. Now the gentle-natured are dear to you, as you have incarnated for the establishment of righteousness, and you are present here to protect the saintly, righteous people (or your forms which desire to protect the righteous are gentle and dear).

51. The first offence of one’s child (or subject) deserves to be condoned (and tolerated) by the Lord. Oh tranquil-minded Lord! Be pleased to pardon this stupid creature who has not recognised you (your divine nature).

52. Be gracious to him, Oh Lord. The serpent is on the point of death. We, women, deserve to be pitied by the good and the righteous. Be pleased to grant unto us our life in the form of our husband.

53. May you be pleased to ordain us, your maid-servants, what we should do for you; for one who faithfully abides by your command, becomes free from fear of all kinds (or attains to liberation from samsāra).”

Śrī Śuka said:

54. The glorious Lord who was thus fervidly appealed to and praised by the wives of the serpent, left the swooning serpent whose hoods were badly smashed with his kicking (with heels).

55. Regaining gradually his senses and vitality, Kāliya began to breathe slowly with difficulty. The miserable creature folded its palms, addressed to Lord Kṛṣṇa (as follows).

Kāliya said:

56. Dominated as we are by tamas, we are wicked-mind-

* It behoves you to be gracious unto all gentle-natured (Sāttvikā), fierce-tempered (rājasī) and dull-natured (tāmasīka) forms, teeming in the three worlds. You have, however, incarnated for the protection of righteousness. Hence the protection to the gentle is dear to you and equally so are those who wish to renounce their offensive nature.

—VR.
ed since our very birth, and entertain wrath for a long time. It is difficult, Oh Lord, to relinquish one's natural disposition (whereby one identifies one's body with the soul and feels attachment to body and its belongings), as it exercises a powerful hold on people like an evil spirit.

57*. By you has been created this universe as the outcome of the three guṇas and is replete with various natures, prowess, energy, hereditary or class differences (seeds), latent desires and bodily shapes of forms, Oh Creator of the Universe.

58. Oh glorious Lord! In this world, we, serpents, are by nature deeply wrathful. Deluded by nature as we are, how can we escape from (the clutches of) your Māyā which is so difficult to shake off.

59. You, Omniscient Lord of the world, are the cause of relieving us from the influence of Māyā; therefore, be pleased to confer your grace or punishment on us as you deem it proper.

Śrī Śuka said:

60. Hearing his speech, the Lord who assumed the human form for a specific purpose (of helping gods) ordered: "You must not stay here, Oh serpent. Hurry up and go to the sea along with your wives, children and kinsmen. Let this river be used by cows and men.

61. Whatever mortal being remembers this command of mine to you, and recites it both in the morning and in the evening, shall have no fear from you (serpents).

62. Whoever, after taking bath in this pool, the scene of my sport, propitiates gods (and manes) by offering water-libations, and observing a fast, worships Me meditating on Me all the while, is absolved of all sins.

63. That Garuḍā of beautiful wings, in terror of whom, you fled (abandoned) the island Ramaṇaka and resorted to this pool, shall not now devour you, as you bear my foot-prints."

Śrī Śuka said:

64. Thus addressed by Lord Krṣṇa of miraculous feats,

* VJ. Although Viṣṇu is the creator of the Universe, god Brahmā created the different varieties of guṇas or natural characteristics. They are due to the variety in the proportions and combinations of svabhāva (in-born nature), viṛya (prowess), ojas (virility, vitality) etc.
Kāliya and his wives devoutly worshipped him with delight (at the assurance of safety from Garuḍa).

65-66. They worshipped the Lord of the Universe with celestial clothes, necklaces and gems and ornaments of superb quality, with heavenly perfumes and ointments and a grand wreath of blue lotuses. Having propitiated the Lord whose banner is Garuḍa, they, with great pleasure, circumambulated him and bowed to him and were duly permitted by the Lord.

67. Accompanied by his wives, friends and children, Kāliya went to the Ramanāka island in the sea. The Yamunā of nectar-like water became instantly rid of poison through the grace of the Lord, who out of sport has assumed a human form.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Rescue from the Forest Conflagration

King Parīkṣit enquired :

1. Why did Kāliya migrate from Ramanāka, the home of the Nāgas? Or what specific offence did he commit against Garuḍa?

Śrī Śūka replied :

2-3. Oh King of mighty arms! It was formerly agreed¹ that whatever share of offerings was received by the Nāgas, every month, from the serpent-worshippers, was to be dedicated to the noble-souled Garuḍa, and to be deposited on every New Moon day at the foot of a particular tree (in Ramanāka) by serpents who were the prey of Garuḍa. All Nāgas thus contributed their share for self-protection.

¹ V.B. quotes the following agreement brought about by Brahmā between Garuḍa and the serpents:

\[
\text{amāyāṁ vṛkṣa-mūle tu Nāga-lokesu yad bhavat} \]
\[
\text{ekasmin divase tāvad ekatra sthāpayantu hi} \]
\[
tato hi Garuḍas tasmins tad bhukte naiva pīḍayet \]
\[
iti vyavasthaya sarpa māsi māsi balim dadēḥ} \]

SS. states that they offered one serpent per month to Garuḍa.
4. Being elated with pride for its power and virulence of its poison, Kāliya, the son of Kadru, slighted Garuḍa, and ate up the offerings intended for him.

5. On learning this, the glorious Garuḍa, beloved of the Lord, got enraged, and with a desire to kill Kāliya, swooped down on it with terrific speed, Oh King.

6. Raising up its numerous heads (hoods), the serpent whose weapon is poison, advanced against Garuḍa who was vehemently rushing at it, and bit him with fangs as its weapons, and looked terrific with its dreadful tongues, poisonous hissing and cruel eyes.

7. Brushing it aside with the terrific vehemence of his speed, the wrathful Garuḍa, the son of Tārkṣya (the sage Kāśyapa), the carrier of Lord Viṣṇu and possessed of terrific prowess, struck it down with its left wing¹ brilliant like gold.

8. Struck down with the wing of Garuḍa, Kāliya became overwhelmed with fear and agitated. It entered the pool of the Yamunā that was out of bounds for Garuḍa, and hence unapproachable.

9. On one occasion Garuḍa, being extremely hungry carried away by force his favourite prey—an aquatic creature, though he was prohibited from doing so by the Sage Śaubhari.²

10. Seeing that the fish were greatly over-whelmed with grief and felt miserable due to the death of that fish king, Śaubhari, out of compassion for the aquatic creatures in that pool, and for the safety of the creatures living in that pool declared;

11. “If ever Garuḍa enters this pool and eats the fish hereof, he will instantly meet death. I utter the truth.”

12. Only Kāliya knew this (Śaubhari’s) curse but no other serpent knew it. So it resided in that pool out of the fear of Garuḍa. It was expelled out of it by Kṛṣṇa.

13-14. Finding Kṛṣṇa come out of the pool, decorated with heavenly garlands, sandal pigment and rich dress and

---

¹ VT. notes that it was to express his contempt for Kāliya that Garuḍa used his left wing.
² Probably the same sage who married all the fifty daughters of Māndhātā. It might be during his stay in the pool of the Yamunā for performing the penance, that the above incident took place. (vide Supra) 9.6. 39-55, also VP. 4.2.69-131) beautified with numerous costly big diamonds, gems and gold ornaments all over his Person, all cowherds leapt to their feet like sense-organs on return of life (or 'creatures after the return of the vital Principle'), and with their hearts overwhelmed with rapturous joy, embraced him with deep affection.

15. Regaining their consciousness, Yaśodā, Rohini, Nanda and other cowherds and cowherdesses got their desires fulfilled by meeting Kṛṣṇa.

16. Balarāma clasped Kṛṣṇa in the arms and laughed, as he knew the prowess of Kṛṣṇa.

16A. VR's text adds this half-verse:

He seated him on his lap and looked at him again and again in great affection. The trees, cows, bullocks, calves all were filled with extreme joy.

17. The Brāhmaṇa preceptors (of Nanda) along with their wives (who had already come there along with all the inhabitants of Vraja), now approached Nanda and congratulated him, "Thank God! How fortunate it is that your son seized by Kāliya is liberated from its clutches.

18. Confer some gifts on Brāhmaṇas, on account of the deliverance of Kṛṣṇa (from Kāliya)". Delighted at heart Nanda immediately gave cows and gold as gifts.

19. The highly fortunate Yaśodā who got restored to her child, which was as good as lost, hugged him. Seating him on her lap, he again and again shed tears of joy.

19-A VR's text adds:

In the meanwhile, when the sun set, Kṛṣṇa along with Rāma camped there along with their parents, cowherds and their wealth—the herds of cattle.

20. The inhabitants of Vraja and cows, oppressed as they were by hunger, thirst and physical exhaustion, passed that night near the bank of the Yamunā, oh King of Kings!

20-A VF.'s text adds: (a half verse)

At that time, in Vraja, Oh best of Kurus!

21. In the jungle dried up with summer, a great forest conflagration broke out at midnight, and surrounding the Vraja lying fast asleep, it began to scorch them.
22. Touched by the fire, the inhabitants of Vraja woke up and in their bewilderment sought resort to Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Lord who had assumed a human form through his Māyā.

23. “Oh Kṛṣṇa! Oh highly fortunate Kṛṣṇa! Oh Rāma! Oh Rāma of infinite prowess! This extremely terrific fire is now consuming us who are yours (your devotees).

24. Oh Lord! Protect us who are your well-wishers and friends, from this death-like (deadly) fire from which it is extremely difficult to escape. We cannot give up your feet (resorting to which) there is no fear from any quarter”.

25. Perceiving this helplessness and danger of his people (devotees), the Supreme Ruler of the earth, the Infinite Lord of unfathomable powers, swallowed up that terrible fire.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Slaying of the Demon Pralamba

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Surrounded by his kinsmen whose hearts were full of delight, Kṛṣṇa, whose glories were sung (by them), entered Vraja (looking) beautiful with herds of cows.

2. While they (Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa) assuming through their Māyā power, the guise of cowherds, were indulging in various sports, there was the advent of the season called the Summer which is not much pleasant to embodied beings.

3. It, however, appeared like the spring due to the special (environmental) characteristics of Vṛndāvana where the glorious Lord Keśava (Kṛṣṇa) was personally staying along with Balarāma.

4. It resounded with the sound of cascades that drowned the jingling of the crickets. It looked beautiful with clusters of trees constantly sprayed with the particles of water from the waterfalls.
5. Due to the pleasant breeze blowing over the waves of the rivers and the pools (and the cascades) and moistened with spray and carrying the fragrant pollen of white lilies, blue lotuses and other flowers, the inhabitants of that forest (Vṛndāvāna) which, covered with meadows richly overgrown with green grass, did not experience the scorching heat radiating from the sun and forest fires in the summer.

6. At the place, the scorching rays of the sun, fierce like virulent poison, were not able to dry up the moisture and verdant nature of the soil wherein the mixture of sand and mire on all sides of the bank remained always wet by the waves that used to beat against the banks of rivers with unfathomable water.

7. The resplendently beautiful forest was in full blossom and was resounded with the cries and notes of various birds and beasts, with singing peacocks and humming bees and warbling cuckoos and waterfowls.

8. With a desire to enjoy sports, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, accompanied by Balarāma and surrounded with cows and cowherds, entered the forest playing upon his flute.

9. With their persons decorated with tender foliage, peacock feathers, clusters of flowers and coloured earth, Balarāma, Kṛṣṇa and other cowherds indulged in dancing, wrestling and singing.

10. While Kṛṣṇa was dancing, some cowherds sang, some clapped their hands, some played on flutes or blew their horns, while others applauded and cheered up.

11. Gods who had assumed the forms of cowherds¹ and thus completely concealed their god-head, eulogised in applause both Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, as actors do to cheer up another actor (in spite of their master-servant relation).

12. The two brothers wearing side-locks, sometimes, sported by running in circles, long-jumps, shot-putting, striking of arms, tug-of-war and wrestling.

¹. VR. reads gopā-jāti-pratichannau as adj. qualifying ‘Kṛṣṇa-Rāmaṇau’ and interprets: ‘Gods who assumed the forms of cowherds glorified Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma who had completely concealed their divinity in the guise of cowherds.'
13. Sometimes while other cowherds were dancing both (Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) sang personally, and played on instruments and applauded (with words) “well-done! Buck up”, Oh great king.

14-16. Some time they would play with a Bīlva fruit, sometime with Kumbha fruit, and now with a handful of Āmalaka fruits (myrobalans). Sometimes (in a running race or with swift movements in an arena) they would playfully not allow themselves to be touched, while at times they would play hide-and-seek after shutting the eyes of a cowherd boy—or by blindfolding and such other games. Sometimes they would divert themselves by mimicking the sounds and notes of beasts, birds. Now they would indulge in jumping like frogs, and now they would cut jokes of various kinds; now by swinging with the help of branches of trees and sometimes by playing the role of kings.

Indulging in such sports well known among the people, they rambled all over the area in the rivers, on the mountains, in the valleys, bowers, in woods and lakes.

17. While Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa were grazing their cattle in the meadows of that forest, a demon called Pralamba assumed the guise of a cowherd and entered his followers with a view to kidnapping them.

18. Even though Kṛṣṇa, the omniscient (All-perceiving) Lord of the Yadu clan, knew it (his real intention), he agreed to be his playmate and friend, with an intention of finishing with him.

19. Kṛṣṇa, a past-master in games, summoned all the cowherds and proposed, “Oh comrade-cowherds! Now let us play by dividing ourselves into two suitable parties.”

20. In that game, the cowherds selected Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa as their captains—some (one party) accepted Kṛṣṇa’s side, while the rest (the other party) Balarāma’s side.

21. They indulged in various sports characterised by one party members to carry as mounts the members of the other party—the winners being the riders and the defeated party-members, the carriers.

22. In this way, some boys riding and some carrying and simultaneously grazing the cattle—they went near a banyan tree called Bhāṇḍiraka.

23. When cowherds like Śrīdāma, Vṛṣabha and others belonging to the party of Rāma, became victorious in the game, Kṛṣṇa and others carried them on their backs, Oh King.

24. Being defeated, Lord Kṛṣṇa bore Śrīdāman, Bhadra carried Vṛṣabha and Pralamba took Balarāma, the son of Rohini on his back.

25. Considering that Kṛṣṇa was irresistible, the prominent demon Pralamba swiftly carried away Balarāma far beyond the limit for dismounting.

26. When his progress was stopped by carrying Balarāma who grew weighty as the mount Meru (the king of all mountains), the demon who assumed his original (demonic) form adorned with gold ornaments and clothes, looked like a cloud illuminated with flashes of lightning carrying the Moon (the Lord of Stars) on his back.

27. Balarāma (the wielder of a plough as a weapon) was a bit disturbed to see the demon’s body soaring with crashing speed in the sky, and with burning eyes, terrific (frowning) brows, terrible jaws and teeth, hair like flames of blazing fire, weirdly dazzling with the splendour of gold wristlets, crown and ear-rings.

28. The very next moment, Balarāma regained his consciousness (of his divine nature) and grew fearless. And like Indra striking vehemently a mountain with his Vajra, in great rage, he dealt a heavy blow with his fist on the head of his enemy who was carrying him away from his group of cowherd friends.

29. The moment the blow descended on his head, it was shattered to pieces; vomiting blood profusely (from his mouth), he lost his consciousness. Giving out a terrific roar, the demon fell dead, like a mountain struck down by Indra’s weapon (thunderbolt).

30. Seeing the demon Pralamba killed by the mighty Balarāma, the cowherds were extremely astonished and shouted, “Bravo! well done!”

31. Pronouncing benedictions on him, they highly praised him. And he deserved it. With their hearts overwhelmed with affection, they embraced him as one returned from the realm of death.

32. When the sinful demon Pralamba was killed, gods felt highly gratified and happy. They showered on Balarâma wreaths of flowers and applauded him with their approbations "well done! Well done!"

CHAPTER NINETEEN
Swallowing up of a Forest-conflagration

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. While the cowherds were deeply engrossed in playing, their cows roamed to a great distance, grazing at will, and lured by green pasture, strayed into an inaccessible part of the dense jungle.

2. Entering from one forest (-area) to another, the she-goats, cows and she-buffaloes became thirsty while wandering in the forest, began to cry loudly and got into a thicket of reeds.

3. Not finding the cattle, cowherds, of whom Kṛṣṇa and Balarâma were prominent, felt repentance (for their dereliction of duty). Despite their search for the cows, they were at a loss to know where they could have gone.

4. Having thus lost their means of livelihood, the cowherds got perplexed not knowing what to do. Then all of them followed the track of the cows marked with their footprints and blades of grass cut by their hoofs.

5. Finding their wealth of cattle strayed from its path in the jungle of Muñja-grass and lowing helplessly, they directed their herds back and were overwhelmed with fatigue and thirst.

5-A. VR’s text adds:
Climbing up to the top of a tall tree and showing his personality dark like a cloud in complexion, Kṛṣṇa loudly called out those distressed cows by their individual names.
6. Being called by their names by the glorious Lord in a tone deep like the thundering of clouds, the cows became overwhelmed with joy to hear the sound of their names, and responded with lowing loudly.

7. Thereafter, as the Fate would have it, there broke out, on all side, a forest conflagration causing havoc in all the inhabitants of the forest. And helped by its assistant, the strong wind, the great fire appeared desirous of lapping up all the mobile and immobile creatures with its tongues of dreadful flames.

8. Observing the advance of the forest-fire on all sides, the cowherds and cows got horrified. Just as people afflicted with the fear of death seek asylum with Lord Hari, they resorted to Kṛṣṇa along with Balarāma, for shelter and prayed to Him.

9. "Oh Kṛṣṇa! Oh Kṛṣṇa of infinite prowess! Oh Balarāma! Balarāma of immeasurable power! It now behoves you to protect us who are being burnt by fire, and have approached you for asylum.

10. We are really your kinsmen and as such, should not be destroyed thus. You are the knower of all that is righteousness. We are all devoted to you and have in you our saviour." Śrī Śuka said:

11. Hearing the pitiful appeal of his cowherd-comrades, Lord Hari assured them, "Don't be afraid. Please close your eyes."

12. With the words 'Be it so', they closed their eyes when, in the meanwhile, Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Master of Yoga swallowed up that menacing conflagration and completely saved them from that calamity.

13. Then, on opening their eyes, they were extremely surprised to find themselves and their cows safe from danger, and brought over to Bhāndīra¹.

¹. From the details given in VT. about the bunyan tree called Bhāndīra, it appears that at the time of Jiva Gosvāmi, they located it to the Northwest of the Śiva temple called 'Śpāro' (?) near Vṛndāvana, and the jungle of muñja grass where the conflagration was swallowed up by Kṛṣṇa was ten miles to the south of the bunyan tree.

14. Observing that it was due to the yogic power of Kṛṣṇa and the manifestation of his Yogic Potency (yogamāyā) that they were delivered from (death from) the forest fire, they came to believe in his divine nature.

15. Tending homewards the cows in the evening, Kṛṣṇa along with Balarāma, returned to Vraja, playing on his flute, while the cowherd boys were singing his praise.

16. The very sight of Kṛṣṇa (Govinda) filled the Gopīs (cowherd-women) with Supreme delight, as every moment of separation from him was felt by them as a hundred ages (yugas).

CHAPTER TWENTY

Description of the Rainy Season and the Autumn

Śrī Śuka said*:

1. The cowherd-boys related to their mothers and other women-folk (particularizing the special points) in details, the miraculous feats of them both (viz. of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) as to how Kṛṣṇa rescued them from a forest-conflagration, and how Balarāma killed the demon Pralamba.

2. Listening to the account, elderly cowherds and cowherd women were astonished. They (thenceforth) looked upon Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma as the most prominent gods who have come down to stay in Vraja.

3. Then (after the summer), there was the advent of the rainy season which is favourable to the regeneration of all be-

* In VJ.'s text verses 1 and 2 form a part of the last i.e. VJ's 17th chapter. VJ's new (18th) chapter begins from the 3rd verse of this (20th) chapter.

 Note : VV. 3-24 give a spiritually suggestive, beautiful description of the rainy season in the epic style. Annotators have tried to find some 'hidden meaning' convenient to their school of thought in these verses.

VJ. regards this description as an illustration (dṛṣṭānta) of the deep or superficial (of pure and not so pure) devotion to god Nārāyaṇa. (Nārāyaṇa-bhakti-vaiśādyavaiśādy-a-dṛṣṭāntatvena Prāvid ōtum varṇayati / ings, and during which, the sky appears beautiful with refulgent circles (round the Sun and the Moon), and is resounded with thunders.

4. Being overspread with thick dark blue clouds (heavy with water), attended with lightning and thunder, and with its light (of the Sun or the Moon) being obscured and dimmed, the sky looked like Brahman modified by the conditioning guṇas of Prakṛti¹ (or the individual soul whose spiritual wisdom is obscured by sattva, rajas and tamas each corresponding to the lightning, thunder and clouds which overcast the sky)².

5. (Like a king redistributing his wealth for public welfare to his subjects, from whom he collected it in the form of land revenue and other taxes). At the proper time (in the rainy season), the Sun-god or the Rainy season³ began to release the wealth in the form of water to the earth from which he absorbed it with his rays, during the (last) eight months.

6. Mighty clouds charged with lightning (with which they viewed the earth parched with the summer heat) and violently tossed by tempestuous winds (as if they were overwhelmed with compassion for the world afflicted with the summer) showered down the life-giving⁴ water (resuscitating the world) which brought delight to all, just as merciful persons⁵ lay down their lives out of compassion for the harassed and tormented people.

¹. Saguna Brahman—(1) Individual soul conditioned by guṇas but capable of expanding by guṇas and not physically—VR (2) Four-faced god Brahmā—VJ

². (i) VR : By nature, the sky is clear, pure and bright but gets darkened by clouds etc. So also though knowledge is inherent in the Īśvara, the cognitive power remains ineffective till the Īśvara attains Liberation or mukti. Hence one should try for Liberation.

(ii) The Sun: the brightest luminary is shrouded with clouds like god Brahmā with the three guṇas,—VJ.

³. Parījanya—The sun-god who presides over the thundering clouds—VJ.

⁴. v.l. prāṇinām—The very life of living beings—VR.

⁵. Just as the glances of Lord Kṛṣṇa shower the water in the form of Spiritual Knowledge on his earnest devotees—VJ.
7.* Just as the shrivelled and emaciated body of a person undergoing severe austerities for the attainment of some desired object, regains its normal health and plumpness after the realization of that object, the earth that was parched and shrivelled through the heat of the sun (in the summer), now swelled up (and became green) when drenched with water by the rain-god.

8. At the nightfall (when the sky is overcast with clouds) it is the fire-flies and not the planets that shine through darkness even as the heretical scriptures dazzle in their sins, in the Kali age and not the Vedas.

9. Just as young Brāhmaṇa pupils break their silence at the end of their daily religious routine, and begin their recitation of the Vedas on hearing the voice of their preceptor, the hibernating frogs which were lying silent, broke out croaking on hearing the sound of rains (or the thunder of the rainy clouds).

10. Rivulets that dry up in the summer, now overflow their banks and flowed into the wrong channel, like the body and riches of persons with unrestrained mind (and enslaved by their senses) and misdirected to the wrong track.

11. Like the army (camp) of a king, the earth appeared green with verdant grass (at some places), crimson-coloured by (the crowds of) Indragopa insects, and at some places, it became covered with the growth of umbrella-shaped mushrooms.

12. Fields with their rich crop brought delight to the farmers and heart-burning to the rich (feeling jealousy towards

---

* This verse shows the pravrtti marga of worldly prosperity—VJ.

 SR & KD.: Fields caused joy or grief to the farmers according to the richness or failure of harvests as they did not know that everything depends on destiny.

V.T. takes kṣetra as 'a body'.

V.R.: The verse teaches that one should feel joy at the prosperity of others.

V.J. interprets kṣetra as 'a sacred place' and explains: Due to the vision of the great glory of the Lord, holy places bring joy. But to those who are proud and materialistic and think about the cost of pilgrimage find that the same holy places are full of misery and anxiety. One who is keen on getting Mokṣa (Liberation) should devote himself to the lotus feet of Hari.'

1. VB.: To the proud kings who are bent on conquering the enemies, the rains and fields covered with crops, cause obstruction and troubles, as they do not know that victory or defeat depends on the Will of the Lord.
the farmers) as they did not know that everything depends on the luck.

13.† Being drenched with the fresh rain-waters,\(^1\) all beings living on the land and in water assumed a beautiful, winsome appearance immediately, even as persons attain to attractive divine form\(^2\) through the service (worship and contemplation) of Hari (due to its being the highest form of religion and of supremely blissful nature).

14. The sea, the waters of which are already tossed into high waves by stormy winds, becomes more violently agitated at the confluences with rivers, even as the heart of an immature yogi, still influenced with passions, becomes highly perturbed by contacts with worldly objects.\(^3\)

15. Though continuously subjected to the down-pour of rains, the mountains were not agitated at all, like the devotees of Hari whose minds are absorbed in the meditation of the Lord and are not perturbed even under overwhelming calamities (of threefold nature).

16. Being unused (or unrepaired for a long time) and hence overgrown and covered with grass, the tracks and paths become doubtful (unrecognizable) like the Vedas which are not properly studied (and repeatedly recited), get consigned to oblivion by the force (passage) of time.

17. Just as pleasure-seeking women bear no constancy to men of virtue and merit (if devoid of money), the fickle-hearted * VT. endorses ŚR. and states that both the process and attainment (sādhana-vasthā and sādhyāvasthā) of the service of Hari are supremely blissful.

VR. : No Grace can be attained except through the service of Hari.

1. VJ. interprets vāri as ‘knowledge’ that removes the misery of saṁsāra of the denizens of the nether-world (pātāla), inhabitants of the terrestrial globe and residents of the higher (celestial) world. To these inhabitants, pure spiritual knowledge leading to gracious divine forms, is attainable through the service of Hari.

2. VB. : Just as devotees assume the four-armed divinely refulgent Hari-like form etc. ‘The inhabitants of land etc.’ stand for persons characterised by saṁsāra, rajas and tamas.

3. guṇa—(i) rajo-guṇa—VJ.

(ii) Natural propensities creating agitation in the mind for sensual pleasure. These are to be controlled by meditating on Hari.—VR.
flashes of lightning did not remain constant (and faithful) to clouds which are the friends of the world.

18. Just as the attributeless Supreme Person manifests himself which is a product or conglomeration of guṇas, (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas), the rain-bow (Indra’s bow) though devoid of a guṇa (a string), shone forth in the sky, the special quality (guṇa) of which is sound.

19. Veiled over by clouds shining with her own beams of light, the moon did not shine forth like the individual soul, enveloped and shrouded in its ego-sense, illumined by its own light.

20. Just as persons sorely distressed and (hence) disgusted with the miseries of household life (samsāra) feel delighted at the arrival of the devotees of Lord Kṛṣṇa, peacocks to which the advent of the rainy season (lit. the appearance of the clouds) is itself an occasion of joy, become exulted with their hair (feathers) standing on their end (while dancing with their feathers spread out).

21.* Just as persons, at first grown emaciated and exhausted through asceticism, become stout and robust on attaining the fruition of their desires, the trees shrunk and dried up through the heat of the summer, sucked water through their feet (i.e. roots) and assumed many new (rich) forms (putting forth luxuriantly new branches, foliage, fresh blossoms, fruits etc.).

22. (This verse shows the characteristics of persons permanently indulging in samsāra—nitya-samsāri).

The cranes continue to stay even in sliding, miry and thorny banks of lakes, Oh Parīkṣit, like unto wicked-minded persons given to low pleasures, continue to live in houses wherein they carry on their detestable cruel (lit. of non-pacific nature) jobs.

* VR. Persons performing penance with some material end , in view grow emaciated through penance, but after realizing the fruition of their desire, become multiplied in the form of sons, grandsons etc., and persons who, with no ulterior motive except the propitiation of the Lord, perform penance, attain Liberation, and are endowed with various supernatural forms and life similar to the Lord.

VJ. interprets pādapa as ‘ascetics’ and explains: As ascetics performing penance, drink the ambrosia of Śāstri knowledge and controlling their senses and minds realize the Supreme Soul (paramĀtmān) Himself.
23. While the god of rains poured down showers of rains, dams and bridges got damaged and breached by floods, just as the paths\(^1\) of religious duties prescribed for different classes of society (varṇas) and stages of life (āśramas) in the Vedas, are breached by attacks of false heretical theories in the Kali Age.

24. Clouds impelled by winds showered their nectar-like waters to creatures below, just as rulers of the earth or merchant kings advised by Brāhmaṇas at opportune times, distribute their blessed wealth among the subjects (or carry out works of social welfare).

25. When the forest was thus abounding in trees richly laden with ripe dates and rose apples, Kṛṣṇa, surrounded by cows and cowherds, and accompanied by Balarāma, entered in it for sporting.

26. At the call of Kṛṣṇa, cows which (normally) proceeded in slow gait owing to the weight of heavy udders, hastened with quick steps, showering with joy the milk from their udders on the way.

27. On the way, Lord Kṛṣṇa saw the inhabitants of the forest (men, birds and beasts) exulted with joy, rows of trees dripping with honey, streams of waters cascading from hills, and their echoing sound in the hills and the caves that were at hand.

28. Sometimes when it rained, the Lord took shelter under a tree or entered a cave, and sported Himself joyously eating bulbs, roots and fruits.

29. Accompanied by Balarāma, he sat on a slab of stone near water, and ate the rice mixed with curds (brought from home), sharing it with cowherds who were to sit with him for the meal.\(^2\)

30-31. Beholding the bulls and calves lying on the lush green grass ruminating in great satisfaction, with their eyes

---

1. Due to the heretical arguments advanced by the Buddha and his followers the Vedic paths of action (Karma), of Knowledge and of Devotion are broken down—VB. Bhakti, however, has a place in non-vedic religions in India.

2. Includes the followers of āgamas and tantras under heretics.

2. Some other cowherds made their own arrangement at different places—VB.
closed, and cows fatigued with the heavy weight of their udders (also resting and chewing the cud in satisfaction), and the splendid beauty of the rainy season enhanced by his own enchanting powers, bringing delight to all creatures, the Lord felt gratified (with them all).

32. While Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa were dwelling at that Vraja in this way, the autumn characterised by cloudless skies crystal-like waters and gentle breezes, set in.

33. (Originally waters are crystal clear, but they become turbid due to rainy season). Now due to the autumnal season which makes the lotus-plants blossom forth, waters have regained their original translucent nature, just as the minds of persons who have fallen from the path of yoga, regain their mental serenity by resuming their yogic practices.

34. Just as devotion to Kṛṣṇa removes all the evils setting upon persons belonging to different stages of life (āśramas), the Autumn dispelled all the clouds from the sky and prevented the contacts of the elements or the congestion of created beings, dried up the mire on the earth, and cleansed the turbidity from water.

35. Having discharged (and thus renounced) all their possessions (in the form of the waters in them), the clouds shone forth in their spotless white splendour, as quiescent sages who have absolved themselves of all sins do, after renouncing all their three-fold desires (about progeny, property and celebrity).

36. Just as people with spiritual wisdom impart their nectar-like knowledge on some occasions, and refuse to do so on others, the mountains also at some places allowed the streams of pure water to flow, while at others they withheld them.

37. Just as ignorant persons immersed in their household matters are not cognisant of the daily shortening of the span of their life, so the creatures in shallow waters did not perceive the diminishing water level every day.

38. Just as a poverty-stricken, wretched man burdened with family responsibilities but of uncontrolled senses, undergoes

1. SR. enumerates the evils: The trouble of physical work during studenthood, the pangs of separation in married state, and sexual passions etc in sanyāsins.
miseries, the creatures in shallow waters suffered from the heat of the autumnal sun.

39. Marshy tracts of land gradually gave up their marshiness, and the plants their unripeness, just as (spiritually) wise men slowly (step by step) discard their notions of 'I' and 'mine' with respect to their bodies and belongings which are distinctly different from their self.

40. When the season of autumn set in, the waters of the ocean grew calm and still, even as a meditative sage established in his self, gives up ritualistic performances and recitation of the Vedas.

41. Cultivators secured the supply of water to their fields by strengthening the bunds (and thus stopping the breaches and leakages), just as Yogins, by control of senses, preserve their spiritual knowledge which otherwise gets dissipated (through unsubdued senses)\(^1\).

42. The moon relieved the sufferings of creatures caused by the rays (heat) of the autumnal sun, just as the (revelation of) spiritual knowledge alleviates the troubles caused by the (false) identification of the body with the soul, or Lord Kṛṣṇa removes the pangs of separation of (cowherd) women of Vraja.

43. The cloudless sky shone forth beautifully with bright stars twinkling clearly in autumnal nights, as the mind with the predominance of Sattva, correctly comprehends the import of the Vedas (Śabda-Brahman) as decided by the Pūrva and Uttara Mīmāṁsās.

44. The full moon, surrounded by stars, shone resplendent in the heavens, just as Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Yadus, did in his circle of Vṛṣṇī clansmen, on the earth.

45. People, embraced by the (cooling) temperate breeze which has blown over blossoming forests, felt relieved of the heat (of the sun) but not so the Gopa women whose heart was stolen (captivated) by Kṛṣṇa (whom they embraced in their hearts) as the pangs of actual separation were enhanced thereby.

46. Due to the (fecundating influence of the) Autumn, and through the insistent courting of their mates, cows, female deer

---

\(^1\) VB. aptly quotes:

\[
\text{urdhvendriyais tu viśeṣo jñānasyādho vinājanam ā}
\]
\[
nirodhe puṁja-bhāvaṇa svakāśyaḥ sādhayaḥ dhruvam //}

(or beasts), she-birds and women, conceived (irrespective of their willingness), just as the acts for propitiating the Lord are followed by the concomitant fruit (automatically).

47. At the sunrise all lotuses (except moon-lotuses) bloomed forth, just as all subjects except criminals (or robbers) become fearless on the installation of a king (i.e. restoration of good government).

48. The earth, rich with ripe cornfields, shone bright and beautiful, especially due to the incarnation of the two rays (āṇyas) of Lord Hari (viz. Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) and also with the performance of Vedic sacrifices of harvest season (wherein new corn is offered), and with festivities and grand celebrations gratifying the senses, which were carried on in cities and villages.

49. Just as Siddhas (the masters of yoga and mantras—mystic incantations), detained (in their present bodies) by their ordained span of life, attain their respective desired heavenly bodies, when the appropriate time arrives, merchants, sages, kings and snātakas (life-long bachelor-students) shut up in their places due to the rainy-season, (and were impeded from undertaking an expedition or journey) now set out to achieve their respective objects.

CHAPTER TWENTYONE*

The Song of Gopīs (cowherd-women)

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. In this beautiful forest, with its waters made crystal-clear by the Autumn, and caressed by a breeze surcharged with the fragrance of beds of lotuses, Lord Kṛṣṇa entered deep, along with his cows and cowherds.

* Ch. XIX according to VJ.'s text. He thinks that the object of this chapter is to emphasize that everyone should perform devotion, the means of spiritual knowledge, according to his capacity—

sva-yogatānusāreṇa Harau jhāna-sādhanam bhākṣīḥ kartavyā
2. While grazing the cattle, Kṛṣṇa, in company of cow-herds and Balarāma, entered deep into the forests, the lakes, rivers and mountains wherein were resonant with the warbling of flocks of enraptured birds and hummings of bees; through the glades of trees adorned with their floral wealth; and he played charmingly on his flute.

3. When the damsels of Vṛṣṇi heard from a distance that enchanting music of the flute exciting erotic sentiments, some of them sung unto their friends the excellences of Kṛṣṇa, in his absence.

4. Hardly did they begin to describe when, remembering his dalliance with them, they could not proceed, as their mind was distracted by the vehement force of passion, Oh King.

5. (The cowherd women depict their mental vision of Kṛṣṇa as he entered Vṛndāvana. This visualization of Kṛṣṇa distracted the Gopīs as mentioned in the above verse.) Possessed of a charming personality like an accomplished actor, graced with a crown of peacock feathers, his ears

1. cukūja—(i) played on, sounded—ŚR., VR., SD. (ii) conveying an erotic invitation to Gopīs—VJ., VB.

2. VB. says that it was a divine music. Hence it could be heard from such a long distance.

3. SG. & VT. carefully exclude elderly ladies like Yaśodā and Rohini from this effect. In them, motherly affection was awakened. While Rādhā being deeply moved conveyed her feelings to her friends like Lalitā. The text of the Bh. P., however, is silent about names of erotically excited gopīs, including Rādhā.

4. v.i. nāṭu-vara-vajāḥ—(i) The most beautiful among all the forms assumed so far by the Lord.—VT. (ii) Just as an actor puts on a special dress for playing a particular part on the stage, the Lord assumed this human form with this special dress on the stage of the world.—SG. (iii) By looking at which (form), all beings dance with joy—SG.

5. MR. (Miśra Rāmakṛṣṇa in his com. Prema-mañjart) quotes from Kṛṣṇa-yāmala.

Rādhā-priya-mayūrasya patram Rādhēkṣaṇa-prabham / bibharti śīrādā Kṛṣṇas tasyād eḍānibham yataḥ 1/

A poetic explanation that Kṛṣṇa wore the feathers of a peacock due to the similarity of the 'eye' (eye-like bright bluish coloured centre) of the feather to Rādhā's eye.
decorated by kărṇikāra flowers, clad in garments (brilliant) yellow like molten gold, wearing the Vaijayanti wreath made of flowers of five different colours, (consisting of tulasi, kunda, mandāra, pārijāta and lotuses) filling the holes of his flute with the nectar of his lips and accompanied by the cowherds singing his glory, Krṣṇa entered the Vṛndāvana forest, beautified with his foot-prints.

5A. VF’s text adds:

Kṛṣṇa wore a crest of peacock’s feathers and appeared as a forest-dweller with Kărṇikāra flowers adorning his ears. He rested his face on his left arm (his face was turned to the left). Breathing through the flute with appropriate histrionic movements of eye-brows and fingers, he made all the hosts of cowherds sing classical music (the Gāndharva Veda as compiled by Bharata), and gave delight to all the creatures in the world.

6. Listening to the music of the flute which bewitched and transported the hearts of all beings, all the women of Vraja embraced him mentally, as they were (each) engaged in describing it.

The cowherd women sang:

7. “This is the highest reward of being blessed with eyes; we do not know if there can be any greater felicity than this, Oh friends. Those only have enjoyed the fruit who have drunk to their hearts’ content (ni-pīṭam) (the charm) of the counte-

---

1. MR. in his com. (mentioned above) quotes a verse giving names of flowers woven in the Vaijayanti wreath:

   *Tulasi-kunda-mandāra-pārijāta-saroruhaiḥ /
   pantebhiḥ kusumāir etair vanamālā prakṛtipā //

   2. The musical notes issuing from the flute were sweet like nectar to the ear, but this sweetness is transferred poetically to the breath that issued from Krṣṇa’s lips (mouth)—VB.

3. Balarāma is implied in Krṣṇa as that was the inseparable pair.

* It is presumed that the gōpts, one after another sing these verses. The names of gōpts given in SG or VT are not mentioned in the Text of the Bh. P. The gōpts express their eagerness to be with Lord Krṣṇa to enjoy his company personally, and each regards herself as unfortunate as compared even with inanimate objects like rivers and Govardhana hill which are supposed to enjoy Krṣṇa’s melodious music on the flute.
nance of the sons of Nanda as they played on the flute, casting around their loving side-glances at the time of tending their cattle to the forest, along with their cowherd-companions.

8. Picturesquely clad in garments interwoven with tender mango-leaves, with tufts of peacock feathers, and bunches of flowers (decorating the head), and wearing wreaths of lilies and lotuses, and singing1 and dancing freely sometimes in the midst of the group of cowherds, they (Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) appeared exceedingly beautiful like actors on the stage.

9. Oh Gopīs! What infinitely great meritorious acts must have been performed by this flute, in consequence of which it can freely enjoy to its heart’s content, the nectar flowing from the lips of Dāmodara (Kṛṣṇa)—which is the legitimate monopoly of Gopīs—and leaves but little to others; the rivers (which like mothers nourished with their waters the life of the bamboo of which the flute is made) which enjoyed a part of it, expressed their ecstasy with the blooming of lotuses (like hair standing on their ends with joy). The bamboos (the parent of the flute) like righteous elderly people shedding tears of joy to find a great devotee of the Lord born in their family, shed drops of dew.

10. Oh friend! Vṛndāvana which has attained the splendid beauty of bearing the imprints of the lotus-feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa,2 has enhanced the glory of the earth (far above

1. gāyamāna—Some times when exhausted they invited other cowherd boys to sing at intervals and exhibited their superiority. The cowherd boys are blessed as they could fully enjoy the singing and dancing of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa who felt shy to do so at Vraja among elderly people. Hence the Gopīs felt that they are extremely unfortunate, as they missed the free exhibition of dancing and singing of Kṛṣṇa—SG.

VT. repeats SG. VB. explains how this Lord’s act was full of all rasas. His rasa theory is beyond the scope of a footnote.

2. The epithet is Devaki-suta ‘the son of Devaki’, and not Yaśodā-suta ‘the son of Yaśodā’. In fact, the goptīs did not know that Kṛṣṇa was Devaki’s son, and they presumed that he was Yaśodā’s son. The narrator Śuka and members of the audience, knew that Kṛṣṇa was Devaki’s son, and hence the author of the Bh. P. who represented that it was Śuka that of the heaven). While seeing the rapturous dance of peacocks on hearing the music of Kṛṣṇa’s flute, which they felt to be deep and low rumbling of clouds, all other animals on the hills stood motionless.¹

11. Blessed are the female deer which though lacking in reasoning, capacity (due to their birth in animal species) offer, along with their mates, the black-antelopes, their worship to him with their loving glances, on hearing the music of flute played by the picturesquely dressed Kṛṣṇa, the son (or delight) of Nanda (while our cowherd-husbands are too petty-minded to tolerate it, if we do the same).

12. Beholding Kṛṣṇa, whose handsome appearance and amiable disposition were enhancing the delight of women, and listening to the enchanting music played upon by him, celestial damsels moving in the aerial cars (seated on the laps of their heavenly husbands) became infatuated under the spell of the god of love, and had the chaplets of flowers drop down from the braids of their hair, and the folds of their garments slip down and unsettled.

13. And the cows quaffed, with goblets in the form of their ears raised erect, the nectar-like melodious music of the flute flowing from the mouth (i.e. the breath) of Kṛṣṇa, and the calves stood entranced and motion-less, holding in their mouth the mouthful of milk sucked from the flowing udders who reported even this speech of Gopīṣ, used the term Devaki-suta, without being aware of the slip. SG., VT., VC defend it by quoting from Bhad-Viṣṇu Purāṇa that ‘Yaśodā’ and ‘Devaki’ are two names of Nanda’s wife.

dve nāṁ nanda-bhāryaṁ Yaśodā Devakītāpi ī

But the quotation is not found in my (Gita Press, Gorakhpur) edition of VP. Other annotators accept the epithet Devaki-Suta as Kṛṣṇa, and have just ignored the textual slip. SG.’s defence that Devaki merely gave birth to Kṛṣṇa, but he was really brought up by Yaśodā (suta-sadbhava evalaṁ tayā prasūta eva, putras tu Yaśodāyā eva iti bhāvaḥ) is merely a cover-up.

¹. SJ. interprets the motionlessness as ‘swoon due to the impact of divine love’ (Prema-mūrcchā). This blessed state is not enjoyed even in Vaikuṇṭha. The gopīṣ regret their misfortune of not being transported to that swoon-like state. This shows the unsati able nature of Divine Love.

2. This is the manifestation of Śāntvika-vikāra—SG.
(of their mothers). Through (the medium of) their eyes, they embraced Govinda (Lord Kṛṣṇa), with tears of joy trickling from their eyes.

14. How wonderful! Oh mother! The birds in this forest must most probably be considered as sages, for (just as sages desirous of visualizing Kṛṣṇa follow different branches of the Veda, and perform the duties prescribed therein, without any desire for the fruits accruing from them), the birds are perching on the branches of trees covered with charming fresh foliage (without flowers and fruit obstructing Kṛṣṇa’s sight) in order to have complete (unobstructed) view of Kṛṣṇa with un-winking eyes, and to listen to the melodious music of the flute (with full absorbing attention), remaining speechless and oblivious to the external world (like sages happily absorbed in Kṛṣṇa’s music or praise).

15. Listening to the music of Kṛṣṇa with wrapt attention, even the (inanimate) rivers exhibited their passion for him, by the whirlpools which thereby diminished the rapidity of their currents (flowing to the sea, their Lord), and (under the pretext of) offering him the present of lotuses, they, with the arms in the form of waves, clasped the pair of his feet, as if to camouflage their act of embracing.

16*. Perceiving that in the heat of the sun, Kṛṣṇa pasturing the cattle of Vraja in company of Balarāma and cowherds, and himself following them playing on the flute, the rain-cloud (due to Kṛṣṇa’s being similar to it in complexion and dispel-

1. VJ. (and as an alternative explanation SG. & VT.) regard snuṭastana-payah-kavalāḥ an adj. qualifying gāvah (cows), and interpret: “With milk flowing from their udders and a mouthful of grass in their mouth”. I think the music of the flute enchanted both the cows and the calves, and they forgot even to swallow the mouthful of milk. Hence my translation as above.

2. v.l. Sṛṅvānti mitiṭadāyāḥ ‘Listening with half-closed eyes’—SG. “Listen with closed eyes without looking at anything else”—SD.

* VT. states that noticing the effect of the heat of the Sun on the cattle and cowherds, Kṛṣṇa played the musical mode called mallaṇa rāga (Megha-mallaṇa rāga) on his flute, which effected a shower. It is believed that if this rāga (musical mode) is scientifically sung, it brings rain-showers immediately.

3. With its eyes of lightning—VT.
ling heat-like distress of the people) arose and out of overflowing friendliness to him, spread out his body as an umbrella over them, and showered him with flowers\(^1\) (i.e. flower-like showers).

17. Perfectly accomplished of purpose are the Pulinda (including aboriginal and backward class) women who, after being overcome and distressed with passion at the sight of the saffron (colour) sticking to the blades of grass (as well as rocks and other places)—the saffron-paste originally applied to the breast of the Divine Consort\(^2\) (of Kṛṣṇa) and rendered still more charming by its contact with the reddish, lotus-like feet of the Lord of high renown (or whose glory is sung in the Vedas)—got cured of those pangs (of having a vision of Kṛṣṇa) by smearing their faces and breasts with that paste.

18. “Alas! Oh friends! Even this mount Govardhana is the foremost among the servants (devotees) of Lord Hari, inasmuch as it derives extremely high delight from the touch of the feet of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, and it receives them with respect, catering to their needs and to those of their (cowherd) friends and cattle, by offering fresh water, good grazing ground, caverns for shelter and edible bulbs and roots.

19. Oh friend! Of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma who tend their cattle from one forest to another along with their young cowherd friends, and characterised by carrying ropes\(^3\) (for tying hind-legs of cows when milking), and string-nooses (for controlling unruly cows), it is, however, wonderful that the sublimely sweet and melodious notes of their flutes cause motionlessness in mobile corporeal beings, and induce bristling with joy (which is a form of motion) among the (immobile) trees.”

20. While describing to each other such (fascinating) sports of the Lord who ranged over the forest called Vṛndāvana, the cowherd-ladies became completely absorbed in them (or in him).

---

1. The flowers of the clouds are the rain-drops— megha-puspam ghana-rasam quote SG. and VT.

2. VT. insists that she is no other than Rādhā.

3. nīryoga-pāśa etc.—Extremely powerful bonds or ties created by vāga—VJ.
CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

Cowherd-maids Pray to Kātyāyanī—Krśṇa’s carrying away their garments

Śrī Śuka said:

1. In the first month (Mārgaśīrṣa), in the season of Hemanta,¹ maids in the Vraja (cowherd-settlement of Nanda), observed the vow of adoring goddess Kātyāyanī, eating only pure food fit for being offered to sacrificial fire.

2-3. Having taken bath in the waters of the Yamunā at day-break, they made an image in sand of the goddess, just near the river water, on the bank, and worshipped her with sandal-paste, fragrant flowers, offering her propitiatory oblations, burning frank-incense, waving lights before her, and presenting other miscellaneous gifts of varying costs, along with tender shoots, fruits and unbroken grains of rice.

4. Those virgins performed the worship of the goddess, each repeating the prayer (as a mantra or incantation): “Oh goddess Kātyāyanī! Oh great deluding potency of the Lord! Oh great yogini (of great Super-human powers)! Oh absolute ruler of the universe! Be pleased to grant the son of cowherd Nanda (i.e. Krśṇa) as my husband!”

5. The maidens who have set their heart on Krśṇa, observed the vow for the period of a month, worshipping goddess Bhadrakāli with the prayer, “May Nanda’s son be our husband”.

6. Getting up early in the morning, and calling others by their names (to wake them up), they sang in loud chorus

* It is significant that this episode is not given in the HVP and VP. The object of this chapter is to demonstrate that devotion alone ‘generates’ (brings about) the Lord’s grace.

bhaktir eva bhagavat-prasāda-jananītī dartayitum—VJ.

1. This season consists of the following months of the Hindu calendar—Mārgaśīrṣa and Pauṣa.

2. This Sanskrit verse is regarded as a mantra and it is to be repeated 1,600 times a day, during the period of Kātyāyanī-vrata—KD.22.62.

VT and VC, quote Nārada-pañcarātra to show that every mantra about Krśṇa has goddess Durgā as the presiding deity. Hence the justification of this vrata and japa for getting Krśṇa as a husband.
the glory of Lord Kṛṣṇa, as they went to bathe in the Yamunā clasping each other’s hand.

7. On one occasion (on the last day of that vow which was a full-moon day), they, as usual, left their garments on the bank, and singing the glory of Kṛṣṇa, they sported in the water merrily (as that was the concluding day of their vow). Thus they concentrated on him in mind, word and deed).¹

8. Understanding their intention, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Master of all other experts in yoga,² surrounded by his companions,³ went there to grant them the fruit of their vow.⁴

9. It is traditionally reported that he collected all their garments and quickly climbed a Kadamba tree (nearby). Laughing loudly, he spoke to them in fun, while (other) boys also kept a-laughing.

10. “Oh delicate girls! As you are exhausted by observing a religious vow, I am not joking. Earnestly I tell you. Let each of you come here at will, and receive her respective garments.

11. As these (cowherd) boys know it, I have never spoken a lie up till now. Oh girls with beautiful waist (Oh girls of pure hearts)! You may come here one by one or all together, and take your own clothes.⁵

---

¹ evam mānasa-vācika-kāyikatānātvam darśitam—VT. The poet-announcer K.D. says that the maidens imagined the bluish water of Yamunā as the person of Kṛṣṇa and embraced Him (in the form of water) and kissed it etc.—KD.22.84-87.

² The epithets bhagavān yogēsvareśvarah shows that it is the ‘eternal metaphysical Lord—the third aspect of the Reality’ which is implied here and not the human Vāsudeva Kṛṣṇa (vide Intro. XLVIII-XLIX Bh.P. vol. I). K.D. underscores the same, ‘He became many to satisfy them.’ —KD. 22.99.

³ VT. quotes Gautami Tantra and shows that these companions are ‘Intellect, ego, mind, heart’.

⁴ VB. thinks that the maidens have committed the following faults: nude bath, breaking of silence and playing while observing a vow. To purge them of these, Lord Kṛṣṇa came there and by his look did it.

⁵ It is the erotically tinged devotion of Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavas which makes VT. state that Kṛṣṇa was desirous of seeing the central part of their
12. Perceiving (the implications of) his joke, the cowherd girls were overcome with love. Bashfully they looked at each other and smiled, but none came out of the water.

13. When Kṛṣṇa was speaking to them jocularly, the girls got confused in their mind. Keeping themselves immersed in the cold water up to the neck, they requested him, while shivering with cold.

14. "Oh dear Kṛṣṇa! Pray, do not be unjust to us. Darling! We know that you, the son of Nanda, are our beloved, whom the whole of Vṛṣṇi praises. Pray, do return our clothes to us, as we are shivering (with biting cold).

15. Oh beautiful Kṛṣṇa of charmingly bluish complexion! We are your servants. We all shall carry out your behests. You are a knower of dharma (righteous conduct). Pray return our clothes, else we shall (be constrained to) report the matter to the king (Nanda)" (threatened the elderly gopi's).

The glorious Lord said:

16. "If you are my servants (as you say), and undertake to abide by my biddings, come here and take back each your (respective) clothes, have a countenance beaming with a smile.

16A. VJ. and VT. record a half-verse

Otherwise, I will not return the garments. What will the angry chief do to me?".

bodies (yūṣmākam madhyabhāgadisaundaryam eva draṣṭum isyate, na ca vastrair etair maṭpajotanam iśi nigūḍho bhāvat/) It is on the background of Tantricism that this Vaiṣṇavism was developed. Hence the commentator's words should not be superficially understood at their face value in view of note on page 1396. VB. says Kṛṣṇa wanted to see their hearts, interpreting madhya as 'heart'. Other annotators have just passed it over. As Kṛṣṇa's physical age was only six years and four months at this time, the girls wishing to marry him must have been presumably less than six years of age and as such this episode appears allegorical.

1. VB. quotes a smṛti text which prohibits the seeing of the secret parts of a girl, sexual act of beasts, a naked woman or one whose breasts are exposed to view:
17. At this, all the girls shivering with cold and covering their private parts with the palms of their hands, came out of the water, frozen (lit. shrunk) with cold.

18. Perceiving their virginity, the glorious Lord who was propitiated with the purity of their hearts, placed their clothes on the branch of the tree and smilingly addressed them, with great pleasure.

19. "It is a positive offence against gods, that you entered water in a nude state, after undertaking the observance of a religious vow. For the expiation of this sin, you bow raising up your folded palms to your heads, and lay prostrate (on the ground) after which you accept your (respective) clothings."

Additional verses in the Texts of VR and VF.

19-A. Hearing this command full of religious significance, from the great Soul (Lord Kṛṣṇa), the damsels paid obeisance to him with one hand, covering their private part with the other.

19-B. Seeing them (violate the proper way of bowing to the Lord), the glorious Lord uttered this observation full of righteousness (and concerning religious formality), "Those who are experts in Vedas know it (and have laid it down) that he who bows to god Acyuta (Kṛṣṇa or Viṣṇu) with one hand only, should be punished by cutting off the other hand (not used in bowing).

19-C. Hence, a person should pay respects to his Lord by both of his hands. You, therefore, comply that way, and that will please me the better".

20. Considering what was explained to them by Lord Kṛṣṇa (Acyuta), the maids of Vraja realized that taking a plunge (bath) in a nude state is a transgression in the observation of their vow. Being desirous of completely fulfilling the vow, with all the related rites and formalities, they

Kanyā-yaṇīṁ paśu-kṛtām nagna-śrīṁ prakāśa-ṣantīṁ nāvalokayaṁ
Hence as a knower of dharma, Kṛṣṇa should return the clothes.
1. On seeing them arrived—VT.
2. Cf. na nagnaḥ kāhiciś invyāt ī

—MBH. Anu. 104.51
bowed to Lord Kṛṣṇa, the very embodiment of the fruit and religious rites, directly present before them. And it was he who washes off all sins, flaws and transgressions.

21. Seeing them bowing down humbly before him, the merciful Lord Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devakī, was pleased with them, and returned to them all their clothes.

22. Though they were badly deceived by the criticism of their nudity (in verse 19), were compelled to give up bashfulness, were ridiculed (by saying that he was not joking (verse 10), were treated like puppets and robbed of their clothings, they were so much satisfied with the company of their beloved that they bore no displeasure towards him.

23. They put on their clothes. So charmed were they with the company of the Lord, and their hearts were so much attracted, that they did not stir away from that place but continued to cast their bashful glances at him.

24. Understanding that their motive of undertaking the observance (of Kātyāyanī) vow was the longing to touch his feet, the glorious Lord Dāmodara (Kṛṣṇa) addressed the maidens:

25. "Oh chaste ladies! Your object (in observing the Kātyāyanī vow) viz. to worship me, is already known to me. It is approved of by me, and it shall be realized.

26. Your desire for my company is not censurable, for your longing to have enjoyment with me will not again lead to a birth in Samsāra. A seed once fried or boiled does not sprout.

27. Return to Vraja, Oh girls, as your object is accomplished. You will spend the autumnal nights in enjoyment with me—the object for which you, good ladies, have observed the vow of the worship of Kātyāyanī."

Śrī Śuka said:

28. Thus commanded by the Lord, the maidens whose object was accomplished, continued to contemplate in their minds the lotus-feet of the Lord, and returned to Vraja most grudgingly (lit. with great difficulty).
29. The glorious Lord, the son of Devaki, accompanied by Balarāma and surrounded by cowherds, went to a great distance from Vṛndāvana, grazing the cattle.

30. Perceiving that the trees served as umbrellas by spreading their shade in the scorching heat of the summer sun, Kṛṣṇa addressed to his cowherd friends, the residents of Vraja:

31. “Oh little Kṛṣṇa, Oh Amśu, Oh Śrīdāman, Subala, Arjuna, Viśāla, Ṛṣabha, Tejasvin, Devaprabha and Varūthapa!

32. Have a look at these great blessed souls who live only for the welfare of others, and themselves undergo (for others) the severity of stormy winds, heavy showers, summer heat and snow, and save them off from us.

33. The birth of the trees is verily the most blessed in the world, as it contributes to the well-being of all creatures. Just as no needy person returns disappointed from benevolent persons, so is the case with a person who approaches these for shelter.

34. They fulfil the desires (needs) of others by means of their leaves, flowers, fruits, shade, roots, bark, wood, fragrance, gums or exudations, ashes, coals and tender leaves.

35. That a person should sacrifice his life, wealth, intellect and speech for doing what is beneficial to others, is the farthest limit of the usefulness of embodied beings for their fellow creatures.”

36. Praising them (the trees) thus, the Lord proceeded to the Yamunā passing through the avenue of trees whose branches were bent low with clusters of young leaves, foliage, bunches of fruits and flowers and other leaves.

37. Having made their cattle drink that very sweet, cool and healthy water of the Yamunā (to their fill), the cowherds themselves drank that sweet water to their heart's content, Oh king.

38. The cowherd pastured their cattle in the groves on the bank of the Yamunā. Being oppressed with hunger they approached Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa and addressed as follows:
CHAPTER TWENTYTHREE*

Spiritual Emancipation of the Wives of Brähmana Sacrificers

The cowherd boys urged:

1. Oh Balarāma! Oh Rāma\(^1\) of extra-ordinary prowess! Oh Kṛṣṇa, the annihilator of the wicked! This hunger is sorely troubling us, indeed. It behoves you both to appease it.

Śrī Śuka said:

2. When the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devakī, was thus requested by the cowherd boys, he spoke to them with the intention of showering his grace on some Brähmana women\(^6\) who were devoted to him.

3. “Go to the sacrificial hall where Brähmanaṣas who are reciters of the Vedas (but who do not know the meaning and implications of the Vedic text recited) are engaged in conducting a sacrificial session, called Āṅgirasa, with a desire to attain the celestial region, (after death).

4. After arriving there, tell them the names of my elder brother and of mine, and that you are deputed by us, and request them (to give you some) cooked rice, Oh Gopas!"

5. Being thus commanded by the Lord, they went there, folded the palms of their hands, and lay prostrate on the ground like a staff before the Brähmanaṣas (by way of paying them obeisance), and begged of them:

---

* This is the XXI chapter in VJ.’s text. The object of this chapter is to emphasize that it is the internal capability and faith that is more powerful and effective in the devotion of Lord Kṛṣṇa and not the scholarship or knowledge of the Śāstras—VJ.

1. The Supreme Brahman—VB. He is so called as yogins find spiritual delight in that infinite Supreme Soul characterised by Reality, Bliss and Consciousness. He quotes:

\[ \text{ramante yogino’nte satydnande ciddāmanti} / \]
\[ \text{iti Rāma-padenāsau param brahmābhidhyate} // \]

2. The singular bhāgyāḥ is used in the sense of the plural or a class, meaning “wives”—VR. VJ.
6. “Oh Brāhmaṇas (the veritable gods on the earth)! Be pleased to listen. We are the cowherds, the servants of Lord Kṛṣṇa. We have arrived here under instructions from Balarāma. May God bless you.

7. Not far from this place, Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa are grazing their cows. They are hungry and hence they desire to have food from you. If you have real faith in them, supply them the cooked rice which they seek from you, Oh Brāhmaṇas, the best knowers of dharma.

8. Oh excellent-most people, (as you know it), it has been decided in the dharma-śāstra that it does not involve any violation (of dharma), if food from a person who has been consecrated for sacrifices is eaten, the exception being his consecration for a sacrifice requiring animal slaughter or a sautrāmaṇi sacrifice, (when such eating is prohibited).”

9. Cherishing petty longings (viz. life in heaven whence down-fall is certain) yet engaged in elaborate and toilsome acts (of sacrificial procedure), ignorant yet considering themselves as learned and vainglorious of their wisdom, (as they knew not that by the path of devotion which is easier than the path of Karma the summum bonum is attained) the Brāhmaṇas, though they heard the solicitations of the Lord (who out of Grace sent his friends for food to them), did not care to heed it.

10-11. Looking upon their bodies as their souls (and in their caste-pride), and being of perverted mentality, they looked upon Kṛṣṇa, that Supreme Brahman, the veritable glorious Lord, (the possessor of six excellences), that supra-sensuous Being, as merely an ordinary mortal being, though

1. It is not a soma sacrifice but a combination of an īṣṭi with an animal sacrifice (Śatapatha Br. XII. 7.2.10). Its chief characteristic is offering of sura (wine). This is performed at the end of Rājasūya sacrifice or caṇa. This sacrifice frees a son from debt due to his mother. The peculiar thing about Sautrāmaṇi is that here wine is offered and the remnants of it are drunk by a Brāhmaṇa hired for that purpose or are poured on an ant-hill.

(Brāhmaṇam parikṛṣṭayād ucchāsanasya pādāram / Āpastamba XIX, 33) (Brāhmaṇam parikṛṣṭa grahocchāsanasya pādārom... valmikavāpyād avanamet /—Satyādha XIII-8, 26-31)
he really constituted the time and place (of the performance of sacrifices), the substances to be oblated, the mantras (for invoking deities), the procedure (prescribed for performing sacrifices), the priests (officiating over the performance), the sacrificial fires, the deities invoked, the performer of the sacrifice, the actual act of sacrificing itself and the religious merits accruing from that sacrifice.

12. As they said neither 'Yes' nor 'No', the cowherds became disappointed, and returning to Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, reported accordingly, Oh repressor of enemies.

13. On hearing their words, the Almighty Lord of the Universe burst out laughing, and in order to acquaint the cowherds with the ways of the world, (that beggars are not choosers and that one should try till achieving success), he spoke to them again:

14. "Inform the wives (of those sacrificers—Brāhmaṇas) that I, along with Balarāma, have arrived here. They are affectionate and (with their hearts engrossed in contemplating upon me), they live in me mentally. They will give you (abundant) food, to your heart's content".

15. Thereupon, the cowherds went to the apartment reserved for the consecrated wives of the sacrificers, and saw them decked with ornaments, and seated comfortably there. Paying respects to those chaste Brāhmaṇa ladies, the cowherds respectfully submitted:

16. "Salutations to you Brāhmaṇa ladies! Kindly listen to us. We are deputed here by Kṛṣṇa who, while wandering, has arrived (here) not far from this place.

17. While grazing the cows, he along with Balarāma and cowherds, has come far afar (from his house). May food be served to him, hungry as he is, along with his companions.

18. The Brāhmaṇa ladies who, due to their hearing (and contemplating over) the stories of Kṛṣṇa, were ever eager and anxious to see him, found themselves in a flurry, when they listened to the (news of his) arrival so near.

19-20. Like rivers flowing towards the ocean, all of them hastened to the beloved Lord Kṛṣṇa, taking with them in vessels, large quantity of sumptuous food of four kinds, even though they were prohibited by their husbands, fathers, brothers and relatives, for they, having heard of him for a long time, had fixed their hearts on the glorious Lord of hallowing renown.

21-22. There in a grove beautified with the new tender foliage of Aśoka trees, on the bank of the Yamunā, the women (wives of sages) beheld Kṛṣṇa strolling leisurely, surrounded by cowherds, along with his elder brother (Balarāma)—Kṛṣṇa of dark blue complexion, wearing silken garment of golden colour (or a girdle of gold), dressed like an actor decorated with a wreath of sylvan flowers, peacock-feathers and tender shoots, beautified with mineral paints; who rested one of his hands on the shoulders of his trusted companions, and playfully dangling a lotus in the other hand; with lilies gracing his ears and locks of curly hair hanging against his cheeks, he wore a face beaming with smile.

23. They had their minds completely absorbed in him, their most beloved one, the frequent audition of whose excellent glories have rendered completely fruitful the very function (and existence) of the ears, and adorned them like ornaments. Welcoming his arrival through the gates of their eyes into their hearts, they embraced him there for a pretty long time, and got rid of all their anguish and misery (of separation from him), just as the egoistic propensities get submerged after embracing the prājñā, (the soul, that is ever awake as a witness of sleep) and forget all afflictions.

1. The kinds of food mentioned are:
   (1) bhakṣya—easily gulpable
   (2) bhajiya—requiring mastication before swallowing
   (3) Lehya—which is to be licked
   (4) casya—which is to be sucked

2. The pun on a-loke suggests that their grief for their inability to see Lord Kṛṣṇa is now removed.

3. The soul that is ever awake as a witness of sleep.

Kd.: Just as the out-going propensities return and embrace the prājñā and forgetting all worldly afflictions, merge themselves into sleep. ss. 343.
24. The Lord, being the witness of the mind and intellect of all had come to know that they had arrived there solely with the earnest desire of seeing him and had given up all hopes and longings for their husbands etc. (as they came in defiance of the orders of their men-folk) addressed to them with a smiling face.

The glorious Lord Said:

25. Welcome—very auspicious is your arrival, Oh highly blessed ladies. Be seated comfortably. What can we do for you? That you have come with a desire of seeing us (despite the opposition of your men) is really worthy of you.

26. Discerning persons who really understand their self-interest and object in life, engage themselves directly in constant uninterrupted devotion unto me without any ulterior motive, as I am the most beloved Self.

27. Who else can be more beloved than one’s own Soul through contact with whom life, vital breath, intellect, mind, body, wives, children, wealth etc. have endeared themselves to us.

28. Now that you have achieved your object in life (of seeing me), please return to the sacrificial hall, where the Brāhmaṇas, your husbands who will successfully complete their sacrificial session with your presence, and their status of being householders depends on you, your being with them.

The wives of the sages said:

29. Oh all-pervading Lord (who know everything about us) ! It does not behove you to utter such harsh words. We beseech you to fulfil your own promise (in Vedas viz. He, who approaches the Lord does not revert to Samsāra, VR. Just as after realization of the Supreme Soul the urges and curiosities of seeing him shake off all types of anguish and eagerness of seeing Him.

VJ. : Just as all the absorption of all sense-activities into Prājñā, the knowers shake off all their affliction.

The basic upanisadic concept of Prājñā is as follows : Prājñā is the enjoyer of bliss (Maṇḍ. 4.1) of dreamless sleep.
(Chāndogya Up. 8. 15.1). We have approached your feet in defiance of and transgressing the wishes of our relatives and shall wear in our hair the wreaths of Tulasī leaves indifferently kicked off at us by you (i.e. have come to serve you even as slaves)."

30. Neither our husbands, nor our parents, sons, brothers, relatives, friends will now accept us (back), not to speak of others. Oh Subduer of the internal foes like passion, avarice etc. !

Now that we have laid ourselves prostrate at the feet of your glorious self, may you be pleased to confer or ordain that state of life (your absolute service or slavery) whereby we shall have no other go to heaven or any other world."

The Lord said:

31. Now that you have been commanded to return by me, neither your husbands, nor parents, brothers, sons and others, nor even the public shall scorn you or get angry with you. Even the gods shall approve of it (your act of coming to me).

32. (If you still feel unable to leave me, please note that) Bodily contact among men does not contribute to happiness or love in this world. If you concentrate your mind on me, you will attain to me before long.

VR. adds

32-A. Devotion unto me is engendered by listening to my attributes, by visualizing me, by contemplating on me and not so much by physical proximity. Therefore, return to your homes.

Śrī Śuka said:

33. Therefore, as directed (by the Lord) the wives of the sages returned to the sacrificial hall. Not only did the sages not expostulate them, but they carried the sacrificial session to a successful conclusion with their help.

34. One lady out of them, who was detained per force by her husband, embraced in her heart the Lord as pictured by her through what she heard about him, and gave up her body that came to her lot by her karma (deeds) in past life.

35. Lord Govinda first made the cowherds feast on the four kinds of that food. The Lord partook of it only afterwards.

36. In this way, the Lord who, out of sports, had assumed a human body and imitated the ways of the world led a sportive life giving joy to cows, cowherds and cowherdesses by his charming personality, sweet words and deeds.

37.* Then remembering (their disgraceful behaviour), the Brāhmaṇas who committed that offence repented, “Alas! We have disregarded the entreaty of the Lords of the Universe who are imitating the behaviour of human beings.

38. Perceiving the extra-ordinarily supreme devotion of their women in Kṛṣṇa and realizing that they were wanting in it, they were extremely tormented and censured themselves.

39. “Fie upon our three-fold birth,¹ our mastery of Vedic lore! Fie upon our observance of vows (of continence during sacrificial sessions)! Fie upon our extensive versatility of knowledge! Fie upon our spotless pedigree! Fie upon our expertise in ritualistic technicalities in sacrifice, when we are averse to (lit. have turned away our face from) the supra-sensuous Lord Kṛṣṇa!

40. Verily the Māyā of the Lord is capable of infatuating even experts in yoga. Hence we, Brāhmaṇas, the spiritual preceptors of men, are deluded with regard to our real interests.

41. Oh! Look at the unfathomable² devotion even of

---

* Here the doubt in Parīkṣitā's mind about the goodness of the Brāhmaṇas is cleared up in this verse. The Brāhmaṇas were auspicious by nature, for they were filled with remorse at the offence they committed, when they remembered, “Alas! We have scornfully treated the request of the Lords of the Universe who (outwardly) imitate human behaviour.”

¹ According to ŚR the threefold birth is as follows:

i) Purity of heredity and family (Śaukla)

ii) Investiture of the sacred thread and initiation into Gāyatrī Mantra (Śāvitrā)

iii) Consecration for Vedic sacrifices (daikṣa).

² Ignorant, weaker sex as explained in the next verse

duṇaṭa-bhitṣa—Bond of devotion that brooks no separation—SS.
our women in Krṣṇa, the father and preceptor of the world, which cut asunder the bonds of death called the ties of the household.

42. These have not undergone the purificatory rite (known as the investiture of the sacred thread) which is regarded as the second birth (for Vedic and other studies). Nor have they stayed in the preceptor’s house (for Vedic studies or Śāstric learning). They have not performed any austerities and have no grounding in the Śāstric enquiry about the Soul. They are not characterised by any special (spiritual or external) purity or any auspicious or meritorious (sacrificial, or other rites or) acts.

43. Despite these, they entertain such firm and unflinching devotion unto Krṣṇa of hallowing renown, the Lord of the experts of yoga, a devotion not engendered in us even though we have undergone the purificatory rites (such as the investiture of thread) and have other qualifications (mentioned above).

44. Oh! How gracious of him it was that although he himself was the goal to be achieved through sacrificial and other activities prescribed by the Vedas, he, through the message sent with the cowherds reminded us (of the futility of all acts if devoid of devotion to God)—who were too stupid to understand our real self-interest and were negligent due to household activities.

45. To request food from us who are absolutely under his control, was a mere pretext of the Ruler of the universe who has all his desires fulfilled, and is the master who confers all blessing like bestowing Liberation from Saṁsāra.

46. His solicitation for food was merely a ruse to delude the world, as the Goddess of Affluence, giving up her proverbial fault of fickleness or inconstancy, discards others and seeks permanent resort in him, with the hope of touching his feet at least once.

47-48. He is verily that self-same glorious Lord Viṣṇu who constitutes the time, the place of sacrifice, the substances

1. or The refuge or main-stay of the pious saints.
2. or: that he has now incarnated for the protection of the good
—VR.
to be oblated to fire (e.g. caru), the mantras (mystical formulae for invoking the deities), the technicalities of sacrificial procedure, the priests (engaged in carrying out various duties in sacrifice) deities to be invoked, the sacrificial fire, the sacrificer, the performance of the sacrifice and the merit accruing therefrom. We have heard that he was born in the Yadu clan. But stupid and deluded as we are, we do not recognize him.

49. How blessed-most we are in having such women as our wives due to whose devotion in him, we too have our minds firmly fixed on Lord Hari.

50. Salutations to You, Oh glorious Lord Krśṇa of unobstructed (all-penetrating) intelligence! As we have our minds deluded by your Māyā, we are wandering in the paths of Karma.

51. May that Ancient-most Person be pleased to condone and forgive our transgression, as we, due to our minds being infatuated with your Māyā, the deluding potency, have not been able to realize your prowess and glory.

52. Having thus recollected the sinful offence given by them to Lord Krśṇa by their behaviour of disregarding him, the Brāhmaṇas, though desirous and eager to see the two Acyuta brothers (Krśṇa and Balarāma) did not dare to stir out due to the fear of Kaṁsa.

---

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

Prevention of Sacrifice to Indra

*Sṛt Śuka continued:

1. While living in that very locality (viz. Vṛndāvana, Vraja) in the company of Balarāma, even the glorious Lord

1. The story of Krśṇa’s opposition to Gopās’ offering a sacrifice to Indra and his advice to offer it to mount Govardhana instead, is recorded in VP. 5, ch. 10 and HV. 2, ch. 15. These stories show that Krśṇa directly
Krṣṇa feigned as if he did not notice the cowherds engaged in preparation for the Indra-yāga (worship of the rain god Indra).1

2. Despite his thorough knowledge of it, the omniscient glorious Lord who was the indwelling Soul of all beings, with great humility, enquired of elderly Gopas of whom Nanda was prominent.

3. "May it be told to me, Oh father, what occasion for your hurry and flurry has arrived? (If it be a sacrifice) what is the fruit or purpose of it? Who is regarded as competent to perform it? And with what materials is it to be performed?

4-5. I am desirous of hearing it, Oh father! Please do tell it to me who am eager to learn. For there is nothing worth concealing in the case of the righteous who look upon the self-same soul as abiding in all beings also in the case of those who do not discriminate between people (or things) as their own or as of others (and are of impartial outlook), have no friends, aliens or enemies, and have nothing to hide from others. But to those who retain this discrimination, the neutrals may be avoided as enemies, but a friend or a well-wisher has been over-ruled the older Vedic gods, especially Indra, and that the Krṣṇa cult superseded local and contemporaneous divinities including the great god Indra of the Vedic period. Indra's attempt to punish the cowherds by downpour of heavy rains and his final discomfiture by Krṣṇa who protected the cowherds with their cattel and other belongings under the umbrella of mount Govardhana lifted by him, show the recession of the Vedic religion and the positive advance of the Krṣṇa cult.

The roots of rivalry between Indra and Krṣṇa cults go back to the Vedic period, if we are to accept Nilakanṭha Caturdhara's interpretation of RV. 5.48.3 given at the beginning of his com. on HV, 2. ch.15. It is as follows:

\[\text{āgra\-vabhir ahanyebhir aktabhīr varιśhāḥ}\\\text{vajraṁ ājīghartī māyīṁ}\\\text{satam va yasya pracarān sev dame sāhvartayānāṁ vīvartayannāh}\\\]\n
RV. 5.48.3 (as quoted by Nilakanṭha)

"For (seven) nights, Indra sent down heavy showers like his most powerful weapon Vajra on māyin i.e. Krṣṇa, who had assumed a human form through His Māyā Potency, and who made the Gopas to use the materials (collected) for Indra's sacrifice to the sacrifice of mount Govardhana".

called as one’s own self\(^3\) (and as such, nothing should be kept secret from him. I, being such, should be confided with this sacrifice affair).

6. People perform actions with or without understanding the purpose or the fruit of the act. The ignorant persons do not accomplish the fruit of that action (to that extent) as people with full knowledge achieve.

7. May it be clearly explained to me who am inquisitive about it, as to whether your present course of action (viz. performance of sacrifice to Indra) has been undertaken after enquiring into the Śāstras or in consultation with friends or is it a mere blind traditional function in the ways of the world.

_Nanda explained:_

8.* The great god Indra is (the presiding deity of) the rainfall itself and clouds are his loving manifestations. They shower water which is the very source of delight\(^3\) and life of all beings.

9. Oh child! We and other people like us, worship\(^3\) Indra, the ruler of clouds and controller of the world, by performing sacrifices with materials produced with his seminal discharge viz. rain-water.

10. It is on the remnants of the sacrifice that people subsist for achieving their three purposes in life (viz. _dharma—_

---

1. VJ. explains: one should not keep everything secret from everybody. One should avoid a neutral party as an enemy, but not do so in the case of a friend or a well-wisher who is as good as one’s own-self.

2. V.l.—_prāpanoḥ_ (VJ) “infusing life and activity”.

3. VT explains—Otherwise it will be ungratefulness. The 3 P. pl. _yajante_ instead of _Vayām yajōmaḥ_ is used as Nanda felt abashed before Kṛṣṇa. righteousness, arthā-affluence and worldly prosperity and kāma-enjoyment of pleasures). The rain-god is the real bestower of fruits to persons who exert in agriculture, industry etc.

11. He who, out of passion, greed, fear or hatred, gives up the customary religious rites handed down by tradition, does not attain his real good.

Śrī Śuka said:

12. Hearing the explanatory speech of Nanda as well as that of other residents of Vraja, Keśava (Krṣṇa) addressed his father with a view to provoking Indra’s wrath (and finally to discomfit him). ¹

The glorious Lord said:

13. A being comes into existence only by its own past deeds (karma),² and passes away through the force of its own karmas. It is only through the instrumentality of one’s past actions, that the being experiences worldly pleasures, pain, fear or blessings (hereafter). (The favour or disfavour of a divinity is immaterial and irrelevant).

14. If there be any authority like the Supreme Ruler to dispense fruits of actions of others, and if he were to resort to confer fruits of the deeds on the doer of the actions, and he will have no control over him who abstains from committing any act.³

15. What power can Indra exercise on beings who follow the course of their actions (and experience the resulting fruit)? He is incapable of modifying its destined course of action of human beings according to their own individual nature. (It is the Almighty God and not Indra who can do it.)

---

¹ Cf. VP, 5.10.25.
² VJ. Here karma means Nārāyaṇa as He is the agent of all activities (Nārāyaṇa eva sarvasya kartavyabhīṣkeṣya sarvasya kārpanah karmaivetyāha)
³ Śr.: explains that this is a refutation of those who regard God as dependent on karmas. God is untouched by and above all karmas. He is the bestower of the fruit of an action to its doer.

VJ.: If it is presumed that there is a Supreme Controller to dispense weal or woe as a result of the karma of a person, He will be a mere helper (sahāyabhūtaḥ) with no independence of His own.
16. People are the slaves of their Nature and follow their own individual natural disposition and proclivities. The whole world of gods, asuras and human beings thus has their being established in nature and follow it.¹

17. It is through the force of past actions (karma) that a being comes by and casts off corporeal forms of a high or low order. It is (nothing but one’s Karma that assumes the role of) an enemy, a friend, an indifferent person, a preceptor or the Supreme Controller.

18.* Hence abiding in one’s own nature (i.e. following one’s natural disposition) one should do one’s duty (according to one’s own class or position in life), and thus respect (lit. adore) it (one’s prescribed karma). That deed whereby one can lead a happy (and a successful) life is verily his deity.

19.† A person who, entertaining faith in one god offers services to another, does not attain happiness and welfare, just as an unchaste woman gratifying her paramour, (fails to get prosperity or happiness).

20. A Brähmana should maintain his livelihood by the study and the teachings of the Vedas; the Kṣattriya by the protection of the earth; a person from the Vaiśya community, by means of vārtā (as explained in the next verse); and a Śūdra by rendering service to the twice-born castes (mentioned above).²

21. Vārtā is four-fold: viz. agriculture, commerce, rearing of cattle and the fourth, usury. As far as we are concerned, cows (the cattle) have been the means of our subsistence.

¹. VJ identifies Nature with Nārāyaṇa. The above verses refuse the power to secondary divinities like Indra who are mistaken for the Supreme Lord. It is Nārāyaṇa who is designated by the term svabhāva.

* VJ interprets karma as Nārāyaṇa and states: One should perform his duty prescribed as such by his Varna (caste) and āśrama (stage in life), and dedicate every thing to Nature i.e. God Nārāyaṇa who is the creator and supporter of the world and is involved in every religious rite. The name of any god whom a being worships (e.g. god Gaṇeśa), denotes as a matter of fact Lord Nārāyaṇa Himself.

† Verse No. 24 in VJ’s Text.

². Cf. VP 5.10. 16-31.
22. The attributes called sattva, rajas, and tamas are causes of the maintenance, creation and dissolution of the Universe. It is through rajas that the universe of various kinds of things is created by the mutual union of man and woman.

23. It is after being impelled by rajas that the clouds shower water all round. By means of these waters people accomplish their purpose (of growing food etc.). What has the great Indra to do with this?

24. Father! We have no towns, no countries or territories, no villages or no houses to dwell. We are forever forest-dwellers, living in jungles and on mountains.

25. Therefore, let a sacrifice dedicated for the propitiation of cows, Brāhmaṇas and the mount (Govardhana) be instituted. And let this sacrifice be accomplished with the materials collected for the worship to Indra.

26. Let different varieties of sweet dishes from rice, boiled in milk with sugar, down to boiled pulses and various puddings and cakes be prepared and all the milk collected from all the cows be brought together.

27. Let sacrificial fires be properly fed with oblations by Brāhmaṇas who are well versed in the Vedas, and let various food preparations be given to them along with cows, as sacrificial fees.

28. Food should also be distributed to all others up to the cāndāla, the low castes and dogs as may be deemed proper. Cows should be supplied with grass and the above mentioned articles of food be offered as bali to the mount Govardhana.

29. After taking your meals you put on your ornaments and painting yourselves with sandal-pastes etc. and putting on excellent clothes, circumambulate by the right side to cow, Brāhmaṇas, sacrificial fires and the Govardhana mountain.

30. This is my view and religious belief, Oh father. It may be adopted if it is approved of by you. This type of worship and sacrifice will be liked by cows, Brāhmaṇas, the mountain (Govardhana) itself and by me as well.

Śrī Śuka said:

31. Hearing the exposition of (the creed as elucidated
by) the glorious Lord who, as the Time-Spirit was desirous of crushing the pride of Indra, the Gopas headed by Nanda approved of it with words, "Correct, very nice".

32-33. And they carried out everything as Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of the demon Madhu, instructed them. Having got recited the benedictory hymns (and the expiatory rites to avert evil) known as Svastyayana, they propitiated with great respect, the mountain (Govardhana) and Brāhmaṇas with those very materials (collected for Indra-yāga, the worship of and sacrifice to Indra) and offered grass to the kine. With their wealth of cattle in front of them, they circumambulated the mount (Govardhana) by keeping that mount always on their right.

34. With the gracefully adorned Gopa women singing the exploits of Kṛṣṇa, and with Brāhmaṇas pronouncing benedictions, the cowherds who also wore excellent ornaments, rode their carts with bullocks yoked to them, and went round the mountain keeping it ever to their right.

35. In order so inspire confidence and belief in the Gopas, Kṛṣṇa, on his part assumed a totally different personality. Announcing that he is the mountain Govardhana itself, he with his gigantic body, consumed the enormous quantity of the food offered.¹

36. Thereupon, along with the inhabitants of Vraja Kṛṣṇa presented salutation to his own other form and exclaimed, "How wonderful! Lo! This mountain has manifested himself.

37. This mountain is capable of taking any form he likes, at will. He kills the forest-dwellers who showed disrespect to him. To him let us bow for the welfare of us as well as of our cattle."

38. The Gopas thus carried out the worship of the mountain, the cows and the Brāhmaṇas according to the directions of Lord Vāsudeva and they returned to Vraja along with Kṛṣṇa.

¹ Cf. VP. 5.10.47.
CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

Lifting up of Mount Govardhana

Śrī Śūkṣ said:

1. Then perceiving that his worship had been stopped, Indra got enraged upon the cowherds headed by Nanda who regarded Kṛṣṇa as their Protector.

2. Being incensed, Indra directed the host of clouds called Saṁvartaka which bring about the destruction of the universe. Priding himself as the Supreme Ruler of the Universe he commanded:

3. “Oh! Look at the astounding audacity and arrogance due to wealth and prosperity of those cowherds who are after all forest-dwellers, but depending on a mortal (called) Kṛṣṇa, have set at nought a deity.

4. Giving up the path of knowledge involving the meditation of the Self or self-realization, they expect to cross the ocean of Sāṁśāra or worldly existence with the help of the

1. The hill called ‘mountain Govardhana’ is 18 miles from Vṛndāvana, in Mathura district. In the village ‘Paitho’, Kṛṣṇa is believed to have held up the mountain on his little finger. This episode is narrated in VP. 5 ch. 11 and in HV. 2 ch. 18, the latter seems to be an enlarged version. The common verses and repetition of similar expressions in these three works indicate that these three works have used a common traditional bardic source.

Nilakaṇṭha in his com. on HV. 2. 18 quotes the following Re.:

\[\begin{align*} tamasya rāja Varuṇas tam Āśvinau & \\ kratuḥ sacanta Mārutasya Vedhasah & \\
dādāra dakṣam uttamaṃ aharvidam & \\
Vrajaṁ ca Viṣṇuḥ sakhivā aporpuṭe & \\
\end{align*}\]

—RV 1.156.4 (also Ait. Br. 1.30 and Kaṭṭāki Br. 9.6)

Aundh Ed. of RV. reads Āśvinā for Āśvinau. Nilakaṇṭha interprets: “Varuṇa and the twin Āśvinikumāras gave their consent to the sacrifice offered to the mountain (Govardhana) at his behest by Viṣṇu. When Indra got angry at the destruction of the sacrifice to be offered to him, to the Wind god and god Brahmā, Viṣṇu held up the mountain that was the recipient of the sacrifice but was capable of offering excellent protection from showers. A friend of all the inhabitants of Vraja as he was, he covered the Vraja with the mountain.
so-called unreliable boats in the form of sacrifices consisting of rituals.

5*. Similarly, taking resort to that garrulous, foolish, arrogant, ignorant mortal Kṛṣṇa who (out of pedantry) regards himself as a great scholar, the cowherds have dared to offend me.

6. Shatter down (lit. shake off) the arrogance of affluence of the cowherds who are puffed with pride of wealth and prosperity and have their minds filled with insolence through the influence of Kṛṣṇa. Destroy all of their cattle."

7. With a view to annihilate the camp (the cattle-wealth) of Nanda, I shall follow you riding my elephant Airāvata and accompanied with the troop of maruts of enormous prowess."

Śrī Śuka said:

8. Thus commanded and freed (from their bonds) by Indra, the (saṁvarta) clouds vehemently harassed Nanda's Gokula with heavy showers.

9. Dazzling with flashes of lightning and thundering with the roar of thunderbolts and impelled by tempestuous winds, they showered hail-stones.

10. When the clouds let loose incessant downpour of showers as big as columns (in volume), the earth was inundated with torrential floods of water, and the elevations and the depressions of the ground became invisible.

11. The cattle which were shivering (with cold) under excessively driving showers and tempestuous winds, and the cowherds and their women who were afflicted with severe cold, sought refuge in Lord Kṛṣṇa.

12. Covering their heads and their children (and calves) with their bodies and acutely suffering from the torrential downpour, they approached shivering, to the feet of the Lord.

*. VT.—tries to explain the implied glorification of Kṛṣṇa e.g. vādaḥ—whose word is effective or powerful. Paṇḍita-māṇinam—respected by persons who are paṇḍitas or knowers of Brahman.

VJ. Kṛṣṇa who is vādaḥ i.e. speaks what is censured by the scriptures and who regards himself as an authority (Paṇḍitamāṇinam).

 Cf. VP. 5.11.5 and HV. 2.18.5
13. "Oh Kṛṣṇa! Oh highly glorious Kṛṣṇa! The whole of Gokula has none else but you as its protector, Oh Lord! You are affectionate to your devotees. It behoves you to protect us from the enraged divinity (Indra)".

14. Observing that due to the beating of the volley of the hail-stones, the Gokula had fallen senseless, the glorious Lord Hari came to know that it was the working of indignant Indra.

15. "As the sacrifice to be offered to him has been obstructed by us, Indra is pouring down for our destruction tremendously heavy showers full of hail-stones, accompanied by terrific stormy winds, out of season.

16. Now I shall employ an effective counter-measure through my yogic power and remove the tāmas (darkness) in the form of the arrogance of affluence of the divinities who, through their foolishness, regard themselves as the supreme ruler of the world.

17. It is not desirable that celestials, who are endowed with the quality of sattva (goodness) or devotion to me to a special degree, should be puffed up with the vain pride of being the (Supreme) ruler of the world. The humiliation of these wicked divinities at my hand will work as Grace unto them.¹

18. With all the yogic power at my command, I will, therefore, protect this Gokula which has sought shelter in me and has accepted me as their Master and which now entirely depends on me. This is the eternal vow taken by me."

19. Observing thus (to himself), Kṛṣṇa, though a child, uprooted with ease the mount Govardhana with one of his hands² and held it up sportively as if it were a mushroom.

20. And quoth the glorious Lord to cowherds "Oh mother! Oh father! Oh residents of Vṛṣṇi. Enter comfortably

¹. (i) anugraha eva—ŚR.
(ii) Will lead to deeper devotion to me—VJ.

². with left hand—VT. He quotes HV 2.13.31.

sa dhṛṣṭaṁ sāṅgata meghair giriḥ sanyena pāṇind

VT.'s graphic description and dramatic narration of this episode deserves perusal in the original.
into the cavity beneath the mountain along with your wealth of cattle.

21. You need not entertain any fear that the mountain will slip down from my hand. Dispel all the fear about storms or (driving) showers, for protection (against them) has been already securely devised."

22. With their minds thus reassured by Kṛṣṇa, they entered into the cavity (beneath Govardhana) along with their wealth, herds of cattle, their dependants (like priests etc.) food-grains etc. according to the accommodation (which was sufficiently available).

23. Being gazed at by those inhabitants of Vraja who disregarded their pangs of hunger and thirst and thus neglected their personal comforts, Kṛṣṇa upheld the mountain for seven days and did not move from his position.

24. Observing the yogic power of Kṛṣṇa, Indra was extremely astounded. Being shorn of pride and thwarted of his design, he restrained his sanhvartaka clouds.

25. Noticing the sky cleared of clouds, the sun already risen and the terrific tempestuous winds and the downpour of hails had ceased altogether, Kṛṣṇa, the bearer of Govardhana, told the cowherds.

26. "Oh cowherds! Now that the stormy winds and showers have stopped and the waters of the flooded rivers have almost receded, you dismiss all your apprehension and go out into the open with your women, children and property (cattle)."

27. Taking with them their respective wealth (viz. herds of cattle) and all the cart-loads of their belongings, the cowherds slowly came out (of the cavity) along with their wives, children and elders.

28. The glorious Lord on his part sportfully placed the mountain on its previous position while all beings stood a-gazing.

29. Overflowing with a flood of affection the inhabitants of Vraja approached him embracing (blessing, smelling the crown of his head and doing such acts expressive of love), according to their position and relations. The cowherd women overwhelmed with affection and joy worshipped him with curds and unbroken rice (aṅkātas)¹ and expressed their choicest blessings profusely (out of grateful affection and not out of a sense of seniority as they knew his divine nature).

30. Yaśodā, Rohiṇī, Nanda and Balarāma, the mighty among the mightiest, were overwhelmed with affection and impatience and embracing Kṛṣṇa, they showered him with benedictions.

31. In the heavens, hosts of celestials, Sādhyas, Siddhas, Gandharvas and Cāraṇas sang his glory and out of joy showered flowers on him, Oh king.

32. Commanded by the celestials, conchs and kettle-drums were sounded in the sky and leaders of Gandharvas (celestial artistes) headed by Tumburu participated in singing.

33. Oh king! Surrounded by his affectionate cowherd-friends and accompanied by Balarāma, Kṛṣṇa proceeded to Gokula from that place. And young cowherd women, delighted at heart, returned to their respective homes singing all the while such miraculous exploits of Kṛṣṇa (like lifting up of Govardhana) who has captivated their hearts.

CHAPTER TWENTYSIX

Conversation between Nanda and Cowherds

 Śrī Suka said:

1. Witnessing Kṛṣṇa’s miraculous feats of this type (such as lifting up of mount Govardhana) the cowherds, being unaware of his prowess, were extremely astonished and coming to Nanda, they spoke unto him (as follows):

2. “Verily the exploits of this child are extremely marvellous. How does he deserve to be born among rustic people like us—a birth really unworthy and censurable to him.

1. VB. : The cowherd women made a circular mark of curds on his forehead on which some unbroken rice were applied and water was waved round his face and sipped.
3. How is it that a child of seven years as he is, he could hold up with ease (as if in sport) a big mountain on one hand, as an elephant king would do to a lotus (with its trunk) ?

4. Even as the god of death takes life out of the body of a living organism, he, as a babe, with half closed eyes, sucked the breast of the mighty giantess Pūtanā along with her life.

5. While a baby of only one month,¹ when he was made to sleep (and was placed) under a cart, he, while crying and kicking up his feet, turned the cart topsy-turvy by the touch of the fore-part of his foot.

6. While he was an infant of one year and was being carried away through the sky by a demon called Trāṇāvarta, he killed the demon who was strangléd to death on account of being caught by the neck by Kṛṣṇa.

7. On one occasion, when he was tied to a mortar by his mother for stealing butter, he, while crawling on his hands and feet (along with mortar) between two Arjuna trees, made them fall down uprooted.

8. While grazing calves in the forest, he, accompanied by Balarāma and surrounded by cowherd boys, tore open with his hands the bill of the enemy, a demon called Baka (who assumed the form of a heron) with the intention of killing him.

9. He killed the demon Dhenuka who, assuming the form of a calf, was entering the herd of calves with the desire of killing, and hurling with ease the (demon’s) carcass against a Kapittha tree, caused Kapittha fruits fall down in great number.

10. Accompanied with Balarāma (and possessed of supreme power), he killed the demon in the form of a donkey along with his brethren, he made the forest of palm trees which were laden with abundant ripened fruit, free from fear.

11. Having made the mighty Balarāma kill the ferocious Pralamba, he rescued the cattle and cowherds in the Vraja from forest conflagration.

12. Having subdued the great serpent Kāliya of the most virulent poison, he humiliated his pride and expelled him per force from the deep pool (in the Yamunā) and made the waters of the Yamunā free from poisonous pollution.

¹. Māyāsa—some annotators interpret this as ‘three months old’.

13. Oh Nanda, all of us, the inhabitants of Vraja cherish for this son of yours undissociable affection. And even he bears towards us all a deep love since his birth.

14. A child of seven and the feat of uplifting and holding up a great mountain! How inconceivable it is! Hence we entertain a suspicion (and a fear too) about (the real nature of) your son.”

Nanda replied:

15. “Oh cowherds! Hear from me what the sage Garga predicted to me with reference to this boy. And that will dispel all your doubts or fears.

16. ‘Assuming different bodies in different yugas, He has manifested himself in bodies of three colours viz. white, red and yellow. Now he has adopted a dark-complexioned body.

17. As this son of yours was at first born of Vasudeva in some place (Mathurā), the knowers will call him distinctly as the son of Vasudeva, the Lord of the goddess Śrī.

18. Your son has got so many names and forms suitably designating his excellences and deeds that I do not know them all nor do these people at large.

19. A delight to cowherds and Gokula, he will bring about your weal. And you will easily cross over all difficulties and calamities with his help.

20. Oh Lord of Vraja! Formerly when anarchy prevailed he protected righteous people who were troubled by the miscreant. Through his protection they prospered and subdued the bandits.

21. Those extremely fortunate persons who cherish affection to him shall not be defeated by enemies even as the partisans of Viṣṇu at the hands of Asuras.

22. Therefore, Oh Nanda, this boy is similar to Lord Nārāyaṇa in excellences, majesty or affluence, glory and prowess. Hence no amazement need be felt at his exploits.”

1. VP.5.15 states that the Gopas directly asked Kṛṣṇa about his feat of lifting up Govardhana, but Kṛṣṇa out of modesty told them that he was one of them and not a superior being.
23. Exhorting me thus directly, the sage Garga returned home. Since then I took upon Kṛṣṇa, the remover of all afflictions, as an amīta (part manifestation) of Nārāyaṇa.”

24. Hearing from Nanda’s speech the report of the account given by Garga about Kṛṣṇa’s glory and having witnessed and heard personally the great prowess of Kṛṣṇa of infinite energy and power, the inhabitants of Vraja became delighted. They respectfully honoured Nanda and ceased to feel any amazement about Kṛṣṇa’s feats.

25. May that Lord of cows be gracious unto us—the Lord who finding that the Gokula with all the cowherds, cows, and women had resorted to him for shelter as they were afflicted by the driving showers of rain, hail-stones, thunderbolts and tempestuous winds let loose by the deity Indra, wrathful at the destruction of the sacrifice (to be offered to him), took compassion on them, and smilingly uprooted the mountain sportively as one would pluck up a mushroom and holding it up on one hand protected the Gokula and thus crushed pride of Indra.

CHAPTER TWENTYSEVEN

Indra coronates Kṛṣṇa

Sri Suka continued:

1. When Kṛṣṇa held up the mount Govardhana and protected Vraja (Gokula) from heavy showers, Surabhi, the wishyielding heavenly cow, came down from Go-loka to Kṛṣṇa, and Indra too approached him.

nāhāṁ devo na gandharvo na yakṣo na ca dānavaḥ / abah vo bāndhavo jāto naiteṣacchintyam iti'nyathā //

— VP. 5.13.12

1. A special heaven for cows. It is above Brahmāloka. Surabhi, daughter of Dakṣa or the divine cow, Rādhā, Kṛṣṇa’s companion at Gokula and other eminent devotees of Kṛṣṇa have a place there. This divine world was granted to Surabhi by god Brahmā (MBH Anu 83, 29-39). It is described in glorious terms in the same chapter (Anu 83, 37-44).
2. Indra who felt abashed at his humiliation (by Kṛṣṇa) met him in privacy (in a solitary place) and touched his feet by his crown brilliant like the sun.

3. Having witnessed and heard the prowess of Kṛṣṇa of immeasurable lustre, energy and power, Indra with his pride of being the ruler of three worlds, subdued, spoke to him with folded palms.

_Indra said:_

4.* Your essential nature consists of absolutely pure sattva and as such it is one uniform quiescent existence full of (spiritual) knowledge untainted by rajas and tamas. This saṁsāra consisting of the stream of guṇas which is the product of Māyā has no place in you.

5. Oh Controller of the Māyā! How could greed and other passions which characterise the ignorant and which are both the product as well as the cause of Māyā possibly affect you (lit. have a place in you)? It is, however, for the protec-

----

*(1) VR. Your abode constitutes of absolutely pure sattva, un-tinged by rajas and tamas and hence quiescent (free from love, hate etc.). It is attainable through your meditation and worship. This phenomenal existence which is the current of three guṇas and their products originates in your will; the causes of the assumption of a corporeal form have no place in You.

(2) VJ. I seek shelter in your Abode (which is verily yourself). In it even absolutely pure sattva has no place, what of rajas and tamas. It is auspicious, constituted of knowledge. The stream of three guṇas which is controlled by your will has no place there as it has in jīvas due to their attachment. Māyā the cause of guṇa-current has no place in you.

1. _tad-ḥetava...tat-krśāḥ:_

VR. : Greed and others which are the consequences after assuming the body and the causes leading to other future births.

VJ. : How can the guṇas which cause saṁsāra be imagined in the Lord.

VJ. further states that the Lord disciplines both the good and the wicked and quotes Agni P.

```plaintext asatāṁ ca satāṁ caiva Hari evānudāsakāḥ satām tu śreyaṁ saiva hyanukāśitīṁ bhavisyati
```
tion of righteousness and the control of the wicked (in their interest and out of grace unto them) that you exercise authority (lit. bear the sceptre for punishing the wicked).

6. You are the progenitor, preceptor and Supreme controller of the worlds. You are the undefiable Time-spirit who hold the rod of punishment. It is for the welfare of the world that you act, manifesting yourself at will, your (sportive) forms and crushing down the pride of those who fancy themselves to be the masters of the world.

7.* Noticing your fearlessness and formidable in times of stress and peril, ignorant fools like me who prided themselves to be the rulers of the world, immediately shed off their arrogance, and getting rid of their egotism, betake themselves to the path of righteousness. In this way your sportive acts are meant for the punishment and discipline of the wicked as well.

8. Oh Ruler of the world! It behoves you to pardon me—your offender, who was puffed up with the pride of my affluence and was totally ignorant of your prowess. Oh Lord! May not the intellect (and mind) of a stupid fellow like me become so wicked (and perverse) again.²

9. This incarnation of yours in this world is for the destruction of those powerful army-leaders who are themselves a burden to the earth and whose birth has become a source of troubles to others, and for the prosperity of the followers of the feet of your Lordship. (As such, I, being your servant, deserve pardon and mercy even though I have committed a grave offence against you, Oh Adhokṣaja—Lord beyond the ken of sense-perception).

1. VB. By assuming forms of a father, preceptor and god of death you inflict punishment for the good of the people. VB. enumerates the incarnations e.g. the Fish, Tortoise etc. as representing the father, the preceptor etc. but does not completely illustrate it.

* When, at the end of our lives, we see your fearful form, we shed off our pride immediately and take to the noble path of bhakti consisting of remembering the name of the Lord, applying gopīcandana, wearing a wreath of Tulast etc.—VB.

2. VT. cautions us that Indra did not pray this with a sincere and pure heart and he behaved the same way at the time of taking away the pārijāta tree.
10. Obeisance to you, a glorious God, who reside in the hearts of all and who are still too great-souled to be discerned;¹ you Kṛṣṇa, the son of Vasudeva and the Lord of Sātvatas.

11. Salutations to you who assume a form to comply with the wishes of your devotees; who are the embodiment of absolutely pure knowledge; who are all-pervading, the seed (the primary cause) of everything and the indwelling² soul of all beings.³

12. Oh Lord! Flying in blind rage at the interruption of the sacrifice offered to me, I did this for destroying the Gokula, with heavy showers and stormy winds.

13. With my pride crushed and efforts to destroy Gokula frustrated, I have been favoured by you, Oh Lord. I have sought shelter in you, Oh Supreme Ruler, Preceptor, nay, my own soul itself.

Śri Śuka said:

14. Thus extolled highly by Indra, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, replied to him laughingly, in a voice deep like the rumbling of clouds, as follows:

The Lord said:

15. Oh Indra! Highly intoxicated as you were with the pride of the majesty of Indra-hood (kingship of the celestials), it was out of grace unto you that I interrupted the sacrificial worship to be offered to you, so that you should ever remember me.

16. Out of those who have grown blind with the arrogance of supreme power and affluence and do not recognise me as the wielder of the rod of punishment, I deprive that person of his position and wealth unto whom I condescend to show grace.

1. antaḥstha' tyāparidvītthāy—ŚR.
2. You are the cause and controller of everything but are not identical as a Substance—VR.
3. Here God's being embodiment of sat (Existence), cit (Consciousness) and ānanda (bliss), bestower of the wishes of the devotees and having a form constituted of pure knowledge are emphasized—VR.
17. You may now return, Oh Indra! May all be well with you. Carry out my commandments. All of you should continue in your respective offices (and execute your duties) diligently without being puffed up with pride or haughtiness.

18. Paying respects, along with her progeny (cows), to Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Lord in the guise of a cowherd, the noble-minded Surabhi (the celestial cow) submitted to him:

Surabhi said:

19. Oh Kṛṣṇa! Oh great yōgin! Oh Inner controller of the Universe! Oh Creator of the world! Oh Immortal Lord! We are now blessed with a Lord in you as the protector of the world.

20. Oh Protector of the World! You are the only Supreme Deity to us. Hence for the prosperity and success of cows, Brāhmaṇas and gods as well as of saintly persons, you be our Ruler (Indra).

21. As per directions of god Brahmā, we are going to crown (lit. give coronatory ablution to) you as our Supreme Ruler (Indra). You have incarnated for lightning the burden of the earth, Oh Inner Soul of the Universe.

Śrī Śuka said:

22-23. Praying Kṛṣṇa with these words, Surabhi, the celestial cow, consecrated him by sprinkling her milk on him, while Indra, accompanied by gods and sages and instructed by (Aditi and other) mothers of gods crowned him, bathing him with waters of the heavenly Gaṅgā brought by the celestial king-elephant Airāvata, with his trunk. He proclaimed Kṛṣṇa, the descendant of Daśārha as ‘Govinda’.

Indra said:

23A*. I am the Indra of gods. You have attained the Indrahood of the cows (cattle). People will sing of you as ‘Govinda’ in this world.

*Yande's Bombay edition adds this verse in the footnote Bh. P vol. 7 p. 397.
24. Gandharvas, Vidyādharas, Siddhas and Cāraṇas headed by Tumbaru, Nārada and others arrived there. They sang of Hari's glory that washes off all the sins of the world. Overwhelmed with joy, celestial damsels danced beautifully.

25. The prominent ones among gods glorified him and showered him profusely with wonderful flowers. At that time, all the three worlds attained the Zenith of felicity while the cows drenched the earth with their milk.

26. Rivers flowed with various kinds of delicious drinks; the trees exuded sweet honey profusely. Bumper crops were harvested from unploughed lands and mountains exhibited precious stones (on their outward parts instead of concealing them in mines).

27. When Kṛṣṇa was crowned, all animals, though cruel and ferocious by nature, shed off their enmity.

28. Having thus coronated Lord Govinda (Kṛṣṇa) as the Protector of cows and Gokulas, Indra, with the permission of Kṛṣṇa, went to the celestial world in the company of gods.

CHAPTER TWENTYEIGHT

Nanda rescued from Varuṇa

Śrī Śuka said:

1. On the Ekādaśī day (the eleventh day of the lunar fortnight, so sacred to devotees of Viṣṇu) Nanda observed complete fast and worshipped Lord Viṣṇu (Janañādana). On the twelfth day, Nanda entered the waters of the Yamunā for performing ablution.

2. Nanda, being ignorant of the time reserved for the demons, entered the waters during night time. A demon (asura) servant of Varuṇa seized Nanda and produced him before Varuṇa.
3. Not seeing Nanda, the cowherds cried out, "Oh Kṛṣṇa, Oh Balarāma". Hearing the cry and knowing that his father had been carried off to Varuṇa, the Omnipresent Lord, who affords protection to his devotees, approached Varuṇa.

4. Seeing that Lord Kṛṣṇa (the Ruler of senses) had arrived, Varuṇa, the protector of the world, was highly enraptured and worshipping him respectfully submitted:

Varuṇa said:

5. "Today (the object of assuming) my body has been fulfilled. Though I am the Lord of ocean, which is a mine of precious stones, never before such a treasure-trove was found by me as today.

VR. adds:

By the very sight of you, Oh omnipresent Lord, the (purpose of my) eyes and tongue have become fulfilled.] Those who resort to your feet achieve the end of their journey (of samsāra).

6. I salute you Oh glorious Lord, the Brahman himself and the Supreme Soul wherein the very name of the Māyā, the cause of creation of the various worlds, is not even heard of.

7. Your father has been brought here by my ignorant servant who did not know the limits and nature of his duty. It behoves your Lordship to pardon him.

8. Oh Kṛṣṇa! The witness of everything in the Universe! Be pleased to shower your grace on me. Oh Govinda, full of filial love! This is your father. He may be taken back."

VR. adds:

We have been fortunate to see you as your father has been brought here. We are your progeny (or subjects). It behoves you to be gracious unto us, despite our offences."

Śrī Śuka said:

9. Thus propitiated by Varuṇa, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Ruler of rulers, took his father with him and returned, thereby bringing delight to his kith and kin.

10. Nanda was struck with wonder at the affluence and grandeur of the protectors of the world which he had never witnessed so far, and also the submissiveness of the Lokapālas to Kṛṣṇa—with amazement he related everything to his relatives.

11. Thinking him to be the Almighty Lord himself, the cowherds whose minds were still more overwhelmed with eagerness and wonder, thought (to themselves): "Would that the Supreme Lord grant unto us his imperceptible state (called Brahmān) and take us to his eternal region?"

12. Knowing the wish (cherished at heart) by his own people, the all-perceiving glorious Lord, out of his own accord, and out of grace, began to think with a view to accomplishing their desires.

13. "While wandering in this world in higher and lower forms of existence due to the force of the Nescience, desire and actions (karma), people verily do not know their own fate."

14-15. Considering this, the highly compassionate, glorious Lord Hari manifested to the cowherds his own realm which is beyond the range of tamas and his essential nature which is absolutely real, not subject to modification or destruction but is pure consciousness, infinite, self-luminous, eternal and perfect stage which is realized by the sages after transcending the trinity of guṇas (when the bondage of guṇas is severed).

16. They were at first transported to Brahmāhrada—pool-like deeply absorbed state in Brahmā—and were made to plunge into it and were eventually taken out of it (i.e. were awakened from that samādhi or trance). There they beheld the divine region of Brahmā by the Grace of

1. Śrī's 1st explanation: Para-Brahmān is the pool in which the cowherds were made to remain immersed in a trance and again roused from the samādhi by Kṛṣṇa.
Lord Kṛṣṇa through which formerly Akrūra also saw the divine abode.

17. Beholding in that realm Kṛṣṇa being extolled by personified Vedas in different hymns, Nanda and others were filled with supremely ecstatic delight and were greatly amazed as well.

CHAPTER TWENTYNINE

Lord Kṛṣṇa’s Rāsa with Gopīs

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Perceiving that those (indescribably beautiful and hence proper for indulging in delightful sports) nights were

ŚR.’s 2nd explanation: The pool in the Yamunā wherein the Akrūra beheld the Brahma-loka (vide infra chs. 39.40-55) is also called Brahma-hrada. Although ŚR gives this alternative explanation that they were taken to this pool in the Yamunā by Kṛṣṇa and were shown Brahma-loka that is not complementary to the Almighty Lord Kṛṣṇa. Hence ŚR.’s first explanation is accepted.

1. ŚR. explains: “The word purā is used as the incident took place before the dialogue between Śuka and Parīkṣit took place.”

2. Rāsa or hallīsaka is a dance in which one male dancer plays his part with a number of female dancers moving in a circle. Jiva Gosvāmi quotes in BKS.

nartakthir anekāḥhir maṇḍale vicarśṇubhiḥ /
yatraiko nyatati nātās tad vai hallīsakam viduḥ ||

Ch. 20 in HV. 2 is titled hallīsaka-kṛṣṭanam in stead of rāsa. This rāsa-kṛṣṭa forms a part of VP 5.13, but the rāsa-paścaḥdhyāt which begins from this chapter is poetically superb. SG. calls these “five vital breaths”-paśca-praṇa-tulya-paścaḥdhyāt. These five chapters form the corner-stone of the warm, sensuous madhūrā bhakti. Commentators of Bengal school of Vaiṣṇavism such as Sanātana Gosvāmi, Jiva Gosvāmi have grown ecstatically lyrical and have given full play to their poetic imagination. Vallabha also is at his best while annotating these chapters. These annotators have written so exhaustively (over and above the implication of the actual wording of the text) that it cannot be compressed here, as it will be an independent book by itself to include them all.

For the significance of Rāsa-īṣṭa vide Intro. pp. XLIX-LIV.

3. tā anirvacanyāḥ sava-kālataḥ śreṣṭha-tarāḥ paramānanda-rasamayīs tat-kṛṣṭoṣyogāḥ īyartathāḥ / beautified with full-blown jasmines of the autumnal (jarad) season, even the glorious Lord, in exercise of his Supreme yogic Māyā potency⁴ made up his mind to play (rāsa).

2. Like a lover, returning after a long absence (would make the face of his beloved blush into crimson-red by the touch of his hand as if he) painted the face of his beloved with

1. Yogamāyā upāsrītah : in the company of Rādhā—SG. equates Rādhā with yogamāyā as follows:

\[ \text{yogasya sambhogasya māyō mānam paryāptir yasyām sā yoga-māyā śrī Rādhā} \]

“Rādhā in whom was the highest accomplishment of enjoyment’’

—SG

VJ : exercising his own essential powers.

Various conjectures are expressed by annotators why Lord Kṛṣṇa exercised his yogic Māyā Potency. He used it (1) to hypnotize the minds of people in Vraja, (2) to devise a flute capable of attracting Gopa woman (Vaiṣṇava-Śarana’s Śūḍhāntārtha-dīpikā), (3) to supply the necessities of such a dance in a forest (SD., also Rāmanārāyaṇa’s Bhāvabhāva-vibhāvikā etc.

KD : Kandarpa, the god of love, who subdued all gods like Hari, Hara and Brahmā was elated with pride. His pride was humiliated by Kṛṣṇa in this rāsa kṛiḍā (29.57-59). KD. raises the usual moral problem of playing with women married to others and explains the words yoga-māyāṁ upāsrītah as ‘‘without touching the wife of another man, he enjoyed himself in his natural essential bliss’’, and quotes ātmārāmo paryāramat
The Lord was the subduer of the god of love (Manmatha mathana) and under the pretext of eroticism, these five chapters lead to the stage of spiritual renunciation (29.63-68). Dhanapati-Sūri in Bhāgavatag udhārtha-dīpikā endorses ŚR’s view that this Pañcarāhyāyī leads to renunciation from samsāra.

Here two currents of interpretations become obvious in the various annotations in the Vrindavana edition, one endorsing madhurā bhakti and the other (including ŚR., VJ.) advocating the usual non-erotic bhakti.

SG : As soon as the desire to play with Gopīs arose in the mind of Kṛṣṇa, the moon (the hero) was actuated with the same desire towards the Orient (the heroine), the stars being their attendants. By his balmy beams he removed the distress not only of the Orient but also of other people of the trouble caused by the autumnal sun’s heat.

VJ : caraṇī—The plant-world.

BKS : Although he loved all the Gopīs of Vraja and removed their distress, he daubed the face of Rādhā with saffron paste even though he was ever present with her (priyāyā saha dūrgamā saurakālīnām darśanām yasya svādhīna-bhartikatvāt) saffron-paste by his extremely soothing hands, the lord of stars—the moon—arose presently making the face of the orient blush into crimson-red by his balmy beams, (simultaneously) mitigating the distress of the people caused by the scorching heat of the sun.

3.* Beholding the moon, the friend of lilies (which blossom at the touch of his rays) in full orb, reddish like fresh saffron, superbly resplendent like the countenance of goddess Lakṣmī and seeing the groves (of Vṛndāvana) lit up with its soft rays, he breathed forth such melodious music through his flute as to captivate the hearts of the beautiful-eyed Gopīs.

4. Hearing that music which increased their love for him (or rather "which enhanced their forgetfulness about their own person")1), the damsels of Vraja whose hearts were

Or: dirgha-darśana—of large eyes. Dhanapati in Gūḍhārtha dipikā : The moon was the predecessor of Kṛṣṇa. He painted the face of the Orient (which is legally Indra's direction) with his soft balmy beams and advised (by his example) Kṛṣṇa to do the same with Rādhā who was another man's wife and remain above sin like himself.

VB. : The moon is the presiding deity of the mind and he naturally emulates whatever arose in Kṛṣṇa's mind. carṣṇā—Faculties. These were concentrated in highest bliss.

* VT. informs that the place where the rāsa play took place is known as Rāṣulī. SG. and VT. emphasize that all adjectives or adjectival phrases used in this verse show that the time, place etc. were quite proper and opportune for love-making.

VB. The moon, the presiding deity of the mind, was the brother of Lakṣmī and as such had facial similarity with her. And he appeared reddish like Lakṣmī's countenance at the time of her marriage awakening eroticism. He quotes a śrutī text : "Women love a singer" and states that Kṛṣṇa invited all beautiful maidens of Vraja by the sweet notes of the flute.

1. anaṅga-vardhanam—The usual translation following annotators will be "Increasing the feeling of love of Gopīs for Kṛṣṇa is not complimentary to Gopīs or Kṛṣṇa. The word anaṅga—means 'bodiless'. The Gopīs were so much engrossed in Kṛṣṇa's devotion that they practically forgot themselves. This forgetfulness about their person was so much enhanced by listening to the flute-call that they left their work then and there and ran to him. Even an exponent of madhurā bhakti like SG., warns that the word anaṅga is not used in a vulgar sense : grānya-dharma-hetu-prākṛta-kāmāḥśābdhā-avivakṣayā."
captivated by Kṛṣṇa, unmindful of what the other was doing, arrived hastily with their (gold) ear-rings dangling through their fast gait, at the spot where their Lover was waiting.

5. (Even hearing the name of Kṛṣṇa instantaneously makes his devotees renounce all other activities and hence the Gopīs left their work half-done as follows:)

Being extremely eager (to join the Lord), some who were milking cows, went away leaving the milking half-done; others started, placing the milk (for heating) on the oven to boil (without removing it from the oven), while others flew to Kṛṣṇa without removing the dressed dish (of wheat flour) from the hearths.

6. Some who were serving food (to the members of their family) left off without serving (any further); some others suckling their babies set them aside and fled; some others who were waiting upon their husbands suddenly stopped and departed; while others who were taking their meals, set aside their food and started.

7. Some were painting their bodies (with pigments, sandal paste), while others were cleansing their person, still others were applying collyrium to their eyes, while others were bedecking themselves with clothes and ornaments in a disorderly way—All hastened to the presence of Kṛṣṇa (leaving their work half-done in the middle).

8. Though prevented and obstructed by their husbands, fathers, brothers and relatives, their hearts being lured away and robbed by Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Gopīs were hypnotised and they did not return.

VB. understands the destruction of the gross body and the creation of a new one by the word anāṅga—

�ṅgą tu nāśayate vācato nātana utpannāḥ /

1. This is technically known as vibhrama. SG and VT quote the famous characteristic:

Vatāḥ-bhātṛi-vṛlāyāṁ madanāveśa-sambhramat /
Vibhramo kāsā-neśās-bhūtāstham-vibharamayāḥ //

When the time of arrival of the Lover approaches and the mind is overwhelmed and confused with the passion of love, the wrong or disorderly way of wearing clothes and ornaments is the characteristic of Vibhrama (confusion).
9. Some being shut up in the inner apartment, could not manage to get out. They closed their eyes and meditated upon Lord Kṛṣṇa with their minds absorbed in his devotion.

10-11.* Their inauspicious karmas being consumed by the fire-like intense agony of unbearable separation from their dearest Lord, and with their auspicious karmas being exhausted by the ecstatic bliss of the embrace of the Immortal Lord enjoyed in their meditation on him, the cowherd women who became united with\(^1\) that Supreme Soul, even as a beloved would do with her paramour,\(^2\) and with all the karmic bonds of mundane existence being instantaneously sundered off, they cast off their mortal coil constituted of three guṇas.

* VJ. explains that even sāṅkīتا karma (Potential karma which did not begin to give its effect) is destroyed by the knowledge and realization of God.

SG. The Gopīs lost all the bonds of hopes of participating in the rāsa by retaining their bodies (as pointed out in the Bhāgavatāmṛta). There is more intense joy in separation from a lover as it gives rise to more fervent love.

Alternately SG. explains: By their attachment (saṅgam āsaktīm) to the Supreme Lord as their paramour, they, by their suffering intense agony at the unbearable separation from their dearest Lord, destroyed the inauspicious sufferings of three types (physical; elemental etc.) of the world and had enhanced the auspiciousness of the world (aṅkīnaṁmaṅgalaḥ—aṅkīnaṁ puṣṭam vṛddhīṁ gatam, jagatāṁ maṅgalam) by their bliss of the happy embrace of Lord Kṛṣṇa attained by them in their meditation, gave up the various states of mind (Bhāva).

SG concludes: Liberation (mokṣa) is attained by knowledge, attainment of the region of Vaikuṇṭha, by loving devotion of the Lord; the Lord is won over by sakhyya prema (friendly affection); by intensity of love and always regarding him as the dearest Lord, leads to union with him at Vṛṣṇī.

1 Saṅgata—Who properly realized Nārāyaṇa, the Supreme Lord

—VJ.

2 VT. raises the point whether the Gopīs united with the Lord as a paramour (in illicit sexual relations) and ably refutes the moral charge. It is the intensity of passion of a beloved for the paramour which is implied here.
12.* They (the damsels of Vraja) knew him only as a Supreme Lover and could not recognize him as the Brahman himself. How did the cessation of the flow of guṇas (in the form of continuity of the cycle of birth and death, take place in the case of those women whose minds were under the influence of guṇas.

Śrī Śuka explained:

13. It has been previously explained to you that as Śiśupāla, the king of Cedis, attained the sumnum bonum (absorption in the person of Lord Kṛṣṇa), there is no problem at all how the beloveds of the Supra-sensual Lord should do so.

14. Even though the Lord is not subject to any modification or change; is beyond the ken of intellect, and infinite; transcends all the guṇas yet controls them; he manifests himself for the good (Final beatitude) of people.

15. Persons who always cherish love, anger, fear, affection, identity and friendliness unto Lord Hari, ultimately attain one-ness with him.²

*ŚR correctly explains the nature of Parikṣit’s doubt. The husbands or sons of those Gopis were, as a matter of fact, Brahman himself. But as they had no knowledge or capacity to recognize that Brahman in them, they could not attain Liberation (Mokṣa). Similarly they did not look upon Kṛṣṇa as the Brahman but only as a Lover. Hence how could their association with him be the cause of Mokṣa?

SG. endorses the question raised above by ŚR. but adds: To the Gopis or devotees, Mokṣa (Liberation) is quite insignificant as they were more interested in the excellences such as superb beauty, sweetness, love etc. of the Lord. He, however, clarifies that King Parikṣit had personally no such doubt, but it is for the knowledge of others that he asked this question.

VJ. explains in the next verse that Liberation (Muktī) is attained by direct realization through uninterrupted devotion, but not due to Kāma (desire, sexual or otherwise). If kāma is amalgamated with Bhakti (devotion), it brings in the Grace of the Lord. But this love of the Supreme Being cannot be regarded as the paramour-beloved relation. (It seems VJ. treats Vr. 11-13 as a unit and explains the api in v. 11 as implying this explanation.

2. VR and VJ reject the notion of Mokṣa as absorption of the
16. It does not behove your Majesty to entertain such feeling of wonder in the case of the birthless glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Ruler of all the masters of yoga, through whose Grace, the entire (mobile and immobile) creation gets emancipated (from saṁsāra).

17. Seeing that all the damsels of Vraja have approached him, the Lord who was the foremost among the eloquents, addressed them, hypnotising them with the most fascinating or loving expressions.

_The glorious Lord said_:

18. Hail to you, Oh highly blessed ladies! You are welcome. What pleasant services can I render to you? Is everything well with Vraja? Please explain to me the cause of your hasty arrival.

19.* Oh ladies with beautiful waists! This night is of frightful appearance. It is infested with ferocious beasts (and demons). Please do return to Vraja. This place is not fit for women to stay out at night.

individual soul with the Supreme Soul. Naturally VR interprets tanmayatāṁ yānti as “attain similarity to Him”—_tāt-prakārātāṁ tāt-sādharmaiḥ yānti_

VJ. states that due to cherishing Love etc. for the Lord, the souls of such persons become saturated with those very feelings even in the final stage, but they do not become identical with Hari.

_Haraḥ kāmādīkaḥ vidadhata upāsate te tan-mayatāṁ yānti kāmādyutmatāṁ āpnuvanti, na tu bhagavan-mayaṁ._

1. All women of Vraja young and old who should have stayed at Vraja instead of coming into the forest—SG.

2. SR: Noticing that all the damsels of Vraja have hastened there in an agitated state of mind, Kṛṣṇa expresses anxiety and asks.

SG. : Kṛṣṇa pretends indifference.

VB. : In the following ten verses Kṛṣṇa wards off the tāmāsa, rājāsa and sāttvika categories of characters in the following order: tāmāsa-cum-sāttvika, tāmāsa-cum-rājāsa and tāmāsa-cum-tāmāsa.

3. By serving the cause pious ladies like you, I shall attain special merit—SG.

* SG. explains the double entendre thus:

This full-moon-night is delightful to people (_janān rañjayati ti rajānti_). (Due to absence of darkness) it is quiet and beautiful in appearance (_aghora-rāpa_). It is inhabited (and visited) by beautiful creatures (_a-ghora-
20. Not seeing you in Vraja, your mothers, fathers, sons, brothers and husbands must be searching for you. Do not create fear and anxiety in your relatives.

21. You have now seen how the forest is adorned with floral beauty and illuminated with the silvery beams of the full moon, and beautified with the tender foliage of trees dancing sportively with the gentle breeze blowing from the Yamunā.

22. Oh ye virtuous ladies! Please return to Gokula without delay. Wait upon your husbands as ideal wives. Your children and calves are crying, suckle them and milk the cows.

23. Or if you have come as your heart is attached to me out of deep affection to me, it is quite natural (that you should have done so) for all creatures are affectionate to me.

24. But it is the supreme duty of women to wait upon and render service to husbands with sincerity of hearts, to look after the well-being of relatives and to nourish children.

25. The husband may be ill-natured or quarrelsome unfortunate, decrepit with age, dull-witted, sickly or penniless but women desirous of the heavenly world should not desert him if he be morally not fallen.

26. Resorting to illicit intercourse with a paramour by women of noble families, is a hindrance to the attainment of the heavenly world; it is scandalous, base, fraught with miseries and dangers, and it is abhorred everywhere.

27. Devotion to me is truly engendered by hearing about me, by looking at me, by meditating upon me and glorifying my sportive and noble deeds, and not by physical proximity. Therefore, please return home.

_sattva-nisvityā_ like deer and peacocks (which awaken erotic sentiment), or it is being enjoyed by a person like me who am quiescent and pleasant by nature (aghorāḥ sukhadāḥ sintam suvedāvah yasya tena maya nisvityā). Therefore, please do not go back to Vraja (pratipat Vraja na). As you are beautiful women, you please stay on here (śāstreyam).

SD: As you have by chance come here, please return. It is night time, it is not desirable that women should stay with me now.
Sri Śuka said:

28. Having heard that unpleasant speech of Kṛṣṇa, the cowherd women grew despondent as their expectations were frustrated, and they were immersed in deep anxiety out of which they could not extricate.

29. With their faces down-cast (in disappointment), and their Bimba-like red lips parched with hot breaths of grief, scratching the ground with their toe-nails and washing the saffron-painting on their breasts with tears mixed with collyrium, they stood silent, heavily burdened with distress.

30. The Gopis who discarded all their cherished desires for his sake, and who were still deeply attached to him, wiped out their eyes sore with weeping, and with their voice chocked up with anger resulting from frustration, and in faltering accents, they addressed to their dearest Kṛṣṇa who talked to them as if he bore no love to them.

Gopis urged:

31. “It does not behove, you, Oh Omnipresent Lord, to speak so harsh to us, your devotees, who have renounced all objects of enjoyment and have resorted to the soles of your feet. Pray do not abandon us your earnest devotees but accept us as does the Deity (Viṣṇu), the most ancient person, accept his devotees desirous of Liberation from Saṁsāra.

32. Knower of the principles of righteousness as you are, it may be as you say it, that the natural duty of women is to attend upon and render service to their husbands, children and friends or well-wishers. May this be so in the case of you, Oh dear Lord, who are the origin and object of such precepts. For, you being the Soul, the most beloved relative of all embodied beings, are dearest to all.1

1. K.D. explains that just as a coin of the highest denomination contains within it the coins of lower denomination (e.g. a rupee consists of one hundred paisa. When you possess a rupee you have with you one hundred paisa, similarly) when you, who are the soul of all creatures, are served well, other beings like husbands, sons etc. are automatically served properly. You form the basis of our desired objects as well as their accomplishments. This being the case, enough of your precepts of dharma —29.455—471.
33. Persons who are well-versed in dharma direct all their love (and devotion) to you, Oh ātman (soul) of all. For when you, the eternally dear Lord are available, what purpose can be served by husbands, sons and other relatives who are nothing but a source of trouble. Therefore, Oh Supreme Ruler! Be pleased to be gracious unto us, Oh Lotus-eyed God!

34. Our heart which until now used to be engaged happily in our homes, has been easily enticed away by you; so too our hands which were occupied with our domestic work. Our feet refuse to move away a single step from the soles of your feet. Under these circumstances, how can we return to Gokula and (even if we are carried there) what possibly can we do there?

35. Extinguish, Oh darling, with the flood of the nectar of Your lips1 the conflagration (of passion) set ablaze in our hearts by you, with your beguiling smiles, sideglances and melodious music, otherwise, with our bodies consumed by the fire of separation, we shall, by meditating upon you (like yogins), attain to the position of your feet.

36. Oh lotus-eyed Lord who are affectionate and favourable to persons (like yogis, sages and cowherds like us) who dwell in forests! Since the moment we happened somewhere (at some unknown place) to touch (but once) the soles of Your feet which are the delight of goddess Lakṣmī² we have been blessed by You and are now not at all able to stand before any other person, Oh dear Lord!

37. Although Śrī (the goddess of affluence and beauty) —to bask in whose favourable glance (at least once), gods make strenuous efforts,—has already secured a place on your bosom, she still aspires with Tulasī (the presiding deity of the

---

1. SG. clarifies that the fire of passion set ablaze is so intense and enormous that it requires a flood and not sprinkling of the nectar-drops for extinguishing it.

(ii) SG.'s second interpretation: Let the nectarine flood of your lips be crystallized into words and let it enter our ears and put out the fire of passion enkindled in our hearts.

2. Or which condescend to give (occasional) opportunity of touching the goddess Lakṣmī.
basil plant) and loves to secure the dust on Your lotus-like feet which it is the privilege of Your servants to enjoy. We also have similarly sought the dust under Your feet.

38. Do be propitious unto us, You soother of all afflictions. It is with the hope of (getting the opportunity of) adoring You that we quitted our homes (like yogīs) and have approached the soles of Your feet, Oh adornment of mankind! Grant us who are burning with intense longing, excited by Your charming smiles and enchanting glances, the privilege of serving You.

39. Looking at Your countenance covered with curling locks of hair, with cheeks shining with resplendent earrings and with lips full of ambrosia, and with sideglances accompanied by charming smiles, and beholding Your mighty arms reassuring protection (to Your devotees) as also Your bosom that excites passion in the heart of goddess Śrī, we would like to be Your menial servants (lit. your slaves).

40. Oh darling! Breathes there a woman in all the three worlds who would not swerve from the noble path approved by the elite, when (she happens to be) enchanted with the ravishing melodious (modulations of the) music of Your flute and (chances to be) bewitched by gazing of Your form, the most charming in all the (three) worlds, even a glance which sends a thrill of joy through cows, birds, trees and beasts.

41. It is certain that your honour has specially incarnated for dispelling the fear and afflictions of Gokula even as the First Divine Person—god Viṣṇu—did as the Protector of the Celestial Region. Therefore, Oh friend of the distressed, place Your lotus-hand on love-fired breasts and (aching) heads of Your maid-servants."

Śrī Śuka continued:

42. Listening to the piteous prayer of the Gopīs, the Ruler of the Masters of Yoga laughed loudly. Although he was ever-revelling in his own self, out of mercy and grace he conferred bliss on them.¹

¹. V.B. emphasizes the aloofness of Lord Kṛṣṇa who Himself being immersed in His own spiritual bliss, proceeded to delight the Gopīs (with no personal involvement).
43. With their countenances blooming under the gaze of their beloved Lord, the Gopīs gathered around Lord Kṛṣṇa (Acyuta) of glorious deeds, whose charming smiles radiated the splendour of his jasmine-like teeth. And he looked like the full moon surrounded by stars.

44. Being praised in songs (by the Gopīs) and himself bursting into a loud song, Lord Kṛṣṇa, adorned with the Vaijayantī wreath and leading a bevy of hundreds of beautiful damsels, wandered 'over the forest, gracing it (with his hallowed and charming presence).

45. Surrounded by Gopīs, he entered the cool sandy bed of the river and sported with them, while pleasant gentle breezes cooled by (their contact with) the waves of the Yamunā and charged with the fragrance of water lilies (blooming by the moonlight) were blowing.

46. Exciting amorous sentiment in the beautiful damsels of Vraja by stretching out his arms, embracing them, touching their hands, locks of hair, thighs, waists, bosom, by indulging in jokes and by prickling them gently with his nails, by his sportive glances and smiles, Kṛṣṇa gave delight to Gopīs.

47. Recipients of such a high honour from the noble-souled Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Gopīs got puffed up with pride and (each one of them) regarded (herself) as superior to all other women on the earth (in beauty).

48. Perceiving their conceit at their fortune (of being associated with the Lord) and their pride (of being the most beautiful woman), Lord Kṛṣṇa disappeared then and there, for curing them of that pride and showering Grace on them.
CHAPTER THIRTY*

Search after Kṛṣṇa

Śrī Śuka continued :

1. When the Lord suddenly disappeared, the damsels from Vraja, like she-elephants which have missed the leader of their herd, were deeply distressed, when they could not see him.

2. With their hearts captivated by the graceful movements, loving smiles, lustful glances as also by delightful discourses, amorous dalliances and frolics of the Lord of goddess Lakṣmī (Kṛṣṇa), those young damsels mentally identified themselves with him and began to emulate his various acts and sports.

3. Identifying themselves with Lord Kṛṣṇa and exhibiting Kṛṣṇa’s sportful movements and amorous dalliances, the Gopīs, the beloveds of their darling (Kṛṣṇa), whose persons had become (as it were) the duplicates (of Kṛṣṇa) in deportment, graceful smiling, glancing, speech etc., declared (to each other) “I am Kṛṣṇa.”

4. Singing aloud of Kṛṣṇa’s glory in a chorus, they sought for him, like lunatics, from forest to forest, enquiring of trees about that Lord (the Supreme Man) who, like ether, was pervading all the creatures from within and without.

5. “Oh Aśvattha ! Oh Plakṣa ! Oh Nyagrodha ! (varieties of Indian fig trees). Have you seen the son of Nanda who has absconded, stealing away our hearts by his captivating smiles and bewitching glances ?

6. Oh Kurabaka, Aśoka, Nāga, Punnāga and Campaka trees ! Did the younger brother of Balarāma who humbles the pride of proud women by his smiles pass this way ?

7. Oh blessed Tulasi (Basil plant) to whom the feet of Lord Govinda (Kṛṣṇa) are so dear ! Have you seen Acyuta, so very beloved of you, wearing you (in a wreath) swarming with bees.

* This is ch. No. 28 in VJ. This ch. shows that none but Lord Hari by His nature possesses all yogic powers. It also shows the intensity of devotion of the Gopīs—VJ.
8. (Addressing various flowering trees) Oh Mālatī! Oh Mallikā! Oh Jāti! Oh Yūthikā! Was Mādhaya (Lord of Lakṣmi, Kṛṣṇa) seen by you giving you delight by the touch of his hands, while passing by the way?

9. (Invoking other trees) Oh mango tree (of the cūta variety)! Oh Priyāla, Panasa (Jack-fruit tree), Asana, Kovidāra, Jambū (Rose-apple tree), Arka (the sun plant), Bilva (the wood-apple tree), Bakula, Āmra (a variety of mango tree), Kadamba and Nīpa trees and other trees on the bank of the Yamunā—Born as you are for the benefit of others! May you direct the path of Kṛṣṇa to us whose minds are vacant (due to separation from Hari).

10. What austere penance have you performed, Oh Earth, inasmuch as you appear resplendent with your hair standing on their ends through the thrill of joy, at the touch of the feet of Keśava (Kṛṣṇa)! But is this ecstasy due to (the touch of) Kṛṣṇa’s feet just now or is it due to your being best-ridden (formerly) by Lord Trivikrama (Viṣṇu, as Vāmana who covered the universe in three steps) or is it caused by the embrace of the Lord when incarnated as a boar (even before Vāmana-incarnation)?

11. Oh female deer! Here is permeated the fragrance of our leader’s—Lord Kṛṣṇa’s—garland of Kunda flowers tinged with (the scent of) saffron applied to the breast of his lady-love (when he hugged her). Did Kṛṣṇa pass this way along with his beloved, giving delight to your eyes by his graceful limbs Oh friend?

12. (To trees which bent low with the load of fruits) Oh trees! Did the younger brother of Balarāma, placing one (i.e. left) hand on the shoulder of his beloved and holding a lotus in the other (i.e. right) hand (to protect his beloved by warding off) the swarms of bees attracted by (the fragrance of) Tulasī and blinded by the intoxication (caused by the fragrance) which followed him—did Kṛṣṇa (ever) come here and was pleased to accept your low bows with glances full of affection (and appreciation)?

13. (Oh friends!) Ask these creepers which have embraced the arms (i.e. branches) of their husbands, the trees, as they certainly exhibit the thrill (sprouts or flowers) of joy at the touch of his finger-nails while plucking a flower for his beloved)."

14.* Thus the cowherd women became bewildered in their vain search of Kṛṣṇa and raved in this way. With their hearts engrossed (and as if identical) with him, they began to emulate the divine sports of the Lord.

15. One of the Gopīs who imitated Kṛṣṇa sucked the breast of another Gopī who played the part of Pūtanā. Another Gopī emulating Kṛṣṇa, the baby, began to cry and kicked another Gopī who acted the part of a cart (Śakaṭa).

16. Acting the role of a demon (viz. Tṛṇāvarta) carried away another Gopī who behaved like an infant Kṛṣṇa, while a third crawled on all fours dragging the feet and thereby making a jingling sound of the anklets.

17. Two Gopīs enacted¹ the role of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa while others played the part of cowherds. Out of them one struck a third gopī that played the part of Vatsāsura (a demon in the form of a calf), while another (acting as Kṛṣṇa) struck another (fourth) Gopī who enacted the role of the demon Baka.

18. One imitated Kṛṣṇa shouting out at cows from a distance, while another emulated him and played upon the flute, while others applauded her saying "Well done."

19. Another Gopī who mentally identified herself with Kṛṣṇa placed her arm on some other Gopī and while following her, told the other "Lo! I am Kṛṣṇa. Look at my graceful gait."

20. "Don’t be afraid of tempestuous winds and (driving) shower. Protection against them has been provided by me". Saying so, another Gopī strained herself and held up (a part of) her garment with one hand (as if it were the mount Govardhana²).

21. Treading on the head of another Gopī and mounting thereon (one Gopī) ordered, "Now that I, the wielder of

*VJ.'s text does not include 10 verses from this verse (i.e. vv. 14-23 both inclusive).

1. Historical present is used in some of these verses but for consistent use of tense, past tense is used in translation.

the rod of punishment to the wicked, have incarnated, get out from this place, Oh wicked serpent."1

22. (Imagining that all the Gopas are surrounded by forest conflagration and to vouchsafe their protection) another Gopi said, "Oh cowherds! Lo that raging forest fire. Shut up your eyes quickly. I shall speedily accomplish your welfare (rescue from fire)."

23. Tied to (a Gopi who represented) a mortar with a wreath by another (Gopi who acted the part of Yaśodā).

23-A* ["Now I bind the thief who has stolen butter and broken a number of (earthen) pots"][*]. And the lady with beautiful eyes (who was thus bound) covered her face (with hands) and feigned fear (put up a show of trembling with fear).

24. While they were enquiring of the creepers and trees of Vṛndāvana about Kṛṣṇa, they noticed in a certain part of the forest, the foot-prints of the Supreme soul (Kṛṣṇa).

25. "It is obvious that the footprints are definitely those of the noble-souled son of Nanda, as they are identified by the marks such as a flag, a lotus, a uajra, a goad and a barley seed"2

26. While they went ahead tracing his path by following those footprints, the poor women were sorely distressed at heart to find them interspersed with those of a young woman and spoke to each other.

27. "Whose foot-prints possibly these can be? Who can be this woman who walked in his company with his hand resting on her shoulder, even as a she-elephant with the trunk of her mate on hers.

28. Certainly the Supreme Ruler, the glorious Lord Hari, has been propitiated3 by this lady. Hence, being pleased with her, Lord Kṛṣṇa took her to a rendezvous abandoning us all.

1. Cf. VP. 5. 13. 27.

* VR's text adds this half-verse.

2. Cf. VP. 5.13-32.

3. SG.: Here the name of that Gopi is Rādhā is indicated by the text: rādhayati ārādhayati iti śrī-Rādhā iti nāmakaraṇam darsitam'. Although the text of the Bh.P. is silent on this point, all commentators of the Bengal school of Vaiṣṇavism presumed that she was Rādhā and have written interesting extensive commentaries on these verses.
29. Oh friends! How blessed are the particles of dust under the Lotus-feet of Lord Govinda—the particles which god Brahmā, Śiva, and goddess Lakṣmī bore on the crowns of their head, for absolving themselves of the sins (which separated them from him. Let us do so, so that by placing the dust on our heads we shall be united with Kṛṣṇa).

30. But these foot-prints of hers cause distress to our hearts inasmuch as only she (out of all Gopīs) has stolen away Kṛṣṇa (who belongs to all of us) and enjoys his kisses in a secret place.

31. But here her foot-prints are not visible. Most probably, seeing that the tender soles of his beloved's feet are pricked with sharp and pointed blades of grass, her darling Kṛṣṇa has carried her on his shoulders.

31 A.* These foot-prints have been sunk more deeply (in the soil) as he was carrying the young woman. Have a look at these foot-prints of love-lorn Kṛṣṇa (obviously) weighed down under a heavy load.

31 B. (Going a few paces ahead, they observe :) It appears that here he set her down for gathering flowers (for putting them in her braid of hair).

32. (Proceeding still further) Here flowers are gathered by the Lover for his beloved. Behold these foot-prints which are not entire as he stood on tip-toe.

33. (Most probably) on this spot the lust-ful Lord has performed the decoration of the hair of his lady-love. He must have certainly taken his seat here for fastening the flowers in her braid.

34. It is with a view to demonstrate to the world the wretched plight of the love-stricken as well as the stone-hearted nature of women that the Lord sported with the lady even though he is ever delighted in his own blissful self, self-sporting Perfect Person unattracted by the amours of women.

35-36. Showing to each other the traces of Kṛṣṇa’s foot-prints in this way, the Gopīs wandered in a despondent mood (concentrating on Kṛṣṇa). And the Gopī whom Kṛṣṇa

* 31-A Not found in the Text of ŚR and VB.
(in preference to other Gopīs, and) leaving others in the forest, had brought there, now began to regard herself as the most beautiful of all women. Thought she to herself, "the beloved Lord resorts to me only, abandoning all other Gopīs who too love him."

37. Thereupon, after going to a certain place in the forest, she, being affected with pride, told Śrī Kṛṣṇa, "I am not able to walk any further. Therefore (give me a lift and) take me whither-so-ever you please."

38. When requested thus, he told his beloved, "Mount on my shoulder" and he disappeared. And the lady lamented in repentance.

39. "Oh Lord! My darling! Oh most beloved one! Where have you gone? I am your miserable slave. Be pleased with me to reveal your Presence, 'Oh mighty armed Lord!"

40. While the (other) cowherd women went on tracing the path of the Lord, they noticed from a distance, their distressed friend bewildered through her separation from her darling.

41. Listening to her report as to how she was received with honour by Mādhava (Kṛṣṇa) and was humiliated by him through her own wickedness, they were extremely astonished.

42. They further probed into the forest (for Kṛṣṇa) so long as the moon-light was available. Seeing that darkness was setting in, they returned from that spot.

43. With their minds absorbed in him, they talked about Kṛṣṇa only; they imitated his movements and sang about his excellences. They became oblivious of their persons, as well as of their homes.

44. Returning to the sandy bank of the Yamunā, the Gopīs contemplated on Kṛṣṇa only. Anxiously waiting for his arrival, they sang of Kṛṣṇa in a chorus.
CHAPTER THIRTYONE

Gopis' song (prayer for Kṛṣṇa's return)

Gopis sang:

1. It is due to your birth here that the goddess of affluence and beauty (Lakṣmī) abides here permanently and the Vraja outshines in progressive prosperity. But dear Lord! We, your beloveds, who have with difficulty managed to be alive for your sake (in the hope of visualizing you) are searching for you in every direction. Be pleased to reveal yourself to us, Oh darling.

2. Oh Lord of amorous enjoyment! Is this not killing us en masse by disappointing us, your gratuitous maid-servants, with your eyes that surpass (lit. steal) the splendour of the interior of a beautiful full-blown lotus in a translucent lake in the autumn, Oh Bestower of boons?

3.* Oh mighty Lord (lit. Bull among men)! We have been so often protected by you from death through drinking of poisonous water, from Aghāsura, the demon disguised as a boa-constrictor, from heavy showers, stormy winds and the fire of lightening, from the demon (Ariṣṭa) in the form of a bull) and from the son of Mayāsura (the demon Vyoma)

1. Ch. 29 in VJ.'s Text. According to VJ, this chapter shows that for those who are not eligible to study the Vedānta and yet aspire after Mokṣa, singing His glory is the way of propitiating the Lord. It brings about His Grace. This chapter describes Gopis' (women, not eligible to Vedic studies) way of propitiating the Lord. The Gopis are addressing Kṛṣṇa directly, as He is all the while present in their hearts.

VR. The request for revelation may be treated as the burden of the song.

2. This is not a chorus but one Gopi after another (or one group of Gopis after another) is expressing herself.

3. SG. states modestly that he explains the "crumbs" of the noble-soul Sr who has deeply drunk the essence of the nectarlike song. SG quotes a Prākrit verse (Text corrupt) which means that a beloved does not survive her separation from her lover, but as their lives are entrusted to Him, they are alive.

*In VJ.'s text, Śr's 6th verse is 2nd and Śr's 2nd verse as 3rd.

4. Vide infra 10.36.16

5. Vide infra 10.37.28
and from perilous situations all over. (Why are you so indifferent to us now? We still hope to secure your protection.)

4*. Oh friend! As a matter of fact you are not the son of a Gopi (Yaśodā) but you are the witness, dwelling in the soul (i.e. hearts) of embodied beings. When prayed by god Brahmā for the protection of the universe, you appeared in the clan of Sātvatas (or the family of devotees). (Hence, it is improper for you to show indifference to your devotees).

5. Oh Leader of Vṛṣṇis! Place on our head your lotus-like palm that graciously assures protection to those who resort to your feet through fear of samsāra—Your palm which bestows all desires and has espoused the hand of Śrī, the goddess of prosperity, Oh Beloved.

6. Oh Mighty Hero! The Annihilator of the afflictions of the inhabitants of Vraja! Oh friend whose beguiling smile humiliates the pride of your people (votaries)! Be pleased to accept us who have been your bonded servants. Show unto us—poor women—your charming lotus-like countenance.

7. Be pleased to place on our bosoms your lotus-feet which totally dissipates the sins of those who prostrate themselves (in complete submission) at them (your feet) that (affectionately) follow the herbivorous animals (cows), which are the abode of Śrī, the goddess of beauty and prosperity, and which were placed on the hoods of the serpent Kāliya—and thereby remove completely the pangs of passion from our hearts.¹

The anachronism is obvious. SG. defends it by saying that Gopīs developed omniscience due to their devotion to Kṛṣṇa. Hence, these future acts are quoted here. VB asserts that Gopīs being omniscient, the chronological sequence is not binding on them!

* This is verse 5th in VJ. (as per Vṛndāvan edt.).

VJ: You are verily the delight of the Gopīs, Oh friend! For the protection of the universe you have appeared in the family of Yadus (i.e. Sātvatas). You are the Inner Controller of all embodied creatures and witness to all (or you are ever realizing your ownself). You are worshipped by god Brahmā, the creator or the preceptor of the Universe.

¹ SR, VR & VJ unanimously explain Kṛndhi hṛcchayaṁ as Kāmāch chindhi—"cut down, destroy the passionate love in our hearts". VB’s imaginative explanation is interesting. For example—The Gopīs submit: ’Our breasts are not soft but you have trodden upon the hard hood of Kāliya. We may be uncultured but your feet followed cows. The request is made by all Gopīs and hence plural kucesu.
8. Oh lotus-eyed Lord! With your melodious words consisting of charming expressions delightful (and appealing even) to the minds of the wise and with the nectar from your lips, revive us who are charmed with you and are swooning for you—and are but your slaves doing your biddings, Oh Valiant hero!

9. (We did not die of separation from you but are alive due to listening to your nectarlike stories).

Highly meritorious (due to their liberality in the previous existence) must be those persons who extol your nectarlike stories which are not only life-giving to the afflicted but are superior to the nectar (itself), inasmuch as, they are highly eulogized by the knowers of the Brahman (to whom nectar is negligible) and which remove all sins, are the most auspicious to hear, and the source of all prosperity and are spread all over the world.

10. Darling Kṛṣṇa! Your hearty laughs, your loving oglings, your sports and pastimes so auspicious to contemplate on, and your enchanting jokes and acts in privacy all go down into our heart and agitate it, Oh Deceitful Love!

11. Oh Loving Lord! When you go out of Vraja to graze the cattle, our heart gets agitated (with the thought that) your lotus-like beautiful feet will be pricked and pained by the gravel and stubs and blades of grass, Oh Darling.

12. When at the close of the day you now and then present your countenance overhung with dark-blue curly locks of hair, soiled with the dust raised by cows (in the forest), it appears like a lotus (surrounded by black bees and over-strewn with pollen), and thereby you provoke the passion of Love in our hearts (and do not satisfy it) Oh Cheat!

13. Oh delightful Enchanter! Pray be pleased to place on our bosom your lotus-feet, bestowers of desires to prostrating supplicants, worshipped by the lotus-born deity, the very ornament of the earth (enhancing its beauty by footprints),

1. They are the most liberal persons on the earth (ŚR.)
2. or Those who sing of your glory broadcast all over the world are the most munificent donors.
3. VB—Kāman dyati khaṇḍayati cuts down, removes kāma
4. God Brahmā—ŚR; goddess Laktśmi—SG.
the most blissful ones which ought to be meditated in times of distress, Oh Remover of mental anguish.

14. Oh Hero! Pray, condescend to grant to us the nectar of your lips which enhances the charm of amorous enjoyment and destroys all griefs—the nectar which has been enjoyed fully by the flute kissed by you in sounding, making people forget all other passions and attachments.

15. During day-time, while your Lordship is away wandering in the woods, and we are not able to see you, even a quarter of a moment is felt by us as an age. (But when you return in the evening we feel that) god Brahmā must be dull-witted in creating our eye-lashes which, while winking, deprive us even for a moment of the joy of looking at you, when we are eagerly gazing at your beautiful countenance, graced with curly locks of hair.

16. Oh crafty Deceiver! Who would abandon poor women like us who, being enchanted by the loud melodious music of a musical expert like you and who know that we are sure to come to you—us who have completely set at nought our husbands, children, followers, brothers and relatives and knowing your way, have sought your presence, Oh Acyuta!

17. Remembering your secret amorous promises and beholding your smiling countenance provoking the passion of love in our heart, your loving glances, your broad chest, the abode of Śrī (goddess of affluence and beauty), our hearts get excited with excessive longing every now and then, and becomes infatuated.

18. Darling Kṛṣṇa! Your incarnation is for dispelling the sins and miseries of the inhabitants of Vraja (viz. Gopas) and of the forests viz. sages, as well as for conferring the highest auspiciousness on the universe. Be pleased, therefore, to impart to us who entertain a strong yearning for you in our hearts, something of that balm (of your company) which will relieve all the mental anguish of your people (votaries).

19*. As your Lordship constitutes our very life, our

1. Hero in erotics—SG.
   Hero in munificent gifts like puruṣārthas—VB.
   *Deleted in VJ's text.
mind reels to think whether your lotus-feet on which you wander in the forest, are not pained while walking on the gravels etc., for (on our part) we, being afraid (of injuring your tender feet) place them gently on our hard breasts, Oh tender Darling!

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO

Krṣṇa comforts Gopīs

Śrī Śuka said:

1. In this way (as described in the previous chapter), the Gopīs, yearning strongly to see Lord Krṣṇa went singing loudly, wailing loudly and at times raving incoherently, they wept loudly and piteously, Oh king.¹

2. And (surprisingly enough) in their very midst appeared Lord Krṣṇa, the descendant of king Śūra, with his lotus-face beaming with smile, wearing a yellow garment, adorned with a wreath of flowers, capable of fascinating the god of Love (cupid) himself (with his charm).

3. Seeing their belovedmost Darling arrived,² all those women, though emaciated and weak at once sprang to their feet, with their eyes wide open with rapturous delight, even as the limbs of the body do on the return of the vital principle (Prāṇa).

3-A. VR.’s Text:

The more they drank the nectarine beauty of his countenance with the drinking vessels (in the form) of their eyes, the more unsatiated they grew (lit. they were not satiated at all), just as men of spiritual wisdom feel about his feet.

¹. The beginning of the chapter shows that just as the Lord manifested Himself to the Gopīs, He reveals himself to the possessors of spiritual means of getting divine wisdom—V.J.

². SG. quotes VP. tato dartṣur dyāntam vikti-mukha-paṅkajah and states that Krṣṇa revealed himself at a distance and then approached the Gopīs. The above quotation is not traceable in the Gitā Press etc. of VP.
4. One of the Gopīs, in her ecstasy, clasped the lotus-hand of Kṛṣṇa with her palms, while another placed on her shoulder his arm smeared with sandal-paste.

5. Another slim and emaciated Gopī received in the hollow of her palms, the betel chewed by him, while another Gopi, feverish with love, placed his lotus-feet on her bosom.

6. Being beside herself with the agitation of unrequited love, another Gopī knitted her eyebrows and continued to bite her lip and was looking at him as if she was subjecting him to a volley of side-glances.

7. Another Gopī gazed at his lotus-face with fixed unwinking eyes. Although she drank (his nectar-like face) to the full, she did not feel satiated like saintly persons who are never satiated serving his feet.

8. A certain other Gopī got him established in her heart through the pupils of her eyes, and closed the eyes (so as to prevent his exit). Then she (mentally) embraced him, and through that thrill, had all her hair standing on their ends like a yogin immersed in spiritual bliss.

9. All of them became satisfied and happy by the high festival of having the look of Keśava (Kṛṣṇa) and had their fever born of separation subsided, just as people do when they attain God-head or meet a person who has realized the Brahman or who reach Prājñā in deep sleep.

10. Surrounded by the ladies who had shed off their sorrow (due to the separation from the Lord), the glorious immortal Lord Kṛṣṇa shone more brilliantly like the Puruṣa (Supreme Spirit) endowed with his spiritual powers.

11-12. The Supreme Lord repaired with them to the sandy bed of the Yamunā where swarm of blackbees were attracted by the gentle breeze charged with the fragrance of fully blossomed jasmine and Mandāras. The darkness of the night where-of was dispelled by flood of rays of the autumnal

---

1. These are variously enumerated by different commentators:

   (1) ŚR.—(a) Sattva, rajas and tamas
   (b) spiritual knowledge and (physical and mental) strength essential for meditation.

   (2) VR. : 24 tattvas forming the part of the astral body of a jīva.

   (3) VJ. : various forms of Lākṣmī attending upon the Lord.
moon, rendering the scene all the more delightful; the soft sands whereof were (evenly) spread by the handlike ripples of the Yamunā. (In this way, the Lord surrounded by the Gopīs appeared still more beautiful).

13. With their mental anguish completely dissipated by the extreme joy of seeing him, the Gopīs accomplished their desires to their heart's content, just as Śrutis (Vedas which pertain to the karmakānda or sacrificial and other rituals, are unsatisfied due to their inability to see the Lord but) have their purpose achieved (in the portion containing jñāna-kānda or spiritual knowledge leading to and resulting) in God-realization. With their upper garments coloured with the spots of saffron applied to their breasts, they prepared a seat for Kṛṣṇa, who was dearer to them than their self (or their indwelling soul).

14. The glorious Almighty Lord who is enthroned in the hearts of the masters of yoga took his seat on it. Assuming a personality which was the only receptacle of all the splendour and beauty in the three worlds, he shone splendidly in the congregation of Gopīs.

15. Offering warm respectful welcome to him who enkindled the passion of love, the Gopīs, with their eyebrows the sportfulness of which was enhanced by their smiles and playful oglings, and praising him while pressing his hands and feet placed on their laps, spoke to him slightly feigning anger.

Gopīs said:

16. Some show favour (in response) to those who resort to them, while others behave to the contrary (and favour those

1. VJ. reads: Kṛṣṇehdy asta etc. and interprets:
   The sands whereof were scattered and made uneven by the sports of Kṛṣṇa—(Śrī Kṛṣṇa-mūrtikriyā dyastāni ca taralāni cātā evācitāni itastāt vikriyāni)

2. VJ. : Worthy of being enjoyed only by the goddess Lakṣmī who is adored and served by the three worlds.
   VB: He assumed the best of the form suitable to the time, place etc. and manifested whatever was the worthiest.

3. SG. suggests that Kṛṣṇa assumed different forms each per Gopī and occupied the seat prepared by her and made her feel that it is her special privilege to receive Kṛṣṇa that way.
who do not resort to them), while (still) others do neither (and confer grace of favour on none). Oh Lord! Be pleased to explain to us clearly about this.

The Lord replied:

17. Oh friends! Those who love or resort to each other (the reciprocity of their love is with a selfish motive), strive to achieve purely their own purpose. Neither friendliness nor righteousness plays any part therein. This love is just for self-interest and nothing else.

18. Those who love even those who do not resort to them (or love them) in return, are really compassionate like parents. Here lies pure, blemishless righteousness as well as good will, Oh charming damsels (with beautiful waists).

19. There are some who do not love those who resort to them. How can they be expected to favour them who do not resort to them? These belong to the following categories:

(1) They are sages immersed in the spiritual delight of atman (the soul) (and are unconscious of the external world).

(2) They have accomplished the objects of their desires (and as such have no interest or longing for enjoyment and hence indifferent, though conscious of the external world).

(3) They are ungrateful (and incapable of appreciating obligations done to them).

(4) They are bent on hating their elderly people (father or teacher).

20. (When Kṛṣṇa dodged the implied accusation of Gopis against him in explaining the above categories, the Gopis smiled. Kṛṣṇa noticed it and explained).

As far as I am concerned, Oh friends (I do not belong to any of these categories because I am an extremely compassionate and the best friend of all), I do not respond immediately to their love and devotion (I do not reveal myself to them), so that they would ever continue to meditate upon me, just as a penniless man who has lost the money he has earned, is absorbed in thinking about his lost treasure and would not be aware of anything else.

1. KD refuses to regard this as real worship or love: It is naked self-interest 32.17.172-80.

20. A *Vj’s Text adds:

In the same way both (the categories described above) continue to get from me the fruit or return in great or small measure (according to the intensity of their devotion to me) even as one obtains fruit from the kalpa taru (wisyielding tree).

21*. Oh fair damsels! In this way, it is with a view of seeing the intensity and constancy of your devotion to me that I remained with you invisible (and stayed with you listening to your expression of love about me) as you have, for my sake, renounced the conventional worldly sense of decorum, the injunction of the Vedas (for righteousness or otherwise) and your kith and kin. Oh beloved ones! It does not behove you to blame me, your Darling.

22. Even if the long life of celestials¹ be granted, it is not possible for me to repay adequately your devoted service to me with whom your relations are pure and faultless. And you have resorted to me and adored me cutting asunder the unbreakable ties that fetter you to your home. (The only way is:) May your righteousness be rewarded by your good deeds only.

---

*VJ: The Lord explains how to serve him on the plea of Praising the service rendered by Gopis:

Just as a penniless fellow who lost his wealth he could earn, is too much submerged in deep sorrow to be cognisant of anything else, you have dedicated to Me everything—worldly way of life, injunctions of the Vedas and your relatives; your devotional service shall not be fruitless. By nature I am beyond the ken of senses and hence was invisible to you—But it does not behove you to find fault with Me who am your darling.

¹ The life of a god is 36000 human years but KD interprets vibudhāyus as the life-span of god Brahmā which is one pardvika years i.e. 100,000,000,000,000,000 years—32.22.260.
CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

Description of Rāsa Krīḍā

Śrī Suka said:

1. Listening to these soft fascinating words of the Lord, the Gopīs forgot the agony caused by separation from him and their bliss was enhanced by personal contact with him, Oh dear king.

2. There (on the sandy bank of the Yamunā) Lord Govinda inaugurated his Rāsa Krīḍā (the play called Rāsa) with those jewel-like damsels (of superb beauty) who were so devoted and affectionate to him and who formed a circle with their arms interlocked (with those of Kṛṣṇa).

3. Then commenced formally the festive dance called rāsa, beautified splendidly by the (moving) circle of Gopīs with Kṛṣṇa, the great Master of Yoga of inconceivable mystic powers (assumed as many forms as there were Gopīs and) entered in between every two Gopīs and with his arm placed around the neck of the adjacent Gopi, made each of the damsels consider to be nearest to him (and being embraced by him).

1. SG. quotes from Bharata’s Nāṭya-śāstra: The dance in which a number of female dancers dance with their hands interlocked in the company of men who place their arms round the neck of the women-partners:
   nāstār gṛhita-kauṭhīnām anyānyātakara-srīyām/nartakīnām bhaved rāsa maṇḍalībhīya nartatiṃ/

2. SG. quotes Bīla-maṅgala which describes how Kṛṣṇa accompanied each Gopi as her dance-mate: “A circle of dancers was formed with Kṛṣṇa between two dancing ladies and a lady between two Kṛṣṇas. In the middle of such a circle of dancers Kṛṣṇa stood and played upon His flute.
   aṅganān aṅganām antarā Mādhavo / Mādhavaḥ Mādhavaḥ caṅṭaraṁāṅganā / ittham ākālpiṣ maṇḍal ādhyagaṇā / saṁjagau venaṇā Devakī-nandanaḥ /

This is possible only to Bhagavān Kṛṣṇa with His yogamāyā. Hence the significance of the words bhagavān and yogamāyām upāśritah in Supra 10.29.1

Vide infra V. 20 which states that Kṛṣṇa assumed as many forms as there were the cowherd-women.

Kṛṣṇ ā prātistatām dīnānām yāvatār gopa-yoṣitaḥ /
4. (As soon as Lord Kṛṣṇa thought of beginning the rāsakṛīḍā) there thronged in the sky hundreds of heavenly cars of celestials along with their wives whose minds were carried away with curiosity (of seeing the rāsa dance).

5. At that time, kettle-drums were sounded and showers of flowers fell. The heads of Gandharvas accompanied by their consorts sang the noble and hallowing glory of the Lord.

6. There arose in the ring of rāsa (dancers), the (orchestral) din of the jingling bangles and anklets and the tinkling of the small bells of girdles of the ladies accompanied by their darling Lord.

7. Exceedingly beautiful shone the glorious Lord, the son of Devaki, in the midst of those pairs of damsels like unto a highly precious emerald\(^1\) embedded in between a pair of gold beads.

8. With their measured treads of feet and (artistic) movements of their hands (in dancing), with their smiles and (gracefully) amorous dance of eyebrows, with bending waists and shaking breasts, with the fluttering of their garments, with ear-rings rocking on their cheeks, with drops of perspiration trickling down their face and with their braids of hair and girdles getting loosened (in the course of dancing), the dancing-mates of Kṛṣṇa glorified the Lord in songs and appeared beautiful like flashes of lightening illuminating a circle of clouds (as Kṛṣṇa assumed as many forms as the Gopīs in that circular movement of rāsa).

9*. In the course of dancing, the Gopīs, enamoured of loving devotion to Kṛṣṇa and thrilled with delight at the touch of Kṛṣṇa, sang at the pitch of their voices sweetened with different musical modes (rāgas) filling thus the whole universe with the music (of their song).

10. A certain Gopī sang in chorus with Kṛṣṇa in a higher pitch. Even though her notes of the gamut (svara-jāti) did not harmonize with that of Kṛṣṇa, she was applauded by him with the words "Well-done", as he was pleased with her performance. When she proceeded to reach her highest pitch to the measured beat (iūla) well-known as Dhruva (pada), Kṛṣṇa showed great regard for her.

\(^1\) SG. explains that although Kṛṣṇa was of sapphire-blue complexion, the brilliant-golden complexion of the Gopīs, He embraced, made Him appear like emerald.

*Commentators quote names of Gopīs. These names of the Gopīs involved in the dance are imaginary-unsupported by the text of the Bh.P.

11. Thoroughly exhausted by (participation in) the rāsa dance and with her bangles slipping (from her wrists) and jasmine flowers dropping (from her braid), another Gopi caught hold by her arm, the shoulder of Kṛṣṇa who was standing by (i.e. flung her arms round him).

12. (It is reported that) another Gopi smelt how Kṛṣṇa's arm placed on her shoulder, was fragrant like a lily and was anointed with sandal paste, (and losing herself) she (actually) kissed it and was thrilled with it (with her hair standing on their ends).

13. To another Gopi who rested on Kṛṣṇa's cheek her own which was glowing with the brilliance of her own earrings rocking in the course of dancing Kṛṣṇa gave his half-chewed betel.

14. Another Gopi, standing by his side was fatigued with singing and dancing, making all the while a jingling sound of her anklets and girdle (while dancing) pressed to her bosom his blissful lotus-hand.

15. Obtaining Acyuta (the immortal God—Kṛṣṇa), the sole Darling of the goddess Śrī (Lakṣmī) as their beloved, the cowherd women with his arms round their neck extolled him in song and played (danced) with him.

16. The Gopa women with the beauty of their face enhanced by lotuses adorning their ears, cheeks beautified with their curly locks of hair, and drops of perspiration, with wreaths of flowers dropping from their (braids of) hair, danced with the glorious Lord accompanied with the musical instruments in the form of jingling bangles and anklets, at the ring of the rāsa dance where humming blackbees acted as songsters.

17*. Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of goddess Lakṣmī, sported with the beauties of Vṛṣa by embracing them, pressing their palms, winsome oglings with free amorous gestures and hearty (loud)

* VJ. God is absolutely independent and above all prescriptions and prohibitions and can violate all canons of conduct!
laughter, even as a child would play with its own reflection (in the mirror).

18. Their senses were so overwhelmed with ecstatic joy at the contact with that Divine Personality that the women of Vraja whose wreaths and ornaments were loosened and falling, were too much beside themselves (with joy) to re-adjust their dishevelled locks of hair, their garments and brassiers, Oh Prominent Kuru!

19. While witnessing Kṛṣṇa’s love sports, the celestial damsels were smitten with love and fainted. And even the Moon-god along with his retinue (of stars or nakṣatras) was too much amazed (to proceed with his movements and halted).

20. Though a reveller in his own Supreme bliss, the Lord assumed as many forms as there were Gopīs and delightfully disported\(^1\) with each of them.

21. The merciful Lord wiped out affectionately, the sweat off their faces with his most blissful comforting hand as they were fatigued with overdancing with him, Oh dear king.

22. Adoring the Supreme Lord with the splendour of their cheeks enhanced by the brilliant gold ear-rings and curly locks of hair and with glances accompanied with nectar-like smiles, the Gopīs who (despite their fatigue in the rāṣa dance) became enraptured by the touch of his finger-nails, burst out in singing his hallowing deeds.\(^2\)

23. Like unto a king-elephant breaking down the dams and entering water in the company of she-elephants, the exhausted\(^3\) Lord Kṛṣṇa who had transgressed the restraints (laid down by the Vedas and public decorum) became desirous of getting over the fatigue, and in the company of the Gopīs, entered the waters of the Yamunā (where he was) closely

---

1. VJ. reads ‘rārāma’. The Parasmaipada form indicates the aloofness of the Lord in that rāṣa rārāmeti Vyatayena para-dārabhimanaṇa dosa nāsti iti vakyamāṇam artham ihaiva śucayati

2. These songs suggested the conclusion of the rāṣa (Ve.)

3. SG. imagines that this adj. is used to indicate that the beauty of Kṛṣṇa’s countenance was enhanced by droplets of sweat appearing on it through fatigue.
followed by black-bees (humming melodiously) like the chiefs of celestial songsters, the Gandharvas, (as they were) allured by his garland (of Kūnda flowers) squeezed by contact with the persons of the Gopīs (while embracing etc.) and was coloured with saffron applied by them to their breasts.

24. Oh dear Parikṣit! The Lord, who ever revels in his own blissful state, sported here like a king-elephant as he was profusely sprinkled over with water on all sides by the youthful damsels who were casting amorous glances at him, and were heartily laughing, while he was being praised by gods who were showering on him flowers from their aerial cars.

25. Like unto a young elephant exuding temporal fluid sauntering in the company of female elephants, the Lord, surrounded by a swarm of black-bees and a bevy of young ladies, roved in a grove on the bank of the Yamunā, where blew on all sides a gentle breeze bearing the fragrance of aquatic flowers as well as of the flowers on lands.

26. In this way, the Lord of accomplished desires to whom the bevy of young damsels were deeply attached and devoted, enjoyed all those nights (without losing a single minute without enjoyment—the night¹ illuminated by the rays of the moon and which formed the basis for all charming poetical works specially appropriate for autumnal season—but he controlled all his energy within himself (such was his control over Eros.)

King Parikṣit said:

27. The Almighty Lord of the Universe along with his arīśa-part (Balarāma) incarnated here to establish Dharma (righteous way of life) and the suppression of the vile way of life.

28. He is the Promulgator of the moral order. He is the ideal model of ethical standard and the Protector thereof. How did he act in direct contravention of it, in seducing sensually the wives of others?

¹ The plural number indicates that throughout His Kīkora period (from 11 to 15 years of age), Kṛṣṇa enjoyed the rāsa-dance every night-SG. This is a better interpretation than imagining that Kṛṣṇa extended that particular night for many days while Gopīs felt it to be a single night.
29. Oh holy sage of sacred vows! Be pleased to resolve our doubt as to with what intention the Lord of Yadus who is said to have accomplished all his desires, perpetrated such censurable deed.

Śrī Śuka explained:

30. Transgression of the canons of righteousness and over-adventurism are found to have been committed by mighty rulers. But that does not amount to a blemish for a noble heroic soul, as in the case of omnivorous fire (which does not get polluted by consuming impure things).

31. An incapable weakling (dependent on his body) should never commit this (transgression) even mentally. A person imitating him foolishly meets destruction like a person other than Rudra (but imitating Rudra) does by swallowing the (Halāhala) poison churned out of the sea.

32. The words of the possessors of divine wisdom and might are always correct and authoritative, but not necessarily, so their acts (which may be emulated on certain occasions only). Hence an intelligent person should practice such course (of conduct) which is consistent with their own precepts.¹

33. Such authoritative persons who are devoid of ego (ahankāra) have no selfish ends to serve by virtuous behaviour or have no stakes to lose by acting to the contrary.

34. Need it be told that the Lord, the controller of all beings like the sub-human creation (birds, beasts etc.), human beings and celestials who, being fit to be governed by him (and are subject to his control), is not concerned with piety or impiety of the acts (the moral code of conduct of ordinary beings is not applicable to the Almighty).

35. The sages who are completely satisfied (and have become desireless) by serving the pollen-like dust of his

¹. VR.: Therefore, an intelligent person should follow those acts of God which are consistent with His precepts. OR A prudent man should not emulate the acts of God which are against His precepts.

VJ.: An intelligent person should not practice what is said or regarded as contrary to Vedic injunctions.
lotus-feet and who have absolutely freed themselves by shaking off all the bondage of karmas by virtue of their Yogic Powers, behave according to their free will and are not bound (by their acts). How could there be any bondage to the glorious Lord who has assumed a personality at his own free will?

36. He who dwells not only in these Gopīs but also in their husbands—nay in all embodied beings (as their Inner Controller), and who presides over all these, has as a sport, assumed the form of Kṛṣṇa in this world.

37. It is for showering Grace on all creatures that the Lord has put on a human form and participated in those sportful activities (like the rāsa krīḍā). By listening to these, a person may become attached to him exclusively (as a devotee).

38. The male inhabitants of Vraja were so much spellbound by the deluding potency of the Lord that they always considered their wives ever present by their sides and they never felt any jealousy against Kṛṣṇa.

39. At the approach of the Brāhma muhūrta (i.e. dawn) the Gopīs, the beloveds of the glorious Lord, returned reluctantly to their homes with the permission1 of the Lord.

40. He who reverentially listens to and rehearses the account of the amorous sport of Viṣṇu (i.e. his incarnation Kṛṣṇa) with the damsels of Vraja, conceives intense devotion to the Almighty Lord, attains spiritual wisdom and self-control, and soon overcomes the maladies of the heart (like lust and other passions).

---

1. SG.—anu-moditāḥ—who were all the while—(every minute of that night)—filled with joy by Kṛṣṇa (hence their reluctance to return).
CHAPTER THIRTYFOUR

Sudarśana emancipated and slaying of Śaṅkhacūḍa

Śrī Śuka said:

1. On one occasion, the cowherds had their curiosity aroused in participating in a pilgrimage to god (Śiva) and they set out in carts drawn by bullocks to a place known as Ambikāvana (the grove of goddess Pārvatī).

2. Having performed ablutions in the river Sarasvatī, they devoutly worshipped the god Śiva as well as the goddess Pārvatī with various articles of worship.

3. Most reverentially, they donated cows, gold, garments, honey, sweet-meats to Brāhmaṇas as gifts, praying “May god Śiva be propitious unto us.”

4. The highly fortunate Nanda, Sunandaka and others observed a vow of subsisting on the waters of the river (the whole day) and passed that night on the bank of the Sarasvatī.

5. A certain big boa-constrictor of that forest, being pinched with extreme hunger, came there by chance and began to swallow up Nanda who was asleep.

6. While being swallowed by the serpent, Nanda screamed out “Oh Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa, this big serpent is devouring me, Oh child! please save me who have approached you for rescue.”

7. Hearing his shriek, cowherds suddenly awoke. Beholding Nanda swallowed by the serpent, they got bewildered and struck the serpent with fire-brands.

8. Though it was scorched by burning fuel, the serpent did not let go Nanda. At that time Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Śaṭvatas, approached the reptile and touched it with his foot.

9. With all his sins absolved by the touch of the glorious Lord of Lakṣmi, he cast off his serpentine body and assumed a form that was worshipped by Vidyādharas.

10. The Lord (of senses), Kṛṣṇa, asked the man with resplendent personality decorated with a wreath of gold, as he reverentially bowed down to him.

11. “Who are you of miraculous form resplendent with supreme splendour? How is it that you lost your self-control and were forced into this disgusting form of life?”
The serpent (now a Vidyādhara) answered:

12. "I am a certain (famous) Vidyādhara known as Sudarśana. Endowed with divine splendour and excellent beauty, I ranged in my aerial car in all directions.

13. Puffed with pride of my beautiful form, I jeered at the ugly forms of the sages Aṅgiras. For my sin of deriding them, I was brought down to this species by them.

14. I now find that this curse was pronounced upon me to show me grace, by those merciful sages, inasmuch as I am absolved of all sins by being touched with foot by the preceptor of the world.

15. Oh destroyer of sins! I am relieved of the curse by the touch of Your foot. You are the dispeller of the fears of beings who resort to you through fear of saṁśāra. Kindly give me permission to take leave of You.

16. Oh great yogin! Oh supreme Person! I approach you most humbly, Oh Protector of the righteous people! Oh resplendent God! Oh Supreme Ruler of the rulers of worlds! Be pleased to grant me permission (to return to my region). Oh Acyuta! Instantaneously at your very sight, I am released from the curse of the Brāhmaṇa.

17. A person who utters your name at once purifies all the listeners (of the Name) as well as himself. What more need be said that a person who is touched by your foot gets absolved of all his sins instantaneously."

18. Taking leave of Kṛṣṇa (the descendant of Daśarha) with these words, circumambulating him and playing obeisance to him, Sudarśana went to heaven and Nanda was thus rescued from that precarious situation.

19. Having seen the special personal glory of Kṛṣṇa, the inhabitants of Vrajā with astonished minds, completed their religious observance of Śivarātri. They returned to Vrajā reverentially discussing his glorious exploits.

20. On another occasion, Govinda (Kṛṣṇa) and Balarāma of wonderful prowess, sauntered in the forest at night in the company of damsels of Vrajā.

21. Being melodiously extolled by damsels, who were deeply attached to them, with their persons well adorned and beautifully painted with sandal-paste and pigments, they wore beautiful wreaths and were dressed in fine garments.

22. They hailed the advent of the night, as the moon and the stars were rising and appeared in view and as a gentle breeze was blowing over the bed of lilies to which were attracted swarms of bees intoxicated with the fragrance of jasmine flowers.

23. Going simultaneously through the whole scale of musical notes with modulations of their voices, both of them presented vocal music which was auspicious and delightful to the mind and ears of all beings in the world.

24. Hearing that ravishing music, the cowherd women fell in a trance and were not aware of their garments slipping away from their persons, loosening of their braids and dropping of wreaths from them, Oh Protector of the people!

25. While they both were thus sporting as they pleased and singing at will like intoxicated persons, a servant of Kubera known as Śaṅkha-cūḍa approached them.

26. Before their very eyes (and in defiance of them), he dauntlessly drove the screaming young women who were under their protection, towards the north, Oh king!

27. Beholding their women crying out (for their succour), “Oh Kṛṣṇa! Oh Balarāma” like cows when seized by a robber, the two brothers rushed in pursuit.

28. Shouting out the promise of protection, “Don’t be afraid” the two brothers armed themselves with a Śāla tree and rushing hastily, they overtook the wretch of a Guhyaka (Yakṣa).

29. Terrified to see them both close on his heels like the time-spirit and god of death incarnate, the foolish fellow let the women go and took to his heels with the intention of saving his own life.

30. In order to deprive the Yakṣa of the jewel on his head, Kṛṣṇa pursued him wherever he ran, while Balarāma stayed on protecting the women.

31. Within a short distance, the Lord confronted him and with a blow of his fist sundered off his head along with the jewel.
32. Killing Śaṅkhaścūḍa in this way and taking from him the brilliant gem, Kṛṣṇa gave it, out of affection, to his elder brother, before the very eyes of the damsels.

CHAPTER THIRTYFIVE

Gopīs' Song (in pairs of verses)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. When Kṛṣṇa departed to the forest (to tend the cattle), Gopīs whose hearts followed him, spent their days in great misery, loudly singing of his sportful pastimes.

The Gopīs said:

2-3. Oh Gopīs when Mukunda with his left cheek inclined to the joint of his left arm and with dancing eye-brows, applies the flute to his lower lip and begins to play on it with his tender fingers placed on its holes, the Siddha damsels passing through their aerial cars along with their husbands, feel disconcerted with amazement at the melodious music, and feeling bashful to find that their hearts have been hit by the shafts of love, become infatuated and are not aware of the loosening of their garments.

4-5. Oh delicate ladies! How wonderful is the phenomenon! Listen. When this child of Nanda, with his smiles beaming like a wreath of sparkling pearls\(^1\) and with the lightening-like (fickle yet lustrous) goddess of wealth (Lakṣmi) permanently abiding on his chest (as Śrī-Vatsa, plays melodiously) on his flute to bring solace and delight to the afflicted people, bulls in Vraja, deer and kine in their herds, from far afar, have their hearts captivated with the enchanting music of the flute and stand (listening to the music) with their ears erect and (holding unswallowed) half-chewed morsels of grass between their teeth (and look) as if they are asleep or drawn in picture.

---

\(^{1}\) OR (1) smiles reflecting from the garland of pearls on His chest as His countenance is inclined towards it. (2) Whose laugh shines like a wreath of pearls on His chest (3) The luster of which was spotlessly white like the laugh of pearls (ḥāra-ḥāsaḥ īva viśādaṁ sphurtir yasya)—Śr. VJ. reads.—ḥāra-ḥāsaḥ—Looks brilliant with the pearl-garland.

6-7. (The melodious music of Kṛṣṇa's flute hypnotises even the non-sentient creation.)

When Lord Kṛṣṇa dresses himself like a wrestler with a tuft of peacock-feathers and tender leaves and anointed with mineral paints, and sometimes accompanied by Balarāma and cowherds calls the cows (through the melodious notes of his flute), (even the non-sentient) rivers stop flowing as if they are strongly longing to receive the dust of his louts-feet borne by the breeze. But they possess poor merits like us, inasmuch as, they (instead of getting the much-yarned-for dust) keep waving their arms in the form of waves and have the flow of water stopped (as we have our eyes bedimmed with tears).

8-9. When Kṛṣṇa,¹ who like the Ancient-most Person Nārāyaṇa, possesses unfading eternal splendour, (and whose heroic exploits were celebrated by his followers, (the cowherds), ranges in the forest, calls the cows which are grazing on the slopes of the mount Govardhana by uttering their names (musically) through his flute, the creepers and trees in the forest as if manifest the All-pervading Lord Viṣṇu abiding in them, by exhibiting their floral richness and wealth of fruit, laden wherewith the boughs of the trees are bowing down low and with their bodies thrilled with intense love spray forth a shower of honey.

1. This describes the effect of Kṛṣṇa's flute on the immovable or stationary creation like trees—ŚR., VR.

VJ. : Just as the most Ancient puruṣa Nārāyaṇa who lies on the cosmic waters, is being praised by sages like Sanaka with the Vedic mantras which are profusely evolved out of the mouth of Vāyu etc.

2. Or: the ever-lasting abode of Lakṣmī, the goddess of affluence, splendour and beauty.

3. Or: Gods and sages (in the case of viṣṇu)

4. VJ : The adj. vanacora includes all the incarnations including the Fish.

5. VJ. : applies this to the sages and Yogs in the forest who perform austerë penance in the forest; who realizing Lord Viṣṇu within their hearts, bow to Him with their hands and are imbued with eternal bliss.
10-11. * Lo! Look here when Kṛṣṇa with a charming Tilaka (a sacred mark on his forehead) heartily appreciates the enchanting high pitched humming-song of the swarms of black-bees intoxicated with the honey in the Tulasī flowers woven in his Vanamālā and emitting ethereal fragrance, and applies the flute to his lips (to breathe a song in response to their music), the cranes, swans and other aquatic birds living in the lake, with their hearts enticed away by the captivating music, approach Lord Hari and with their eyes closed and minds under perfect control, meditate on him (lit. sit close to him) in perfect silence.

12-13. When accompanied by Balarāma and beautifully decorated with floral ear-rings\(^1\), Kṛṣṇa stands on the summits of mountains and that Lord of eternal Bliss fills the whole Universe by the fascinating music of his flute, Oh beautiful ladies of Vraja, even the cloud, being afraid in mind of showing disrespect to the great Lord, rumbles softly keeping time with the tune of his flute, spreads himself over him as an umbrella and covers the friend (of the universe) with a flower-like spray (or the invisible gods spray him with flowers).

14-15. (To Yaśodā who has joined these Gopis :) Oh chaste lady! Your son is expert in the various games and sports played by cowherds. But when he applies his flute to his Bimba-fruit-like red lips and plays out varied original tunes in the art of flute-playing, the chiefs of gods of whom Indra, god Śiva and god Brahmā are prominent, listen to the delineation of the music in different pitch again and again.\(^2\) Although these gods were experts in music, they failed to grasp the heart (the underlying principles or the nature of the fine points) of the music and stood confused.

16-17. When Kṛṣṇa of the noble gait of the king-elephants moves on playing on his flute, and soothing the pains caused to the earth at Vraja due to the hoofs of the cattle, by means of his feet similar to lotus-petals and beautified with the marks of a flag, a vajra (thunder-bolt), a lotus and a goad, we, with the stormy passion of love enkindled in

* This describes the effect of the music of Hari's flute on birds.
1. or with pearl necklaces.
2. or inclining their neck and mind to the direction whence the musical notes were coming—VR.
us by his sportful oglings, are reduced to the (stationary) state of trees and out of infatuation are not aware of the loosening of the braids of hair and the garment.

18-19. Sometimes, when wearing a wreath of beads and counting the cows (in his charge thereby (with the beads), Kṛṣṇa, wearing a garland of Tulasī the fragrance of which is specially liked by him, sings playing on his flute, resting his hand on the shoulder of his affectionate friend, the she-deer, the mates of black-antelopes, with their hearts enticed away by the music of the flute, follow Kṛṣṇa, the ocean of excellences, and renouncing all desires to return home, stay by his side like the cowherd-damsels.

20-21. Oh sinless Yaśodā! When your child, Nanda’s son, picturesquely dressed with the wreaths of Kunda (jasmine) flowers and surrounded by the cowherds and the wealth of the cattle, plays on the bank of the Yamunā, joking with his intimate friends, a gentle breeze (from the south) blows agreeably and pleasantly and offers him respect with its cool touch charged with the fragrance of sandal. And bands of demigods (like Gandharvas) performing the function of bards and minstrels, wait around him worshipping him with instrumental and vocal music and articles of worship.

22-23. Being compassionate to the people of Vraja and the cows, he held up the mount Govardhana. When after collecting his entire wealth of cattle, he returns home playing on his flute, his panygeric is being sung by his friends and his feet being worshipped by the old (gods like Brahmā and others) on the way, with his garlands covered over with the dust raised by the hoofs of the cows, here comes the Moon (the Lord of stars) born of Devakī’s womb—a veritable feast to the eyes of Gopīs by his splendour, even in a fatigued condition,—he does so solely with the desire of fulfilling the wishes of his friends.

24-25. With his eyes slightly rolling with ecstatic joy, showing great regard to his friends and well-wishers, adorned with a wreath of sylvain flowers, with his face pale like a slightly ripening badara fruit, and his tender cheeks beautified with the splendour of his gold ear-rings, here comes in the evening, like the Moon (the Lord of the night). The Lord of Yadus (Krṣṇa) with the sportive gait of an elephant-king, with a cheerful face relieving the day-long endless agony (of separation) of the cow-like Gopīs of Vraja (to relieve the cows of the daylong—as if interminable—heat of the sun).

1. Adorned with jewel Kaustubha—VJ.

Sri Suka said:

26. In this way, the highly fortunate damsels of Vraja with their minds and hearts absorbed in him, used to spend their days in delight singing the sportful activities of Lord Krṣṇa, Oh King Parīkṣit.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SIX

Akrūra deputed to bring Krṣṇa and Balarāma to Mathurā

Sri Suka narrated:

1. Some time after this (festive occasion described in the last chapter), there arrived at Vraja, Arīṣṭa, a demon having the form of a bull, with a huge body and a big hump, tearing up and shaking the earth with his hoofs.

2. Bellowing with terrific harshness and breaking the earth with his hoofs, he rushed with his tail upraised, turning up mounds of earth with the ends of his horns.

3-4. Discharging dung and urine in small quantities at intervals, he came with his eyes fixed and staring. Oh dear Parīkṣit! At his violent and terrific roar, cows and women were so shaken with fear that they prematurely delivered their off-spring in miscarriage.

5. Noticing that demonic beast with sharp horns, cowherd men and women got terrified. And the cattle ran away in fear, deserting Gokula, Oh king.
6-7. Calling upon Kṛṣṇa, "Oh Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa", all of them sought the shelter of Govinda for their protection. Noticing the Gokula overwhelmed with fear and fleeing, Kṛṣṇa reassured them with the words, "Don’t be afraid", and challenged that demon in the form of a bull, "You stupid wretched-most fellow! What do you gain by terrifying the poor cowherds and cattle?

8. When I am here to crush down the pride of strength of the wicked and evil-minded brutes like you." Challenging him thus, Kṛṣṇa stroked his arms and provoked the wrath of Ariśṭa, by clapping his hands.

9. Kṛṣṇa waited spreading out his serpent-like mighty arm on the shoulder of a friend. The demon Ariśṭa who was thus enraged, dashed at Kṛṣṇa in fury, furrowing the earth below with his hoofs and dispersing the clouds with his tail upraised.

10. Thrusting forward the ends of his horns and staring fixed with blood-shot eyes, the demon, trying to cow down Kṛṣṇa with his side-glances, darted at him even as the thunderbolt discharged by Indra.

11. Catching hold of the Asura by his horns, the glorious Lord pushed him back to a distance of eighteen paces as an elephant would do to drive back its rival.

12. Although pushed backward by the Lord, Ariśṭa who was perspiring all over, and heaving sighs, sprang to his feet and in a wrathful frenzy, speedily dashed at Kṛṣṇa again.

13. As he rushed towards Kṛṣṇa, the Lord seized the demon by the horns and hurled him on the ground. Pressing him down with one foot, he wrung his body as one would wring and twist a drenched cloth. Pulling out one of his horns, he struck him and the demon dropped down on the earth.

14. Vomiting blood, discharging urine and dung, kicking up his legs and with eyes rolling under excruciating pains, he went to the abode of death. Thereupon, the celestials, showering flowers on him, sang hymns in praise of Hari.

15. Having slain the demonic bull and glorified by his people (Gopas and gods), He, along with Balarâma, entered Gokula giving delight to the eyes of Gopis.

16. When the Asura (demon) Ariṣṭa was killed by Kṛṣṇa of miraculous feats, the worshipful divine sage Nārada who was endowed with divine vision, intimated to Kāṁsa as follows:

17. “By Vasudeva who was apprehensive (about the safety of his children) were given in charge of his friend Nanda, Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devakī and Balarâma, the son of Rohiṇī, while the daughter (you tried to kill) was born of Yaśodā. It is by them both that your men (deputed to kill Kṛṣṇa) were slain."

18. Hearing that (revelation) Kāṁsa, the king of Bhojas whose mind was agitated with wrath caught hold of a sharp sword, with a view to kill Vasudeva.

19. He was prevented from taking that action (lest knowing of their father’s death Kṛṣṇa and Balarâma should abscond). But realizing that his (Vasudeva’s) sons are (ordained by Providence as) the cause of his death, Kāṁsa got Vasudeva and his consort fettered with iron chains.

20. When the divine sage (Nārada) departed, Kāṁsa sent for Keśin and commissioned him with the order, “Let Balarâma and Keśava (Kṛṣṇa) be killed by you.”

21. Then Kāṁsa, the king of Bhojas, summoned his ministers like Muṣṭika, Cāṇūra, Śala, Toṣala and others, conductors of elephants and spoke to them:

22-23. Listen to this, Oh warriors, Cāṇūra and Muṣṭika. In the Vraja of Nanda dwell Balarâma and Kṛṣṇa, the two sons of Vasudeva. It is ordained that I should meet death at their hands. When both of them are brought here, they are to be done to death by you in the game of wrestling.

24. Let galleries of various designs, suitable to the arenas of wrestlers, be constructed. Let all people in the city (of Mathurā) and the villages, witness this freestyle wrestling.

Additional verses in the Text of VR and VJ.

24.1. Oh highly intelligent superintendent (or keeper) of my elephants! Listen to this command of mine. Our Elephant, Kuvalayāpiḍa has the rut flowing from its temples.
24.2. It should be placed at the entrance of the arena with a heavy iron bar in its trunk. The two sons of Vasudeva (Ānaka-dundubhi) are to be killed.

24.3. But even the conductor of the elephant got agitated in mind and submitted, “How can I kill the two sons of the sister of His Majesty, the Lord of the earth?”

24.4. When addressed thus by the elephant-driver, the wicked-minded Kaṁsa ordered him again, making all the assembled persons hear it for compliance.

Kaṁsa said:

24.5. Carefully listen to this command personally given by me. You should all hear it and bear it in mind. Listen to the reason why from the start, I have been a sworn enemy of these, even though they are my relatives.

24.6. On one occasion, my highly fortunate lotus-eyed mother who was in her youth, was wandering about in the garden of the palace, when a gentle cool breeze was blowing.

24.7-8. It was the spring time when the garden was beautified with full-blown Aśoka, Bakul, areca nuts and Punnāga trees, with humming and hovering swarms of black bees, resounded with the sweet cooings of cuckoos. It was attractive with the group of dancing peacocks and the herds of playful monkeys; it was lined with rows of Sāla trees.

24.9. While my mother of auspicious vows was sauntering there, she, who was well adorned and had taken her bath after menstruation, and was agitated with the passion of love, contemplated of her husband.

24.10-11. At that time a certain Gandharva, Drumila by name, was going through the garden, unseen by others. He noticed that she was alone and ready for the occasion. He being able to read the thoughts and intentions in the minds of all, understood what she was thinking about. He assumed the form of Ugrasena and resembled him in speech and smiles.

24.12. The Gandharva who entertained a lustful passion about that chaste lady and was love-striken, got her consent. Being perfectly ignorant about the reality, she accompanied and had a pleasant time with him in that forest grove.
24.13. That chaste lady somehow came to discover him to be somebody else during the act of intercourse. She was extremely distressed at heart and with her mind and eyes agitated demanded, "Who are you, Oh wretched cheat? That a wicked person like you has perpetrated this deed condemned by the noble?"

24.14. The long-armed Drumila tried to console her who demanded this of him. He gently explained, "Oh good lady! We belong to a family of Gandharvas. We are equal to the celestials and are there beloved attendants.

24.15. Oh auspicious lady! Please note that we (Gandharvas) are not easily accessible to females of the human species like you who are fit to be enjoyed by human beings only. And there is a lot of difference between men who are subject to birth, death and such other physical and mental ailments and the celestials (who are unaffected by them), Oh pretty woman!"

24.16. While he was talking thus, the lady with her mind overwhelmed with rage, interrupted, "Do you want to appease me now after perpetrating that nefarious act?

24.17. In defiance of the deities presiding over water, fire, earth, air, the ether, the moon, the sun, and disregarding the presiding divinities of the cardinal points, Time-Spirit, the two twilights (the dawn and the dusk) and the Dharma itself, you have adulterated with me.

24.18. Like unto a restraint-less elephant emitting ichor and blind with passion, you, wretched fellow, have made me, who was like a pure, translucent lotus-pond in a forest, turbid and impure. You wretched-most vile immortal! Do you again dare to try to conciliate me?"

24.19-20. While she was censuring him thus, he, being afraid of being imprecated, urged through fear, "Oh Lotus-eyed lady! Sexual relation between immortals and women is of the regular order while that between men and celestial women is of the irregular order and is unnatural.

24.21. Hence, Oh lady with lotus fragrance, please note that I have not committed an offence. My semen shall not go waste. A son will be born to you.
24. 22-23-24. He will be affluent, intelligent, highly energetic and daring. My words shall not prove vain and untrue." While he was speaking thus, my enraged mother who was deeply distressed at the loss of her irrecoverable chastity, exploded in wrath: "You have transgressed the bounds of dharma and have taken to different (sinful) course of conduct, and are a wicked sinner, a follower of the wrong (immoral) path, your son shall be cruel, characterised by criminality and void of good qualities. He will never receive the blessings of gods, Brāhmaṇas and sages".

24.25. While the lady was giving vent to her wrathful expression, the Gandharva became afraid that she would curse him and uttering the words. "He will be an enemy of your relatives", he disappeared.

24.26. After his departure, my blessed mother came back to her palace from the garden. And nobody else knew the incident.

24.27. In due course she became pregnant and delivered me at the proper time. On one occasion, the worshipful sage Nārada told me all this.

24.28. Since that time I hate these relatives who are wicked. You yourself are a witness here how they are always inimical to me.

24.29-30. As I am born of a Gandharva, it will not be sinful to kill the wickedly disposed Ugrasena, the evilminded Devaka, the crafty Vasudeva and their partisans and dependants. I, therefore, issue a command to you that they both (Krṣṇa and Balarāma) should be ruthlessly killed.

24.31. By performing the worship of god Yama, the deity of the other world with the offerings of the two boys (Krṣṇa and Balarāma) crushed to death by the mighty elephant, let them (Vasudeva, Ugrasena and others) follow their path (to the abode of death).

24.32-33.* Let Vasudeva, Ugrasena, that Nanda and Devaka, the cowherds and Yādavas and all of their followers and partisans witness with tearful eyes the killing of their own sons. Let all the people in the country be invited and let them witness the free style wrestling\(^1\) (svatra-sam-yugam).

* Vṛndāvana edition gives these 33 additional verses.

25. Oh conductor of my elephant! You are a good man: The elephant Kuvalayāpiḍa is to be posted by you at the entrance of the arena. See to it that my two enemies (Krṣṇa and Balarāma) are killed by it.

26. Let the sacrifice connected with the bow (dhanur-yāga)\(^2\) be commenced with due formality on the fourteenth day (of the dark half). Let the priests offer sacrificial animals as victims to the king of bhūtas (goblins) i.e. god Śiva who is the bestower of all boons (to god Śiva the bestower of boons and the ruler over all beings).

27. Having thus passed the orders, Kaṁsa who was adept in the technique of achieving his purpose sent for Akrūra, the prominent member of the Yadu clan. Taking his palm in his hand, he spoke to Akrūra.

28. "Oh leader of charitable persons! Devoted as you are to me, please do a friendly turn to me; for there is nobody else either in my clan of Bhojas or those of Yadus who will guard my interest.

29. Hence, Oh gentle friend, I depend on you as a means of accomplishing an important mission even as the mighty Indra does, depending on god Viṣṇu, achieve his object.

30. Go to the Vraja of Nanda. There dwell two sons of Vasudeva. Please fetch them both here in this chariot. Let there be no delay.

31. It is reported that gods who are dependents of Viṣṇu have ordained my death (at the hands of one of them). Bring both of them along with cowherds headed by Nanda (lest the boys should refuse to come). Instruct Nanda and others to bring

\(^1\) but pauruṣam—‘my prowess’ interprets VR.

\(^2\) VB. explains: As against the Viṣṇu-power of Krṣṇa, Kaṁsa wanted to counter-balance it by propitiating god Śiva. The worship of god Śiva as presiding over the bow (which would thereby be victorious in fighting) is called dhanuryāga in Śiva-tantra.

\(^3\) VB states it to be the Śivarātri day.

\(^4\) VB. : Akrūra used to give cows as gifts to Brāhmaṇas every day for a period of twelve years and his mother gave food in charity. Hence he is designated as dānapati (the leader of donors).
the tribute (curds, ghee etc.) so that they would be convinced that the dhanur-makha (sacrifice to Bow) is real and not a ruse to bring them.

32. When they are brought here, I shall get them killed by an elephant which is like the god of death. If they happen to escape (death from the elephant), I shall get them despatched by two wrestlers who are like thunderbolts.

33-34. When both of them are finished, I shall put to death Vasudeva and his brothers who will be grieving (the death of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) and massacre the clans of Vṛṣṇis Bhojas, Dāśāhras, and also my aged father Ugrasena who still dotes for sovereignty and his brother Devaka as well as all other enemies of mine.

35. It is after that that this earth will be rid of all thorns (free from enemies). My father-in-law Jarā-sandha will be like a father unto me and Dvīvida (the monkey chief), a dear friend.

36. Śambara, Naraka and Bāṇa have entered into friendly alliance with me. Having killed all the kings siding with gods, I shall enjoy the earth.

37. In view of (the knowledge of) these facts, quickly bring the youngsters Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa inducing them to witness the bow-sacrifice as well as the beauty of Mathurā, the capital of Yadus.

Akrūra replied:

38. Oh king! What you intend to do is all for the good inasmuch as you try to avert the evil (viz. death). But one should maintain equanimity and try one’s level best whether it results in success or failure. For it is the Providence which is the real cause (instrument) of success.

39. A man builds castles in the air (lit. one entertains very big plans) even though they are thwarted by the Destiny and thus experiences joy and sorrow. I shall, however, carry out your order.

Śri Śuka said:

40. Having directed Akrūra (to go to Vraja) and sent away his counsellors, Kamsa entered his palace and Akrūra his home.
CHAPTER THIRTYSEVEN

Slaying of Asuras Keśin and Vyaoma

Śrī Suka said:

1. Demon Keśin who was deputed by Kaṁsa, assumed the form of a gigantic horse with the speed of the mind. Furrowing the earth with his hoofs, overcrowding the sky with clouds and heavenly cars dispersed by the waving of his mane and terrifying all creatures by his neighing he came to Nanda’s Vraja.

1-A*. With big eyes, a terribly vast cavern-like mouth, an enormous neck resembling a large dark-blue cloud, the wicked-hearted Keśin, desirous of achieving the desired object of Kaṁsa, rushed to the Vraja of Nanda, making it tremble with fear.

2. Occupying a forward position, the glorious Lord challenged Keśin who was creating a panic among the inhabitants of his Gokula by his neighing and was disturbing the formation of clouds in the sky by his tail and was seeking a fight with him—at which Keśin roared like a lion.

3. Beholding Kṛṣṇa confronting him, that unapproachable formidable beast of terrific speed rushed at him with extreme rage, drinking up the heavens, as it were, with his wide open mouth (and turning round) kicked hard with his hind legs the Lord with lotus-eyes.

4. Dodging the Kick, Kṛṣṇa, the Lord (who is suprasense perception) angrily caught hold of his two hind legs with his hands and whirling him round threw him contemptuously to a distance of hundred bows (cubits), even as Garuḍa would fling (an ordinary) serpent, and stood as before.

5. Regaining his consciousness, Keśin sprang to his feet. Opening his mouth wide in violent wrath, he fiercely attacked Hari. Smiling fearlessly, Hari thrust his left arm into Keśin’s mouth as a serpent enters a hole.

* Not found in the text of ŚR but recorded in the texts of VR., VJ., VB. and SD. Gauḍiya Vaishnava annotators follow ŚR and do not comment on it.
6. When Keśin tried to bite Kṛṣṇa’s arms his teeth dropped down at the touch of the Lord’s arm as if at the touch of red-hot iron. And the Lord’s arm thrust in the interior part of his body went on growing immensely like dropsy, when neglected.

7. With his breath (passage) choked by the (disproportionately) swelling arm of Kṛṣṇa, he kicked up his legs, perspired profusely all over the body, and with its eyes rolling, discharging excretion, he fell down dead on the ground.

8. Extricating his arm from out of the body of Keśi (which was burst open at various places) like a ripe cucumber, the mightily-armed Kṛṣṇa was not even slightly touched with pride, even though he effortlessly killed his enemies, but was glorified in songs and showered over with flowers by the wondering gods.

9. Oh king! Thereafter the divine sage Nārada, the foremost of devotees of the Lord, approached Kṛṣṇa of noble behaviour and conferred with him in privacy as follows:

10. “Oh Kṛṣṇa (the enchanter of the world)! Oh Kṛṣṇa of incomprehensible nature! Oh Lord of yogi! The absolute Ruler of the world! Oh Vāsudeva (the pervader of the universe) and the abode of all! Oh the most prominent among the Sātvatas (the Yādava clan)! Oh Almighty Lord!¹

11. Like unto fire lying dormant in fuel, you alone are the Inner Controller of all beings. Remaining unrevealed, you abide in the hearts of every being as a witness to everything. You are the Supreme Person, the Controller of the universe.

12. Depending entirely upon your own Self, You evolved guṇas through your Māyā potency. The Almighty Lord of unfailing will power as you are, you create, protect, and devour (destroy) this universe with those guṇas.

13. Such as you are, you have incarnated yourself on the earth for the annihilation of the daityas (demons), goblins

¹ SR. : Nārada glosses over the disclosure about Kṛṣṇa to Kaṁsa by telling Him, “You are the Almighty Lord specially incarnated for relieving the earth of its burden of Daityas. Now You be active, finish with them and protect the Universe.”
and rāksasas that have been born as kings and for protecting those who abide by the canons of righteousness (or your votaries.)

14. Fortunately enough this demon Keśin who assumed the form of a horse and terribly frightened at whose neighing, gods (the eye-lid-less beings) deserted the heaven, has been easily killed by you, as in a sport.

15. Oh Omnipresent Lord! Day after tomorrow, I shall witness Cāṇūra, Muṣṭika and other wrestlers, as also the elephant (Kuvalayāpiḍa) as well as Kaṁsa slain by you in broad day-light.

16. Thereafter I shall see the slaying of the demon Paṅcakajana (who was a conch-dweller) Kālayavana, Mura and Naraka as well as bringing down (from heaven the celestial tree) Pārijāta after defeating Indra.

17. After that I shall witness your marriages with the daughters of warriors (like Bhiṣmaka, Rukmiṇi’s father) by offering your personal valour as the dowry (i.e. by defeating the opposition) as also the absolution of Nṛga from sin at Dvārakā.

18. Thereafter I would see the recovery of the jewel Syamantaka and a spouse (Jāmbavatī) along with it and the restoration of his son to a Brāhmaṇa from the abode of Death.

19. (I shall see later) the destruction of Panḍraka.\(^2\) and burning down the city of Kāśi, the death of Dantavakra and slaying of Śiśupāla, the king of Cedi in the great sacrifice Rājasūya, performed by Yudhiṣṭhira.

20. It will be my privilege to see whatever other heroic deeds your Lordship would perform while dwelling in Dvārakā and they shall be eulogised in songs by poets on the earth.

---

1. Nṛga—A king of Ikṣvāku race, famous for his gifts of cows to Brāhmaṇas. One day, due to oversight and without being aware of it, he gifted a cow which was already given by him to another Brāhmaṇa. For this sin, he was born as a Chameleon but was absolved of all sins at the touch of Kṛṣṇa and went to heaven—vide infra 10.64.10.

2. Panḍraka: King of ancient Kāṛūga. His name was Vāsudeva. On hearing of Vāsudeva Kṛṣṇa, he sent him a message to surrender all his special royal emblem and worship him. Kṛṣṇa invaded Kāṛūga with a big army and killed Panḍraka Vāsudeva who used to wield artificial Sudartaṇa discus etc. like Kṛṣṇa Vāsudeva.—vide infra 10.66.7-21
21. After that I shall see you in the form of Death or time-spirit intent on destroying the whole universe and the annihilation of Akṣauhinīs (Divisions) of armies with you in the role of Arjuna’s charioteer.

22. We approach, for protection, the glorious Lord who is entirely constituted of perfectly pure knowledge and has all his purposes accomplished as he is well-established in his own blissful nature; whose will is never futile; and due to whose spiritual refulgence the stream of guṇas originating from Māyā is ever warded off.

23. I lay prostrate before you, the leader of Yadus, Vṛṣṇis and Sātvatas—the leader (yourself) who are the supreme Ruler, and who have brought forth all this varied creation (the phenomenal world of differences) through his own Māyā and have assumed a human form for the sake of sporting.

Śrī Śuka said:

24. In this way, the sage Nārada, the foremost among the votaries who was delighted to see him, paid obeisance to Kṛṣṇa, the Chief Yadus and departed with his permission.

25. And Lord Kṛṣṇa also, having killed Keśin in a fight, tended the cows along with other cowherds who were highly pleased with him for his heroic act and enhanced the joy and happiness of the inhabitants of Vraja.

26. On one occasion, while they were grazing the cattle on the table-land high up on the mountain, the cowherd boys played the game of hide and seek in which some gopas became thieves (or cattle-lifters) and others guards (or policemen).

27. At that time, some played the part of thieves while others became guards, while some others played the role of sheep (to be lifted). In this way they indulged in the game fearlessly, Oh King!

28. Vyoma, the son of the Asura Maya who was a past-master in black magic, assumed the form of a cowherd and playing the role of a cattle-thief carried away a great many cowherd-boys who acted the part of goats.

29. The mighty Asura threw each cowherd-boy so carried in the cave of that mountain, and closed its entrance with a rock. In this way four or five boys remained (outside the cave).

30. Noticing the vile act of that Asura, Kṛṣṇa, the protector of the righteous, forcibly caught hold of him while kidnapping the cowherds, even as a lion would do to a wolf.

31. The mighty demon resumed his original form big like a mountain. Being suffocated with his grip, he wanted to extricate himself but could not do so.

32. Catching hold of him by both his hands, he dashed the Asura to the ground and killed him in the way of sacrificial beasts, while gods were witnessing it from heaven.

33. Having broken open the rock that blocked the entrance to the cave, he brought the cowherds out of that perilous situation. Glorified by gods and cowherds, he returned to his own Gokula.

CHAPTER THIRTYEIGHT

The Arrival of Akrūra to Gokula

Śrī Suka said:

1. Having stayed at Mathurā that night the highly intelligent Akrūra mounted a chariot and proceeded to Nanda's Vraja.

2. On his way, the highly fortunate Akrūra who was filled with extreme devotion to the lotus-eyed Lord reflected to himself as follows:

3. "What auspicious act has been done by me! What austere penance I have performed! Or what gift to a deserving person has been donated by me, by virtue of which I am going to see Lord Kṛṣṇa today.

4. Just as recitation and study of the Vedas is impossible to a person born in the Śūdra class, I consider that gaining even the sight of Kṛṣṇa of excellent renown is very difficult for me, inasmuch as my mind is addicted to sensual pleasures.

1. Vide Supra 10.36.40.

5. Perhaps that may not happen that way. Even though I may be a vile person, I may be blessed with the sight of the Immortal Lord Kṛṣṇa. Sometimes a person carried along with the current of time, may get to the other shore of samsāra.

6. To-day all my evils (sins) are destroyed, and my birth has achieved its highest objective in that now I shall bow down to the glorious Lord's lotus-feet which are contemplated by yogins.

7. Verily Kaṁsa has shown a great favour to me as, being deputed by him, I shall see the lotus-feet of Lord Hari who has now incarnated in this world and by the lustre of whose circle of toe-nails, people in the former ages have got over the darkness of Samsāra which is so very difficult to cross.

8. The Lord's feet are worshipped by gods Brahmā, Śiva and others, by goddess Lakṣmī, by sages and by Sātvatas (Yādavas or his devotees)—feet which wandered in the forest along with his companions for grazing the cows and which are tinged with the saffron applied to the breasts of Gopīs.

9. Verily, as the deer go round by my right side (an auspicious omen), I believe I shall certainly behold today the face of Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa) with its charming cheeks and shapely nose, its smiling glances and reddish lotus-eyes, covered over with curly locks of hair.

10. How strongly I do yearn that today I shall be blessed with the audience (vision) of god Viṣṇu, the abode of beauty and excellence, who by his own Divine will has incarnated as a human being for lightening the burden of the earth. In case it so happens, it will be undeniable that the very existence of my eyes has achieved its fulfilment.

11. Though he is merely the witness of the Cause and the effect, he is devoid of egoism. By virtue of his lustre (lustre-like Spiritual Knowledge), he has dispelled the darkness of ignorance or Nescience and the consequent notions of differentiation and misapprehensions resulting from it. By his will, he is, however, found to be sportively engaged in the houses (of Gopis, arbours of trees in the Vṛndāvana forest) in the company of Jivas created in himself through, his Māyā Potency which, under his supervision and control, invests them with the life-spirit, the senses and mind or intellect.
12. The words describing his excellent attributes, exploits and incarnations which are capable of destroying all the sins of the world and of conferring auspicious blessings, resuscitate, contribute to the beauty and secure sanctity to the world. But words which do not describe them (howsoever ornamental and elegant they be) are like decorations of a dead body.
13. The Almighty Lord who brings about the felicity and blessings to the great gods who abide by the injunctions laid down by him\(^1\), has descended into the clan of the Sātvatas. It is reported that the Supreme Ruler now stays at Vraja spreading all around his glory, which, due to its being auspicious to all beings, is sung by gods.
14. Inasmuch as I have been witnessing auspicious omens from the dawn, I believe that to-day I shall certainly behold him—the one great goal of the noble souls, the Father (or the Preceptor) of the world, the most lovable and charming to the three worlds, a veritable grand feast to those who are blest with a sight—manifesting a form which is the covetedmmost abode of the goddess Śrī.
15. And as soon as I see them, I shall immediately get down from the chariot and will certainly bow down directly to the feet of those two Almighty rulers of the Universe, the Prime Personalities—Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma whose feet have been merely intellectually grasped and meditated upon for Self-realization even by yogīs (but have never been able to visualize them actually). Along with them I shall pay respects to their cowherd-friends and to all the beings residing in the forest of Vṛndāvana.
16. (Now he covets the touch of the Lord’s hand and hopes that the Lord would fulfill his longing.) Will not that Omnipresent Lord place his lotus-palm on the head of mine who have prostrated myself at the soles of his feet—his hands

\(^1\) ŚR specifies these as varṇārama-dharma.
which have afforded protection to all men who being terrified of the serpent in the form of Time (or Death) seek resort to them? (I heartily yearn for this favour).

17. By offering worship to those very palms Kausīka (Indra who is reported to have worshipped it on an occasion) and the demon-king Bali (who offered water in token of the gift of three paces of land to the Dwarf-Viṣṇu) attained sovereignty over the three worlds and which, by their very (cool and) fragrant touch like the Saugandhika lotus (noted for its specially sweet smell) alleviated the fatigue of the damsels of Vraja during the rāsa-sport and thus refreshed them.

18. Though deputed by Kamsa, I am sure, he will entertain no hostile attitude to me as his enemy. For the Immortal Lord is Omniscient and can see everything in the universe. Being the Supreme Soul (Kṣetrajña) he will see with his pure (unclouded and unprejudiced) vision what is desired inside and outside of the heart of everyone.

19. How strongly I yearn for it! If he, with a merciful eye, looks smilingly at me who am prostrate at his feet, who with folded palms have concentrated on the soles of his feet, I shall instantaneously get thoroughly absolved of all sins, and with all my fears of saṃsāra dispelled, shall enjoy exquisite joy and Supreme bliss.

20. Would that when he would, with his mighty arms, embrace me, his best friend and well-wisher, his clansman who look upon him exclusively as my God, my soul (body) will be highly sanctified immediately and the fetters of karman lie shattered thenceforth.

21. When, after enjoying the privilege of being embraced by him (lit. having a personal contact with him), I shall stand bowing down to him with folded palms and he will address me, “Uncle Akrūra”, I shall feel that our coming into life (birth) has achieved its purpose. Fie upon the life of that being who is not respected in such a way by the worshipful Lord.

22. No one is beloved of him or an intimate friend of him nor is any one disagreeable, hateful or worthy of indifferent treatment to him. He however, attends upon his devotees just as the celestial wish-yielding tree grants the desire of a person when he is resorting to it.

23. And moreover, his elder brother Balarāma, the best in the Yadu-clan, will embrace me with a smile. When I shall be humbly bowing with folded palms, he would take me by my hands and usher me into his house. When I shall be received with due formalities by all his relatives, he will enquire of Kaṁsa's behaviour towards his relatives and clansmen.

Śrī Śuka said:

24. Oh King, while Akrūra, the son of Śvaphalka was contemplating about Lord Kṛṣṇa, he arrived by his chariot at Gokula, when the sun was reaching the setting mountain (the western horizon)

25. In Vraja, he noticed the foot-prints of the Lord, the sacred dust of whose feet is respectfully received with their crowns (i.e. heads) by all the protectors of the worlds—foot-prints which are distinguished with the marks of a lotus, a barly seed, a goad and such other characteristics and are auspiciously ornamental to the earth.

26. His impatience heightened to its climax through the ecstasy of delight at their sight, his body thrilled with the excitement of love with his hair standing on ends, with his eyes bedimmed with tears (lit. tear-drops), he jumped from the chariot and exclaiming, "How blessed and rare are these particles of the dust from Lord's feet", he prostrated himself and rolled over them.

27. This is the real ultimate purpose of life (purusārtha) of all beings invested with a body that they emulate the ecstatic mental state and behaviour of Akrūra since the moment he received Kaṁsa's order to bring Kṛṣṇa, without any hypocrisy, fear or worry at the sight of Hari's image, hearing his glory etc.

---

1. Cf. samo'hauṁ sarva-bhūtesu na me dveṣyasti na priyāḥ etc. —BG. 9.29.

2. grants according to merits the deserving fruit—VJ. (sva-sva-yogya-phalaadāmena)
28. There, in the enclosure meant for milking cows, he saw Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma wearing yellow and blue garments respectively and with eyes beautiful like lotuses in the autumn.

29. They were Kīrorsa (lads between eleven to fifteen years) in age, dark-blue and white in complexion (respectively), the abodes of beauty and affluence (also bearing Śrī-vatsa mark in the case of Kṛṣṇa), with mighty arms and charming countenance, prominent among the beautiful, possessing the might and prowess of young elephants.

30. The noble-souled pair of brothers ornamented the (ground in) Vraja with the prints of their feet marked with the (figures of) a banner, a Vajra, a goad and a lotus and their smiling eyes expressed compassion.

31. They had taken their bath and had their person besmeared with fragrant pigments (such as sandal-paste). They wore wreaths of flower and Vana-mālās and were immaculately attired. They expressed noble yet attractive playfulness.

32. They were the Foremost and the first ancient-most Persons, the cause of the world and the protectors thereof. They had descended on the world in their personal rays (āṁśas) as Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa for the good of the world.

33. By their personal splendour they dispelled the darkness of the directions (all over the world). They appeared respectively like a mountain of emerald and a mount of silver both chased in gold¹, Oh King!

34. So overwhelmed with devout affection was that Akrūra that he quickly jumped down from the chariot, and fell prostrate like a stick near the feet of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa.

35. With his eyes flooded with tears of joy at the sight of the glorious Lord and with hair standing all over his body, he was not able even to introduce himself to them as his throat was choked with love and emotion.

¹. The problem is how could the dark-blue Kṛṣṇa dispel darkness. VJ. says Kṛṣṇa was like the sun and the ‘dark-splendour’ (Kṛṣṇa-prabhā) of the sun dispels darkness.

VR. differs: Kṛṣṇa was like a big emerald set in the middle of gold while Balarāma was like a diamond inlaid in a dark background.
36. Being affectionate to those who have completely surrendered themselves to him, the Lord who understood him (as to who he was and the purpose of his arrival etc.), drew Akrūra near him with his hands, characterised with the mark of discus, and embraced him as he was pleased with him.

37. The noble-minded Balarāma embraced Akrūra who was bowing low before him. Holding his clasped palms by his own, he led him to his house along with his younger brother Kṛṣṇa.

38. After enquiring about his journey (whether he faced any troubles etc.) and offering him a high seat, Balarāma washed his feet with due formality and offered him articles of Madhuparka (such as honey, ghee, curds, water).

39. Having presented a cow to the guest and after massaging him as he was fatigued, the powerful Lord served to him with reverence, preparation of pure food with a variety of excellences.

40. When his meal was over, Balarāma, the expert in the highest dharma (viz. proper reception of guest) again delighted him by offering articles like fragrant betel-leaf, scenting his mouth, perfumes and sweet-smelling garland.

41. When the customary formalities were over, Nanda enquired: “Oh Dāśārha (Descendant of Daśārha) ! How do you manage to get on with the regime of ruthless Kamsa—you who are now no better than sheep tended by a butcher.

42. That blood-thirsty wicked Kamsa has killed the children of his cousin (sister) even while she was bitterly crying. We wonder what safety or happiness there could be to you, his subjects.

43. Having thus been honoured by Nanda in sweet words, Akrūra recovered from the fatigue of the journey by such polite enquiries.
CHAPTER THIRTYNINE

Akrūra returns with Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. Seated comfortably on a couch and received with high respect by Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, he (Akrūra) realized all the aspirations he cherished on his way to Gokula.

2. Is there anything unattainable to a person when the glorious Lord, the very abode of goddess Śrī, becomes propitious? However, those who are exclusively devoted to him expect nothing from him, Oh King!

3. When the supper was over, Lord Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devaki, enquired about the treatment meted out by Kaṁsa to his Kinsmen and his further plans in the matter.

The glorious Lord enquired:

4. Oh gentle-natured uncle! It is good that you have come. I hope you had a comfortable journey. May be well with you all. Are all our (near and distant) kinsmen and friends un-harassed (by Kaṁsa) and free from ailments?

5. Dear uncle! It is certainly not very consistent on my part to enquire after the welfare of our kinsmen and that of their descendants (or of the subjects in general), so long as this co-called maternal uncle Kaṁsa, the very bane (lit. disease) of the family, is prospering.

6. Alas! It is for my sake that my venerable parents, despite their innocence, had to undergo immense sufferings. It is for me that their sons were murdered and they had to remain in chains in the prison.

7. It is our good fortune that today we could have a sight of our relative—a sight I had been coveting for long, Oh gentle-natured uncle! Be pleased to explain to us the purpose of your visit. Oh uncle.

---

1. The following four verses (4, 5, 6 and 7) are not found in VJ's text.

2. ŚR. explains: jñatī—near relatives. They are sapinda; bandhas are distant and hence a-sapinda
Śrī Śuka said:

8. When thus enquired by Lord Kṛṣṇa, Akrūra, the descendant of Madhu, described in details the history and rationale of Kaṁsa’s deep-rooted hostility to the Yadu clan, his attempts on the life of Vasudeva.

9. He reported to Kṛṣṇa the message (inviting them on the pretext of dhanur-yağa and the proposed attempt on their life through Cāṇūra and others) and the mission for which he had been deputed as an emissary by Kaṁsa and what Nārada had narrated to Kaṁsa about his (Kṛṣṇa’s) birth from Vasudeva.

10. On hearing the message from Akrūra, Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, the vanquishers of hostile warriors, laughed loudly, and they communicated to their foster-father Nanda the command of the king Kaṁsa.

11. He (Nanda) on his part ordered the cowherds: “Let all the yield of cows (such as milk, ghee) as well as presents (of various kinds) as tribute, be taken with you. Let the bullock-carts be kept ready.

12. Tomorrow we have to go to Mathurā where we shall be paying as tribute the choicest products of our cows’ yield to the king. We shall also witness there a very grand festival for attending which (it is reported that) all the people from the country (of Śūrasena) are going.” Nanda, the Gopa chief, got this order proclaimed all over his Vraja, through the security officer of the Vraja.

13. The cowherd women (to whom Kṛṣṇa was their very life) were deeply distressed at heart on hearing that Akrūra had come to Vraja to take away Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa to the capital city (Mathurā).

14. Some had the splendour of their countenance withered by the hot breaths due to the agony of heart caused by hearing that news. Some became so much beside themselves through overwhelming grief that they got their garments loosened, bangles dropping and braids of hair dishevelled.

15. Through their concentrated contemplation on Kṛṣṇa, some Gopīs got all the functions of their sense-organs ceased and became insensible to this external world, as if they had ascended to the realm of the Supreme Self.
16. Some other Gopis lost their consciousness as they remembered the wonder-fully phrased speeches of Kṛṣṇa touching their very heart and expressed with warm loving smiles.

17-18. Musing over Kṛṣṇa's extremely graceful gait and manner of behaviour, his amiable smiles and loving glances, his witty repartee dispelling sorrows and his extra-ordinary exploits, the Gopīs terrified and distressed at the very thought of impending separation, met together in groups and with tears flowing over their cheeks (faces) and hearts absorbed in Kṛṣṇa, they complained:

Gopīs said:

19. Alas! Oh Creator! You have not the slightest compassion anywhere in you, inasmuch as, you bring together embodied beings in friendliness and love and unnecessarily separate them before they have accomplished their desired object. Your whimsical behaviour is childish (lit. like the purposeless behaviour of a child).

20. It is not a good act (in fact a wicked) act on your part that you, having first manifested to us the countenance of Kṛṣṇa covered over with ringlets of dark hair, charming due to its beautiful cheeks and prominent nose, beautiful with a beaming smile that dispelled all grief, now takes it away from our view.

21. You are really cruel as (disguising yourself) under the nomenclature Akrūra¹, you like an irrational person, are depriving us of our very eye given by you to us. It is with that we visualized the excellence of your creative capacity (completely exhibited) even in a part (limb) of Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of Madhu.

22. Alas! What a pity! The friendship of Nanda's son is of a momentary nature. He is so much fond of new company that he does not condescend to cast a glance at us who have been eagerly longing for him and who, being beguiled by his enchanting acts, have openly accepted his slavery forsaking our homes, relatives, sons and husbands.

¹ You will say it is Akrūra and not I, who is taking away Kṛṣṇa. It is not possible for others to do this. It is you who have come here under the name Akrūra—ŚR.

23. For the ladies of the city (Mathurā), their night will dawn very happily. All the benedictions have been (i.e. will be) definitely realized by them. For as Kṛṣṇa enters the city, they will drink (with their eyes) the countenance of the Lord of Vraja (Kṛṣṇa) full of intoxicating (yet) nectar-like smiles, the charm of which is enhanced by lovely side-glances.

24. Oh ladies! Even if Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa) is self-controlled and independent and has his relatives in Vraja, how can he ever return to us, poor rustic women, when his mind is captivated by the sweet, soft words, and fascinated by the bashful smiles and amorous deportment of the ladies of Mathurā.

25. Today, certainly there will be a high feast to the eyes of Dāśārhas, Bhojas, Andhakas, Vṛṣṇis and Sātvatas and those who will see passing by the road (in the chariot) Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devakī, the consort of goddess Śrī (Lakṣmī), the very abode of excellences.

26. As this fellow wants to carry off Kṛṣṇa who is dearer than life itself to us, beyond the known paths (to a far-off land beyond our reach), without (in any way) consoling deeply-grieving persons (like us), Akrūra (not cruel) ought not to be the name of such a ruthless fellow who is (as a matter of fact) extremely cruel.

27. Look! without feeling the slightest feeling (lit. witness) of sympathy or mercy he (Kṛṣṇa) has comfortably occupied his seat in the chariot; following him the haughty Gopas (cowherds) are hastily speeding up in their bullock carts. (This departure of Kṛṣṇa) is treated with indifference by the elders (of Vraja). It appears that hostile Destiny is working against us today.

28. Approaching Kṛṣṇa (the Lord of Lakṣmī) We shall dissuade him (from going). What can the elders of the family and relatives do unto us whose hearts have been rendered afflicted and melancholy by Fate, by bringing about separation from Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa) which is unbearable even for half a minute, (under such circumstances even death is no terror to us.)
29. Oh cowherd women! How can we get over without him the unending darkness of separation from him, with whom we felt like a moment the nights indulged in rāsa dance (and similar other sports) the charm of which was enhanced by his warm love, charming smiles, sweet whispers, playful glances and embraces?

30. How can we (even manage to) live without Kṛṣṇa who at the even tide, with Balarāma (the incarnation of Śeṣa) as his compassion, and surrounded by cowherds, used to enter Vraja, playing on his flute, and with his curly hair and wreaths of flowers soiled heavily with dust raised by the hoofs of the cattle, and captivate our hearts by casting at us his smiling side-glances?

Śrī Śuka said:

31. Talking to each other in this manner, and extremely distressed at the thought of separation from Kṛṣṇa, the women of Vraja whose hearts were deeply attached to Kṛṣṇa threw to winds their sense of bashfulness and cried loudly, (uttering his various names:) “Oh Govinda! Alas Dāmodara! Oh Mādhava”.

32.* When it was sun-rise, Akrūra finished his morning Sandhyā (prayer to the sun) and other religious duties, and drove his chariot (along with Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) without paying any heed to the lamentations of womenfolk.

33. Cowherds, headed by Nanda, followed them closely in their bullock-carts taking with them abundant tribute in the form of pitchers full of the yield of cows (such as milk, curds, ghee).

34. The cowherd women also followed their beloved Kṛṣṇa feeling a bit delighted when he turned round and cast an affectionate glance at them and waited¹ for his command not to follow him.

*A ŚR. gives an additional verse here:

Krūram Akrūrātah śrutat Karṣaṁ Karṣanīṣṭudanah |
gopi-mānava-thātrāmah sa-Rāmaḥ svapramāḥ yayau //

Having heard from Akrūra (the report about) cruel Karṣa, Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of Karṣa, the delight of the Gopīs (by fulfilling their desires) went to his capital (Mathurā) along with Balarāma.

¹. Waited for his reply to the message sent by them through an emissary and stood on an eminence within the range of his view—VT.
35. Perceiving that the Gopīs were deeply tormented at his departure, Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Yadu, comforted them through a messenger that he would return soon.¹

36. As long as the flag (of the chariot) was visible and as long as the dust raised by the chariot could be seen, they stood motionless like figures painted in pictures, as they had deputed their minds after him.

37. At long last, being disappointed at the return of Lord Kṛṣṇa, they too returned and for relieving themselves of the sorrow of separation, they spent days (and nights) in glorifying his deeds and pastimes in songs.

38. In his chariot swift in speed like the wind, the Lord along with Balarāma and Akrūra arrived (at noon) on the bank of the Yamunā that absolves one of all sins.

39. After (washing his hands and feet) performing the Ācamana (ritual sipping of water), he drank the sweet crystal-clear water of the Yamunā. Going near a grove of trees (where the chariot was standing), he got into it along with Balarāma.

40. Akrūra on his part seated them (comfortably) in the chariot, and (requesting them not to leave their seats as he was afraid of enemies) he took leave of them. Coming to the pool of Yamunā (known as ‘Ananta tīrtha’), he performed ablution according to sāstric injunctions.

41. As he plunged into the river water reciting the ancient Vedic mantras (of Agha-maṣaṇa), that Akrūra (being of purified mind) saw therein both Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa together.

42. ‘How is it that the two sons of Vasudeva who were seated in the chariot are down here? In that case they must not be in the chariot.’ With this suspicion, he emerged out of water and looked for them.

43. Perceiving both of them seated (in the chariot) as before, he took, a plunge again thinking, “Was my vision of them both in the water unreal?”

¹. VT. strongly objects to the interpretation: “I shall be sending you messages and thus see you through messengers though personally I cannot come”, for this contradicts the words of Kṛṣṇa’s special emissary Udbhava:

\[ \text{āgamīṣpātyadīrghha paścād Vrajaṁ acrasyaḥ} \]
44-45. Again he saw in that very water, Šeṣa, the Lord of Serpents—a resplendent God with one thousand heads, with crowns adorning his one thousand hoods, wearing a blue garment, white as lotus-fibers, (enormous) like the white snow-clad mountain Kailāsa with its (golden) peaks. He was being praised by Siddhas, Cāraṇas and Gandharvas as well as by Asuras, with their heads bowed down in salutation.

46. He saw on Šeṣa’s lap (coils) another (Supreme) Person (Lord Viṣṇu) bluish dark like a cloud in complexion, clad in yellow silken garment, with four arms, eyes reddish like lotus-petals and very serene and gentle in appearance.

47. He had a beautiful and gracious countenance with enchanting smiles and glances, well-shaped eyebrows, prominent nose, beautiful ears, charming cheeks and reddish lips.

48. He had long and mighty arms, high shoulders and broad chest—the home of the goddess Śrī, a conch-shaped neck, a deep navel and stomach shaped like a tender leaf with three folds.

49. He had well-formed loins and hips, pair of well-developed thighs like those of an elephant and a pair of beautiful knees and shapely shanks.

50. His ankles were prominent and were surrounded by the halo of light radiating from his reddish toe-nails. His lotus-feet were specially charming with petal-like tender toes and (a pair of) big toes.

51-52. He was shining brilliantly with a diadem, bracelets, armlets decked with the most precious jewels as well as with a girdle, a sacred thread, necklace, anklets and ear-rings. He held a lotus, conch, discus and a mace in each of his hands. He had the Śrī vatsa mark on his chest, and a resplendent Kaustubha gem was shining at his neck. He wore a garland of special sylvain flowers (called Vanamāḷā).

53-54. He was being praised in hymns with distinct words expressive of different sentiments, by his attendants, the prominent among whom were Sunanda and Nanda, by sages like Sanaka (and his three brothers Sanandana, Sanātana, Sanat kumāra), by the rulers of gods like god Brahmā, Rudra and others, by nine foremost of Brāhmaṇas (such as Marīci, Kāśyapa and others) and by the most prominent of the Lord’s pure-hearted devotees like Prahlāda, Nārada and Uparicara Vasu.

55. He was waited upon personally by the deities like Śrī (presiding deity over affluence), Puṣṭi (goddess of nourishment), Sarasvatī (presiding over speech), Kānti (goddess of beautiful complexion and splendour), Kīrti (presiding deity of fame), Tuṣṭi (goddess of contentment), Ilā (the Earth goddess), Ûrjā (goddess of energy and strength), Vidyā (goddess presiding over spiritual enlightenment), Āvidyā (the goddess of Nescience), by Śakti (Power) and Māyā (the deluding potency of the Lord).

56-57. He was extremely delighted to have the vision of that Lord and overwhelmed with intense devotion and thrilled with joy (with his hair standing on their ends) his eyes wet with tears of love, Akrūra of the Sāttvata clan summoned courage, and bowed down with his head. And folding his pair of palms, with concentrated attention, he slowly began to praise in voice choked with emotions.

CHAPTER FORTY

Akrūra’s Hymn (in praise of the Lord)

1A. Vṛṣṇi’s Text adds:

At this vision of the Lord, Akrūra’s heart and senses became filled with divine joy and serenity. Bending his neck (head) down with devotion, he praised the Lotus-eyed Lord.

Akrūra said:

1. I bow down to you as you are the Prime cause of all causes (like Mahat etc. from which the Universe evolved). You are the veritable Nārāyaṇa (the Deity reposing over the cosmic waters), the In-dweller in all bodies, the First Principle not subject to change or modification. It is from the lotus sprouted from his navel that god Brahmā, the Creator of the Universe appeared. It is from him (Brahmā) that the universe was evolved.
2.* All the causes of the evolution of the world such as (the elements) the earth, water, fire, air, the sky and its originator-ahamkāra, the principle of cosmic intelligence called mahat, prakṛti (Primordial matter) and the cause thereof (viz. Puruṣa, the mind, the senses (and organs) and their objects and all the gods presiding over them, are all evolved out of your Supreme Person (Śrī mūrti).

3. These—god Brahma¹ and others—being material (or other-than-the spirit) do not know the essential nature of yours who are the real ātman (Supreme self). For god Brahmā is conditioned by or enveloped in the guṇas of Prakṛti. As such he is unable to congnize your essential nature which is beyond all guṇas.

4. Certainly, the righteous and practitioners of yoga worship you directly as the Supreme Person, the Ruler of the Universe—as the Indweller of the body (Or in the senses and organs of the bodies of every jīva), presiding over all material bodies (or the great elements like the ether, air, fire etc.), presiding over the bodies of god.

5. Some twice-borns (e.g. Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas) follow the path of action—Karma mārga, and betake themselves to the course of sacrificial performance. With the help of the knowledge of three Vedas (Ṛk, Sāman and Yajus), they worship none but you under the names and forms of different divinities in extensive sacrificial sessions.

6. Having renounced all activities² (pertaining to karma-mārga, they have attained tranquillity and control of senses.³ Such men of spiritual wisdom worship the Embodiment of

* VR presents the viṣṭāśvarta stance : He shows that this verse described the Lord as the material cause as well as the efficient cause. "From Your Person Brahma characterized by mūla-prakṛti as his body is transformed into mahat, ahamkāra."

¹ VJ: Jīva and others—Like inanimate things, even jīva cannot cognize your nature. The jīvas are observed with the false notion that the body and soul are identical or they themselves are the absolute masters.

² VJ: These—Brahmā and others cannot cognize Your real nature as they are distinct and different from your self.

³ VR. : give up all Vedic rites performed for attaining their desires which give rise to egotism and passions

OR: realize that Vedic rites are a form of worshipping the Lord.

³ VJ : Unswerving devotion of the Lord exclusively.
Knowledge through sacrifice in the form of spiritual knowledge i.e. meditation on the Lord).

7.* According to the injunctions laid by you (in the Pāñcarātra āgama) some consecrate their person\(^1\) become absorbed in you and worship you as per procedure laid down by you (in the Pāñcarātra āgama), as the One Deity abiding in many emanations (Vyūhas such as Vāsudeva, Saṅkaṛṣaṇa, Pradhyumna and Aniruddha) or as one form (viz. Nārāyaṇa).

8. Others (i.e. devotees of Lord Śiva) adore you only in the form of Śiva\(^2\) as per procedure ordained by god Śiva (in Śaiva āgamas) but with difference of details according to the teachers (of various Śaiva sects like Kāpālika, Kālāmukha, Pāṣupata etc.), Oh glorious Lord!

9.* Those who are votaries of other deities and have thus reposed their faith and devotion unto them (thinking these deities as different from you), all of them really worship you who pervade them all, Oh Supreme Lord.

10. Oh Lord! Just as rivers with their sources in mountains and flooded by raining clouds enter into the sea from all directions, similarly all paths (of devotion and worship) lead ultimately unto you.

11. Sātvā, rajas and tāmas are nothing but modifications of your Prakṛti (potency). And everything from inanimate immovables to the highest deity Brahmā, are the products of Prakṛti and are woven warp and woof in Prakṛti\(^3\) (and therefore not different from you. You pervade them all)

---

* After describing the paths of Karma, Sāṅkhya, and Yoga, he mentions Pāñcarātra and Śaiva systems in verses 7 and 8.

\(1\) ŚR. : as per Vaiṣṇavite and Śaivite procedures.

\(2\) VR. : By the five consecrating rites prescribed in the Pāñcarātra āgamas.

SD.: quotes a verse enumerating the five samākāras: Tāpah punḍram tathā nāma mantra yāgai ca pañcamah tāpa is branding with representations of discus etc., Punḍra—mark on the forehead (the rest is easy).

\(2\) VB. In Tāmata Kalpa Viṣṇu assumes the form of Śiva.

\(3\) * Cf. Teṣyanya-devatābhaktā yajantu śraddhayānviśāh || teṣṭi māmna Kaunteya yajanyavidhip urvakam ||

BG. 9.23.

\(3\) ŚR : Or : and ultimately they merge into Prakṛti and Prakṛti unto you. In this way all gods etc. are absorbed in you.
12. Hail to you whose mind is perfectly unattached to everything even though you are the In-dwelling soul of everybody and witness to the intellects (minds) of all. This stream of gunas (samsāra) created by your Nescience operates powerfully on gods, men, and subhuman beings.

13. Fire is regarded as your mouth, the earth as your feet, the sun as your eye, the sky as your navel, cardinal points as your ears, the celestial region (the firmament) as your head, Indra, the ruler of gods your arms, and oceans as your belly and the wind as your vital strength.¹

14. Trees and herbs are the hair on your body; the clouds are the locks of hair on your head; mountains are the bones and nails of your transcendental self; days and the nights are your winking; god Brahmā, the Creator of the world, is your generative organ, and rain shower is regarded as your semen.

15. Oh Immortal Supreme Self! You are the perfect immutable Person who can be comprehended by the mind only. On you are projected worlds teeming with beings along with the protectors of those worlds, just as aquatic beings move in water or insect exists in the Udumbara fruit (Indian fig).

16. Whatever forms you assume for your sportive activities in the world, dispel the afflictions and sorrows of people. Hence they sing your glories in joy.

17. I bow to you the Fish incarnation, the cause of the world who moved freely in the cosmic waters of the ocean of deluge. Hail to you who assumed the form of Hayagriva (horse-necked god) for killing the demons Madhu and Kaitabha.

18. Salutations to you Oh gigantic Tortoise, the bearer of mountain Mandara (at the time of churning the ocean for nectar). I bow to you who have assumed the Boar form for the sportive activity of uplifting the earth (from the bottom of the ocean).

19. Oh Lord! The Dispeller of the fear of the righteous! I bow to you the wonderful man-lion. My salutations to you Oh Vāmana who have crossed the three worlds (in one step).

¹. VT. The verse shows how the Lord pervades all gods.

20. Salutations to you Parasurāma, the chief of Bhṛgus who cut down the forest in the form of haughty Kṣatriyas. I salute to you, Oh Rāmacandra, the best of Raghus, who have killed Rāvaṇa.

21. Hail to you the Lord of Sātvatas! Who manifested yourself in four divine emanations of Vāsudeva, Saṅkarṣaṇa (Balarāma), Pradyumna (Kṛṣṇa’s son) and Aniruddha (Pradyumna’s son).

22. Hail to you Lord Buddha! Who are absolutely pure but who deluded Daityas and Dānavas (by your anti-Vedic teaching). I bow to you who assumed the form of Kalki and killed the kṣatriyas who were reduced to the stage of Mlecchas (non-Aryans).

23. Oh Glorious Lord! This world of beings is deluded by your māyā potency and wanders in the path of karma (samsāra) with the false notion of me-and-mine i.e. of the body being his own self and property as his own.

24. And I am such a stupid person, Oh Lord Kṛṣṇa! That I too wander (move in) my body, sons, house, wives, wealth, kith and kins etc. who are really unreal like dream but thinking them to be real.

25. I entertain a contrary notion towards things which are not eternal (e.g. fruit of karmas), are not the real self (viz. my body) as well as which are full of troubles (e.g. house, property) and regard them as eternal, real-self and full of happiness). I am enveloped in the darkness of ignorance and take pleasure in the opposite pairs like pleasure and pain and I do not know that you are the most dear to me.

26. Just as an ignorant person does not know that it is really water that is covered by weeds and other water-plants, and abandoning the real water, runs after a mirage, similarly I have turned my face away from you (and am pursuing unrealities like my body, house etc.)

27. Being of poor intellectual capacity and understanding, I am not able to control my mind which is perturbed by desire for enjoyment and activities to attain it, and am dragged here and there by uncontrollable senses.
28. Oh Lord! I (who am as described above) have approached your feet which are not easily accessible to the unrighteous, regard (the accessibility of your feet) as an act of Grace on your part. Oh God with a lotus in the nevél! Release from the cycle of births and deaths is possible if one's mind becomes attached to you through the service of saintly persons.

29. I bow to you who are the embodiment of Pure Consciousness and the Source of all knowledge. You are the Ruler (of factors e.g. Time-Spirit, Nature, Destiny) that control Jivas; you are the very Brahman of infinite power.

30. Salutations to Lord Vāsudeva, the asylum of all beings. Oh Lord of sense-organs! I bow down to you. Oh Lord! Be pleased to protect me who have approached your feet.

CHAPTER FORTYONE

Krṣṇa's Arrival at Mathurā

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Having manifested his (original Viṣṇu) form in the water to Akrūra, the glorious Lord Krṣṇa withdrew it again, even while he was glorifying him, like an actor (who instantly retires) after playing his role.

2. Noticing that the vision had disappeared, Akrūra emerged from water. He hastily performed the (mid-day) religious duties. He then returned to the chariot still wondering at the vision.

3. Lord Krṣṇa (the Controller of Senses) enquired, "have you seen anything miraculous either on the land or in the water or in the sky? I surmise (from your appearance) that you have perceived some such wonder.

1. ŚR. : It is through Your Grace that one gets the opportunity of rendering service to saintly persons which leads to attachment to you, resulting in Final Emancipation from Samsāra.

2. Despite Akrūra's continuation of praise. This shows Krṣṇa's indifference to praise (anādāre sarṣṭa) —VT
Akrūra replied:

4. "Whatever wonders are there on the earth, in the sky or in the water in this world exist in you who constitute the whole of the universe. What marvel can remain un-witnessed by me who have a direct vision of you?"

5. Oh Supreme Lord! When I directly perceive you who accommodate all the marvels within you, what wonder, either on the earth, in the water or the sky could be witnessed by me."

6. Replying him in these words, Akrūra, the son of Gāndinī, drove the chariot and at the end of the day, he brought Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa to Mathurā.

7. People in the country-side who assembled at various stages on the way, became delighted to see the sons of Vasudeva (Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa) and were not able to take away their eyes from them.

8. In the meanwhile, Nanda, the cowherd, and other inhabitants of Vraja who came ahead of them (by a short-cut) stood waiting for them in a park near the city (Mathurā).

9. After joining them (Nanda and his group of cowherds) the glorious Lord of the world took Akrūra by hand while Akrūra was modestly bowing, and spoke to him as if with a laugh.

10. "You may go in advance with the chariot to the city and return home. We shall get down here and after resting for some time, shall go to the city."

Akrūra requested:

11. Oh Lord! I shall not enter Mathurā leaving you both here. It does not behove you, Oh Protector (of the world) who are so kind to your devotees, to forsake me who am your votary.

12. Be pleased to come. Let us go together. Oh Lord! You transcend sense-perception. Oh best of friends! Visiting our house along with your elder brother (Balarāma), with your friends and cowherds bless our home with your august presence.

13. Be gracious to sanctify our houses with the dust of your feet as we are after all householders (inevitably committing five types of sins\textsuperscript{1}). For the ancestors and gods including the Fire-god get satisfied and propitiated with the water used for washing your feet (which is kept in a vessel or small reservoir in the courtyard of the house).

14. By washing the pair of your feet the great king Bali attained sanctifying fame, incomparable affluence and supreme sovereignty as also the goal reached by absolute votaries.

15. The sacred waters (viz. the river Gaṅgā) that washed your feet have sanctified the three worlds, were borne by god Śiva on his head and by contact with which the sons of Sagara attained to the heaven.

16. I bow to you, Oh God of gods, Oh Lord of the universe, the listening and recital of whose glory bring spiritual merit; On the foremost one in the Yadu clan, Oh Nārāyaṇa of glorious reputation."

\textit{The glorious Lord replied:}

17. It is after slaying Kaṁsa who is the enemy of our Yadu clan, that I shall visit your house in company of my elder brother (Balarāma) and shall bring delight to my friends.

\textit{Sri Sūka said:}

18. Akrūra who was thus replied, became rather disappointed. He, however, entered the city, reported (to Kaṁsa) the account of the mission assigned to him and returned home.

19. The next day in the afternoon, Lord Kṛṣṇa, accompanied by Balarāma and surrounded by the cowherds, entered Mathura with a view to see the city.

20. He saw the city Mathurā with high gate-ways and entrances made of crystals, with huge doors of gold beautified with gold arches. The granaries thereof were made of copper and brass. It was inaccessible due to deep moats around it. Its outskirts were made attractive with parks and beautiful gardens.

\footnote{Manu enumerates five types of inevitable sins caused in the household work such as ‘cooking on a stove’, ‘pounding’, ‘crushing’, ‘brushing up of vessel’ etc. as follows:
\begin{verbatim} pāṭica śūnd gṛhaḥṣya cullī ṣeṣānyupaskarāḥ / kaṇḍant coda-kumbhāteca-Manu 3,66
\end{verbatim}}
21-22. It appeared beautiful with its quadrangles (where four roads meet) decorated with gold and with mansions of gold with suitable pleasure gardens attached to each of them. It was decorated with guild-halls of different classes of artisans and with buildings of other citizens. It was filled with the joyful cooing of pigeons and joyous notes of the peacocks perching on the window-grills and platforms, eaves (awnings) and seats (under trees) all inlaid with Vaidūrya (cat’s eyes) diamonds, crystals, sapphires, corals, pearls and emeralds. Its streets, market places and quadrangles were profusely sprinkled with water and were strewn with flowers, sprouts, parched paddy and unbroken rice-grains.

23. He saw that it appeared beautiful for the entrances of houses were decorated with (auspicious objects such as) artistic pitchers full of water, sprinkled with curds and sandal, graced around with flowers and with rows of lamps and with tender foliage, inserted in the pitchers, with trunks of plantain trees and areca nut trees with bunches of fruit on the branches, and festive flags and buntings hoisted over them.

24. Oh King! When Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, the sons of Vasudeva, surrounded by their friends, entered the city by the royal road, women of that city hastily came out to have a look at them, and some eager ones climbed the terraces of their houses.

25. Out of haste some dressed themselves and put on ornaments in the wrong way; some forgot to wear the ornament in pair and put on one ear-ring (leaving the other ear ornamentless), and one anklet (leaving the other foot anklet-less); while others started (with only one eye painted with collyrium) without applying collyrium to the other eye.

26. Hearing the noise (as the sons of Vasudeva approached), some were so overjoyed that they set aside their dishes while taking meals; some besmeared with oil (preliminary to bath) came out (with oily appearance) without taking bath; some rose from sleep (and without taking any wash, ran up to see), while mothers suckling babies hurried forth (leaving their babies half-fed and crying).

27. With his noble gait and deportment like a mighty elephant in an intoxicated stage (exuding ichern), and with his personality delighting (his consort) the goddess Śrī, the Lotus-eyed Kṛṣṇa provided a sumptuous feast to their eyes and captivated their hearts with his noble sportive smiles and glances.

28. The women of Mathurā whose hearts were already deeply attached to him (lit. were melted and rushed after him) through the reports they frequently heard about him, (regarding his excellences, prowess etc.) now espied him personally. They were honoured by being sprinkled with the nectar-like glances and fascinating smiles by him. They embraced that Embodiment of Bliss (mentally) as he entered through the gate-way of their eyes, occupied their hearts (and was in their ‘possession’). They were so thrilled with joy that the hair on their body stood on their ends. They felt relieved of the endless agony of their hearts through pangs of separation (from him), Oh subjugator of enemies (e.g. lust, passions etc.)

29. Climbing to the highest terraces of the mansions and with their lotus-like faces blooming with delight, the young damsels showered flowers on Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa.

30. At every stop Brāhmaṇas, being overwhelmed with joy, worshipped them with pots of water (to wash their feet), curds and rice-grains (to be applied to their fore-heads as an auspicious mark) and with wreaths, sandal-paste, perfumes and suitable presents (e.g. fruits, sweetmeats etc.)

31.* The ladies of the city (Mathura) remarked to each other, “Oh! What great penance must have been performed by cowherd women on account of which they had the privilege to behold at will these two brothers who are themselves a joyous festival to the eyes of the human world.

32. Beholding a certain washerman who was a dyer too coming that way, Kṛṣṇa, the elder brother of Gada asked him to give the excellent, well-washed clothes.

33. “Please give us both suitable clothes becoming to our worthy status. The highest prosperity will certainly be yours for offering us these as gift.”

1. ŚR adds: Oh King! Don’t be immersed in the erotic sentiment.
* Not found in VJ’s Text.
2. Name of Kṛṣṇa’s step-brother, son of Vasudeva and Deva-raķṭitā (Devaki’s sister)—Supra 9.24.46-52.
34. Though requested by the glorious Lord who was perfect and possessed of plenty in every respect, the highly arrogant servant of the king (Kansa) got angry and retorted with scorn.

35. "You ill-mannered, rustic hill-dwellers and foresters! Do you always ever wear such fine clothes? How do you have the audacity to overstep your limits and to desire to have the royal clothes.

36. Get ye gone, you childish fellow. If you really wish to live, you should never make such requests. Take care. The king's men verily arrest insolent people, beat them (soundly) and strip them of their belongings."

37. While he was thus swaggeringly boasting, Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devakī, got enraged and with his finger-tips he severed his head from his trunk.

38. All the servants of the washerman threw down the bundles of clothes and took to their heels in all directions. Kṛṣṇa took the clothes (he wanted).

39. Kṛṣṇa as well as Balarāma put on two pieces of garments (an upper and lower one) of their choice. They distributed the remaining to the (accompanying) cowherds and threw the rest on the ground.

40. Then a weaver was pleased with them and elegantly dressed them both with rich multi-coloured clothes in a manner worthy of them.

41. With the variety of excellent clothes and decorations, Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma appeared brilliant and most beautiful like two young elephants, one white and the other dark, tastefully adorned for some festival.

42. Being pleased with him, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa conferred on him the type of liberation called "similarity of godly form" (in the next world), and superb affluence, strength, wealth, memory and acuteness of sense organs in this world.

43. Then they proceeded to the house of a florist called Sudāman. Seeing them he respectfully rose to receive them and bowed, placing his head on the ground (i.e. lying prostrate before them).
44. He offered them seat and water to wash their feet. He worshipped both of them along with their followers (cowherds) by offering the articles of worship, wreaths of flowers, betel leaves and sandal paste.

45. He submitted, "The very object of our life has been fulfilled, Oh Lord, My race has been sanctified by you. And by your arrival my ancestors, gods and sages have been pleased with me.

46. Both of Your Honour are the ultimate cause of this Universe. It is by your rays that you have descended on this earth for its prosperity and protection.

47. Both of you are the friends and the soul of the world. Even though you are favourable to your devotees, you do not entertain discriminating outlook. You are equal unto all beings.

48. Therefore be pleased to lay down a command on Your servant as to what I should do for you. It is a high favour upon a human being that you direct him to do your service."

49. Oh Great King, Sudāman who was greatly pleased in mind, divined the wishes of them both and he presented them garland made of specially fragrant flowers.

50. Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma who were excellently decorated by the garlands, were greatly pleased with him and they, the great bestowers of boons, conferred on him, blessings as he bowed them respectfully and sought their protection.

51. He sought from them the boon of entertaining unswerving devotion unto them who constituted the soul of all, as well as friendship to their devotees and great compassion to all beings.

52. Having given him the boon as well as bestowing on him prosperity that would increase with his descendents and having conferred on him strength, longevity, glory and splendour, the Lord departed with his elder brother.
CHAPTER FORTY-TWO

Description of the Wrestling Arena

Śrī Śuka said:

1. While proceeding ahead on the royal road, Kṛṣṇa espied a deformed young woman of charming countenance carrying a vessel containing sandal-paste and other unguents (for smearing and beautifying the body). He asked laughingly just to humour her.

2. "Who are you, Oh lady of shapely thighs? For whom is this vessel of unguents intended? Tell us the truth. Give us both some excellent unguents (out of these). (By this act of yours) you will soon be blessed with good luck."

The maid-servant said:

3. "Oh beautiful youth! I am a maid-servant called Tri-Vakra (Deformed at three places viz. at the neck, the breast and the waist), but I am esteemed by (His Majesty) Karna in (the technique of) preparation of unguents. For the pastes and ointments prepared by me are very much liked by the king of Bhojas.-who else other than you both deserves to be anointed with this?"

4. Her heart being thoroughly captivated by their beauty, comeliness, bewitching smiles, sweet words and loving glances, she besmeared them thickly with the unguent.

5. Then with the upper part of their bodies painted with the unguent, the colour of which was different from that of the complexion of their persons, they both (Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) appeared very much effulgent.

6. The glorious Lord who was very much pleased with her, decided to straighten up perfectly the hump-backed woman deformed at the three different places, though possessed of a charming countenance, and thereby to show (to the world) the fruit of having a sight of him.

7. Pressing the front part of her feet with his own feet, he held her chin with two fingers of his raised open palm and made her body perfectly straight.
8. Instantly, at the very touch of Kṛṣṇa, she became the loveliest young damsel with all limbs straight and proportionate and shapely, with big buttocks and heavy breasts.

9. Being thus gifted with excellent beauty and noble qualities, she thereupon felt the passion of love enkindled in her. And drawing him by the end of his upper garment, she requested him, beaming with a smile.

10. “Come, Oh hero! Let us go home. I cannot bear (the idea of going away) leaving you here, now. Please be propitious unto a woman whose mind has been agitated by you, Oh prominent one among men.”

11. When solicited thus by the woman, despite the presence of even Balarāma, Kṛṣṇa cast a glance at him and at the faces of cowherds, laughed loudly and spoke to her.

12. “Oh lady with beautiful eye-brows! After accomplishing the object of my coming here (viz. killing of Kaṁsa) I shall certainly visit your house which relieves the pangs of hearts of men. You are the only resort of homeless wayfarers like us.¹

13. After taking leave of her in sweet words, as he proceeded through the commercial area of the town (lit. through the streets of the Vaiśya community), he, along with his elder brother and followers was worshipfully received with various presents, betel-leaves, garlands of pearls and precious stones and perfumes by the guilds of merchants.

14.* The minds of the ladies of the merchant communities were so much agitated and overwhelmed with love that they forgot themselves. With loosened garments and braids of hair and slipping bracelets, they stood motionless as if painted in a picture.

15. Thereupon, enquiring with the people about the venue of the Bow-(Sacrifice), the Immutable Lord (Kṛṣṇa) entered the sacrificial-hall and saw the wonderful bow, beauti-

¹. VJ. : God is not attached to anyone. But his devotees worship him and become his resort.
VR. : You deserve to be enjoyed.
* Untraced in VJ.‘s Text.
ful (and big) like the rainbow (as it was studded with precious stones).

16. It was guarded by many men-at-arms, as it was worshipped and decorated with precious stones and valuables. Though he was prohibited by the attending guards, Kṛṣṇa forcibly caught hold of it.

17. Sportively picking it up with his left hand and fixing its string, Kṛṣṇa of formidable prowess, stretched it to the full and snapped it asunder in two in a second, as an intoxicated elephant would do to a sugarcane. And all men stood a-gazing (in astonishment).

18. As the bow was being broken, the crashing sound filled the sky, the space between the earth and heaven and all the quarters. Hearing that sound, even Kaṁsa was seized with terror.

19. The guards of the bow along with the attendants got enraged. Armed as they were, they were anxious to arrest him. Shouting “Let him be seized and bound down”, they encircled him.

20. Perceiving those fellows of wicked intentions, Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa flared up in rage, and grasping the two pieces of the broken bow stick, soundly drubbed them all.

21. Having destroyed the battalion of soldiers despatched against them by Kaṁsa, they came out of the gate of the sacrificial hall. As they roamed along, they were delighted to see the affluence of the city.

22. Witnessing their marvellous prowess, splendour, fearlessness and handsome personality, the citizens of Mathura regarded them as two foremost ones among gods.

23. While both of them were thus wandering at will, the sunset. Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma surrounded by cowherds, returned from the city to the camp of their carts.

24. All the auspicious blessings anticipated (to happen to the citizens of Mathura) by the Gopīs who became afflicted with the pangs of (impending) separation from Kṛṣṇa at the time of his departure (from Vraja), materialised to be true at Mathura, in the case of those citizens who could gaze at the splendour of the elegant personality of Kṛṣṇa (The Supreme Person), the ornament of Manliness to whom Śrī, the goddess of beauty and affluence, resorted for shelter disregarding other gods who sought her.

25. After washing their pair of feet, they partook of rice boiled in milk. With full knowledge what Kaṁsa intended to do the next day, they spent that night quite happily.

26-27. Kaṁsa, however, was struck with panic when he heard the report of the breaking of the huge bow and the massacre of the guards of the bow and the contingent of the army (deployed against them), and the marvellous sportive acts of Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma. The wicked-minded fellow, being terrified, remained sleepless for a long time, and saw both in sleep and while awake, many evil omens portending death.

28. Though his reflection in water or mirror was visible, he could not see his head in that reflection. Though no second luminary was in existence, he saw every planet (or lamp) in duplicate.

29. He espied holes in his shadow. Nor could he hear the whizzing sound of vital breath when the ears were closed. He felt that the trees he saw were of gold. Nor his footprints (in dust or sand) as he walked, were visible to him.

30. In dreams he saw himself clasped in embrace by dead persons (or goblins) and that he rode a donkey and gulped poison. He saw that he was wandering along with a garland of red flowers, and was smeared all over with oil and was naked.

31. He perceived such and other similar portends foreboding death, both in his dreams and in the waking state. Being terribly afraid of death, he did not get any sleep at all through anxiety.

32. When the night was over and the sun came up from the eastern waters, Kaṁsa caused (i.e. gave orders for) the grand celebration of athletic sports (such as wrestling of athletes etc.).

33. Men worshipped the wrestling arena. There was a fanfare of trumpets and beating of drums. The galleries were decorated with garlands, flags, bunting and ornamental arches.

34. Citizens and country people headed by Brāhmaṇas and Kṣattriyas entered and were comfortably seated, each according to his position. Princes and royal personages also occupied their respective seats.

35. Surrounded by his ministers and at the centre of his tributary princes sat Kamsa on the throne, though his heart was aching with anxiety.

36. While the flourish of trumpets was being (occasionally drowned by the stroking of arms by athletes\(^1\), the well adorned proud athletic champions occupied their seats along-with their trainers.

37. Cāṇūra, Muṣṭika, Kūṭa, Šala and Tošala as well—all highly cheered up by the exciting music of the instruments presented themselves into the arena.

38. Cowherd Nanda and other cowherds who were invited by the king of Bhojas and who had offered their presents to him, took their seats on a separate dais.

CHAPTER FORTYTHREE

Killing of the elephant Kuvalayāpiḍa

Śrī Śuka said:

1. The next morning, Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma who had taken their bath and performed purificatory rites (as if to expiate the sin of killing their maternal uncle who, despite warnings of breaking the sacred bow, did not release their parents but wanted to kill them, heard the sound of the kettledrums and the shouting and beating of arms by wrestlers, went to see the tournaments, Oh repressor of enemies!

2. Arriving at the entrance of the arena, Kṛṣṇa beheld the elephant Kuvalayāpiḍa stationed there under the direction of the controller of the elephant.

3. Preparing himself for action by tightening the cloth worn round the loins, and tying up tightly his curly locks of

\(^{1}\) mallanāḥ tala-la

cvo-bāhu-mālāghataḥ—VT
hair (with his upper garment) he spoke to the conductor of the elephant in a voice deep like thunder.

4. "You conductor of the elephant! Make way for us. Hurry up. Clear out instantly. Else I shall send you along with your elephant to the region of Death."

5. Threatened thus, the driver of the elephant got enraged and goaded that already infuriated elephant looking like the god of Death at the end of the universe, to charge against Kṛṣṇa.

6. The big elephant vehemently dashed at Kṛṣṇa and seized him with his trunk. But slipping out of the coil of his trunk, Kṛṣṇa dealt him a blow and concealed himself betwixt his legs.

7. The enraged animal could not find Kṛṣṇa. Guided by his sense of smell, he reached his trunk to Keśava (Kṛṣṇa) who forcibly disengaged himself and rushed out of his grip.

8. Catching hold of the tail of that extremely mighty elephant, Kṛṣṇa easily dragged him to a distance of twenty-five bows (or one hundred cubit) even as Garuḍa would do to a cobra.

9. With his firm grip on his tail, he turned him to the contrary direction when he tried to turn to the right or to the left to catch hold of Kṛṣṇa, just as a boy would do to a calf to revolve it either this way or that.

10. Then he confronted the elephant at the very front and struck him down with his hand. He ran before the elephant with that much speed that he thought Kṛṣṇa to be in his grasp at every step and he made him tumble down.

11. While running sportively, Kṛṣṇa fell down on the ground, and promptly jumped aside. Thinking that Kṛṣṇa had fallen down (and lying there), the infuriated elephant struck the ground with his tusks (as Kṛṣṇa was not there).

12. Extremely enraged at the futility of his attack and being goaded on by the drivers, he dashed in rage towards Kṛṣṇa.

13. The glorious Lord, the slayer of demon Madhu, approached the attacking elephant, caught hold of his trunk and felled him on the ground.
14. Like a lion, Lord Krṣṇa pressed down the fallen elephant with his foot and extracting a tusk of that elephant killed him as well as his drivers.

15. Leaving the dead elephant there, Krṣṇa with one tusk in hand, entered the arena. With one tusk on his shoulder, with his body stained with drops of ichor and blood, Krṣṇa shone beautiful with his lotus-like face decked with pearl-like drops of perspiration.

16. Surrounded by several cowherds, Balarāma and Krṣṇa armed with an excellent weapon in the form of the tusk of the elephant, entered the amphitheatre.

17.* When, accompanied with his elder brother, Krṣṇa entered the arena, he appeared like a thunderbolt to the athletes, as a superman to men, the god of Love (Cupid) incarnate to women, a kinsman to cowherds, a chastiser to wicked monarchs, a child to his parents, the veritable Death to Kamsa, the king of Bhojas, as a weakling or an inadequate competitor to the ignorant, the Highest Principle (Brahman) to the Yogins and the Supreme Deity to Vṛṣṇis.

18. Seeing that the elephant Kuvalayāpiḍa was killed and both of them were still invincible, Kamsa with all his intrepidity and self-possession, felt extremely terrified at that time, Oh King.

19. The mighty-armed brothers with picturesque dress, strange ornaments, wreaths and wearing quaint garments, shone like two excellently attired brilliant actors on the stage and they captivated (and agitated the minds of the onlookers with their brilliance.

* ŚR. explains that Lord Krṣṇa was a combination of different rasas (sentiments) according to the view point of the person concerned. He quotes a verse enumerating the order of rasas. He manifested:

> raudrodbhutas ca śrīgāro āhārāyāh uṭro dayā labhāh/> bhayānakas ca bīthataḥ jāntaḥ saprema-bhaktiḥ
dh

VT. and VB. also in a lengthy commentary expound how Lord Krṣṇa represented all the rasas. For example: the ordinary citizens were so much surprised to see the Supra-human exploits of Krṣṇa (e.g. killing a big elephant single-handedly without the use of weapons by his physical might) that it was a miracle to them (adbhuta)
20. The occupants of the galleries, both from the town and the country gazed at those two super-men. With their eyes and countenances beaming with an outburst of extreme joy, they as if drank the countenances of those brothers with their eyes but did not feel satisfied, Oh King.

21. They were as if drinking them with their eyes, licking them with their tongues, smelling them with their nose and clasping them in their arms.

22. They described to each other the details of what they actually saw (e.g. breaking of the sacrificial bow) and of what they heard (e.g. lifting of mount Govardhana) as if they were recollecting their personality (armed with the tusks of the elephant), excellences (such as bravery), sweetness (of smiling, manner of speaking etc.) and their extraordinary courage.

23. "These two brothers are the incarnations of the rays of the Almighty Lord Hari whose abode is cosmic waters, descended on the earth in the house of Vasudeva.

24. It is reported that this Kṛṣṇa was born of Devaki and taken to Gokula where, without being known by anyone, he grew up in the house of Nanda till that time.

25. By him Pūtanā, the demon in the form of a whirl-wind (Cakravāta), the two Arjuna trees, the Yakṣa (Śaṅkhacūḍa), Keśin, Dhenuka¹ and others of the same tribe were finished.

26. Cows along with cowherds were rescued by him from the forest-conflagration, the serpent Kāliya was subdued and Indra was humbled down with his pride ridden off.

27. The big mountain (Govardhana) was held up by him on his palm for seven days and Gokula was protected from (driving) showers, (tempestuous) winds and thunderbolts.

28. Looking with delight at his ever-cheerful appearance beaming with smiles, the Gopīs easily² got over their sufferings of various sorts.

29. People say that being protected by him in every respect, the race of Yadu became widely celebrated and will attain affluence, glory and influence.

¹. It may be noted that Dhenuka was killed by Balarāma (vide 10.15.36). But people in Mathura heard a different report.

². ŚR. alternately takes ātram as qualifying mukham and interprets: the slightly 'fatigued countenance of Kṛṣṇa.'
30. This is his elder brother the splendid-looking Balarama of lotus-eyes, by whom were killed Pralambha, Vatsaka (the demon who assumed the form of a calf) and Asuras like Baka and others."

31. While people were talking thus (among themselves) and there was a flourish of trumpets, Cāṇūra addressed Kṛṣṇa and Rāma, and spoke as follows:

32. "Oh Kṛṣṇa, the son of Nanda! Oh Balarama! Hearing that both of you are respected as great heroes, expert in wrestling, you have been invited by the king who is eager to see you.

33. Subjects who abide by the wish of the king in thought, word and deeds, attain to prosperity. And if they behave to the contrary, they meet with the reverse of it.

34. It is quite well known that since the age as cowherd-boys who tend calves, even grown up cowherds also take delight in sporting and wrestling in the jungle while pasturing the cows.

35. Hence, let all of us do what is liked by the king. All beings will be propitious unto us thereby, as the king personifies all beings."

36. Hearing that speech, Kṛṣṇa welcomed it. Considering that wrestling was desirable in his case, he gave a reply appropriate to the place and occasion.

37. "(Though we are not city-dwellers like you under Kaṁsa's direct control) we too, wanderers in the forest as we are, are the subjects of the king of Bhojas we shall always do what is agreeable to him. It will be a great favour unto us.

38. We are after all boys. We shall play with those who are equal to us in strength. Let there be proper type of wrestling. There should not be the slightest transgression of justice, Oh judges of the wrestling tournaments."

1. As it usually happens in hearsay information, people of Mathura seem to have mixed up matters, for Vatsa and Baka were killed by Kṛṣṇa.

2. VB. explains that the investiture of the sacred thread of Kṛṣṇa had not taken place. As such, though he was a Kṣatriya, he was ineligible to use arms. Hence (for killing them) wrestling was appropriate from the point of time and place or traditional usage.
Cāṇūra replied:

39. "Neither You nor Balarāma is a child nor a teenager (from eleven to fifteen years of age). You, by whom an elephant possessing the strength of a thousand elephants was killed as if in a sport, are the foremost among the powerful people.

40. Hence, Oh Kṛṣṇa (A scion of the Vṛṣṇi clan) You will have to wrestle with powerful athletes. There is no injustice in this case. You measure Your strength with me and let Balarāma wrestle with Muṣṭika."

CHAPTER FORTYFOUR

Slaying of Kaṁsa

Śri Śuka continued:

1. (When the pairs (or wrestlers) were so determined) Lord Kṛṣṇa (the slayer of demon Madhu) of unflinching resolution caught hold of Cāṇūra and Balarāma, the son of Rohiṇī advanced towards Muṣṭika.

1-A* (Spurious—vide the foot-note)

2. With the ambition of vanquishing the opponent, they interlocked their hands and feet with those of the opponent and vehemently tugged each other (with all their strength).

3. While wrestling they struck each other with fore-arms with clenched fists¹, knees with knees, heads with heads and chests with chests.

* D.S. Yande's edition of the Bh.P. Bombay 1928 adds this spurious verse. As Vrndāvana edt. does not give it, I did not include it above:

\[ \text{śphothya hastau hastāḥbhyāṁ ātā caiva punah punah} / \]
\[ \text{vitiṣṭhā bhūyaḥ saṅghṛya parikramya parasparam} // \]

It describes how the wrestlers stroked loudly their arms and thighs, closed upon each other and tried to dodge.

I regard it as 'spurious' as some standard annotators such as ŚR., VR., VJ., VB., VT, do not take its cognisance.

1. \[ \text{tasmin muṣṭyopa-lakṣitatoena kathaṁcit muṣṭir eva vācyā—VT} \]
4. They mutually tried to overpower each other by whirling, squeezing into arms, dashing each other to the ground and by pouncing on each other or dodging by receding.

5. Fired with the ambition to vanquish the other, they subjected each other’s bodies to sufferings by lifting up, by carrying away, dashing down on the ground and fixing the opponent to the spot.

6. Noticing that unequally-arranged fight between the weak boys and the powerful athletes, all the lady-spectators, being full of compassion, spoke (criticising) in groups, to each other, Oh king!

7. “Alas! It is out and out injustice on the part of the royal assembly who revel in such unequal fighting between the weak and the strong opponents, despite the presence of the king as spectator.

8. What a great contrast is there between the athletes of adamant-like powerful bodies, enormous like the hills, as opposed to the two saplings (teenagers) of very delicate limbs and who have not even attained youth.

9. This is certainly the transgression of righteousness on the part of this assembly. One should never stay at all at a place where violation of religion and justice takes place.

10. An intelligent person who is aware of the faults of the members of attending an assembly, ought not to enter that assembly at all. Irrespective of his participation in the discussion of the assembly by remaining silent despite knowing the truth or making a non-factual statement), the attending member incurs sins.

11. Lo! Have a look at the lotus-face of Kṛṣṇa. How his countenance appears adorned with droplets of perspiration and resembles a lotus covered with drops of water, as he whirls round his opponent.

12. Don’t you see the face of Balarāma, with reddish eyes, flushed with rage against Muṣṭika, yet beautified with a defiant laugh.

13. Oh! How blessed must be the lands of Vraja where this Ancient Person whose feet are worshipped by god Śiva and goddess Lakṣmī roams about in the guise of a human being, decorated with wreaths of quaint wild flowers, playing upon his flute, tending cows in the company of Balarâma and goes out for playing games (Shame upon this assembly where he is maltreated thus).

14. What supreme type of penance the Gopîs must have practised that they drink with their eyes his personal charm which is the essence of beauty, neither equalled nor surpassed by anything, which is by itself too beautiful to be adorned by anything external which assumed novelty every moment and is very difficult to obtain, as it is the permanent absolute abode of glory, beauty, affluence and almightiness.

15. Blessed are the women of Vraja who, in the course of their every day activities like milking the kine, pounding corns etc. churning curds for butter, applying cow-dung to the ground, rocking the cradles, lullabying their babies, cleaning and sweeping the houses, glorify him in songs with their hearts deeply attached to him, with their throat choked with tears and who get whatever they wish with their minds absorbed in Lord Kṛṣṇa (or who carry on all their activities while contemplating on Lord Kṛṣṇa).

16. Inexhaustible must be the fund of merits of those women of Vraja who, coming out on the street quickly on hearing him playing upon the flute, while going out of the Vraja in the morning and returning to Vraja in the evening along with the (herd of) cows, are able to behold his countenance beaming with smiles and radiating grace and compassion.

17. While the women folk were loudly discussing among themselves, the glorious Lord Hari, the Master of Yoga made up his mind to finish with the enemy, Oh Leader of Bharatas!

18.* Hearing the panicky discussion of women (full of apprehension), the parents (Vasudeva and Devaki) who were not aware of the (extraordinary) strength of their children, were overwhelmed with filial love and were agitated at heart (full of repentance for not instructing Akrūra not to bring children to Mathura).

1. ŚR. urukramacittam teṇāva yānaṁ sarva-viśaya-prāptir yāsāṁ tāḥ

* untraced in the text of VJ.
19. Acyuta (Kṛṣṇa) and Cāṇūra fought with each other using diverse manoeuvres in wrestling. In the same manner did Balarāma wrestle with Muṣṭika.

20. It is reported that at every blow and stroke from the Lord’s limbs (such as fisted fore-arms and knees) which were hard like strokes of Vajra (Indra’s thunderbolt), the limbs of Cāṇūra got shattered and he fainted now and then.

21. With the swiftness of a hawk, the enraged Cāṇūra jumped up and clenching both hands into fists, struck the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa (the son of Vasudeva) on the chest.

22-23. The Lord however did not budge an inch under that blow like an elephant when struck with a wreath of flowers), (on the contrary) catching hold of Cāṇūra by both his arms, he whirled Cāṇūra several times so violently as extinguished his life thereby and dashed him on the ground, where he lay stretched with ornaments and garlands scattered and hair dishevelled, like the flagstaff of Indra struck down.

24. Similarly Muṣṭika was violently slapped with his palms by Balarāma who was dealt a blow with his fist by Muṣṭika.

25. Trembling violently (in a swoon) and pressed hard (from within), he vomitted blood profusely through his mouth and fell down dead on the ground, like a tree uprooted by a stormy wind.

26. After this, Balarāma, the past master in boxing (lit. in dealing blows) sportively yet scornfully dealt a blow with his left fist and killed another demon Kūṭa who advanced to fight.

27. At the same time, Śala (who approached Kṛṣṇa to pull his leg) got his head knocked off by Kṛṣṇa’s kick and the head of Tosalaka (who attempted the same simultaneously) had his head split in two (by Kṛṣṇa’s kick) and both of them fell down lifeless on the ground.

28. When Cāṇūra, Muṣṭika, Kūṭa, Śala and Tosalaka were thus killed, the rest of the wrestlers, being anxious to save their own lives, ran away.¹

¹ Out of the various commentaries describing this wrestling, it appears that VB had a better idea of that art.
29. Then Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa dragged forth their cowherd-friends in the arena. And clasping them they sported. While the trumpets were flourishing, their anklets too jingled as (Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) capered and danced.

30. With the exception of Kaṁsa, all spectators were overjoyed at the (athletic) feats of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa. And all good people including prominent Brāhmaṇas cheered them up with the shouts “Bravo! Well-done!”.

31. It is traditionally reported that when the stalwart wrestlers, were killed and the rest took to their heels, Kaṁsa, the king of Bhojas, stopped the blowing of all trumpets and commanded as follows:

32. “Drive out from the city (Mathura) the two ill-behaved sons of Vasudeva. Confiscate the wealth of all Gopas (cowherds). Arrest and bind down the wicked-minded Nanda.

33. As to the evil-minded Vasudeva, the vilest of the vile, let him be put to death immediately along with father Ugrasena and his attendants who have sided with the hostile party.”

34. While Kaṁsa was thus boastfully ordering, the indefatigable Lord Kṛṣṇa flared up in rage and with vehemence he sprang forth with agility to the high dias (occupied by Kaṁsa).

35. Perceiving Kṛṣṇa so approaching him as his veritable Death, the heroic Kaṁsa instantly sprang from his seat and grasped his sword and shield.

36. Like Garuḍa forcibly seizing a serpent, the formidable Lord of irresistible and terrible energy, instantaneously caught hold of Kaṁsa firmly, as he was moving about right and left, like a hawk in the sky.

37. Toppling down his crown and catching Kaṁsa by his hair, the Lord hurled him down from the high dias to the groundfloor of the arena. And on him jumped the absolute willed, (the weighty) support of the (heaviest of the heavy) universe, the veritable Lord Viṣṇu (the lotus-navelled God) himself.

Vṛṣ’s text adds

37A. When Kaṁsa was thus thrown down and crushed by Kṛṣṇa, (the mightily heavy) abode of the three worlds and of absolute will power, Kaṁsa gave up his life in a second (the winking of the eyelid), Oh King.

38. And like unto a lion dragging an elephant, Lord Hari dragged him on the ground though lifeless, even while the world was witnessing it (aghast). Loud shricks, screams and shouts expressing grief and horror burst forth from all the people, Oh King.

39. With a mind agitated with fright, he always visualized in front of him the Lord armed with a discus even while he was drinking, speaking, wandering, sleeping (nay even) breathing. Hence after death, he attained (identity with) that very form which is so very difficult (for others) to attain.

40. Kaṁka, Nyagrodhaka, and other eight younger brothers of Kaṁsa became enraged and attacked him with a view to repay the moral debt of their brother by avenging his death.

41. With the tusk of the elephant as a club (parigha) Balarāma, the son of Rohiṇī, struck down and finished all those who rushed fully prepared and with vehement impetuosity, as a lion kills beasts.

42. Kettle-drums were sounded in the heavens. Great divinities like Brahmā, Śiva and others were highly delighted and sang songs of glory, while showering flowers on him. And celestial women danced.

43. The widowed women, however, who were deeply grieved at the death of their husbands and friends came there beating their heads and eyes overflowing with tears, Oh great king.

44. Embracing their husbands lying dead on the ground the grieving ladies lamented loudly, shedding frequently profuse tears.

45. (They bewailed: "Ah! My Lord! My beloved, knower of dharma! Oh merciful Lord! Oh affectionate darling! By your death we, along with your home and progeny are as good as killed.

46. Oh foremost among men! Bereaved of you the protector, the city of Mathura does not appear beautiful as it is bereft of joyousness, festivals and auspiciousness.
47. Oh Lord! You perpetrated utmost cruelty and harshness towards the innocents. Hence, you have been brought to such a plight. What oppressors of living beings can get happiness?

48. For, this Kṛṣṇa is verily the beginning (creator), end (destroyer) and the protector of all beings. He who is insubordinate to him shall never get any happiness.”

Śrī Śuka said:

49. Having consoled the ladies of the royal family, the glorious Lord who is the protector of the world, caused what is known as the formal obsequies and funeral rites of those who were killed.

50. Thereupon, Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma secured the release of their father and mother from their chains and touching their feet with their heads, paid respects to them.

51. Realizing that their sons who were bowing down are verily the Lords of the world, Devakī and Vasudeva being afraid (of a possible offence to them) did not embrace them.

CHAPTER FORTYFIVE

Restoration of Preceptor Sāndipani’s son

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. Noticing that his parents, Vasudeva and Devakī, had realized the truth (of their Divine Nature) prematurely (before enjoying the filial bliss in loving them as their children), the Supreme Person, Kṛṣṇa, cast over them his divine Māyā (the spell of his deluding faculty) which infatuates the world, so that this realization (of his God-hood) should not continue (as it would not give scope to their parental love and affect their affectionate filial behaviour).

2. Kṛṣṇa, the bull (prominent person) among the Sātvatas, approached along with his elder brother to his parents.
He bowed down with great modesty, and respectfully addressed them: "Oh Mother" and "Oh father."

3. "Father! Though both of you have been all along longing earnestly for it, we could not, at any time, give you the pleasure of witnessing the infancy, childhood and boyhood of your sons.

4. Unfortunate as we are, we had not the good luck of staying near you nor could we enjoy the bliss of being caressed by parents which children dwelling in their parent's home experience.

5. It is not possible for a mortal being, even within the full span of human life of hundred years, to repay the obligations of parents who brought forth and nourished his body whereby all the four objects in life (like dharma, artha etc.) are achieved.

6. If he (the son) be (physically and financially) competent but does not maintain them by rendering personal service or financial help, he is made to eat his own flesh (in hell) after his death, by servants of Yama.

7. He who, in spite of his competence (to support) his old mother, father, chaste wife and infant son, his preceptor, (learned) Brāhmaṇa and one seeking his resort, is as good as dead though breathing.

8. With our minds ever in terror of Kṛṣṇa and due to our inability to worship you both, all these days have been sheerly wasted away.

9. It behoves you, Oh father and mother, to forgive us, since we were dependants and unable to render service to you, even though you were mercilessly harassed by that wicked-hearted fellow Kṛṣṇa."

Śrī Śuka said:

10. Fascinated by the charming words of Lord Hari who, though the soul of the universe, had assumed a human form through his Māyā Potency, they placed him on their lap, embraced him and felt greatly delighted.

11. Oh King! Bound with ties of (filial) affection, they bathed him profusely with their tears. Being bewildered and with their throats choked with tears and emotions, they could utter nothing.

12. Having thus comforted his parents, Lord Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devaki, (immediately) installed his maternal grandfather as the king of Yadus.

13. He addressed him (Ugrasena): "Oh great king! May Your Majesty be pleased to command us (Yadus) as well as the subjects (of the Śūrasena country). Owing to an imprecation from Yayāti, Yadus are not entitled to occupy a throne."

14. When I attend upon you as your servant, even gods (and other supernatural beings) will submissively offer worship to you. What then to speak of other chiefs of human beings? They will definitely do so.

15-16. Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Creator of the Universe, brought back his kith and kin—Yadus, Vṛṣṇis, Andhakas, Dāśārhas, Kukuras and others, who being overcome with the fear from Kaṁsa, had fled to different directions and had undergone suffering in foreign lands. He consoled them, providing them with sufficient wealth and wherewithals and rehabilitated them in their homes.

17. Protected by the arms of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma and with all their agonies removed by Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, they enjoyed themselves in their homes with all their desire accomplished.

18. (Having the opportunity of) seeing daily the lotus-like countenance of Kṛṣṇa graced with splendour and beauty and beaming with smiles and compassionate looks, all of them were delighted.

19. Even aged persons thereof, who could drink with their eyes the nectarine beauty of his lotus-face, became rejuvenated with abundant strength and energy.

---

1. Despite Yadu's refusal to transfer his youth to his father for enjoying his mother (a serious moral problem), Yadu was given the southern part of his kingdom by his father (vide Supra 9.19.22). ŚR. explains: 'Though you belong to the Yadu clan, you will not incur any sin as you occupy the throne by my command.'
20. Thereupon, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Son of Devakī, and Balarāma approached Nanda, and embracing him, spoke to him as follows, Oh King of kings.

21. "Father! Both of us have been extremely fondled and nourished by you both (Nanda and Yaśodā) who have been highly affectionate to us. Parents cherish more love towards their children than to their own selves.

22. He is the real father and she is the (de facto) mother who nourish and caress like their own sons, other babes who are abandoned by their relatives, due to their incapacity to feed and protect them.

23. Father! Now all of you return to your Vraja. After looking to the welfare and felicity of friends hereof, we shall come to visit you, our kith and kin who due to our separation from them are grieved through their love for us."

24. Having consoled Nanda along with the residents of Vraja in this way, the glorious Immutable Lord (Kṛṣṇa) respectfully worshipped them with garments, ornaments, utensils (of copper, brass etc. as milk-containers) and other gifts.

25. Nanda who was addressed thus (by Kṛṣṇa) was overwhelmed with filial love. With his eyes streaming with tears, he hugged them both and returned to Vraja along with Gopas.

26. Thereafter, Vasudeva, the son of Śūra caused as per Śāstric prescriptions, the ceremony of the investiture of the sacred thread1 (essential for the status of the ‘twice-borns’) (of their sons) by his family priest Garga and other Brāhmaṇas.

27. After adorning the Brāhmaṇas with ornaments, he worshipped them and gave as daksīṇā (fee for performing this ceremony) cows with their calves, decorated with gold chains and other ornaments and covered with silk-cloth.

28. The noble-minded Vasudeva recollected the cows which he donated mentally, according to the constellation that was in ascendance at the time of the birth of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa but (which he could not give, as they) were seized ille-

---

1. As the presence of mother is essential in the sacred thread ceremony, it is obvious that Balarāma’s mother, Rohini was brought from Vraja—VT.
gally and unrighteously by Kāṁsa. And he gave those cows also (which he intended to give).

29. Thereupon, being consecrated (through the investiture of the sacred thread) and attaining the status of the ‘twice-borns’, those two staunch observers of vows adopted the vow of celibacy (lit. vow pertaining to the Gāyatri mantra) from the sage Garga, the family priest of Yadus.

30. Though both of them were the source of all lores, and the omniscient Lords of the worlds, they concealed their unclouded spiritual knowledge which is in-born and not borrowed from others, by behaving like common men.

31. Desirous of having a residence in a preceptor’s house for their education, they approached (and served Sāndipani who was originally a resident of Kāśī1 but was now a citizen of Avantī.

32. The self-controlled brothers formally approached him with due humility and respect, and set a model of faultless behaviour with the teacher, (for others to emulate). Both of them who were respectfully treated, served their teacher with devotion, as if he were a god.

33. Being highly pleased with their pure-hearted devoted services, the eminent Brāhmaṇa teacher, Sāndipani taught them all the Vedas along with their Upaniṣads (the philosophical works) and the accessory branches (viz. Śīkṣā—phonetics, chandas—prosody, Vṛddhakaṇa—grammar, Jyotisa—Astronomy, Kalpa—science of Vedic ritualism and Nirukta—etymology).

34. He taught them Military science (lit. the Veda pertaining to archery) along with the mystic formulae (mantras) of discharging and retracting astras (missiles), dharma-śāstra (Law incorporated into the codes of Manu etc.), Mimāṁsā, Logic and political science along with its six branches2 (viz. techniques regarding peace-treaties, warfare, expedition, encampment, spreading sedition and dis-array among enemies and consolidation of alliance).

---

1. Kāśī—belonging to Kāśyapa gotra.
2. SR. and VJ. quote the following verse enumerating these branches—

   Sandhin ca vigrahah caiva pānām āstanaṁ eva ca /
   dvādhiś-khāvan kṣamsayaṁ ca sañgundh kavayo viduḥ //
35. Those two greatest among the great, who were themselves the progenitors of all lores mastered everything that the teachers uttered but once to them (while teaching), Oh protector of men!

36. Within a period of sixty-four days and nights, those brothers, with controlled minds, mastered as many (i.e. sixty-four\(^1\)) arts and crafts, and persuaded their preceptor to accept whatever he liked as his fee of teaching.

1. ŚR. quotes a work Śaiva tantra enumerating the traditional sixty-four kalás. Ardhamāgadhī Jaina canon enumerates 72 kalás. The resemblance between the two lists is significant from the point of social life in ancient India. Here the list of sixty-four kalás as quoted by ŚR. and explained by VT is given.

37. Noticing their miraculous capacity and greatness and their super human intelligence, the Brāhmaṇa, after consultation with his wife, sought (the restoration to life of) his son who died in the ocean at Prabhāsa (paṭṭaṇa in Saurāṣṭra), as his fee.

38. Complying with his request with the word, “So be it”, those two great heroes (who could single-handedly fight with ten thousand warriors) and were of unlimited prowess, then mounted their chariot, arrived at Prabhāsa and going to the beach thereof, sat there for a moment. Having come to know of the arrival of those divine personages, the god presiding over the ocean, worshipped them with valuable presents.

39. The glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa spoke to him: “Let the son of my preceptor who was swallowed up by you in a big wave, be restored immediately.”

The Presiding Deity of the sea replied:

40-41. “Oh refugent Lord Kṛṣṇa! I have never carried away that son of your preceptor. But there is a formidable demon called Pañcajana who moves through the waters. He is an asura who has assumed the form of a conch. As a matter jñāna (developing colours in precious stones), 41. akara-jñāna (mining and mineralogy), 42. Vṛksāyurveda (botany), 43. meṣa-kukuta-lāvaka-yuddha-vidhi (arranging ram-fights, cock-fights), 44. Śuka-sārikā-pralāpana (teaching parrots, etc. to imitate human speech), 45. utsādanam (Driving out an enemy—by a mantra), 46. Keśamārjana-Kauśala (hair-dressing and cleaning), 47. aksara-muṣṭikā-kathana (reading closed letters and divining what is hidden in fists), 48. mlecchita-kuṭarka-vaikalpa (reading books in foreign or barbaric scripts), 49. desa-bhāṣājñāna (knowledge of languages of the country i.e. Indian languages), 50. Puṣṭa-sakṣikā-nirmitti-jñāna (knowledge of making a cart blossom), 51. yantra-maṭrī-khaṭa-maṭrī (magical formulae—with figures inscribed with letters and amulets to wear), 52. sampātyam (breaking hard substances like diamonds in different shapes), 53. mānasī-kavya-kṛtyā (mind-reading in verse form), 54. abhidhāna-kośa (Lexicography), 55. chandogjñāna (knowledge of prosody), 56. Kriyāvikalpa (multiplying the number of objects by various devices), 57. chaliṭaka-yaga (playing tricks), 58. Vastra-gopana (showing one’s clothes as more superfine), 59. dyūta viśeṣa (expertise in gambling), 60. akṣara-krīḍā (attracting remote objects—telekinesis), 61. Bālakṛṣṭanaka (playing children’s games), 62. Vaindyikī (jugglery and practice kṛṣṭa dharmas), 63. Vaijñayikī (foreknowledge of victory in debate), 64. Vaidallkṛtyā (control of goblins and evil spirits). of fact, the boy has been carried away by him.” Hearing that, the glorious Lord instantly plunged into the water, killed the demon (Pañcajana) but could not trace the child in his bowels.

42-44. Taking the conch which formed his body, he returned to his chariot. He went with Balarāma to Saṁyamanī, the beloved city of Yama, the god of death and blew his conch. Hearing the loud blast of the conch, Yama, the chastiser of all beings, offered them worship on a grand scale and with deep devotion. Bowing down in humility, he submitted to Kṛṣṇa who abides in the hearts of all beings, “Oh Viṣṇu who have assumed a human form out of sport! What can I do for you both?”

The glorious Lord replied:

45. Oh great Ruler! Even if the son of my preceptor is brought here due to the force of his Karma, bring him here in obedience to and under the sanction of my command.

46. The preceptor’s son who, in compliance of his command, was brought back by the god of Death, was restored to their preceptor by those two eminent Yadus who requested him, “Be pleased to ask for any other boon.”

The Preceptor (Sāndīpani) said:

47. Child Kṛṣṇa! The obligations of the preceptors have been richly and properly repaid by you both respectable pupils. What desire of your preceptor can remain unfulfilled?

48. Oh heroes! You return to your homes! May your glory be purifying to the world! May your memory and knowledge of the Vedas remain afresh here and hereafter.

49. Oh child parākṣit! Being thus permitted to return home, both of them returned to their capital in their chariot which had the speed of the wind and the thundering of the cloud.

50. All the subjects who missed Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa for many days, were highly rejoiced to see them both, like persons who have recovered their lost wealth.
CHAPTER FORTYSIX

Uddhava deputed for consoling Nanda

Sri Suka said:

1. Uddhava was the foremost counsellor of the Vṛṣṇis and the utmost beloved friend of Kṛṣṇa. He was a direct disciple of Brhaspati (the preceptor of gods and a founder of the political science) and was most intelligent.

2. On one occasion, holding Uddhava’s hand in his own, Lord Hari, the destroyer of miseries of those who seek asylum in him, spoke to him—his most beloved votary of unflinching devotion.

3. “Oh gentle-natured Uddhava! Please do go to Vraja. Bring felicity to our parents (Nanda and Yaśodā) by communicating my message to them. Please relieve the (mental) agony of separation from me of the Gopīs by conveying my special message to them.

4. They have entirely devoted their heart and soul to me and they regard me as their very life. For my sake they have given up their husbands and sons—nay their bodily requirements as well.

4A. They are united with me in mind regarding me as their beloved-nost, the climax of their love and their Lord. I always support and give happiness to those who renounce all pleasures and interests and means to obtain them here and hereafter, and have over-ruled popular moral conventions for my sake.

5. Myself, the foremost of their beloved objects, being away at a distant place, the women of Gokula always brood over me and being overwhelmed with deep anxiety and grief caused by separation from me, they have become oblivious to everything else, dear friend!

6. It is due to my message assuring them of my return to visit them that the cowherd women whose heart and soul is

1. v.1. nau—of us both—VB.
2. 4-A. Some editions (e.g. Yandé’s Bombay edition) add this line here:
   māmeva dayitam preṣṭham ātmānam manasā gatāḥ absorbed in me are somehow managing to stay alive with great difficulty’.

Śrī Śuka said:

7. Oh king! When thus instructed, Uddhava received with respect and devotion the message of his Lord. Getting into his chariot, he drove fast to Nanda’s Gokula.

8. While the sun was setting and his chariot was obscured with the thick cloud of dust raised by the hoofs of the cattle that were returning home, the blessed Uddhava reached Nanda’s Vraja (and could contact Nanda without Gopīs being aware of his arrival).

9. It (the Gokula) was noisy to the roaring of maddened bulls (in rut) fighting with one another for cows in heat, and by rushing of cows with heavy udders to meet their calves.

10. It appeared beautiful with snow-white calves (briskly) frisking and capering here and there and with the musical notes of flutes and (whistle-like) sounds while milking the cows.

11. The Gokula appeared most resplendent with richly adorned Gopīs and Gopas, the former glorifying in songs the auspicious deeds of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa.

12. It was charming with the habitations of the cow-herds where the sacred fire, the sun-God, guests, cows, Brāhmaṇas, ancestors and gods were being worshipped with flowers, lights and fragrant frank-incense burnt before them (OR and which were beautified by garlands, lamps and burning frank-incense).

13. On all sides, it abounded in groves in full blossom and resounded with the sweet warblings and notes of birds and hummings of bees. It was 1 illuminated with ponds full of lotus-beds teeming with swans and Kāraṇḍavas (a species of ducks).

14. Seeing (and receiving) Uddhava, the belovèd follower of Kṛṣṇa, who had arrived there, Nanda was exceedingly delighted. He embraced him and worshipped him (with due formalities and respect) regarding him to be Vāsudeva (Kṛṣṇa) himself.
15. When he was served with rich dishes and was comfortably resting on a bed, and had been relieved of his fatigue by shampooing and such other services, Nanda enquired of him.

16. “Oh Highly blessed dear Uddhava! Is our friend Vasudeva, the delight (or son) of Śūra happy and doing well, as he is now free (from imprisonment) united with his sons, wives and others and is surrounded by his friends and well-wishers?

17. The wicked Kāṁsa who always hated the righteous and religious-minded Yadus, has fortunately been killed by his own sins along with his followers.

18. Does Kṛṣṇa remember us, his mother Yaśodā, his friends, well-wishers and other Gopas, Vṛsā of which he was the protector, cows, Vṛndāvana and mount Govardhana!

19. Will Kṛṣṇa, the Protector of cows, come at least once, to see his friends, kith and kin (hereof)? Then alone we shall be able to see his charming countenance with a shapely nose, happy smiles and (loving) glances.

20. We have been protected from the forest conflagration, stormy winds and driving showers, the demon in the bullock form (Ariśṭa), the serpent (Kāliya) and from perils and fatal accidents which were difficult to be avoided, by the highly noble-souled Kṛṣṇa.

21. Dear Uddhava! When we remember the heroic exploits of Kṛṣṇa, his sportive glances, his smiles and talks, all our actions become slackened.

22. Even as we see the play-grounds, the river Yamunā, hills, forests and groves adorned with the foot-prints of Kṛṣṇa, our mind becomes absorbed in him.

23. As observed by Garga, I too regard that Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa are the most prominent divinities who have descended on this earth for accomplishing some important mission of gods.

24. Both of them easily killed, as in a sport, Kāṁsa who possessed the strength of ten thousand elephants, the two wrestlers (Cāṇūra and Muṣṭika) and the king of elephants. Kuvalayāpiḍa.
25. Like a king of elephants breaking down a sugarcane, Kṛṣṇa snapped the formidable bow three tālas (i.e. twenty-seven spans) in length. And on one hand, he held up the mount Govardhana for a period of seven days.

26. By him were killed as in a sport demons like Pra-lambha, Dhenuka, Ariṣṭa, Trāṇavarta, Baka and others who have vanquished gods and asuras.”

Śrī Śuka said:

27. Recollecting graphically again and again the sports and exploits of Kṛṣṇa, Nanda whose mind and intellect were deeply attached to Kṛṣṇa lapsed into silence, as he was overwhelmed with extreme longing and (felt choked up) with a flood of affection.

28. While Yaśodā was listening to the description of the exploits of her sons, she shed tears profusely and her breasts overflowed with milk through maternal affection.

29. Noticing such a supreme affection of Nanda and Yaśodā towards Lord Kṛṣṇa, Uddhava spoke with great joy to Nanda.

Uddhava said:

30. “Oh courteous bestower of honours! Both of you are indeed the most praiseworthy among embodied beings in this world, inasmuch as you cherish such a deep love for Nārāyaṇa (Kṛṣṇa) who is the Creator of all beings.

31. For these two—Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa—are the primary (efficient and material) cause of the Universe; they are the Puruṣa (spirit) and Pradhāna (Primordial matter). Permeating all beings, these two Ancient (beginningless) Lords control varieties of consciousness.

32. If at the time of death, a person concentrates his mind in him at least for a moment, he reduces to ashes all his (accumulated) karmas and (realizing the nature of his self) becomes identical with Brahman, (and attaining a form constituted of pure sattva) acquires the refulgence of the Sun, and instantly reaches the highest goal.

1. You gave us the honour of belonging to the fraternity of devotees of the Lord from Nārada down to a resident of Gokula—VT.
33. Both of you cherish utmost devotion unto him (Krṣṇa) who is the veritable Lord Nārāyaṇa himself, the cause (source) of all beings, and who has assumed a human form for some divine purpose. Oh noble-souled Nanda! What meritorious acts are yet to be achieved by you both!

34. At no distant date, the immutable Lord Kṛṣṇa will visit Vraja again. The glorious of the Sātvatas will accomplish whatever delights his parents.

35. Whatever Kṛṣṇa has promised you after slaying Karna, the enemy of Sātvatas, in the arena he will accomplish it for you.

36. Please do not get depressed, Oh highly fortunate ones! You shall see Kṛṣṇa by your side. Just as the fire (latent) exists in fuel, he abides in the hearts of all beings.

37. (Please do not entertain doubt how he will leave his dear parents and come to you). None is extremely beloved of or disliked by him, for he is above attachments. None is superior or inferior or unequal to him as he is the same to all.

38. He has no mother, no father, no wife, no children or other relatives. He has none who is his own or who is his non-self. He has no corporeal form at all.

39. He has no bound of Karma. But out of sport and for the protection of the righteous, he incarnates in good (e.g. Rāma, Kṛṣṇa, bad (Fish, Boar) and mixed (e.g. Man-lion) types of species.)

40. Though this unborn Lord is transcendental to and hence unaffected by gunās, he assumes all the gunās such as the sattva, rajas and tamas. It is out of sportiveness that he creates, maintains and destroys the universe by these means.

41. Just as the whole earth appears rotating to an eye that is rolling, the Soul is regarded as the Agent through the influence of ahamkāra (Ego) while it is actually the mind that is active.

1. Vide Supra 45.23
2. Not traced in VB
3. Incarnates among gods, humans and sub-human beings—VJ.
4. Not traced in VJ.’s Text.
42. This glorious Lord Hari is not merely a son of you both, but is the Sun, Soul, father, mother and the Almighty Ruler of all.

43. Without the presence of and apart from the Lord, there is nothing which is seen or heard of, has happened in the past or present or can happen in future: nothing immobile or mobile, great or small is different from or without the presence of the Lord. For only he is everything and real.

44. In this way, while Nanda and Kṛṣṇa’s follower (Uddhava) were talking, the whole night passed away (without their being aware of it). (At dawn) the cowherd women got up, lighted the lamps, duly worshipped the presiding deities of their home e.g. the threshold, and began to churn their curds.

45. The Gopis appeared splendid with their jewels shining resplendent in the light of lamps, as they pulled to and fro the cords of the churning-rod, with (jingling) rows of bangles on their hands, with their big hips, heavy breasts and pearl necklaces moving (in a rhythmic motion), with their cheeks resplendent with the radiance of the rocking ear-rings (while churning), and with their countenance decked with red saffron.

46. The sound of the singing damsels of Vraja glorifying loudly in songs the deeds of the lotus-eyed God (Kṛṣṇa) mixed with the (gurgling) sound of the churning of the curds, filled the heaven and thereby whatever was inauspicious in all directions was dispelled.

47. When the sun rose, and the Gopis of Vraja saw a gold-plated chariot at the door of Nanda, they enquired whose chariot it was.

48. Has Akrūra, the accomplice of Kaṁsa who carried away lotus-eyed Kṛṣṇa to Mathura and thus accomplished Kaṁsa’s purpose, come again?

49. Is he going to bring about the gratification of his dead master by offering us i.e. our bodies or flesh as pinda (offering to the deceased) to him. While the women were talking thus, Uddhava who had finished his bath and morning (religious) duties, arrived there.
CHAPTER FORTYSEVEN

Uddhava’s Discourse on the Real Nature of the Lord, Return to Mathura

Śrī Śuka said:

1-2. Observing that follower of Kṛṣṇa (viz. Uddhava) with (knee) long arms and eyes like (a pair of fresh-blown) lotuscs clad in yellow (silk) raiment and wearing a garland of lotuses, with a lotus-like cheerful countenance, brightened with ear-rings set with resplendent jewels, all the damsels of Vraja, beaming with broad smiles, became extremely eager and curious to know who was that charming personality with fascinating looks, wearing dress and ornaments like those of Lord Kṛṣṇa, whence he came and his who’s who. They surrounded him who had taken shelter under the lotus-feet of the Lord Kṛṣṇa of hallowing renown.

3. Ascertaining that he was the emissary of the spouse of goddess Lakṣmī (Kṛṣṇa) carrying a message for them, they bowed down to him with modesty. They received him courteously with bashful smiles, glances and sweet words. When he was comfortably seated, they enquired of him in great confidence (privately):

4. “We learn that you are the attendant of Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Yadus, who have arrived here and that your honour has been deputed by the Lord for bringing about the happiness of his parents.

5. Otherwise, we do not see that there is anything worth remembering for him in the Gokula. The ties of affection of relatives and kinsmen are extremely difficult to dissociate even for sages.

6. In the case of others (who are not relatives) the friendship is contracted for achieving a purpose and it lasts till the purpose is accomplished, as in the case of love shown by men to (good-natured, guileless) women or by black bees to flowers.

7. Courtezans abandon a penniless (lover); subjects, an incompetent king; students who have completed the course of Vedic studies, their preceptors and the priests in sacrifice, the sacrificer who has paid their fees for performance of sacrifice.
8. Birds leave off the trees the fruits of which are exhausted; guests, the house after finishing their meals; beasts, a forest that is burnt down; a paramour after enjoying the women though attached to him.’’

9. When Uddhava, the emissary of Kṛṣṇa arrived at Vraja, the Gopīs whose body, mind and speech were completely devoted to Lord Govinda (Kṛṣṇa) disregarded the worldly usages and etiquettes (in behaving with strangers).

9*-A. VJ’s Text differs (vide the footnote).

10. Remembering vividly every now and then the sportsive activities of their Kṛṣṇa during his infancy and childhood, they glorified his deeds in songs and also wept, casting off their sense of bashfulness.

11. A certain Gopī who was musing over her union with Kṛṣṇa, saw a bee about her and imagining that it was the messenger deputed to her by her Beloved Kṛṣṇa, addressed it as follows:

_The Gopi said:_

12. Oh bee! Oh friend of a rogue (Kṛṣṇa, a treacherous paramour)! Don’t touch our feet (and try to win our favour by submissive bows) with your beard-like tentacles

* VJ’s text reads differently:

When Uddhava, the emissary of Kṛṣṇa, arrived at Vraja, he perceived that the Gopī’s thereof had dedicated their mind, body of speech to Govinda so completely that they had lost the sense of worldly manners and etiquettes.

1. SG. and the annotators of Gaudīya school of Vaiṣṇavism assert that this Gopi was Rādhā. SG quotes the Agni P. to support this view but the quotation is untraceable in the Gurumandal Calcutta ed. of the _Agni P_.

 Irrespective of the name of Gopi who sang this ode to the black bee, it is one of the best poetic outburst of a love-lorn heart in Sanskrit literature. Gaudīya Vaiṣṇavas regard this as the expression of “divine ecstasy” in the mahābhāva stage. This expression of intense love is called _Citrajalpa_ and is discussed in their works on rhetoric. As VT. points out, this stage is superior to Mokṣa in blissfulness.

2. VJ. States that this address of a black bee is equally applicable to Uddhava. Thus _Kitava-bandhu_ in v. 12 means ‘A friend or relative of Kṛṣṇa who was a thief (stole butter etc.)

3. _madhupa_—One who has kissed the nectar-like sweet lips—VR.
tinged with the saffron of the wreath (of Kṛṣṇa) that was pressed down upon the (Saffron-painted) breasts of our rival women (of Mathura). Let Kṛṣṇa, the chief of Madhus whose messenger you are, as described above carry with him, the favours of the proud ladies (of Mathura). (Why his attempt to court rustic women like us !) which will become a butt of ridicule in the assembly of Yadus.

13. Being infidel like you who (after sucking the honey) immediately desert the (innocent, good-natured) flower, he made us drink but once the seductive, enchanting nectar of his lips. He instantly abandoned us. Alas ! What a pity ? How is it that the (notoriously fickle) goddess of wealth continues to serve his lotus feet (I presume that) her mind must have been transported by the fascinating talk of Kṛṣṇa of hallowed renown.

14. (Thinking that it is to gain her favour that the black-bee is humming a song of Kṛṣṇa's glory, she retorts).

Oh six-legged one ! Why are you singing here, in such details, in front of us, homeless forest-dwellers, the glory of the Ancient-most person Kṛṣṇa the Lord of Yadus. (It is already too well known to us). Go hence. Let all his episodes be glorified in song in the presence of the female friends of Kṛṣṇa (the friend of Arjuna). Those lady-loves of Kṛṣṇa the agonies of whose breasts (and heart) are soothed by his embrace and other erotic acts will bestow on you your desired object.

15. Are there any women on the earth, in the celestial region or in the nether-world who are difficult to be won over by him with his alluring crafty sweet smile and the tempting dancing of his eyebrows ? What are we after all to him, the

1. Śaḍaṅghri—Oh Uddhava you have mastered six dāsanās, you attend to sixfold duties, you have trampled underfoot the six objects of enjoyment which obstruct the path of devotion.—VJ.

2. Purāṇa—

(i) purā pūrva eka nam nivṛtī-rāpam sukha-rāpam . . sāṃpratan duḥkha-karam / which formerly gave pleasure to us but now brings grief—SG.

(ii) pūre vartamānam 'Kṛṣṇa who is staying in the town'—VJ.
dust on whose feet is adored by goddess Lakṣmī? However (go and convey my message to him) that the epithet uttamaśloka (one of the most glorious renown) befits him who is on the side of the helpless and forlorn people like us.

16. (The black bee approached her feet as if to beg pardon). Get away. Take away your head from my feet. I know you thoroughly. Being an emissary of Mukunda (an expert in fraudulent courting) you are trained in the fine art of conciliation and winsomeness by means of sweet words. It is here at Vraja that he (ungratefully) deserted us who have abandoned our husbands, children, prospects of happiness in the next world (by conforming to social morality) for his sake. Inconstant at heart as he is, what is there to be gained by such reconciliation?

17. (In his previous incarnation as Dāśarathī Rāma) Cruelhearted by nature, like a hunter (desirous of eating the flesh of his kill), he (surreptitiously) hit with an arrow Vāli, the king of monkeys. Being dominated by one woman (his consort Sitā), he deformed another woman (Śūrpaṇakhā) who approached him with amorous purpose. Like a crow eating up bali (boiled rice etc. offered in bhūta-yajña), he (as Vāmana) ate up (accepted the worship offered by) King Bali and (un-gratefully) bound him down (and threw him in a cave in the subterranean world.) Now enough of any friendship with that person of black complexion (Kṛṣṇa). But the wealth of his episodes is too (precious and sweet) to forgo.

1. caraṇa raja...ka: We are however not among the gullible women who fall a victim to his temptations. The term uttama-śloka is applicable to the partisans of the helpless—VR.

(ii) We are after-all forest dwellers. We only hear that the term uttama-śloka is used for one who espouses the cause of the indigent and the helpless but that is not our experience (for he has no interest in us). V.J.

SG. is interesting. The gist is as follows:

Only low women (kāh striyaḥ) or all women fall a victim to him by his craftiness in enticing women. Goddess Lakṣmī may be worshipping the dust on his feet but none of us will stoop so low. Only a person of glorious renown deserves singing which he is not. Or He has become so closefisted (and hard-hearted) that he does not see us. (This is of course ironical).
I8* In this world, many persons who have but once enjoyed a particle of his delightful sportive deeds which are (sweet as) nectar to the ears, have shaken themselves free from conflicting pairs of qualities (like love and hate, pleasure and pain). Reducing themselves to non-entities\(^3\), they have at once forsaken their homes and members of their families in a bereaved state, and have adopted the ascetic way of life like that of birds (i.e. the way of life of hamsa ascetics) and practice control of sense-organs\(^2\).

19. Oh messenger of Krṣṇa! Let other topics be discussed. For, like female deer, the gullible female mates of black-antelopes, which (mistakenly) believe in the enticing musical notes of the hunter (and get into a trap or are hit with an arrow), we innocent maid-servants of Krṣṇa trusted in his crafty professions of love as genuine, and have many times\(^3\) seen and suffered from the acute pangs of love created by his amorous touch of nails.

20. Oh friend of our Darling Lord! Are you redeputed by our Beloved that you have come again? You are an honourable guest. Dear black-bee! Please seek whatever you would like to have from me. Oh gentle-natured bee! As his consort Lakṣmī is always by his side and has a place on his bosom, how are you going to take up from here to the side of the Lord, separation from whom is very painful and difficult.

21. Oh gentle black-bee! Is the son of our Gopa-chief (i.e. Nanda,) now at Mathurā back from his preceptor’s house? Does he remember his father’s house (i.e. his parents Nanda and Yaśodā)? Does he ever refer to us his maid-servants, in his talk? Would that (he return to Gokula and) place his arm fragrant with the (pigment of) aguru—sandal on the crown of my head (to soothe me)"

---

* The SK wording of the text appears apparently a censure but it is a praise of the Lord in the deeper sense.

1. Go away out of sight like birds—SG.

2. bhāvasevaṁ : Just as birds fly through the support of the sky, the ascetics do so through the support of Lord Hari. These ascetics maintain their body for the Spiritual Knowledge.
   *bhikṣu-caryam : indriya-grāma-nigrāham/ —SG.

3. Female deer suffer but once when hit by an arrow, but our sufferings are life-long.
Śrī Śuka said:

22. Having heard this (expression of ardent love for Kṛṣṇa, Uddhava consoled those Gopīs who were eagerly desirous of seeing Kṛṣṇa, with the messages of their Darling and addressed them as follows:

Uddhava said:

23. Oh Gopīs! You have completely achieved all the objects in human life (e.g. dharma, artha, kāma, mokṣa) and are adored and praised by the world, inasmuch as your hearts are dedicated to the glorious Lord Vāsudeva.

24. Devotion unto Kṛṣṇa is engendered by charitable gifts, observance of vows, austerities, performance of homa (sacrifice) muttering of a mantra or God’s name, Vedic (scriptural) studies, self-control and such other meritorious acts.

25. It is fortunate of you that you, respectable ladies, have established such an unsurpassably supreme (standard of) devotion into the glorious Lord of hallowing renown as is extremely difficult even for sages.

26. You deserve congratulations as you have renounced (attachment to) your sons, husbands, your own persons, kith and kin as well as your homes, and have sought after the Supreme person Kṛṣṇa.

27. Oh highly blessed Gopīs! Due to your separation from the Lord, you have accomplished an unflinching, absolute devotion unto Lord Adhokṣajā (Kṛṣṇa). You have certainly rendered a great favour unto me by giving me a glimpse of your ardent devotion to the Lord.

28. Let the message of your dear Lord which will bring delight to you be heard (alternatively). It is to convey this message that I, as a confidant of the Lord, have come here.

The Glorious Lord said:

29. As I pervade all as their Inner Soul, there cannot be any separation between you and me. Just as the five elements—the ether, air, fire, water and earth—are found in all beings, similarly, I abide (as the support) in the mind, vital breath, elements, conative and cognitive senses and qualities.

\[1. \text{v.l., bhaktir na sādhvita 'Is not engendered'—VR.}\]

30. By the force of my Māyā Potency and in association with bhūtas (elements), the senses and the guṇas, I create myself (in various forms) within myself, protect them, and destroy them.

31. The Self (ātman) is absolutely pure, distinct, untainted and unconcerned with guṇas, an embodiment of consciousness and knowledge. He appears (as Viṣṇu, Taijasa and Prājña) in the states of sleep, dream and wakefulness through mental states (and not directly) which are the creations of Māyā.

32.* Ever alert and vigilant, a person should try to control that mind with which he broods over the objects of senses which are unreal like the objects seen in a dream, and runs after the senses (sense-object) even during wakefulness.

33. According to the opinion of the spiritually wise, the study of the Vedas, the Yoga (with its eightfold path), the Sāṅkhya teaching (discriminating between the soul and the non-soul), renunciation (saṃnyāsa),—austerities, control (over the senses), truthfulness—all these have mind-control as their goal, even as all the rivers terminate in the ocean.

34. It is with a view to attract your mind constantly to me while you eagerly meditate upon me, (and thus to secure our mental nearness) that I, though your beloved, am staying far away beyond the ken of your eyes.

35. The mind of women is not so much ardently drawn to and absorbed in their beloved while he lives near, just before their eyes, as and when he is staying far away.

36. As you have completely dedicated your entire heart resigning all its activities to me, and are constantly contemplating on me, you will attain me within a short time.

37. Those ladies who being detained at Vraja (by their husbands etc.) could not participate in the Rāsa in the forest, have attained to me by contemplating on my exploits, Oh blessed ladies*.

* Not traced in VJ.
Sri Suka said:

38. Having heard the message of their most beloved Lord, the damsels of Vraja whose recollections of Lord Kṛṣṇa were revived by it, became highly delighted and spoke to Uddhava.

The Gopīs said:

39. Luckily the tyrant Kaṁsa, the deadly enemy and persecutor of Yadus is killed along with his followers. It is a matter of good fortune that the immortal Lord (Kṛṣṇa) is living happily with his relatives who have obtained all their objects (through his grace).

40. (Some asked): Does Kṛṣṇa, the elder brother of Gada who was adored by us with affectionate, bashful smiles and loving glances, impart the same delight to the women of the city (Mathura), Oh gentle Uddhava?

41. (Others asked): Highly expert in erotics and beloved of excellent women as he is, how can he fail to (be won over) and bound down by their love when he is greeted with words (expressing love) and amorous gestures by them.

42. (Someone asked): Does the Lord of cows (or of Gokula) ever remember us, the rustic women, causally, in some context in the assembly of the urban women of Mathura, during his free talk of his past life, Oh pious one!

43. (Others asked): Does he ever remember those nights (at Vraja) when in Vṛndāvana grove lovely with blooming lilies and jasmine and resplendent with the full moon, he sported with us, his beloveds, and when in the ring of the Rāsa dance resonant with the jingling of anklets his charming stories were sung by us?

44. (Some asked): Will Kṛṣṇa, the descendent of Daśārha ever come here to enliven us who are tormented with grief on account of separation from him, by the life-giving touch of his limbs, like Indra refreshing woods (scorched with heat of summer) with rain-clouds.

45. (Others exclaimed): Why should Kṛṣṇa (bother to) come here at all when he has obtained a kingdom, slain

1. The adj. implies that Uddhava being pious must tell the truth.

—ŚG
all the enemies, will have married a number of princesses and is living happily in the company of his friends.

46. (Others gave out the fact of the matter)

What purpose of the Supreme Soul, the Consort of Lakṣmī (Kṛṣṇa) be served by us, the forest-dwellers or by others (princesses), when he himself has all his desires accomplished and is perfect (within himself).

47. Even the public woman Piṅgalā¹ has observed that desirelessness is the real happiness. Knowing that as we do, our longing and hope to meet Kṛṣṇa is difficult to overcome.

48. Who could detach one’s mind from the secret talks one had with the Lord of hallowing renown from whose person Śri seldom dissociates herself, even though he does not long for her?

49-50. What a pity! The river Yamunā, the mount Govardhana, the woodlands of Vṛndāvana, the cows, the musical notes of flutes—all associated with Kṛṣṇa with Balarāma as his companion—poignantly remind us again and again of Kṛṣṇa, the son of the Gopa Nanda, through his foot-prints which are the asylum of the goddess Lakṣmī. Alas! It is simply impossible to forget him, Oh Uddhava.

51. Our hearts have been fascinated and spirited away with his seductive gait, enchanting laughter, sportive glances, and honeyed words. How can we forget him, Oh Uddhava?

52. Oh Lord! Oh Consort of goddess Lakṣmī! Oh Lord of Vraja who destroyed our afflictions! Oh Lord of cows! Be pleased to lift up Gokula that is submerged in the sea of grief.

Śrī Śuka said:

53. Thereupon, the Gopīs whose agonies of separation from Kṛṣṇa, were removed by the message of Kṛṣṇa, realized that Kṛṣṇa the Supra-sensuous Lord was within

---
¹ Piṅgalā—Name of a prostitute in Mithilā. Once she was disappointed as none came to her in spite of her waiting, she realized the bliss of transcending desires and hopes. Avadhūta regarded her as his preceptor vide, infra 11.7.34, 11.8. 22-44.
them—nay was identical with them—and they worshipped Uddhava with due respects.¹

54. Uddhava stayed there for some months alleviating the grief of those cowherd women. He brought delight to the settlement of those cowherds (Gokula) by glorifying in songs the delightful stories of Lord Kṛṣṇa’s sportive activities.

55. For as many days, Uddhava stayed at Nanda’s Vraja, (they were so absorbed) in talking about Kṛṣṇa, those days of the residents of Vraja flitted away as if they were so many moments only.

56. Observing devoutly the river Yamunā, Vṛndāvana, mount Govardhana, the valleys and the blossoming trees, (where Kṛṣṇa roamed and sported and) which reminded the people of Vraja of Kṛṣṇa (causing thereby a longing to see him) that Servant of Hari spent that time in joyfulness.

57. Uddhava was highly pleased to notice the intense mental anguish of the Gopis (as described above²) caused by their (longing for and) absorption of their minds in Kṛṣṇa, Uddhava paid his respects to them and (in justification of the bowing down to Gopa women by a Kṣattriya like himself and sang (of their glory) as follows:

58. “Only these Gopa women have really vindicated their worthiness of possessing a human body (life as a human being) since their heart is steeped in Supreme Love (and devotion) to Lord Kṛṣṇa, the protector of cows—a stage which those who are scared of samsāra (and aspire after liberation from it i.e. mumukṣus), the sages (who are muktas i.e. freed from the bondages of samsāra) and we (the devotees of the Lord) aspire. To a person interested in the stories of the Infinite Lord, what importance is there to the kinds of birth as a Brāhmaṇa (viz. physical heredity from Brāhmaṇa parents, ceremonial birth by means of investiture with the sacred thread and initiation in the sacred Gāyatrī mantra and ritualistic birth with consecration for sacrificial performance)\(^1\) OR, Of what use is the repeated birth as four-faced god Brahmā if one has no fascination or liking for the stories of the Infinite Lord\(^2\).

¹ They worshipped Uddhava regarding him as if he was Lord Kṛṣṇa himself.—VJ.
² vide Supra vv 4-21 and vv 39-52

59. What a contrast is this! (On the one hand) these rustic forest-dwelling women condemned for adultery\(^9\) (in the eyes of the public as they abandoned their husbands and offered themselves to Lord Kṛṣṇa) and their deeprooted intense absolute devotion to Lord Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Soul, on the other. Certainly, the Almighty Lord himself bestows the highest beatitude upon his devotees who, even though ignorant, always remember him and resort to him, just as nectar, the king of medicines when used (unknowingly by an ailing patient, cures him).

60. Oh! How covetable was the blissful Grace that was showered on the cowherd women of Vraja at the time of Rāsa dance when all their cravings and longings for getting themselves embraced by the mighty arm of the Lord were amply satisfied—A grace never enjoyed even by goddess Śrī who is always closely associated with his person, nor by the celestial damsels whose fragrance and splendour of complexion is like lotuses—What need be said of others? (Much less can others expect it).

61. How strongly I desire to be one of these shrubs, creepers, plants or herbs of Vṛndāvana which have the good luck to come in contact with the dust on the feet of these cowherd women who forsook their relatives so difficult to abandon, and the traditional path followed by the noble and the good (which is equally difficult for chaste women to give up) and took to the path of devotion that leads to Lord Kṛṣṇa who is sought after by the Vedas.

1. This explanation is based on the 1st way dissolving the compound in the text:
   \(\text{ananta-kathā-rasa} = \text{Ananta+kathā+rasa}.\)

2. This will be the interpretation if the compound in text mentioned above is dissolved as \(\text{Ananta+kathā+a-rasa}—\text{ŚR}.\)

3. SG. regards this as a comparison between Gopīs and Uddhava who call themselves: \(\text{vayam vyabhicāra-duṣṭāḥ—we who are averse to pious deeds.} \)
62. The Gopis dispelled all the agonies of their heart by embracing Lord Krṣṇa's lotus-feet placed on their bosoms during Rāsa dance—the lotus-feet of the Lord which are adored by the goddess Śrī, god Brahmā and others who have accomplished all their desires, and by masters of yoga in their hearts.

63. I bow down again and again the dust under the feet of the damsels of Nanda's Vraja, whose loud singing of the stories of Lord Hari sanctifies the three worlds.

Śrī Śuka said:

64. Then, after taking leave of the Gopīs, Yasodā and Nanda and bidding good-bye to Gopas, Uddhava, the scion of Daśārha, became ready to depart (on his return journey) and mounted his chariot.

65. When he just got out of his house, Nanda and others brought in their hands different presents (presumably for Krṣṇa and Balarāma) and with eyes dimmed with tears of love, spoke to him affectionately as follows:

66. "May all our mental activities be concentrated on the lotus-feet of Lord Krṣṇa. May our speech (oral activities) be ever engaged in uttering the name of the Lord and may our body (physical activities) be engaged in bowing to him (and doing such worshipful services).

67. Wandering whithersoever (or in whatever species of birth) we be, as a result of our karman (actions) or by the will of the Almighty Lord, may our love be constant in the Supreme Lord Krṣṇa in consequence of our auspicious deeds and charitable gifts (performed by us in our past lives)."

68. Thus honoured by the cowherds through their devotion to Krṣṇa, Uddhava returned to Mathura protected by Krṣṇa, Oh King Parikṣit.

69. Lying prostrate before Krṣṇa, he reported to Krṣṇa the effusion of intense devotion of the people of Vraja (unto him), and handed over the presents (sent by the cowherds) to Vasudeva, Balarāma and King Ugrasena.
CHAPTER FORTY-EIGHT

Visit to the Houses of Trivakrä and Akrūra

Śri Suka said:

1. Now knowing the earnest desire of the maid-servant Trivakrä who was pining with passionate love for him, the Almighty Lord, the In-dwelling soul of all, who is omniscient, went to her house with an intention to gratify her cherished desire.

2. The house was equipped with highly costly articles of furniture; was enriched with means of stimulating erotic passions, was decorated with garlands of pearls, flags, canopies, beds, seats, was perfumed with fragrant incenses, lights (emitting sweet scent), wreaths of flowers and perfumes.

Texts of VR and SD add:

2A. (It was beautified with beautiful paintings in various colours pertaining (or designed according) to kāmaśāstra (science of Erotics).

3. Beholding that he was coming, she (Tri-vakrā) in a flurry, quickly rose from her seat, went forward along with her female companions to pay him due respect, and warmly received him by offering a high, comfortable seat and other articles of worship.

4. Uddhava also was similarly received as a pious person, but he touched with his hand (to pay respects to) the seat offered to him, and sat on the floor. (To carry out his part as a man) Kṛṣṇa also, following the practice of the world, (got up from his seat and of his own accord quickly entered the bed-room furnished with costly bed.

5. Embellishing herself after bath, with cosmetics, fine clothes, ornaments, garlands of flowers, scents, betel-leaves chewing, nectarlike drinks and the like, she approached Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of goddess Lakṣmī—ogling him with amorous glances and bashful sportive smiles.

6. He called to his side that beautiful woman who was a bit nervous and hesitant through bashfulness, as it was their first meeting. He took her by the hand that was adorned with bracelets and made her sit on the bed. He gave that charming lady her desired pleasure for the slight act of merit she had done, by offering him the pigment (at his request, while going to Kamśa for service).

7. Enjoying the fragrance of his feet, swept off the agonies in her breast and bosom specially tormented by love-fever, and those of her eyes as well, by (the soothing touch of) his feet. She clasped in her arms her beloved Kṛṣṇa, the embodiment of bliss who was now on her bosom and thus got rid of the suffering of separation she had gone through, for a long time.

8. Alas! Having thus obtained in return for the offer of pigment the presence of the Lord of the Absolute state (who confers Final Beatitude), the Supreme Ruler of the Universe so difficult to attain, the unfortunate woman begged of him the following.

9. She said, "Oh beloved-most Lord! Be pleased to stay with me for some days here in my house and give me the pleasure of your company. Oh lotus-eyed god! I cannot forgo your company."

10. Having conferred upon her the boon as per her desire and having honoured her (with presents), the Lord of all the universe who respects others, returned with Uddhava to his (Vasudeva’s) splendid palace.

11. Having propitiated the All-pervading Lord Viṣṇu, the Supreme Ruler of all rulers of the universe (like god Brahmā) who is so very difficult to be pleased, a person who seeks what is agreeable to the mind (viz. the pleasures of the sense) is certainly a man of perverted intelligence inasmuch as the so-called pleasures are trivial (and not worth craving).

12. With a desire to do a good turn to Akrūra in his interest and with the intention of sending him on some errand, Lord Kṛṣṇa accompanied by Balarāma and Uddhava went to the house of Akrūra.

13. Seeing from a distance that those greatest among foremost of men who were his own relations, were coming, he was overjoyed. He rose from his seat and went forward to receive them. He embraced them and honoured them.
14.* He bowed down to Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma (as he knew their divine nature, though they were his juniors in age) and was reciprocally respected by them. When they were comfortably seated, he worshipped them with due formalities

15-16. He washed their feet and sprinkled over his head that water (with which he washed them). He received them respectfully by presenting articles of worship such as rich clothes, excellent perfumes, wreathes of flowers and ornaments. He bowed them bending down his head and kneaded their feet after taking them in his lap. Modest and devoted as he was, Akrūra submitted Lord Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma as follows:

17. "How fortunate it is that the wicked Kaṁsa along with his followers has been killed by you both and this clan of yours has been not only rescued from the (seemingly) unending harassment and difficulties but is made prosperous as well.

18. Both of you constitute Pradhāna (Primordial matter) and Puruṣa (the self, in Sāṅkhya terminology). Both of you constitute (the material and efficient) causes of universe and are inherent in it. Without you neither cause nor effect can exist.

19. Oh Lord Kṛṣṇa who is the Supreme Brahman Itself! Having evolved the universe through your potencies (such as rajas and others) you have entered into it (as its Indwelling Soul or Inner Controller) ! you appear as many in various innumerable forms which are within the ken of sight and hearing.

20. Just as the constituent elements like earth, water, fire etc exhibit themselves in various forms of beings mobile and immobile as through various species of creatures, so your honour who is the one, absolute, self-dependent Supreme self, manifest yourself in innumerable forms (in various species such as human beings, beasts etc. and in various stages of life such as child, youth etc. which are but your creations (and thus appear as many).

21. Through your potencies in the form of guṇas viz. rajas, sattva and tamas, you evolve, protect and dissolve the universe. But you are not bound or affected either by the guṇas or by the actions. Essentially constituted of pure knowledge and consciousness as you are, nothing could work as a limiting condition on you.

* Not traced in VJ.'s text.

22. As physical body and other limiting conditions (which are supposed to subject the soul to limitations and bondage) are not observed predicable in your case, no birth or difference can be predicated of the soul in reality (much less so in the case of the Supreme Soul viz. your honour). There is no bondage or Liberation (mokṣa) therefrom for you. It is our lack of discrimination and ignorance which project these on you.

23. Whenever this ancient path (of religion prescribed in the Vedas promulgated by you for the good of the world is threatened with obstruction by the false heterodox creeds, your honour assumes a form (constituted) of pure, unalloyed sattva guṇa (for the re-establishment of the original Vedic path).

24. You are that Supreme Lord, now incarnated in the house of Vasudeva along with Balarāma, your partmanifestation, with the mission of removing the burden of the earth by slaying one hundred aksauhiniṣ of kings born with non-celestial i.e. demonic asura amṛta and also to enhance the glory of your (Yadu) race.

25. Oh Supreme Ruler ! Today our homes have been rendered highly blessed and fortunate indeed inasmuch as they are visited by you who are the creator and the preceptor of the world, the very embodiment of all gods, ancestors, beings and the kings and the water washing whose feet (viz. the river Ganga) hallows the three worlds. Oh Supra-sensuous Lord !

26. What learned person would seek resort to any person other than you who are so beloved of your devotees, true of word, friendly and grateful and who bestow on all his votaries and friends who resort to you, their desired objects—nay his own self which is above decay or growth.

27. Oh Janārdana ! Luckily you, access to whom is very difficult even to the great masters of Yoga as well to the lords of gods, have become manifest to us. Be pleased to cut off cords your Māyā quickly (and immediately) regarding sons, wives, money, relatives and of our very body.
Śrī Sūka said:

28. The glorious Lord Hari who was worshipped and glorified by his votary Akrūra, spoke to him smilingly, and addressed to Akrūra hypnotising him as it were with his sweet and pleasant words.

The Lord said:

29. “You are our elderly relative (or preceptor), uncle. You are our ever praiseworthy relative. We are after all your children who are to be protected, nourished and looked after with compassion.

30. Highly blessed and most adorable persons like your honour should always be waited upon by persons desirous of achieving their summum bonum. For gods are always intent on achieving their own purpose (and are selfish), but saintly persons are never so selfish at all. (They oblige you without any expectation in return while gods won’t grant you anything unless they are pleased by the offer of oblations in the sacrifice etc. Hence saints are greater than gods).

31* Not that the holy places (tīrthas) consisting of water and gods represented in earth and stone images do not purify but they do so after a pretty long time, while saintly persons sanctify one immediately at the first sight.

32. You are verily the worthiest of our friends. With the object of doing some good to pāṇḍavas and making enquiries (probing the real state of affairs) about them, please do go to Hastinapura.

33. We have heard that after the death of their father those grieving children along with their grief-striken mother were brought by the king Dhṛtarāṣṭra to his capital and they stay there.

34. It is certain that king Dhṛtarāṣṭra, the son of Ambikā who is both blind and of poor intellect, is under the control of his wicked son and does not treat them impartially.

* The term Tīrtha does not connote a storage of water but it is the deity presiding over them that is implied. The same is the case with images of gods made of earth or stone. But these deities have to be served for a long time to please them. But not so the saints—VJ.
35. Do go now and ascertain his present behaviour (with them) whether it be good or otherwise. After knowing the facts correctly we shall so manage (the situation) as will be conducive to the welfare and happiness of our friends."

36. Having briefed Akrūra (regarding his mission to Hastinapura) the glorious Almighty Lord Hari straightway returned to his palace along with Balarāma and Uddhava.

CHAPTER FORTYNINE

Akrūra’s Mission to Hastinapura

Sūr Sūka said:

1-2. Having arrived at Hastinapura, the noted capital of the great and glorious kings of the Puru dynasty, he saw there Dhṛtarāṣṭra, the son of Ambikā along with Bhīśma, Vidura, Kunti: Bāhlika along with his son Somadatta, Droṇa, the descendant of Bhāradvāja along with Kṛṣṇa of the Gautama family, Karna, Suryodhana (i.e. Duryodhana), Aśvatthāman, the son of Droṇa, Pāṇḍavas and other friends thereof.

3. Having met his relatives in the appropriate manner (to establish closer contacts), Akrūra, the son of Gāndinī, was respectfully enquired about by them about their friends (at Mathura) and he also reciprocally asked them about their well being.

4. With a view to probe and know in depth the behaviour of the king whose sons were wicked and who was himself feeble-minded, and who was guided by the will of the wicked (like Śakuni), Akrūra stayed there many months.

5-6. Prthū (Kunti) and Vidura completely reported to him all the wicked acts such as administering poison (to Bhīma) and others by Dhṛtarāṣṭra’s sons who could not tolerate and felt jealous of Pāṇḍavas’ majesty, prowess, physical strength, heroism, modesty and other excellent virtues as well as the love and loyalty the subjects had for them; they also told him what they intended to do (to harm Pāṇḍavas).
7. Approaching her brother (cousin) Akrūra who came to visit her, Kunti (Pṛthā) remembered her birth-place and with her eyes full of tears enquired:

8. "Oh gentle Akrūra! Do my parents (Śūrasena and Māriśā), brothers (Vasudeva and others), sisters (Śrūta-devā etc.), nephews (Krṣṇa, Balarāma and others), respectable ladies in the house (like Devakī and others) and female friends remember me?

9. Does my nephew, the glorious Lord Krṣṇa, the protector of his dependants and affectionate to his votaries, and the lotus-eyed Balarāma ever remember the sons of their paternal aunt?

10. Would Krṣṇa care to comfort with words of consolation me who am grieving here in the midst of enemies like a female deer in the midst of wolves. Would he do so to my children who are now fatherless.

11. Oh Krṣṇa! Krṣṇa! Oh great yogin! Oh Soul of the Universe! Oh Creator of the world! Be kind and protect me who have sought Your protection, Oh Govinda, I am suffering along with my children.

12. To persons who are afraid of death and of the cycle of births (sāṁsāra), I do not see any other refuge except the lotus feet of yours—of the Supreme which confer Liberation from sāṁsāra.

13. Bow to Krṣṇa, the pure Brahman (unalloyed with Māyā), the Supreme Soul, the Lord of Yogas, the very embodiment of yoga! I have sought asylum in you."

Śrī Śuka said:

14. In this way, remembering her relatives, and Krṣṇa, the Ruler of the world, your paternal great-grand mother lamented loudly, in grief.

15. Akrūra who looked upon pleasure and pain with equanimity and Vidura of great glory, consoled Kunti by telling her the divine parentage of her sons (and their mission to help Krṣṇa in the reduction of the burden of the earth).

16. When he was about to return to Mathura, Akrūra approached King Dhṛtarāṣṭra who practised discrimination between his sons and Pāṇḍavas and was specially partial and attached to his sons. He communicated to the king in the midst of his relatives, the message of his well-intentioned relations such as Kṛṣṇa and others.

_Akrūra said:_

17. Oh son of Vicitravirya! You are the enhancer of the glory of the Kuru race! But after the demise of your brother Pāṇḍu, you have now occupied the throne (in stead of installing Pāṇḍu’s son—the legal heir—on the throne).

18. By governing the earth with piety (and as per code of righteous government), pleasing your subjects by your (spotless) character and behaving with strict impartiality with your relatives, you can still attain prosperity and good reputation.

19. If you act otherwise, you will be censured in this world and shall go to dark hell hereafter. You, therefore, treat impartially your sons and the Pāṇḍavas.

20. There is no possibility of having eternal companionship with anybody at any time in this world—not even with one’s body. What need be said of contacts with one’s wife and sons, Oh King.

21. A creature comes into being alone and it dies alone, all by itself. It is all alone when it experiences the fruits of good deeds or suffers the consequences of his evil actions.

22. Others who go under the name of sons (_lit._ one deserving nourishment) carry away the wealth accumulated by unfair means of this dull-witted fellow, as the brood of aquatic animals share waters.

23. A foolish person who unrighteously nourishes life, wealth, sons and others under the wrong notion that they are his own, finds himself deserted by them, for good, even when he has not yet accomplished his objective of enjoying them.

24. A person not knowing his real interest, being deserted by them (viz. wealth, sons etc. which he regarded as his own) carries the load of his sins himself as he is averse to religion and with his hopes of enjoyment, unfulfilled, he enters the hall of blinding darkness.

25. Oh King! Realizing that this world is like a dream, illusion or an idle fancy, you control your own mind by yourself and be impartial and serene, Oh Lord.

_Dhṛtarāṣṭra replied:_

26. Oh Dānapati (the most distinguished donor of charities)! As your honour utters this sweet, salutary speech, I do not feel sated with it, just as a mortal would feel after obtaining the nectar.

27. Oh gentle-natured Akrä! Your sweet and righteous advice, however, does not get fixed in my fickle mind which is partial through affection towards my sons, any more than a flash of lightening into the mount Sudāman.

28. What human being can violate the decree of the Supreme Ruler who has now descended in Yadu’s race for removing the burden of the earth.

29. Bow unto that Supreme Lord who, having created this universe by his Māyā of incomprehensible ways and having entered it afterwards (as the Inner Controller) he apportions the karmas and their fruits, and whose sportive acts which are very difficult to comprehend and who is the main cause and the ultimate goal of this wheel of transmigration (samsāra).

_Srī Śuka said:_

30. Having thus gauged the mind of the king Dhṛtarāṣṭra and taking leave of his well-wishers and relatives, Akṛūra of the Yādava clan, returned to Mathurā.

31. Oh Parīśit (the scion of the Kuru race)! (After his arrival at Mathurā), he reported to Balarāma and Krṣṇa, the behaviour of Dhṛtarāṣṭra towards Pāṇḍavas—the main purpose of his deputation to Hastināpura.
CHAPTER FIFTY*

Settlement at the Fort of Dwārakā

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Asti and Prāpti were the two queens of Kāmśa Oh prominent Bhārata. When their husband was slain, they were afflicted with sorrow. They went to their father's house.

2. Stricken with grief, they reported fully to their father Jarāsandha, king of Magadha, the cause of their widowhood.

3. Hearing that unpleasant account, he was filled with grief and indignation, Oh King Parīkṣit. He made a great endeavour to wipe out the Yādavas from the face of the earth.

4. Accompanied with an army of twenty-three akṣauhinīs Jarāsandha besieged Mathurā, the capital of Yadus, on all sides.

5-6. Observing the army of Jarāsandha was surging forth like a sea overflowing its coastal limits, and that His capital was besieged by it and His own people were struck with panic, the glorious Lord Hari who assumed a human form with a special mission (of removing the burden of the earth) considered the measures suitable for the exigencies of that time and place and also the purpose of His incarnation (on the earth).

7-8. "I shall now destroy this army amounting to many akṣauhinīs consisting of infantry, cavalry, chariot-corps and elephants, in the service of Jarāsandha's tributary princes and brought together (and deployed) by Jarāsandha, King of Magadha, as this force is nothing but an accumulated burden to the earth. But Jarāsandha should not be killed, as he will again make efforts and mobilise more forces (and help disburdenment of the earth).

9. This incarnation of Mine is for this mission, viz. removal of the burden of the earth, protection of the righteous and the elimination of the wicked.

*Henceforth there is much divergence in the Texts of ŚR and VJ. For the convenience of readers, additional verses in VJ are translated in the footnotes and the additional special chapters in VJ are given separately as an Appendix to the X Skandha.
10. Another personality (e.g. the boor incarnation) has been assumed by me for the protection of the path of righteousness and termination of the unrighteousness when it becomes predominant, at times.*

11. While Kṛṣṇa was thinking in this way, there descended near him, from the sky, two chariots resplendent like the sun, (each) equipped with military appurtenances (armour, banner etc.) and manned by charioteers.

* (Here the Text of VJ. gives the following additional verses).

10.1 While Kṛṣṇa was pondering thus, the mighty king of Magadha with his big army, laid siege to Mathurā including its groves and parks.

10.2-4. According to the commands of Jarāsandha, the Magadhan king, Kaliṅga, Cekitāna, Dantavaktra, Vidūratha, Ulmuka, Veṇudāri, Śālva and the wicked-minded Śiśupāla, king of Caidyaśas, reached the, eastern gate (of Mathurā) and blocked it. Vindā, Anuvinda of Avanti, Virāṭa, Darada, Ekalavya, Bālhika and the king of Panjab (land of five rivers) besieged the southern gate.

10.5-6. Directed by Jarāsandha, the powerful king Pauṇdraka, Yudhāmanyu, Brhaikṣattra, Śālva, Bhūriṣravas, Uttamaujas, Rukmi, Druma, Sudaksīna assailed the western gate and beleaguered the city of Mathurā.

10.7-8. Drupada Śiśupāla, Trigarta, Jayadratha, Śakuni, Somadatta and the mighty Kuṇinda—all proud of their power—proceeded to the northern gate under the leadership of Jarāsandha and laid siege there, Oh prominent Bhārata.

10.9 Like a sea overflowing its coastal limits, they blockaded all the four gates. Uttering war-cries, blowing conches a number of times, they became ready for action and beat thousands of kettle-drums.

10.10. Hearing that tumultuous uproar of the combined forces of those kings at the gates, which resembled the roaring of the inundating oceans at the end of the universe, Kṛṣṇa was not at all disturbed in mind like a proud mighty lion on hearing the howling of a pack of jackals.

 The Vrindavana edition quotes in VJ.'s com. the following verses as additions in VJ.'s text:

11.1 (There appeared) the terrific yet beautiful discus Sudarasana of thousand spokes, and the auspicious heavy mace named Kaumodaki as it belonged to Nārāyaṇa who imparts delight and happiness to the world.

11.2 (There appeared) the most formidable bow called Śārnga, bent at three points and equipped with a string; sword called Nandaka of sharp edge and pointed at the end; two light and attractive quivers with inexhaustible store of arrows.
12. Seeing their ancient celestial weapons appearing there of their own accord, Kṛṣṇa, the Supra-Sensuous Lord, spoke to Balarāma.

13. "Look, Oh respectable brother, the great peril that is threatening to befall Yadus, of whom you are the protector, Oh Powerful Lord. Behold, this chariot of yours has arrived along with your favourite weapons.

14. Getting into this vehicle, wipe out this (hostile) army and rescue your people from the impending disaster. Our incarnation is certainly for this purpose, Oh powerful Lord, that we should afford protection and felicity to the righteous.

15. Remove the burden of the earth now known as "the army of twentythree aksauhinis" Having planned together thus, both the descendants of Daśārha (viz. Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) put on their armours (armed with their respective weapons and accompanied with a small band of selected warriors mounted their chariots and sallied forth from the city of Mathurā.*

11.3 (The chariot was yoked with) horses called Saibya, Sugriva, Meghapuṣpa and Balāhaka. And a heavy and sturdy plough and a club (pestle) for Balarāma.

11.4-A. These weapons alighted from the sky for using them in the battle.

15.1 Oh King Parikṣit! Accompanied with a small army consisting of many prominent Yadus well-armed and clad in coats of mail, both of them rushed out of the great city.

15.2 When Kṛṣṇa came out of his residence, he summoned all Vṛṣṇis and commanded them to defend forthwith the four gates of the city.

15.3 Kṛṣṇa deployed Vasudeva, Niśātha, Kṛtavarmā and Uddhava at the eastern gate, Oh descendant of Bharata!

15.4 Hari sent to defend the northern gate Ugrasena, Sudāman, Pṛthu and Viprthu.

15.5 Hari sent to the Western gate extremely powerful warriors Sātyaki, Gada, Prasena and Akrūra, the son of Gândini.

15.6-7 Kṛṣṇa of supremely heroic lustre, equipped with weapons of his choice, himself with Dāruka as his charioteer and with Balarāma to help him, sallied forth through the northern gate. The Lord of the universe blew out his conch of very loud sound, inspiring terror in Daityas and Dānavas.
16. Surrounded by a small force, both of them krṣṇa and Balarāma equipped themselves with their beautiful weapons and went out of the city. Hari with Dāruka as his charioteer came out of the city and blew conch.

17. It (the challenging conch-blowing) sent a cold shivering of shudder in the hearts of the armies of the enemy. Seeing them both, Jarāsandha said: 'Oh Krṣṇa! Meanest of all men' (also 'to whom other men are inferior', 'the best among men').

15.8 Krṣṇa, the consort of goddess Lakṣmī, smilingly spoke to Dāruka who had occupied the front seat (of the chariot-driver), in the chariot.

The Glorious Lord directed:

Take the chariot to the place where Śiśupāla the king of Caidyas, and Jarāsandha, the king of Magadhas, have taken their positions, Oh knower of military duties (dharma). I shall thoroughly satisfy with my arrows, the (itch of fighting of all the) kings very proud of fighting.

Śrī Śuka continued:

15.9 Thus directed by the Lord, Dāruka quickly drove the horses to that spot and Govinda, the conqueror of inimical forces, roared like a lion.

15.10 Blaring out his conch, Balarāma also sent forth a roar like a lion that shuddered the hostile forces, causing nervous anxiety and fear in their hearts.

15.11 At the eastern gate there was a terrible fight between the Yadus and the (attacking) princes, eight princes (like Kaliṅga etc.) fighting with the four (such as Vasudeva and others). It was a miraculous sight indeed.

15.12 At the southern gate, there was tough fighting between Yadus who were inspired with confidence by Krṣṇa and the inimical princely forces.

15.13 At the western gate also the battle between formidable Yādava archers and the army of opposing princes was so thrilling that it made one's hair stand on their ends.

15.14 Fired with the ambition of conquering both the worlds (here and hereafter), Yadus, though beaten by princes valorous as the king of gods, did not recede from the battlefield, Oh King.

15.15 In that battle, god Viṣṇu (i.e. Lord Krṣṇa) beloved of the three worlds, an eminently brave member of the Yādava clan, reached the spot where the most terrible kings of Caidya (Śiśupāla) and of Magadha (viz. Jarāsandha) were positioned.
18. I do not wish to fight with a young boy like you as you are alone. It is shameful (to fight with you). I won’t fight with you who lay concealed so long (out of Kamsa’s fear) you stupid fellow! The murderer of relatives! You go away (Fighting is not your profession) as you are a gupta (a man of Vaiśya community, as you are the son of the cowherd Nanda.

19. Oh Balarāma! If you have faith and confidence in you, muster some courage and fight with me. Go to heaven leaving your body shattered with my arrows or kill me (if you dare).

_The glorious Lord replied:_

20. “Those who are really brave do not boast but display their valour. We do not take seriously the words of those who are delirious (or of unbalanced mind through grief due to the death of your son-in-law) or who are on the point of death (as you are now).”

21. Jarāsandha, the foster-son of the demoness Jarā, assailed both Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, the descendants of Madhu, and surrounded them both, their detachment of soldiers, vehicles (chariots), flags, horses, charioteers with a big formidable army, just as a tempestuous wind would cover the sun with clouds or the fire with particles of dust.

22. Finding that the chariots of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma which were distinguished by the ensigns with the figures of Garuḍa and Palmyra tree had become invisible in that battle, the women of Mathurā who occupied seats on the top of the ramparts, mansions and towers were struck with grief and fell in swoon.

23. Perceiving that his own army was sorely afflicted by incessant showers of extremely sharp arrows from the cloud-like inimical forces, Hari twanged His excellent bow called...

Verse 18.1. ŚR. gives a complimentary interpretation of the line:

_guptena hi turyaṁnda na yotsya yāhi bandhuhan /

With you who, being the Inner controller of all beings, are beyond the ken of sight. Oh highly intelligent person! You are the destroyer of Avidyā! Be pleased to come (let me attain to you).
Śārīga which was held in high esteem (lit. adored) by both gods and demons alike.

24. And taking out arrows from the quiver, and setting them on the bow, pulling the bow-string and discharging volleys of sharp arrows, he incessantly shattered down chariots, elephants, horses and infantry-men, whirling the bow like a fire-brand.*

* Here VJ's Text adds the following verses:

24.1 Then Kṛṣṇa applied to his mouth and loudly blew the conch Pāñcajanya, which, white like the moon in appearance, gave out a loud blast that spelt death to Daityas, and gave courage and comfort to Yādava who were struck down with hosts of Kṣatriya forces.

24.2 Hearing the most deafening terrible blast of the conch, the kings, at every point, lost courage at the terrific sound. The warriors on the Yādava side assisted by their army, raised their weapons and put down the army of opposing kings.

24.3 The Yādava warriors felt encouraged by Hari's twanging of the Śārīga bow. They immediately rushed onwards against the enemies, discharged volleys of arrows and put to flight all the kings at the four gates.

24.4 Śiśupāla, the king of Caidya's, who bent his bow almost in a circle, challenged and threatened Kṛṣṇa saying, "Oh Kṛṣṇa! Stop, halt, Oh Kṛṣṇa."

24.5 Kṛṣṇa rushed at him showering on him innumerable sharp arrows washed with oil, from his bow which was bent practically into a circle.

24.6 Thereupon Śiśupāla, the son of Damaghoṣa, took out five terrible arrows. With four of them he hit the horses and with one the charioteer, quickly.

24.7 He quickly set ten arrows on the bow and discharged them at Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of the demon Madhu. He gave out a roar like a lion and all this happened as if like a miracle.

24.8 At that (Śiśupāla's exploit) Kṛṣṇa applauded him, crying out, "Well done! Bravo! Oh Śiśupāla, you are a great archer. You are a hero and a powerful one at that.

24.9-15 Now you wicked-minded fellow, see my expertness in archery by experiencing it personally." While Kṛṣṇa was speaking thus, all the kings simultaneously discharged and hit Kṛṣṇa with sharp arrows. Kṛṣṇa hit each of them with five shafts, dispatching the charioteer and four horses of each chariot to the abode of the god of Death. Kṛṣṇa, the delighter of the Yadus, pierced each of the kings with three arrows, on the chest, in the mouth and on the forehead, in the battle. The valiant leader of the Yadus quickly cut down the thirty bows of the thirty kings
25. The elephants fell down with their temples split up; a number of horses with their necks cut off with arrows fell down. The chariots stood with the horses, charioteer and the warrior killed and flag staff broken. The foot-soldiers had their arms, thighs and necks cut down.

26. There flowed forth hundreds of streams of blood issued from the shattered bodies of soldiers, elephants and horses which were teeming with (floating acquatic) serpent-like (hacked down) arms, rolling tortoise-like human heads, they were studded with islets of elephant-bodies and were infested with crocodiles in the from of (dead) horses.

27. Therein were hands and thighs of men like fishes, the locks of human hair like moss, bows like ripbles and weapons like bushes. The shields (or wheels) were like terrible whirl-pools and ornaments of big and costly precious stones formed the stones and sand in them.

28. By Balarâma of infinite prowess (who was) knocking down with his pestle the proud and powerful enemies in that battle, there started streams of blood which struck terror in the hearts of the cowards and inspired matrial delight and courage in the valiants.

29. Oh dear Parikṣit? That army impassable and terrible like an ocean of vast limitless (unfordable) expanse and directed (lit. protected) by Jarāsandha was completely annihilated. This was a supreme sportive feat of the sons of Vasudeva who were the Lords of the world.

with thirty shafts in that battle. He laughingly cut off the bow even of Śiśupāla, the son of Damaghoṣa, and with three shafts cut down the flag, his crown and the umbrella. Thereupon Kṛṣṇa, the descendant of Madhu, fitted ten Bhalla type of arrows on his Śānga bow. He drew the bowstrings up to the ear and hit Śiśupāla with them in the battle. The army of the Kṣatriyas which was pierced with arrows became confounded.

24.16. The hostile army, the horses, charioteers and chariots of which were killed and destroyed, became helpless as there was nobody to save it, as if it was struck with tempestuous winds at the end of world which blows away hills, trees and creepers.

24.17. Keeping all the while the Magadhan army in view, Kṛṣṇa of ferocious valour, continued discharging arrows, blowing his conch and twanging his bow incessantly and moving it in a circle like a fire-brand, in the battle.
30. There is nothing surprising in the defeat of the hostile forces in the case of Kṛṣṇa of infinite excellence who, out of sportiveness, brings about by His will, the creation, protection and destruction of the three worlds. This is however an attempt to describe the story of the Lord who imitates the ways of the mortals.*

31. Like a lion powerfully seizing another lion, Balarāma took Jarāsandha a captive who, though extremely powerful himself, had lost his chariot and the whole of the army and was left alone alive.

32. With a view to achieve His purpose of (destroying the demonic forces which would be mobilised by Jarāsandha) he forbade Jarāsandha’s being bound with the nooses of Varuṇa and cords of human beings (by Balarāma) although Jarāsandha had put to death many enemies (in the past).

33-34. Released and allowed to go by Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, the Protectors of the world, Jarāsandha who was highly respected by warriors, felt ashamed. He made up his mind (to retire from politics and) to perform penance. But on his way (to the forest) he was dissuaded by (his friendly) kings with expressions conveying the import of sacred texts (and quotations from Śāstras) as well as popular maxims and words of worldly wisdom. They convinced him by the argument: “Your defeat by the Yadus is the consequence of the bondage of your karma (actions in past life)”.

* Here Vṛṣṇi’s text adds:

30.1. When all his army was annihilated and the remaining soldiers fled away, the extremely mighty Jarāsandha, alone in his chariot confronted Balarāma, the wielder of the plough (as a weapon).

30.2. Both of them were enormously big like mountains, proud like intoxicated elephants, fired with indignation and possessed of great strength. They fought with each other.

30.3. Jarāsandha who was overwhelmed with wrath, took up his heavy mace (Gadā) and turning it round a hundred times, hurled it at the chest of Balarāma.

30.4. Dodging the onward dashing gadā, big and heavy like a mountain peak, Balarāma, the wielder of a plough (as his weapon) smilingly made his attempt fruitless.

30.5. Having rendered the mace ineffective by striking it with his pestle, the wrathful Balarāma struck it against the chariot and killed his charioteer.
35. With all his army annihilated and himself slighted by the Lord by showing indifference to him, king Jarāsandha, the son of Brhad-ratha returned to Magadha with his heart weighed with despair and melancholy.

36. Kṛṣṇa also whose army was unscathed (as the wounds of his soldiers immediately healed with his nectarine glance and who had crossed over the ocean of the inimical forces (by crushing them), was applauded (with words “Well done! Bravo”) and was showered over with flowers by gods.

37. He returned to his capital while his victory was being celebrated in songs by the congregations of the citizens of Mathurā and bards like Sūta, Māgadha and Bandins whose hearts were delighted with the total disappearance of the feverish panic (caused by the siege of Mathurā).

38. As the Lord entered the capital, conches, drums, kettledrums, trumpets were loudly and incessantly sounded and lutes, flutes and mrdangas were every now and then played upon.

39-40. The roads of the city were sprinkled with water. The population was jubilant. The city was decorated with flags and was resonant with the recitation of the Vedas. Ornamental arches with festoons suspended were erected all over the way. (By way of worship and reception) Kṛṣṇa was showered over with flowers and tender shoots by women; curds mixed with unbroken grains of rice were applied to his forehead and he was gazed with affection by the people with their loving eyes full of joy.

41. The Lord (Kṛṣṇa) presented to Ugrasena, the king of Yadus, all the spoils of the battle, the untold treasure (left behind by the flying army) and the ornaments and jewelry of the warriors (killed and hence) lying on the battle field.*

* The Textus ornatus of VJ. gives a number of additional verses and chapters. This additional material has made the Kṛṣṇa legend more comprehensive and attractive. Readers are recommended to read the additional verses in the footnotes and additional chapters which are given as Appendix to this Skanda.

From verse 41 here VJ. adds three more interesting chapters describing the repeated attacks of Jarāsandha in Mathurā and the journey of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma to the South (probable to find a suitable place for the Yādavas at a safe distance from Magadha) and how Kṛṣṇa killed
42. In this manner Jarāsandha, king of Magadhas mobilised every time an army of the same (twentythree) number of Akṣauhinīṣis and fought for seventeen times (in succession) with the Yadus who were protected by Lord Kṛṣṇa.

43. (In every expedition) the Vṛṣṇis completely destroyed the whole of his army through the dint of Kṛṣṇa’s spiritual power. With his forces completely slaughtered and himself allowed to escape by the enemies, king Jarāsandha returned to his capital.

44. While the eighteenth invasion was imminent, there appeared in the interval, a Yavana hero (Kālayavana) who was despatched by Nārada.¹

45. Kālayavana (who regarded himself as) the matchless hero in this world, heard (the report from Nārada) that Vṛṣṇis were his equals in war. He invaded and laid siege to Mathurā with three crores of Mlecchas (barbarians).

46-47. Seeing him (with that vast army), Kṛṣṇa who had Balarāma as His companion, conferred (with him), “Alas! A great calamity is befalling Yadus on both sides (from Kālayavana and Jarāsandha. Today this Yavana with his vast army has completely beleaguered us. Jarāsandha, the king of Magadha also will be coming today, tomorrow or day after tomorrow.

48. If Jarāsandha, the son of Jarā, comes while both of us are engaged in fighting with this (Kālayavana), the mighty Magadhan king will massacre our clansmen or take them captive to his capital.

49. Therefore, let us construct today a fortress inaccessible to human beings (lit. bipeds) and keeping our kinsmen

¹ According to VP. 5.23.6 it was in reply to the query of Kālayavana as to who is a match to him that Nārada mentioned the name of Yādavas. Nārada did not instigate him against Kṛṣṇa.
safe in that fort, we shall arrange for the killing of this Kālayavana.\footnote{1}

50. Having thus consulted with Balarāma, the Lord caused a fortress constructed in the (western) sea. In the fortress, he got built a city twelve yojanas (96 miles) in area and wonderful in every respect.

51. The building of the city exhibited the expertise in architecture and the skill in masonry of Tvaśtr, the architect of gods. The roads, quadrangles, streets (and residential areas) were constructed strictly in conformity to the prescribed tenets of the science of architecture (pertaining to city building).

52. In that city, gardens planted with celestial trees and creepers and wonderful parks were laid out. It was built with sky-scraping, gold-towered buildings and balconies of crystals.

53. It had barns built of silver and brass which were adorned with gold pitchers. The houses therein were of gold with jewelled domes and floors paved with gold and big emeralds.

54. It was provided with shrines with upper storeys dedicated to gods. It was thickly populated with persons belonging to the four classes of the society. It appeared beautiful with the palaces of the rulers of the Yadu clan.

55. For the sake of Hari, the great Indra transported his own assembly-hall Sudharmā and the celestial tree Pārijāta\footnote{2} resorting to which a human being is not subjected to the conditions (such as hunger, thirst, old age, death) affecting a mortal.

55-A \textit{VF's text adds:}

This city became a beloved resort of Lord Viṣṇu (Krṣṇa), the God of gods who resides on the milky ocean.

1. As per \textit{VP} 5.23.1-4 Gārgya who was insulted by Yadus got a boon from Lord Śiva that his son (Kālayavana) would terrorise Yadus and would be invincible. To respect Śiva's boon, Krṣṇa did not kill him.

2. ŚR. explains this anachronism by stating that although Pārijāta was not brought at the time of building Dwārakā, the event that Krṣṇa brought it from Indra took place before this narration of the \textit{Bhāgavata} by Śuka.
56. Varuna gifted (snow-) white horses with one black ear, swift like mind in speed.

56-A. VJ.’s Text

The Lord of waters presented to the God of gods one thousand such horses. Kubera, the presiding deity over treasures gave him eight treasures, while Guardian deities of the worlds submitted their special type of wealth to him.

56-B. VJ.’s Text

Similarly, guardian deities of other spheres presented him the wealth special to them.

57. When Lord Hari incarnated on the earth, Siddhas to whom all powers were given for the execution of their duties by the Lord, resubmitted all the powers etc, to him.

58. Having transferred all the people (his clansmen) there (to Dwarka) by using his supernatural yogic powers and in consultation with Balarama, the protector of the remaining population (of Mathura), Krsna issued out of the gates of Mathura, wearing garland of lotuses completely unarmed.

CHAPTER FIFTYONE

Mucukunda’s Eulogy of the Lord

1-3. The Yavana (Kalyavana) perceived Sri Krsna coming out (of the gates of Mathura) like the rising Moon, most beautiful to look at, dark in complexion, clad in yellow silken garment, with the Sri-vatsa mark on his bosom, with his neck beautified with the pendant brilliant Kaustubha gem,

1. S.R. quotes the following list of eight treasures padmas' cāna mahāpadmo matsu-kūrma tathādakaḥ // nilo mukundah saṅkhaś ca nidhayeśāu prakīrtiḥ //

2. Here ends chapter 53 in VJ.’s text.

3. Ch. 54 in VJ.’s text.
having four mighty (knee-) long arms and eyes reddish like a fresh-blown lotus, ever beaming with joyousness, with splendid, beautiful cheeks, bright with a smile and lotus-like countenance with dazzling alligator-shaped ear-rings.

4-5. “This exquisitely beautiful man characterised by Śrī-vasta, four arms, lotus-like eyes and wearing a Vanamālā must be Vāsudeva (Krṣṇa). From the characteristic marks described in details by Nārada (I presume) he cannot be anyone else. But since he is armless and walking on foot, I too shall fight with him unarmed (and without using any vehicle)”.

6. Resolving thus, the Yavana, with the intention of seizing him whom even the yogin cannot attain with difficulty, chased him who was running fast with his back towards the Yavana.

7. Showing himself to be within his grasp at every step, the king of Yavanas was taken far away to a distant mountain cave.

8. “Born as you are in the Yadu race, it is not proper for you to run away from the enemy”. Reproaching him thus while pursuing, he could not overtake him (and catch hold of him) as his inauspicious karmas were not exhausted.

9. Even though he was thus vilified, the Lord entered a deep cave in the mountain⁴. Kālayavana also made his way into it and saw that another person was lying there asleep.

10. “Surely after luring me to such a long distance, he is (pretending to be) asleep like an innocent person.” Thinking thus and regarding the sleeping man to be Krṣṇa, the stupid fellow kicked him

11. The man who was asleep for a long time became awakened. He slowly opened his eyes and looked in all directions and espied Kālayavana standing by his side.

1. VB. States that the cave is near Dhavalapura (Dholapur) at a distance of 10 yojanas from Mathurā. N.L. De identified it with a lake three miles to the west of Dholapur and states that on the site of the lake there was formerly a mountain—GDAM I.p. 132.
12. By the angry look of the enraged man (rudely awakened from sleep), there arose a fire out of Kālayavana's body and he was reduced to ashes in a moment.

King Parīksit asked:

13. What was the name of the man who (thus) killed the Yavana, Oh Brāhmaṇa sage? From whom was he born? What (extra-ordinary) prowess did he possess? Why did he enter the cave for sleep? What majestic lustre did he possess?

Śrī Śuka narrated:

14. He was born in the race of Ikṣvākus and was a prominent son of Māndhātṛ. He was well-known by the name Mucukunda. He was friendly to Brāhmaṇas and always true to his words.

15. He was implored to ensure their protection (from demons) by the host of gods headed by Indra, as they were very much afraid of (and harassed) by Asuras. He accordingly afforded them protection for a long time.

16. Having secured (the services of) god Kārttikeya (son of Śiva) as their protector, they spoke to Mucukunda, "Oh King! You may now retire from the onerous task of protecting us.

17. Having given up your world kingdom from which all the thorns (miscreants and enemies) were wiped out by you, you have been protecting us in doing which you have given up all pleasures, Oh warrior.

18. Now none of your sons, queens, clansmen, ministers or your contemporary subjects survives as they are subjected to the influence of Time (and have died).

19. The glorious supreme immortal Lord, the Time-spirit is mightier than the mighty. He drives off all creatures easily as in a sport, as a herdsman would do his cattle.

20. May God bless you. Please ask of us any boon except the final emancipation. For the imperishable Almighty Lord Viṣṇu alone has the capability to grant it.

1. Though he was in heaven, Mucukunda was always engaged in fighting and had no respite to enjoy heavenly bliss—VJ.
21*-22. When the highly glorious king Mucukunda was thus addressed (by gods), (it is reported that) he respectfully bowed to gods¹. He entered a cave (shown to him by gods) and reposed himself to enjoy the sleep granted to him by gods.

23. (The gods assured him) “He who would wake you up thoughtlessly while you are asleep (and thus disturb your rest), the stupid fellow be reduced to ashes the very moment he is woked at by you”.

24. When the Yavana was reduced to ashes, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the most prominent Śātvata manifested himself to the intelligent king Mucukunda.

25-27. He perceived the Lord, of dark-blue complexion like a cloud, wearing a yellow silken garment, with the Śrivatsa mark on the chest, lustrous with the resplendent Kaustubha gem, having four arms, appearing resplendent with the Vanamālā (a garland of forest flowers special to Śri Kṛṣṇa), with a charming, kindly disposed countenance, beautified with radiant alligator-shaped ear-rings, captivating to the eyes of all human beings¹ with smiling looks expressing gracious love, endowed with youthfulness, noble in gait like a proud lion.

28. Being over-awed with his dazzling effulgence, the highly intelligent and wise king gently enquired of him as he was unapproachable due to his splendour.

Mucukunda said

29. “Who are you arrived here i.e. this inaccessible mountain cave in a dense forest? How is it that you go about in this forest full of thorns, on foot tender like lotus-petals?

* According to Yande’s (Bombay) edition.

¹. VJ.’s text adds:

21.1... and he begged of them to grant him (the boon of) sleep lasting for a pretty long period inside a cave. When he was granted that boon, the noble-minded king Mucukunda being overcome with fatigue sought from them (undisturbed) sleep.

Vṛndāvana edition adds:

21.2. (Mucukunda requested as a boon :) ’Whoever disturbs my sleep should be instantaneously reduced to ashes, Oh most prominent gods’. The gods granted the boons saying ‘Amen’.

¹. v.l. enchanting to the eyes of the three worlds (VJ.)
30. You are the embodiment of majestic lustre of all those endowed with effulgence and luminosity. Are you the glorious Fire-god or the Sun-god or the Moon-god or the great Indra or the guardian deity of the world or any other divinity of that high status?

31. I regard you as the Supreme Person, Lord Viṣṇu out of the three Gods of gods (viz. Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva) as you dispel the darkness of the cave (or remove ignorance in my heart) by your splendour as does the light of a lamp.

32. Oh most excellent person! If it pleases You, may your birth, exploits, family name be frankly disclosed to us who are sincerely desirous of hearing it (or who sincerely desire to render you service).

33. As for us we are Kṣattriyas of the Ikṣvāku race, Oh Tiger among men. I am, Oh Lord, known as Mucukunda, the son of Māṇḍhāṭr (who was the son of Yuvanāśva).

34. Completely exhausted by vigil extending over a long period and with all the limbs of my body benumbed and over-powered with sleep, I lay enjoying un-interrupted sleep to my heart’s content, from which I was rudely awakened by some unknown person, just now.

35. Even he has been reduced to ashes, verily by his own sins, indeed. It is after that your glorious personality, the destroyer of enemies, has been perceived by me.

36. Being bedazzled by your unbearable lustre, we cannot look at you for long. Our powers are ineffective in your presence, Oh blessed God. But you deserve to be honoured by all embodied beings (This much we can say about you)’.

37. Thus respectfully addressed by the king, the glorious Lord, the Creator of all beings, laughed aloud and replied to him in a voice deep like the thundering of a cloud.

_The Almighty Lord replied:_

38. Dear King! my incarnations, exploits and epithets are innumerable. They, being infinite in number, it is not possible even for me to count them.

39. Possibly someone might reckon, through (a continuous period of) many lives, all the particles of dust over the earth, but nobody can ever enumerate my excellences, exploits, designations and incarnations.¹

40. Even great sages (like Parāśara, Vaiśampāyana etc.) who tried to describe my descent and exploits pertaining to the past, present and future in order, have not been able to reach the end.

41. However, listen to me as I narrate those pertaining to the present time, Oh dear king. Formerly, I was entreated by god Brahmā to protect the order of righteousness and for annihilation of Asuras who caused a burden to the earth.

42. I have descended in the race of Yadus in the house of Vasudeva. As I am born of Vasudeva, they call me Vāsudeva.

43. Kālanemi, born as Kaṁsa and the haters of the righteous like Pralamba and others have been killed by me. This Yavana is caused to be burnt by me through your fiery looks.

44. Having been earnestly and repeatedly implored by you in days gone by, I, that Vāsudeva, being fond of my votaries, have come over to this cave for showering my divine Grace on you.

45. Seek boons from me, Oh royal sage. I shall bestow on you all desired objects as no person that resorts to me (submitting himself completely to my Will) shall suffer misery any more.

Śrī Śuka said:

46. When addressed thus, Mucukunda bowed down to him. Remembering the words of Vṛddha Garga (predicting God Viṣṇu’s revelation to him), he realized that he (Vāsudeva) was Lord Nārāyaṇa himself. Overwhelmed with joy, he submitted as follows:

¹ Cf. Viṣṇor nu kath víryām pravocam yah pārthivāni vimām sa rajānśi —RV. 1.154.1, AV 7.26.1; VS. 5-18, TS. 1.2.13.3
Mucukunda said:

47. Oh Lord! This person (i.e. I or human being) whether male or female is absolutely deluded by your Māyā (Deluding Potency). With his eye (or mind) concentrated on saṁśāra (Or being unable to realize that you alone are the Reality), he does not seek resort in you (as a devotee). For the sake of happiness, he is attached to the house including wife, children, wealth etc.) which is the source of all miseries and is thus deceived (in his search for happiness).

48. After securing the blessing of birth as a human being in this world—which, in itself, is very difficult to obtain—and that too with proportionate limbs (and soundness of mind) without any efforts (on one’s part but through Divine Grace), a person who does not resort to the lotus-feet of the Lord, is, Oh handsome Lord, a wicked-minded (dull-witted) fellow who, like a beast desirous of eating grass falls into a grass-covered well (with no way out), sinks down in the dark deep well of domestic life.

49. All this life of mine has been fruitlessly wasted, Oh Invincible Almighty, for I behaved as a king elated with the pride of affluence and splendour of my royalty, identifying this mortal body as the Self and in endless anxiety due to my attachment to sons, wives, treasures, and lands.

50. Forgetting you altogether, I became incorrigibly haughty and lordly with the deep-rooted (ignorant) attachment to this inert body which is similar to an earthen pot or a wall (and thus totally different from the Soul), the inherent pride of being a god among men (king) surrounded by many military officers commanding division of chariots, elephants, cavalry-men and foot-soldiers and leading expeditions over the earth.

51. Like unto a hungry serpent, licking the corners of its mouth with its tongue, seizing upon and swallowing up a rat, you, the alert God of Death, surprisingly overtake a person who forgets you altogether, and is engrossed in pondering over the ways and means of achieving worldly plans which (even if frustrated) intensify the desire for worldly objects which (even after attainment) extremely increases the greed and thirst for them.
52. The mortal body which formerly moved in chariots plated with gold or rode on elephants and was designated (honorifically) as 'the god among men', is reduced to what may be called as excrement (if devoured after death by dogs, crows etc. in an undisposed condition), as worms (if interred in the grave) and as ashes (if cremated by fire) during the inevitable course of Time.

53. Having conquered (all kingdoms spread over the earth in) all directions, with the (possibility of future) wars forestalled, occupying the exalted imperial throne, being paid respects by his (former) equals, the man is reduced to the state of a pet (a beast for play) for women in his home which is characterized by sexual pleasures, Oh Almighty Lord.

54. Being devoted to the performance of austerities denyng himself all pleasures of senses, he continues to perform righteous acts and donate gifts (in the present life) with the expectant desire, "I should become the king of heaven (Indra) or the sole sovereign rular of the world. But this simply intensifies his thirst and is not conducive to real happiness.

55. When the time of release from the samsāra of a person wandering in the cycle of births and deaths, approaches then only companionship with saintly persons takes place, Oh Imperishable Lord. It is only after association with saints that the mind (being avverse to attachment to all worldly objects turns to your devotion—you who are the Master of the high and the low.

56. That the bondage of attachment to kingship should be severed automatically (without any efforts on my part) is, Me-thinks your special divine Grace shown to me—the Grace devoutly solicited by saints of unflinching devotion to you and by kings who though they ruled over the entire earth, still wished to retire to the forest for penance.

57. Oh Omnipresent Lord! I do not seek any other boon from you except rendering service to your feet, which is regarded as the most covetale blessing according to those who have renounced everything (and possess nothing of their own). Having propitiated you, the bestower of Mokṣa (Liberation), Oh Hari, what wise man would solicit a boon from you which will create a bondage to one’s soul.
58. Hence, rejecting all blessings which are bound with the guṇas viz. Sattva, rajas and tamas, Oh Lord, I seek resort in you, the Supreme Person, the very embodiment of knowledge and consciousness unsullied by any taint, transcendent to all guṇas, the One without second.

59. For a very long time, I have been troubled in this world with fruits of action and have been afflicted with the vāsanās (effects left on the mind after enjoying fruits of actions) and am harrassed by six unsatiable (internal) enemies. Being unable to secure mental peace, I have with great difficulty approached your lotus-feet Oh Lord who are the Supreme Soul, free from fear and grief of death, Oh Lord! Be pleased to protect me who am full of distress.

The glorious Lord said:

60. Oh Emperor of the entire world! Oh great king, Your mind is free from impurities (like attachment, greed etc.) and judgment clear. For though you were tempted with boons (at your sweet will), you were not lured thereby.

61. It was with a view to test your unerring, vigilance that you were tempted with boons. Please know that the mind and intelligence of unflinching devotees is never changed by temptation of blessings.

62. The mind of those who are other than devotees and who control it by Prāṇāyāma (breath control) and other means, is not devoid of vāsanās (the subtle desires) and it is noticed that they are again attached to sense-objects.

63. You may roam over the earth at will after setting your mind on me. May your devotion unto me be everlasting and unflinching for ever.

64. In compliance of your duties as a Kṣatriya, you have killed living beings in hunting (fighting etc.). Expiate the sin committed by you by seeking my asylum and by meditation and performance of penance.

65. In the next birth you will be a prominent Brāhmaṇa, the best friend of all beings. Then you will certainly attain to me, the Absolute, Oh king.
CHAPTER FIFTY-TWO

Krṣṇa and Balarāma escape to Dvārakā: Balarāma’s marriage

Rukmiṇī’s Letter to Krṣṇa

Śrī Śuka continued:

1. In this way, blessed by Krṣṇa, Mucukunda, the descendant of Ikṣvāku, circumambulated by the right Lord Krṣṇa, bowed to him and came out of the cave.

2. He noticed the diminution of stature and form in men, beasts, creepers and trees and concluding that the Kali Age had set in, he went to the northerly direction.

3. Endowed with faith and penance, free from attachment and cleared of doubts, the wise king concentrated his mind on Krṣṇa and entered the mount Gandhamadana.

4. He arrived at Badarikāśrama, the abode of Nara and Nārāyaṇa. Undergoing conflicting pairs of conditions (such as heat and cold, pleasure and pain) with tranquillity of mind, he propitiated Lord Hari with his austerities.

5. The Lord again returned to the city of Mathurā which was still besieged by the Yavana army. He annihilated the Yavana army and carried of their wealth as spoils to Dvārakā.

6.* While the wealth was being transported on the backs of men and oxen under the direction of the Imperishable

---

1. VT: Though the Kali age set in after Krṣṇa’s departure from this world, he guessed that the advent of the Kali Age was imminent.

2. A part of Rudra Himālayas in the Kailāsa range. According to Mbh. and Varāha P. Badarikāśrama is situated on this mountain.—GDAMI p. 60.

3. Badrinath in Garhwal in U.P.

* After this verse V.J.’s text reads:

6.1 Thereupon king Jarāsandha, fierce like the universal fire at the end of the world, deployed his forces consisting of divisions of chariots, elephants, horsemen and foot-soldiers in crocodile-like formation within the wink of the eye and he surrounded Lord Krṣṇa in the midst of that formation.

6.2 Grasping the situation the ferocious Krṣṇa hastily uprooted a tree and struck down with it the elephants, chariots and horses in that battle.
Lord, Jarāsandha, commanding an army of twentythree aksau-hinīs arrived on the scene.

7. Observing the violent onrush of inimical forces, Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, the descendants of Madhu adopted the human way of life and quickly began to run, Oh king.

8. Though really dauntless, they left the vast treasure (the spoils from the Yavana army) and simulating terrified cowards, they ran for many yojanas on foot, tender like lotus-petals.

9. Seeing both of them on the run, the powerful king of Magadhas laughed heartily and being ignorant of the deep designs and capacity of those two Lords pursued them with his army of chariots.*

6.3 Thus knocked down by Kṛṣṇa with the tree, elephants in the hostile army fell down dead on the ground like mountains struck down by Indra with his Vajra (Thunder-bolt).

6.4 There was left no trace of the chariots along with the occupants of the chariots, of the horses along with their riders, as if they were reduced to powder (in a grinding mill), Oh best among the Kurus.

6.5 Being infuriated, Balarāma knocked down with blows of his fist, intoxicated elephants, on the battle field, just as Indra, the King of gods, does to mountains with his thunderbolt.

6.6 The chariots (of the enemies) which were shattered down with the blows of Balarāma’s fist, could not even be seen on the earth, Oh King, as they were reduced to powder like dry, withered leaves.

6.7 In the meanwhile, Jarāsandha noticed that all the wealth of the Yavana was being carried to Dvārakā and (pursuing it) and massacring the Yādavas (escorting it), seized it all. He then returned to the scene of the battle to encounter Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, Oh scion of the Kuru race.

1. VJ’s Text adds here:

7.1 Noticing Jarāsandha dashing towards them with his allied princes and their armies and themselves being showered with volleys of arrows like two cubs of elephants (kari-potakau) driven by heavy rainshower, and themselves were without any chariots, weapons, armours and soldiers.

* Here VJ’s text adds:

9.1 Striking back, the two warriors took rest at Karavīrapura at night. When the sun rose, the two heroes ascended the mount Gomanta.

9.2-3. Climbing up mount Gomanta which was inhabited by Siddhas, Cāraṇas, Gandharvas and Vidyādhāras, Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa hastily ascended its peak known as Pravarṣaṇa as clouds always shower
10. Being completely exhausted by (the strain of) running fast to such a long distance, they, however, ascended the lofty mountain peak known as Pravarsana where Indra the god of rain, always sends forth showers.

11. Surmising that they must have concealed themselves somewhere on the mountain and not being able to locate their place of hiding, they (Jarasandha’s men) set the whole mountain on fire on all sides with the fuel (the trees cut down by them during their search) strewn around.

rains there. They happily lived there subsisting on fruits and roots, Oh king.

9.4. Feeling elated and happy, Jarasandha also pursued the two Madhava brothers (Krṣṇa and Balarāma) and laid siege to the Gomanta mountain, surrounding it with his vast army.

9.5-7. He summoned his followers, the allied princes proud and irresistible in fight, such as (kings of) Kaliṅga, Kuṇjarapatī, the ruler of Śurāṣṭra (Kathiawar), Jayadratha the king of Sindhu (lower Sindh), Somadatta of the Kuru family, Śakuni the king of Gandhāra and Rukmi, the (crown) prince of Vidarbha, Sudakṣiṇa of Kamboja and Virata, the king of Matsyas. He commanded them to go up and fight from the east of Gomanta.

9.8-10. For scaling (and attacking) the mountain Gomanta from its southern side, Jarasandha ordered the following kings—Drupada, the king of Pāṇcālas, Damaghoṣa, the ruler of Cedis, Bhramadatta, king of Śālavas and Ekalavya, the chief of Nīśadhas, Bāhlika, the foremost of Kuru and the unconquerable Yudhāmanyu, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti and Paṇḍraka, the king of Kāsi.

9.11-13. To Druṇa, the ruler of Kimpuruṣas, Dantavakra and his younger brother, the heroic king of Videhas and Bhūriśravas, Brhaccāpa, the ruler of Kuruṣas and Śatadhvaja of Daśārṇa, Saiblya, the king of Suvira (or Sauvira, upper Sindh and Southern Punjab) and the great chariots warrior Darada,—To these King Jarasandha of immeasurable dignity and splendour, commanded to ascend expeditiously the mount Gomanta from the west.

9.14-15. Despatching as vanguards Suśarmā of Trigarta, the mighty Veṇudārin, the immensely powerful Kulinda, the chiefs of Kekayas, Śiśupāla and the invincible monarch Bhīṣmaka, he himself quickly scaled up the mount from the northern side.

9.16. Having thus climbed mount Gomanta abounding in fruit-bearing trees of all seasons, they searched for Krṣṇa and Balarāma everywhere below the peak Pravarsana. Not finding Balarāma and Krṣṇa, they deforested the mount cutting down all the trees.
12. Thereupon, both Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma quickly (and with great velocity) leapt from the mountain peak which is eleven yojanas in height and had its sides burning, and descended on the plains below (beyond the army of Jarāsandha).

13. Without being noticed by enemy and his followers, those best sons of Yadu race returned to their capital Dvārakā which is surrounded by the sea as its moat, Oh king.

14*. Falsely believing that Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa must have been burnt (in that fire), the king of Magadhas withdrew his vast army and returned to his kingdom of Magadha.

15. It has been already narrated to you by me (vide Supra 9.3.27-36), that Kakudmin, the son of Revata, the celebrated king of Ānarta gave his daughter Revatī in marriage to Balarāma, as per direction of god Brahmā.

16. Lord Kṛṣṇa also married Rukmiṇī, the princess of Vidarbha and the daughter of Bhīṣmaka and who was an āṁśa (part-manifestation) of goddess Śrī in a svayānvara (‘self-choice’ type of marriage where the girl elects of her own free will, her husband).

17. Like Gauruḍa, the son of Kaśyapa taking away the pitcher of nectar (defeating all the gods), Kṛṣṇa carried her away defeating instantly Śālva and other kings who were partisans and allies of Śiśupāla, the king of Čedis.

King Partkṣit enquired:

18. It has been heard by us that the Lord married the beautiful looking Rukmiṇī, the princess of Bhīṣmaka as per rākṣasa form of marriage (wherein the girl is abducted per force in the teeth of opposition of relatives.)

* After this adds VJ.'s Text:

14.1. Having vanquished Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, the foremost among the Yādavas in the eighteenth expedition, Jarāsandha had brought under his dominion all the directions (all kingdoms on the earth) and feeling proud of it, he lived in his own kingdom, Oh king.

14.2. The noble-souled Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma (the Mādhava brothers) entered the city of Dvārakā and lived happily in the company of their highly joyous relatives and were being praised day and night by bards and songsters like Śūta, Mādgha and Bandīs.

End of ch. 55th in VJ.'s Text

For ch. 56 in VJ.'s Text vide the Appendix.
19. I desire to hear the story of Lord Kṛṣṇa of boundless power and energy, who defeated Jarāsandha, Śālva and others and carried away the girl, Oh worshipful sage.

20. Oh Brāhmaṇa sage! The stories of Lord Kṛṣṇa are meritorious, sweet, ever-interesting, delightful and they wipe out the sins of the world. What person who knows the importance of listening to them, will be sated at hearing them.*

Śrī Śuka narrated:

21. There was a great king called Bhīṣmaka, a powerful monarch of the Vidarbhas. He had five sons and only one charming looking daughter.

22. The eldest son was Rukmi. After him was born Rukmabāhu and then Rukmakeśa, Rukma-mālin and the pious Rukmini was their sister.

23. Listening attentively to the glorification of Lord Kṛṣṇa’s beauty, prowess, excellent virtues and affluence as sung by the visitors to her palace, she regarded him as her worthy spouse.

24. Kṛṣṇa also made up his mind to marry her as he knew her to be a suitable wife due to her intelligence, auspicious characteristics, nobility of heart, beauty, high character and other excellences.

25. In spite of all brothers being desirous of giving their sister in marriage to Kṛṣṇa, Rukmi who hated Kṛṣṇa, came in the way of it and proposed Śiśupāla, the king of Cedis.

26. Grasping the situation, the beautiful princess of Vidarbha was deeply agitated at heart. She pondered over the problem and immediately despatched a trusted Brāhmaṇa to Kṛṣṇa with the mission of bringing him.

27. Arriving at Dvārakā, he was ushered into (Kṛṣṇa’s presence) by the door-attendants where he saw the First (the most ancient) Person (in the world) seated on a throne of gold.

28. Seeing him come, Lord Kṛṣṇa who was always friendly to Brāhmaṇas, got down from his throne. Offering a

* Here Vṛindāvana edition gives the additional chapters 56 and a part of 57. These are translated in the Appendix.
(respectable) seat to the Brāhmaṇa, he worshipped him (as an honourable guest) as gods used to treat him.

29. When he had taken his meals and rested comfortably, Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the final asylum of the saintly people, approached him and massaging gently his feet with his hand, he quietly enquired of the Brāhmaṇa.

30. “Oh most prominent one among great Brāhmaṇas! Is your righteous course of conduct traditionally approved by the elders, going on without any difficulty? (I hope) you are (happy with it and) contented in your heart.

31. If a Brāhmaṇa adjusts himself in contentment, with whatever he gets by chance, but does not swerve from his course of righteousness, he is like a wish-yielding cow capable of granting blessings to all the world (or that righteous course of conduct serves as a wish-yielding cow to him)

32. Even Indra, the king of gods, if discontented, has to wander from one world to another restlessly. But a destitute person, if contented, sleeps soundly without a touch of feverish anxiety to his body and mind.

33. I bow down again and again with my head to those Brāhmaṇas who are happy with the realization of their self, pious and the best friends and well-wishers of all beings, free from ego, serene and self complacent.

34. Are you all happy (with a feeling of security) under your ruler, Oh Brāhmaṇa? That king is liked by me in whose country the subjects protected by him lead a happy life.

35. Please tell me the place from which you have come here crossing this (unforable) sea and the object of seeing me. If it be no undivulgable secret, please tell us everything—what we should do for you?”

36. When such relevant queries were made courteously to the Brāhmaṇa by the Supreme Lord who had sportively assumed a human form, described to him in details (the situation which led princess Rukminī to depute him to Lord Kṛṣṇa)*

1. v.l. nāpnoti : Even though he is the lord of gods he does not attain to higher worlds but suffers—ŚR.

2. Or : With what they get as a result of their destiny or karmas.

* Here VR.'s Text adds : (also VJ.)

36.1. I have been deputed to your presence, on best of men, by Rukmini said in her message:

37. Oh the most-beautiful Person in all the worlds! Having listened to your excellent qualities which enter into the heart through (the passage of) ears and remove all the feverishness of the body and the mind, and of your excellent charms ensuring all the cherished blessings to those who possess eyes, my heart sheds all bashfulness and enters in you, Oh Immortal Lord!

38. Oh Kṛṣṇa! Lion among men! What wise, judicious girl of very noble descent will not seek you as a husband at the proper time—you who are the most beautiful one among all men, and one's own compeer in family, character, personal charm, knowledge, youthfulness, affluence and splendour.∗

39. I have, therefore, chosen you as my lord indeed. Oh Lotus-eyed dear lord! I have submitted my self unto you. Please do take me as your wife. Like a jackal polluting by his touch the lion's share of the prey, may not Śiśupāla, the king of Cedis come hastily and touch the hero's share (i.e. myself).

40. If the Supreme Lord, the Almighty, has been properly propitiated by me by religious deeds such as digging wells, performing sacrifices, giving donations, observance of religious rules and vows and the worship of gods, Brāhmaṇas and preceptors and such other deeds, may Lord Kṛṣṇa, the elder brother of Gada, come and marry me so that others like the son of Damaghoṣa (Śiśupāla) may not take my hands.

princess Rukmini. Please listen to her message and let her prayer (and proposal) be implemented immediately there-after.

36.2. Placing the letter (written by Rukmini) at his feet, he bowed down to him. The Lord of the world, with beautiful smiling eyes, took it up. The Lord, Dharma incarnate, read it attentively as if he was eagerly desirous to read it.

∗VF's Text adds:

38.1. You are the glorious consort of goddess Lakṣmi, loved by Your devotees, the Supreme Controller of the Universe who are resorted to for protection by helpless people and as such also by me. Taking this into account, be pleased to grant the prayer of mine who am a servant of your lotus-like feet. Oh dearest Lord I have submitted myself to your feet.
41. Oh Invincible Lord! May you come secretly with an army and generals to Vidarbha at the time of marriage which is to be celebrated very shortly. Defeat the armies of Caidya and Jarāsandha, the king of Magadha, and take me away as the spoil of your prowess according to the Rāṣṭasa form of marriage.¹

42. ‘How should I marry you who live in the precincts of the harem without putting your relatives to death?’ If this be the ground for hesitation, I shall suggest you an expedient. On the day preceding the marriage there is (in your family a traditional) procession to our family deity. In that, the bride to be wed goes openly to her deity.*

43. Oh Lotus-eyed Kṛṣṇa! In order to remove their personal ignorance, great-souled persons like god Śiva desire to have the dust on your lotus-like feet for covering their person as a bath. If I do not have this favour from you, I shall give up my life by starvation and other severe observance of vows so that at least after a hundred births I shall be favoured with your Grace.

The Brāhmaṇa said:

44. Oh Lord of Yadus! These are the secret words of the message that I have bought for you. Please consider what is worth doing in this (exigency of the situation), and prompt action should be taken immediately after this.

¹ This form of marriage is recommended for Kṣatriyas.
* V.J. adds here:

42.1 Coming over there at that time with the four divisions of army such as chariots, elephants, cavalry and infantry, and having given a sound drubbing to kings of Śālva, Magadha, Cedi and others, may the Lord of Laksī take me along with my maids of honour from the temple to his own capital and have there a formal marriage celebration (lit. taking of hands).

 V.J.’s Text
Sri Śuka said:

43.1 Pondering over all the contents of the letter as well as the oral message of the princess, Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of demon Madhu, looked at the Brāhmaṇa (to convey his message).
CHAPTER FIFTYTHREE

Rukmini’s Marriage: Rukmini carried away by Kṛṣṇa.

Śrī Suka said:

1. Hearing the message of Rukmini, the princess of Vidarbha, Kṛṣṇa, the delight of Yadus, clasped the hand of the Brāhmaṇa and laughing heartily, he spoke to him.

The Lord said:

1 A. VR.’s Text adds:

Just as the most beautiful Rukmini has ever fixed her heart on Me.

2. So also I too have set My heart on her. Hence I do not get any sleep at night. I know that it is due to Rukmin’s hatred against me that my marriage with her is obstructed by him.

3. As one would capture a flame after churning the fuel, I will vanquish those wretched kings in a battle and take away (as prize) that faultlessly beautiful princess who is so devoted to me.

Śrī Suka narrated:

4. Having ascertained (from the Brāhmaṇa) the constellation under which Rukmini’s marriage was to take place (viz. day after tomorrow at night, Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of the demon Madhu ordered his charioteer Dāruka to get his chariot ready forthwith.

5. Dāruka instantly brought up the chariot drawn by (the famous horses) Śaibya, Sugrīva, Meghapuṣpa and Balāhaka and stood before him with folded palms.

6. Taking up the Brāhmaṇa with him, Kṛṣṇa, mounted the chariot and with those swift horses (yoked to the chariot) he travelled from Ānarta¹ to Vidarbha within one night.

7. Due to his weakness of being over-affectionate to his

¹. Gujarat and a part of Malwa with Kuśasthali or Dvārakā as the capital—GDAMI p. 7. son, the king of Kuṇḍina caused all the auspicious rites connected with marriage-ceremony, with a view to give his daughter to Śiśupāla.

8-9. The city had all its streets, roads and quadrangles profusely sprinkled with water. It was decorated with banners of various kinds and buntings and arches. It was crowded by men and women who were wearing garlands of flowers, fragrant ointments and dressed themselves with immaculate clothes. They perfumed their mansions with the fumes of aloe wood (Aguru) smoke.

10. Having worshipped the manes, gods and Brāhmaṇas with due formalities and giving them a heavy feast he caused the auspicious verses recited according to formalities (to bless the bride).

11. The bride of beautiful teeth who had taken a bath and had gone through the formal auspicious preliminaries (such as wearing an auspicious thread woven with a piece of gold) was clothed in a pair of brand-new silken pieces and was beautiified with excellent ornaments.

12. For the protection of the bride (from evil influences), the most prominent Brāhmaṇas pronounced mantras from the Sāmaveda, the Rg-Veda and the Yajur-Veda. The family-priest of the king who was expert in the Atharva-Veda offered oblations to fire for the appeasement of evil stars (and the prosperity of the house).

13. The king who was prominent among those who were well versed in Śāstric prescriptions gave as gift to Brāhmaṇas gold, silver, clothes and sesame seeds mixed with raw sugar and cows as well.

14. In the same way king Damaghoṣa, the ruler of Cedis, caused all the religious formalities conducive to the good of his son, by Brāhmaṇas who were expert in mantras.

15. Accompanied with regiments of elephants exuding ichor, chariots decorated with garlands of gold and with armies of cavalry and infantry, he came to the city of Kuṇḍina.

16. The king of Vidarbhas went out to receive him and worshipped him with all the formalities with a gladsome heart. He lodged him in a separated mansion which was reserved for that purpose.
17. There came thousands of kings who were the allies of Śiśupāla such as Śālva, Jarāsandha, Dantavaktra, Vidūratha, Pauṇḍraka and others.

18-19 All those enemies of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma determined to see to it that the bride was secured for Śiśupāla. They decided among themselves, “In case Kṛṣṇa accompanied by Balarāma and other Yadus comes and tries to carry away the bride, we shall jointly put up a fight with him.” Having made up their minds thus, all the kings came with all their forces and vehicles there.

20-21. Hearing the report of military preparations of the hostile kings, the glorious Balarāma who came to know of Kṛṣṇa’s having gone alone to carry away the bride, apprehended a fight, and taking with him a very big army consisting of elephants, horsemen, chariots and foot-soldiers quickly rushed to Kuṇḍina, as he was overcome with brotherly affection.

22. The beautiful daughter of king Bhīṣmaka who was yearning for the arrival of Lord Hari and not seeing (any chances) of the return of the reputed Brāhmaṇa, began to think as follows:

23. “Alas! Only one night has remained for the celebration of the marriage. I am afraid I am unfortunate with little merit (to my credit). The Lotus-eyed Lord has not come as yet, nor do I know its reason. The Brāhmaṇa who was my emissary with that message, has also not returned as yet.

24. Is it that the noble-souled Lord who made preparations for coming here has seen something censurable in me and hence does not come for the acceptace of my hand?

25. To me who am unfortunate, neither god Brahmā nor god Śiva is favourable and the fair goddess Pārvatī the spouse of god Śiva, that chaste daughter of Himālayas too seems to be averse to me.”

26. While the girl whose mind was thus fixed on Lord Kṛṣṇa (as if carried away by him) was pondering thus, her eyes were bedimmed with tears. But as she knew what was proper for that particular time (viz. not shedding tears), she closed her eyes.
27. In this way, of the bride who was eagerly waiting for the coming of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the left thigh, arm, and eye began to throb indicating thereby auspicious and happy news.

28. That very excellent Brāhmaṇa who was directed by Kṛṣṇa (after his arrival in the park near Kuṇḍīna) saw the glorious princess in the harem.

29. Seeing his cheerful countenance and gait with confident steps (indicating a success of his mission) the virtuous girl who was expert in guessing the indications, asked him with a broad smile.

30. He informed her that Kṛṣṇa, the delight of Yadus had arrived and assured her of his definite promise of taking her away (supra verse 3) and that he was brought in his chariot by Kṛṣṇa Himself.

31. Knowing definitely that he (Kṛṣṇa) had arrived (at Kuṇḍinapura), the princess of Vidarbha was over-joyed at heart. (In her exultation) she could not decide what gift or boon be conferred on the Brāhmaṇa for his highly valuable service. And she simply bowed down to him¹ (and later paid him sumptuously).

32. Learning that both Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa had arrived out of curiosity to witness the celebration of his daughter’s marriage, king Bhīṣmaka went forth to receive them with a flourish of trumpets, taking with him proper articles of worship and presents.

33. (Being highly intelligent, he guessed that Kṛṣṇa had arrived for marrying his daughter for which he was quite willing). So he worshipped Kṛṣṇa with due formalities suitable after the arrival of the bridegroom and he brought Madhuparka (a preparation of honey and curds—a customary offer to a bridegroom after arrival on the eve of the marriage ceremony), excellent (lit. well-washed) garments and other desirable presents (of various kinds) and worshipped them as enjoined in scriptures.

¹. ŚR.: Or: Rukmini was an incarnation of Laksīmi, the goddess of wealth. All people who pay respects to her are bestowed with all kinds of wealth. She decided, "When I, Laksīmi, pay respects to this Brāhmaṇa, he will automatically become more affluent than all others."
34. The high-minded monarch arranged for a spacious, luxurious accommodation for them.

3-4A. VJ’s Text:

It was quite spacious and suitable for them but in a garden on the outskirts of Kuṇḍinapura, as the city was overcrowded with kings like Jarāsandha and others.

34. ... He also arranged for the hospitable reception of Kṛṣṇa’s followers and army, in a proper manner.

35. In this way, he received all other kings who arrived there, each according to his prowess, age, military power and affluence, catering to them all that they desired.

36. Hearing that Kṛṣṇa had arrived, the citizens of Kuṇḍinapura came to see him and (as it were) drank (to their heart’s content the honey of beauty) of his lotus-face with both their eyes as if they were the joined palms for drinking).

37. (They spoke amongst themselves): ‘Only Rukmiṇī and no other girl deserves to be his consort, and he alone of faultlessly beautiful personality is the suitable consort for Rukmiṇī, the daughter of Bhīṣma.

38. May the Lord, the creator of the three worlds, be pleased with whatever little merit we possess and as his grace (showered on us) may the imperishable Lord Kṛṣṇa accept the hand of the princess of Vidarbha.’

39. While the citizens who were attached to Rukmiṇī by bonds of affection, were speaking thus with one another, the bride, guarded by soldiers, started from the harem to the shrine of Ambikā (goddess Pārvatī).

40. Deeply contemplating on the lotus-feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa, she went on foot to see and worship the foliage-like tender feet of goddess Bhavānī.

40-A VJ’s Text adds:

Kṛṣṇa, the delight of Yādavas went there in the company of some selected followers.

41. The bride observed silence; she was accompanied by her mothers and was surrounded by her friends (maids of

1. Probably to avoid an outbreak of conflict if the two inimical camps are accommodated in the town.
honour). She was protected by the valiant royal guards clad in coats of mail and alert with their weapons uplifted.

41-A. Vṛṣṇi’s Text:

And she was surrounded by aged chamberlains (eunuchs) with canes indicating their office, Mrdaṅgas, conchs, drums, trumpets and kettle-drums were sounded (during the procession.)

42. She was accompanied by thousands of prominent courtesans carrying with them a variety of offerings and articles of worship and by Brāhmaṇa women (whose husbands were alive) tastefully adorned with garlands of flowers, perfumes (or sandal paste) excellent garments and ornaments.

43. Songsters singing songs and musicians playing on their instruments as well as bards and panegyrists like Śūta, Māgadha and Bandins surrounded the bride glorifying her in songs.

44. Arriving at the shrine of the goddess¹, she washed her lotus-like hands and feet. Purifying herself with sipping the water thrice as ācamanā, she entered with a serene mind in the inner apartment—into the presence of the goddess Pārvatī.

45. Aged Brāhmaṇa ladies who were well-versed in the (pre-marital) rituals, guided the bride in the worship and paying respects to the goddess Pārvatī, the Consort of Śiva, along with god Śiva as well.

46. (Rukmiṇī prayed :) I constantly pay my respects to you Oh auspicious² Mother goddess, along with your children (Gaṇeśa and Kārttikeya). May Lord Kṛṣṇa become my consort. May this prayer of mine be granted.

47. She worshipped the goddess Pārvatī in several ways by sprinkling her with water, applying sandal-paste and unbroken rice-grains, varieties of incense, with (a rich variety of) clothes, garlands of flowers, ornaments, various kinds of articles of worship and offerings (variety of edibles) and with rows of lights (waving them round her).

1. VR.’s v.l.—she entered the shrine of the goddess.
2. Śiva—implies respects to Lord Śiva with whom she (the goddess) shares the name and person.
48. With similar articles she worshipped Brāhmaṇa women Suvasinis—(whose husbands are alive) in the same way, offering them salt, apūpa (fried cakes), betel leaves, maṅgalaśūtra (the sacred thread to be worn round the neck by Suvasinis), fruits (of various kinds) and (pieces of) sugarcane.

49. The Brāhmaṇa ladies gave her some part (of what she offered as worship to the goddess Ambikā) and gave their blessings (in addition) along with them. Rukmini bowed down to them and and to the queen-mother and accepted the things offered to her (as prasāda).

50. Completing (the observance of) the vow of silence she came out of the temple of Ambikā, clasping the hand of her servant (nurse) with her own hand resplendent with rings of precious stones.

51-53. The glorious warriors who assembled there found themselves tormented with the passion of love and became perplexed at seeing her, who like the deluding potency (Māyā) of the Lord, was enchanting to the warriors, with her beautiful slender waist, and countenance beautified with the earrings; she was sixteen years of age, wore a girdle of precious stones around her waist: had protruding breasts (showing attainment of womanhood); her eyes were unsteady, appearing as if afraid of her over-hanging locks of hair. Beaming with bright smile, her white jasmine-bud like teeth appeared reddish as they were tinged with the splendour of her red lips-red like the Bimba fruit. Her gait was like that of a royal swan and her feet were radiant with the splendour of jingling anklets.

54. Hypnotized on seeing Rukmini who under the pretext of the religious pilgrimage (to the shrine of the goddess), had come to offer her beauty to Lord Hari, the kings whose

1. VJ.'s Text adds

50.1 Nearby was the shrine of Indra and (his consort) Śacī who were the family deities of the royal house of Vidarbha.

50.2 Rukmini entered (the inner part of the shrine) in the presence of Śacī, the beloved of the lord of gods. She bowed to the feet of Śacī whose lotus-feet were not worshipped by her for a pretty long time. Then she issued out of that temple with many umbrellas being held over her and fanned by waving of a number of chowries.

2. Śrāmd— who had not attained puberty—ŚR, VR.
hearts were captivated by her sublime smile and bashful looks, dropped down their weapons (without being aware of it), and fell senseless on the ground even though they were mounted on elephants, chariots and horses.

55. At that time, she was eagerly awaiting the arrival of the Lord and hence was slowly moving (her feet resembling) a pair of lotus-buds. Removing aside her hair flowing over her eyes with her fingers, she cast bashful side-glances to have an over-view of the kings that assembled there. And Lo! she noticed him there.

56. Even while the enemies were looking on, Kṛṣṇa snatched away the princess who was desirous of ascending his chariot; he seated her in his chariot with the ensign of Garuḍa (emblem of Garuda on the flag) setting at nought the whole lot of Kṣattriyas assembled there. Kṛṣṇa, the Consort of Lākṣmī, then slowly (and fearlessly) departed from the place (to Dvārakā) with his forces headed by Balarāma, like a lion seizing his own share of prey from the midst of a pack of jackals.

57*. Other proud kings under the leadership of Jarāsandha did not tolerate this discomfiture and loss of reputation (by Kṛṣṇa's carrying away Rukmīṇī in the teeth of their opposition). They exclaimed: "Fie upon us who, although armed with bows, have been deprived of our reputation and glory by cowherds just as the lions are deprived of their kingly position by the deer."

CHAPTER FIFTY-FOUR

Celebration of Rukmīṇī's Marriage

Śrī Śuka said:

1. With these self-condemning words, all the highly indignant kings put on their coats of mail and mounting their own vehicles and surrounded by their respective armies hotly pursued Kṛṣṇa, equipped with bows in their hands.

* This is the 1st verse of the next chapter in VJ.
2. Beholding the on-rushing kings in pursuit, the generals of the Yādava army stood their ground to confront them, twanging their bows, Oh king.

3. Veterans of war (like Jarāsandha) who were riding on horse-back, the shoulders of elephants and seats in the chariots discharged volleys of arrows like innumerable clouds pouring showers of water on mountains.

4. Finding her consort’s force covered with showers of arrows, the slender-waisted bride with her eyes agitated with fear looked at her Lord’s face bashfully.

5. Laughing out that fear, the Lord assured her: “Don’t be afraid, Oh fair-eyed maiden! The inimical forces will be liquidated in no time by your soldiers”.

6. Not tolerating that prowess of the enemies, (the leaders of the Yādava army like) Gada, Balarāma and others shot down the horses, elephants and chariots (of the enemy) with their steel-arrows (nārāca).

7. And rolled down on the ground crores of heads of the occupants of chariots, horsemen and elephant-riders—all ornamented with ear-rings, crowns and head-gears.

8. And fell down on the grounds, their hands wielding swords, maces (gadās) and bows, and also fore-arms, thighs, feet, as well as the heads of horses, mules, elephants, camels, donkeys and (infantry-) men.

9. As their armies were thus being drubbed and slain by Vṛṣṇis ambitious of victory, the kings led by Jarāsandha turned back and fled away (from the battle field).

10. They all approached Śiśupāla who was gloomy, dispirited and with parched-up mouth, grieving as if his legally married wife was abducted.

The kings consoled him:

11. “Oh tiger among men! Give up this despondency. In the case of embodied beings, pleasure or pain is never observed to be his permanent lot.

12. Just as a wooden doll dances according to the will of the showman (controlling it), the same way, due to his being controlled by God, the embodied being endeavours to pass through pleasure or pain.
13. Though backed by an army of twenty-three akṣauhinīs, (every time) I suffered defeat at the hands of Kṛṣṇa in seventeen expeditions. But ultimately I was victorious in one (the last) battle.

14. I, however, do not feel aggrieved or elated by anything (defeat or victory) as I know that the world is controlled by time in combination with Providence.

15. Leaders of the army-commanders as we are, on this occasion also we were defeated by the small contingent of Yādavas under the protection of Kṛṣṇa.

16. The enemies became victorious this time as Time was favourable to them. We too shall vanquish them when the Time will be propitious to us.”

Śrī Śuka said:

17. Thus consoled with enlightenment by his friends, Śiśupāla returned to his capital along with his followers, while the other allied kings who survived that battle went back to their respective cities.

18. The mighty prince Rukmi who hated Kṛṣṇa, could not tolerate the idea of his sister being married to Kṛṣṇa according to the rākṣasa from of marriage and with an army of one akṣauhinī, he hotly pursued Kṛṣṇa.

19. The mighty-armed, impetuous, determined Rukmi, clad in armour and armed with a bow, in his high indignation, took the vow in the hearing of all princes (before they departed).

20. “Upon my word I hereby solemnly declare that I shall not enter Kuṇḍinapura unless (and until) I bring back Rukmini after killing Kṛṣṇa in the battle.”

21. Announcing this, he mounted his chariot and commanded his charioteer: “Quickly drive the horses to the spot where Kṛṣṇa is, so that I shall have an encounter with him.

22. Today with my sharp arrows I shall vanquish the pride of valour of that cowherd (or: the protector of the Vedas), the most wicked-minded fellow (or: one who is gracious unto the wicked as well who has abducted per force my sister”.
23. Not knowing the extent of (the infinite) power of the Lord, Rukmi, the wicked braggart pursued alone in a chariot and shouted out the words, 'Stop', 'stop' to Kṛṣṇa who (also) was driving alone in his chariot.

23A. He overtook Kṛṣṇa while he was crossing the divine river Narmadā. Being fully prepared for a fight, he repeatedly shouted out at him to stop.

24. With all the force at his command, he bent the bow (by drawing the bowstring) and hit Kṛṣṇa with three arrows and roared: "Wait minute here (Oh thief! My enemy), the disgrace to Yadu's family\(^1\).

25. Where are you going clandestinely kidnapping my sister like a crow\(^2\) stealthily picking up sacrificial oblation? I shall today subdue your pride, you dullard\(^3\) who are a cheat and adopt crooked stratagems in fighting.

26. Surrender my younger sister (lit. a young girl) before you are not lying (in the dust) struck down by my arrows.'\(^4\) Smilingly Kṛṣṇa cut down Rukmi's bow and wounded him with six arrows.

27. He struck his four horses with eight shafts, the charioteer with two and his flag with three. Taking up another bow, Rukmi pierced Kṛṣṇa with five arrows.

28. Struck by the stream of arrows, the imperishable Lord Kṛṣṇa sundered Rukmi's bow. He again equipped himself with (still) another bow which too the Lord snapped.

29. Kṛṣṇa cut into splinters whatever weapon—whether a club studded with iron, spear, pike, sword and shield, lance and iron club—Rukmi took up (one after another).

30. Jumping down from his chariot with a sword in hand, the indignant Rukmi, determined to finish with Kṛṣṇa, rushed at him like unto a moth dashing at a fire.

---

1. As usual ŚR treats this as a compliment explaining the pun in yadānāṁ kulopānsaṁ as yadānāṁ kulaṭaṁ, awhanaṁ—"you Protector of Yadu's race, expert in destroying enemies".
2. ŚR takes sumiśta dhrūkṣaṁ as adhoḍaṁ and interprets "Like god Indra taking away his legitimate sacrificial oblations"
3. manda—stable, immovable—ŚR.
4. 26.A—V.J.'s Text adds:

Bending the bow by drawing the bow-string powerfully, he hit Kṛṣṇa with three arrows.
31. As he was advancing, Kṛṣṇa cut down his sword and shield into sesame-like particles with his arrows and taking up his sharp sword, he rushed forth bent on killing Rukmi.

32. Beholding his attempt to kill her brother, the virtuous Rukmini was overwhelmed with fear. Falling at the feet of her consort, she piteously entreated:

(VJ's Text: Rukmini prayed)

33. "Oh lord of Yoga of incomprehensible nature! Oh God of gods! The Protector of the world! Oh embodiment of auspiciousness! It does not behove you to kill my brother, Oh mighty-armed Lord.

Śrī Śuka said:

VJ's Text:

33-A. Praying him thus in frightened tones, the poor Rukmini earnestly desiring to save her brother, clasped the feet of Kṛṣṇa, the Protector of the world.

34. The merciful Lord gave up his attempt (on Rukmi's life) as his feet were clasped by Rukmini whose whole person was trembling with fear, whose mouth was parched up with grief, whose throat was choked (with emotions) and whose gold necklace was fallen, out of nervous anxiety.

35. Binding that evil-doer with a piece of cloth, he disfigured him by shaving his head (with the blade of his sword) keeping (intermittently) some part of the mustaches and hairlocks on the head. In the meanwhile, prominent heroes in the Yādava forces crushed and routed the extraordinary hostile forces, like elephants trampling down stalks of lotuses.

36. When they approached to the presence of Kṛṣṇa, they beheld Rukmi reduced to that (humiliating) plight, as good as dead (through shame). The mighty Lord Balarāma was moved with pity and releasing him, he protested to Kṛṣṇa.

(VJ's Text: Balarāma reproved)

37. "This blameworthy act, abhorrent to us (our race), has been perpetrated by you, Oh Kṛṣṇa, in shaving the mous-

1. v.l. pāṇḍita—omniscient—(VT)
taches and the locks of hair of a relative. Disfiguring a relative this way amounts to killing him.

38. (Addressing Rukmini): In your grief and brooding over this deformity of your brother, please do not scorn us (as evil-minded people) Oh good lady. No other person is the giver of (i.e. responsible for) the pleucre or pain that comes to one’s lot; for a person reaps the fruits of his own actions.

39. Even if a relative has committed an offence deserving death in retribution, he should not be killed by a relative. He should be discharged forthwith. What is the propriety of slaying a person again, when he stands killed by his own sinful acts.

40. God Brahmā has ordained this as the dharma (the code of conduct) for Kṣattriyas that even a brother should kill a brother (in the battle). What could be more terrible than this? (Hence it is the kṣattriya dharma that is at fault and not we who abide by it, Oh lady).

41. (Turning to Kṛṣṇa) It is only the proud, blinded with the intoxicating influence of prosperity that offend relatives for the sake of kingdom, land, wealth woman, honour, authority or for any such consideration.

42. (Addressing Rukmini): It is an improper lookout on your part that you, like an ignorant person, think auspiciously and well of your brother who always bears ill-will towards all beings and ill of those who are your well-wishers¹.

43. “That some persons are friends, some enemies and some indifferent is the self-delusion created by Lord’s Māyā (deluding potency) among persons who regard the body and the soul as identical.

44. For the Supreme Soul is one only in all corporeal beings. But he is mistaken as many by the ignorant, just as the luminary (the sun, though one, is regarded as many when it is reflected in different vessels containing water) or the sky (though one, is regarded as different when circumscribed in a pitcher (ghaṭākāśa) or within a room (maṭhākāśa) is looked upon as many (when in reality it is one).

¹ ṢR adds: It is certainly your improper outlook that you regard the auspicious or proper punishment meted out to your brother (by shaving him) as evil, even though your relative is ill-disposed to all beings.

45. This body constituted as it is of five material elements (like the earth, water, fire and others), vital elements (like sense-organs and their presiding deities) and the guṇas¹ and has a beginning and an end, is projected on the Soul (ātman) through ignorance (avidyā) which makes the embodied soul wander in the cycle of saṁsāra².

46. The soul has no union with or disunion from anything else (viz. the body), as nothing other than the soul exists at all, Oh good lady. The soul is the cause of such appearance, just as the sun is the cause of the perception of the sun by means of the eye and colour (but the sun bears no union or disunion with them)³.

47. Changes such as birth (youth, death) and others pertain to the body and never to the soul, just as the waxing and the waning of the moon are attributable to the digits of the moon (which remains constant all the while). The death of the body is like the amaṁvasyā (kuhū) when the light of the moon disappears but the moon remains unaffected (in the same way the soul continues to exist despite the disappearance of the body).

48. Just as a sleeping man, in a dream, perceives himself, the sense objects of enjoyment and experiences the fruit (enjoyment) thereof, even though nothing of these exists in reality, similarly an ignorant person undergoes (the experience of this unreal) saṁsāra.

1. ŚR: and is thus conditioned by the triad—ādhibhautika, ādhyātmika and ādhidaivika.

2. ŚR.: The body is not pure due to conditioning circumstances.

3. (i) It is the power of illumination of the sun which shines all the while and has no contact with the eye and as such has neither union or disunion with the eye. Similarly, the Soul being of the nature of consciousness and existing in the past, present and future has no possibility of union or disunion with the body—VT.

(ii) The Supreme Soul is not bound or separated from the body coming into existence of which is dependent on Him, just as the Sun is unconnected with the eye or the colour, both of which depend on the sun for their function—VR.
49. Therefore, by means of the knowledge of reality eliminate completely your sorrow which is born of ignorance and which causes you pining and delusion. And be comforted and serene at heart, Oh lady, with bright smiles."

Śrī Śuka said:

50. When the beautifully slim lady was thus enlightened by the glorious Lord Balarāma, she overcame her mental depression and attained equipoise of her mind through reason.

51. Allowed to get away with life only, shorn of his power (or army) as well as of glory, brooding over his disfigurement and with his plans and ambitions frustrated, Rukmī built a big town called Bhojakatā for his residence.

52. He resided there through indignation, as he formerly announced. "I shall not re-enter Kuṇḍīna unless and until I have killed the wicked-minded Kṛṣṇa and brought back my younger sister."

53. Having vanquished all the monarchs in his way, the Lord brought Rukmīṇī, the daughter of Bhīma to his city, Dvārakā and married her as per Śāstric injunction, Oh Scion of the Kuru race.

54. There was a great festivity in every house in Dvārakā, the capital of Yadus, of the residents thereof, who were exclusively devoted to Lord Kṛṣṇa, the protector of Yadus, Oh king.

55. Men and women thereof were highly delighted. Adorned with ear-rings of highly polished jewels, they presented valuable gifts to the newly-wedded couple wearing excellent bridal dress.

56. The city of Vṛṣṇīs (Dvārakā) shone splendidly with flags raised in honour of Indra, with a wonderful variety of garlands, cloths and ornamental arches decorated with jewels, provided with auspicious arrangement at every door of pitchers full of water, incense of the aguru (agall ochum) burning and lamps.

1. Bhojakatā or Bhojapur is identified with Bhojapura, six miles to the south-east of Vidiśā. GDAMI 93. It was built to the north of the Narmadā as per purāṇas which thus support this identification. GDAMI 33 and 224.

57. Its streets were besprinkled with the exuded ichor (temporal fluid) of elephants of the great kings invited for the marriage, and entrances beautified with tall plantain trees and areca-nut trees.

58. Moving hastily here and there in confusion in that marriage, clansmen of Kurus, Sṛṇjayas, Kaikeyas, Vidarbhas, Yadus and Kuntīs were happy to meet each other.

59. Hearing the episode of Kṛṣṇa's carrying away Rukmini sung by the people everywhere, kings and princesses who attended the marriage became extremely wonder-struck.

60. Great was the exultation among the citizens of Dvārakā, Oh king, to see Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of goddess Śrī now married to Rukmini who was no other than goddess Lakṣmī herself.

CHAPTER FIFTY FIVE

The Story of Pradyumna's Birth

Śrī Śuka narrated:

1. As to Kāma, the god of Love, who was a portion of (the future) Lord Vāsudeva, was formerly burnt down through the wrath of god Śiva. Hence he (Kāma) resorted to him again for the restoration of his corporeal form.

* Ekanātha has written an excellent work in ovī metre on Rukmini's marriage. Out of respect for Ekanātha, KD has incorporated it in his com. on this skandha (Harivaradā)

1. As SR and VR point out this chapter contains a chronological anomaly as it describes slaying of the demon Śambara by Pradyumna and his return to Dvārakā along with his wife Māyāvati—incidents which took place long after Kṛṣṇa's marriages with Jāmbavatī, Satyabhāmā and others which are described in the subsequent chapters.

2. This refers to the incident when at the behest of god Indra, Kāma, disturbed god Śiva's spiritual concentration, with a view to tempt him to marry Umā and get rid of the menace of the demon Tāraka by procreating a son (the future Skanda). But contrary to expectations, Śiva flared
2. That very god of Love was born of Rukminī, the princess of Vidarbha, and (lit. from the semen of) Kṛṣṇa. He became celebrated as Pradyumna and was in no way inferior to his father (Kṛṣṇa) in any respects.

3. Knowing that the babe was his future enemy (slayer), the demon Śambara, the inveterate enemy of Kāma, who could assume any form at will, clandestinely kidnapped it even when it had not completed ten days (on the sixth-day)¹ and throwing it into the sea, he went home.

4. A huge powerful fish swallowed that babe. But along with others, that fish was caught into a big net by fishermen.

5. The fishermen brought it as a present to Śambara. The cooks carried it to the kitchen and cut that wonderful fish with a knife.

6. Finding a babe in its abdomen, they offered it into the charge of Māyāvati. As her mind was full of misgivings (about the child), the divine sage Nārada narrated to her all the details how it was born and how it was found in the bowels of that fish.

7. It is reported that she was Rati, the glorious wife of the god Kāma, waiting for the reincarnation of her consort whose body had been reduced to ashes.

up with anger at this disturbance and opened his Third eye—the fire out of which reduced Kāma to ashes (Vāl, Ram.Bāla 23.10-13). VT. and VR. argue that Pradyumna, the Third emanation (Vyūha) of the Pāṇcatātra school is indestructible. VT. finds a via media by assuming two sets of deities—the ordinary—Prākṛta set to which category Kāma, the servant of Indra who tried to disturb Śiva and got consumed by fire, belonged. The other set, viz. the four manifestations (Vyūhas) of Nārāyaṇa of which Pradyumna forms the third, is not implied here. The word—tu in the text Kāmas tu signified this distinction between the two categories, and emphasizes that it was the Prākṛta kāma, the jīva of whom sought birth from Kṛṣṇa.

¹.  saṣṭhe 'hni jatamātram tu Pradyumnaṁ sūtikāghātaṁ/ mamaiṣa hantiṁ tu mune hṛtavān kāla-Śambaraḥ ||

VP. 5.27.3.

2. As explained below (VT) and in VP. 5.27.27ff., she was Rati, the wife of Kāma who was reduced to ashes by Śiva. Under the pseudonym Māyāvati, she worked as the kitchen-in-charge of Śambara waiting for her re-union with her husband in his next birth.
8. She was entrusted with the charge of supervision (of the cooking of pulses and rice) in Śambara's kitchen. Having come to know that the child was her spouse Kāmadeva himself, she developed affection to that child.

9. Not long afterwards Pradyumna, the son of Krśna, attained youth and caused confusion in the heart of women who had a look of him.

10. Considering him as her husband, Rati was ogling at him with bashful smiles and raised eyebrows and approached with amorous purpose Pradyumna who with eyes longish like lotus-petals and knee-long arms was the most beautiful man in the world.

11. The respectable son of Krśna (strongly) protested: "Oh mother! You seem to have a perverted mind. Abandoning the motherly relation, you behave like a lustful woman."

Rati replied:

12. "Your honour is the son of Lord Krśna taken away by the demon Śambara from (the lying-in-chamber in) your house. I am Rati, your (lawfully) married wife and you are (none else but) Kāma, the god of Love, my Lord.

13. This demon Śambara cast you into the sea when you were not even ten days old. A fish swallowed you up. It is from the bowels of the fish that your honour came out here, my lord.

14. This enemy of yours is irresistible and invincible as he is expert in hundred types of black magic (māya). You, however, slay him by means of māya powers like mohana (stupesfaction) and others.

15. Being deprived of her child, your mother is wailing like a female osprey at the loss of her young one. Being overwhelmed with motherly affection for a child, she is anxious and miserable like a cow bereaved of her calf."

---

1. v.l.—noted in VT: 'Due to her Māyā power, even Śambara could not know the child'.

2. According to HV, Pradyumna's growth was wonderfully accelerated with specific medicines, etc.
16. Exhorting him thus, Rati, the past-master in deluding magical processes (māyāvati), imparted to the noble-souled Pradyumna the knowledge of ‘Supreme Illusion’ (Mahā-māyā), capable of destroying all sorts of spells and magical processes and illusions.

17. Approaching Śambara, he challenged him for a fight, provoking a quarrel by insulting him with unbearable taunts.

18. Reproached with sharp words of abuse, Śambara, like a serpent trodden under foot, rushed out with a mace in hand and eyes reddened with indignation.

19. Vehemently whirling his mace, he hurled it at the noble-souled Pradyumna and gave out a roar, terrible like the stroke of a thunderbolt.

20. The glorious lord Pradyumna struck back the oncoming mace with his own and flying in rage, he dashed his own mace at the enemy, Oh king.

21. Resorting to the illusory method of warfare of Dāityas as taught by Maya, the Asura, taking up a position in the sky, discharged on Pradyumna, the son of Kṛṣṇa, a shower of missiles.

22. Being troubled with the down-pour of missiles Pradyumna, the powerful hero, the son of Rukmiṇī, employed his Great Lore consisting of pure satīva which was capable of counteracting and annihilating all Māyās (illusory processes, spells, etc.)

23. Thereupon, the dāitya (Śambara) used hundreds of magical spells (māyās) used by Guhyakas, Gandharvas, Piśācas (goblins), Nāgas and Rākṣasas but the son of Kṛṣṇa simply blew them out (i.e. easily destroyed them).

24. Raising his sharp-edged sword, he forcibly severed from Śambara’s trunk his head with its copper-coloured beard (and moustaches) and adorned with a crown and earrings.

25. Showered over with heaps of flowers by the celestials who were eulogising him, Pradyumna was taken to his (home-) city (Dvārakā) through the sky by his spouse who was capable of coursing through the sky.
26. Like unto a cloud accompanied with lightening, he, with his consort, alighted from the sky into (Krṣṇa’s) excellent harem crowded with hundreds of beautiful women, Oh king.

27-28. Beholding him, of a complexion dark-blue like a cloud, wearing a yellow silken garment, of extra-ordinarily long arms, reddish eyes, with an enchanting smile and charming countenance, with his lotus-face extremely graced with dark-blue curly locks of hair, the ladies thought him to be Krṣṇa himself and out of bashfulness concealed themselves immediately wherever they could.

29. Coming to a conclusion from the distinguishing characteristics between the two (such as absence of Śrīvatsa that he was not Śrī Krṣṇa, the ladies approached him with great delight and wonderment as he was accompanied by a jewel-like beautiful damsel.

30. Then among them Rukmini, the sweet-tongued princess of Vidarbha, of bluish (corners of) eyes, recollected her lost son and milk of maternal affection oozed out of her breasts.

31. "Who can this be a jewel among men? Whose son is this lotus-eyed one? What mother has borne him in her womb? Who is this damsel obtained by him?

32. If my son who being stolen away from the maternity chamber and thus lost, be alive somewhere, he would be his compeer in age, similarity of features, etc.

33. How could this boy inherit so much resemblance to the Lord wielding the Śāraṅga bow in form (features), limbs, gait, tone of voice, smiles and way of looking.

34. Or, he must really be the same child whom I bore in my womb. I have begun to feel more affection for him and my left arm is throbbing." 1

35. While Rukmini, the princess of Vidarbha, was thus reflecting (to ascertain whether Pradyumna could be her son), Krṣṇa, of glorious renown, came there along with Devaki and Vasudeva.

1. This is regarded as an auspicious omen in regard to women, foreboding good tidings.
36. Though Kṛṣṇa knew the actual state of affairs, the Lord kept mum. It was Nārada who told all the story from his (Pradyumna’s) kidnapping by Śambara.

37. Listening to that extremely miraculous account (of Pradyumna’s life till then), the ladies of Kṛṣṇa’s harem joyfully congratulated him upon his return after many years, like one returning to life from the realm of death.

38. Devakī and Vasudeva, Kṛṣṇa, Balarama, Rukmīṇī and other women of the harem embraced the young couple and were transported with joy.

39. Hearing that Pradyumna who was missing so long has arrived, the citizens of Dvārakā exclaimed; How wonderful! How happy it is that the boy who (being missing) was as good as dead, has returned to life.”

40. It is not wonderful that owing to his close resemblance to his father Kṛṣṇa, many times Pradyumna’s (step-) mothers mistook him for Kṛṣṇa and resorted to seclusion (the passion of love was awakened in them). The very thought of the god of Love provokes passion. What of other women when Pradyumna, the god of love, who was the reflection of exact semblance of the Lord, the abode of goddess Lakṣmī, presented himself within the range of their sight?

CHAPTER FIFTY SIX

The story of Syamantaka jewel

(Kṛṣṇa’s marriage with Jāmbavатī and Satyabhāmā)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Satrājitā¹ who had committed an offence against Kṛṣṇa, gave, of his own accord and making some special effort for it, his own daughter in marriage to Kṛṣṇa offering therewith the Syamantaka jewel (as an atonement for the offence).

¹ The word is spelt both ways: Satrājīta and Satrājit. The translation retains the spelling adopted in the original Sk. text.
King Parîksit enquired:

2. What offence did Satrâjita commit against Kṛṣṇa, Oh Brâhmaṇa sage? Whence did he get the Syamantaka gem? Why did he offer his daughter in marriage to Hari?

Śri Śuka narrated:

3. The Sun-god was an intimate friend of his own devotee Satrâjita. The Sun-god was so much affectionate to and pleased with Satrâjita that he presented to him the Syamantaka gem.

4. Wearing that gem about his neck and effulgent like the Sun-god, he could hardly be visible and recognized due to its dazzling lustre, Oh king.

5. Beholding him even from a distance, people felt blinded with his brilliant splendour and believing him to be the Sun-god, reported it to the Lord who was playing at dice.

6. "Salutations to You, Oh Nārāyaṇa, the Wielder of the couch, discus and mace! Oh Lotus-eyed Dāmodara! Oh Govinda, the Delight of Yadus.

7. Blinding the eyes of men with his lustre, here comes the Sun-god of scorching rays, with a desire to pay visit to you, Oh Protector of the world.

8. Prominent gods really try to seek the way (to find you) in all the three worlds. Having come to know today that you live undisclosed among the Yadus, the birthless Sun-god has come to see you, Oh Lord."

Śri Śuka said:

9. Hearing the report of the ignorant people, the Lotus-eyed Kṛṣṇa laughed loudly and remarked: He is not the Sun-god but Satrâjit dazzling with the jewel (Syamantaka).

10. Satrâjīt entered his affluent, splendid mansion beautified with auspicious objects (for the celebration of his successful return with the gem) and got the jewel properly installed by Brâhmaṇas in the shrine of his family deities.
11. Oh King! Every day, the gem yielded eight bhāras\(^1\) of gold. Where the gem is installed and worshipped, there is no danger from famines, epidemics, calamities, serpents, diseases, inauspicious things or from rogues.

12. He was solicited by Kṛṣṇa on one occasion for the gem, for presenting to Ugrasena, the king of Yādavas. But being greedy of wealth, he did not comply regardless of the consequences of such refusal (to the Lord's request).

13. One day, Prasena (the brother of Satrājit) wore that jewel of extra-ordinary lustre about his neck and mounting his horse, he went to the forest for hunting.

14. Having killed Prasena along with his horse, a lion snatched the gem from him (out of curiosity for the dazzling thing) and was entering his mountain cave when he was killed by Jāmbavat who desired to possess the gem.

15. In his den, he used it as a toy for his young son. Not finding his brother, Satrājit was greatly tormented.

16. (He expressed his suspicion :) "My brother is most probably murdered by Kṛṣṇa as he went out to the forest with the Syamantaka jewel round his neck". Hearing that, people passed on the rumour in whispers from ear to ear.

17. Hearing that rumour, the Lord accompanied by some citizens followed the track of Prasena (Prasena’s horse) in order to wipe out the calumny imputed to him.

18. People saw that Prasena and his horse were killed by a lion in the forest and that the lion was killed by a bear on the side of the mountain.

19. Keeping outside the citizens (with instructions to wait), the Lord alone entered the den of the king of bears, though it was terrible and full of blinding darkness.

20. Seeing there that the excellent gem was used as a toy of a male child he determined to take it away and stayed there near the child.\(^2\)

21. Seeing that extra-ordinary person (not seen before) the nurse of the child screamed out as in fear. Hearing that,

---

1. Śr. quotes verses which show that one bhāra is equivalent to 8000 Tola (1 Tola = 11.66 grams).
2. VB quotes a verse from Purāṇas as the nurses lullaby to the child, “The lion killed Prasena, the lion was killed by Jāmbavat. Oh tender child, don’t cry. This Syamantaka is for you.”
the enraged Jāmbavān who was the foremost among the mighty rushed at him, in rage.

22. Verily, in his indignation, he failed to understand Kṛṣṇa's greatness, and regarding him as an ordinary person he fought with him, his own Master (Rāma in previous incarnation), the Supreme Lord.

23. Like two hawks fighting for a piece of meat, the combat between them was tumultuous as they tried to overthrow each other by weapons, rocks, trees and arms.

24. There was a continuous combat for twenty-eight days (and nights as well) hitting each other with fists, harsh like the strokes of thunderbolt.

25. Jāmbavān was extremely wonderstruck as his joints and limbs were crushed and dislocated by the blows of Kṛṣṇa's fists and as his strength decreased and the body was full of perspiration. He addressed to him:

26. "(Now) I know You to be Lord Viṣṇu, the Ancientmost Person, the Creator of the Universe and the Controller thereof Who constitute the energy, the power of endurance (mental strength) and physical power of all beings.

27. You are really the Creator of the progenitors of the Universe; You are the Reality that underlies it (as the material cause of the created substances). You are the Time Spirit which controls and destroys the world. You are the Supreme Soul of all.

28. You are verily my Lord Rāma, at whose side-glances which were slightly enkindled with wrath, the whole ocean full of alligators, whales and other aquatic animals got agitated and was made to give way to you; Who built a bridge across the sea as if it was a memorial of your glory; who burnt down the city of Laṅkā and by whose arrows, the heads of demons rolled on the ground."

29-30. To his devotee, the king of bears who had thus realized the knowledge of his being the Supreme Spirit, Kṛṣṇa, that Imperishable glorious Lord, the lotus-eyed son of Devaki, touched (all over his body, out of compassion) with his bliss-bestowing hand (relieving all his fatigue, wounds and pain in the combat) and out of Supreme Mercy and Grace, spoke to him in a voice deep with affection.
31. “We (I and citizens of Dvārakā) arrived here at the entrance of your cave for the sake of the Syamantaka gem. (Though some of the false imputation of calumny is hereby removed), I have entered the den to wipe out completely the false accusation (of Prasena’s murder) against me, by means of (i.e. by producing) this gem.”

32. It is traditionally reported that thus addressed, Jāmbavān gladly offered his daughter Jāmbavatī in marriage to Kṛṣṇa, along with the Syamantaka gem, by way of worshipping him.

32A. VR’s Text adds:

Lord Kṛṣṇa who is affectionate to his devotees, was worshipped (by Jāmbavān) with many other excellent precious stones. And the Lord instantly bestowed on him (or decided to confer upon him) the Supreme Emancipation from which there is no return to saṃsāra.

33. After Waiting (at the entrance of the cave) for twelve days and finding that Kṛṣṇa entered the cave but had not returned out of it, the people who accompanied him there, returned to their own city (Dvārakā) in grief.

34. When they heard the report that Kṛṣṇa had not issued out of the cave (for the last twelve days), Devakī (Kṛṣṇa’s mother), queen Rukmiṇī, Vasudeva (Kṛṣṇa’s father), his friends and kinsmen deeply grieved (his non-return).

35. Citizens of Dvārakā cursed Satrājīt (for the disappearance of Kṛṣṇa). Deeply grieving, they devotedly worshipped the goddess Durgā (well-known by the name, Candrabhāgā),¹ the Supreme Illusive potency of the Lord, for the safe return of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

36. (Possibly) due to the blessing of the goddess they received through their worship and prayers of the deity, Lord Hari manifested Himself along with his spouse (Jāmbavatī) and with his purpose (recovery of the Syamantaka gem) completely achieved, thus thrilling them with joy.

1. Śr. remarks: Candrabhāgāh nāma Durgām suggests that his Text most probably read Candrabhāgā for Mahāmāyā and was Upasthūs Candrabhāgāh Durgām” etc. instead of the current one.”
37. All of them were transported with ecstatic joy to find Kṛṣṇa as if returned to life after death and that too with a spouse and the Syamantaka gem about his neck.

38. Summoning Satrājīt to the royal assembly, in the presence of the king (Ugrasena), the Lord narrated the story of the recovery of the gem and entrusted the gem to his (Satrājīt’s) care.

39. Deeply feeling ashamed, he took that Syamantaka jewel. Casting down his head and full of repentance for his guilt (of traducing the Lord), he returned home.

40. Constantly brooding over the sinful act (of calumniating an innocent person like Kṛṣṇa) and being agitated and perplexed at his conflict with a powerful party, he pondered: “How can I wipe off this misdeed and misbehaviour? Or how will Lord Kṛṣṇa be propitiated and gracious unto me?

41. What course would lead to my well-being whereby people won’t censure me who am really short-sighted, mean, foolish and greedy of wealth.

42. I shall offer him my daughter who is a jewel among women, as well as that Syamantaka gem to him. This is the proper expedient, otherwise no peace can be brought about (between us) by any other way.”

43. As the tradition reports, by this reasoning process, he reached this decision. Taking personal initiative in the matter, Satrājīt offered his daughter who was excellent in all respects as well as the Syamantaka jewel to him.

44. According to ritualistic formalities prescribed in the Śāstras the Lord married Satyabhāmā who was blessed with good disposition, charming beauty, generosity and other excellent virtues and had many suitors soliciting her hand.

45. (Declining the offer of the Syamantaka gem) the glorious Lord said, “We do not accept the Syamantaka gem. Let it be with you as you are the devotee of the Sun-god (the donor of the gift). We shall enjoy the yield of the gem (viz. gold. As you have no son, I am the legal heir for the gold yielded everyday by the gem).
CHAPTER FIFTY SEVEN

The Story of Syamantaka

(Murder of Satājit for Syamantaka—Akrūra allowed to retain it)

Sri Śuka said:

1. Hearing the report of Pāṇḍavas and Kunti having been burnt (in the house of lac at Vāraṇāvata), Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the Ruler of Senses, though knowing the reality (about their escape to safety), went with Balarāma to the Kuru country (to its capital Hastināpura) as a formal condolence visit to relatives.

2. It is traditionally reported that as co-sharers in their grief, he met Bhīṣma, Kṛpa along with Vidura, Gāndhārī as well as Drona and exclaimed: ‘Alas ! What a pity !’

3. Taking advantage of this opportunity (of Kṛṣṇa’s absence), Akrūra² and Kṛtavarmā instigated Śatadhanvā³, “Why should not the gem Syamantaka be seized (now, as Kṛṣṇa is away) ?

4. Satrājit who, having positively promised us his beautiful, jewel-like daughter, set us at nought and gave her in marriage to Kṛṣṇa. Why should not such a fellow follow his brother (to the land of death) ?”

5. His mind being thus thoroughly perverted and prejudiced, the wicked-most, sinful fellow with his span of life

1. Vide MBH. Adi. ch. 147.

2. VT. takes pains to absolve Akrūra of his participation in the criminal conspiracy of murdering Satrājit. His explanation that being enraged at Satrājit’s accusation of Kṛṣṇa, Akrūra wanted to kill him, is not convincing—as Satrājit offered both Satyabhāmā and Syamantaka to Kṛṣṇa and it was Kṛṣṇa who of his own accord requested Satrājit to retain the jewel with him. When matters were amicably settled, to instigate Śatadhanvā to murder Satrājit is certainly not creditable. And his subsequent abscending with Syamantaka and the production of the gem when cornered by Kṛṣṇa, reflects against the character of this ‘one of the greatest devotees’ of Kṛṣṇa.

3. One of the five sons of Hṛḍīka of the Yadu clan, and a brother of Kṛtavarmā (vide supra 9.29.27) diminished (and was about to be terminated soon), murdered Satrājit out of greed, while he was asleep.

6. While the women (in the family) were screaming and wailing loudly and helplessly, he, like a butcher knifing a beast, finished with Satrājit and absconded, taking with him the gem Syamantaka.

7. Beholding her father thus slain, Satyabhāmā was stricken with grief and bewailed, ‘Oh father! father I am undone’ And she fainted.

8. Depositing that dead body in a trough full of oil (to prevent its decomposition), she rushed to Hastināpura. Tormented as she was, she reported the matter of her father’s assassination to Kṛṣṇa who (being omniscient) already knew the facts (of the case).

9. Hearing that (tragic incident) Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, both the Lords of the world, following the (customary) way of human beings bewailed, ‘Alas, what a calamity has befallen us!’ with eyes flowing with tears.

10. From Hastināpura, the Lord with his consort and elder brother returned forthwith to his capital and started to adapt measures to slay Śatadhanvā and recover the gem from him.*

* Vṛṣṇi Text adds:

10.1. At this juncture, there arrived from the capital¹ of the Pāṇcāla country, an emissary deputed by king Yajñasena (Drupada) announcing the self-choice (Suṣuyama) type of marriage of his princess Yajñaseni (Draupadi).

10.2. Being invited there along with his brother, Sri Kṛṣṇa went to (Kāmpilya), the capital of Pāṇcālas and saw there the teen-aged sons of Pāṇḍu.

10.3-4. Those princes were perfectly disguised as Brāhmaṇas and were not seen before. Accompanying them, after they had achieved their ambition through the exhibition of their prowess by hitting the mark (the test for winning Draupadi’s hand), he arrived at a potter’s residence. He paid respects to his paternal aunt (Kunti) and took leave of prince Yudhisṭhira.

10.4A. And hastened back to Dvārakā to slay Śatadhanvā.

¹ viz. Kāmpilya, the capital of South Pāṇcāla, the kingdom of Drupada. It is now known as Kampil, 28 miles N.E. of Fathegaḍh in Farrukhabad District, U.P.—GDAMI p. 88.
11. Knowing the punitive measures adopted by Kṛṣṇa, Śatadhanvā got afraid and being anxious to save his life, he begged of Kṛtavrma's help. But he (Kṛtavrma) replied:

12. "I will not offend Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, the Lords of the universe. Who can hope to live in peace after committing an offence against them?

13. The great warrior Karīsa was forsaken by the goddess of wealth and prosperity due to his hatred of them, and had to leave this world along with his followers, while Jarāsandha had to take to flight in (each of the) seventeen expeditions losing even his own chariot."

14. Being thus refused help (by Kṛtavrma), he entreated Akrūra for help. But he too replied: "What person knowing the might of these two Lords of the world, can dare to oppose them?

VJ.'s Text adds:

14. A. God Śiva whose abode is mount Kailāsa, used to bow down to Hari with his head. He (Hari) has vanquished Hamsa and Dīmbhaka who have become arrogant and overbearing due to boons (got by them), in the battle. The great poisonous serpent (Kāliya) was expelled by him from the pool (in the Yamunā).

15. It is out of sport that he creates, maintains and destroys this Universe. People deluded by his Māyā (the Unborn) do not comprehend the activities of the Creator of the Universe.

16. As a boy of seven years, he uprooted a mountain and held it up on one hand easily, as in play, like a child holding an umbrella-like mushroom.

17. Salutations to the Glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa of miraculous deeds. I bow down to the Infinite Lord, the Prime Cause of the universe, the Indwelling Soul of all."

18. Thus refused help by Akrūra, Śatadhanvā deposited the great jewel with him and mounting a horse (or a mare) capable of going hundred yojanas a day, he took to flight.

19. Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa rode in their chariots carrying the flag with the emblem of Garuḍa, pursued with very swift horses, the murderer of his father-in-law, Oh king.

20. Śatadhanvā left his horse that dropped down (dead through fatigue), in a park of Mithilā. Being afraid, he began to run on foot, Kṛṣṇa also, out of rage, followed him on foot.

21. The glorious Lord who pursued on foot beheaded him with his Sudarśana disk of very sharp edge, and he searched his upper and lower clothes for the Sāmantaka jewel.

22. Not finding the jewel on his person, Kṛṣṇa returned and spoke to his elder brother, “Śatadhanvā has been killed in vain, for the jewel is not on his person.”

23. Then advised Balarāma, “The jewel has been certainly deposited by Śatadhanvā with some person (at Dvārakā). You return to the capital and trace him (the person possessing the jewel).

24. I wish to see king Videha, my dearest friend.” Speaking thus, Balarāma, the delight of Yadus, entered the city of Mithilā, Oh king!

25. Seeing him come unexpectedly, the king of Mithilā, being highly pleased in mind, immediately rose up to receive him, and worshipped duly his honourable guest with suitable presents and other articles of worship.

26. The powerful lord Balarāma spent some years in the city of Mithilā. He was duly honoured by the noble-souled Janaka with great affection. It was during that period that Suyodhana, the son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra, learnt the art of fighting with mace, at his feet.

27. Returning to Dvārakā, Lord Kṛṣṇa who wanted to please his beloved wife, reported the death of Śatadhanvā and also of his not finding the gem with him.

28. Thereupon, along with friends and well-wishers, the Lord caused to be performed all the obsequies of Satrājit his father-in-law who had been murdered.

29. Having heard the report of the slaying of Śatadhanvā, Akrūra and Kṛtavarmā, the instigators of the crime, were overwhelmed with fear and absconded (from Dvārakā).

30. When Akrūra left Dvārakā, there appeared evil portents to the citizens of Dvārakā and they frequently suffered from physical and mental troubles as well as troubles caused by gods and elements (Mahābhūtas), so goes the tradition.

VJ.’s Text Adds:

30-A. Thereupon Śrī Kṛṣṇa inquired of old people of whom Ugrasena was prominent: “What is the reason that after such a long time, these ill omens and calamities are be-falling us?”

31. Forgetting what I have spoken before, some chroniclers declare as above. But how is it possible that ominous portents will occur in the home-town of Lord Kṛṣṇa who is the abode of ascetics (capable of countering such evils by their very presence)?

32. Formerly, so the tradition goes, when the lord of rains did not send seasonal showers, the king of Kāśi gave his daughter Gāndini in marriage to Śvaphalka (the father of Akrūra) who came there as a guest and there fell showers of rain in the kingdom of Kāśi.

33. His son Akrūra possesses the same (hereditary) miraculous powers. Wherever he stays, the rain-god sends showers at the proper season. No calamities or epidemics (like cholera) affect at that area.

34. Hearing the advice of the elders and considering that this (i.e. the departure of Akrūra) could be the cause (of these calamities, but the absence of the Śyamantaka gem is the real cause), Śrī Kṛṣṇa managed to bring back Akrūra (to Dvārakā) and spoke to him.

35. Śrī Kṛṣṇa who knew the minds of all (understood that this great devotee does not covet to possess the Śyamantaka gem, and must have certainly brought it with him) received him with deep respect, engaged him in delightful conversation, narrated to him some pleasanstries and spoke with a smile:

36. “We already know that the brilliant gem Śyamantaka is in your possession since it was deposited with you by Śatadhānva, Oh master of charities.

37. As Satrājita had no male issue, (legally) the sons of his daughter Satyabhāmā should offer water oblations and lumps of rice (to the departed soul), pay off his debts and inherit the remaining property.
38. As you observe vows properly, let the Syamantaka gem, however, remain in your possession, as it is difficult for others to retain it. But my elder brother (Balarāma) does not believe that I do not possess the gem (he suspects that I have it with me).

39. Please show to our relatives (the Symantaka gem) and bring peace of mind to them, Oh highly fortunate Akrūra. (You cannot deny the possession of the gem as) now-a-days your sacrificial performances on altars of gold are going on continuously (without any interruption or break)."

40. Pursuaded with such sweet words, Akrūra, the son of Śvaphalka, brought the gem wrapped up in a piece of cloth and handed over to him that gem which was resplendent like the Sun.

41. Having made Akrūra to show the gem to his relatives and clansmen*, he wiped out the blame and suspicion imputed to him by (producing) the gem (from Akrūra) and the Lord returned that gem to Akrūra.

42. He who reads, hears, contemplates this highly auspicious episode rich with the exploits of the glorious Lord Viṣṇu, the Ruler of the Universe—an episode which wipes out all sins—becomes free from evil reputation and sins, and attains ever-lasting peace.

* Here Vṛṣa's Text adds :

41.1. The ruler of the world cleared off the accusation levelled against Him and explained the details of the case to Balarāma who had been away so long and had returned for seeing the gem (and to convince himself personally).

41.2. But on seeing it, he regarded himself to be the proper person to possess it and coveted to have it, Oh prominent Kaurava. Satyabhāmā considered herself to be (legally) the proper heir eligible (to possess) that hereditary property.

41.3. Without knowing the mind of Hari, she confidently wished to possess it. Even Jāmbavati desired to get that gem as it was given as dowry by her father (as such her claim was legal).

41.4. Knowing all these (covetous) claims, Lord Kṛṣṇa, the consort of goddess Lakṣmī handed over again the gem to Akrūra.
CHAPTER FIFTY EIGHT

Espousals of Lord Kṛṣṇa

Śrī Śuka said:

1. On one occasion, Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the most prominent one among men, went to Indraprastha (modern Delhi) to see Pāṇḍavas who were celebrated for their bravery and other virtues. The Lord of the goddess Śrī was accompanied by Śātyaki and others.

2. Seeing Lord Mukunda, the Supreme Ruler of all, coming, all the sons of Pṛthā (Pāṇḍavas) immediately stood up and those warriors went to receive him just as the divinities presiding over senses do to the returning main vital respiration (as senses become active when respiration returns).

3. Those warriors embraced the Imperishable Lord and got all their sins removed by the contact with his person. Beholding his countenance, beaming with affectionate smile, all of them were transported with joy.

4. Having bowed down to the feet of Yudhiṣṭhira and Bhīma, he embraced Arjuna and was in their turn paid respects by the twin Nakula and Sahadeva.

5. When he was comfortably seated on an excellent throne, the dark-complexioned, recently-married Draupadī who was above censure (in spite of her marriage with five brothers), came there slowly and bashfully bowed down to him.

6. In the same way, Śātyaki was worshipped and paid respect to by Pāṇḍavas. Others also were equally received and they sat on their respective seats around Kṛṣṇa.

7. Approaching Kuntī, Kṛṣṇa paid respects to her. He was looked at with eyes full of affection and tears, and was as if embraced by her looks. He was inquired about the relatives. He made queries about her health and well-being as also of her daughter-in-law, and other relatives.

8. Remembering all the many sufferings they had undergone (at Vāraṇāsī and till their coming to the Svayamvara of Draupadī), her throat was choked with perplexing affection and eyes full of tears, she spoke to Kṛṣṇa who manifested himself in order to remove all the sufferings (of his devotees).
9. "Oh Kṛṣṇa, when remembering us, your relatives, my brother Akrūra was deputed to us by you, we had been happy since then. For we were blessed with a protector like you."

10. You being the well-wisher and the very soul of the universe, do not entertain the deluding notion of partiality (calling someone as your own and disavowing relationship with others). You, however, abide in the hearts of those devotees who constantly remember you and destroy all their sufferings by your very presence therein.

_Yudhiṣṭhira said:_

11. "Oh Supreme Lord! I do not know what righteous act has been performed by us inasmuch as you, who are not easily visible even to experts in Yoga, have manifested yourself to our view, in spite of our poor understanding".

12. Earnestly requested by the king (Yudhiṣṭhira), the All-pervading Lord happily spent the four months of the rainy season there, giving delight to the eyes of the citizens of Indraprastha.

Vṛṣa's Text adds:

9.1 “I have been quite at ease and happy since the time you, without forgetting, specially came to visit us while we were (at Kāmpilya) in the Pañcāla country”.

9.2-3. When Kunti spoke thus, Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Master in Yoga, of his own accord told her: "Having seen your sons along with their bride while they were (then) living in-cognito in the Pañcālas (in its capital city Kāmpilya) at the potter's house, I departed hastily on that very day.

9.4-6. For, I wanted to kill Śatadhanvā, the enemy (and murderer of Satyabhāmā's father. When that evil genius Śatadhanvā was killed (and the Syamantaka gem was not on his person), my elder brother, Balarāma, the wielder of a plough (as his principal weapon) got angry with me. Disregarding me, he went to the Videha country in despondent mood. I stayed in the city (of Dvārakā) all this pretty long period, anxiously waiting for his return. Due to the pressure of work, I did not go anywhere”.

To him who was explaining thus (the reasons of not seeing her so long), Kunti, with her heart filled with feelings of affection, spoke to Him.
13-14. One day, equipping himself with the Gāndīva bow, two quivers with inexhaustible stock of arrows and putting on his armour, Arjuna, the victorious, mounted his chariot distinguished by the flag bearing a monkey-emblem, prepared himself for hunting. Arjuna, the destroyer of hostile warriors, accompanied by Śrī Kṛṣṇa, entered a dense forest infested with a number of tigers and wild beasts.

15. He hunted down with his shafts a number of tigers, boars, buffaloes, antelopes (called ruru), tarabhas (a fabulous eight-legged animal, capable of killing lions), bison, rhinoceros, hares and porcupines.

16. As the day for performing sacrifice (or the Śrāddhā-performance) had arrived, the attendants carried away those beasts which were considered proper and pure as oblation to the sacrificial fire.

17. Having sipped the water thrice (as ācamana), those two dark-complexioned great (chariot) warriors drank the crystal-clear water and noticed a charming girl strolling about.

18. Arjuna who was deputed by his friend Śrī Kṛṣṇa, approached that beautiful damsel of well-set teeth and charming appearance and enquired of her:

19. ‘Oh beautiful maiden! Who are you? Whose daughter are you? Whence have you come? What is the intention (of strolling here)? I believe you wish to have a spouse? Tell me everything, Oh beautiful lady.’

Kalindi replied:

20. I am the daughter of the Sun-god. I am performing austere penance with the desire of getting the boon-bestowing god Viṣṇu who is worth courting, as my consort.

21. I do not wish to seek as my spouse any other person than the god Viṣṇu, the abode of goddess Śrī, Oh hero. May

1. This episode must have taken place after the burning down of the Khāṇḍava forest by Arjuna. God Agni who was satisfied by consuming that forest, gave Arjuna the Gāndīva bow and two inexhaustible quivers of arrows and the chariot with the monkey-flag. —MBH Ādi 224.3-20.
the glorious Lord Mukunda (Krṣṇa), the refuge of the helpless, be propitious unto me.

22. I am known as Kālindī. I dwell in the mansion constructed by my father under the waters of the Yamunā and I mean to stay there, till I am able to see the immortal Lord Acyuta."

23. Arjuna (the controller of sleep) reported it verbatim to Śrī Krṣṇa. He knew it already. He placed the girl in the chariot and approached Krṣṇa in the presence of Yudhiṣṭhira along with her.*

24. When Krṣṇa was requested to help in the matter, he immediately got an extremely wonderful and beautiful city built by Viśvakarmā for the sons of Pāṇḍu.

25. While the glorious Lord stayed there with the desire of doing some good to his relatives (or devotees), he became the charioteer of Arjuna for consigning the Khāṇḍava forest to the Fire-god.

26. Being pleased with him, the Fire-god bestowed upon Arjuna the (Gāṇḍīva) bow, four white horses and the chariot (drawn by them), two quivers with inexhaustible stock of arrows and an armour impregnable by (the arms etc. discharged by) armed soldiers.

27. Maya (the Asura architect) who was rescued from the (forest-) conflagration, (built for his friend) and presented to his friend Arjuna an assembly-hall wherein Duryodhana had optic illusions and he mistook a sheet of water for a paved floor and vice-versa.

28. Taking leave of Yudhiṣṭhira and obtaining consent of his friends, he returned to Dvārakā accompanied by Śātyaki and others.

* Here Vṛṣṇi's text adds:

23.1. While Krṣṇa, the Controller of sense-organs, was happily staying at Indraprastha, he sent for Viśvakarman, the master architect of that period.

23.2-3. He made Viśvakarmā to build a wonderful city with high ramparts, portals, towers, mansions, gates. It became celebrated as the city of Indra (Indra-prastha). He did so with the desire to oblige his relatives. Accompanied with his relatives, he was permitted (to depart from Indraprastha).

25 A bit of anachronism: vide verse 13 above.
29. Thereupon, in the auspicious season when the day was propitious and an auspicious constellation of stars was in ascendance, he married Kālindī.

29-A. *Vṛć.'s Text adds:

Who being endowed with charming beauty and youthfulness gave delight to the mind and the eye). And he thereby enhanced the joy and auspicious prosperity of his own people.

30. Vinda and Anuvinda, (the princes) of Avanti who were subservient followers of Duryodhana, forbade their sister (Mitravinda from choosing Kṛṣṇa as her consort) in her svayamvara, even though she was devotedly attached to him.

31. Śrī Kṛṣṇa then forcibly carried away Mitravinda, the daughter of his paternal aunt, Rājādhivī (vide Supra. 9.24-31) while all the kings (attending the $Śvāyāmvara$) stood agazing.

32. There was a very pious king called Nagnajit ruling over Kosala (at Ayodhyā). He had an excellent daughter named Satyā (Nīlā) who was also known as Nāgnajiti (after her father's name).

33. Kings were not able to win her for marriage without subduing seven extremely dreadful, wicked bulls with pointed horns and which never brooked the very smell of (approaching) warriors. [The taming of these bulls was the condition precedent of being eligible for Satyā's hand].

34. Hearing that the princess could be won only by the subduer of those bulls, Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Protector of Sātvatas, proceeded to Ayodhyā, the capital of Kosalas, with a vast army.

35. With great pleasure, the king of Kosalas received him respectfully with due formalities, such as going forth to welcome, offering a seat etc. and worshipped him with very valuable presents and articles of worship, and in his turn he was reciprocally congratulated by Kṛṣṇa.

36. Beholding that a suitor who was agreeable and desirable to her in every respect had arrived in state, the princess of that great king fell in love with him, (who was the consort of goddess Lakṣmī). (She prayed:) 'If I have devoutly worshipped the Lord by the observance of the vows, may this Śrī Kṛṣṇa be my spouse and all auspicious benedictions prove true.

37. What should I do whereby that glorious Lord will be pleased with me—the Lord, the dust on whose lotus-feet is borne on their heads by the goddess Śrī, the lotus-born god Brahmā, god Śiva, the Lord of mount Kailāsa along with the protectors of different worlds; Who is the Supreme Ruler and who, from time to time sportively assumes various forms with the object of enforcing the Law (of righteousness) as ordained by him?"

38. And to Kṛṣṇa who was duly worshipped, the king submitted again: ‘Oh Nārāyaṇa! The Lord of the World! What more service a poor person like me can render to you who are perfectly satisfied in your own spiritual bliss.’

Śrī Śuka said:

39. The Lord who was pleased with him and occupied a comfortable seat, smilingly addressed to the king in a voice deep like the rumbling of clouds.

The Lord said:

39-A. VJ.'s Text adds:

‘Wise men opine that that suitor (bridegroom) is the best who does not propose his suit on any other occasion except at the time of svayamvara (self-choice-by the bride-type of marriage). Oh Lord of the earth! It is such a suitor who (proposes his suit) when he gets an invitation along with other kings who might participate for the same object (as suitors).’

40. Wise men have strongly censured all entreaties on behalf of a prince—even if he be an humble kṣatriya but is following the path of the duty prescribed by śāstras. It is out of a strong desire for securing your friendship that I am soliciting you for your daughter (in marriage). And we are not prepared to pay any price (for the same).’

1. saḥ arthārthas tām viśvām kālāṁ vina āhwayati ātmānam iti seṣah—VJ.
The king said:

41. 'What other suitor (bridegroom) superior to you can there be in this world, Oh Lord—a bridegroom most cove-table for the girl, as being the only abode of all excellent virtues and on whose bosom the goddess Śrī abides permanently inseparable.

42. But with a view to securing a suitable bridegroom to the maiden, we have already laid down a condition for testing the prowess of the suitor, O Prominent Sāttvata.

43. These are the seven bulls untamed and ungovernable, O warrior. A great many princes have been discomfited and got their limbs pierced and broken by them.

44. (How strongly I wish it) If these (bulls) be tamed and controlled by you alone. O scion of the Yadu clan, your honour will be the desired-most suitor to my daughter O
Lord of the goddess Śrī.'

45. Hearing the nature of the convention, the Lord fastened his girdle tightly. He divided himself into seven persons and controlled the bulls easily as if in a sport.

46. With their pride crushed and spirit broken, he tied them with ropes (after passing the cords through their noses) and he sportively drew them (after him) like unto a child drawing wooden toy-bulls.

47. The king was wonderstruck. With pleasure he offered his daughter in marriage to Kṛṣṇa. The Lord espoused er her with due religious formalities as she was worthy of him.

48. The Queens were extremely delighted to find that their daughter secured her beloved Kṛṣṇa as her spouse and there was a high festival (on that occasion).

49. Conchs, drums and kettle-drums were sounded.
Vocal and instrumental music along with expressions of benedictions by Brähmaṇas were heard. Rapturously exulted men and women donned excellent clothes, and decked themselves with garlands and ornaments (on the joyous occasion).

50-51. By way of dowry the mighty king gave ten thousand cows, three thousand excellently dressed young women (as maid-servants) all decked with necklaces of gold-coins, nine thousand elephants, chariots hundred times the elephants, horses hundred times the number of chariots and men-servants hundred times the number of horses.¹

52. With his heart overwhelmed with affection, the king of Kosalas sent the couple in a chariot escorted with a big army.

53. Although the kings were formerly worsted in their encounter with the Yādavas and the uncontrollable bulls they, out of extreme jealousy obstructed Kṛṣṇa on the way while he was taking the bride with him.

54. As those kings advanced discharging volleys of arrows, Arjuna, the wielder of the Gāṇḍīva bow, keen on obliging his relative, routed them as a lion would do to insignificant beasts.

55. On reaching Dvārakā along with the dowry, Lord Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devakī and the prominent leader of Yadus, passed his time in conjugal happiness with Satyā.

56. Śrī Kṛṣṇa married Bhadrā, the princess of Kekayas, the daughter of His paternal aunt Śrutakṛṣṇa (vide Supra 9.24.30) as she was offered in marriage by her brothers Santardana and others.

57. Like unto Garuḍa swooping down upon the (pitcher of) nectar (in the teeth of opposition from gods), Kṛṣṇa, single-handedly carried away Laksmana, the princess of the Madra-ruler, who was endowed with auspicious marks, in her svayamvara (setting at nought the assembled suitor-princess).

58. Similarly, Śrī Kṛṣṇa had thousands (sixteen thousand) other spouses, all of whom were good-looking and whom he rescued from the prison of demon Narakāsura, the son of the goddess earth, after slaying him.

¹ VR calculates them as follows:
9,000 elephants, 9000.00 chariots, 9000.00 horses, and 9000.00.00 men-servants.
CHAPTER FIFTY NINE

Narakāsura slain. The Pārijāta tree brought to Dvārakā

The king Parikṣit enquired:

1. Be pleased to narrate to me the great prowess of Kṛṣṇa, the wielder of Śārnga bow as to how he killed the demon Naraka, the son of the earth-goddess and those damsels (subsequently married to Kṛṣṇa) came to be taken to captivity by him (Naraka).

Śrī Śuka said:

2. Kṛṣṇa was informed of the atrocious deeds of Narakāsura, the son of the Earth, such as snatching away his umbrella, the insignia of his Lordship of the heaven, depriving his mother Aditi of her ear-rings, his expulsion from Maṇiparvata, the peak of mount Mandara, the mountain of gods, through the complaint lodged by Indra. He along with his consort (Satyabhāmā) mounted Garuḍa and flew to Prāgjyotisapura (the capital of Narakāsura).*

---

1. Naraka did not deprive Indra of his umbrella as complained by him, but that of Varuṇa vide verse 23 below. But ŚR. explains that that was an affront to Indra himself as he was the king of gods.
2. Cf. VP. 5.29.1 This chapter deals with the same episode. Hence the textual similarities.
3. ŚR. explains that Indra appraised Kṛṣṇa of these misdeeds while he was in the palace of Satyabhāmā. So to satisfy her curiosity, he took her with him. ŚR gives another reason: Satyabhāmā was an incarnation of the Earth goddess. When Narakāsura was born of the Earth through Viṣṇu’s contact with her in the Boar (Varāha) incarnation, while lifting her up from the rāsātala. He promised her not to kill Naraka without her consent. Hence Satyabhāmā—the mother earth—was taken by him as a consenting party.
4. Kāmarūpa or Kāmākṣyā in Assam (near Gauhati)—

*Vj.’s Text as given in the Vrindavana edition:

2.1. While the highly blessed Kṛṣṇa was staying at Dvārakā, he was approached by Indra who came from the heaven in a distressed and despondent state of mind.

2.2. Lord Kṛṣṇa received him with due respect, consoled him (with a promise of help) and gave him leave to depart.
3. The city was well protected on all sides with inaccessible hilly fortifications and mounted missiles and weaponry and was unapproachable due to the moats of water and fire and belts of stormy winds and was covered on all sides by thousands of terrible and strong snares devised by the demon Mura.

4. He shattered down the hills with his mace, devastated the fortification of weaponry with his shafts, cut off the moats and belts with his discus and the wire-snares with his sword.

5. With the loud blast of his conch, He blew down the war-machinery (on the ramparts) and broke down the hearts of the proud warriors. Śrī Kṛṣṇa the wielder of the mace demolished the fortification with his heavy mace.

6. Hearing the (deafening) blast of the conch terrific like the thunders at the end of yugas (when the universe dissolves) the five-headed demon Mura who was sleeping under water, rose therefrom.

7. Raising up his trident, that dreadful demon extremely difficult to look at due to his glaring lustre like the Sun or the Fire (about to destroy the world) at the end of yugas, rushed at Kṛṣṇa, with his five mouths wide open as if to devour the world as a serpent would rush at Garuḍa.

8. Brandishing the trident with great velocity, he hurled it with all his might at Garuḍa and roared with all his five mouths. The loud roar filled the earth and the heaven, all the directions and the firmament in fact all the cavity of the Brahmāṇḍa (universe).

9. Thereupon powerfully hitting two arrows at the trident as it was dashing against Garuḍa, He cut it into three

2.3. He (Kṛṣṇa) arrived at the great city of the king of demons which was situated on a high peak of the Himālayas, and was inaccessible due to the moats, belts of water, fire and winds and was guarded by soldiers.

2.4. He quickly cut down the snares of Mura by his discus and the terrible rows of swords (round the fortification) with his sword.

2.5. Within the wink of an eye, Hari blew off the water by using the wind missile and extinguished the fire-belt with the missile of Varuṇa (creating downpour of water). And with the terrific blast of his conch, he broke down the spirit (heart) of the proud warriors.
and stuffed the demon's mouths with arrows. The demon (on his part) vehemently hurled his mace at Kṛṣṇa in that battle.

10. In that battle, the invincible elder brother of Gada (i.e. Śrī Kṛṣṇa) shattered, with his mace, the on-rushing mace to a thousand pieces. And as the demon was rushing at him with his arms raised-up, he easily severed off his heads with his discus.

11. With his heads dissevered, the demon fell lifeless into the water like a mountain with its peak cut off by the mighty Indra. Grieved at their father's death, his seven sons, enraged and impatient to avenge it, rushed at Kṛṣṇa fully prepared.

12. Directed by Naraka, the son of the Earth, the seven sons of Mura viz. Tāmra, Antarikṣa, Śravana, Vibhāvasu, Vasu Nabhavān and the seventh Aruṇa, with their commander Pītha at their head, sallied forth to the battlefield, fully equipped with arms.

13. Overwhelmed with rage, they advanced discharging volleys of shafts, swords, maces, darts, double-edged swords and javelins on the invincible Lord. As the tradition goes, the Almighty Lord of unsparing prowess reduced with his shafts the whole volley of weapons to sesamum-seed like pieces.

14. He (Śrī Kṛṣṇa) despatched to the abode of the god of death all of them with Pītha as their leader, with their heads, thighs, arms, legs chopped off and their armours split open. Observing that his army commanders were massacred with the discus and shafts of Lord Kṛṣṇa, Naraka, the son of the

1. V.J.'s Text differs :

11—A. When the demon Mura was killed, a shower of flowers expressing joy at the event, fell on the head of Viṣṇu (i.e. Kṛṣṇa)

2. V.J.'s Reading :

12.1. Directed by Naraka and riding their chariots drawn by bulls, those warriors (sons of Mura) sallied forth from their homes. Overwhelmed with rage they discharged from their well-strung bow, weapons, like darts, ṭṭṭis (double edged weapons) and javelins at the unconquered Lord.

3. V.J.'s Text adds :

13.1. The remaining warriors then immediately sped to the great capital (Prāg-jyotiṣapura) and reported to Naraka that all sons of Mura were killed.
goddess Earth, could not control his rage and rushed out with his elephant-corps all exuding ichor and their pedigree traceable to Airâvata born (i.e. churned) out of the Milky ocean.∗

15. Beholding Kṛṣṇa seated on Garuḍa along with his consort like a cloud emblazoned with a streak of lightening appearing just above the disc of the sun, Naraka discharged at him a Śataghni2. All his soldiers simultaneously struck at him.

16.∗ With his sharp-pointed arrows equipped with variegated feathers, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the elder brother of Gada, mowed down the army of Naraka cutting down the arms, thighs, necks and trunks of the soldiers simultaneously killing the horses and elephants.

17. (What a wonderful feat) O scion of the Kuru race! Hari cut down with three sharp arrows each of the weapons and missiles discharged (at Hari) by the hostile soldiers.

18. He was borne by Garuḍa who (on his part) struck down elephants with his wings, killing them with his bill, claws and wings.

19. Distressed by Garuḍa’s attacks they retreated into the city. Seeing his army killed and routed by Garuḍa, Naraka continued to fight single-handed.

∗ VJ.’s Text adds:

14.1. Surrounded with thousands of chariots and elephants and accompanied by a vast army, Naraka arrived at the battlefield.

1. VJ.’s Text:

15.1 Beholding Kṛṣṇa—the Sun, the four-armed Kṛṣṇa wielding an excellent bow and a conch, the Kaumodakī mace and a disc (in each hand).

15.2. Espying Naraka dark blue like a cloud riding on elephant, Govinda blew his conch and roared like a lion.

15.3. The invincible army of the demon-king showered a volley of terrific arrows on the head of Kṛṣṇa. That son of the goddess Earth discharged at Kṛṣṇa his iron Śataghni and he was struck with that blow.

15.4. It was a miracle when the volley of innumerable arrows discharged by Naraka were simultaneously splintered with his shafts smilingly despatched by the Lord.

2. A weapon used as a missile, supposed by some to be a sort of a rocket—ASD p. 545.

16∗ VJ.’s wording of the 1st half differs:

Then with volleys of sharp arrows decked with variegated feathers discharged at Naraka’s army, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, etc.
20. Naraka, the son of the Earth goddess struck Garuḍa with his Śakti (spear) which had beaten back even Vajra (Indra’s thunderbolt). Though hit by it, Garuḍa did not budge (an inch) like an elephant struck by a garland of flowers.\(^1\)

21. His attempt having been thus frustrated, Naraka, the son of the Earth goddess, took up his spear to strike at Kṛṣṇa, but before he could hurl it, Hari, with his discus (Sudarśana) of razor-like sharp edge, severed the head of Naraka who was riding on elephant.

22. The head still adorned with ear-rings and a beautiful crown, though lying on the ground was shining, splendidly ‘Alas!’ ‘Bravo! Well done’ applauded the sages, while the lords of gods, showering flowers on Śrī Kṛṣṇa, eulogized him.

23. Thereupon the goddess Earth approached Kṛṣṇa and handed over to him a pair of ear-rings resplendent with jewels and chased in the purest gold (belonging to Aditi), accompanied with the necklace called Vaijayanti\(^2\) and a garland of forest flowers (vanamālā), the umbrella (the royal insignia) of Varuṇa as well as a great jewel (or the peak of mount Mandara called Maṇiparvata—vide verse 2 above).

24. The goddess folded her palms, bowed down to him and with her heart full of sincere devotion extolled the Lord of the universe who is adored by gods.

1. \textit{V.J.'s Text adds:}

20.1. Though deeply pierced with that Śakti (spear) Garuḍa did not move at all like an elephant struck with a garland, in that fight with Naraka.

20.2. Thereupon, taking up his bow Naraka discharged a shower of arrows on Kṛṣṇa, but Keśava cut them all with his shafts.

20.3. Noticing that Naraka had properly set an ardha-candra arrow (with semi-circular head) and was about to discharge by pulling the bow-string, Kṛṣṇa cut down his bow.

20.4. Then the son of the mother Earth picked up his heavy mace of hard iron, but Kṛṣṇa cut it with an arrow called Kṣurapra (an arrow with shoe-shaped sharp head).

20.5. After this, Naraka, the vanquisher of hostile forces hurled his sharp-edged axe at Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa) but he cut it down with his sword.

20.6. Then he threw at Kṛṣṇa seventyfive Tomaras (javelins) and Naraka, the destroyer of hostile heroes, roared like a lion.

20.7. Kṛṣṇa simultaneously cut down all the javelins with one arrow. It was simply a miracle, O Prominent Kuru.

2. \textit{V.J. takes Vaijayanti as ‘garland of flowers of five colours’ and Vanamālā as ‘a big garland of flowers and leaves reaching the foot,’ but VR regards both as one: vaijayantya vana-mālāyā saha.}
The Earth-goddess prayed:

25. Salutations to you, Oh God of gods, Oh wielder of a conch, a discus and a mace! I bow to you, Oh Supreme Soul who have assumed form in compliance with the wishes of your votaries.

26. Hail to You, O God with a lotus in the navel (and are thus the cause—creator—of the universe). I bow to You O wearer of the wreath of lotuses (signifying your glorious renown). Salutations to You, O God with lotus eyes (soothing the torments of the world). Bow unto You, O God with lotus feet (deserving adoration and service by the world).

27. Hail to the Lord of (the highest) divine faculties (such as omnipotence etc.), Vāsudeva—the resort of all beings and the All-pervading god Viṣṇu. You are the Supreme Person, present before all the evolutes¹, the Creator (or the Cause) of the Primordial matter (Prakṛti). I bow to you, Perfect Spiritual Wisdom incarnate.

28. Hail to you who are yourself unborn but are the Creator of this Universe; who are the Brahman itself of infinite potencies. You are the Inner Controller of the great and the small, the Master of all elements (or created beings), O Supreme Soul.

29.* O Lord when desirous of creating the universe you assume intense form of rajoguṇa (viz. the four-headed god Brahmā); for the dissolution of the world you support the Tamoguṇa (and assume the form of god Rudra). And for the continuance of the world, you assume the sattva (i.e. Viṣṇu form). You are no other than the Time (Kāla), the Primordial

¹ SR. quotes a Śruti text to support this:

*pūrva evāham ihāsam iti tat tрусasya пuruṣatвam /

29*. VR : O omnipresent Lord! When desirous of creation, you do so by entering the body of the four-faced god (Brahmā) characterised by rajoguṇa. For destruction (of the universe) you enter into the person of Rudra, Kālāgni (Fire burning down the universe) etc. who are dominated by ṭamas. For protection of the world, you enter into the bodies of Manu and other in whom sattva-guṇa is predominant as well as by incarnating yourself directly. It is due to your presence in Kāla (The Time Spirit), Primordial matter (Prakṛti) and the individual Soul that you are designated as Kāla though distinct from them. VR. quotes:

aitad āṁyam idam sarvam, tat satyam, sa āṁdā—Chāndogya 6.8.7 etc.
matter (Prakrti) and the supreme Spirit itself—yet you are distinct from them.*

30. You are one without a second. i.e. the earth (and other elements like) water, fire, wind and the sky, the five tan-mātrās (the subtle elements with their qualities such as sound, taste, touch, form and fragrance), the presiding deities over senses, mind, cognitive and conative senses, ahan-kāra (Ego, I-ness), Mahat (the Principle of Cosmic Intelligence), the mobile and immobile creation all these are illusions imposed on you.

30-A. Yande's Bombay ed. adds in the ft. note (P. 857).

When I was lifted by you, O Lord, in your boar incarnation, this son (Naraka) was born of me in consequence of your contact. So you gave that son to me and now he has been struck down by you.

31. This (Bhagadatta) is his (Naraka's) son. He is afraid and hence I have brought him to your feet, as you remove all the miseries of those who are afflicted. Be pleased to protect him by placing on his head your lotus-like hand which washes off all sins and impurities.

*Sri Suka said:

32. When the glorious Lord was entreated in these words by the goddess Earth in devotion and humility, the Lord vouchsafed him protection and entered the palace of Naraka, full of all affluence.

32A. VJ.'s text adds

Having installed him (Naraka's son, Bhagadatta) on his hereditary throne (lit. kingdom) and reappointed his ministers to their respective posts, Hari entered the series of compartments and dwelling units of Naraka's harem.

33. Hari found there sixteen thousand (and one hundred—) daughters of kings (Siddhas, gods, asuras etc.) brought as captives after defeating various kings.*

---

29* VB : emphasizes that God transcends the gūṇas.

VJ. You are Kāla (the Time-Spirit) which gives effect to the Fate (adṛśta) of beings. You are called Pradhāna as the exalted-most, Supreme Person and are so designated. Or You are purusottama and hence called Pradhāna Puruṣa.

1. ŚR. bases his interpretation on the basis of VPa 5'29.31 (regarding additional one hundred girls) but the second verse quoted by him—
34.* Perceiving the great hero among men enter, the damsels were so fascinated with him that they mentally chose him as their desired-most beloved spouse brought to them by their Destiny.

35. "May this hero be my husband. May god Brahmā (or the Creator) approve and grant my prayer." With this devout feeling for him, all of them severally set their hearts on Kṛṣṇa.

36. Śrī Kṛṣṇa sent them all to Dvārakā in palanquins after they had taken their bath and put on excellent clean dress. He also despatched along with them valuable treasure (of precious stones etc.) as well as chariots, horses and immense wealth.

37. Kṛṣṇa sent sixtyfour, white, four-tusked swift-footed elephants of Airāvata's pedigree to Dvārakā.

VJ.'s Text adds:

37-A. He gave to Bhagadatta one elephant, called Sūrati out of them and sent the rest to the shed.

38. Having gone to the palace of Indra and restored to Aditi her two ear-rings, he along with his beloved consort Satyabhāmā was worshipped by the king of gods along with his queen Indrāṇī.

39. Importunate by his consort, he uprooted the celestial tree Pārijāta and placed it on (his mount) Garuḍa. After defeating the celestials (who resisted the taking away of Pārijāta), he brought it to his capital Dvārakā.

40. It was planted as an (additional) adornment to the garden of Satyabhāmā's palace. Covetously hankering after deva-siddhā-surādīnām nṛpānām ca Janārdana /

\[
hṛtvā hi sa 'surāḥ kanyā rūrōṭha nījamanīr // is not traced in the Gitā Press edition.
\]

34A.*—VJ.'s reading: Seeing him enter, the damsels who were all youthful, well-ornamented and of attractive features were fascinated with the great hero among men.

1. VT. explains that those girls led an austere life, wearing tawny-coloured clothes observing vows and fasts.

2. VJ.'s text elaborates this episode in two chapters. (ch. 65 and 66) which are translated in the Appendix as chapter 59-I and 59-II.
its fragrance and intoxicating honey, black bees from heaven followed it.\footnote{This is described in ch. 67 of VJ.'s text which is translated in the Appendix at ch. 59-III.}

41. Indra touched the feet of Kṛṣṇa with the crests of his crown many times while he bowed to him and begged of him to accomplish his purpose (viz. the recovery of Aditi's earrings, Varuṇa's royal umbrella and others). But once his purpose was achieved, he fought against him. What a great ignorance on the part of gods! Fie upon that affluence!

42. Later on, the immutable Lord assumed as many forms as the number of damsels (brought from Naraka's harem) and on the same specific auspicious time, he simultaneously yet severally married each one of them in their respective mansions with due formalities (and still remained changeless and perfect).

VR.'s Text adds:

42A. Lord Hari grants all the wishes of his devotees. He is infinite and incomprehensible. What is miraculous therein that he was severally and simultaneously present with each of his spouse?

42B. Lord Kṛṣṇa who is the Supreme of all the masters of Yoga, is still visualized within, without and all around in hundreds and thousand forms by his devotees.

43. In their mansions which surpassed all comparisons and were endowed with super-abundant affluence, the imperishable Lord of incomprehensible activities remained present (all the while simultaneously). Though he was perfectly satisfied with his own bliss, he sported with those ānīśas (rays) of goddess Lakṣmī (viz. those newly wedd 16000 damsels) and like other house-holders attended to his house-hold duties.

44. Having obtained the consort of goddess Lakṣmī as their own spouse whose ways (or approaches to whom) are incomprehensible even to god Brahmā and others, those damsels continuously waited upon him with ever-increasing incessant delight, by means of their affectionate smiles, side-glances in their ever-new meetings and their bashful behaviour and speech.
45. Although hundreds of maid-servants were in their service, each of them personally rendered service to the Lord by rising up and advancing to receive him, offering him a seat and excellent articles of worship, washing his feet, offering betel-leaves, removing his fatigue and refreshing him by fanning, application of sandalpaste and garlands of flowers, and by combing his hair, arranging his bed, bath and catering to him refreshments (or presents) to him.

CHAPTER SIXTY

Conversaion between Kṛṣṇa and Rukmini (A Sweet Quarrel)

Śri Śuka said :¹

1. On a certain occasion, Rukmini, the princess of Bhīṣma was waiting upon her consort, the Creator and the Preceptor of the world who was comfortably seated on her own bed while the maid-servants² were fanning.

2. That Unborn Lord, the Controller of the Universe, who, out of sport, creates, protects and destroys this universe,

¹ VJ.'s text gives the introductory background in 4 verses.

² King Parīkṣit enquired :

1.1 Every one of the queens of Kṛṣṇa was devotedly attached to him from the bottom of her heart and every one of them was confident in her heart that she was the only beloved-most queen of Kṛṣṇa.

1.2 Was Kṛṣṇa equal to all in his love of them or was he specially attached to one (of them) ? As I strongly desire to know the fact of the matter, be pleased to narrate it to me.

Śri Śuka said :

1.3 It is widely well-known to all that out of all his queens, Rukmini, the princess of Bhīṣma, was the senior-most and the Lord was loving her the most of all.

1.4 On one occasion, a love-quarrel with her was provoked by Kṛṣṇa. I shall narrate to you the whole episode. Please listen to it, O descendant of the Kurus.

2. Vide verse 7 below.
was born in the race of Yadus for the protection (and enforcement) of the moral ordinances laid down by him.

3-6. O King! (In her mansion) Rukmini was waiting upon her Consort, the Lord of the three worlds, as he was comfortably relaxing on a cushion, white like the foam of milk, on an excellent couch, in her inner apartment which was beautified with a canopy fringed with strings of lustrous pearls suspended from it and with refulgent precious gems as lamps. It (the apartment) was decorated with flowers and wreaths of jasmine resonant with the swarms of humming bees; it was lit up with silvery moon-beams that entered through the appertures of the latticed windows. From the garden a gentle breeze surcharged with the fragrance of Parijata wafted in, while the incense of the fumes of burning aloe wood escaped out of the eyeholes of the lattice.

7. The queen (Rukmini) too from her (female) friend’s hand the chowrie with a (gold) handle studded with gems and began to serve her Lord by fanning Him with it.

8. She was holding the chowrie in her hand adorned with rings and bracelets and was making a jingling sound with a pair of anklets studded with jewels. By the side of Lord Krishna, she looked extremely charming with the lustre of necklace reddened with the saffron applied to her bosom covered in her upper garment and with her priceless girdle worn round her waist.

9. Gazing at her who was goddess Lakshmi herself who was exclusively devoted to him and had assumed a form suitable to the form sportively adopted by him, Lord Hari, being very much pleased with her, smilingly spoke to her who appeared extremely charming with her countenance looking all the more beautiful with her curly locks of hair, ear-rings, gold necklace and her face splendidly beaming with nectar-like (sweet) smile.

1. devate deva-devyayam manasyate ca manushan /
   Vispor dehanur upam vai karotyesatmanas tanum //

   —VP. 1.9.145.
The Lord said:

10. O princess (of excellent beauty and virtue)! You were desired and sought after by rulers of the earth whose affluence and power equalled to that of the divine protectors of worlds; were endowed with majestic splendour and were far-famed for their wealth, beauty of form, magnanimity and might.

11-12. O lady with beautiful eyebrows! Why did you reject the prince of Cedi (Śiśupāla) and others who arrived (at your place) seeking your hand and were mad with intense love for you and to whom you were (already) agreed to be offered (in marriage) by your brother and father? Why did you select us who were in no way their compeer—us, who being afraid of other Kings, have sought shelter in the sea, have contracted enmity with the powerful (monarchs like Jarāsandha) and have practically relinquished the royal throne.

13*. O damsel with lovely brows! Women who (by marrying) follow the path of men whose ways are obscure and who generally follow paths untraversed by the (general) public, generally come to grief.

14. (Women generally approve of the rich even though they may not be good looking.) But we are have-nots and we are generally dear to people who possess nothing (and are poor). Hence affluent people generally do not resort to me, O lady with beautiful waist.

15. (It is advisable that) Marriage and friendship be contracted between those who are equal in wealth, heredity (or family prestige) sovereign power, beauty of form or future prospects but not between the inferiors or superiors.

16. O princess of Vidarbha! Without ascertaining the

* The inner significance of these epithets seems to be as follows (as later brought out in Rukmini’s reply).

Women who seek us whose nature is incomprehensible and who do not follow the trodden-orthodox path of action, reach the abode of the Supreme Man. VR and VB give a similar (though somewhat different) explanations.

 Some epithets in the verse have double meaning:

- g̤un̤ār hina—without i.e. transcending the g̤unas (sattva, rajas)
- bhikṣubhir mudhā—who are eulogized by recluses disinterestedly (without any ulterior motive) vide infra Rukmini’s reply—verses 34-48.

real situation, we who are really devoid of all qualities but are praised for nothing by beggars, have been selected by you due to your lack of foresight.

17. Even at this stage you may choose some prominent Kṣatriya hero who is suitable to you in every respect. You may thereby enjoy all the blessings both here and hereafter.

18. Kings like Śīśupāla, Śālva, Jarāsandha, Dantavakra and others—why even your elder brother Rukmī also—have been hating me (like an enemy), O lady with beautiful thighs.

19. In order to humiliate the pride of those haughty princes who are blinded with the arrogance of their prowess that you have been brought here by me who have to crush the pride of the wicked.

20. As a matter of fact, we do not hanker after women, children or wealth and are indifferent to the world. We are perfectly satisfied in our blissful Self. We are unconcerned to our body or to our household. Like a lamp we are simply a witness who have nothing to work for.

Śri Śuka said:

21. Having spoken to her thus, the Lord who wished to remove the pride of Rukminī who, due to her continuous association with him, regarded herself the beloved-most spouse of her Lord till then, became silent.

22. It is reported that at that time, on hearing this unpleasant speech, the like of which was never heard before—of her beloved, the Lord of the three worlds, queen Rukminī shuddered at heart, began to tremble and shedding tears, sank into fathomless anxiety.

23. Scratching the floor with her shapely foot beautified with reddish nails, sprinkling profusely with tears darkened with collyrium, her breasts rendered reddish by the application of saffron, she stood there with her face cast down and her speech choked with excessive grief.

24. As her reason became benumbed and lost with excessive agony, fear and grief, the fan dropped from her hand which became instantly so much shrivelled and loose that bangles were slipping from them and her body suddenly became unconscious and fell down with disheveled hair like a plantain tree uprooted in a stormy wind.

25. Observing that (indescribably powerful bondage of love of his beloved (owing to which) she could not understand the subtle significance of his joke, Lord Kṛṣṇa who was merciful by nature, took pity on her.

26. Quickly springing down from the couch, the four-armed Lord lifted her up and gathering up her locks of hair, gently wiped her face with his lotus-hand.

27. He wiped out her eyes which were full of tears and her breasts soiled with her tears of grief. He hugged in his arms his chaste faithful consort who was exclusively and absolutely devoted to him, O king.

28. The Lord, who knew how to comfort and was past-master in offering consolation and is the last resort of the righteous and the saintly people comforted mercifully his broken-hearted queen whose mind was bewildered with the (harshness of the misunderstood) subtle joke for which she was the wrong target (lit. which she did not deserve).

The Lord consoled:

29. O princess of Vidarbha! No. Please do not be displeased with me. I know that you are absolutely devoted and faithful to me. O beautiful damsel! It is just with the desire of hearing your retort that I spoke that in jest.

30. It was just to behold your charming countenance with its lower lip throbbing with anger through love, with corners of eyes reddened while casting wrathful side-glances and the knitting of your beautiful eyebrows.

31. This is the highest benefit in the domestic life of the householders that they can spend some hours in joking and jesting with their beloved, O beautiful timid lady.

Srī Śuka said:

32. O king! When that princess of Vidarbha was thus cajoled and comforted in these words by the glorious Lord,

1. The Lord manifested his four arms for the purpose of lifting her up, embracing her, wiping her face etc. ŚR.
she realized that it was nothing but his jocular speech and got over her fear of being abandoned by her dear Lord.

33. Beholding (attentively) the Lord's face through her beautiful affectionate side-glances accompanied with bashful smile, she addressed the most prominent of men, O descendant of Bharata.

Rukmini said:

34. Verily, what Your Lordship has said is factually correctnamely that I am not equal and similar to you who are endowed with infinite excellences (like greatness, beauty etc.). There cannot be any comparison between you who are ever established in your own greatness, the glorious Lord of the trinity of gods (Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra) and I who am Prakṛti (The Primordial Nature) consisting of three guṇas (sattva, rajas and tamas) and whose feet are resorted to by the ignorant.

35. O Supremely mighty Lord (or Lord of mighty strides in cosmic Form)! It is true that you, being as it were afraid of guṇas (sattva, rajas or qualities e.g. sound, smell, etc.) abide in the sea² (i.e. shine eternally in hearts unfathomable like the sea). Being the Supreme Self of infinite pure consciousness, you are ever hostile to wicked senses (or persons who are controlled by wicked propensities). And sovereignty has been spurned away as a position of blinding darkness by your servants. (Then what of you?).

---

1. ŚR. quotes verses enumerating all the epithets Kṛṣṇa used to show his inferiority to Rukmini in his jocular speech above and attempts to show the hidden meaning or the puns used in each which extol the real greatness of Kṛṣṇa as expounded in Rukmini's speech here.

2. VR : What fear can exist for you who covered the three worlds in your strides? It was just to exhibit your intense love for me that you resorted to the sea which has 'sea-ness' like my father, the milky ocean. I being your beloved-most, you love everything related to me.

VJ. samudra—Body constituted of five elements. You abide fully refulgent (of the size of a thumb) in the heart of the body consisting of five elements.
36. The paths of sages who enjoy the honey of your lotus-like feet are not clearly understandable (discernible). And to men of bestial nature, they are certainly incomprehensible. Hence the way of their behaviour like that of the Supreme Ruler is extraordinary and supernatural. Such being the case, need it be said that your course of conduct must be much more so, O Almighty Lord.

37. Are you really nīṣ-kāñcana (a have-not possessing nothing as your own) ? No. For there is none superior to you. Even god Brahmā and others who enjoy (sacrificial) offerings and worship (from others) offer worship to you. Persons who cater to the satisfaction of their senses and are blinded by their affluence do not know that you are the Kāla—the exterminator of all. Your worship is the dearmost to gods who enjoy oblations and (reciprocally) they are so to you.

38. You are indeed the embodiment of all the highest) purposes in human life, the very personification of the fruit thereof, with the desire of attaining which the wise and intelligent people renounce every thing, O Almighty Lord! The association between your worship and them (the master-servant relation)¹ is quite proper. But not so that between a man and a woman who are attached to each other and are subject to pleasure and pain.

39. Your prowess and glory have been extolled by sages who have renounced the staff (the external index of being a recluse). You are the soul of the universe. You are ever willing to bestow your Soul (upon your votaries). Hence I have chosen you rejecting gods like Brahmā, Śiva, Indra whose blessings and positions are shattered down and destroyed by the (vehement) velocity of Time impelled by the slight movement of your brow. What of others (like Śīṣupāla, Śālva and others mentioned by you).

40. O elder brother of Gada! Your words (of having taken shelter at the sea through the fear of kings) are meaningless (as fear is impossible in your case). Oh Lord! putting to flight all kings by the twanging of your Śārūga bow, you carried me away like a lion which routing all beasts, appropriates his own prey. How can it be true that you became afraid of those kings and took shelter at the sea?

¹. VR calls it Ṣeṣa-Ṣeṣi relation.

41. Longing for you, great (lit. crest-jewels of) monarchs like Anåga, Pṛthu (the son of Vena), Bharata (the son of Jayanti, the queen of Rśabha), Yayāti (the son of Nahuśa), gaya and others renounced their undisputed sovereignty over the whole world and entered the forest (for performing penance). Did they suffer here for having taken to the path leading to you, O Lotus-eyed one?

42. What mortal woman with a clear vision that you, the abode of all excellences, are the real objective in life and has once enjoyed the fragrance of your lotus-feet which are extolled by saints and sages, which grants emancipation from saṁsāra to people and are the abode of the goddess Lākṣmī, will disregard them and take resort to another person who is ever subject to the fear of death and saṁsāra.

43. I resorted to you, the Supreme Ruler of the worlds, as a suitable partner, my very Soul who grant all wishes here and hereafter. May your feet which liberate from the false saṁsāra and protect those who resort to them, protect me who am wandering in the cycle of births.

44. O Imperishable Lord! Annihilator of enemies! May the kings (like Śiśupāla and others) listed by you be married to that unlucky woman to whose ears your stories sung in the assemblies of god Śiva and Brahmā, have not reached. For those kings (mentioned by you) behave like a donkey, an ox, a dog, a cat and a menial servant in the homes of their wives.

45. The stupid woman who has not tasted the fragrance of the honey in your lotus-feet will resort as a beloved to a living corpse covered from outside with skin, moustaches, beard, hair on the body, nails and filled inside with flesh, bones, blood, worms, refuse, fleem, bile and wind.

46. O lotus-eyed Lord! You revel in your own self and you do not cherish any extraordinary outlook (i.e. any special love) for me. May my love to your feet be constant when for the advancement of the world you look at me (i.e. Prakṛti) with an excess of rajas, that itself is the highest grace on me.
47. O slayer of Madhu! I do not regard your speech as without significance or false. For sometimes, as in the case of Ambā¹, some girls do set their hearts on somebody else (than the one for whom they are brought to marry).

48. In the case of an unchaste woman though married, her mind hunts after new persons. A wise man should not maintain i.e. marry an unchaste woman, for he falls both here and hereafter.

The Lord said:

49. O virtuous princess! It is only with the desire of hearing this (from you) that you were deceived (by that jocular speech). Whatever you spoke after my speech i.e. the interpretation you have put upon it—is quite true and correct.

50.* Whatever blessings you seek from me shall always be fulfilled as you are absolutely devoted to me, O beautiful lady. But blessings sought from me lead to freedom from desires.

51. Your deep love to your husband and your fidelity to him has been proven, O sinless lady. Though I have tried to move you (and shift your allegiance) with my words, your mind (and fidelity) could not be alienated.

52. Those who, for the sake of conjugal happiness worship me, the bestower of emancipation from saṁsāra, by performing penance and observance of vows, and have given their hearts to sensual pleasure, are deluded by my Māyā.

53. Having attained to (i.e. propitiated) me, the Lord and Bestower of Liberation from saṁsāra as well as of wealth or worldly pleasures, those who long to have only worldly pleasures from me (and not me their Lord and Bestower) are really unfortunate, O proud lady. For, these pleasures can be obtained even in the hell or lower species of life. To men given to such sensual pleasures, life even in hell would be welcome and suitable.

¹. Ambā, a princess of Kāśī, loved the king of Śālva even though Bhīma carried her away to marry his step brother Vicitra-virya.—MBH Adi 102.60-64.

* VJ. Whatever you long to have is always with you already. Hence you do not wish to attain any greatness or power. Or Whatever blessing you wish to have, you have it in me.
54. O deity of my house (and wealth) ! How glad I am that you have borne to me a constant attachment and devotion which liberates from saṁśāra¹ and which is very difficult to practise for the wicked and still more so for deceitful women actuated by wicked tendencies and given to the gratification of low sensual appetites.

55. O Proud lady ! In all the houses, I have not noticed such a loving wife like you who, at the time of your marriage disregarded all the suitor-monarchs assembled (at your place) and despached a Brāhmaṇa-emissary with a confidential message to me of whom you have merely heard good accounts only.

56. You have patiently borne oft-recurring occasions of grief (caused by us) such as the disfiguration of your brother after taking him captive in the battle (by me), the death of your brother (at Balarāma’s hand) while playing at dice (in the gambling hall) on the occasion of (Aniruddha’s) marriage.²

57. That a messenger with a secret clear-worded message was sent by you to secure me (as your consort), that you felt this whole world as void when (you felt that) I delayed and that then you wanted to cast away your body³ as not worthy of any other person (except me). This supreme love of yours (is impossible for me to repay) we can receive you gladly, hailing you with joy.

Śri Śuka said:

58. In this way, imitating the human world in such amorous conversation, the glorious Lord of the Universe, though absorbed in his own spiritual Bliss, indulged in love-sport with Lakṣmī (in the form of Rukmiṇī).

59. In the same way, the Omni-present Lord, the Preceptor of the Universe was present severally in the mansions of all other queens as its Master and simultaneously carried out all the duties prescribed for house-holders.

---

¹ Wealth in the form of Devotion characterised by Love which is itself of the nature of liberation from saṁśāra—VT.
² An anachronism: vide infra ch. 61. 36.
³ vide Supra 29.36:

Tarhambujāka na labheya bhavot-prasādam |
Jahyām astun vrata-kṛṣāṇa saṣājanmabhiḥ syām ||
CHAPTER SIXYONE

Aniruddha’s Marriage: Rukmi Slain

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Each of the above-mentioned queens of Kṛṣṇa bore to him ten sons respectively who were in no way inferior to their father in qualities of head-and-heart.

2. Observing that Lord Kṛṣṇa did not move out of their mansion but was always at home, every one of the princesses, being ignorant of his divine nature, considered herself to be his most beloved wife.

3. Those damsels were enchanted with his countenance charming like a blooming lotus, (knee-) long arms, large beautiful eyes, glances expressive of winning affectionate smiles and sweet conversation, but reciprocally with all the charms at their command, they could not conquer and fascinate the heart of the Perfect One.

4. On the contrary, those sixteen thousand wives of Kṛṣṇa failed to agitate his mind with those shafts of the god of love, and other enticements conveying erotic messages by the movement of their eye-brows charming with the sentiment expressed by their smiles and stealthy side-glances.

VJ.’s Text adds:

4A. Even though their Lord occupied a high seat in their personal mansion, out of bashfulness due to their new union in marriage, those chaste and virtuous damsels cast from behind the pillars their side-glances through eyes full of love at their highly beloved consort, the Lord of saintly people, the sole asylum of the goddess of wealth.

4B. They laughed with joy when their eyes were closed from behind with his hands by their beloved while he was enjoying himself in their mansions. But being afraid of disturbing his passion of love for them, they waited only adjusting garments on their person though it may not be pleasant to him.
5. Having obtained the consort of the Goddess of Wealth and beauty (Lakṣmi) as their own consort, the ways of approaching whom were incomprehensible even to god Brahmā and others those damsels enjoyed with ever-increasing joy and love his affectionate smiles, side-glances with a longing for union felt as ever new.

6. Although hundreds of maid-servants were in their service, each of them personally rendered service to the Lord by rising up, advancing to receive him, offering him a seat and excellent articles of worship, washing his feet, presenting him betel-leaves, removing his fatigue and refreshing him by fanning, application of sandal-paste and garlands of flowers and by combing his hair, arranging his bed, bath and catering to him refreshments.

7. Out of those (sixteen thousand, one hundred and eight) queens of Kṛṣṇa who bore him ten sons each, eight were previously mentioned as principal queens. I shall relate to you about pradyumna and other sons (of these eight queens).

8-9. Pradyumna being the eldest, Cārudeśa, Sudeśa, the chivalrous Cārudeha, Sucāru, Cārugupta, Bhadracāru and his younger brother Cārucandra, Vicāru, Cāru as the tenth—these sons were born of Rukmiṇī. They were in no respect inferior to their father Hari.

10-12. Bhānu, Subhānu, Svarbhānu, Prabhānu, Bhānumān, Candrabhānu, Bṛhadbhānu, and the eighth Atibhānu, Śrībhānu, Pratibhānu—these were the ten sons by Satyabhāmā. Sāmba, Sunitra, Purujit, Ṣatajit, Sahasrajit, Vijaya, Citraketu, Vasumān, Dravid, Kratu—these were the ten sons of Jāmbavatī. Samba and these others were all favourites of their Father.

13. Vīra (v. l. Bhānu), Candra, Aśvasena, Citragu, Vegavān Vṛṣa, Āma, Śaṅku, Vasu, Śrīmān, Kunti were the sons of Nagnajitī.

* ŚR. notes that verses 5 & 6 are extremely beautiful and they are an echo of those in a previous chapter (Supra 59. 44 & 45 with some modification.
14. Śruta, Kavi, Vṛṣa, Vīra, Subāhu, Bhadra, Ekala, Śānti, Darśa, Pūrṇamāsa, Avara and Somaka were the ten sons of Kālindī.

15. Praghoṣa (v. l. Prajaṅgha), Gātravān, Simha, Bala, Prabala, Īrdhvaga, Mahāśakti, Sahas, Ojas and Aparājīta were the sons of Mādri (Lakṣmaṇā).

16. Vṛka, Harṣa, Anila, Grdhra, Vardhana and Annāda, as also Mahāmśa, Pavana, Vahni and Kṣudhi were the sons of Mitrvindā.

17. Saṅgrāmajit, Brhatseṇa, Śūra, Praharāṇa, Arijit, Jaya, Subhadra, Vāma, Āyus and Satyaka were the sons of Bhadrā.

18-19. Diptimān, Tāmratapta and others were born to Hari by Rohini. (She was the chief of the group of sixteen thousand and one hundred queens). A mighty son Aniruddha was born of Pradyumna by Rukmavati the Princess of Rukmi in the city of Bhojakaṭa (while Pradyumna was there).

As the mothers of Kṛṣṇa's sons were sixteen thousand in number, the sons and grandsons of those sons numbered billions.

King Partkṣit enquired:

20. Oh learned sage! How is it that Rukmi who was vanquished in combat by Kṛṣṇa and was eagerly waiting for an opportunity to avenge, gave his daughter in marriage to his enemy’s son? Be pleased to narrate to me how the matrimonial alliance came about between these two deadly enemies.

21. For the Togins can accurately and distinctly see the future, the past and the present as well as what is beyond the ken of senses, which is very remote and screened off (by something else).

Śrī Śuka narrated:

22. Being the actual embodiment of Anaṅga (the god of Love), he (Pradyumna) was selected by Rukmavati in her svayamvara (self-election by the bride-type of marriage). Com-

1. It appears a slip on the part of SR. to equate her with Ģaibya-VT.
2. Obviously a similarity of name in the women of the same family.
pletely defeating the assembled kings single-handedly in his chariot, he carried her away.

23*. Although Rukmī, humiliated by Kṛṣṇa, was cherishing enmity against him (but) with a view to please his sister Rukmini, he offered his daughter in marriage to his nephew.

24. It is reported that the mighty son of Kṛtavarmā married Cārumati, the large (beautiful) eyed daughter of Rukmī.

25. Though still nursing deep hostility to Kṛṣṇa and though aware of the violation of the restrictions of dharmasāstra¹

23* Here VJ's Text adds:

23.1. Rukmī who was humiliated by Kṛṣṇa (by deforming him after defeat) continued to (broad over and) nurse the enmity. By his penance, he propitiated god Śiva abiding on mount Śrī Śaila.

23.2-3. Rudra, the most prominent among boon-conferring gods, was propitiated by Rukmī by performance of penance. He asked Rukmī to seek a boon. He sought for a strong unbreakable bow which will be invincible for hosts of enemies and un-sunderable even to gods. "So be it", said the god Śiva and gave him the bow. But god Śaṅkara cautioned him thus:

23.4. "When you confront god Viṣṇu, this bow will desert you and will return to me. Not otherwise."

23.5 Telling him thus, god Śiva gave him the bow and disappeared. Having secured the boon, the king returned to his capital Bhojakata.

23.6 With the help of the bow, Rukmī brought under his control all kings noted for their prowess in battle. Kṛṣṇa was the only exception.

23.7 With greed of retaining the possession of the bow, Rukmī did not even think of opposing Vāsudeva. Nor did he think of entering into faithful alliance with him, O great king.

23.8 Although he still cherished the enmity, he remembered the words of god Śiva. Pradyumna who was the veritable Manmatha (the god of Love) incarnate, was chosen by Rukmavati in the Svayamvara.

23.9 Having vanquished in the battle, all the kings assembled there (for the svayamvara) single-handedly in his chariot, he carried her away. The great warrior Aniruddha was born of Rukmavati.

23.10 Being directed by (Uṣā) Bāṇa's daughter, Citralekha kidnapped him; and on account of him, the thousand-armed Bāṇa became a two-armed one.

1 Śridhara notes the popular objection that one should not dine with the enemy (doṣad annam na bhoktavyam) and not the real object of dharmasāstra which discourages in-breeding by prohibiting cross-cousin marriages.

VB quotes:

\[
\text{mātā pitāmahī yasya tathaiva prapitāmahī} / \\
\text{tisra eka-kule jātāh so bhiṣastu nigadyate} \| \\
\]
in such a matrimonial alliance, Rukmī, with the desire of pleasing his sister to whom he was bound by the ties of affection, gave his grand-daughter Rocanā to Hari's grandson (Rukmī's daughter's son).

26. For the marriage ceremony, Rukmiṇī, Balarāma, Kṛṣṇa, Sāmba, Pradyumna and others went to the city of Bhojakata.

27. When the marriage ceremony was over, some haughty kings like Dantavakra of Kaliṅga and others urged Rukmī, "Completely vanquish Balarāma in the play of dice".

28. Though ignorant of the game of dice, Balarāma is strongly addicted to it, O king." Thus advised, Rukmī invited Balarāma to play dice and played at dice.

29. In that game, Balarāma consecutively staked wagers of one hundred, one thousand, ten thousand (coins of gold) and Rukmī won them all. At that time the king of Kaliṅga laughed loudly at Balarāma, displaying his teeth—(an insult) with which Balarāma, the wielder of the plough, could not put up.

30. Then Rukmī staked one lakh (coins) as a bet which Balarāma now won. But resorting to deceit, Rukmī asserted, "I am the winner".

31. Agitated with anger like the swelling ocean under the full moon, the glorious Balarāma whose eyes were naturally reddish, became fiery with extreme rage and he staked a wager of ten crores (of gold coins).

32. As per rules of that game, Balarāma rightly won that bet. But Rukmī resorted to false pretext and said, "I have won the bet. Let the umpires declare their decision".

32-A. Vṛj's Text:

"So be it" said Dantavakra of Kaliṅga showing his teeth (grinning) at Balarāma. Balarāma boiled with rage but (controlled himself and) observed silence.

33. Thereupon a voice from the heaven declared, "As per rules of the game, the wager is properly won by Balarāma. What Rukmī says is false."

34. Ignoring the declaration from the heaven, Rukmī, being instigated by wicked kings and impelled so by his (impeding) death, laughed loudly at Saṅkarṣana (Balārāma) and spoke to him.

35. “You are after-all cowherds ranging over the forests and not experts at the play of dice. Kings like us play with dice and with arrows (i.e. fight) and not persons (cowherds) like you.”

36. When thus humiliated by Rukmi and ridiculed by kings, Balarāma flew in rage and taking up an iron bar¹, struck Rukmi down in the assembly of kings.

37. He vehemently caught hold of the (flying) king of Kaliṅga on the tenth pace and angrily knocked out his teeth exhibiting which he laughed at him.

38. Other kings with their arms, thighs and heads broken, chopped off and bathed in blood when struck with the iron bar by Balarāma, fled away in terror.

39. When His brother-in-law Rukmi was slain, Hari being afraid of alienating the relation with his queen Rukminī and brother Balarāma, expressed no remark for or against the incident.

40. Seating Aniruddha along with Suryā in an excellent chariot, Balarāma and others from the Dāśārha clan of whom Lord Kṛṣṇa was the mainstay, and who had accomplished all their objects, left Bhojakaṭa and journeyed to Dvārakā (Kuśasthali).

CHAPTER SIXTY TWO²

Aniruddha taken captive by Bānāsura

The King Pārksīt submitted:

I. The best of Yadus (Aniruddha) married Uṣā, the daughter of Bāṇa. On this occasion a terrible and very great combat took place between Lord Hari and god Saṅkara. O

---

1. v.l. with the dice-board-VJ.
2. Not traced in VJ’s Text.
great yogin! May you be pleased to describe to me in details this episode.¹

Śrī Śuka narrated:

2. Bāna was the eldest of the hundred sons of the great-souled Bali who donated in charity the whole of the earth to Lord Hari who presented himself before him in the form of Vāmana (a dwarf, a Brāhmaṇa boy).

3. Bali’s own son Bāna was always engaged in devotion to god Śiva. He was respectable, generous, intelligent, true of word and firm in observance of vows.

4. Formerly, he used to rule over his kingdom from the beautiful city of Šoṇitapura² as its capital. By the grace of god Śiva even those celestials (the sworn enemies of Asuras) behaved with him as his servants. Endowed with a thousand arms as he was, he pleased god Śiva (the world-delighter) by playing upon musical instruments while god Śiva performed his Tāṇḍava³ dance.

5. The glorious god Śiva, the Lord of all beings, worthy of seeking shelter, who is affectionate to his votaries, asked Bāna to seek any boon. Bāna begged of him to be the guardian deity of his capital.

¹ The Vṛindāvan edition records the following verse from the Text of VT. and other commentators of Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇava school.

² Assamese claim Tejapur as the Šoṇitapur of Bāna. But the route followed by Kṛṣṇa in his expedition against Bāna and its siege etc. (as given in Harivrata), show that Šoṇitapur in Kumaun on the back of Kedār-gaṅgā about 6 miles from Usāmatīha near Gupta Kāśi has better claims to be this Šoṇitapur-GDAM p. 189.

³ According to Bharata, the sage Tāṇḍu was its initiator. But later as Śabdārthacintāmāṇi notes it came to be applied to all male dances and dancing by women was called lātya. It implies violent type of dance in which Rudra indulges at the end of yugas. The violent effect of this dance is expressed in the 1st verse (Maṅgala) of Matsya P. as follows:

Pracanda-tāṇḍavaḍaṁ Praksiptā yena dig-gajāḥ //
bhavantu vighna-bhaṅgīya Bhavaya caraṇāmbujāḥ //

Matsya P. 1.1
6. On one occasion, Bāṇa who was madly elated with his prowess, touched with his crown brilliant like the sun, the lotus-feet of god Śiva who (as the presiding deity of his capital) was near to him and said:

7. “I bow to you, O great God, the preceptor and the highest Ruler of the world, the Wish-yielding tree fulfilling the desires of persons whose longings are not satisfied.

8. The (boon of) thousand arms conferred by you have resulted into a burden to me; for I do not find an equal combatant (against me in the three worlds excepting you).

9. With my arms itching for a fight and being impelled by eagerness to combat, I marched against the elephants (supporting the world) at the end of cardinal points, crushing down the mountains on the way. But being terrified, the elephants hastily took to flight, O Ancient-most Person”.

10. Hearing this (arrogant speech), the glorious god Śiva got enraged and told him, “When your flag-staff (with the peacock ensign) shall be broken down automatically, your combat with some one equal to me will take place and it will humiliate (break down) your pride, O stupid fellow”.

11. Thus snubbed, the Asura with perverse mentality became delighted and repaired to his place. The crooked-minded fellow was waiting for the fulfilment of Śiva’s augury which indicated a crushing blow to his prowess.

12. He had a daughter called Uṣā. Virgin as she was, in dream, she enjoyed sexual pleasure with Aniruddha, the son of Pradyumna as her beloved consort whom she had never seen or heard of.

13. Not finding him there near her (after opening her eyes), she got up in a bewildered state, exclaiming “Where are you my beloved lord?”, in the midst of her girl-companions and was exceedingly abashed.

14. Bāṇa had a minister called Kumbhāṇḍa. His daughter Citralekha was her bosom-friend. Out of great curiosity, she enquired her friend Uṣā:

15. “Whom are you searching for, O friend with beautiful eyebrows? what is the nature of your desire? As far as I have observed, as yet there has been no suitor to your hand, O princess.”
Usā narrated:

16. "In my dream I saw an unknown man of dark complexion, lotus-eyed, endowed with (knee-) long arms, wearing a yellow (silken) garment, captivating the hearts of women (capable of enjoying them).

17. I am seeking after him as my beloved Lord who having allowed me to drink the honey of his lips, has gone (to some unknown place) throwing me into the sea of misery even though I am still thirsty (after him)."

Citralekhā said:

18. "I shall remove (the cause of) your grief. If he who captivated your heart exists somewhere in the three worlds, I shall bring that man. Please tell me who it is."

19. Saying thus she drew graphic portraits (of elite youths) of gods, Gandharvas, Siddhas, Cāraṇas, serpents, Daityas, Vidyādhāras, Yakṣas and human princes.

20. Out of human beings, she drew the portrait of Vṛṣṇi’s: Ugrasena, Vasudeva, Balarāma, Kṛṣṇa. When she saw Pradyumna’s portrait, she felt shy.

21. Seeing the carefully painted portrait of Aniruddha she looked down in shyness and exclaimed smilingly, "It is he. It is he." O Ruler of the earth.

22. Citralekhā who was endowed with yogic powers knew that he was the grand-son of Kṛṣṇa and through the air, she went to Dvārakā under the protection of Kṛṣṇa, O King.

23. Resorting to her yogic powers, she bore Aniruddha, the son of Pradyumna, who was sleeping on an excellent bed and brought him to Śoñita-pura and presented her beloved to her friend, Uṣā.

24. Beholding the most beautiful of beautiful persons, she was extremely rejoiced and in her private apartment which was inaccessible to the eyes of males, she enjoyed herself with the son of Pradyumna.

25. He was respectfully received with excellent garments, wreaths of flowers, perfumes, sweet incense, lights, high seat, with drinks, foods and other eatables, with sweet conversations and personal service.
26. Aniruddha who remained concealed in the princess’s apartment, got his senses captivated by Uṣā whose love for him was ever increasing and he did not know how many days rolled away.

27. As she was thus enjoyed by the Yādava hero and lost her virginity, the attendants observed through marks which could be hardly concealed, that she was enjoying specially joyous life.

28. The servants reported to Bāṇa, “O King, from the behaviour of your daughter, we mark that she is casting a stain on your family.

29. Though we were cautiously guarding her, we do not know how such pollution took place in the apartment of your virgin daughter who was closely guarded and was beyond the reach of male eyes.”

30. Thereupon Bāṇa who was sorely distressed to hear of his daughter’s pollution, hastened immediately to the apartment of his daughter and saw there the best of the Yadus.

31. He saw Aniruddha who was the son of Kāma (Pradyumna), the most beautiful person in the world, dark in complexion, wearing a yellow garment, of lotus eyes, long and mighty arms and with his countenance brightened with the lustre of his ear-rings and locks of hair and was beaming with smiling looks.

32. Bāṇa was shocked to see Aniruddha playing at dice with his beloved daughter who on her part adorned herself with festle ornaments—and wearing between his arms a garland of Jasmine flowers, special to the season of spring, tinged with the saffron on her bosom during his contacts with her person seated in front of her.

33. Seeing Bāṇa enter surrounded with fierce looking soldiers, Aniruddha, the descendent of Madhu, took up an iron bludgeon and took position like Yama, the wielder of the rod determined to finish with any body that may approach him.

34. Like a great boar that kicks away the attacking dogs, he struck them down who attacked him on all sides with the intention of arresting him. Beaten thus by him, they ran out of Uṣā’s palace with their heads, thighs and arms broken.

35. The powerful son of Bali got angry with Aniruddha who was striking down his soldiers and he bound him down with Nāgapāṣa (serpent-like cords).

36. Uṣā was overwhelmed with grief and despondency to see him bound with the cords of Nāga and wept loudly with tears flowing down her eyes.

CHAPTER SIXTYTHREE

Bāṇa Vanquished. Aniruddha brought to Dvārakā

Śrī Śuka said:

1. And thus passed away the four months of the rainy season, while the relatives of Aniruddha, (being unable to trace him) missed him and were grieving for him (for his disappearance), O descendant of Bharata!

2. Learning from Nārada, the report of Aniruddha’s valorous fight and his imprisonment, Vṛṣṇis who looked upon Kṛṣṇa as their presiding deity, speedily marched against Śoṇitapura, the capital of Bāṇa.

3-4. Pradyumna, Yuyudhāna, Gada, Sāmba and Sāraṇa, Nanda, Upananda, Bhadra and others—all loyal followers of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa—these prominent Sātvata heroes accompanied with twelve aksauhinīs of army, laid close siege to the city of Bāṇa, on all sides.

5. Noticing that the parks of the city, fortifications, gates, balconies and towers were shattered down, Bāṇa was fired with rage and taking with him an equally strong army, sallied forth out of the city.

6. The worshipful god Rudra surrounded by the Pramathas and accompanied by his son Skanda, rode his big bull and fought with Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa for the sake of Bāṇa.

7. The combat that raged between Kṛṣṇa and Śaṅkara and the duel between Pradyumna and Guha (Kārttikeya) was tumultuous, astounding and horripilating (making the hair stand on the ends).

8. There was an encounter between Balarâma with Kumbhânda and Kûpakarna; and a duel between Sâmba and the son of Bāna, and between Bāna and Sâtyaki.

9. Great gods like Brahmâ and others, sages, Siddhas, Câraṇas, Gandharvas (celestial singers) heavenly damsels, Yakṣas came in their aerial cars to witness the wonderful battle.

10-11. With sharp-pointed shafts discharged from his Šârṅga bow, Kṛṣṇa put to flight the followers of god Śiva viz. goblins, Pramathas, Yakṣas, Dākinîs, Yâtudhânas, Vinâyakas, Vêtâlas, and ghosts, Mâtrkas, Piśacas Kûsmâṇḍas and Brahma-râkṣasas.

12. God Śiva, the wielder of Pinâka bow, discharged various kinds of missiles on Kṛṣṇâ, the wielder of Šârṅga bow. Śrî Kṛṣṇa, without expressing any surprise, neutralised each and every missile of Śiva by his counter-missiles.

13. He nullified Brahmâstra with a Brahmâstra, Vâyavyâstra (missile creating stormy winds) with Parvatâstra (a missile surrounding the winds by mountain-like obstacles), the Agnyastra (the fire missile) with the rain missile and Rudra’s special Pâśupata missile with his own Nârâyanastra.

14. Then Śrî Kṛṣṇa stupefied god Śiva by making him yawn and lethargic with Jṛmbhañâstra (yawning missile) and in the meanwhile slaughtered Bâna’s army with his sword, mace and arrows.

15. Skanda being pierced on all sides by the streams of arrows discharged by Pradyumna and bleeding in every part of the body, retreated from the battle on the back of his peacock.

16. Kumbhânda and Kûpakarna fell down pounded by the pestle of Balarâma and their armies with their leaders killed, ran away in all directions.

17. Noticing his army shattered and scattered in this way, Bâna became extremely enraged. He left his combatant Sâtyaki, and in his chariot he rode to and attacked Kṛṣṇa.

18. Simultaneously bending five hundred bows, Bâna who was over-proud of his valour, applied a couple of arrows each on each of the bows.
19. The glorious Lord Hari simultaneously snapped all Bāṇa's bows, killed his charioteer, horses and shattered his chariot and blew his conch.

20. Bāṇa had a mother (mother-like presiding deity) called Koṭarā. With a desire to protect the life of her son, she appeared before Kṛṣṇa completely nude with locks of her hair dishevelled.

21. Then (in that situation), Kṛṣṇa turned his face without casting a look at the naked deity. In the meanwhile, Bāṇa whose chariot was broken and bows cut down, retreated to his capital.

22. When all the army of Bhūtas (goblins etc.) fled away, Jvara (Śiva's fever) having three heads and three feet, rushed at Kṛṣṇa burning down as it were, all the ten cardinal points.

22A. And he appeared in the battle in front of Kṛṣṇa.

23. Thereupon the refulgent god Nārāyaṇa had a look at that Jvara and let loose against him his own (Vaiṣṇava) Fever. In this way the Śaivite and Vaiṣṇavite fevers fought with each other.

24. Severely beaten by the fever commanded by Viṣṇu, the Śaivite fever screamed loudly. He could not find any shelter from fear. Being terribly afraid, the fever commanded by Śiva sought refuge with Kṛṣṇa and folding his palm praised him.

Jvara prayed:

25. I bow to you, Lord of infinite potency, the controller of great gods (like Brahmā and others), the Soul of all (the universe). One without a second, (of the nature of) Absolute Consciousness, the Cause of the creation, subsistence and dissolution of the universe, you are what is known as the Brahman which is indicated by the Vedas (but not cognised directly), absolutely serene, subject to no modification.

26. (You, being beyond all attributes, are the Lord of all). The Time-spirit (that impels action), Providence (resultant from the karma or action), Karma, Svabhāva (the natural propensities as a result of Karma), substance (subtle elements),

1. The name of Bāṇa's real mother was Aśānā. VT clarifies that according to V.P. Koṭarit was the family deity of Daityas.
the body, Prāṇa (vital breath called Sūtra), the Ego, modifications (viz. eleven senses—10 conative and cognitive senses+1 mind, the internal organ) and the combination of these evolutes called the Liṅga or subtle body which sets in motion the stream of cause-effect relation like that of the seed and the tree—all is your Māyā. I seek shelter in you in whom there is negation of Māyā.

27. Sportively assuming various incarnations (as Fish, Tortoise, Boar etc.) you protect the gods, saintly persons who abide by the dharma (duties prescribed for their respective class and stage in life) and for their protection you exterminate those who deviate from the righteous path and live by committing violence. This incarnation of yours is intended for lessening the burden of the earth.

28. I am being consumed by the extremely unbearable, terrible, deadly cold fever created by your irresistible energy. Corporeal beings have to suffer, so long as they, remaining enmeshed in desires, do not take shelter at the soles of your feet.

The Lord said:

29. “Oh Triāra! (three-headed fever) I am pleased with you. May your fear from my fear be set at rest. May he who remembers our conversation, be free from fear from you.”

30. Thus ordered the Śaivite Fever bowed down to Lord Kṛṣṇa and departed. But Bāṇa mounting his chariot advanced and fought with Kṛṣṇa.

31. Then equipped with various weapons in each of his arm, Bāṇa who was extremely enraged, discharged a volley of arrows on the Lord with the discus as his weapon, O king!

32. While Bāṇa was discharging missiles, the Lord amputated with his discus, the sharp razor-like felly, the arms of Bāṇa, like branches of a tree.

33. While Bāṇa’s arms were thus being lopped off, the worshipful god Śiva who was compassionate to his devotee approached Kṛṣṇa and requested him as follows:

Rudra submitted:

34. (It is not surprising that Bāṇa fights with you as he is unaware of your real nature, for you age the veritable
Brahman, the Supreme Light lying concealed in the Vedas (which are the Brahman revealed in verbal form). You reveal yourself to sages and hence those sages of pure heart realize you to be all-pervading and pure as the sky and (eternally) absolute.

35. You are indeed the Cosmic Man (Virāṭ puruṣa) that comprise within you (as parts of your body) all the universe. Thus the sky is your navel; the fire, your mouth; water, your seminal fluid; the heavenly region, your head; the cardinal points, your ears; the earth, your feet; the moon your mind; the Sun, your eye; myself (viz. Rudra), your Ego (ahāmkāra); the seas, your belly; Indra (and other protectors of the world), your arms;

36. Herbs and plants are your hair on the body; clouds, the locks of your hair; god Brahmā, your intellect; the pro-creator of the worlds, your generative organ; and Dharma (the god upholding righteousness), your heart. (But this Bāṇa does not know this Cosmic Personality of yours).

37. This incarnation of yours, O Lord of undiminished glory and power (or who stay eternally in Go-loka), is for the protection of righteousness and for the prosperity of the world. All of us (protectors of various spheres) are delegated powers by you and hence we (can) protect the seven spheres of the universe.

38. You are the one without a second, the First Person (beyond all persons belonging to the three states), pure, self-luminous through knowledge, the cause of all but yourself without any cause, the controller (of the universe). Yet you manifest your self through your Māyā as an individual Soul (in every being be it gods, men or subhuman beings) and throw light on everything.

39. O Perfect Lord! Just as the Sun, covered under his own shadow (viz. clouds, his creation) illuminates both the clouds as well as other forms, you, though the Self-luminous, get concealed under the guṇas (viz. Ego) and yet make all the guṇas and their products shine (with your light).

40. With their intellect deluded by your Māyā, men are attached to their sons, wives, houses and other belongings and they sink and come up again in the sea of misery (samsāra).
41. He who, after obtaining this human body (birth) through the Grace of the God, does not worship respectfully your feet, is certainly a self-deceiver fit to be pitied.

42. The mortal man who, for the sake of sense objects which are worthless and hollow, neglects you who are the beloved Soul and the Ruler of the world, consumes poison throwing aside the nectar.

43. I myself, god Brahmā, celestials and sages of pure heart have with all our heart and soul resorted to you who are the most beloved Soul and the controller of the world.

44. In order to get Liberation from saṁsāra, we seek asylum in you and worship you who are the cause of creation, subsistence and dissolution of the world, equal to all, serene, a beloved friend and deity. You are One without a second, the only goal, the one abode of all the world.

45. O god, this Bāṇāsura is my dear devotee deeply attached to me and much liked by me. Full protection has been promised by me to him. Therefore, may Your Grace be extended to him as you did in the case of Prahlāda, the king of Daityas.

The Lord said:

46. O worshipful Śiva! We shall comply with whatever you have requested us and what is pleasing to you. Whatever you have decided (about Bāṇa) has my full approval.

47. This Asura is the son of Bali and as such I should not kill him. I have conferred a boon on Prahlāda that none of his descendants would be killed by me.

48. It was just to curb his arrogance that his arms have been lopped off by me. And his big army is annihilated because it was a burden to the earth.

49. The four arms that are left to him (Bāṇa) shall not suffer from age or destruction. From no quarters this Asura need entertain any fear and he shall be your attendant.

50. Having thus secured protection, the Asura bowed to Kṛṣṇa with his head and brought Aniruddha, the son of Pradyumna along with his bride, placing them in a chariot.
51. Placing in the van, Aniruddha and his bride who were clad in excellent dress, decked with ornaments and guarded by an akṣauhinī of soldiers, Kṛṣṇa set out with compliments from Rudra.

52. He entered His capital (Dvārakā) which was tastefully decorated with flags and ornamental arches, and had its streets and quadrangles thoroughly besprinkled with water. He was warmly received by the citizens, friends, relatives and Brāhmaṇas, with the blowing of conchs and sounding of drums and kettle-drums.

53. He who rising early at dawn, recalls and contemplates on the story of combat between Śrī Kṛṣṇa and god Śaṅkara and Kṛṣṇa’s final triumph, will never meet any defeat in life.

CHAPTER SIXTYFOUR

The Story of Nṛga

Śrī Śuka said:

1. On one occasion Sāmba, Pradyumna, Cāru, Bhānu, Gada and other princes of the Yadu clan went to a park for sports and entertainment.

2. Having played there for a long time, they felt very thirsty. While in search of water, they found a dry well and noticed a strange animal in it.

3. Observing that it is a lizard as big as a hill, they marvelled in their minds. Moved with pity, they tried to lift it out.

4. The boys tied the animal fallen (in the well) with leather thongs and ropes of fiber but were unable to lift it up.

1. Nṛga, a son of Ikṣvāku, was very famous for his generosity and performance of sacrifices (MBH, Sabha 8.8, Vana. 88.5-6, 121.1-2). Due to oversight, he gifted a cow twice for which he was cursed to be a chameleon (MBH Anu. 70.10-28, also Vāl. Rām. 7.24, 7.53).
Overcome with curiosity and surprise, they reported the matter to Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

5. The lotus-eyed glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the creator and protector of the world, went there (to the well). Peeping at it he sportively lifted it up by his left hand.

6. Being touched by the hand of the Lord of hallowing renown, the being instantly shuffled off his body of a chameleon and was transformed into a heavenly being adorned with wonderful ornaments, garments, and garland of flowers and distinguished by a complexion (bright) like molten gold.

6A. VF’s Text adds :

He bowed down to the lotus-feet of Lord Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa) with his head and lay prostrate before him.

7. Although Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa) was omniscient (and as such knew the reason), he enquired of him (the newly transformed god) with a view to making known to the public the cause of his birth in the species of lizards “Who are you, O glorious person blessed with most excellent personality. I believe you must be a great god.

8. My good friend! What act of yours brought you to such a wretched plight which you certainly did not deserve. We are curious to hear your story. Be pleased to narrate it to us if you deem us worthy of being told.”

Śrī Śuka said :

9. When the king (Nṛga) was thus accosted by Kṛṣṇa of infinite forms (Kṛṣṇa, the embodiment of Bliss), he bowed down to the Lord of Lakṣmī with his crown radiant like the Sun, and spoke:

*Nṛga submitted :

10. O Lord! I am a king called Nṛga, the son of Ikṣvāku. My name might have reached your ears if a list of liberal donors has been (at any time) mentioned to you.
11. What is there that is unknown to you who abide as a witness in the hearts of all? And your vision and knowledge are unobstructed by Time. It is, however, in obedience to your command that I recount my history.

12. I donated as religious gift to Brāhmaṇas as many cows as there are sand-grains on the earth or as many as there are stars in the heavens or as many drops in the showers of rain.

13. All those cows were youthful, milk-yielding, possessed of good nature, of beautiful form and excellent breed. They were tawny in colour, had their horns plated in gold and hoofs in silver. They were gifted along with their calves all duly covered with silk garment, garlands and ornaments. And everyone of them was legitimately obtained by me (by paying their price in well-earned money).

14. I used to give them to youthful prominent Brāhmaṇas possessing excellent qualities and noble character; who, though coming from poverty-stricken families, were noted for their vow of truthfulness and were endowed with penance, learning or knowledge of the Vedas, spiritual lore and generosity.

15. I gave as religious gifts cows, lands, gold, houses, horses, elephants, girls (in marriage) along with maid-servants, a lot of sesamum seeds, silver, beds, garments, precious stones, utensils and furniture (necessary) for (unfurnished) houses as well as chariots. I performed a number of sacrifices and constructed wells, tanks and other works of social welfare.

16. (On one occasion) a cow belonging to a prominent Brāhmaṇa strayed and mingled in the herd of my cattle. Not being aware of this, it was gifted by me to another Brāhmaṇa.

17. As the cow was being taken away, the original owner of the cow saw it and asserted to him, "This cow belongs to me". The recipient of the cow as a gift argued, "The cow is mine, for king Nṛga has given it to me as a religious gift".

18. Both the disputant Brāhmaṇas, each trying to estalish his claim, (approached me and) said, "You are the donor of the cow to me". The other asserted, "In that case, you have lifted my cow." And I became confused and embarrassed to hear their claims.
19. Caught in such a religious predicament, I tried to conciliate them with a humble entreaty. "I shall give a hundred thousand excellent cows (all better than this). Please give in exchange this cow.

20. Both of you be pleased to condone this fault which has been unknowingly committed by me—your humble servant. Be pleased to lift me up from this difficult situation whereby I shall be falling in a dirty hell.

21. The original owner of the cow declared, "I am not willing to accept (your offer at all) and he left. The other (new recipient owner) went away saying, "I do not wish to have ten thousand cows in exchange for this cow."

VR.'s Text adds:

21A. O Supreme Lord! May be due to your Māyā power or your will expressed through force of time, I died. O Lord! I narrate in your presence where I was taken away by the force of my destiny.

22. O God of gods! In the meanwhile (after death) I was carried away by the messenger of Yama to Yama's abode. O Lord of the world! I was asked there by the god of death:

23. "Would you like to reap the fruit of your evil acts first or would you like to enjoy the fruits of your meritorious acts first. I do not see the limit of the charitable and religious acts performed by you nor of the glorious world that you have attained thereby."

24. I said, "O god! I shall first suffer for my inauspicious acts". He commanded, "Fall down" and immediately I fell and while falling, I found myself transformed into a lizard, O Almighty Lord.

25. O Keśava! I am your servant (devotee) who have been friendly and charitable to Brāhmaṇas. I have been earnestly craving and striving to have your direct revelation. It is hence that my memory is still unblurred.

26. O Omnipresent Lord! You are beyond the ken of sense perception. You are the Supreme Soul to be contemplated and visualized in their pure hearts with the help of the 'eye' (knowledge) of Upaniṣads by masters of yoga. (Such as you are) I am amazed as to how you came directly within the range of my sight—I whose reason is blinded by extreme miseries—for, you are visualized by those who are to be emancipated from sāṁśāra (Hence I believe I shall be released and this is my last birth).

27-28. O God of gods! Lord of the world! O Govinda (protector of cows or master of senses)? O Supreme Man! O Nārāyaṇa! O Hṛṣīkeśa (the Master of Sense-organs; their prime mover)! O Lord of hallowing renown! O Infallible Lord! O Immutable God! O Kṛṣṇa! Give me leave to return to my celestial state. O Lord! (I pray) wherever I may be (i.e. in whatever species I be born) my mind have asylum at your feet.

29. Hail to you the source (creator) of everything! The Master of Māyā potency! The final resort (or abode) of all beings! O Kṛṣṇa,¹ the Lord of all yogas, I bow down to you. (Though I am unwilling to part from you of above description, I take my leave of you to enjoy the fruits of actions conferred upon me by you”.

30. Submitting to him this prayer, Nṛga circumambulated him and touched the feet of the Lord with his diadem. With his permission, he ascended an excellent aerial car, even as all people were looking on.

31. Lord Kṛṣṇa! The son of Devakī, the God who is friendly to Brāhmaṇas—nay the very Dharma incarnate—spoke to person around him with a view to instruct those born in Kṣattriya class.

32. “The property of Brāhmaṇas, howsoever little it may be, if misappropriated, is indigestible even to the Fire-god (i.e. a person of immeasurable power and glory like the Fire god); what need be said that it is certainly so in the case of kings who, out of (empty) pride, regard themselves as the rulers (of the world).

33. I do not consider the most deadly poison Halāhala as the real fatal poison, as there is an antidote against it. But

1. SR. quotes a Smṛti (Purāṇic?) source which interpretes Kṛṣṇa as Brahma.

    Kṛṣṇir bhū-vācakah sābdah nāsaṁ nirvṛti-vācakah tayor aikyam param Brahma Kṛṣṇo ityabhidhiyate the property of a Brähmana (if misappropriated) is the real poison, as it cannot be counteracted by any remedy in the world.

34. Poison kills (only one person viz.) the swallower. The fire is extinguished with water. But the fire ignited out of churning the Aranyas in the form of (misappropriated) Brähmana property burns the whole race along with its roots.

35. A Brähmana’s property used without his (willing) permission (or with permission under duress) ruins three generations (the enjoyer, his son and grandson). But if usurped and enjoyed per force, it spells disaster to ten generations of ancestors (by forcing them to hell) and ten generation of successors after him.

36.* Kings blinded with the pride of their sovereign power and affluence, are incapable of seeing their own fall. Those kings who regard it good to covet Brähmana’s property which is a veritable hell, are fools.

37-38. Those uncontrolled dictatorial monarchs, their descendants and relatives who deprive Brähmanas of bountiful nature but with large family responsibilities, of their means of livelihood and their property are subjected to torture (lit. are cooked) in the hell called Kumbhipaka for as many years as the number of particles of earth moistened by the tears shed by those Brähmanas while crying.

39. He who confiscates the means of livelihood of a Brähmana irrespective of its being donated to him by himself or by another person, becomes a worm in the faeces for sixty thousand years.

40. (I strongly wish that) I may not come in possession of the wealth or property of a Brähmana (at any time and in any way), by coveting which people are cut short in their prime, kings become defeated and are deprived of their kingdoms and (after death) are born as formidable serpents.

* VR. construes differently: Those kings who regard it good to covet the property of a Brähmana are blinded by sovereign power and wealth, They do not foresee and think over their falling into the hell. They are extremely stupid.

1. One of the 28 hells in which the wicked are baked like potter’s arthen-ware or are immersed in boiling oil.
41. O my kinsmen! Abstain from hatred or injury (in retaliation) to a Brāhmaṇa who has offended you, attacked you or reproached you (with words of abuse). Always pay them your respects.

42. Just as I bow to Brāhmaṇas regularly with a calm and collected mind, similarly you also salute to them. He who fails to do so, shall be receptive of the punishment at my hands.

43. The property of Brāhmaṇa, even though misappropriated without being aware of it, brings about the downfall of the sinner just as the cow of the Brāhmaṇa brought about the fall of king Nṛga though he was ignorant of misappropriation."

44. Having thus taught (dharma) with the actual demonstration (of Nṛga’s case) to the residents of Dvārakā, the glorious Lord Mukunda who hallows all (beings in all) worlds, entered his palace.¹

CHAPTER SIXTYFIVE

Balārāma’s Visit to Gokula—The Course of the Yamunā diverted

Śrī Śūka said:

1. (On one occasion) the glorious Lord Balārāma became eagerly desirous of seeing his friends and well-wishers (at Vraja). Mounting his chariot, he proceeded² to Gokula ruled over by Nanda, O the most prominent Kuru.

1. Here VY’s Text adds:

44.1 Association with the righteous persons will never fail to bear fruit, O King Parīkṣit. It was by virtue of his companionship with the pious that king Nṛga was released from hell (i.e. hellish life).

44.2 As with sacred places, everything done in relation to the righteous—their sight, touch, glorification, remembrance—brings about purification.

44.3 As you have listened to this, O chastiser of enemies, you should always (try to) adore the saintly people. If you desire to have the final emancipation, the property of a Brāhmaṇa should never be misappropriated by you.

2. Pra-yaya—went after wearing the dress of a Gopa (cowherd)—VT. It quotes HV. in its support and informs us that Balārāma went to convey the massage of Kṛṣṇa.
2. Balarāma was warmly embraced by Gopa men and women (at Vraja) who were yearning (to see him) for a pretty long period. He bowed to his (foster) parents Nanda and Yaśodā who welcomed him with blessings (and said):

3. “O Balarāma (of the Dāśārha clan)! May you, the Lord of the universe along with your younger brother Kṛṣṇa, protect us for a long time (just as you do to Yādavas)”. With these words, they placed him on their lap, hugged him and bathed him with tears.

4. He paid respects to elderly Gopas with due formalities and was bowed down by his juniors in age. He met other Gopas (observing courteous exchanges) according to their age, friendly intimacy and according to their (respective) relations (with him).

5. He then approached the cowherds, cut jokes and laughed with them, held them by hands, (expressed other friendly gestures). When he had taken rest and was refreshed, they gathered and seated themselves round him as he was comfortably seated.

6. The Gopas who had renounced their worldly pleasures for Śrī Kṛṣṇa of lotus—(petal-like) eyes were enquired about their health and of their relatives in a voice choked with emotions (and in faltering accents). They also reciprocally enquired about the health of Yādavas as per their relations.

7. “Are all our friends and relatives (at Dvārakā) hail and hearty, O Balarāma? Now that you are a married person blessed with children, do you (occasionally) remember us?”

8. Luckily the wicked Kaṁsa has been slain and it is fortunate that all our friends and well-wishers are liberated (from his atrocious rule). It is really a matter of good luck that after killing and vanquishing your enemies, you have taken your abode in an inaccessible place (Dvārakā)”.

9. Gopīs looked upon Balarāma’s visit as an honour and paid respect to him (In spite of their pangs of separation from

1. VT. carefully collects evidence of the visits of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa from VP. & HV. and points out that they used to visit at intervals when they happened to come to that side.
Krṣṇa) they beamed with a smile and asked, "Is Krṣṇa, the darling of ladies in the city (as against us—rustic women), happy?"

10. Does he occasionally remember his friends, (like the Gopa-Dāman and others), father (Nanda) and mother (Yaśodā) at Vraja? Will he come at least once to see his mother (Yaśodā)? Does that mighty-armed Lord ever remember our modest service (or constant devotion to him)?

11. It is for his sake, O Balarāma that we abandoned our parents, brothers, husbands, sons, sisters and relatives whom it was hard to forsake.

12. Instantly he cut asunder the bonds of friendship with us who were so beloved to him and he abandoned us forthwith. (The cause of our not preventing him from going was his fascinatingly sweet) words—what woman would hesitate to put forth faith in them?

13. (Some Gopīs asked): How would the wise and shrewd women of the town trust the words of that fickle-minded and ungrateful person? (Others replied:) When he provokes the passion of love in them by his fascinating words, his winning smiles and enticing looks, those women being over-powered with love, put faith in his wonderful speech.

14. (Some said): O Gopīs! What have we to do with the talk about him? Tell some other stories. (Drop all references to Krṣṇa). If his time can pass (happily) without us, our time (reciprocally) can do so without him (though in pangs of separation from him)"

15. Recalling in this way the smiles, sweet words, winsome looks, gait, loving embraces of Krṣṇa, those Gopa women wept bitterly.

16. The worshipful Lord Balarāma, past-master in the various ways of consoling, comforted them by conveying to them massages of Śrī Krṣṇa which were most soothing to their heart.¹

¹ Sandeśāiḥ tāma-madhuraiḥ premagarbhāvaraṇvitaḥ / Rāmenāboditā Gopaiḥ Krṣṇasyādiṭimoharaiḥ // VP. 5,24.20.
17. The glorious Lord Balarāma spent there (in Gokula) two months (of the spring season)—Caitra and Vaiśākha and entertained the Gopīs at night.

18. Surrounded by a bevy of ladies (Gopīs), Balarāma sported with them in the gardens on the bank of the Yamunā brightly illumined by the rays of the full moon as the gentle breeze charged with the fragrance of night lotuses was blowing.

19. The heavenly beverage called Vāruṇī, sent by god Varuṇa began to flow out from the hallow of a tree and filled with its fragrance the whole of the forest.

20. Inhaling the fragrance of that stream of honey (like beverage) wafted by the gentle wind, Balarāma went to that tree and drank it along with the women.

VR’s Text adds:

20-A. Glorified in songs and himself bursting out in singing in the circle of beautiful women, he sported himself like Airāvata (Indra’s elephant) in company of she-elephants.

20-B. Kettle-drums were sounded in the heavens, the heavenly beings showered flowers on them in delight. Gandharvas and sages glorified Balarāma’s exploits in great joy.

21. Balarāma (the plough-armed) whose exploits were glorified in songs by the Gopīs, roved in an inebriated condition in the forest, with his eyes swimming in intoxication.

22-23. Adorned with a wreath of flowers and the special garland of five-coloured flowers called Vaijayanti, wearing one ear-ring only, with a smiling lotus-face beautified with dewy drops of perspiration, in an inebriated condition he commanded the Yamunā to come near him to enable him to indulge in water-sports. Being intoxicated, he thought that the Yamunā insolently disobeyed his order. Balarāma got enraged and forcibly dragged her with the pointed plough-share of his plough.

24. (He threatened her): “You sinful one! In total disregard for me you indifferently do not come despite my

---

1. VB. Vāruṇī, born while churning the ocean for nectar, was given to demons. Whatever tree she occupies gives out alcoholic beverage. VT. on the authority of HV. says that Vāruṇī was Varuṇa’s daughter and hence not forbidden. Likewise she creates the beverage in the hollow of the Kadamba tree.
summons to you, but go your own way. By the tip of my plough I shall now divert you in a hundred ways".

25. When threatened thus, the river-goddess Yamunā became afraid and fell at his feet. Trembling with fear she spoke to the delight of the Yadus.

26. "O Balarāma, the Delight of the world! O mighty-armed hero! I did not know your prowess. O Lord of the world, (I now know) that it is with your one āṁśa (part) only, viz. Śeṣa that you support the universe.

27. O Soul of the universe so kind to his votaries! I have come to seek asylum in you, O glorious Lord. It behoves you to set me free (to flow in my own bed) as I did not know your supreme greatness."

28. Thus entreated, the mighty Balarāma then let go the Yamunā. And just like a king elephant entering water with his mates, he entered the waters (of the Yamunā) with the women (Gopīs).

29. After having sported to his hearts content (in the water), Balarāma emerged from her waters when Kānti¹ (a form of goddess Lakṣmī) presented to him two clothes of non-white (blue) colour, highly precious ornaments and an auspicious (brilliant) garland.

30. Putting on those blue garments, wearing the gold necklace, he shone like Airāvata, Indra’s elephant, when painted and tastefully ornamented.

31. Even to this day, the Yamunā is seen to flow through the track (river bed) through which the Yamunā was dragged. It is an index of the great prowess of Balarāma of infinite prowess.

32. Balarāma’s mind was fascinated with the sweet qualities of the young women of Vraja, so he felt all nights passed in sports at Vraja as one continuous night.

¹. ŚR. quotes VP 5.25.16 and states that Kānti is a synonym of Lakṣmī while VT. regards her as a form of Lakṣmī, the Spouse of the second Vyūha Saṅkarṣapa.
CHAPTER SIXTYSIX

Slaying of Paunḍraka and others

Śr̥t Śuka said:

1. When Balarāma had gone to the Vraja under Nanda’s control, the ruler of the country called Karuṣa being full of ignorance, sent to Kṛṣṇa a messenger declaring ‘I am (the real) Vāsudeva.’

2. “You are the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the ruler and the protector of the universe who have incarnated (for the protection of the world)”. Thus flattered by foolish people, he really came to believe that he was the Imperishable Lord.

3. And the dull-witted fellow (being ignorant of the real greatness of Kṛṣṇa) sent an emissary to Lord Kṛṣṇa of inscrutable ways, at Dvārakā, even as an ignorant boy who is set up as a king by other (equally ignorant) children in children’s play would do.

4. The messenger on his part arrived at Dvārakā and conveyed the following message of his king to the Almighty lotus-eyed Kṛṣṇa as he was attending the court-assembly.

5. “I am the only one Vāsudeva who have descended (as an incarnation on the earth) for showing compassion to all created beings. There is no other Vāsudeva. Hence you relinquish your false title.

6. O Sātvata! Whatever emblems of ours (such as Kaustubha Vanamālā, conch, a discus etc.) you bear out of your stupidity, renounce them and come to me for shelter. If not, give a fight with me.”

1. The same as Puṇḍra or North Bengal especially district of Malda and the adjoining area-GDAMI, pp. 95 & 161.
2. Kautalya Arthādstra notes its fame for excellent elephants. D.C. Sircar however identifies Karuṣa with Shahabad region of South West Bihar (SGAMI-332-35). This explains Paunḍraka Vāsudeva’s friendship with the King of Vārāṇasi and his stay at Vārāṇasi whence he advanced against Kṛṣṇa.
Sri Suka said:

7. Hearing that boasting of that puny-minded king Paunḍraka Ugrasena and other members of the assembly laughed loudly.

8. After jocular pleasantries, the glorious Lord replied (through the same) messenger. "O fool, I shall hurl my insignia (such as discus, mace etc.) at you, your emblems and supporters on the strength of which you brag thus (Or: I shall relieve you of all your artificial emblems like Sudarśana etc. on the strength of which you are boasting).

9. (As to your demand for my submission to you) It is you who will be the resort (prey) of dogs with that (braggart) mouth of yours shut. You will lie down dead on the battlefield surrounded by kites, vultures and other birds of prey, you fool."

10. The messenger conveyed that defiant censure to his master in full details. Sri Kṛṣṇa also mounted his chariot, went to Kāśi (where Paunḍraka was staying with his friend, the king of Kāśi).

11. Hearing the intelligence of Kṛṣṇa's invasion, even the mighty car-warrior Paunḍraka quickly sallied forth from the town (Kāśi) with two aksauhinis of army under his command.

12. His friend, the king of Kāśi followed him to guard his rear with his army of three aksauhinis, O king. Hari espied Paunḍraka:

13-14. Who (Paunḍraka) was bearing the (replicas of Kṛṣṇa's arms such as) the (Pāṇcajanya) conch, the (Nandaka) sword, the (Kaumodakī) mace, the Śāṅga bow; was distinguished by the Śrīvatsa mark (on the chest), was wearing (an artificial) Kaustubha gem and was decorated with Vanamāla. He was clad in two pieces of yellow silk and had an ensign of Garuḍa (on his chariot); he was adorned with a priceless crown and very costly ornaments and was wearing two radiant ear-rings of alligator-shape.

15. Seeing him seated (in the chariot) with an artificial dress similar to His own like an actor on the stage, Lord Hari burst into a heavy laugh.
15A. The battalion of archers of the king of Kāśī, equipped with strong bows, covered Kṛṣṇa with arrows within a moment, just as rain-clouds cover a mountain with water. Some of them were seated on elephants, some on horses and some mounted in chariots, all of them marched forward to the battle-front.

16. The enemies (mercilessly) attacked Hari with darts, maces, iron bars, javelins, ṛṣṭis (double-edged swords) different kinds of spears e.g. Tomara, swords and arrows.

16A. Another king, a friend of the ruler of Kāśī came to his help with three aksauhīnis of army, in that battle.

17. Just as the cosmic fire bursting forth at the end of yugas completely consumes all the categories of creatures, Śrī Kṛṣṇa with his mace, sword, discus and arrows, totally annihilated the armies of Pauṇḍraka and Kāśirāja consisting of elephant-divisions, cavalry, chariots and foot-soldiers.

18. That battlefield was scattered over with (parts and limbs of) chariots, horses, elephants, foot-soldiers, donkeys and camels which were cut down and amputated by his discus. Like the terrible dancing arena of Rudra, the battlefield shone, heartening only the brave.

19. Kṛṣṇa, the descendant of Śūra, (sarcastically) said to Pauṇḍraka, "O Pauṇḍraka, whatever weapons you asked me to surrender through your messenger, I now discharge at you.

20. I shall make you give up my epithet which you have falsely assumed, you ignorant fellow. And if I were not to desire to fight with you, I would seek you as a Protector today".

21. With this sarcastic reply (with reference to Pauṇḍraka’s message with his emissary), he deprived Pauṇḍraka of his chariots with his sharp shafts. And just as Indra lopped of the tops (or wings) of mountain, he sundered off the head of Pauṇḍraka with his discus.

22. Similarly, he chopped off with his arrows the head of Kāśirāja from his body and made it fall down in the city of Kāśī like a lotus bud carried with it by wind."
23. Having thus killed the jealous Paundraka along with his friend Kasiraja, he entered the city of Dvarka while his nectar-like sweet exploits were being glorified in songs by Siddhas.

24. Due to the continuous contemplation of Hari, all the (Karma) bondages of Paundraka were completely annihilated. As he always put on a form similar to that of Hari, he became one with Hari.

25. Seeing the head adorned with ear-rings fallen at the palace-gate, people were puzzled as to what it was and whose head it was.

26. When they came to know that it was the head of their own king, queens, princes, relatives and citizens of Kashi lamented loudly "Alas. We are undone. O king, O dear Lord, O Lord".

27-28. His crown Prince Sudakshina performed the funeral rites of his father. He determined, "I shall repay the debt of my father by killing his slayer". Sudakshina along with his family priest propitiated god Siva with the deepest meditation.

29. In the holy place of Avimuktaka (or Kashi), god Siva who was pleased with him, offered him the boon (of his choice). He sought his desired-most boon, viz. the means to slay his father's slayer.

30-31 (Lord Siva advised): 'You should worship the fire known as Dakshinagni (which is also called rtvij) with the help of Brahmanas according to the procedure prescribed for mastering black magic. That fire surrounded by Pramathas (goblins) will accomplish your purpose like a family priest (rtvij) appointed for a purpose, provided it is used against a person who is hostile to Brahmanas and is hated by them. (This implies a warning not to use it against a friend of Brahmanas like Krsna). Observing strictly the prescribed vows, Sudakshina obeyed the directions of Siva (for invoking the malevolent aspect of Dakshinagni) and directed it against Krsna.

1. Out of the three fires maintained in the family, Dakshinagni is to be propitiated for the worship of manes and mastery over black magic (abhicara).
2. Rtvij is an epithet of Agni. vide RV 1.1.1 This is one interpretation.
32. As soon as the abhicāra-prayoga (sacrifice for mastery over black magic) was completed, there arose from the sacrificial pit, god Agni in person, but in his very terrific form. The locks of his hair, beard and moustaches were of red-hot copper. He was emitting flames of fire from his eyes.

33. He had a very grim appearance with large protruding tusks and staff-like long eyebrows. He was licking the ends of his mouth. He was naked and was brandishing a trident that threw out flames of fire.

34. Surrounded by goblins and setting ablaze all the cardinal points, he rushed against Dvārakā shaking the earth under his strides, with his legs tall as a palm tree.

35. Seeing that Abhicāra (malevolent) fire rushing towards them, all the citizens of Dvārakā were terribly afraid like wild beasts at the approach of the forest conflagration.

36. While the glorious Lord was playing dice in the assembly-hall, they ran to him overwhelmed with fear and prayed, “Protect us, O Lord of the three worlds, protect us from the fire that is burning the city”.

37. Listening to the (report of that) public calamity and seeing the cause of their panic, the Lord, who is the shelter of his devotees, laughed loudly and assured them: Don’t be afraid. I shall be your saviour”.

38. The Almighty Lord who is a witness to whatever happens within and without all created beings, came to know it to be the Kṛtyā (female form of the malevolent force) of god Śiva and commanded his discus Sudarśana that was by his side, to destroy her.

39. The Sudarśana discus, the missile discharged by Lord Kṛṣṇa was dazzling like millions of Suns (combined). It was flaming forth like the cosmic fire destroying the universe (at the end of yugas). It was radiating its brilliant lustre in all directions, the heaven and the earth. It forthwith extinguished that Abhicāra fire.

40. Counteracted by the force of the missile (Sudarśana) of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Abhicāra fire called Kṛtyā had all its force curbed down and blunted. As if slapped in the face, it turned back, approached Vārānasī and burnt down Sudakṣiṇa and his family-priests who directed the Kṛtyā.
41-42. Close on its heels, the discus of Viṣṇu entered the city of Vārāṇasī and reduced it to ashes along with its high towers, assembly halls, mansions, market places, towers, enclosures, treasuries, arches, stalls for elephants, horses, chariots, dining halls and kitchens and returned to Dvārakā again and stood by the side of Kṛṣṇa who does everything sportively.

43. The mortal being who listens to this attentively or relates this exploit of the most glorious Lord to others becomes completely absolved of all sins.

V.J.'s Text adds:

43A. Both of them (the narrator and listener of exploits) rid themselves of all sins including heinous ones like Brahmaghyā and when they cast off their body, they proceed to the heaven of Lord Viṣṇu.

---

CHAPTER SIXTYSEVEN

Balarāma slays Dvīvida

King Parīkṣit said:

1. I long to hear again of the wonderful deeds of Balarāma, the possessor of infinite, immeasurable power and miraculous feats. Please narrate what other wondrous deeds he performed.

Sri Śuka said:

2. There was a monkey called Dvīvida, a friend of Narakāsura. He was a counsellor of Sugrīva and a brave and powerful brother of Mainda.

3. In order to avenge the death of his friend Naraka, he caused a great havoc in the country by setting on fire cities, villages, mines and cowherds' camps.

4. Sometimes he uprooted the hills and completely reduced to powder the whole of the Ānarta country where Hari, the slayer of his friend, was living.

---

1. Western Gujarat with Dvārakā as its capital.
5. He was possessed of the strength of ten thousand elephants. Some times he used to stand in the midst of the sea and create a high tide by dashing up volume of seawater with his arms and drown the coastal area under water.

6. The wicked fellow broke down big trees in the hermitages of the great sages and desecrated the sacrificial fires with urine and excreta.

7. Like a wasp imprisoning a worm the naughty monkey shut up men and women in the valleys and caves of mountains and blocked their entrance with big stones.

8. In this way he wrought havock in the country and ravished women of noble birth. Once, hearing sweet enchanting music, he went to the Raivatak hill.

9. There he espied Balarāma, the Lord of Yadus, wearing a lotus-garland, charming in every limb, standing in the midst of a bevy of beautiful damsels.

10. While singing he was drunk with Vārunī and his eyes were swimming with intoxication. He had a brilliant personality and looked like an elephant exuding ichor.

11. The wicked monkey climbed the boughs of the trees and shaking the trees heavily made a chattering sound to attract their notice to his presence.

12. Beholding the insolence of the monkey those young damsels, the spouses of Balarāma, being fickle by nature and fond of fun, burst out into a heavy laughter.

13. In the teeth of Balarāma’s presence, the monkey began to insult the damsels by twisting his eyebrows, making wry faces at them and showing them his hind part. Balarāma, the foremost among warriors, got enraged and hurled a big stone at the monkey.

14. But that wily monkey evaded the stone and (swooping down from the trees) took away the pitcher of wine (from Balarāma) and ridiculed Balarāma by laughing loudly and provoking Balarāma’s wrath.

15. The wicked monkey dashed down the pitcher of wine, tore the clothes of women. Being puffed up with pride, he treated Balarāma with utmost contempt and caused him excessive annoyance.
16. Seeing his mischievous and arrogant behaviour and considering the havoc caused by him in the country, Balarāma flew in rage and took up his pestle and plough in hand, in order to kill the enemy.

17. Dvividā too was endowed with great strength. He uprooted a Śāla tree with his hand and rushing with great vehemence at Balarāma, struck his head with the tree.

18. The mighty Balarāma stood firm like a mountain. He caught hold of the tree (as its blow was) falling on his head and hit Dvividā with the pestle called Sunanda.

19. With his head crushed with the pestle, it became covered with a stream of blood. Dvividā shone with the torrent of blood like a mountain covered with a flow of liquid red chalk. In spite of that, he did not mind Balarāma’s stroke.

20. He again pulled out another palm tree and removing all its leaves by dint of his physical power, he hit Balarāma in rage. But Balarāma splintered it into hundred pieces.

21-22. The monkey again struck him down with another palm tree which Balarāma cut into hundreds of pieces. Fighting in this way with the glorious Lord, he pulled out a palm tree to strike which was broken to hundreds of pieces. Uprooting trees on all sides, he denuded the forest into a treeless tract.

23. Being enraged, he discharged a shower of rocks on Balarāma all of which the wielder of pestle as his weapon, reduced to powder.

24. The leader of monkeys clenched his palm-like long arms into fists and approaching the son of Rohiṇī (Balarāma), he hit his chest with both the fists.

25. The ruler of Yādavas also threw down his pestle and plough and angrily hit with both of his hands on his (Dvividā’s) collar-bones. And he fell down vomiting blood.

26. O king Parīkṣit (a tiger among the Kurus)! As Dvividā fell down, the whole of the mountain along with its peaks and trees began to shake like a boat tossed with a tempest in the sea water.

27. There arose in the skies shouts of victory, salutation and approbation: ‘Well-done’, ‘Well-done’, from gods, Siddhas, prominent sages who were sending forth showers of flowers.
28. Killing in this way Dvivida, the scourge of the land (rendering it desolate), the glorious Lord Balarāma entered his city while he was being glorified in songs by the citizens.

CHAPTER SIXTYEIGHT

Hastināpura dragged by Balarāma

Śrī Śuka said:

1. O King Sāmba, the son of Jāmbavatī, who was always victorious in battles, carried away Duryodhana’s daughter Lakṣmāṇā, at the time of her svayānvara.

2. Kauravas were extremely enraged at this, “This is a naughty boy. Setting us at nought, he per force carried away our daughter who did not want him (as a suitor).

3. Arrest and keep in confinement this unruly, wicked fellow. What can the Vṛṣṇis do? They are enjoying that territory conferred upon them by us and that too through our grace (we are the real masters of that land).

4. If, after hearing of the captivity of their son, they come here, the Vṛṣṇis will sue for peace with their pride humbled down like senses brought under control by breath-control (prāṇāyāma).”

5. With this resolve, Karṇa, Śala, Bhūri, Yajñaketu and Duryodhana

5A. VJ.’s Text:

Along with Duḥśāsana, Śakuni who always gave wrong and wicked advice—all these disregarded Vidura and glorious Gāndhārī...

and with the approval of the Kaurava elders (like Bhīṣma) attempted to bind Sāmba.

6. Noticing that he was being pursued by Kauravas, the great chariot-warrior Sāmba, took up his beautiful bow and stood defiantly like a single lion turned at bay.

1. v.1. like serpents whose fangs are removed.—VJ. *
7. Enraged and eager to take him captive, they shouted, ‘Stop’, ‘Stop’. And under the leadership of Karṇa, those archers covered him with a volley of arrows.

8. Though surrounded by Kauravas, that scion of the Yadu race, the son of the incomprehensible Lord Kṛṣṇa, did not tolerate them like a lion attacked by insignificant beasts.¹

9-10. Twanging his beautiful bow, he pierced simultaneously each of the six chariot-warriors like Karṇa and others, with equal number of shafts. He struck the four horses; with four arrows, the charioteers and the great archers in the chariots with one. All of them applauded his exploit.

11. Attacking him simultaneously, they deprived him of his chariot, each Kaurava warrior killing one of his four horses one his charioteer and the remaining warrior snapped his bow.

12. With great difficulty the Kauravas dislodged him from the chariot and took him captive. Victorious they entered their capital, with the boy as well as the maiden.

13. Hearing the news from Nārada’s report, Yādavas got enraged, O King. And under the direction of Ugrasena, they made preparations of an expedition against the Kauravas.

14. But Balarāma pacified the Vṛṣṇi warriors who made full preparations of war. He was disposed to wash away the dirt (bitterness) of quarrels. He did not wish that there should be a feud between Kauravas and Vṛṣṇis.

15. In a chariot resplendent like the sun, he went to Hastināpura. He was accompanied with Brāhmaṇas and elderly persons of the family like the moon surrounded by planets.

16. Arriving at Hastināpura, he camped in a park outside the town. He deputed Uddhava to Dhṛtarāṣṭra to ascertain what they intended to do in the matter.

17. Uddhava formally paid respects to Dhṛtarāṣṭra, the son of Ambikā, Bhīṣma, Droṇa, Bāhlika and Duryodhana and intimated to them the arrival of Balarāma.

¹ v.1. He did not put up with the insult like a serpent beaten by a stick.
18. They were highly pleased to hear that Balarāma, their best friend had arrived. They warmly received Uddhava and taking into their hands auspicious presents, they went to Balarāma.

19. Approaching him they received him with due formalities and honours offering him arghya and a cow. Those of them who knew of his prowess bowed down Balarāma with their heads.

20. Hearing that their respective relatives were hale and hearty and enquiring after their welfare and health and such friendly talk, Balarāma declared fearlessly.

21. ‘Listen attentively to what His majesty Ugrasena, King of kings, commanded you: Carry out his orders without delay.

22. (We hear) that a great many of you unjustly (according to the rules of warfare) combined and vanquished Sāmba who was fighting singlehandedly (as per canons of dharma-yuddha) and have taken him captive. With the desire of maintaining amity among relatives, I do tolerate this. (But now immediately bring him to us along with the bride).”

23. O Parikṣit, Kouravas became deeply indignant to hear the speech of Balarāma who was endowed with immense power, prowess, energy and whose words expressed his inner strength. They said:

24. “O! How wonderful it is! Due to the inexorable force of time, a shoe covets to ride over the head that is served by a crown.

25. These Vṛṣṇis are related to us by conjugal ties (through Kunti’s marriage in our family). Condescended to share with us the bed, seat and food, the Vṛṣṇis are raised to royal status like us and are favoured with a royal throne.

26. It is due to our indulgence that they enjoy the royal insignia like chowries, fans, a conch, a white umbrella, a crown, a throne and a bed.

27. Now enough of those royal insignia to Yadus who go against their very donors like serpents made to drink nectar (Let us deprive the Yadus of those emblems) who prospered due to our grace are now giving orders to us shamelessly.
28. How could even Indra dare to take what is not given to him by Kauravas like Bhīṣma, Droṇa, Arjuna and others? Can a ram dare to touch what is in the grasp of a lion (unless he gives it up out of grace)?

Śrī Śuka said:

29. Being elated with inordinate pride of their noble birth, their high relations, prosperity, those wicked unmannerly Kauravas addressed unspeakable words within the hearing of Balarāma and returned to their city.

30. Observing the wicked behaviour of Kauravas and hearing their unspeakable reproaches, Balarāma became indignant with wrath and was terrific to look at. Laughing loudly, he repeated to himself:

31. “Verily these wicked persons grown madly arrogant with pride of various kinds, do not desire to have peacefulness. Just as (beating with) a stick is the sure remedy to tame a beast, sound thrashing is the only means to bring these round.

32. It is after slowly appeasing the excited Yadus and indignant Kṛṣṇa that I came here with the intent of bringing about a peace with the Kurus.

33. These dull-witted wicked fellows are naturally inclined to quarrelling. These arrogant fellows have not only treated me scornfully but have used extremely reproachful words to me.

34-35. To them King Ugrasena, the ruler of Bhoja, Vṛṣṇi and Andhaka clans is not a sovereign ruler. Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of goddess Lākṣmī whose orders are obeyed by Indra and other Lords of Spheres, He by whom the celestal assembly Sudharmā is occupied and the heavenly tree Pārijāta is brought (on the earth) and is enjoyed (according to these fellows) does not deserve a high royal seat.

36. Lord Kṛṣṇa whose pair of feet are directly worshipped by goddess Śrī in person, the Controller of all beings does not deserve the royal insignia (according to them).

37. The royal throne is extremely insignificant to him the dust on whose lotus feet is borne on the crowns of their heads by all the Lords of the various worlds (in the universe) and which sanctify sacred waters (like those of the Gaṅgā) resorted to by holy men; and we—that is god Brahmā, Śiva, I (Saṅkarṣaṇa), and even goddess Śrī are but a part of His ray and always bear those particles of dust (on our heads).

38. We, Vṛṣṇis, enjoy the piece of land granted to us by Kurus! And we are nothing better than shoes and the Kauravas themselves the head!

39. What person capable of meting out punishment to others can tolerate the harsh and irrelevant words of those who are drunk with power and wealth and have become intoxicated and insolent?

40. Today I shall rid the earth of all the Kurus'. With this determination, enraged as he was, Balarāma lifted up his plough as if to burn down the three worlds.

41. With the tip of the plough-share, he lifted up the whole city of Hastināpura and angrily began to drag it intending to throw it into the river Gaṅgā.

42. The city that was being dragged and falling into the Gaṅgā, began to rock like a boat. Finding the city so dragged, Kauravas were utterly confounded with consternation.

43. Anxious to save their lives along with those of their families, they placed forward Sāmba and (his spouse) Lakṣmaṇā and with folded palms sought shelter of that very Lord (Balarāma whom they had insulted).

44. 'O Balarāma, O Rāma. You are the support of all. We did not know your prowess. It behoves you to pardon the transgression committed by us who have been foolish and wicked-minded.

45. (You being the substratum of all) you yourself are perfectly independent but you are the cause of the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe. It is true when they say that the three worlds are your toys and you are the player.

46. (Referring to the original state of Balarāma as the Serpent Śeṣa, the support of the worlds:) It is you! O Ananta (Serpent Śeṣa) of thousand heads, who easily hold up this globe of the earth on your head. At the end of the universe, you withdraw the universe within yourself and contain it. And repose on the cosmic waters as the only remaining unabsorbed existence without a second.
47. O glorious Lord! You assume the Sattva guna with the intention of maintaining and protecting the world. Hence your anger is only for teaching a lesson to all and not out of hatred or jealousy.

48. We bow to you who are the Inner Controller of all creatures, O omnipotent and immutable Maker of all! We have sought asylum in you. We offer our salutations to you.

Śrī Śuka said:

49. Balarāma was thus propitiated to be gracious (unto them) by Kauravas who sought his refuge, for they were terrified as their capital city was rocking. Being highly pleased with them, he assured them protection with the words, 'Do not fear'.

50-51. Duryodhana was very affectionate to his daughter. As presents, he (Duryodhana) gave twelve hundred elephants, each sixty years old (in its prime of youth) and ten thousand horses, six thousand goldplated chariots shining like the sun and one thousand maid-servants each adorned with gold necklaces.

52. Glorious Balarāma, the prominent Sātvata, accepted it all and complimented by his friends and well-wishers, he set out with his son (Sāmba) and the daughter-in-law.

53. Returning to his capital Dvārakā, Balarāma met all his affectionate relatives and in the assembly of prominent Yādavas narrated what he did in the Kaurava country.

54. Even to this day the city shows the evidence of the exploit of Balarāma as it is elevated to the South and slopes down towards the Gaṅgā.
CHAPTER SIXTYNINE

Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s Household Life¹

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Having heard that Narakāsura was killed and that Śrī Kṛṣṇa, a single individual as he was, married those numerous women, Nārada became eager to see how Kṛṣṇa managed to live with them all.

2. It is really miraculous that one person (Śrī Kṛṣṇa) possessing a single personality, could severally and simultaneously marry sixteen thousand women, each in a separate house.

3. Being curious to know this, the divine sage Nārada came to see this to Dvārakā which appeared beautiful with its parks and gardens in full blossom and was resonant with the notes of singing birds and humming of the swarms of bees.

4. It was resounded with the sweet warblings and melodious notes of swans and other waterbirds which swarmed the surrounding ponds and pools covered with full blown lotuses, lilies, Kalhāras and lotuses that bloom by day and by night.

5. (Nārada came to Dvārakā) which was thickly studded with nine hundred thousands of palatial buildings constructed with crystals and silver and was shining with excellent emeralds thickly set therein and furnished with articles (of furniture) plated with gold and adorned with jewels.

1. VJ.’s text introduces this chapter with three additional verses. It is after the 3rd verse of VJ. that the texts of ŚR and VJ. agree as from verse 1 above.

Śrī Śuka said:

1.1 Having vanquished all his enemies, Śrī Kṛṣṇa stayed there a number of days enjoying himself with those excellent women in this way.

Karttikeya asked:

1.2 How could one person—Janārdana—who has assumed a human form, give satisfaction to those sixteen thousand queens?

Śrī Śuka said:

1.3 Well. I shall narrate to you what may make the listeners wonder, as to how that one person Śrī Kṛṣṇa gave satisfaction to all the numerous queens.
6. The city looked beautiful with its streets, roads, quadrangles and market places in the city distinctly laid out; with stalls, assembly-halls and shrines dedicated to gods. The roads, court-yards, foot-paths and thresholds of the city were profusely sprinkled with water. The heat of the sun in that city was warded off by everflying flags and pennants.

7. In that city, there was (a complex of palatial buildings known as) the harem of Lord Kṛṣṇa which was highly praised by all the presiding deities protecting different spheres (in the universe). In constructing that (palatial building complex), Tvaṣṭrī, the celestial architect had exhibited all his architectural skill and ingenuity.

8. That part of the city was adorned with sixteen thousand palatial buildings of Kṛṣṇa's queens. Nārada entered into one of the big palaces out of them.

9. It was supported on columns of coral and the ceiling was of Vaidūrya (a precious stone). Its walls were of sapphire and its floor of unfading lustre was paved with the same precious stones.

10. It was also furnished with canopies specially designed by Tvaṣṭrī from which wreaths of pearls were hanging and it (was provided) with seats and beds made of ivory and set with excellent jewels.

11. It was staffed with maid-servants adorned with necklaces of gold-coins and wearing costly apparel and with men-servants wearing coats, turbans, excellent dress and diamond-ear-rings.

12. O child Parikṣit. Darkness in that place was dispelled by the lustre of clusters of jewels radiating light like lamps. In them, peacocks perching in picturesque (artificial) caves screamed loudly and danced gaily regarding (foolishly) the clouds of fumes of aloewood issuing out of the windows, to be the real clouds.

13. The Brāhmaṇa sage Nārada saw there Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Sātvatas who was being fanned with a choutrie provided with a gold handle by his consort who in her turn was waited upon constantly by a thousand maid-servants who were all equal (to each other) in nature, beauty, age and excellent dress.
14. On seeing him, the glorious Lord, the foremost among those who observe the injunctions of Dharma, promptly got up from the bed of Rukmiṇī (the goddess Śrī), paid respects to his feet with his head adorned with a diadem. With folded palms, He made Nārada occupy his own (exalted) seat.

15. Though he himself was the Creator and Preceptor of the universe and the chief among the righteous, he washed Nārada’s feet and bore that water on his own head. The epithet Bhrahmanya-deva (God who is friendly to Brāhmaṇas) is most appropriately applicable to him both in its implication and as a title. For the waters that wash his feet (viz. the river Gaṅgā) sanctifies the rest of the world.

16. Having worshipped the prominent divine sage (Nārada), the Ancient sage Nārāyaṇa, the friend and companion of the sage Nara, addressed him in measured words sweet like nectar and requested “O Lord Nārada! what service should we render to you?”

Nārada said:

17. “O almighty Lord! It is not at all wonderful in you who are the Protector of all the worlds that you entertain friendliness to all people as well as chastise the wicked (there is no contradiction in both these roles). You incarnate yourself at your own sweet will for conferring final Beatitude as well as for the maintenance and protection of the world. We realize this quite well, O Lord who are extolled as the highest one in the Vedas.

18. I have the good fortune of being blessed with the sight of the pair of your feet which in themselves are the blessed state of final Emancipation and which deserve to be meditated upon in their hearts by gods of unfathomable spiritual wisdom like Brahmā and others and which form the support to those who have fallen in the (dark) well of saṃsāra as a means to get out of it. (Hence I have accomplished my purpose). You, however, be pleased to favour me with unfailing, constant memory of your feet contemplating on which I shall move about in the world.”

19. Thereupon, in order to fathom and know the Yogic power of the Lord of the masters of Yoga, that sage Nārada entered the mansion of another queen of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.
20. Even there he found Kṛṣṇa playing dice with his beloved consort Satyabhāmā and Uddhava. He was worshipped with utmost devotion by Kṛṣṇa by rising up to receive him, offering a comfortable seat and such other formalities.

21. Nārada was enquired of by Kṛṣṇa showing as if he was not cognisant of Nārada's arrival. He asked, "When did you come, O worshipful sage? We are after all imperfect beings. What service may we render to perfect (or persons established in the Self) sages like you?"

22. O Brāhmaṇa sage! Be pleased to order us and make this life of ours blessed (by giving us an opportunity to serve you)". Nārada was extremely surprised. He rose up without a word and went to another house (of another queen of Kṛṣṇa).

23. Even there, he saw Lord Kṛṣṇa playing and fondling with his infant sons. Then in another house (of another queen), he saw him preparing for his bath.

24. At some houses, Nārada saw him offering oblations to sacrificial fire, at other places, he was seen worshipping God by performing five kinds of daily sacrifices (called mahāyajñas); at some houses, he saw him feeding the Brāhmaṇas with a feast and at another place, he found him taking food after offering oblations to the sacred fire.

25. At some houses, he was performing sandhyā (twilight prayer); at other places, he was contemplating the Gāyatrī observing complete silence. At some places, he was practising various skills in fencing with a sword and a shield.

26. At some other houses, he found Kṛṣṇa the elder brother of Gada riding horses, elephants or chariots. At some other mansions, he found him lying in bed while being extolled by bards (bandins).

27. In a certain house, he was holding consultations with his counsellors like Uddhava and others; while at other places, surrounded by a bevy of courtesans, he was indulging in water-sports.

28. At some houses, he found him giving highly adorned cows to prominent Brāhmaṇas, while at others he saw him listening to the auspicious stories from Itihāsa and Purāṇas.
29. In a certain house, he was laughing by telling a joke to his beloved; in other places, he was carefully attending to Dharma, while at other places he was looking after matters pertaining to finance and at other places he was indulging in personal enjoyment.

30. At some houses he saw him sitting alone in meditation contemplating on the Supreme Lord transcendental to Prakṛti; at other places, he found him waiting upon the elders and the preceptors by offering them objects of enjoyment and articles of worship.

31. At some places, he was planning war against some kings, while at other places, he was negotiating peace; at some places he was conferring with Balarāma about the well-being of the saintly people.

32. At some place, he saw him celebrating the marriages of his sons and daughters at the proper age with brides and bridegrooms suitable to their status and royal fortune.

33. People were wonderstruck to see the enthusiasm of that Lord of Yoga in conducting festivities at the time of giving send off to children or welcoming those who returned (for example daughters going to their husbands’ houses or returning therefrom after a long stay).

34. Sometimes he saw Kṛṣṇa worshipping all gods with elaborate sacrifices. Sometimes he was seen engaged in performing the pūrṇa duties of religion by digging wells, founding groves, constructing temples, etc., for public weal.

35. At some places, he saw Kṛṣṇa riding a pedigree horse from the Sindh country and chasing a game. Sometimes followed by Yādava warriors, he hunted animals useful for sacrifice.

36. Somewhere he found him moving about incognito among his subjects, their houses, harems etc. with a view to understand the real feelings and plans of the people.

37. In this way, after observing this exhibition of Kṛṣṇa’s vast Yogic powers, though he was following the human way of life, Nārada addressed him with a smile.

38. “O Lord of Yoga! Your Māyā is incomprehensible—nay not even easily cognisable—to the masters of Māyās.
But through the service of Your feet, our hearts are filled with the spiritual light. And we can comprehend your Yoga Māyā.

39. O Lord Kṛṣṇa! Be pleased to give me leave. I shall range all over the worlds overflowing with your glory, celebrating in songs your sportive acts which sanctify the world."

The Lord replied:

40. "Oh Brāhmaṇa sage. I am the promulgator of Dharma. It is I who practice it and grant my approbation to it. I have descended on this world for teaching it by my example. You need not get troubled, O child."

Śrī Śuka said:

41. It is reported that Nārada saw one and the same Kṛṣṇa (present in all the houses of Kṛṣṇa's queens) performing the righteous duties of householders which purify them.

42. Having observed time and anon the vast display of the Yogic powers of Kṛṣṇa of infinite prowess, the sage who became formerly curious about it, was overwhelmed with great astonishment.

43. Nārada who was duly worshipped by Śrī Kṛṣṇa who showed His faith in dharma, artha and kāma, the three objects of human life, was greatly pleased with him. And constantly contemplating upon him only, he went his way.

44. O King! Following in this way the course of conduct as a human being, Lord Kṛṣṇa assumed different forms for the prosperity of the whole of the world; worshipped by the sixteen thousand beautiful damsels with their bashful, affectionate looks and smile, he spent his life delightfully (at Dvārakā).

45. He who celebrates in songs, listens to or expresses approbation for the exploits of Hari which it is impossible for others to perform but which Hari, who is the cause of creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe, has done, will get engendered in him the devotion to the Lord Almighty which will lead to the Final Beatitude.
CHAPTER SEVENTY

Krṣṇa’s Daily Observances : Deputation from Captive Kings of Jarāsandha

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Now, at the approach of the dawning day, the queens of Mādhava, each of whom was sleeping with the arms of their Lord round their necks, cursed the cocks crowing at dawn, as they were nervously anxious about their (prospective) separation from him.

2. Aroused from sleep by the breezes wafting through Mandāra groves while the black bees were humming sweetly, birds began to sing and warble like bards to wake up Śrī Krṣṇa.

3. Closely hugged within the arms of her lover, even Rukmīṇī would not tolerate that extremely auspicious period (called Brāhma muhūrtā) for fear of separation from his embrace.

4. Getting up in the Brāhma period (two hours before the sun-rise), Śrī Krṣṇa would wash his hands and feet and rinse his mouth. Sipping three spoonfuls of water as ācamana, he with a serene mind, used to meditate on the Self (ātman) who is beyond the range of darkness (i.e. Prakṛti).

5. He used to contemplate upon Ātman also designated as Brahman, Who is one without any limiting condition (upādhi), self-luminous, immutable; Who has been eternally free from the taint of Avidyā (Nescience) by virtue of His being established in His own self; Whose existence and blissfulness of nature are revealed by His own potencies that bring about the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe.

6. After meditation, he took bath in clean water after Śāstric injunctions. Putting on two garments, he performed the Twilight-prayer (Sandhyā), and other (prescribed observances. The prominent one among the righteous persons then offered oblations to sacrificial fire and silently repeated the Gāyatri mantra.

7. He used to offer prayers to the rising sun and pour out water libations to gods, sages, his ancestors (pitrā)—all of whom were his own rays—and with a controlled mind, he used to worship the elderly persons and Brāhmaṇas.

8-9. To Brāhmaṇas who were adorned with ornaments, along with silken cloth, deer-hide (Krṣnājina) and sesame seeds, he used to give every day thirteen thousand and eighty-four cows, all of them docile, with horns capped with gold tops and hoofs plated in silver and necks adorned with pearl-necklaces, yielding abundant milk, with only one freshly yeaned calf, accompanied by their calves, beautifully caparisoned.

10. He used to pay respects to cows, Brāhmaṇas, elderly persons, preceptors and all beings who were his own manifestations, and he used to touch auspicious things (like a towny coloured cow, etc.).

11. He himself was one of the ornaments of the world. He used to adorn himself with his special garments (e.g. yellow silken loin cloth or Pitāmbara) and adornments (e.g. the Kaustubha gem) and his special excellent garlands (e.g. the Vanamālā) and pigments.

12. Seeing the reflection of his face in liquid ghee and a mirror and cast his (first) glances at cows, bulls, Brāhmaṇas and gods, he used to take delight in granting the boons and desired objects to people belonging to all classes inhabiting in his city or dwelling in his harem (alike), and satisfying their requirements by supplying the needs of his counsellors and courtiers.

13. He would first distribute garlands, betel-leaves and sandal-pastes to Brāhmaṇas; then he would honour his friends, ministers and queens with them, and lastly he would accept them for himself.

14. By that time, the charioteer used to bring his most wonderful chariot drawn by Sugrīva and other horses and bowing down to him, he used to stand before him.

15. Thereupon, holding the charioteer's hand by his own, he used to mount his chariot along with Sātyaki and Uddhava, like unto the sun ascending the eastern mountain.

16. Gazed at by the ladies in the harem with their bashful and affectionate looks and permitted unwillingly by them, he would proceed captivating their hearts with his bewitching smiles.

17. O king Parīkṣit then surrounded by all Vṛṣṇis, he would enter the assembly-hall called Sudharmā the occupants—members—of which are not subject to six 'waves' i.e. changes in human life (viz. hunger, thirst, grief, delusion, old age and death).

18. Seated there on an excellent, exalted throne, the Almighty Lord shone illuminating all the cardinal points by his personal lustre. Surrounded by lion-like prominent Yadus, Kṛṣṇa, the best of Yadus, appeared like the moon in the midst of the hosts of constellations and stars.

19. O King! There, the court-jesters waited upon the Lord by providing amusements of various kinds. So did the masters indancing with their manly dances as well as dancing girls with their special performances severally.

20. Bards — sūtas, Māgadhās and Bandins danced, sang and extolled him in accompaniment to tabors, lutes, tambourines, flutes, cymbals and conchs.

21. There were seated some Brāhmaṇas well-versed in the exposition of the Vedas. They elucidated Vedic verses as well as told the stories of ancient kings of sanctifying glory.

22. There arrived a stranger not ever seen before. With the permission of the Lord, he was ushered in his presence by the guards at the door.

23. Having bowed to the Supreme Lord Kṛṣṇa, he, with his palms folded, submitted to him the miserable plight of kings who were kept in captivity by Jarāsandha.

24. Those twenty thousand kings who did not submissively acknowledged Jarāsandha's sovereignty during his conquest of all the quarters (of the world), had been taken captive per force and are incarcerated at Girivraja (mod. Rajgir in Bihar).

(The message of the detained kings:)

25. "O Kṛṣṇa who attract the minds of devotees and of incomprehensible nature. You are the destroyer of the fear of those who seek resort in you. We are of poor intellect and are mortally afraid of Samsāra. We seek asylum in you."
26. We bow to that ever-vigilant Time-Spirit viz. you who are all powerful and who suddenly cut short the desire for long life of this world while it is deeply involved in doing prohibited acts and is careless and negligent in performing auspicious actions such as your worship and devotion as enjoined by you.

27. O Lord, You are the controller of the Universe. You have incarnated in this world by a ray of yours (i.e. Balarāma) for the protection of the righteous and chastisement and destruction of the wicked. We do not understand how somebody else (like Jarāsandha) transgresses your orders (with impunity) and why persons (though protected by you) still take to the path of their Karmas (and experience misery).

28. The happiness of Kingship contingent as it is on so many conditions, is an empty dream. We carry on the burden of saṁsāra (and the anxiety and responsibility of wife, children, etc.). with our body which is as good as dead and stands constantly in fear of death. We are extremely miserable in as much as we abandon the spiritual bliss which is obtainable from you by those who renounce all desires and undergo miseries due to (the inexorable force of) your Māyā.

29. The pair of feet of your Lordship destroy the miseries of those who surrender to them humbly. We are at present imprisoned. Be pleased to set us free from the bondage of Karma now called Jarāsandha, the king of Magadhas. Possessed as he is of the strength of ten thousand elephants, he single-handedly took us, kings, captive and imprisoned us in his palace as a king of beasts (a lion) would do to sheep.

30. O Lord with uplifted discus (Sudarśana), Jarāsandha who was defeated by you eighteen times in the battle, has grown insolent by somehow defeating you in one of them. Though you possess infinite prowess you behave like a human being. But Jarāsandha is grinding us, knowing us to be your subjects. O unconquerable Lord, May you be pleased to do whatever you think proper to do (under these circumstances).

31. (The messenger concludes:) Thus the kings who are imprisoned by Jarāsandha are desirous of seeing your Lordship.
They have submitted themselves to the soles of Your feet.
Be pleased to bestow happiness on those hapless kings.

Śrī Śuka said:

32. While the messenger of the kings was thus delivering the message of the kings, there manifested like the sun, the divine sage Nārada of supreme lustre, wearing gold-coloured matted locks of hair.

VR.'s Text:

32A. Nārada entered singing of the exploits and incarnations of his beloved Kṛṣṇa making Kṛṣṇa, his followers and the world as if melt (with the sweet music) and filling them with great delight.

VJ.'s Text:

32B. (Nārada came in) singing in sweet voice and expressions the delightful acts and incarnation of Lord Kṛṣṇa liquidating heaps of sins and filling the world with extreme joy.

33. Seeing him, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Ruler of the rulers of the worlds, rose from his seat and bowed him with his head with great delight, along with the members of the assembly and his followers.

34. Having worshipped him with due formalities and seating him comfortably, he addressed him in sweet words, pleasing the sage with his devotion and sincerity.

35. He enquired, "Are all the three worlds now free from fear from all quarters? It is certainly a great advantage to us that your worship ranges over all the worlds (as we are thereby in a position to know what goes on in the world).

36. To be sure, nothing is unknown to you in all the creation of the Lord. We, therefore, enquire of you what Pāṇḍavas now intend to do.

Nārada replied:

37. O All-pervading almighty Lord, I have witnessed to a great extent a variety of your deluding potencies (māyās)\(^1\)

---

1. VT: Māyās i.e. the creations or products of these māyās viz. a number of Brahmāṇḍas with all various gods such as Brahmā, Viṣṇus who possess their own māyās which are nothing but the powers imparted to them by you.— I have witnessed these etc.
which are inscrutable and insuperable, and which delude even god Brahmā, the great conjuror, the creator of the universe. O Perfect one! By your powers you abide in all created beings and yet you remain with your splendour undisclosed like fire remaining latent in the logs of wood. (Although you are omniscient, you assume ignorance like a human being). Hence your query causes me no surprise.

38. Who is capable of knowing comprehensively what you intend to do, for you create as well as destroy this universe by your Māyā Potency. The universe appears to exist due to your Māyā (though it is unreal). I bow to you who are in essence distinct from everything else and are thus of incomprehensible nature.

39. O Lord! I seek asylum in you who have enkindled the brilliant lamp (beacon-light) of your glory by sportively assuming various incarnations. This light is for those jivas who wander in the cycle of samsāra and do not know the way to Final Emancipation from the bondage of the body which is the source of all evil.

40. Though yourself the Supreme Brahman, you imitate the ways of human beings in the world. I, however, report to you what king Yudhiṣṭhira, the son of your paternal aunt and your devotee plans to do.

41. King Yudhiṣṭhira, the son of Pāṇḍu, aspires to be a sovereign ruler of the world. He, therefore, wishes to worship you with Rājasūya, the greatest of all sacrifices. You may therefore, be pleased to grant your approval (to their plan).

42. Gods, sages and illustrious kings will certainly attend that grand sacrifice with eagerness to see you.

43. O Lord! Even (cāndālas and other) outcastes become purified by listening to your stories, muttering your name or glorifying you and by contemplating on you who are Brahman incarnate. What need be said of those who perceive you directly and come in personal contact with you?

44. Your glory which is absolutely pure has enveloped like a canopy all the quarters and has spread out all over the heavenly regions, the earth and the subterranean regions and it renders the world absolutely pure. O Lord! Your very presence is auspicious to the world. The waters that wash your feet are known as the Mandākini in the heavens, the Bhogavati in lower regions and as the Gaṅgā in this world and they hallow the universe.

Śrī Śuka said:

45. When Yādavas, the clansmen of Kṛṣṇa, being fired with the ambition of vanquishing Jarāsandha were not in a mood to approve of Nārada’s words (but insisted on an expedition against Jarāsandha) instead of going to Rājasūya, Kṛṣṇa smilingly spoke in soft words to Uddhava, his devoted and loyal servant.

The Lord said:

46. “You are our best eye, a well-wisher and knower of the crux of political deliberations. Therefore, advise us what we should do under the circumstances. We believe in you and shall abide by your advice.”

47. When thus called upon to tender advice by his Master, the Omniscient Lord, as if he were an ignorant person, Uddhava respected his order with his head, bowed down and replied (as follows):

CHAPTER SEVENTYONE

Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s visit to Indraprastha

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Having heard the words of the divine sage Nārada, and considering the views of the members of the assembly and that of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the greatly intelligent Uddhava spoke as follows:

Uddhava said:

2. O Lord! As advised by the sage Nārada, you should render help to your cousins (sons of your paternal aunt) in the performance of that sacrifice and also should extend protection to those (kings in the captivity of Jarāsandha) who desire to seek your shelter.

3. O Almighty Lord! It is only the conquerer of all the cardinal points who is eligible to perform the Rājasūya sacrifice.

VR.’s Text adds:

3A. We should at first set out from this place to go to Indraprastha. It is there (at Indraprastha) that with Yudhiṣṭhira’s permission, you should slay Jarāsandha for the sake of Yudhiṣṭhira. Hence, in my opinion, victory over the son of Jarā (i.e. Jarāsandha) will serve both the purposes.

4. We shall be achieving our great object by this act (of vanquishing Jarāsandha). And great glory will accrue to you by setting at liberty those imprisoned kings, O Govinda!

5. (To Yādavas who are eager to kill Jarāsandha, Uddhava cautions :) In physical strength that king (Jarāsandha) equals ten thousand elephants and as such, is irresistible to others who (regard themselves and actually) are mighty, except Bhima who is his equal in strength.

6. It is only in a single combat that he can be conquered and not otherwise (with a powerful army), as he commands an army of one hundred aksauhinīs. He is friendly to Brāhmaṇas. And when requested by Brāhmaṇas, he would never refuse it.

7. Let Bhīmasena assume the guise of a Brāhmaṇa and approach him to beg of him single-handed combat with himself. There is not the slightest doubt that in your presence Bhīma will certainly kill him in that duel.

8. You are the formless Time-spirit who, as the Supreme Lord, are the real cause of the creation and destruction of the universe, while gods Brahmā and Rudra are mere instruments. So Bhīma will be the mere instrumental cause of killing Jarāsandha while (as a matter of fact) you are the real slayer.

9. (When Jarāsandha will be killed) the queens of those (released) kings will sing in their (respective) palaces your glorious act in slaying their own (common) enemy (who imprisoned their husbands) and of setting at liberty their husbands (who are dear to them as their own selves), just as Gopīs sing of their deliverance (from the demon Śaṅkhacūḍa;) sages who resort to you for shelter glorify you for the rescue of the king of elephants (from the alligator), and the release of Sitā, the daughter of Janaka (from Rāvaṇa’s captivity) and we who are protected by you, sing of your exploit in setting free your parents (Vasudeva and Devakī from the imprisonment of Kaṁsa).

10. O Kṛṣṇa! The killing of Jarāsandha will tend to serve many great objectives (purposes) with the fruition of the meritorious acts of the kings (resulting in their release and re-instatement on their thrones), and the fructification of the evil acts of Jarāsandha (resulting in his death and that of Śiśupāla as well). For performance of the Rājasūya sacrifice meets your approval.

Śrī Śuka said:

11. O King! This counsel tendered by Uddhava was so correct and good in every respect that the divine sage Nārada, Yādava elders and Śrī Kṛṣṇa as well, expressed their approval of it.

12. Thereupon the all-pervading glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devakī, sought the permission of his elders and preceptors and ordered his servants like Dāruka, Jaitra and others to prepare for the journey.

13. Having sent in advance, the ladies of his harem, sons, attendants and their kit, and after getting the formal permission of his elder brother Balarāma and Ugrasena, the king of Yādavas, Śrī Kṛṣṇa mounted his chariot brought to him by his charioteer and distinguished with the flag bearing the emblem of Garuḍa, O chastiser of enemies.

14. Thereupon, surrounded with his formidable army comprising of chariots, elephants, foot-soldiers and horsemen and led by their respective military leaders, Kṛṣṇa set out from Dvārakā filling all the quarters with the brilliant fanfare and tremendous sound of the beating of tabors, drums, kettledrums, conchs and horns or trumpets.

15. The devoted and virtuous queens of Kṛṣṇa, all clad in excellent garments, adorned with precious ornaments, pigments and garlands and well-guarded by attendants armed with swords and shields—followed their husbands along with their sons in golden palanquins and vehicles borne by men and drawn by horses.

16. Mounting on vehicles and litters drawn by men, and on camels, oxen, buffaloes, donkeys, mules, carts and elephants and packing and loading their portable shelters of thatched cottages and tents, woollen blankets, cloths and other articles of their kit, on both sides of the animals, the attendants (of Kṛṣṇa) and courtesans all well-adorned, travelled in his train.

17. Like unto the sea grown agitated with roaring high waves and restless whales, the enormous army, dinning with loud noise and with its lofty flags, big banners, umbrellas, chowries, excellent weapons, ornaments, diadems (or helmets) and armours, was shining brilliantly under the bright rays of the sun.

18. Thereupon, the sage Nārada who was worshipped by Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Yādavas, felt all his hearts and senses deeply satisfied and happy at the sight of Mukunda. After listening to his decision and accepting the reception offered to him, he bowed to Kṛṣṇa and meditating upon him (and thus installing him in his heart) he left Dvārakā, soaring up in the sky.

19. (When Nārada left) the Lord promised the messenger in a kindly tone: "O messenger! You need not be afraid. May good betide you! (I shall see to it that) Jarāsandha, the king of Magadhas, be killed."

20. Thus assured by the Lord, the emissary departed and reported in details to the kings all that happened. The kings longed to get their freedom restored and eagerly looked forward to Kṛṣṇa's actual appearance.

21. Having travelled through Ānarta¹, Sauvīra² and Marus³ and also Viṇaśana⁴, he crossed over mountains and rivers and passed by towns, villages, cowherd-settlements and quarries.

1. Gujarat and part of Malwa—GDAMI, p. 7.
4. Near modern Sīrā in Kurukṣetra or Brahmāvarta—the land between the Sarasvati and the Drīḍadvatī—SGAMI, p. 49.
22. Later on, after crossing the river Drṣadvati (Mod. Ghaggar) and the Sarasvati, he passed through the Pāṅcāla country and the Matsya\(^1\) region and arrived at Indraprastha.

23. Hearing the report of the arrival of Śrī Kṛṣṇa whose sight is very rare to ordinary human beings, king Yudhiṣṭhira who was friendly to all, was highly delighted and went out of the city (to receive him) along with his family priests and accompanied with his friends and well-wishers.

24. In the symphonic combination of vocal music (glorifying Kṛṣṇa in songs) and instrumental music and with the loud chanting of the Vedas, he eagerly approached Lord Kṛṣṇa just as senses do (i.e. are revived instantaneously) after the return of the chief Prāṇa (vital breath).

25. Having seen Śrī Kṛṣṇa, his dearest friend and relative after a long time, the heart of Pāṇḍu's son (Yudhiṣṭhira) melted with deep affection and he embraced him again and again.

26. Embracing with both of his hands the Person of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the sacred abode of the goddess Lakṣmī, the king Yudhiṣṭhira was purged of all sins. With his eyes overflowing with tears and the hair of his body standing on ends, he felt highly blessed and forgot all the delusions about the world.

27. Beaming with a smile and with all his senses and mind overwhelmed with the force of (overpowering) affection, Bhima embraced his maternal cousin (son of his maternal uncle) and enjoyed great felicity. Arjuna and the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, with profuse tears of joy embraced Acyuta\(^2\), the best of their friend and well-wisher.

28. Embraced by Arjuna and paid due respects by Nakula and Sahadeva, Kṛṣṇa saluted Brāhmaṇas and other elderly persons according to their seniority and other worth.

29-30. Paid respects by them, Kṛṣṇa reciprocally honoured Kauravas, Śrījayas, Kekayas, barids like Sūta and Māgadha

---

1. The territory of Jaipur including Alwar and some part of Bharatpur —GDAMI, p. 128.
2. SR. explains : While Arjuna bent to bow Kṛṣṇa, being equal in age, Kṛṣṇa held him up in his embrace while he was bowed down by Nakula and Sahadeva, his juniors.
and celestial singers, bards and court-jesters\(^1\) praised him while others played upon musical instruments, like tabors, conchs, lutes, drums and horns or trumpets, danced and sang.

31. Lord Kṛṣṇa, the crest-jewel among persons with hallowing renown, was thus accompanied by friends and well-wishers who were eulogizing him. With them he entered the well decorated city of Indraprastha.

32. The roads of the city were sprinkled with scented water and the ichor that exuded from the temples of elephants in rut; it was decorated with variegated flags, golden arches and pitchers full of water (at the entrance of houses); it appeared beautiful with its well-washed citizens wearing new silken garments, ornaments, wreaths of flowers and perfumes as well as with young-women who were equally well-dressed, adorned and anointed in pigments.

33. Kṛṣṇa saw the capital of the king of Kurus (Yudhiṣṭhira) teeming with houses that were illuminated with a row of big lights, offerings of flowers, etc. It was charming on account of the latticed windows out of which were issuing out scented fumes, and flags were merrily flapping on the house-tops which were decorated with domes of gold pitchers surrounded with big crests of silver.

34. As soon as the young damsels heard of his arrival, they immediately abandoned their domestic work and even their husbands in bed and flocked to the royal road (the main street) to see the one object worthy of drinking with (the goblets in the form of) eyes by the people, even though due to their eagerness to see him and in their haste, their locks of hair got dishevelled and the knots of silken garments, loose.

35. Women who climbed the terraces of their houses saw Kṛṣṇa along with his queens on the road that was crowded with elephants, horses, chariots and footmen. They showered flowers over him and embraced him with their hearts and extended a warm welcome to him with their profusely smiling looks.

---

1. The annotators differ slightly in assigning these musical activities among sūtas—upto Brāhmaṇas and court-jesters. VT. is uncertain, hence VR is followed.
36. Observing the queens of Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa) on the road accompanying their husband like constellations of stars surrounding the moon, the women of the town remarked to each other: (We don’t know) what meritorious act must have been done by these consorts of Kṛṣṇa whereby this excellent-most personality (of Kṛṣṇa) extends (offers) delight to their eyes with his noble smiles and winsome amorous looks.

37. In the town, at every stage, citizens with auspicious things in their hands, approached Kṛṣṇa and worshipped him. So did the leaders of trade-guilds rid themselves of all sins.

38. Warmly received by ladies of the harem with their eyes blooming with joy and excited with eagerness, Kṛṣṇa entered the palace of the king Yudhīśṭhīra.

39. When Kuntī beheld her brother’s son Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the three worlds, her heart was full of delight and affection. She got up from the couch along with her daughter-in-law Draupadī and hugged him (affectionately).

40. Having brought Kṛṣṇa, the God of gods to his palace, with respect and devotion, king Yudhīśṭhīra was so beside himself with joy that he could not understand how to proceed with the formalities of worship (of such a respectable guest).

41. O king Parīkṣit! Śrī Kṛṣṇa, however, bowed down to his paternal aunt Kuntī and paid respects to elderly ladies. He himself was bowed down by Draupadī and his sister Subhadrā.

42-43. Instructed by her mother-in-law Kuntī, Draupadī duly worshipped the queens of Kṛṣṇa such as Rukmini, Satyabhāmā, Bhadrā, Jámbavatī, Kālindī, Mitravindā, Śāibyā, and the pious Nāgnajitā and other women-guests, with garments, wreaths of flowers, ornaments, etc.

44. King Dharmarāja made comfortable arrangement of lodging for Śrī Kṛṣṇa and that of his queens, members of the army, followers and counsellors providing everyday with new objects of enjoyment.

45. Accompanied with Arjuna, Kṛṣṇa propitiated the Fire-god, offering him the Khāṇḍava forest for consumption. He rescued Maya (from the fire) who constructed a heavenly assembly-hall for king Yudhīśṭhīra.
46. With the desire of pleasing king Yudhiṣṭhira, Kṛṣṇa stayed many months at Indraprastha. Occasionally, surrounded by warriors, he rode out in a chariot with Arjuna for excursion and sport.

CHAPTER SEVENTYTWO

Jarāsandha slain

Śrī Śuka said:

1-2. (When Kṛṣṇa had spent a restful period for some days) on a certain occasion, king Yudhiṣṭhira was seated in his court-hall attended by sages, Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and his brothers, preceptors, elders of the family, clansmen and relatives. He addressed Kṛṣṇa within the hearing of them all.

Yudhiṣṭhira said:

3. O Lord Govinda! I intend to adore you and your hallowed part-manifestations (in the form of Indra and other deities) by performing the noblest of sacrifice called the Rājasūya. May you be pleased (to help us) to accomplish this.

4. O lotus-navelled Lord? Your feet destroy everything inauspicious. Those pious people who constantly worship them physically, contemplate on them mentally, and sing of them vocally attain emancipation from saṁsāra. They obtain even worldly blessings if they so desire but not others.

5. O God of gods! Let the world, therefore, witness the supreme efficacy of the service of your lotus-like feet. O Lord! Be pleased to demonstrate to the Kaurava and Śraujaya chiefs, the status reached and fruits reaped by those who worship you and by those who do not do so.

6. O Lord! You are Brahman himself, the Inner Soul abiding in all beings. You eternally enjoy your essential state of blissfulness and look upon all as equal. Hence the notion of difference such as 'this is mine' and 'this is not mine' cannot be predicated of you. Like persons betaking to the celestial wish-yielding tree, your grace is conferred on those who serve you and it is commensurate to the measure (and intensity) of their service, and there is no violation of this law.

_The Lord replied:_

7. O King! This resolution of yours is excellent. O destroyer of enemies? By performance of the Rājasūya sacrifice your auspicious fame (as the conqueror of all kings) will pervade the three worlds.

8. The performance of this sovereign sacrifice is desirable not only on behalf of us, your friends and well wishers, but also on behalf of sages, your ancestors, gods and all created beings.

9. Having defeated all the kings in the world and thus brought under control the whole of the earth, collect all the necessary articles of sacrifice and then commence the performance of this great sacrifice.

10. O King! These brothers of yours are born from the rays of the deities (such as Indra, Vāyu) who are the guardians of the worlds. And I, who am never won over by persons lacking self-control, have been conquered by you, by your control of mind and senses.

11. In this world, not even a celestial being can discomfit my devotee by his energy, glory, affluence or supernatural power, much less can an earthly being do so.

_Sri Śuka said:_

12. Having heard the approbatory speech of the Lord, king Yudhiṣṭhira became extremely delighted and his countenance looked cheerful like a fresh-blown lotus. He assigned the conquest of cardinal points (of the world) to his brothers who were imbued with the lustre and energy of god Viṣṇu.

13. He commanded Sahadeva to conquer the South along with Śrīnjayas and deputed Nakula to the West, and Arjuna to the North and Bhīma, in alliance with Matsyas, Kekayas and Madrakas to the East.
14. Conquering the kings with their might and energy, those warriors brought from those quarters immense wealth to king Yudhishthira who was preparing for sacrifice.

15. Hearing that Jarasandha could not be conquered, Yudhishthira became anxious. They say that to Yudhisthira who was pondering (over the subjugation of Jarasandha), Krishna, the Primary Cause of the world, suggested the expedient suggested by Uddhava.

16. O Parikshit! Thereupon, the three (warriors)—Bhimasena, Arjuna and Krishna—disguised themselves as Brahmaunas and went to Girivraja (the capital of Magadha) where stayed Jarasandha, the son of Bhadratha.

17. Those three Ksattriyas disguised as Brahmaunas, went to Jarasandha's palace at the time of receiving unexpected guests (with no previous appointment). They begged of king Jarasandha who was friendly and devoted to Brahmaunas and was a keen observer of the sacred duties of the householder.

18. O king! Please know us as unexpected guests who have come over a long distance for soliciting a request. May god betide you! Be, therefore, pleased to grant our request.

19. Is there anything unbearable to people with fortitude and endurance? What act is there which the unrighteous would hesitate to do? What is there that the generous cannot give away? What person is a stranger or an enemy to those who look upon all as equals.

20. Whoever, endowed with capability to do so, does not, by means of this perishable body, achieve everlasting glory worthy of being sung by the righteous, is worthy of being pitied and censured.

21. Kings Hariścandra, Rantideva, Śibi, Bali, Mudgala (who lived on grains gleaned from fields), the legendary pigeon (who sacrificed its life for the hunter and the hunter (who emulated the pigeon's example) and many others attained to everlasting fame at the cost of this transient body.

Sri Śuka said:

22. From their tones, appearance, the scars on the forearms caused by the friction of bow-strings, Jarasandha came to know that they belonged to the Ksattriya class. He also felt that he had seen them formerly somewhere. He began to think :

23. “These are certainly Kṣatriyas who have adopted the guise of Brāhmaṇas. I shall give whatever they beg of me even if it be my body which is difficult to part with.

24. The glorious fame of king Bali is heard glorified far and wide in all directions even though he was dislodged from his sovereign position by Viṣṇu in the disguise of a Brāhmaṇa.

25. The great king of Daityas, knowing full well that it was Viṣṇu in the form of a Brāhmaṇa and though prevented by his preceptor Śukra, he gave away the earth to Viṣṇu in the guise of a Brāhmaṇa who intended to deprive Bali of his sovereignty and splendour for the sake of Indra.

26. What is the good of this life of that wretched Kṣatriya who does not aspire to attain vast renown at the cost of this perishable, ever-waning body for the good of Brāhmaṇas.”

27. Reflecting thus, the noble-minded king Jarāsandha spoke out to Kṛṣṇa, Arjuna and Bhima, “O Brāhmaṇas. Choose whatever you desire to have. I shall give even my head to you.”

Lord Kṛṣṇa replied :

28. “O great king. We are Kṣatriyas who have come here to seek a fight. We do not beg for food. We want a fight with you, in a single combat if it pleases you.

29. This is Vṛkodara (Bhima) the son of Kuntī. This is his brother Arjuna. Please know me as Kṛṣṇa, their maternal cousin and your sworn enemy.”

30. Thus informed by Kṛṣṇa, the king of Magadh has laughed loudly. Getting enraged, he declared, “you dull-witted fellows, (if you so seek it) I shall give a battle with you.

31. I shall not fight with a coward like you who get confounded in battles. Out of my fear, you abandoned your capital Mathurā and sought shelter in the sea.

32. This Arjuna is neither equal in age nor surpassing me in strength. And hence he is no match for me as a combatant. Bhima is my equal in strength.”
33. With these words, he handed over a huge mace to Bhīmasena and taking another tremendous mace for himself he went out of the town.

34. There on a level ground as the arena, the two warriors closed in fight against each other, both of them, being proud and furious in battle, hit each other with their maces hard like (Indra’s) thunderbolt.

35. While they were making skilful wheeling manoeuvres to the right or to the left, the combat became spectacular like the one of actors on the stage.

36. O king! When the maces hurled at each other clashed each other, there arose a harsh and cracking sound cat cat resembling the clapping of Vajras (Indra’s thunderbolt) or like the clashing of the tusks of two fighting tuskers.

37. Just as two twigs of the sun plant are reduced to pulp when two elephants, furious with rage, fight with each other with those twigs, those two maces hurled with full force of their arms dashed against each other and came in contact with each other’s shoulders, hips, feet, hands, thighs and collar-bones and were reduced to powder.

38. When their maces were broken down in this way, those furious warriors among men pounded each other, boxing with fists as hard as iron. The noise produced by the blows of their palms as they struck each other was like that of two tuskiers dashing against each other and was harsh like the striking of Vajra (or clapping of thunder).

39. Both Bhīma and Jarāsandha were equal to each other in training, strength and energy. They struck each other with unabated force. The combat however remained undecided.

40. In this way twentyseven days passed while they fought by day but behaved like friends at night (when the combat was over).

41. O king Parīkṣit! On one day Bhīmasena confessed to Kṛṣṇa, his maternal uncle’s son, “O Mādhava (Descendant of Madhu), I am unable to vanquish Jarāsandha in the duel.

42. Śrī Kṛṣṇa knew the secret of the birth and death of the enemy and how the demoness Jarā conferred life on Jarāsandha. He strengthened Bhīma by transferring his energy and began to consider.

43. He hit upon a plan of killing the enemy. Kṛṣṇa of infallible insight showed it to Bhīma symbolically by splitting a twig.

44. Bhīma, a prominent warrior of enormous strength understood the suggestion conveyed to him. He took hold of Jarāsandha by both his feet and felled him on the ground.

45. He pressed down one foot of the enemy with one of his feet and with his both hands he caught hold of the other foot and tore him in two from the anus, like an elephant splitting a branch of a tree.

46. Now people beheld the two separate parts of the body each with one foot, one thigh, one testicle, one hip, half the back, one breast, one shoulder, one arm, one eye, one eyebrow and one ear.

47. There was a great outcry, when the king of Magadhas was slain. Clasping Bhīma in their arms, Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa applauded him.

48. The glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa is the creator and protector of all beings. None could fathom his greatness and power. He installed Jarāsandha's son Sahadeva as the king of Magadhas on the throne and set at liberty kings kept in confinement by Jarāsandha, the king of Magadhas.

CHAPTER SEVENTYTHREE

Return of Kṛṣṇa and others to Indraprastha

Śri Śuka said:

1. Twenty thousand eight hundred kings who were easily defeated in battle (by Jarāsandha) were kept confined in a valley surrounded on all sides by the mountain. (Released from captivity) they came out with unclean bodies and dirty clothes.
2. Emaciated with hunger and with mouths parched up and greatly reduced in bodies due to confinement for a long time, the kings saw Lord Kṛṣṇa of dark blue complexion like a cloud, wearing yellow silken garments.

3. He was bearing the mark of Śrīvatsa; had four arms. His eyes were reddish like the inner part of a lotus-flower and he was charming and gracious in appearance. He was adorned with brilliant alligator-shaped ear-rings.

4. He was holding a lotus in one of his hands and was wielding a mace, a conch and a discus (Śudarśana) in the remaining three arms. He was adorned with a crown, a necklace of pearls, bracelets, a zone and a pair of armlets.

5. His neck was shining with the excellent jewel Kaustubha and had a garland of forest-flowers (Vanamālā) hanging on his bosom. The kings appeared to drink him with eyes and to lick him with tongues.

6. They were as if smelling him with their noses and embracing him with their arms. They bowed to the Lord with their heads touching his feet and rid themselves of all sins.

7. At the sight of Śrī Kṛṣṇa they were so much overjoyed that they got over the languor and exhaustion caused by their incarceration. Folding their palms, the kings eulogized Hṛṣīkeśa (Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of all senses) in the following words:

_The kings submitted their prayer:_

8. We bow to you, O God of Gods. You remove the distress of those that seek shelter in you, O Immutable Lord, Being disgusted with the terrible samsāra we have resorted to you. Pray, be pleased to protect us, O Kṛṣṇa.

9. O Lord! Slayer of the demon Madhu! We do not blame that Jarāsandha, king of Magadhas. It is really your Grace that we kings were deprived of our kingdoms, O Almighty Lord.

10. A king elated with pride of sovereignty and affluence does not attain the Final Beatitude, but being infatuated by your deluding potency (Māyā) looks upon the transient worldly fortune as permanent.
11. Just as children (or foolish people) mistake a mirage as a pool of water, persons without discriminatory power, ascribe reality to the everchanging Māyā which brings about modifications.

12. O Lord! Formerly we were blinded by our pride of kingship and affluence. In our ambition to conquer this earth, we competed with each other slaughtering mercilessly our own subjects. We were so madly proud that we did not think of death or of yourself, who were ahead of us.

13. O Kṛṣṇa! By your form called Time, of inexorable velocity and infinite prowess, we were despoiled of our former affluence and sovereignty. It is through your Grace that today we, with our pride completely destroyed, are contemplating on your feet.

14. We do not aspire after this mirage like sovereignty which is to be enjoyed by this ever-decaying body, a nursery of ailments). Nor do we seek to enjoy after death the fruits of our (religious or meritorious) actions (in heaven) which sound so pleasant to the ears, O Almighty Lord.

15. Pray, be gracious to teach us, that expedient whereby we shall never lose the memory of your lotus-like feet (and continue to contemplate on them) even while we are involved in the series of births and deaths.

16. We repeatedly pay our salutations to Lord Kṛṣṇa, the son of Vasudeva, the destroyer of the misery of saṁsāra (even of Daityas), the Supreme Self. You are the remover of sufferings of those who bow to you, O Govinda (Lord of Senses).

Śrī Śuka said :

17. O dear Parīkṣit! Thus eulogised by the kings who were now freed from captivity, the merciful Lord who affords protection to those who seek it, spoke to them in sweet language as follows:

The Lord said :

18. O monarchs! As desired by you, from now onwards your unflinching devotion unto me who am the Ruler of the universe and the Self, abiding in all, shall grow strong and deep-rooted.

19. How glad I am at your correct resolution, O kings. What you expressed is the truth. For I have seen how growing pride of affluence and authority has a maddening effect on people.

20. Haihaya (Sahasrārjuna), Nahuṣa, Vēna, Rāvana, Naraka and other rulers of gods, demons and human beings have fallen down from their positions, in consequence of their arrogance, begotten of their prosperity and power.

21. Being thoroughly cognisant of the fact that everything that is created like the body (and other things connected therewith) is perishable, you worship me by performing sacrifices and be alert and protect your subjects in a righteous manner, O monarchs.

22. You secure the continuity of your family by begetting children. Bear up with equable mind, the weal and woe, prosperity and adversity, birth or death as it comes to your lot and carry on your life devoting your heart to me.

23. Remain indifferent to your body and things connected with it. Take delight in the spiritual bliss of the self and observe vows of self-discipline. Thus, concentrating your mind properly and steadily in me, you will ultimately attain to me who am the supreme Brahman.

Śrī Śuka said:

24. Having enjoined the kings in the above manner, Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Ruler of the Universe ordered male and female servants to give them a bath.

25. He made Sahadeva (now the king of Magadha) to receive them respectfully, by giving them clothes, ornaments, wreaths of flowers and pigments worthy of kings.

26. When the kings had taken an excellent bath and put on their rich clothes and ornaments, they were served with dainty dishes and were offered various luxuries worthy of kings such as betel-leaves, etc.

27. Having been honoured by Mukunda, these kings, wearing brilliant ear-rings and freed from their distressful conditions, looked resplendent like planets at the end of the rainy season.

28. Mounting them in chariots decorated with gold and jewels and drawn by good horses, and cheering up their hearts with sweet yet sincere words, they were sent to their respective countries.

29. The kings who were thus relieved of their hardships by the highly noblesouled Kṛṣṇa, returned contemplating on Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the universe and his noble deeds.

30. (Arriving at their capitals) they told to their ministers (and subjects) the glorious deeds of that Supreme Person and carried on their life (and government) diligently as per instructions of the Lord.

31. Having slain Jarāsandha through the instrumentation of Bhīma, Keśava was worshipped by Sahadeva and accompanied with the two sons of Kuntī (Bhīma and Arjuna), he left for Indraprastha.

32. Having reached Khaṇḍavaprastha, these three warriors who had vanquished their enemies blew their conchs, thrillings their friends with delight and their foes with terror.

33. Hearing that sound, the citizens of Indraprastha became delighted in their minds. They concluded that Jarāsandha had been killed and king Yudhiṣṭhira also felt that he had accomplished his object.

34. Having bowed down to king Yudhiṣṭhira, Bhīma, Janārdana and Arjuna reported to him in details all they had severally done.

35. Having heard how compassion had been shown by Kṛṣṇa, Dharmarāja shed tears of joy and was too much overwhelmed with love to express a word.
CHAPTER SEVENTYFOUR

Yudhiṣṭhira's Rājasūya: Śiśupāla slain

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Having thus heard about the slaying of Jarāsandha and also about Lord Kṛṣṇa's supreme glory, king Yudhiṣṭhira was highly delighted. He addressed him as follows.

Yudhiṣṭhira said:

2. All the preceptors of the three worlds (like Sanaka and others) and all the great gods, the protectors of different worlds, do bear on their heads your commands when they have the privilege to receive that Grace which is rarely obtained by others.

3. O Lord of infinite prowess and glory! That lotus-eyed personage like you bears and carries out commands of factually indigent persons who regard themselves conceitedly as rulers, is itself an extreme mockery unbecoming of you as below dignity.

4. But you are the Supreme Brahman like unto the effulgence of the Sun, the glory of the Brahman, the Supreme Self who is one, without a second is neither enhanced nor diminished by the performance of acts by you.

5. O unconquerable Lord of Lākṣmi! Just as the beasts (or ignorant people) entertain the (perverse) notion of difference pertaining to their body indexed by such terms as "I and mine", "You and yours", even your devotees do not possess such a crooked notion of difference (Need it be said that it is totally absent in you?)

Śrī Śuka said:

6. Addressing Kṛṣṇa thus and with his approval, Kunti's son, Yudhiṣṭhira invited competent and worthy Brāhmaṇas who were proficient in the Vedas and the sacrificial ritual, to officiate as priests (at the Rājasūya sacrifice to be performed) in a period suitable for the celebration of such sacrifices such as the spring.
7-9. (Krṣṇa- ) Dvaipāyana (Vyāsa ), Bharadvāja, Sumantu, Gautama, Asita, Vasiṣṭha, Cyavana, Kaṇva, Maitreya, Kavaṣa, Trita, Viśvāmitra, Vāmadeva, Sumati, Jaimini, Kratu, Paila. Parāśara, Garga, Vaiśampāyana, Atharvan, Kaśyapa, Dhaumya, Paraśurāma (of the Bhṛgu clan), Āsuri, Vṛitihotra, Madhucchandas, Viṣesena, Akṛtavrāṇa—these and many others were invited.

10. (And also were invited) Droṇa, Bhīṣma, Krpa and others, Dhṛtarāṣṭra with all his sons and the noble-minded Vidura.

11. Brāhmaṇas, Kṣattriyas, Vaiśyas, Śūdras whoever was desirous of seeing the sacrifice, and all kings and their ministers (and subjects) assembled there, O King.

12. Thereupon the Brāhmaṇas ploughed the sacrificial ground (where gods are to be worshipped with oblations) with gold ploughs and following the scriptural injunctions, they consecrated the king as the sacrificer.

13-15. As the tradition goes, all the utensils used in this sacrifice were of gold as they were at Varuṇa’s Rājasūya sacrifice in ancient times. Indra and other protecting deities of different spheres, god Brahmā and Śiva along with their attendants, Siddhas and Gandharvas (celestial singers), Vidyādharas and big serpents, sages, Yakṣas, Rākṣasas, birds, Kinnaras, Cāraṇas, kings along with their queens—all of them were invited and they attended the Rājasūya sacrifice of Pāṇḍu’s son, Yudhiṣṭhirā.

16. They were not surprised at all, †s they thought that such a performance is quite natural to the devotees of Krṣṇa (to whom nothing is impossible). The sacrificial priests who looked brilliant like gods, conducted for the king, the Rājasūya sacrifice according to sātric injunctions, as the gods did for the sake of Varuṇa.

17. On the day fixed for extraction of the Soma juice, the king with serene mind duly worshipped the highly respectable Brāhmaṇas conducting the sacrifice as well as the judges of the sacrificial performance.

18. The members of the assembly could not arrive at a unanimous decision as to who should be regarded as worthy of receiving the first honour of worship as there were many deserving claimants. At this juncture, Sahadeva spoke out.

19. “(It is my considered opinion that) the imperishable Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Lord and protector of Sātvatas deserves this highest honour. For he is not only all deities but also Time, space, wealth and other things.

20. This universe is his manifestation. He constitutes the sacrifices. The sacrificial fire, oblations offered in the fire, the mantras recited at that time and the paths of knowledge and Yoga or devotion are meant for him.

21. He is One without a second; the universe is his manifestation O members of the assembly. Entirely dependent on himself and though himself unborn, he creates, protects and dissolves this universe.

22. It is through his Grace that people perform different actions, penances and yogic practices and everyone tries to achieve their high objects in life such as dharma (religious practices), artha (wealth), kāma (worldly enjoyment) and mokṣa (Final emancipation).

23. Therefore, this highest honour ought to be offered to Lord Kṛṣṇa who is the greatest of the great. It is thus by offering him the honour of the first worship in the assembly that we shall be honouring all created beings as well as ourselves.

24. He who desires to reap infinite merit in return for his gift should offer it to Lord Kṛṣṇa who constitutes the Soul of all created beings and looks upon all as his own self, (or attached to his devotees) quite serene (desireless) and absolutely perfect.”

25. Sahadeva, who knew the supreme greatness of Kṛṣṇa addressed them in this way and observed silence. Hearing that all excellent and pious members of the assembly were satisfied and approved of the speech with the words “well said, well expressed”,

26. Hearing the decision of the Brāhmaṇas and ascertaining the consensus (lit. what was desired in the hearts) of the members of the sacrificial assembly, king Yudhiṣṭhira was highly pleased. Overwhelmed with affection, he worshipped Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of senses (as the foremost member of that assembly).

27. Then having washed the feet of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, he (Yudhiṣṭhira) along with his queens, younger brothers, counsellors and members of his family, delightfully bore on their heads (drops of) that water (with which he washed the Lord’s feet) which was capable of purifying the world.

28. He worshipped him by offering yellow silken cloths, and very valuable ornaments. But he could not see him clearly as his eyes were flowing with tears (of affection and joy).

29. Seeing Kṛṣṇa so worshipped, all people (in the assembly) folded their palms and offered him salutations with the words Namaḥ (Bow to you), Jaya (Victory to you). And showers of flowers fell down (from the sky).

30. Hearing this (above-mentioned) shouts of salutation and victory, Śiśupāla, the son of Damaghoṣa, whose anger was provoked by the glorification of Kṛṣṇa’s excellences, rose from his seat. He raised up his arm. Being enraged he fearlessly uttered harsh words (with reference to and) for the hearing of Lord Kṛṣṇa.

31. “The Vedic text that the Time-spirit is the real controller (capable of bringing about undesirable events) and that it is inviolable, is quite true. (For example, here, in this assembly) even the judgment of the elderly people has become vitiated by the prattling of an ignorant junior (like Sahadeva).

32. O leaders of the assembly! You are the best judges of deciding who should be the proper receptient (of this highest honour). Please do not head the childish talk of that ignorant boy Sahadeva believing in which you consented that Kṛṣṇa deserved this honour.

33-34.* To the utter disregard of the leaders of this assembly who are endowed with austers penance, learning,

* ŠR. takes pains to show that the inner meaning of these verses conveys the glorification of Lord Kṛṣṇa as Śiśupāla was his attendant in his original birth and as such he would naturally praise the Lord. It appears that members of the assembly shut their ears, thinking it to be defaobservance of sacred vows,—members who have cleared all their sins by their spiritual knowledge; the great sages who are established in Brahman and who are worshipped even by the guardian deities of different spheres, how is a cowherd, a disgrace to his clan and family, considered eligible to receive this honour? How can a crow deserve to receive Puroḍāśa (a sacrificial oblation)?

35. He does not belong to any class of society, (vamā), stage of life (āśrama) or nobility of birth. He has been excommunicated by (i.e. beyond the pale of) all dharmas. He behaves wantonly (against moral or religious code of conduct) and is devoid of virtues. How does he deserve worship?

36. His family has been cursed by Yayāti (the founder of his clan) and is excommunicated by all good people. He is always indulged in drinking. How is he eligible for this worship?

37. These marauders have given up their country (Śūrasena i.e. region around Mathurā)—a land frequented and inhabited by Brāhmaṇa sages; they have resorted to their citadel in the sea—a place destitute of Brāhmaṇas devoted to Vedic studies and harass all people from that strong-hold.”

38. Śiśupāla whose fund of auspicious acts and merits was exhausted, spoke these and the like defamatory words to Kṛṣṇa. But the Lord did not respond at all as a lion does to the howling of female jackals.

39. Hearing that unbearable censuring of the Lord, the members of the assembly closed their ears and left the assembly, censuring Śiśupāla angrily.

40. He who does not leave the place even after hearing reproachful words about the Lord or about his devotees, becomes deprived of his merits and goes down to hell.

mation of the Lord; the clans of Matsya, Kekaya, Śṛṅjayas did not understand this double meaning and wanted to attack Śiśupāla. And Lord Kṛṣṇa also did not understand his praise and beheaded his servant who was praising him in words of double meaning and marched against him with a sword (vide verses 38-43 below). In supra 3.18-3-8 where Hiranyakṣa upbraided Lord Viṣṇu in the boar form, SR has tried to read Viṣṇu’s praise in it, vide vol. I pp. 320-321.
41. Then sprang to their feet the indignant Pândavas, Matsyas, Kekayas and Sṛṇājas with their arms uplifted with the desire of finishing with Śiśupāla.

42. Undaunted by them, Śiśupāla took up his sword and shield and reproached the kings who sided with Kṛṣṇa in that assembly.

43. When matters came to such a stage the Lord himself stood up in the meanwhile and restraining his own partisans, angrily cut off the head of his advancing enemy with his sharp-edged discus—Sudarśana.

44. There was a great uproar when Śiśupāla was killed. In that bustle, the kings who were his followers ran away to save their lives.

45. Thereafter, like a meteor falling on the earth from the sky, there emerged an effulgent light from the body of Śiśupāla and entered the person of Vāsudeva while all beings stood as witness to it.

46. Pondering over the Lord with thoughts saturated with hatred and anger entertained for three consecutive lives, he (Śiśupāla) attained identity with the Lord, for it is one’s own brooding which determines one’s future state of life.

47. The emperor Yudhiṣṭhira gave liberal sacrificial fees to the priests who conducted the sacrifice and to the members of the sacrificial assembly. And having thus worshipped them all with due respect, he performed the closing ablution of the sacrifice (avabhṛtha snāna) according to the injunctions laid down in the śāstras.

48. After having accomplished the Rājasūya sacrifice successfully for king Yudhiṣṭhira, Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the masters of Yoga, lived some more months at Indraprastha at the request of his friends.

49. Thereafter, Lord Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devakī, took leave of king Yudhiṣṭhira who was unwilling to let him go and returned to his capital along with his queens and counsellors.

50. The long narrative of how (Jaya and Vijaya) the two residents of Vaikuṇṭha (as the attendants of Lord Viṣṇu) had to undergo repeated births on the earth under the curse of Brāhmaṇas (like Sanaka, etc.), has been described to you in details.\textsuperscript{1}

51. When king Yudhiṣṭhīra performed his closing ablution of the Rājasūya sacrifice he shone like Indra, the king of gods, in the assembly of Brāhmaṇas and Kṣattriyas.

52. All the gods, men and celestial beings (who attended the sacrifice) were duly honoured by the king. They went back to their respective place praising with joy Lord Kṛṣṇa and the Rājasūya sacrifice.

53. The sinful Duryodhana, the veritable Kali himself, who was a bane to the family of Kurus was the only exception. He could not bear the sight of the vast affluence and the royal splendour of Pāṇḍu's son (Yudhiṣṭhīra).

54. He who sings of Lord Viṣṇu's glorious deed of slaying Śiśupāla (and Jarāsandha and others) and the release of the kings taken captive (by Jarāsandha) and the performance of the Rājasūya sacrifice is released from the bondage of all sins.

CHAPTER SEVENTYFIVE

Discomfiture of Duryodhana

King Parīksit enquired:

1-2. We have heard that all men, gods, kings and celestial beings who had assembled there for the Rājasūya sacrifice of king Ajātaśatru (Yudhiṣṭhīra) were filled with joy to see its glorious accomplishment, O Brāhmaṇa sage. And Duryodhana was the only exception. Be pleased to explain to us. O worshipful sir, the reason of this.

The sage Śuka replied:

3. In the Rājasūya sacrifice of your illustrious grandfather, all his relatives attached to him with bonds of affection, accepted the responsibility of various departments and rendered him service (during the sacrifice).

1. vide supra Skandha VII. Ch. 1-9.
4. Bhīma was the head of the culinary department, Duryodhana was in charge of treasury. Sahadeva was engaged in the reception department while Nakula was entrusted with the provision of supplies (of things required).

5. Arjuna was appointed to serve the elders and preceptors, while Kṛṣṇa was engaged in washing the feet (of the guests). Draupādi superintended service and catering of food while the noble-minded Karna was entrusted with conferring gifts.

6-7. Yuyudhāna, Vikarna, Hārdikya, Vidura and others as well as Bhūri and other sons of Bāhlīka, Santardana and others were entrusted with different departments and duties in that great sacrifice. And all of them endeavoured to carry out their duties, as liked by King Yudhiṣṭhira, O great King.

8. When the priests, member of the assembly, persons of wide and deep erudition, intimate friends and relatives were properly honoured with sweet words, costly presents and sacrificial (and other religious) fees and when (the soul of) Śiśupāla entered the feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Pāṇḍavas took the closing ablution of the Rājasūya sacrifice in the heavenly river, Gaṅgā.

9. During the celebration of the ceremony of the avabhṛtha bath, various instruments of music such as tabors, conchs, paṇavas, drums, kettle-drums and horns were sounded.

10. Dancing girls danced merrily. Bands after bands of songster engaged in vocal music. And sound of musical instruments like lutes, flutes and clapping reached the heaven.

11. With their flags and streamers of variegated colours (fluttering in the air) and accompanied with battalions of well-adorned soldiers, big elephants, chariots and horses, kings wearing wreaths of gold started (for the avabhṛtha bath).

12. With the sacrificer (Yudhiṣṭhira) in front of them followed the clans of Yādavas, Śṛṅjayas, Kāmbojas, Kauravas, Kekayas and Kosalas shaking the earth with their armies.

13. The members of the sacrificial assembly, the priests and prominent Brāhmaṇas chanting the Vedas loudly followed him. And the gods, sages, manes (ancestors) and celestial singers (Gandharvas) sang the praise of Yudhiṣṭhira and showered flowers (on the procession).
14. Men and women who have adorned themselves richly with clothes, ornaments, garlands and perfumes sported smearing and sprinkling each other with oil and saffron-mixed water.

15. The courties sported being smeared by men and reciprocally smearing men with oil, milk, perfumed water, turmeric powder and thick saffron paste.

16. With a desire to witness this procession and festival ladies of royal families all well-escorted by guards went out in their vehicles (palanquins, chariots etc.) just as heavenly damsels crowded the sky in their excellent heavenly cars (to have a look at it). Those ladies when besprinkled by the friends of Śrī Kṛṣṇa (their maternal cousin) appeared still more beautiful with their faces blooming with bashful smiles.

17. With their syringes, the ladies of royal families sprinkled jets of coloured water on their brothers-in-law and friends. Their garments being moist, the limbs of their persons such as breasts, thighs, and hips were exposed to the view. In the excitement of watersport, the braids of their hair got loosened and flowers dropped down from them. By their attractive sportive activities, they provoked impious thoughts in impure-minded people.

18. The emperor ascended the chariot drawn by excellent horses and decorated with wreaths of gold. Accompanied by his consorts he looked resplendent like the sovereign sacrifice Rājasūya with the attendant ritualistic processes incarnate.

19. After performing the special sacrifice called Patnisamājya and other rituals connected with the concluding bath (avabhr̥tha), king Yudhiṣṭhira performed ācamana (sipped water thrice from his right palm) and as directed by the priest, he along with Draupadī took bath in the Gaṅgā.

20. Drums from the heaven as well as those from the earth were simultaneously sounded. Gods, sages, manes and human beings showered flowers on them.

21. Thereupon, persons belonging to all classes of society (varnas) and stages of life (āśrama) took their bath there; for even persons who perpetrated the most heinous sins are absolved of them by such a bath.

22. Then King Yudhiṣṭhira put on two new silk cloths and was well-adorned with ornaments. He then worshipped the sacrificial priests, the members of the (sacrificial) assembly, Brāhmaṇas and others by honouring them with clothes and ornaments.

23. The king who was unflinchingly devoted to Nārāyana duly honoured his friends, kinsmen, kings, friends, well-wishers and all others (who were present) in all respects.

24. Being adorned with jewelled ear-rings, wreaths of flowers, turbans, long coats, silk cloth and extremely costly necklaces, all men looked splendid like gods, while women, the beauty of whose countenance was enhanced by a pair of ear-rings and (overhanging) locks of hair, appeared charming with girdles of gold (round their waist).

25-26. Thereupon highly virtuous priests (rāvjas), members of that assembly, the reciters of the Vedas, Brāhmaṇas, Kṣattriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras as well as the princes who assembled to attend the sacrifice; as also gods, sages, manes and other beings, the guardians of the world along with their followers were duly honoured. They sought the permission to go and returned to their respective regions.

27. Even as a mortal being is not sated by drinking the nectar, people did not feel satiated by glorifying the splendid success of the Rājasūya sacrifice performed by that royal sage Yudhiṣṭhira who was but a humble servant of Lord Hari.

28. King Yudhiṣṭhira could not bear the idea of separation and affectionately importuned his friends, relatives, kith and kin and Lord Kṛṣṇa to stay longer.

29. Dear Parīkṣit! The Lord despatched Sāmba and other Yādava warriors to Dvārakā. Being desirous of pleasing king Yudhiṣṭhira, the Lord continued to stay on with him.

30. In this way, with the help of Lord Kṛṣṇa, king Yudhiṣṭhira, the son of Dharma, crossed over the ocean of his cherished ambition (of performing the Rājasūya sacrifice) which was very difficult to be accomplished. And he was thus thoroughly cured of his fever of anxiety for proper performance of the Rājasūya.

31. On a certain occasion, Duryodhana was sorely troubled at heart to notice the glorious splendour of king Yudhiṣṭhira’s harem and the grandeur of the Rājasūya (and the eminent position attained thereby) by Yudhiṣṭhira whose heart was devoted to Lord Kṛṣṇa.

32. In that harem, all the affluence and royal splendour of kings of men, demon kings and Lord of gods accumulated and utilised by Maya, the architect of that palace, were shining resplendently. With all these, Draupādi, the princess of king Drupada, waited upon her spouses. The heart of Duryodhana, king of Kauravas, was attached to her and hence he was tormented (with jealousy).

33. At that time, thousands of consorts of Lord Kṛṣṇa were staying in that palace. Owing to the heaviness of their buttocks, they had to walk slowly and the anklets on their feet jingled sweetly. They were slender-waisted, and their (white) pearl necklaces became reddish with saffron applied to their breasts. And their beautiful countenances appeared still more attractive with their rocking ear-rings and curly locks of hair.

34-35. Once, in a part of that assembly constructed by Maya, emperor Yudhiṣṭhira, surrounded by his younger brothers and relatives and by Kṛṣṇa who was his eye (indicating what is in his interest or otherwise), was seated on a throne of gold like Indra, the Lord of gods himself. He was endowed with imperial glory and was glorified by bards.

V.J.'s Text adds:

35A. He was waited upon by prominent Brāhmaṇas coming from different parts of the country. Fanned with many white coloured chowries, the tiger among the kings (emperor Yudhiṣṭhira) shone like the Lord of gods in the heaven.

36. There entered the swaggering proud Duryodhana adorned with a crown and garlands with a sword in his hand. He was surrounded, by his brothers and he was angrily railing at the guards at the door and others.

37. He was so much deluded by the skill of Maya that when there was a part of the floor, he mistook it for a sheet of water and drew up his clothes and fell on the floor and at places tumbled into water mistaking it (the sheet of water) as floor.
37A. He regarded the floor paved with sapphires as a pond of water and took up his clothes and all people laughed at him.

37B. When king Duriohdhana was proceeding to a pond of water, he thought it to be crystal pavement and fell into that pond.

38. O dear Parikshit. Seeing that Bhima laughed at him; so too laughed the ladies and other kings even though king Yudhisthira tried to check them. Krśna approved of them.

39. Duriohdhana felt abashed and he hung down his head. As if burning with rage, he silently left for Hastinapura. There was a great uproar (of dismay and regrets) among the pious members of the assembly. The foe-less king Yudhisthira was dejected in mind. The Lord who was bent on reducing the burden of the earth, remained silent. It was through his deluding potency that Duriohdhana was led into these mistakes.¹

40. O king, I have narrated to you what you asked me how Duriohdhana’s wickedness developed during the great sacrifice of Rājasūya.

CHAPTER SEVENTYSIX

Fight with Śālva

Śri Śuka said:

1. O King! Now listen to the account of another miraculous deed of Krśna, who, out of sport, assumed a human form. This concerns the killing of Śālva, the master of the aerial car Saubha.

¹. According to ŚR., this delusion of Duriohdhana was the ‘seed’ of removing the burden of the earth and Bhima’s laughter indicated Duriohdhana’s discomfiture. Hence, Krśna kept quiet.
2. Śālva, a friend of Śiśupāla, had arrived (and was present) at the Suśamanvarā of Rukmiṇī. At that time (he), Jarāsandha and other partisans of Śiśupāla were vanquished by Yādavas.*

3. In the hearing of all the kings (present there) Śālva took a vow, "I shall eliminate all the Yādavas from this earth. Look at my bravery."

4. Having made this solemn declaration, the foolish king

* Here V.J.'s Text adds the following verses.

2.1 The Lord was desirous of lightening the burden of the earth. Contemplating over himself in himself, he remained silent. Thereupon the sage whose lotus-feet are adored by gods, revealed himself in the presence of the Lord of the world.

2.2. Nārada was welcomed by all the members of the assembly by going forward to receive and was duly worshipped by them. He was highly worshipped by Kṛṣṇa and he occupied a comfortable seat near the King.

2.3. With due formalities Dharmarāja bowed to him and enquired of him: "You have access everywhere and you pay visits anywhere and at any time and are impartial (not attached to anyone), O Brāhmaṇa sage.

2.4-5. Who among all chivalrous kings ruling over many kingdoms in the world, is the warrior-prince that is engaged in war preparations all the while now?" Hearing the question so posed by him, the sage Nārada replied.

Nārada said:

2.6. As the pride of all kings is crushed down by Kṛṣṇa of incomparable valour, they now live in their respective kingdoms with their activities curtailed and their glory lost.

2.7. There is, however, one Kṣattriya prince who is highly enterprising and is of wicked mind. He is born in the Śālva country and is a king with a powerful force of men and animals.

2.8. His brother Haiśa, the son of Brahmadatta, was killed in the battle of the Yamunā by the high-souled Viśṇu (Kṛṣṇa), the conquerer of the universe.

2.9. The enemy of Kṛṣṇa, with an ambition to repay the debt of his dead brother by avenging his death, went to Kuṇḍinapura and created an alliance with Rukmi and other princes for that purpose.

2.10. (The alliance was formed) with Śiśupāla, Druma and other kings, with Dantavakra as the prominent leader. But Jarāsandha and others were defeated in the battle.

1. V.l. entered the forest for performing Penance—V.J.

V.J.'s Text adds here:

4. A: When he departed and did not return for many years though his ministers waited for him, his younger brother was installed by them as the king, for they were in need of a monarch (to rule).
propitiated the Almighty god Śiva, subsisting himself only on a handful of dust (flour?) once a day.

5. At the end of the year, the glorious god Śiva, the consort of Pārvati, who is easily propitiated in a short while, offered to bestow a boon on Śālva who had sought asylum with him.

6. As a boon, he prayed the god to grant him an aerial car which would go anywhere at his will and which should be impregnable to gods, Asuras, human beings, Gandharvas, serpents and Rākṣasas (demons) and which could strike terror in the heart of Vyūnis.

7. "Be it so" said god Śiva, the Lord of mount Kailāsa. Commanded by Śiva. Maya, the conqueror of cities of enemies, constructed a city (like spacious aerial car) of steel, called Saubha and handed it over to Śālva.

8. Śālva obtained (in his possession) the aerial car that could move anywhere at his will and was shrouded in darkness and was inaccessible (to others).

* Here VJ’s Text adds:

8.1. He has now returned to his country which is militarily fully prepared with army and transport (horses, chariots, etc). Out of (all) princes, he is the only king actively preparing (for war), O king.

8.2. Having heard this report as detailed by Nārada, the affluent king Yudhiṣṭhira, the son of Dharma, quietly looked at the face of the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa who was seated by his side.

8.3. Listening to that report, Śri Kṛṣṇa, the essence of courage and fortitude, was not disturbed at all. Laughing a bit loudly he remarked, "So be it", That is the index of his greatness.

8.4. Having worshipped the sage and paying him respects with sweet words, he thought, "It is a good thing that he who was wanted and expected for a long time, has also come now."

8.5-6. Śri Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Lakṣmi, immediately despatched Ugrasena, King of Yādavas, Yuyudhāna, Akrūra, Kṛtavarmā and other prominent Yādava warriors along with his contingent of army to defend Dvārakā (against the expected attack from Śālva.)

(End of the Eightyfourth chapter in VJ.’s Text)

Śri Śuka continued:

8.7-8. While the noble-souled Govinda was thus staying at Indraprastha and king Yudhiṣṭhira along with his younger brothers had accomplished his purpose (the completion of the Rājasūya sacrifice), Śālva heard that his friend Śīśupāla, the son of Damāghoṣa and Jarāsandha had been killed and the Rājasūya had been completed and he got enraged.
9. Śālva laid siege to Dvārakā with a mighty army, O prominent Bharata. He razed to ground city parks, gardens, completely.

Vṛṣṇi adds:

9.A He based his camp in the air over the city and fought.

10. He destroyed the city along with its towers, gates, mansions, balconies, terraces and places of recreation. Destructive weapons were showered from that formidable aerial car (a veritable floating city).

11. Heavily fell down (upon Dvārakā) huge stones, trees, thunderbolts, serpents, a shower of gravel (hail-stones ?). Terrific tornadoes swept (across the city); the cardinal points were darkened with heavy dust.

12. Just as the earth was (formerly) oppressed under the scourage of Tripura, the city of Kṛṣṇa was subjected to extreme harassment by Saubha and could not get any respite or comfort.

13. The glorious Pradyumna noticed how his people were subjected to distress. Encouraging them with words “Don’t fear”, the highly illustrious warrior mounted his chariot.

14-15. Sātyaki, Cāruḍeṣṭha, Śamba, Akrūra and his younger brothers, Kṛtavrāma, Bhānuvindha, Gada, Śuka and Sārana and other renowned leaders of the army followed him in their chariots equipped with bows and arms and accoutred in coats of mail and protected by chariots, elephants, cavalry and foot-soldiers.

16. Then there raged a battle between the army of Śālva and that of the Yādavas, tumultuous and horripulating like the (bitter) struggle between gods and Asuras (in ancient times).

17. Just as the sun (the hot-rayed luminary) dispells the darkness of the night instantaneously, Pradyumna, the son of Rukmiṇī destroyed in a moment all the black magical spells of Śālva, the master of Saubha, with his celestial missiles.

18. He pierced the commander-in-chief of Śālva’s army with twenty shafts with gold feathers, iron tips and well-polished knots (known as sanntaparva).

19. He struck Śālva with a hundred arrows and every one of his soldiers with one shaft each, leaders of every battalion (or charioteers) with ten arrows and the horses with three each.

20. Observing that great and wonderful feat of the high-souled Pradyumna, soldiers on both the sides applauded him.

21. But the aerial-car Saubha constructed by Maya had such a magical structure and contrivances that sometimes it appeared many, sometimes one, and at times it was invisible. It was thus very difficult for the enemies (Yādavas) to locate it or conceive its nature and whereabouts.

22. Sometimes Saubha was on the ground; sometimes it flew into the sky; at times it rested on the summit of a mountain; sometimes it floated on water; sometimes it whirled round like a fire-brand and was not stationary at any point—(and thus was impossible to locate).

23. So the leaders of the Yādava army discharged arrows at every such point where Śalva with his aerial car Saubha and his soldiers made their appearance.

24. With his floating city Saubha and his army being sorely oppressed by the arrows discharged by the Yādava enemies — arrows the touch of which was scorching like the fire and the sun and unapproachable like venomous serpents Śalva fainted.

25. Though the Yādava warriors were severely beaten by the volleys of weapons discharged by the leaders of Śalva’s army, none of them deserted the battlefield or his respective (appointed) position, for they wanted to win both the worlds (viz. their sovereignty in the world if survived or heavenly happiness if killed) in the battle.

26. A minister of Śalva called Dyuman, a mighty warrior himself but who was previously heavily beaten (by Pradyumna), made a surprise attack on Pradyumna and striking him with a heavy iron mace, roared loudly.

27. Pradyumna’s charioteer, the son of Dāruka (Kṛṣṇa’s charioteer) who knew his duty (as a charioteer), carried away from the battlefield Pradyumna, the chastiser of enemies whose chest was gravely wounded by the stroke of the mace.

28. When Pradyumna, the son of Kṛṣṇa regained his consciousness after some time he blamed his charioteer, “Alas!
you have not done well in that you have removed me from the battle-field.

29. No person born in Yadu’s race is known to have turned away from the battle-field except me who incurred the blemish through a weak-minded charioteer like you.

30. Having deliberately and obviously left the battlefield, what should I plead to my uncle Balarāma and father Kṛṣṇa when they meet me and enquire about my ability.

31. My brothers and sisters-in-law will jeet at me and openly ask me, “How did you fare with your enemies in the battle? How is it that you played the coward?”

The charioteer replied:

32. (It is) With full knowledge of my duty as a charioteer that I have done this, O longlived one. My Lord, the prescribed duty is that the charioteer should protect the warrior in times of peril and the warrior should reciprocally protect him.

33. Knowing this duty as a charioteer, I took you away from the battlefield as, when attacked by the enemy and struck down with a mace, you became unconscions in a Swoon.

CHAPTER SEVENTYSEVEN

Slaying of King Śālva

Sri Śuka said:

1*. Pradyumna sipped water (as ācamana), clad himself in armour, equipped himself with a bow and commanded his charioteer, “Please take me to the side of Dyumat”.

2. While Dyumat was slaughtering his (Pradyumna’s) forces, Pradyumna checked him and with a smile, he pierced him with eight arrows.

Vṛṣa’s Text adds before verse 1.

1.A. Hearing the words spoken by the charioteer, Pradyumna, the delight of Yadus re-armed himself with weapons and told his charioteer on the battlefield.
3. With four shafts he struck the four horses (of his chariot); he hit the charioteer with one; with two he snapped his bow and flag (staff) and with another shaft he cut off his (Dyumat’s) head.

4. Gada, Sātyaki, Sāmba and other Yādava heroes slaughtered the army of Śalva, the master of Saubha. All the inmates of the aerial car Saubha fell down into the sea with their necks lopped off (from the trunk of their bodies).

5. In this manner the armies of Yādavas and Śalva went on striking at each other. That terrific and tumultuous battle continued for twenty seven days and nights without break.

6. On being invited by Yudhīśṭhira, the son of Dharma, Kṛṣṇa who went to Indraprastha, stayed on there even after the completion of the Rājasūya sacrifice and slaying of Śīṣupāla.

7.* He took his leave of the elders of the Kuru race, sages, Kuntī along with her sons. While he travelled to Dvārakā, he noticed very terrible portents.

4* VJ reads

4.A. Gada, Sātyaki, Akrūra, Sāmba, Śuka, Sāraṇa, Vasudeva and Ugrasena slaughtered the army of Śalva.

7* For verses 7-18 in ŚR.’s Text, VJ.’s Text reads the following verses (in Vrindāvana edition).

7.1. He noticed terrible evil omens prophesying war.

7.2. Taking leave of elders of the Kuru clan and sages and followed by Pāṇḍavas along with their ministers and accompanied by Brāhmaṇas, he set out from the city (Indraprastha).

7.3. After travelling for a short distance, he asked the citizens and the sons of Kunti to stop. He bade goodbye to the sons of Kunti who were bowing him down with tearful eyes.

7.4. He travelled in the westerly directions with his queens riding golden palanquins, accompanied with thousands of elephants, horses, chariots and foot-soldiers and followed by a battalion of princes.

7.5. Even Śalva who (i.e. whose force) was soundly battered retreated from the battlefield with his aerial car and returned to his own dominion.

7.6. While Śalva was going, Sāmba quickly pursued him and with his arrows he sent Śalva’s minister Kṣemadhūrti to the abode of the god of death.

7.7. Pradyumna ambushed Śalva’s most beloved general vininda while he was passing by the way and struck him with his arrows.
8. (On the way) he said to himself, "I have come here to Indraprastha accompanied by my elder brother Balarāma. The Kṣattriya princes, the allies of Śiśupāla must have surely attacked my city (Dvārakā), in our absence.*

9. After his arrival at Dvārakā he noticed the havoc wrought upon his subjects. He then entrusted the defence of the city to Balarāma. Perceiving the aerial car Saubha and the King of Śálva, he commanded Dāruka.

10. "Quickly bring my chariot near Śálva, O charioteer. You need not be afraid (even though) this master of Saubha is skilled in the use of black magic in war-fare."

11. Dāruka, thus commanded by Kṛṣṇa, brought the chariot near Śálva. The friends and the enemy saw him enter the battle-field.

12. Śálva whose forces were practically wiped out, saw Kṛṣṇa enter the battle. At Kṛṣṇa’s charioteer he darted a lance (that sped through the air) making a roaring sound.

7.8. Deeply pierced and wounded by Pradyumna, he took up a sword and shield and fought with Pradyumna, the son of Rukmini. And it was a wonderful combat.

7.9. While he was making wonderful circular manoeuvres, the great Yādava warrior sundered his head off his body in that duel.

7.10. When its chief commanders were killed, the army lost its way and took to heels helter-skelter, with the main object of saving life.

7.11-13. The Eagle-bannered Lord Kṛṣṇa also hastily rushed to Dvārakā and found the mansions, balconies and towers in the city, in debris; the city gates, arches and ramparts broken down; main streets and quadrangles wiped out; parks and gardens devastated; and ponds and wells filled with stones; The recitation of Vedas and the sound ‘Vasāś’ (of priests offering oblations to fire) were silent. Kṛṣṇa was deeply troubled at heart and asked Kṛtavarmā how this devastation took place.

7.14. Hearing from Kṛtavarmā, the details how the King of Śálva wrought this ruin (of Dvārakā) Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of Yādavas announced his vow while all the Sātvatas (Yādavas) were listening.

7.15. "Just now I chase Śálva and enter Dvārakā only after killing that wicked Śálva and drowning his aerial car Saubha into the sea."

7.16-17. Lord Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa), the god with the emblem of Garuḍa on his banner, mounted his excellent chariot to which were yoked (the four famous horses) Saibya, Sugriva, Meghapuṣpa and Balāhaka; was equipped with various weapons and had Dāruka in front as the charioteer. He followed the track of Śálva with the speed of the mind and wind.

7.18. After crossing a long distance, He saw Śálva concealed under the waters of the sea but seated fully adorned in his aerial car Saubha.

* VJ.’s Text adds :

8-A. Pondering thus, the glorious Lord hastily arrived there coming to the battle-field, he saw Pradyumna and others.
13. Observing the lance rushing through the air with great speed and illumining all the quarters like a big meteor (or firebrand), Kṛṣṇa splintered it in hundred pieces with his arrows.

14. Hitting Śālva with sixteen shafts, he pierced the aerial car Saubha which was moving through the sky, with a volley of arrows just as the sun fills the space in the sky, with his rays.

15. Śālva wounded the left arm of Kṛṣṇa in which he wielded the Śārṅga bow. And the Śārṅga bow fell from Kṛṣṇa’s hand. And it was indeed a miracle.

16. There was an outburst of wild outcry of consternation and wonder from all beings who witnessed it. The king of Saubha (i.e. Śālva) roared loudly and (boastfully) said to Kṛṣṇa:

17. “You stupid fellow! You abducted the fiancée of our brother-like friend (Śiśupāla) in our very presence and killed our friend in the assembly at the time of Yudhiṣṭhira’s Rājasūya while he was unaware.

18. In your pride you (falsely) regard yourself as invincible. Only if you stand before me (in this battle), I shall, with my sharp arrows, send you to a place (Yama’s abode) whence nobody returns.”

The glorious Lord replied:

19. “You are vainly bragging, O dull witted one! You do not perceive the god of Death standing near you. Really valiant people do not indulge in idle prattling but exhibit their valour in fighting.”

20. With these words Lord Kṛṣṇa, in extreme wrath, struck down Śālva on the collar-bone with his mace of terribly vehement force. (Under that blow) Śālva was thoroughly shaken and vomitted blood.

21. While the mace returned (to Kṛṣṇa) Śālva disappeared. Then within a short while a man approached him, bowed to him with his head and while sobbing told him, “I am sent by Devaki (with a message).

22. O Kṛṣṇa, of powerful arms. O Kṛṣṇa, so affectionate to parents! Your father is captured and dragged away by Śālva even as a butcher does to an animal to be slaughtered.”

23. Hearing this unpleasant news, Kṛṣṇa exhibited His human nature. Deeply troubled at heart, despondent and overcome with filial affection, he exclaimed like an ordinary mortal.

24. “How is it possible that unperturbable Balarāma who is invincible to gods and Asuras (together) was defeated by this despicable Śālva and my father was taken away as a captive. (Ultimately) Providence is all powerful.”

25. While Govinda was uttering these words, Śālva, the Lord of Saubha, made his appearance bringing with him someone resembling Vasudeva and threatened Kṛṣṇa:

26. “This is your own father who brought you forth in this world and for whom you live. Before your very eyes, I shall slay him. Save him if you can, you childish fellow!”

27. Having threatened him thus, Śālva, the master of black magic cut off the head (of the semblance) of Vasudeva and taking it with him, he entered his aerial car Saubha that was near him in the air.

28. By nature, Kṛṣṇa was the embodiment of pure knowledge. But even he was overwhelmed with human weakness and remained plunged for a while (for a muhūrta) in sorrow, due to his affection for his relative (father). Then that Lord of majestic lustre realized all that scene to be nothing but an illusion of Asura type spread by Śālva as per instructions of Maya.

29. Just as a person awakened from the dream finds the dream-scene vanished, that Immutable Lord Kṛṣṇa, after ‘waking up’ (disenchantment) from the illusory effect of Śālva’s Māyā, found that there was neither the messenger nor the dead body of his father on the battlefield. Seeing his enemy ranging through the sky in his aerial car Saubha, he determined to kill him.

30*. In this way, O royal sage, some sages give an in-

* Verses 23-28 give the view of inconsistent thinkers as ŚR. points out that Balarāma never went to Yudhiṣṭhira’s Rājasūya.
consistent version. They do not remember that their words will prove contradictory.

31. Where are grief, delusion, attachment or fear which are possible to be found only in the ignorant? How can these be presumed to affect the Absolute Lord, the master of Perfect knowledge, wisdom and Divine potencies of omnipotence, omnipresence.

32*. How could there be any possibility of Lord Hari being subjected to delusion—the Lord who is the shelter of those saintly persons who through the worship and service of his feet have obtained enlightenment in the knowledge of ātmān (the self). With this knowledge of Ātmavidya, these righteous people completely destroyed wrong notions existing from times

VR. From Vyāsa’s words it is clear that Balarāma was in charge of Dwāraka in Kṛṣṇa’s absence at Rājasūya. Śālva did not invade Dwārakā—in Kṛṣṇa’s absence. VJ. emphasizes the impossibility of Hari being deluded by the magic spell.

* VJ.'s Text adds :

32.1. O Scion of the Kuru race! When Kṛṣṇa heard the words spoken by them, he began to strike down Śālva along with his aerial city Saubha.

32.2. Taking up his sharp discus Sudarśana, Kṛṣṇa charged it with the spell of the missile of the Fire-god and discharged it to destroy Saubha completely.

32.3. That discus charged with the spell of the missile of the Fire-god (pronounced on it) and hurled from the fore-hand of Nārāyaṇa (Lord Kṛṣṇa) and terrific with its flames went on burning upto the region of Brahmā.

32.4. All the celestials in their aerial cars felt scorchcd with the heat of the discus Sudarśana, cleared out of the sky and fled in all directions.

32.5. The Sudarśana discus dazzling like a hundred suns cut asunder the city of Saubha in two and again returned to the hand of Nārāyaṇa, O king Parikṣit.

32.6. Thus the city (of Saubha) lay shattered in the sea. But the irresistible Śālva made his appearance with a mace in hand. The wicked fellow hurled his mace at Kṛṣṇa.

32.7. Getting into the chariot brought up by the Daitya army—a chariot equipped with a heap of arms—Śālva discharged innumerable weapons on Kṛṣṇa and roared like a lion.

32.8. Hari split the mace hurled by Śālva, in three pieces with his arrows. He blew his conch Pāñcajanya and roared like a lion.
immemorial about the identification of the body with soul and thereby they have secured their own essential, infinite Lordly state.

33. While Śālva was vigorously attacking him with a volley of weapons, Kṛṣṇa, the descendant of Śūra, of unfailing prowess, wounded Śālva deeply with his arrows and shattered to pieces Śālva’s armour, cut down his bow and the jewel on his head, and knocked down to pieces (Śālva’s aerial car) Saubha.

34. Knocked down by the mace daited by Kṛṣṇa’s hand, Saubha was splintered into thousands of pieces and fell into the water in the form of powder. Abandoning it, Śālva landed on the earth and raising his mace quickly rushed at Kṛṣṇa.

35. With a special kind of arrow called bhalla, Kṛṣṇa cut down Śālva’s arm with the mace as he was rushing against him (to assault). In order to finish with Śālva, Kṛṣṇa took up his miraculous discus Sudarśana which was dazzling like the burning sun at the time of the destruction of the universe. (With the discus held up in the position of hurling), he shone resplendent like the Eastern mountain with the disc of the rising sun on its summits.

36. Just as (in ancient times) Indra chopped off the head of Vṛtra, Hari, with that very Sudarśana severed the head decked with a crown and ear-rings of Śālva of extensive capacity in black-magic. And there arose an outcry of grief (alas !) from his men.

37*. O king Parīkṣit! When that sinful Śālva fell struck

*Vṛṣṇi’s Text adds:

37.1. Celestial drums were sounded and showers of flowers were let down. Glorified by the sages and by bards like Sūta, Māgadhā and Bandins, Hari came to his capital Dvārakā, surrounded by his armies.

37.2. He entered the charming city decorated with a number of flags and other decorative work, and with clean quadrangles besprinkled with water.

37.3. He (Kṛṣṇa) was honoured by elderly Yādavas as well as by men in the city and the rural areas. He delighted the sixteen thousand queens who were over-whelmed with love for him. Thus the son of Devaki lived happily and in joy, O descendant of Kurus.
were sounded in heaven by gods. Then Dantavaktra angrily attacked him for avenging the deaths of his friends (viz. Śiśupāla, Śālva).

CHAPTER SEVENTYEIGHT

Dantavaktra and Vidūratha Slain:

Balarāma's Pilgrimage

Śrī Śuka said*:

1. The wicked Dantavaktra wished to demonstrate his friendship with Śiśupāla, Śālva and Pauṇḍraka who had gone to the next world (being killed by Kṛṣṇa). He wished to avenge their death by slaying Kṛṣṇa.

2. (Unaccompanied by an army or without riding a chariot) the foolish but mighty Dantavaktra rushed alone in rage with a mace in hand. Shaking the earth under his feet while walking, he confronted Kṛṣṇa.

3. Beholding him thus advancing, Kṛṣṇa quickly took up his mace and jumping down from his chariot, he resisted him as the seashore stops the flowtide of the sea.

4. Raising his mace, the foolishly arrogant king Kāruṣa (Dantavaktra) exclaimed: “How lucky it is! I am glad that

* Vṛṣṇi’s Text adds at the beginning.

1.1-1.2. : Having heard that Kṛṣṇa had gone to the bank of the Yamunā for the concluding bath (avabhrthā snāna) of the Rājasūya sacrifice, Dantavaktra, the king of Kaliṅga, accompanied by his younger brothers and a big army consisting of elephant corps, quickly marched to ambush Kṛṣṇa while he would proceed to Dwārakā.

1.3-1.5 : Like unto a jackal obstructing a lion, the foolish Dantavaktra blockaded Kṛṣṇa who was accompanied by young Yādava princes, and was surrounded by the palanquins of his sixteen thousand queens, was followed by a group of kings, by a number of great sages, priests who officiate at sacrifices, family priests, preceptors and other Brāhmaṇas.
down with the mace and Saubha was smashed to pieces, drums you have come within the range of my sight to-day!"

5*. O Kṛṣṇa! You are the son of our maternal uncle. But you are treacherous to friends (and have killed them). You Fish to slay me as well. Hence I shall kill you with my mace which is as hard as thunderbolt.

6. Being affectionate and loyal to my friends I shall pay off my debt (of friendship) to them by killing you, an enemy in the form of a cousin, just like a disease in one's body, O ignorant fool."

1. As in the case of Śīṣupāla's censure of Kṛṣṇa (vide SUPRA 10.74. 34-37) ŚR. gives another interpretation of Dantavakra's reproachful speech implying Kṛṣṇa's glorification as Dantavakra was Viṣṇu's attendant in Vaikuṇṭha.

ŚR's glorificatory interpretation of this verse:

Dantavakra whose pride had already disappeared (at the sight of his master Viṣṇu in his original birth in Vaikuṇṭha) welcomed him, "How fortunate it is! How glad I am that your worship has presented yourself to my vision. It is certainly lucky! Really very lucky!

* VJ.'s Text gives the following version:

5.1. O Kṛṣṇa! You are our maternal cousin but you are treacherous to friends and hunt after the wives of others. You are a traitor committing breach of trust, a murderer of relatives, fond of picking quarrels.

5.2. You have killed the son of my maternal uncle Paundraka in a battle. You have slain my cousins' brothers Rukmi and Śīṣupāla. (It was Balarāma and not Kṛṣṇa who killed Rukmi).

2. Dantavakra was the son of Śrutadevi, the sister of Vasudeva.

ŚR.'s interpretation of some adjectives to show that this is Kṛṣṇa's praise is far-fetched. For example the 2nd line in verse 5.

atastūṃ gadayā manda hanisyā Vajrakalpaśā is taken as gadayā Amanda hanisyā a-vajrakalpaśā

"O Lord capable of bearing anything! Bear up with the stroke of my gadā which is tender like a wreath of lotus.

3. ŚR.'s second interpretation of some adjectives in this verse:

ajña-(na vidyate jñāḥ yasmāt saḥ) Omniscient, Vyādhi—One who abides in the body as Inner Controller.

hatā—Having arrived at the realization of your essential nature (han to go) ānṛṣyaṃ upaimi: Pay off the debt of my ancestors (by realization of the Brahma).

"O Omniscient Lord! Due to Sanaka's curse, I have become your cousin and enemy. But having realized your essential nature as one who abide as Inner Controller of all beings or facing you in the ways of Kṣatriyas, I shall pay off the debt of my manes."
7. Cutting to the quick Kṛṣṇa, with such harsh words like piercing an elephant with a goad, he hit Kṛṣṇa on the head with his mace and roared like a lion.

8. Though struck down with a mace in that battle, the descendant of Yadu (Kṛṣṇa) remained unshaken. Kṛṣṇa on his part hit Dantavakra on the chest with his mace Kaumodakī.

9. With his heart shattered with the stroke of the mace, Dantavakra vomitted blood through his mouth and he fell dead on the ground with his hair dishevelled and arms and legs outstretched.

10*. Just as it happened after the slaying of Śiśupāla, a very subtle ray of light emanated from the body of Dantavakra and entered in the person of Kṛṣṇa — a wonderful sight indeed — while all beings were witnessing it.

11. Overwhelmed with grief for his brother, Vidūratha, Dantavakra's brother, armed with a sword and a shield, came there having heavy sighs, but desired to kill Kṛṣṇa.

12. As he was advancing, Kṛṣṇa with his discus of sharp edge, severed off his head adorned with a diadem and ear-rings.

13-15. Having thus demolished (the aerial car) Saubha and slain Śālva, Dantavakra and his younger brother (Vidūratha) who were irresistible to others, Kṛṣṇa entered the decorated city of Dvārakā while his victory was being glorified

* Vṛj.'s Text : 10.1. Practically the same as verse 11 above.

10.2. He quickly jumped down from his chariot and brandishing his excellent sword and shaking the ground under his feet, he dashed against Kṛṣṇa.

10.3. When Kṛṣṇa cut off his sword with an arrow, he took up a terrible sharp-pointed takti.

10.4. Determined to strike down Kṛṣṇa in the battle the foolish fellow darted towards him like an arrow discharged from a bow.

 Vṛj.'s version :

13-15.1. Having thus killed both Dantavakra and Vidūratha in the battle, the Lord put to flight their army and captured their elephants (horses, etc.)

13.15.2. Kṛṣṇa again mounted his divine chariot Puṣpa-ratha which was tastefully decorated. He was accompanied by the Yādava clansmen and was praised by gods and men (in songs).
in songs by gods, men, sages, siddhas, Gandharvas (celestial singers), Vidyādhāras, big serpents and by celestial damsels (apsaras), manes (ancestors), Yakṣas, Kinnaras and while he was being showered over with flowers and was accompanied by prominent Vṛṣṇis.

16*. In this way, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the master of Yoga and the Almighty controller of the Universe is ever victorious, though to the ignorant (lit. persons with the vision of brutes), he appears at times vanquished.

17. It is reported that when Balarāma heard of the war-preparations of the Kauravas against the Pāṇḍavas, he, being neutral (with reference to the belligerent parties) went

16* V. J. 's Text adds after verse 16:

16.A. O descendant of Bharata ! The noble deeds of the Lord of hallowing renown are such as cannot be recounted in tens of thousands of years (even god Brahmā and others cannot do this, what of me ?).

16. B. O chastiser of enemies! In this way the slayer of the demon Madhu (Śrī Kṛṣṇa) began (the destruction of Rākṣasas) with the demoness Pūtānā and killed all the Asuras who were a burden to the earth.

(Here ends Chapter No. 101 in V. J.'s Text)

V. J.'s introduction:

Though the life of Balarāma is interwoven with that of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, two more chapters are added specifically to the life and deeds of Balarāma.

King Pārīkṣit said:

1. I pay my obeisance to the Soul of the universe who through dint of his deluding potency brought about the destruction of the eighteen akṣauhiṇīs of army (in the Mahābhārata war) in equal number of days.

2. By listening to his stories and deeds in aggregate, my bewilderment, wonder and fear go on increasing again and again.

3. I consider that most probably my sinfulness which is difficult to cross has ceased to be. My senses are wide awake and the mind is extremely delighted and serene.

4. My hunger and thirst have subsided. My soul (mind) is filled with ecstatic delight. It is through your grace, O expert in religion (religious discourse) that I feel that I have accomplished all my objects in this world.

5. I, however, wish to hear from you something more. When Balarāma found that his friends (both Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas) were bent on fighting and that he could not prevent them from doing so, he went to perform ablutions in sacred places. O sage rich in penance! Narrate to me what Balarāma did.

* KD. states that Balarāma, out of sympathy, wanted to intervene between the warring parties incidently, when he would reach Kurukṣetra in the course of his pilgrimage—78.146.
away on the pretext of a pilgrimage for performing ablutions in sacred waters.

18. After taking bath at Prabhāsa\(^1\) and propitiating gods, sages and manes (\textit{pitrs}) by offering oblations of water and satisfying men (by serving them food), Balarāma, surrounded by Brāhmaṇas, went from the mouth of the Sarasvatī\(^2\) to its source.

19*. (On the way) he visited various holy places like Prthūdaka\(^3\), Bindusaras\(^4\), Tritakūpa\(^5\), Sudarśana\(^6\), Viśāla, Brahmātīrtha,\(^7\) Cakrātīrtha and the spot where the Sarasvati flows to the east\(^8\).

---

1. Somanath or Veraval in Saurashtra. It is also called Devapattana. Somanath is one of the famous twelve \textit{jyotirlingas} of god Mahādeva. In its neighbourhood are the spots where Yādavas' internecine battle and death of Krṣṇa took place.

---

2. It appears that at that time, the Sarasvatī was still flowing into the Gulf of Cutch i.e. The Arabian sea. There is a small river Raunākṣi, also known as the Sarasvatī in \textit{Vāmana P.} (ch. 84) which falls in the sea near Prabhāsa. But the later description shows that Balarāma followed the course of the Vedic Sarasvati to its source.

* It appears that no geographical sequence is followed in the description of this pilgrimage.

3. Pehoa in the Karnal district, Panjab. It is 14 miles to the west of Thanesvar. This \textit{Tīrtha} is on the Sarasvati, near the famous (\textit{Brahmayant Tīrtha})—GDAMI, p. 16. Vainya performed nine \textit{asvamedha} sacrifices at Prthūdaka (VT).

4. VT. states this to be the hermitage of the sage Kardama near Siddhapura in Gujarāt. N.L. De identifies it with thr same : Sitpur to the northwest of Ahmedabad—GDAMI, p. 38.

5. Tritakūpa—A place near the Sarasvati. In that well Trīta fell and was taken out of it by god Somā (VT). Probably this refers to the incident supposed to be the basis of RV. 1. 105.

6. In Kurukṣetra, the same as Rāma-hrada—a sacred tank to the north of Thanesvar. ŚR identifies Sudarśana and Cakra Tīrtha.—GDAMI, p. 49, 166.

7. A certain Tīrtha on the Sarasvati.

8. The Kurukṣetra Sarasvati is called Prāci or Eastern Sarasvati (\textit{Padma P. uttara khaṇḍa} (ch. 67)). N. L. De states that this name is specially applied to the Sarasvati that issues out of the Puṣkara Lake—GDAMI, p. 187.
20. And passing through the various sacred places which were on the Yamunā and the Gaṅgā, he went to the Naimiṣa forest\(^1\) where sages were holding a prolonged sacrificial session.

21. Having come to know that the distinguished guest was Balarāma, the sages who were engaged in the prolonged sacrifice, received him with due formalities, rose from their seats, bowed down to him and worshipped him.

22. Balarāma who was thus worshipped, took his seat along with his followers. He noticed that Romaharṣaṇa, the disciple of the great sage Vyāsa, remained seated there, occupying a higher seat in front of the Brāhmaṇas.

23. Balarāma, the descendant of Madhu, got enraged when he found that Romaharṣaṇa, a sūta, did not rise from his seat to show reverence to him after his arrival, nor did he fold his palms to bow him and continued to occupy a higher seat in the presence of the Brāhmaṇas.

24. (He said to the Brāhmaṇas) “Why does this Sūta, a child of irregular marriage (between a Kṣatriya father and a Brāhmaṇa (mother) occupied a seat higher than Brāhmaṇas and us who are the protectors of religion and social code of conduct. This evil-minded fellow deserves to be killed.

25-26. In spite of being a disciple of that worshipful sage Vyāsa and having studied many smṛtis (codes of righteous and religious conduct—social and personal) along with all the works on Itihāsa and purāṇas, he lacks self control, has no sense of discipline or modesty; he vainly pretends to be a learned man. His scholarship and learning do not contribute to his real excellence as in the case of an actor who lacks control over his mind and senses.

27. It is with this specific purpose that I have taken incarnation in this world, viz. those imposters and hypocrites who merely pretend to be religious should be done away with by me; for such people are more sinful than the unrighteous.”

28. Balarāma had desisted from slaying even the wicked ones (as he was a pilgrim then). But as fate would have it,

---

1. Modern Nimsar on the left bank of the Gomati in the Sitapur district of U.P. It is 20 miles to the North-West of Lucknow.

—GDAMI, p. 135.
the mighty Lord spoke these words and pierced the Sūta with the end of a Kuṣa grass.

29. Terrified and dismayed in their minds, all the sages screamed out exclaiming, “Alas! Alas”. They said to Balarāma, “O Lord! You have perpetrated an irreligious and unrighteous deed.

30. O descendant of Yadu! This elevated seat of a Brāhmaṇa has been offered by us to him as also, a long period of life and indefatiguate body till the sacrificial session lasts.

31. May be unknowingly but you have committed what amounts to be the sin of killing a Brāhmaṇa. (It is true that) being a master of Yoga, even the Vedic injunction against killing a Brāhmaṇa is not binding on you.

32. O purifier of the world! If your worship, however, performs, of your own accord, the expiation for the sin of Brahmahatya without being prompted to do so by others, you will be setting a noble example to others.¹

The glorious Lord Balarāma said:

33. I shall expiate for this act of Brāhmaṇa-cide in order to set an example to the world. Be pleased to prescribe to me the best course of atonement for such an act.

34. Be pleased to tell me whatever is expected by you for him—such as a long span of life, strength, sound-ness of sense-organs—and I shall accomplish it for him by my Yogic potency.

The sages replied:

35. O Balarāma! May you be pleased to act in such a way as will preserve the infallibility of your missile (charged in the Kuṣa grass), the efficacy of your prowess, the inevitability of death and that our boon (that the sūta should narrate the purāṇas to the end of our sacrificial session) also may not prove untrue.

¹. yad yad ācarati sreṣṭhas tat tad evetaro janaḥ / sa yat pramāṇaṁ kurute lokas tad anuvartate / —BG.3.2
Lord Balarâma said:

36. It is declared by the Vedas that it is one’s own self that is born as a son.¹ His son Ugrâravas will now be the expounder of the Purânas and he will be blessed with a long life, bodily strength and keenness of senses (and intelligence).

37. O great sages! Be pleased to tell me what else you wish to have and I shall accomplish it for you. O learned sages! Please consider and advise me the course of expiation for the sin committed by me unknowingly.

The sages said:

38. There is a terrible Dânava, named Balvala, the son of Ilvala. On every parva (full-moon and new-moon) days, he comes here and pollutes the sanctity of our sacrifice.

39. He showers (on the sacred sacrifice) puss, blood, faeces, urine, wine and flesh. Please kill that wicked demon and that will be the most valuable service rendered to us by you, O descendant of Daśārha.

40. Thereafter, for twelve months you go round the Bhâratavarṣa and with a serene mind take bath in the sacred waters. Thereby being absolved of the sin, you will be purified.

CHAPTER SEVENTY- NINE

Balvala Killed : Balarâma’s Pilgrimage

Śrî Śuka narrated:

1. O king Parîkṣit! When the next parva (full moon) day came, a terrible, violent stormy wind swept over the place showering heavy dust and filling the whole atmosphere with obnoxious odour on all sides.

   1. āṅgād āṅgāt sambhavasi hṛdayād abhijñaye / ātmā vai putra-nāmā i sa jīva karadah śatam] [ —Kuśitaki Up. 2.7.

Balarâma exhorts the sages to install Ugrâravas in the place of Romaharṣana and all the boons promised to him by the sages will be now effective in the case of the son of Romaharṣana.
2. Then there was a downpour of filthy things on the sacrificial ground, caused by Balvala, after which he appeared with a trident in hand.

3-4. Beholding that asura of gigantic body, extremely black like a heap of collyrium, with hair on the head, moustaches and beard like red-hot copper and a face terror-inspiring with its fierce tusks and terrific knit brows, Balarāma remembered (his weapons)—the pestle that shatters hostile forces and the plough which vanquishes demons. And both the weapons immediately presented themselves to him.

5. With the point of his plough, he pulled to the ground, Balvala who was ranging through the sky and full of indignation, he struck that sworn enemy of Brāhmaṇas on the head with a pestle.

6. With his forehead shattered and split open and bleeding profusely, the demon gave out a helpless yell and fell down to the ground like a mountain struck with Vajra and covered with liquid red chalk.

7. The sages applauded Balarāma (for this feat) and pronounced their unfailing benedictions. Those highly blessed sages sprinkled sacred waters on Balarāma (as abhiṣeka) as gods did to Indra when he killed Vṛtra.

8. They presented to Balarāma a celestial five-coloured Vaijayanti garland of unfading flowers (chiefly lotuses, two excellent pieces of cloth and very valuable ornaments.

9. Then with the permission of those sages, Balarāma, accompanied with Brāhmaṇas went to the Kauśikī river. After taking bath therein, he proceeded to the lake from which the Sarayū flows out.

10. From its source and travelling along the current of the Sarayū, Balarāma reached Prayāga. He took his bath there-

1. Modern Kośi running from Nepal by the western border of the Purnea district in Bihar. The river has been tamed by dams now. Was it in the Kokāmukha tīrtha where Balarāma took his bath?—SGAMI, pp. 278-80, 340.

2. The Purāṇas believe that the Mānasa lake is the source of the Sarayū. But the river rises in the mountains of Kumaun and after its junction with the Kāli nadi, it is called the Sarayū. Ayodhyā is on its bank.

GDAMI, p. 181-82.
in, offered water oblations to gods (sages and manes) and proceeded to the hermitage of Pulaha.

11-12. He bathed in the Gomati, Gaṇḍakī, Vipāśā the Śoṇa and visited Gayā and worshipped his ancestors. After taking his bath at the confluence of the Gaṅgā with the sea, he met Paraśurāma and paid his respects to him on the Mahendra hill. He took bath in the seven branches of the Godāvari, the Veṇā, the Pampā and the river Bhīmā.

13. After paying a visit to the temple of Skanda, he went to Śrī Śaila. The great Balarāma then visited the holy mountain Veṇīkaṭa in the Draviḍa land.

14. Lord Balarāma then visited the city of Kāńci known as Kāmakośī (Kāmakoṭī) and the great river Kāverī, he paid visit to the holy place known as Śrīraṅga (Srīrangam) where Lord Hari ever abides.

15. He then went to the Rṣabha hill, a sacred place dedicated to Hari. He then visited Setu—the dam built across the sea (by Rāmacandra) where people are absolved of very heinous sins.

1. The same as Śālagrāma, near the source of the Gaṇḍak—GDAMI, p. 161 & 174.

2. The Beas. It is difficult to plot the route followed by Balarāma as the purāṇa writer has vague idea of the geography of north India.

3. The range of hills extending from Orissa to the district of Madura. It is applied to Eastern Ghat in general—SGAMI, p. 61. N.L. De states that Mahendra hills separate Ganjam from the valley of the Mahanadi—GDAMI p. 119.

5. Also called Śrī Parvata (GDAMI, p. 193) It is a hilly in the Nallomalur range and a famous Tirtha in Kurnool district of Andhra Pradesh.—SGAMI, p. 336.

6. Modern Conjeveram on the river Palar, 43 miles south-west of Madras. The eastern part of the town is called Viśṇu Kāṇci and western part as Śiva kāṇci—GDAMI, p. 86

7. N.L. De identifies it with Kumbhakonam but he is doubtful about it.—GDAMI, p. 86.

8. Śrīraṅgam, 2 miles to the north of Trichinopoly, Tamil Nad. Famous for its Viśṇu temple (Śrī Raṅgam)—GDAMI, p. 193.

9. The Polni hills in Madura. They form the northern portion of the Malaya mountain. The hills are locally known as Varṇa Parvata—GDAMI, p. 169.

10. The Adam’s bridge between India and Ceylon Rameshwaram is the first island in this chain of islets. It is called Saṅgama Tirtha also—GDAMI, p. 184.
16. Balarāma gave ten thousand cows to the Brāhmaṇas there. He then visited the rivers Kṛta-mālā, Tāmrāparṇi and the mountain-chain called the Malaya (one of the seven important mountain ranges in India).

17. There he paid respects to the sage Agastya who was established on the mountain. After receiving blessings from him and with his permission, Balarāma went to the south-sea where he visited the goddess Durgā (Pārvatī), known there as Kanyā (at Kanyā Kumārī).

18. Next he visited the sacred place called Phālguna¹ and the lake called Paṅcāpsaras (five celestial damsels) noted for the special presence of Viṣṇu. He performed ablution therein and gave ten thousand cows (to Brāhmaṇas).

19. Then Lord Balarāma went to Kerala, Trigarta.² (From thence he proceeded to the famous Śaivite holy place Gokarna where god Śiva is ever-present.

20. Having visited the shrine of Pārvatī (designated as Āryā) on the island, Balarāma proceeded to Śūrpāraka (Sopara, Dist. Thana, Maharashtra). After taking bath in the Tāpī, the Payoṣṇi³ and the Nirvindhyā⁴ he entered the Daṇḍaka forest.

21. (From that forest) he entered the river Narmadā on the banks of which is situated the city of Māhiṣmatī⁵. He performed ablution in the Manuṭirtha and again returned to Prabhāsa.

22. Having heard from the Brāhmaṇas the report of the destruction of all Kṣatriya princes (participating) in the war

¹ ŚR identifies it with Anantapur, fifty-six miles to the south-east of Bellary. Paṅcāpsarā tīrtha is near it. VB. calls it 'Anantaśayana'. He states that the five divine damsels were restored to their original status by Arjuna. Hence it is called Paṅcāpsaras.

² North Canara in Karnataka—GDAMI, p. 205.

³ The Pain-gaṅgā, a tributary of the Godavari—SGAMI, p. 57.

⁴ The Newuj, a tributary of the Chambal flowing between the Betwa and the Kaisindh—SGAMI, p. 57.

⁵ Modern Maheshwar, forty miles to the south of Indore. It was the capital of Haihayas. In the Buddhist canon in the Mahā Govinda sutta (Dīgha Nikāya 29.36) it is called Māhiṣṣati and it was the capital of Avanti (Malwa).
between Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas, he considered it as the removal of the burden of the earth.

23. The scion (or the delight) of the Yadu's race (Balarāma) went to Kurukṣetra with the desire of preventing Bhīma and Duryodhana from their single combat with their maces on the battle-field.

24. As soon as Yudhiṣṭhira, the twins Nakula, Sahadeva and even Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna saw him, they bowed to him but they kept quiet, as they were afraid why he had come over there and what he wanted to say.

25. He saw both Bhīma and Duryodhana, with maces in hand, both highly enraged and bent on vanquishing the other, were making wonderful manoeuvres (in the combat with maces). He spoke to them:

26. "O king (Duryodhana), O Bhīma, both of you are warriors equal in strength. I think one of you is superior in physical strength while the other excels in training.

27. As both of you are equal in prowess, I do not see that either of you will be victorious or vanquished. Hence, such a fruitless combat should be stopped altogether.

28. O Parikṣit! The enmity of these two inveterate adversaries was so deepseated that neither of them accepted his advice, though it was salutary and significant. For they did not forget their mutual offensive words and the wicked deeds.

29. Considering that the combat was destined (as a fruit of their past acts and hence inevitable), Balarāma returned to Dvārakā. He was received there warmly by Ugrasena and other relatives who were glad at his arrival.

30. (Balarāma took him with all the necessary materials and assistants for performing sacrifices). He again visited the Naimiṣa forest. The sages, acting as his sacrificial priests, gladly helped Balarāma whose person was constituted of sacrifice (or sacrifices formed a part of his personality) and who kept himself aloof from the (Kaurava-Pāṇḍava) war, in the performance of all sacrifices.

31. The almighty Lord Balarāma imparted to them highly pure spiritual wisdom by virtue of which the sages realized that the whole universe is in their Self and that their self pervaded all the universe.

32. Having performed the concluding bath of the sacrifice along with his consort Revatī and accompanied by his clansmen, relatives and friends, Balarāma who put on excellent dress and was well adorned, shone like the moon radiating its own (moon-) light.

33. Innumerable are other feats and exploits (of such a nature) of the mighty Balarāma who is infinite (or Ananta or the serpent Śeṣa himself) and incomprehensible by nature. He has assumed the form of a mortal being by his own Māyā potency.

34. He who remembers and contemplates over the feats of Balarāma who performed miraculous deeds, both in the morning and the evening, becomes a beloved of the infinite Lord Viṣṇu.

CHAPTER EIGHTY*

The Story of the Brāhmaṇa Śridāman

King Parikṣiṭt requested :

1. O worshipful sage! We desire to hear of other glorious exploits of the noble-souled Kṛṣṇa of infinite powers and glory, O master.

2. What person (on earth) who has the power of discernment of what is excellent and the quintessence of things but has suffered sorely from the shafts of passions and desires, and had once the opportunity of listening to the holy and true

* VJ. : Before beginning the description of Kṛṣṇa's placid life at home in Dwārakā after the Mahābhārata war, VJ.'s text describes the interim activation of Kṛṣṇa such as visiting Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Gāndhāri and departure from Hastināpura. (for this refer Appendix, Chapter eighty-I.)

1. The text of the Bh. P. is silent about the name of the Brāhmaṇa. The name given here is on the strength of the colophon of the chapter.
stories of the Lord of hallowed renown, would desist from listening to them, O Brāhmaṇa sage?

3. That is the only real speech (tongue) with which Lord’s excellences are extolled. Those hands deserve their designation as hands which engage themselves in his service. That mind is worth its name which contemplates on him who abides in all the mobile and immobile creation. Only that ear (is the blessed and) deserves to be called such (viz. the ear) which listens to the holy stories of the Lord.

4. That head deserves to be called such as bows down to him as manifested in both mobile or immobile forms (or lays itself on the ground to bow to him and his votaries). That is the real eye which sees the Lord (in everything and everywhere). Those are the real parts of the body, which always resort to the waters that wash the feet of the Lord as well as those of his devotees (i.e. sprinkle themselves and get purified with those waters).1

Śūta said :

5. When the worshipful son of Bādarāyaṇa was thus requested by king Parīkṣit, Śuka whose heart is immersed in (the meditations of) the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, said.

Śrī Śuka began to narrate :

6. There was a certain Brāhmaṇa friend of Lord Kṛṣṇa. He was a pastmaster in the knowledge of the Vedas (or the supreme Brahman), free from attachment to the objects of senses. He was perfectly serene in mind and possessed complete control over his senses.

7. Though he was leading the life of a householder, he subsisted on whatever came his way without asking or trying for it. He was (naturally) ill-clad and his wife also who was like him (had no sufficient clothing to cover her person) but was of the same spirit, had grown emaciated with hunger.

8. That poverty-stricken chaste lady who was devoted to her husband but whose body was trembling (with weakness)

1. VT. cautions that this sprinkling is limited to the limbs of the upper part (nābher ārdhvam) of the body.
and with a withered countenance, approached her husband and submitted:

9. "Is it not a fact, O Brāhmaṇa, that Kṛṣṇa, the Consort of Lakṣmī incarnate, is a personal friend of your worshipful self? The glorious Lord, the leader of Sātvatas, is a friend and devotee of Brāhmaṇas and a worthy asylum to those who seek shelter in him.

10. Blessed Sir, be pleased to approach him who is the ultimate resort of the righteous and saintly people. He will (immediately understand your circumstances and) bestow abundant wealth on you, who are a poverty-stricken householder.

11. That Lord of Bhoja, Vṛṣṇi and Andhaka clans now resides at Dvārakā. If his lotus feet are remembered, he gives away even his own self (to them. He is so generous). Will not that father and preceptor of the world confer wealth and worldly desires on his devotees, as both these are not very important comparatively (as gifts to his votaries).

12. When he was thus softly entreated by his wife many times, the soft-natured Brāhmaṇa thought, "It will be a supreme blessing at least that I shall gain at the sight of the Lord of holy renown.

13. With these considerations, he made up his mind to go (to Dvārakā). (As it was customary not to see a king or a guest empty-handed, but to offer him something as a present) he said, "Is there anything in the house worth giving as a present to Kṛṣṇa? If so, give that with me, O blessed lady."

14. The lady solicited the (neighbouring) Brāhmaṇas to give her some prthukas (fried and beaten rice). Having secured four handfuls of such rice, she tyed them up in a rag and handed over them to her husband as 'Present' to Lord Kṛṣṇa.

15. With those handfuls of rice as present, the Brāhmaṇa travelled the city of Dvārakā anxiously thinking all the while, "How will it be possible for me to gain a sight of Lord Kṛṣṇa?"

16. Accompanied by other Brāhmaṇas, he crossed the three check posts of guards\footnote{According to verse quoted by VT, a gulma or checkpost consists of nine elephants, nine chariots, twentyseven horsemen and fortyfive footsoldiers.} and the defensive ramparts of the city.
and the mansions of Andhakas and Vṛṣṇis who followed the path of righteousness ordained by Lord Kṛṣṇa—which were inaccessible to other persons.

17. Out of the sixteen thousand palaces of the queens of Kṛṣṇa, the Brāhmaṇa entered one of them which appeared specially affluent and splendid, with the feeling of supreme bliss in merging with the Brahman.

18. Noticing from a distance that the Brāhmaṇa was coming, Lord Kṛṣṇa who then occupied a sofa with his beloved (Rukmiṇī), instantly rose from his seat, went forward to receive him and joyfully embraced him closely with both of his arms.

19. The lotus-eyed Lord felt extremely happy at the touch of the person of his beloved friend, the Brāhmaṇa sage and he shed tears of joy from his eyes.

20-21. Then he seated him on his own couch; and personally washed his feet and sprinkled his own head with the drops of water with which he washed the Brāhmaṇa’s feet. O king Parīksit, the Lord who purifies the whole universe, smeared the Brāhmaṇa with excellent perfumes such as pastes of sandal aloe-wood and saffron.

22. Having worshipped his friend with perfumed fumes and rows of lamps, he offered him a cow as a gift, a betel-leaf (with its usual contents of areca-nut powder, cloves, etc.) and greeted him warmly with sweet words of welcome.

23. It is said that the queen Rukmiṇī herself, with a chowrie in her hand, fanned the ill-clad Brāhmaṇa of emaciated dusty body the veins of which were visible.

24. The ladies in the harem were really astonished to see that a semi-nude Brāhmaṇa is worshipped with so much affection by Lord Kṛṣṇa of such a spotless reputation.

25-26. (They commented): “What meritorious act must have been performed by this naked beggarly Brāhmaṇa, destitute of wealth and censured as worthless in the world, that he was greatly honoured by the preceptor of the three worlds, the abode of the goddess Śrī. But he discarded the goddess Lakṣmī who was occupying the sofa with him and embraced him as if he were his elder brother.”

27. O king! Holding each other by the hand, they recounted to each other the sweet stories of the incidents that happened while both of them lived together in their teacher’s hermitage in their student days.

_The glorious Lord enquired:_

28. O dear Brāhmaṇa, expert in religion! Please tell me if, after the completion of your course of education and after honouring your teacher with the payment of fee for education, you have married a wife suitable to you or have not done so as yet.

29. I learn that even as a householder, your mind is not interested in objects of enjoyment and being a learned man you are not so much after money.

30. Like unto myself who perform action to set example to the world, there are some people who discharge their duties without being affected by desires at heart and avoid the fascinations created by the celestial potency of the Lord.

31. Do you remember, O Brāhmaṇa, our stay in the house of our preceptor? It is there that a twice-born one knows everything worth knowing from his preceptor and ultimately reaches beyond the darkness (of _samsāra_).

32. Dear friend! He from whom one is born (and thus invested with the body) is the first _guru_ (preceptor). He from whom one becomes twice-born (by performance of the _upanayana_—investiture of the sacred thread) and becomes eligible for study of Vedas and performance of religious duties is the second preceptor. And one who imparts spiritual knowledge directly to persons belonging to all _āstāmas_ (stages of life)—is the Third _guru_ (preceptor) and is veritably identical with me.

33. (Hence, those who resort to me as the preceptor giving enlightenment in spiritual knowledge, and cross the _samsāra_ are the really intelligent ones) O Brāhmaṇa! Those who, in this mundane existence, obtain oral instructions (in spiritual matters) from me as their preceptor, easily cross the ocean of _samsāra_, as they know the real essence in the order of _varṇas_ (social classes) and _āstāmas_ (stages of life).

34. I abide in all beings as their Inner Controller. Just as I am pleased by rendering services (to the spiritual preceptor), I shall not be pleased (that much) by performance of sacrifices (or the duties of a householder’s life), by birth in excellent family, by the performance of the investiture of the sacred thread of upanayana (implying the observance of duties of a brahmacārī or a celibate person). Nor shall I be pleased so much with penance (in the Vānaprastha stage of life) or by the path of quietism (followed by sannyāsīs).

35. Do you remember, O Brāhmaṇa, the incident which happened while we were staying at our preceptor’s hermitage and were once sent by our preceptor’s wife to bring fuel.

36. And how when we entered into the thick jungle, suddenly, out of season, there was an outbreak of a mighty violent storm, heavy down-pour of rain and terrible roaring of thunder over our heads.

37. In the meanwhile the sun set and all the quarters were enveloped in darkness and the undulations of the ground being covered under water we could not discern the high or the low level of the land.

38. Then failing to discern the direction to be followed and sorely beaten by the repeated violent blasts of wind and showers in the forest flooded with water, we were afraid and holding each other by hand, wandered here and there.

39. Having come to know of this after sunrise, our teacher Sāndipani came in search of us with his disciples and found us in a bewildered condition.

40. He cried out, “O my children, you have undergone extreme hardships for our sake. Life or the soul is verily dearest to all. But you evinced devotion unto me disregarding even that (your life).

41. It is in this manner that a good disciple should repay his debt (of gratitude) to his preceptor, namely that he should offer with a sincere heart, whatever he has with him (including his very life).

42. O prominent among twice-borns! I am really very much pleased. Let all your desires be fulfilled. May your knowledge of the Vedas never fail you either here or hereafter.”

43. Many other such incidents took place during our residence in the house of our preceptor. It is by the grace of the preceptor that a man becomes perfect and eligible for supreme peace.
The Brähmaṇa (Śrīdāman) replied:

44. O God of gods! O Preceptor of the universe! When we stayed in the preceptor's house, what was there that we did not accomplish through the help of you whose resolutions always turn out to be true.

45. O Almighty Lord! Your person is constituted of the Vedas and you are the repository of all blessings; your stay in the house of the preceptor is certainly a wonderful imitation of the ways of the world.

CHAPTER EIGHTYONE

The Story of the Parched Rice
(The story of Śrīdāman continued)

Śri Śuka said:

1. While Hari was conversing with the prominent Brähmaṇa on such matters he, knowing as he did the minds of all beings, spoke to him smilingly.

2. Lord Kṛṣṇa was friendly to Brähmaṇas and he was certainly the asylum of the pious. Looking at his dear Brähmaṇa friend with an affectionate glance, he laughed loudly and asked in a joking mood:

The Lord said:

3. “What present have you brought for me from your house, O Brähmaṇa? Even the slightest offering—a particle given with affection by my devotees is considered by me as very great, but even if a lot of presents are given to me by one who is not my votary, they are not conducive to my joy or satisfaction.

4. A person who devoutly offers me a leaf, a flower, a fruit or even water, I enjoy that which has been brought to me with devotion by a person of controlled and pure mind.”

5. Even though the Brähmaṇa was thus requested, he felt so much abashed that he did not hand over the present of prthukas ( parched, flattened rice) to the Lord of the goddess Śrī and simply hung his head, O king.

6-7. But the Lord can directly see what goes in the minds of all beings and he knew definitely the cause of Śridāman's visit. He thought to himself, "This Brāhmaṇa never approached me or worshipped me for money. This friend of mine has come here for pleasing his virtuous wife (in compliance of her entreaty). I shall bestow upon him wealth which is rare even for immortal gods.

8. Thinking thus within himself, he, of his own accord, snatched from under the clothes of the Brāhmaṇa, the parched flattened rice tied up in a rag (and brought by way of present to Śrī Kṛṣṇa) asking him, "What is it?

9. My dear friend ! This present ( parched rice-eatable) is exceedingly to my liking. These flattened parched rice will thoroughly satisfy me who am the Soul of the universe."

10. Saying thus, he ate handful of those rice and took another handful for eating when his consort Śrī (i.e. Rukmini) who was so devoted to him caught hold of the hand of the Supreme Lord, (claiming that other handful of rice to herself).

11. "O Soul of the Universe ! This ( handful of eaten rice) is more than sufficient in granting him all kinds of wealth and prosperity both here and hereafter. This much is quite enough for your satisfaction."

12. The Brāhmaṇa passed that night happily in the palace of Śrī Kṛṣṇa. He partook of the feast and drink and felt himself to be in the celestial world itself.

13. The next morning, he set out for his home. He was however, followed some distance by Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Creator of the Universe, the very embodiment of essential spiritual bliss who delighted him with his friendly talk.

14. But the Brāhmaṇa who was happy with seeing his great friend, returned home abashed on account of the mean-

1. ŚR. explains the significance of this prohibition to eat another handful as follows : one handful is enough to bestow on the poor Brāhmaṇa all the wealth and affluence. But by eating another handful, she will be at the service of the Brāhmaṇa (instead of Lord Kṛṣṇa)—a calamity she wanted to avoid.
ness of his heart as he did not get any money from Kṛṣṇa nor did he of his own accord request him for it.

15. (On the way, he said to himself): “How wonderful! The Lord is known for his friendliness to Brähmaṇas which has been personally experienced by me, as the bearer of the goddess Lakṣmī on his bosom held me in close embrace—me who am the wretchedmost.

16. What a world of difference there is between me, a poverty-stricken sinner and Lord Kṛṣṇa, the abode of Lakṣmī. But I have been embraced by him with both of his arms because of my birth as a Brähmaṇa (so kind and friendly he is to Brähmaṇas).

17. Just like a brother, I was seated on the same sofa that was occupied by his beloved queen. Fatigued as I was, I was fanned by the Queen herself with a chowry in her hand.

18. I was adored like a god by Kṛṣṇa, the God of gods who treats Brähmaṇas as his deities. He rendered me the highest service by personally shampooing my feet, applying sandal-pastes, etc.

19. Worship of his feet is the primary cause for men to be blessed with happiness in heaven or the bliss in the Mokṣa and all the affluence available either in this world or the nether-world and of mastery over all miraculous powers (Siddhis).

20. The Lord thought that if a penniless fellow (like me) should gain wealth, it would turn his head and would not remember me. It is with this consideration that the merciful Lord has not bestowed any wealth on me.”

21. While he was musing thus, he arrived at the site of his home-stead. And Lo! It was surrounded on all sides by a palace several storeys high and resplendent like the sun, fire and the moon.

22. It was surrounded with wonderfully beautiful pleasure gardens and groves swarming with the melodiously warbling birds and with pools and tanks in which various types of lilies, lotuses, night-lotuses were in full blossom.

23. It was manned by well-adorned male attendants and beautiful female attendants with gazelle-like eyes. The Brāhmaṇa could not recognise what it was, whose place it was and how was it that it was transformed so wonderfully.

24. While the Brāhmaṇa was pondering over that metamorphosis (of his humble home-stead) god-like glamorous men and women advanced to welcome the highly fortunate Brāhmaṇa with excellent vocal and instrumental music.¹

25. Hearing that her husband had returned, the Brāhmaṇa’s wife was transported with ecstatic delight. And in her joyous impatience, she hurriedly came out of the house (to receive him) like unto the goddess Lākṣmī incarnate coming out of her (heavenly) abode.

26. At the sight of her husband, the chaste lady had her eyes full of tears of love and eagerness. (Out of shyness) she closed her eyes and mentally paid respects to him and embraced him in her mind.

27. He was astonished to see his wife gloriously glamorous like a celestial damsel and shining (in her deportment) in the midst of maid-servants adorned with necklaces of gold coins.

28. Being beside himself with joy, he entered in the company of his wife, his own mansion which was furnished with hundred(s) of columns of precious stones and which resembled the palace of the great Indra.

29. His palace was furnished with beds white (and soft) like the foam of milk. The bedsteads were of ivory chased in gold and the fans and chowries had gold handles.

30. The seats were of gold provided with soft cushions. And wreathes of pearls were hanging from brilliant canopies.

31. The palace walls were of pure crystals studded with big emeralds and in them he saw excellent dolls of precious stones holding resplendent jewel lamps in their hands (to illumine the room).

¹ VT in his com. on Verse 22-23 clarifies that when Śrīdāman stayed that night at Dvārakā and his wife in her humble cottage, this miraculous transformation of her cottage took place. When she got up and was astonished to see the change, the attendants explained how this metamorphosis was due to Lord Kṛṣṇa’s Grace. So in order that her husband should not feel confused, she instructed the attendants to receive him, etc.
32. Beholding such abundance of wealth, affluence and luxury, the Brāhmaṇa, with a dispassionate mind began to reflect upon that ‘cause-less’ un-sought-for windfall of wealth in his care.

33. “I am indeed unfortunate (from my childhood) and am confirmed in eternal poverty. But the cause of this unexpected prosperity can be traced to nothing else but the gracious visit (I had the privilege to obtain) of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the leader of Yadu, the master of infinite wealth.

34. My friend, the foremost of the Dāśārhas is infinitely liberal and is perfect in all blessings. Though he bestows abundantly upon his suppliants like the rain-god, he regards his gift as insignificant and nominal. Knowing the minds of his devotees he gives immense riches to them but does not promise them directly. (He is a silent but highly munificent donor).

35. Although what he gives is immensely abundant, he looks upon it as very little. And whatever insignificant is offered by his friends, he regards it as very great. That high-souled affectionate friend accepted with pleasure only a handful of the parched, flattened rice taken by me for him.

36. May I, in every future birth, be blessed with his good-will, friendship, love and service. May I have the fortune of associating myself with his devotees and may I cherish (ever-increasing) devotion to that abode of excellences and glorious powers.

37. For the Eternal Omniscient glorious Lord himself notices the downfall of the rich caused by the pride of their wealth, and does not wish to confer wonderful affluence, kingship and other spiritual powers or authorities on his devotee (even though he may solicit it) but grants them to the shortsighted ones.

38. Having come to this conclusion by intelligent thinking, the Brāhmaṇa who was devoutly and excessively attached to Kṛṣṇa, did not become much attached to those pleasures, but with the intention of renouncing them, he enjoyed those pleasures with his wife, but with little attachment to them.

39. To the Almighty Lord Hari, the God of gods, the Lord and Protector of Sacrifices, Brāhmaṇas are his deities. To him, nothing is higher then Brāhmaṇas.

40. In this way, the Brāhmaṇa friend of the Lord realized that the Unvanquished Lord Kṛṣṇa is easily agreeable to the will of his devotees. His personal bonds (of ignorance or attachment) were cut asunder by the force of his intensive meditation. And in a short while, he attained to the Lord's region (Vaikuṇṭha), the highest goal of the righteous people.

41. A person who listens to this account of the grace showered on a Brāhmaṇa by the God who is friendly to Brāhmaṇas attains devotion unto the Lord and becomes free from the bonds of Karmas.

CHAPTER EIGHTYTWΟ¹

Meeting of Vṛṣṇis and Gopas of Vṛndāvana

Śrī Śuka said:

1. On one occasion, while Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa were staying at Dvārakā, there occurred a complete eclipse of the sun, as it was at the time of deluge.

2. Being informed of it (beforehand astronomically), all (religious-minded) people from all sides went to the sacred place called Syamantapaṇcaka (Kurukṣetra) with the object of securing merits.

3. It was at that sacred place that Paraśurāma, the most prominent warrior, caused those big pools filled with the bloods of kings, while attempting to exterminate all Kṣattriyas from the earth.

4. Though the glorious Lord Paraśurāma was untouched by any Karma (despite his punitive action), in order to set a model example to people, he performed a sacrifice there for expiation of that sin (of killing Kṣattriyas) as an ordinary person will have to do.

¹. The additional verses from VJ.'s Text are added here from Ch. 70 as printed on pp. 309-310 of the Vrindaban edition.
5. People from all over Bhāratavarṣa came to that most important place of pilgrimage.

VF’s Text adds:

5A-B. Śrī Kṛṣṇa accompanied with the palanquins of his sixteen thousand queens, by his sons, grandsons, multitudes of citizens, army-units, courtesans, she-elephants, by bevy of ladies from the city and other women-friends.

5-6. Vṛṣṇis as well as (elderly persons like) Akrūra, Vasudeva and Āhuka assembled to that sacred place to absolve themselves of their sins. And Gada, Pradyumna, Śāmba and others did the same.

7-8. Along with Sucandra (Rukmini’s son Cārucandra), Śuka and Sāraṇa, Aniruddha and the chief of the army Kṛtvārṇa were posted for the protection of the city. With their chariots resembling celestial cars, with fleet horses springing like waves, with trumpeting elephants like thundering clouds and men appearing splendid like celestial beings (Vidyādharas), Yadavas who were adorned with wreaths of gold appeared extremely splendid and pompous on the way.¹

¹. VF’s Text adds:

8.1-2. With loud chantings of Vedic hymns and playing of instrumental music, and in accompaniment of the flourish of the sounds of conchs and beating of drums, they went on singing and repeating the name of Kṛṣṇa and Govinda continuously. In this way, they filled all the quarters with great noise as they went, O best of Kurus.

8.3. As they reached the holy place Syamantapañcaka, well known all over the three worlds, they built up hutments (dwelling places) with thatched roof, matting and wood (lit. with long grass and sticks).

8.4 Tents with blankets, deerskin and canvass were pitched up for kings. They were hundreds and thousands in number and had a variety of forms.

8.5 There arrived a number of kings, thousands of Brāhmaṇas, Vaiṣyās and Śūdras and innumerable persons of lower castes.

8.6. And noble-souled sages of high reputation and of praiseworthy observance of vows, with preceptors, some maintainers of consecrated fire (agni-hotrins), some life-long celibate students and householders.

8.7. The blind, the deaf, the hunchbacks, dwarfs and physically handicapped people, persons with retarded intelligence, dumb persons—all are desirous of being absolved of their past actions.

8.8 All of them adorned their heads with the dust on the lotus-feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa, beautified with ornaments like bracelets, armlets (both on the lower and upper part of the forearm), garlands and ear-rings.
9. Like celestials ranging through the sky, along with their wives, they put on heavenly garlands, rich clothes. Arriving at Syamanta-pañcaka, those highly blessed people took their bath, observed a fast and were perfectly serene and self possessed in mind.

10. They gave to Brāhmaṇas gifts of cows covering them with clothes and adorning them with garlands and chains of gold. (And after the eclipse was over) the Vṛṣṇis again took a bath as per formalities in the pools created by Paraśurāma.

11-12. The Vṛṣṇis to whom Kṛṣṇa was their deity, served delicious food to prominent Brāhmaṇas and prayed, "May we be blest with constant devotion to Kṛṣṇa. With the permission of the Brāhmaṇas, they broke their fast. And they took rest according to their wish and pleasure under the dense, cool shade of trees. They interviewed their friendly kings and relatives who congregated there (for the same religious purpose).

13-14. They saw kings (their friends and relatives) of Matsya, Uśīnara, Kosala, Vidarbha, Kuru, Śrījaya, Kamboja, Kekaya, Madra, Kuntī, Ānarta and Kerala and hundreds of many other kings who were their allies or strangers. They met their friends and well-wishers like Nanda and other cowherds and Gopīs (cowherd women) who were anxiously longing to meet them.

15. Owing to overwhelming ecstatic joy of mutually looking at each other, their lotus-like hearts and faces became fully blossomed and full of splendour. They hugged each other in close embrace, with tears of joy trickling from their eyes; their hair stood on their ends; their voice choked with emotion and faltering—all of them were transported with joy.

16. Looking at each other with affectionate side-glances and exceedingly friendly smiles, the women also embraced each other closely, pressing against each other their breasts which were besmeared with saffron and their eyes full of tears of joy and affection.

17. After paying respects to the elders, they were bowed by their juniors. Welcoming each other, they enquired after the well-being (of their friends and relatives) and they told each other the stories of Kṛṣṇa.
18. When Kunti saw her brothers, sisters, their sons, her parents, sisters-in-law and Śrī Kṛṣṇa, she felt relief as her grief soothed during her conversation with them.

Kunti said:

19. Dear (elder) brother! I feel I am unlucky as no desire of mine becomes fulfilled. Or it may be that excellent-most brothers like you do not remember of me, even though I am entangled in calamities.

20. It appears that friends, relatives, sons, brothers—nay even parents—do not remember their own relative if the Fate frowns upon him.

Vasudeva replied:

21. Mother (a term of endearment for younger sister)! Please do not blame us, who are ordinary mortals—toys or pawns in the hands of Providence. The world is completely under the control of the Almighty Lord and everyone acts or is compelled to act according to his will.

22. (As you know it) due to the harassment of Kāṁsa all of us had to flee and were scattered in all directions. Dear sister! It is only recently that the Providence has rehabilitated us together.

Śrī Śuka said:

23. The kings who were duly worshipped by Vasudeva, Ugrasena and other prominent Yādavas felt deeply satisfied and delighted at the sight of Lord Kṛṣṇa.

24-26. (Those kings and prominent persons were) Bhīṣma, Drūṇa, Dṛḍtarāṣṭra, the son of Ambikā, Gāndhārī and all her sons, Pāṇḍavas and their queens, Kuntī, Śrījaya, Vidūra, Kṛpa, Kuntibhoja, Virāta, Bhīṣmaka and Nagnajit, the mighty; Purujit, Drupada, Śalya, Dṛḍṭaketu along with the king of KāŚi; Damaghoṣa, Viśālākṣa, the kings of Mithilā, Madra and Kekaya; Yudhāmanyu, Suśarmā, Bāhlīka along with his princes.

27. O king of kings! These princes and those who were the allies of Yudhiṣṭhira were astonished to behold the personality of Lord Kṛṣṇa which was the abode of the goddess Śrī (of affluence and beauty) in the company of his queens.

28. Thereupon, the kings who were duly honoured by Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa were greatly delighted and eloquently praised Vṛṣṇis who were the relatives of Lord Kṛṣṇa and were under his protection.

29. (They complimented:) "O Ugrasena, the king of Bhojas! Inasmuch as you are lucky to have constantly the sight of lord Kṛṣṇa who is very difficult to be seen even by Yogins, you must deem to have accomplished the purpose of human existence among all men born in this world.

30. His spotless glory sung by the Vedas purifies the world; so does the water that washes his feet and his word, viz. the Vedic Śāstra. The earth which has all its potential productive capacity burnt up by the Time-Spirit, has all her powers resuscitated by the touch of his lotus-feet. Hence, she yields to us all our desired objects.

31. The householder's life paves the way to hell. But though you lead that (householder's) life, Lord Viṣṇu himself who makes one unattached both to celestial life as well as salvation (mokṣa) stays in your houses, and you can see him, touch him, go after him, speak with him, sit close to him, eat with him, share the bed with him and have contacts and relations with him.

Śrī Śuka said:

32. Learning that Yādavas of whom Kṛṣṇa is prominent, have arrived there, Nanda accompanied with Gopas and carts loaded with milk-products, came there with a desire to see them.

33. Seeing Nanda all the Yādavas were overjoyed and rose up to receive him, as the bodies do after the return of

1. VJ. : The Śāstra such as The Brahmastra issued out of Lord Kṛṣṇa's mouth purifies the world.

2. VJ. : You have really accomplished the highest purpose in your life as you are in direct contact with Lord Viṣṇu—The source of the bliss in the heaven and in the Mokṣa. He of his own accord has been in your house, so in your case householder's life will not lead to hell.
vital breath. Being extremely anxious to see him for a long time, they embraced him closely.

34. Vasudeva was especially pleased. Being overwhelmed with affection, he embraced him fast, remembering how Kåma subjected him to harrowing persecutions and how he had to entrust his son to Nanda’s care at his Gokula.

35. Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma embraced and bowed to their (foster) parents. But due to overwhelming affection, and the throat being choked with emotions (lit. tears of joy) they could not utter a word, O best of Kurus.

36. The highly blessed Yaśodā placed both the sons on her seat (v.l. on her lap) and clasping them together in her arms in close embrace, forgot her (longfelt) distress (of separation from them).

37. Remembering their close friendship with Yaśodā, both Rohini and Devaki embraced her. With their voice choked with emotions (tears), they exclaimed in faltering tones.

38. “O queen of Vraja! Who can ever forget your everlasting (act of) friendship. Even if one attains to the fortune and status of the Lord of Heaven, the great debt (of your friendship) is unrepayable in this world.

39. Worshipful lady! These two children who had not seen their own parents, were entrusted to your filial care. They lived under your care like eyes protected by eye-lids without any fear from any quarter. You gave them protection, nourishment, loving care, caressing growth and development. For the good and righteous persons do not discriminate between a child who is theirs and the one who is not theirs.

Śrī Sūka said:

40. Having seen their beloved Kṛṣṇa after a pretty long time, they (yearned to gaze at him continuously without the interruption of winking of the eyelids and so) they blamed the Creator who created the eyelids and thus interrupted (even for a wink), his vision. Mentally they closely embraced him, who was ushered in their hearts through their eyes, and instantly became merged in him—an accomplishment not within the easy reach of Yogins who always practice to attain one-ness with him through Yogic meditation.

41. (Kṛṣṇa assumed as many forms as there were Gopīs. And at night in a secluded place simultaneously met them all severally). When the Lord saw them in that (absorbed) state of meditation, he met each of them, in privacy, embraced them, enquired about their health and spoke to them smilingly.

42. "O friends! Do you remember us who in order to serve the cause of our relatives have left Vraja and who were busy, as our heart was distracted elsewhere in annihilating the party of our enemies, and hence, were out of sight and have returned after a long time.

43. As a matter of fact, it is the will of the Almighty Lord which unites or disunites beings. Do you form a low opinion about us suspecting us to be ungrateful to you (despite your consistent friendliness during our stay at Gokul)? (Our absence was an act of God. Please do not misunderstand us).

44. Like unto the wind bringing together, or dispersing clouds, blades of grass, cotton, particles of dust, the Lord—the creator unites or disunites beings created by him.

45. It is a matter of great joy and fortune that the loving devotion entertained by you for me shall lead to my Self-realization and absorption in me, for it is only loving (and constant) devotion unto me that leads people to immortality i.e. Final Liberation.

46. O beautiful damsels! Just as the elements such as the sky, water, earth, wind and fire constitute the inside and outside, beginning and the end of all material objects, I am really the beginning and the end of all beings permeating them all from within and without.

47. In this way all these elements constitute all (gross) products and beings (and are thus in them but they are not in the Soul). The Soul abides in them as the enjoyer and thus pervades them. You, therefore, observe clearly that both these (The soul and the elements) appear in me, but I as the Supreme Perfect Brahman transcend them, all.
Śrī Śuka said :

48. In this way, the Gopīs were initiated and instructed in the spiritual Lore by Lord Kṛṣṇa. By dint of constant contemplation on him, they destroyed the sheath of the subtle body (jīva-kōśa) and became merged in him.

49. And they prayed: "O Lotus-navelled Lord! May your lotus-feet worthy of being meditated upon in their hearts by masters of Yoga of unfathomable spiritual wisdom and which form as a support (or supporting plank) to get out of the well of samsāra to people who have fallen into that well, may these lotus feet ever remain manifest in our hearts even though we lead a domestic life in Samsāra.

CHAPTER EIGHTYTHREE

Narration of Their Marriage Episodes
by Kṛṣṇa's Consorts

Śrī Śuka said :

1. The glorious Lord Śrī Kṛṣṇa who was the spiritual preceptor as well as the goal (to be attained), showered his grace on the Gopīs in that way (described in the previous Chapter). Thereupon (secondarily) he made enquiries about the welfare of Yudhiṣṭhira and all other friends and well wishers.

2. They were kindly enquired after and were duly honoured (with various presents). Their sins were destroyed at the very sight of the Lord's feet. With their minds full of joy they replied:

3. "O Lord, whence can anything inauspicious befall them who with (the goblets of) their ears, drink to their heart's content the nectar of your lotus-feet (making them forget all their griefs with its intoxicating effects) the nectar which (after filling the heart of the great-souled persons and

1. mādakatayā sarva-duḥkha-vismārakatvam ca dhvaniḥm—VT.
having been thoroughly enjoyed by them) flows out of the heart through their lips on some occasions (in the form of the glorification of his sportive actions). It is this nectar which rids all embodied beings of Nescience which is the root-cause of the repeated mundane existence (Lit. assuming bodies repeatedly).

4. We stand offering our salutations to you only (leaving all our attachment to our bodies and household properties\(^1\)). By the effulgence of spiritual knowledge, you have shaken off (and are untouched by) the three states (of wakefulness, dream and dream-less sleep) produced by contact with the mind. Hence, you are a flood (or fathomless and limitless ocean) of blissfulness; you are the Absolute and infinite intelligence. You have assumed a (human) form through your Yogic potency for the protection of the Vedas (which were lost or whose influence disappeared) through the force of the Time-spirit. You are the ultimate goal (or abode) which the recluses of the highest order aspire to reach.

The sage (Śuka) resumed:

5. While people (like Yudhiṣṭhira and others) were glorifying in songs the praise of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the crest-jewel among persons of hallowing renown (or the utterance of whose names is auspicious), the ladies of Andhaka (Yādava) and Kaurava families met together and narrated to each other the stories of Śrī Kṛṣṇa which are sung all over the worlds. Please listen as I shall describe them to you.

Draupadī asked:

6-7*. O Rukmiṇī who are never separate from Lord Kṛṣṇa, Bhadrā, Jāmbavatī, Kausālā, Satyabhāmā, Kālindī, Śaibyā, Rohiṇī\(^2\), Laksmanā—O consorts of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, be pleased to tell us this—how did Śrī Kṛṣṇa who is the embodi-

---

1. hita kim ātmā-dhāma: ātmā sārīram dhāma grham dehadaihika-sambandham parityajya—ŚR.)
2. She was honoured like another Chief queen—ŚR.

---

\(^1\) VT tries to defend the sequence in the names of Kṛṣṇa's queens but it is for metrical convenience that the seniority is not observed.

\(^2\)
ment of God himself, come to espouse you imitating the ways of ordinary mortals, through his own Mâyā Potency.

Rukmîni replied:

8. Like a lion taking away its share (prey) from the herds of goats and sheep, the Lord carried me away, placing his foot on the heads (lit. covering with the dust of his feet the heads) of invincible warrior princes (like Jarāsandha, allies of Śiśupāla) who determined to make me over (in marriage) to Śiśupāla, stood (ready to fight) raising up their bows (and arms). May those feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the abode of Śri (goddess of beauty and wealth), be available to me for worship, forever.

Satyabhāmā said:

9. In order to (disprove and) wipe out the charge (of murder of Prasena) imputed (to him) by my father whose heart was extremely grieved at the death of his brother (Prasena), the Lord vanquished Jāmbavān, the king of bears, and bringing back from him the (syamantaka) gem restored it to my father. Afraid of the consequences (of the false allegations made against Kṛṣṇa and in order to pacify him), my father offered me to him even though I was promised (to be given in marriage) to another (Akrūra).

Jāmbavatī said:

10. My father could not recognize him (Lord Kṛṣṇa) to be his (former) Master and deity, Rāmacandra, the husband of Sitā. He fought with him for twenty seven days. When he stood the test, my father came to know him, (to be no other than Rāmacandra). Then he (my father) took hold of his feet and offered me along with the jewel as a present. (O Draupadī) I am not very great. I am his female slave.

Kālindī said:

11. Having come to know that I am performing penance in the hope of (getting the privilege of) touching his feet, he approached me through his friend (Arjuna) and accepted my hand in marriage. I am just a sweeper (a female servant) in his house.

Bhadra said:

12. Attending my svayamvara and defeating my brothers and kings who offered resistance, my Lord carried me away to his capital (Dvārakā) just as a lion seizes away his share (prey) from a pack of hounds. May I have the good luck of washing the feet of him who is the abode of the goddess Śrī, in every birth.

Satyā said:

13. In order to put to test the prowess of the kings (who came as suitors for my hand), my father procured seven extremely mighty, energetic bulls with very sharp (pointed) horns. These bulls humiliated the pride of dauntless warriors. The Lord (however) quickly controlled them (by putting a string through their nose) and yoked them playfully as children do with lambs.

14. He won me as a prize for his prowess. He vanquished the kings who way-laid us and brought to Dvārakā me along with my maid-servants and an army of four divisions, (consisting of elephants, chariots, horses and infantry). May I ever be blest with the fortune of serving him.

Mitravindā said:

15. O Draupadī, my father of his own accord invited Kṛṣṇa who is my maternal cousin and as my mind was (attached to and) fixed on him, gave me in marriage to him along with my maids of honour and an aksauhinī of army.

16. May I be blest with the opportunity of serving his feet (lit. touch of his feet) in every birth whenever I may be tossed by my Karman. That (touch of his feet) will confer on me the highest good (Moksha).

Lakṣmana said:

17. O Queen (Draupadī)! By frequently hearing about the miraculous incarnation and deeds of the Lord as glorified by Nārada in songs and duly considering (to myself) that the Lord is chosen as a consort by goddess Lakṣmī discarding (Indra and other) guardians of the spheres,\(^1\) I set my heart on him.

18. O chaste Lady, my father who is well known as Brhatseṇa is very affectionate to his daughter (to me). When he came to know my wish, he contrived a plan to fulfill it.

19. O queen, just as at the time of your svayaṁvara the device of an artificial fish was contrived with the desire of securing Arjuna (for you), in my case, the fish was covered from outside and only its reflection in water was visible.

20. Hearing of this svayaṁvara, thousands of kings experts in the secrets of missiles, archery and of arms and accompanied by their preceptors came from all sides to my father’s capital.

21. They were received with honour by my father with due regard to their seniority in prowess and age. With their hearts set on me, they all took up the bow and the arrow kept in the assembly to hit the target.

22. Some kings who took up the bow were unable to string the bow and left it. Some (who could string the bow) could pull it up to their elbow (but were unable to fix the string on the other end) fell down struck by the bow.

23. Other warriors like the kings of Magadha (Jarāsandha) Cedi (Śīupāla) Ambaśṭha, Bhīma, Duryodhana and Karna were able to fix the string on the bow but could not know the location of the fish.

24. Arjuna became ready. He located the fish from its reflection in the water and discharged the arrow, but it just touched the fish at tangent and did not pierce through it.

25-26. When the proud kings found their pride crushed (thus humiliated), they retired to their seats. Lord Kṛṣṇa took

---

1. There is a pun on the following word:
   Paśma-hastayā— (i) By goddess Lakṣmī (ii) By me with a lotus in hand.

   (2) Kings on the earth.

   The second interpretation is: discarding other kings, I selected him with a lotus in my hand.
up the bow, strung it easily (as in a sport), fixed an arrow on it. Looking at the reflection of the fish in water (with that arrow) he felled it on the ground. At that time the sun was at the meridian.¹

27. Drums were sounded in the sky while shouts of victory were raised on the earth. Gods were transported with joy and sent forth showers of flowers.

28. With anklets jingling sweetly at my feet (while I moved), dressed in a (specially prepared) rich silk Sāri and a similar costly upper garment decorated with a wreath of flowers in my braid (of hair) and holding forth a brilliant necklace of jewels wrought in gold in my hands, I entered the arena beaming with a bashful smile.

29. Lifting up my face beautiful with thick tresses of curly hair over-hanging and the cheeks illuminated by the brilliance of the ear-rings, I looked round at the (assembled) kings with a gentle smile and side-long glances and with my heart deep in love with the Lord, I (slowly approached him and) softly placed the necklace round his neck.

30. At that time mṛdaṅgas, tabors, conchs, drums and kettle-drums were sounded. Dancers (both male and female) began to dance and songsters began to sing.

31. When I selected Lord Śrī Kṛṣṇa (as my consort) the rival kings being overcome with lust for me, did not tolerate it, O Draupadi.

32. Placing me in the chariot drawn by (jewel-like) excellent four horses, the four-armed Lord, completely accoutered with armour, raised his Sārīga bow and became ready to fight.

33. Dāruka (the charioteer) drove the gold plated Chariot while all the suitor-kings were merely looking on and he set out for Dvārakā with me, just as a lion proceeds (with his prey) through a pack of deer, O queen.

34. Like dogs trying to obstruct a Lion, those Kṣatriya princes, with a view to ambush him on the way, girded up their lions, raised their bows and pursued him.

¹. The sun's position with abhijit is regarded as the auspiciousmost time conducive to achieve success in everything—ŚR.
35. With their arms, thighs and necks lopped off by the flood of arrows discharged from the Śārīga bow, some kings fell in that fight while others withdrawing from the battle fled away from it.

36. Thereupon the Lord of Yadus (Kṛṣṇa) entered the city of Dvārakā (Kuśasthali) which was specially decorated (for that occasion) with arches, banners and streamers which obscured (even) the sun—a city highly appreciated (for its beauty) both in the heaven and on the earth like the sun returning to his (glorious) residence Śrī Kṛṣṇa entered his Palace.

37. My father respectfully received and worshipped his friends, relatives and clansmen presenting them very costly clothes, ornaments, beds, seats and other articles.

38. Though my Lord is Perfect (and needs nothing) out of devotion, my father presented to him maid servants, all kinds of wealth, foot-soldiers, elephants, chariots, horses and very costly weapons.

39. (Abashed at her boastful description of her own marriage and to please her senior co-wives she concludes). All of us must have performed penance renouncing all attachments (in our previous life by virtue of which) we have the real privilege of being maid servants of our Lord who revels in his own blissful self.

The queens (representing 16000 queens) said:

40. Having killed Bhaumāsura along with his army in the battle, when the Lord came to know that Bhaumā had kept in captivity the princesses of the kings vanquished by him during his expedition for the conquest of the earth, he set us free. Though he had all his desires accomplished, he was pleased to marry us who were constantly contemplating his lotus-feet which emancipate people from Saṁsāra.

41-42. O Chaste queen Draupadī! We do not covet imperial sovereignty over the whole earth or kingdom of the celestial world or enjoyment of both the positions here and hereafter or the attainment of supernatural powers nor the exalted position of god Brahmā, Mokṣa (liberation from Saṁsāra) or residence in his eternal abode (known as Sa lokāt) but we love to bear on our heads the glorious dust on the feet of Śrī Kṛṣṇa (the wielder of the Kaumodakī mace)—the dust which is enriched with fragrance of the Saffron paste applied to the breast of goddess Śrī.

43. We earnestly crave for the touch of the feet of the great-souled Lord who tended cows—the touch which the Gopas and Gopīs of Vraja, women of Pulindas (hill-tribes), grass and creepers longed for.

CHAPTER EIGHTYFOUR

Vasudeva’s Sacrifice

Śri Śuka said:

1. Listening to the bonds of intense love (expressed in the speeches) of his queens to Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the Soul of the universe, Kuntī, Gāndhārī, Draupadi, Subhadra and other queens of the royal house along with all the Gopīs so devoted to Kṛṣṇa were greatly surprised and their eyes were filled with tears of joy.

2. While they were thus engaged in conversation, men with men and women with women, there arrived a number of sages with the desire of seeing Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma.

3-5. (They were as follows :) Kṛṣṇa-Dvaipāyana (Vyāsa), the divine sage Nārada, Cyavana, Devala, Asita, Viśvāmitra, Śatānanda, Bhāradvāja, Gautama, Paraśurāma along with his disciples, the worshipful Vasiṣṭha, Gālava, Bhṛgu, Pulastya, Kaśyapa, Atri, Mārkaṇḍeya, Brhaspati, Dvita, Trita, Ekata, sons of god Brahmā (such as Sanaka, Sanandana and others) Aṅgiras, Agastya, Yājñavalkya and others.²

1. In the colophon the title of this chapter is Description of Pilgrimage.

2. Under ‘others’ VT. includes Parāśara, Maitreyā, Vaiśampāyana, etc. Historically these were not contemporaries but the epic-writer credits them with inordinately long life or persons belonging to these gotras are implied. Biographical sketches of these have been given in the footnotes of the previous volumes of this work.
6. Beholding those sages who were universally respected, all the kings and others present there as well as Pāṇḍavas, Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma immediately rose from their seats to show respect and bowed to them.

7. Śrī Kṛṣṇa along with Balarāma and all others (present there) respectfully honoured the sages with sweet words of welcome, offering them seats, water to wash their hands and feet, flowers, incense, sandal paste, etc.

8. When they were comfortably seated, the glorious Lord, whose (human) form (incarnated in this world) was for the protection of Dharma (Religious order or path of righteousness) addressed them, while the great assembly was silently listening to him.

_The glorious Lord (Śrī Kṛṣṇa) said:_

9. How blessed are we! Today we have attained completely the fruit (the highest objective) of having taken birth (in this world), as we have been blessed with a visit by masters of Yoga, the sight of whom is very difficult to obtain even for gods.

10. How can men whose (even concept of) penance is poor (limited to pilgrimage to sacred places, etc.) and who look upon the (stone or metal) images as God get the rare privilege of enjoying your sight, touching your feet, conversing with you, paying personal obeisance to you, worshipping your feet, etc.?

11. Waters in sacred places consisting of sheets of water are not the real holy waters; the images made of clay and stones are not the real gods. It is after a long course of time that they purify people. But saints like you purify instantly by their very sight.

12. If the deities presiding over the fire, sun, stars, planets, earth, water, heavens, air, speech and mind are worshipped and propitiated they cannot wipe out the sin (i.e. ignorance in spiritual matters which is the root cause of sins) but promote the notion of diversity and difference. But the service rendered to persons of spiritual wisdom, even for a short time (a muhūrtā) eradicates it completely.
13. He is really a donkey, carrying a fodder for the cattle who looks upon this stinking dead body constituted of three humours (bile, phlegm and ‘air’) as the soul, regards wise and other relatives related to such a body as his own, believes a material image (of clay, stones, etc.) as an object of worship, and thinks that waters (absolve from sins and hence) are purificatory, but does not entertain such notions (of being saviours from sins) towards the spiritually wise.

Śrī Śuka said:

14. Hearing this speech of the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa of unfailing infinite intelligence, which was very difficult to comprehend, the Brāhmaṇas got confounded and remained silent.

15. Pondering over for a long time, they realized that though he is the Supreme Controller of the universe, it is for teaching the world by his own example, that he behaved like an ordinary person (under God’s control). And beaming with a smile, they addressed him.

The sages said:

16. We, the best ones among the knowers of Truth and the chief among the progenitors of the world, are deluded by your Māyā, (Though you are the Lord of the Universe) you keep your universal rulership concealed by your apparent human acts, showing to be controlled by God’s authority. How wonderful is the behaviour of the Lord.

17. Though he is one and no activity can be attributed to him (or whose activities are not determined or ordained by his Karmas), he appears in many names and forms just as the earth though one has many names and forms (e.g. a pot, a pitcher and others) through her own products and (though

---

1. go-kharah: VG. quotes Brhaspati Sanhitā which states: Persons, even though paid respects by kings, should be regarded as ‘donkeys among brutes’ (gokharah) if they do not know the religion (dharma) of the glorious Lord and the secrets of mantras.

one) by himself he creates, protects and eats up (i.e., withdraws within himself) the universe but is not bound by any of these acts. O! How mysterious is the working of (you) the Perfect One, whose (birth and other) acts are merely an (outward) imitation of human beings (The real you are different).

18. Even though Your Lordship is the Supreme Person (transcendental to Prakṛti and Puruṣa,) from time to time, you assume the pure sāttvika form for the protection of your devotees, and for the chastisement and control of the wicked, and by your example, you maintain the path of the Vedas—and you are the embodiment of different castes (varṇas) and stages in life (āśramas).

19. The Veda constitutes your extremely pure heart. Through study, penance, self-control, you—the Brahman are realised there in both your manifest and unmanifest forms and your transcendental form is beyond the ken of these two.

20. O Lord Kṛṣṇa who are the Brahman yourself! As you are known through Śāstras (and Brāhmaṇas are the repository of these Śāstras) it is the Brāhmaṇas who form the best shrine as a means of realizing you. Hence, you are the most prominent amongst those who patronize the Brāhmaṇas and respect them.

21. Today in meeting you who are the shelter of all saintly persons, we have achieved the real benefit of our very existence, learning, penance and ability to see, as you are the highest consummation of all blessings.

22. Salutation to you, O glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa of boundless wisdom and intelligence. You are the Supreme Soul who have shrouded your glory by your yogamāyā (yogic deluding potency).

23. These kings in the assembly and your clansmen (Vṛṣṇis) who share life and enjoyment together with you do not know that you are the Almighty God, the Time-spirit and the Supreme Soul concealed under the veil of your Māyā.

24-25. Just as a person who is asleep does not (during that stage) remember his body in his wakeful stage and looks upon all objects (he sees in the dream) as real and supposes his self in the dream which is perceptible to the mind and exists in name only, to be real, similarly, (even while awake), a person loses his power of discrimination as his sense-activities are directed towards objects which exist in name only (and are not real) by your Māyā and his mind being deluded and bewildered, he does not realize you.

26. To-day we had the good fortune of seeking the feet of you (who are of the above description)—your feet which are the source of the sacred river Gaṅgā which absorbs people of heaps of sins; which are enthroned in the heart by yogins whose yogic practices have been ripened and perfect. Those who have been able to wipe out evil proclivities or ego by means of overflowing tide of devotion have attained the highest stage of realizing you (or have secured resort in you). Hence, O Lord, be pleased to be gracious unto us your devotees."

Śrī Śuka said:

27. Having thus (prayed and) taken leave of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the descendant of Dāśārha, Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Yudhiṣṭhira, the sages made up their minds to return to their respective hermitages, O royal sage.

28. Seeing that the sages were departing, the far-famed Vasudeva approached them, bowed them, clasped their feet and with great self-restraint, he requested them as follows:

Vasudeva said:

29. Salutation to you, O sages, in whom all deities abide.\(^1\) It behoves you to listen to my request. Be pleased to advise me by adopting which course of karma, one can clear one's self of all karmas.

Nārada said:

30. It is not strange or wonderful that Vasudeva, regarding Śrī Kṛṣṇa as a child, is desirous of being enlightened in spiritual knowledge and is asking us about the way of attaining to his spiritual good.

\(^1\) ŚR. quotes the following Vedic text in support of this supposition:
Yāvatār vai devatās tāḥ sarvā veda-vidi Brāhmaṇo vasmi
31. In this world, over-familiarity in the case of mortals, breeds negligence or lack of reverence. Persons who live on the bank of the Gaṅgā discard the water of that very river and go to another place of sacred waters.

32. Kṛṣṇa's spiritual knowledge is not diminished by the force of Time which causes the creation and dissolution of the universe, nor by itself or by any external cause or action of guṇas.

33. His wisdom is unaffected by any affliction or hindrances (kleśa) or the effect of karmas or flow of guṇas. He is the Almighty Lord, one without a second. But ordinary people regard him just like themselves as he has shrouded himself under his own potencies, vital airs, etc., just as the sun is concealed by clouds, mists and eclipse, etc.

34. Then, O king, the sages, addressed Vasudeva (Ānakaundubhi) as follows while all including Acyuta and Balarāma, were hearing them.

35. “The cause of wiping out of karmas through performance of karmas has been seen (and declared) well by the good. One should devoutly propitiate and worship Viṣṇu, the Lord of sacrifices by performing sacrifice.

36. This course has been shown as the way to serenity of mind, an easy type of Yoga and dharma that brings delight to the soul, by wise sages who perceive with the eye of sāstras.

37. It has been regarded as the most auspicious course for householders of the twice-born castes, that they should devoutly worship the Supreme Person by sacrifices performed with pure self-earned wealth with fair means.

38. One should give up covetousness for wealth by spending it in the performance of sacrifices, and in gifts, the desire for wife and children by enjoying conjugal happiness in married life, the aspiration for celestial world and the pleasures

1. Patañjali enumerates the following kleśas: Nescience (avidya), feeling-of-personality or ego (asmitā), attachment (rāga), aversion (dveṣa) and will-to-live or fear of death (abhīśā).

2. VJ. Vasudeva being an ordinary person regards the Almighty Lord Kṛṣṇa just a common person like himself, as Kṛṣṇa has shrouded himself under his own potencies, etc.
thereof by considering that they are subject to damaging effects of Time, leaving all these (three) desires at home in one's village, the wise have proceeded to the forest for performance of penance, O Vasudeva.

39. O Lord Vasudeva, a twice-born person is born with three debts which one owes to gods, sages and manes. If one were to renounce the household life without repaying these debts by performance of sacrifice, Vedic studies and begetting sons, he is sure to fall.

40. You are now free from two debts, O highly intelligent Vasudeva, the obligations to sages and to the manes (pitrás): Now discharging the debt to gods through performance of sacrifices, absolve yourself of all obligations and be a house-less recluse.

41. O Vasudeva, you have with the most intense devotion worshipped Hari, the Lord of the universe. He has become your son."

Śri Śuka said:

42. Hearing the words of the sages, the noble-minded Vasudeva bowed those sages with his head and beseeched them for their favour and requested them to officiate as priests for his sacrifice.

43. Those sages who were appointed with proper religious formalities, assisted the righteous-minded Vasudeva to perform a number of sacrifices in the best possible manner (or on the largest scale) in that holy place, O King Parikṣit.

44-45. When Vasudeva was being initiated for the sacrifice, O King, members of the Vṛṣṇi clan and other kings took their bath, dressed themselves in excellent clothes, wore wreaths of lotuses and adorned themselves with ornaments. Vasudeva's queens also who had besmeared their persons with (fragrant) pigments, put on gold necklaces and clad in their best apparel, came to the sacrificial hall with offerings in their hands.

46. Musical instruments like Mrdangaś, tabors, conchs, drums and kettle drums were sounded. Actors (male) and female dancers danced. Sūtas and Māgadhas sang the panegyrics. Sweet-voiced Gandharva ladies along with husbands presented vocal music.
47. Collyrium was applied to Vasudeva’s eyes. His body was besmeared with butter. The sacrificial priests, with due formalities consecrated with sprinkling water Vasudeva along-with his eighteen queens, as the moon god was formerly consecrated in the company of his (twentyseven) consorts, in ancient times.

48. The consecrated Vasudeva who was clad in deerskin, appeared extremely splendid with his queens, all of whom were clad in silken garments and were excellently adorned with gold bangles, pearl necklaces, anklets and ear-rings.

49. Wearing silk garments and jewels, the priest, who officiated at Vasudeva’s sacrifice along with the members of the sacrificial assembly, appeared splendid like the corresponding priests in Indra’s sacrifice, O great king.

50. At that time, Balarāma and Śrī Kṛṣṇa (the former representing the jīva and the latter the Almighty Lord) the rulers of living beings, accompanied with their brothers, sons and consorts shone forth with all their supreme glorious powers (vīhūtis).

51. In every sacrifice, by performing with due rites and formalities, the Prākṛta and Vaikṛta categories of sacrifices characterised by Agnihotra, he worshipped Lord Viṣṇu who is the controller and master of the materials for the sacrifice, the knowledge of Mantras employed and the formal act of performing the sacrifice.

52. Then at the appropriate time as prescribed in the Śāstras, Vasudeva gave to his sacrificial priests who were already adorned with ornaments, very richly adorned cows, girls and land as the sacrificial fee.

53. Having made the sacrificer’s wife to perform the Samyāja part of the sacrifice and after the rites of avabhṛtha ablation, the great sages who officiated at the sacrifice followed the Yajamāna (the performer of sacrifice) to the pools (created

1. ŚR.: Prākṛta Jyotisāma, Darśa, Pūrṇamāsa, Vaikṛta: saura sattra and others going under the name Agnihotra.

2. The v.l. mahādhanaḥ means ‘the extremely affluent Vasudeva’. VT. takes ‘Mahādhanaḥ’ as qualifying Dakṣīṇaḥ and interprets, ‘sacrificial fees consisting of costly jewels, gold, money, etc.’
by and known after the name) of Paraśurāma and performed the concluding bath.

54. After taking his bath, Vasudeva richly adorned himself with ornaments and distributed clothes and ornaments to bards and his queens also gave gifts. He then entertained with food, people of all castes and communities and animals down to dogs to their complete satisfaction.

55-56. With rich liberal presents, Vasudeva honoured his relatives, their wives, and children—the princes and people of Vīdarbha, Kosala, Kuru, Kāśi, Kekaya and Sṛnjayas; and also the members of the sacrificial assembly and the priests; various categories of gods, men, bhūtas, pitṛs (manes) and Cāraṇas. All of them took leave of Kṛṣṇa, the abode of the goddess Śrī and praising him and the sacrifice, returned to (their respective) home.

57-58. Dhṛtarāṣṭra and his younger brother Vidura, the sons of Pṛthā, Bhiṣma, Droṇa, Kuntī and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), Nārada, the glorious sage Vyāsa, friends, relatives and kinsmen with their hearts softened with friendly feelings, embraced their relatives of the Yadu clan and with heart heavy with the pangs of separation, left for their own states along with other people.

59. Highly honoured with extensive rich presents by Kṛṣṇa, Balarāma, Ugrasena and others, Nanda who was very affectionate to them, stayed on along with the Gopas (for some time more).

60. Having thus crossed the ocean of his desire (of performing sacrifices) with such an ease, Vasudeva was greatly delighted at heart. Surrounded by his friends and well-wishers, he took Nanda by the hand and said:

Vasudeva said:

61. O brother Nanda! A bond called friendly affection has been forged by the Almighty Lord. I think it is very difficult even for valiant warriors and yogins to snap it asunder.

62. For, the great friendliness extended by the virtuous-most persons like you to ungrateful persons like us is unsurpassed and too valuable to be repaid. Though your friendliness bears no reciprocal return, it will never be withdrawn from us.
63. We, being ourself helpless and simply "incapable of doing it, did not do any good turn to you. And now our eyes being blinded by the intoxication of affluence, we do not see you even when you are before us, O brother.

64. O respectable brother, royal fortune should not come to the lot of a person who aspires after the final beatitude, for his eyesight gets blinded by it and he does not recognize his people or relatives."

Śrī Śuka said:

65. In this way, the heart of Vasudeva was softened with the feelings of friendliness. Remembering the warm friendship borne by Nanda to him, tears welled-up in his eyes and he wept (with tears gushing down his cheeks).

66. With a view to giving the pleasure of his company to Vasudeva and out of deep affection from Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, he postponed his departure from day to day and stayed on there for three months more, respectfully treated all the while by the Yadus.

67. During his stay, Nanda together with relatives (Gopas) and the inhabitants of Vraja (who accompanied him there) were catered to their heart’s content, whatever they desired and wanted, by offering them valuable ornaments, silk cloths and other costly presents.

68. Taking with him all the valuable gifts presented to him by Vasudeva, Ugrasena, Śrī Kṛṣṇa. Uddhava, Balarāma and others, he took leave of the Yādavas and returned home (with a big Yādava army to guard him during his return journey).

69*. Nanda, Gopas and Gopīs whose hearts were attached

* Vṛṣ’s Text adds:

69.1. Droṇa, Bhīṣma, Karna, Bāhlika, Vidura and others and Dhṛta-rāṣṭra, along with his sons returned to their respective homes severally.

69.2. All other kings who had come there on a holy pilgrimage (stayed there for three months at the end of which) they returned to their respective kingdoms.

69.3. And the noble-souled Pāṇḍavas and Kuntī, speaking in faltering accents (as their voice was choked with tears) accompanied with all their relatives, returned to Indraprastha, taking leave of Kṛṣṇa.
and fixed on the lotus-feet of Śrī Kṛṣṇa found themselves unable to retract them from there and returned to Mathurā.

70. When all the relatives departed (to their respective places), Vṛṣṇis who looked upon Kṛṣṇa as their Deity, noticed the approach of the monsoons and returned to Dvārakā.

71. On their return, they narrated to the people (who could not come to that pilgrimage) the great festival of the sacrifice performed by Vasudeva, the leader of Yadus and their meeting of friends and other incidents during the course of that pilgrimage.

CHAPTER EIGHTYFIVE

Restoration of his Elder Brothers by Kṛṣṇa

From the Realm of Death

The Son of Bādarāyaṇa (Śrī Śuka) said:

1. On one occasion, (after their return from the sacrifice at Kurukṣetra), Balarāma and Śrī Kṛṣṇa went (as usual) (to pay respects to their parents), and bowed down to Vasudeva. Vasudeva affectionately received them when they saluted his feet, and spoke to his sons as follows:—

2. Having heard the speech of the sages indicating the glorious powers of their sons and feeling a sense of confidence by their exploits, he affectionately addressed them and said.

3. O Kṛṣṇa! Kṛṣṇa! O great Yogin! O eternal Saṅkarṣaṇa! I (now) realize that both of you are the Supreme Persons (ruling over) Prakṛti and Puruṣa, the direct causes of the universe.

4. You are the place (Substratum), the agent and the instrument of the universe. You are its source and its object or purpose; whenever or whatever form it assumes is yourself. As and when this universe evolves, all the causes thereof including time and manner are the Almighty Lord yourself who control both the Prakṛti (to be enjoyed) and Puruṣa (the enjoyer) and transcend them both.
5. O Supra-sensuous Lord! Having created this universe of a diversified nature out of yourself, you enter it as its soul, the Indwelling Controller, and you, the eternal (unborn) Lord, become the active force (Prāṇa) and the cognitive force (Jīva) and maintain it.

6.* The powers with which Prāṇa and Sūtra are endowed and other forces which go to create the universe, are really the potencies of the Supreme Self, for these powers depend (for their existence on you and there is a great dissimilarity between the nature of) Prāṇa and the Supreme Soul, (the former is physical or material while the latter is spiritual). The activity of Prāṇa and others is only apparent (the real motive force is you, just as the velocity of an arrow is not in the arrow itself but in the physical force of the man who discharged it.

7. The lovely light of the moon, the heat and glare of the fire, the brilliant splendour of the sun, the twinkling of stars and the streaks of lightning, the stability of mountains, fragrance which characterises the earth—all these special characteristics are as a matter of fact yourself only.¹

8. The qualities of water, viz. satisfying the thirst, the life-giving effect, are yourself, O God. The waters themselves and their essential characteristics, viz. liquidity and taste are yourself. The energy of senses, the mental power (firm will-power), bodily strength, the activity of the body, the activities and the force of the wind are your qualities (though they are attributed to the wind element).

9. You are the space that is delimited by cardinal points; You are the quarters themselves and the ether with its characteristic the Subtle sound (sphoṭa) which is the para form of speech. You are the sound Om, the Paśyanti form of speech. You are (the Madhyamā form of speech) and the articulate speech) (Vaikhari) which separates letter sounds and words which denote different objects.

6* The verses following these are the echoes of Vibhūti Yoga. BG. Ch.X.
1. na tatra sūryo bhātī, na candra-tārakam, etc. tamaṃ bhāntam anubbhātī sarvam, tasya bhāstā sarvam idam vibhātī ।—Katha Up. 5.15 Śveta. Up. 8.14.
Mundaka 2.2.10 Śvetāvatara
Also Tadādiyagatam tejo, etc. in BG.15.12.
10. You are the real sense organ, the power revealing its special objects; You are also the presiding deities of the senses and their potency. You are the cognitive and retentive faculty of the Intellect. You are the co-ordinating power of different experiences inherent in jīva.

11. You are the Tāmasa aspect of Ego (Ahamkāra) which is the root cause of the gross elements; the Rājasa type (Taijasa) of Ego, as the cause of the sense-organs; the Sāttvika kind of Ego (Vaikārika) which creates the deities presiding over the senses and the mind (and the Pradhāna or Māyā which makes jīvas wander in the Samsāra1 (or: You are the Chief Prakṛti, the cause of Mahat and other principles and which involves the jīvas in Samsāra.)

12. Just as the material substance (e.g. gold) is the constant factor all through its various modifications (e.g. various ornaments like bangles, armlets, etc.), you are the constant factor abiding in all these perishable objects and are not subject to modification or decay.

13. The attributes of Prakṛti viz. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas and their products (such as Mahat and other principles) have been superimposed on you, the veritable Brahman, by your Yoga Māyā (but you are untouched by them)2.

14. These created things, therefore, do not really exist, when they are not seen as projected on you (at the time of Pralaya) by Yoga Māyā; they are non-existent. (i.e. their very existence depends on you as the substratum on which they are superimposed). You abide in them (when you create and sustain the universe). Otherwise you remain unconnected with these modifications and abide in your absolute (blissful) state.

15. Those who are ignorant of the subtle course of yours who are the soul of all, and are present in this universe or Samsāra, which is a constant flow of guṇas, (wrongly identify themselves with their bodies through their ignorance) and there-

1. VR: You constitute the Karma which makes jīva experience the fruit of the balance of his Karmas.
2. Māyā tatam idam sarvam jagad avyakta-Mūrtinā | matsthāni sarva-bhutāni na cāham teṣavasthitāḥ //

BG 9.4
by) get enmeshed by their Karmas, and continue to whirl in the Samsāra, as a consequence of those Karmas.

16. (I sincerely regret that) after having attained by a lucky chance, birth here (in Bhārata Varṣa) as a man endowed with vigorous sense-organs—which is really very difficult to obtain, I remained negligent about the main object of human life (viz. Pursuit of Mokṣa) through the influence of your Māyā and have wasted my life, O Lord.

17. Your Lordship binds down the whole of the world with bonds of affection to the body as being my own self and relations and belongings of the body (such as sons, etc.) as they are absolutely mine.

18. I realize that both of you are not our sons but directly the controllers of Prakṛti and Puruşa (The Primordial Matter and individual souls). As you have stated (at the time of your incarnation in our prison-cell), both of you have taken this descent (in human form) for the annihilation of the Kṣattriya Kings who have become a burden to the earth.

19. O friend of the afflicted! I have, therefore, now sought asylum with your lotus-feet which dispel the fear of Samsāra of those who resort to them (your feet). Absolutely enough of this craving for objects of sense-enjoyment under the influence of which I looked upon this mortal body as my soul and you who are the supreme person, as my child.

20. Indeed, you did tell both of us in the lying-in-chamber, that you are, as a matter of fact unborn (not actually born) but for the protection of the order of righteousness (ordained by you), you reveal yourself as “born” from us (formerly as Sutapas and Prśni, Kāśyapa and Diti, now Vasudeva and Devakī) in every Yuga. You assume various forms like the sky and discard them (though you are one), O Lord whose glory is widely sung (in Śrutis). Who can comprehend the wonderful Māyā (Potency) of yours, O Omnipresent Lord?

Śri Śuka said:

21. Hearing such a speech from his father, the glorious Lord, the leader of Sātvatas (Śri Kṛṣṇa) smiled. Saluting his father with all humility, he replied in sweet words.
The Lord said:

22. Your speech is pregnant with philosophical significance, O father, and we accept it; as thereby you have expounded to us, your sons, the whole body of Philosophic principles.

23. I, you, this elder brother Balarāma, all these inhabitants of Dvārakā and all the mobile and immobile creation should be regarded as such (Brahman), O the greatest of Yadus.

24. The (Supreme) Soul is really one, self-illuminating, eternal, different and distinct from the body, devoid of any attributes; it is however due to his alliance with guṇas created by him and in bodies of various creatures produced out of those guṇas, that he appears diversified (as a man, a god, etc.), visible, momentary, identical with the body and possessed of attributes.

25. Just as the elements, sky, air, fire, water and earth become diversified (as small and great, manifest, and unmanifest, etc.) according to their products, so does the soul, though one, assume different forms and becomes many, manifest or unmanifest, small or great.

Śrī Śuka said:

26. In this way, O king Parīkṣit, Vasudeva who was thus enlightened by Kṛṣṇa became divested of the notion of diversity, remained silent and delighted at heart.

27. Devakī, the embodiment of all deities was there at this time (of conversation). She was wonderstruck, O prominentmost Kuru, to hear that her sons had brought back to life, the son of their preceptor.

28. Addressing Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, Devaki, who remembered her sons killed by Karna, piteously appealed to them, with tears of grief flowing down from her eyes.

Devaki said:

29. O Balarāma, Delighter of hearts and of immeasurable prowess! O Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the masters of Yoga! I recognize you both as the Lords of the progenitors of the universe and the First persons in the universe.

30. It is (traditionally) reported that both of you have been born of me for the extermination of Kings whose virtue (or Sātvika nature) is lost through the influence of the Time-spirit and who transgress the injunctions (you laid down for their behaviour) in the scriptures (Śāstras) and have proved to be a burden to the earth.

31. O Soul of the Universe (Śrī Kṛṣṇa)! I resort to you for shelter to-day—you who bring about the creation, sustenance and dissolution of the Universe by your minutest part, viz. the particles of the guṇas (Sattva, Rajas and Tamas) which are evolved out of a part of Māyā which in its own way is an evolute of a part of Puruṣa who is but a part manifestation of you.

32. Both of you, being urged by Time and desired by your preceptor Śāndiplani to bring back to life his son who died long ago, you brought back his son from the region of Pīḷṭs (manes) i.e. the abode of death, and presented him to your preceptor as a homage (and thus paid the debt of your preceptorship)

33. You should similarly fulfil my desire as both of you are the Lords of the masters of Yoga. I desire to see, brought to life, my sons who have been killed by Kāṃsa, the King of Bhojas.

The sage Śuka said:

34. Directed thus by their mother, O Parikṣit, Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa resorted to their Yoganāyā (Super-human Yogic potency) and entered the nether world called Sutaṭala.

35. Beholding both of them enter Sutala, King Bali recognised them to be the Deity, the Soul of the Universe and especially his own God (Lord Viṣṇu). His heart was overflowing with joy at their appearance. Instantaneously, he rose up from his seat and along with the members of his family, he prostrated himself before them.

36. He brought for those great-souled personages excellent seats. When they gladly occupied them, he washed their feet and sprinkled over his head as well as those of the members of the family present, that water which (as they say traditionally) purifies the world right from its creator, god Brahmā.

37. He worshipped them by offering extremely valuable cloths, ornaments, fragrant ointments, betel leaves, chauries (waving around their faces) lamps, catering nectar-like sweet dishes and by submitting to their services his own self, his race and his wealth.

38. It is traditionally reported that Bali whose army equalled to that of Indra, the King of gods had his heart so much soaked with love for his God that he bore the Lord’s feet on his head again and again. His eyes were bedimmed with tears of joy and his hair, standing on their ends. His voice being choked with emotions, he prayed in faltering accents.

_Bali Prayed:

39. Salutations to you the Infinite (Lord Śeṣa) who are so vast (as to bear the universe on your hood). I bow to you Lord Kṛṣṇa, the embodiment of eternal bliss, the creator of the world, the expounder of the Śāṅkhya and Yoga darśanas (or the Paths of knowledge and Bhakti), the Supreme Soul, nay the very Brahman himself.

40. Even your sight is very difficult to obtain to all beings (even to the masters of yoga). It is through your Grace that (to some) it is not so very difficult, (just as now) you of your own accord have luckily blessed us with your visit even though we are dominated by rajas and tamas by nature.

41-42. We, Daityas, Dānavas, Gandharvas, Siddhas, Vidyādharas, Cāraṇas Yakṣas Ogres (Rākṣasas), goblins (Piśācas), the leaders of evil spirits like bhūtas and Pramathas and others of our ilk, bear continuous hostility to you who are the receptacle of pure Sattva (unsullied by Rajas and Tamas) and the very embodiment of scriptures (Śāstras).

42-A _VR’s Text adds:

That some people have attained to the different types of Liberation (from Samhāra known as Sālokya (residence in the Deity’s abode), Sāmityya (vicinity to the Deity), Sārūpya similarity in form to the Deity) and Sātmāta (Coalescence with the Deity) is due to the disposition of their mind, O Lotus-eyed Lord.

43. Just as by virtue of unflinching devotion to you or by inveterate enmity to you (as in regard to Śiśupāla) or by deep passion of Love for you (as in the case of Gopīṣ), persons have attained so much close union with you as could not be achieved by gods who possess Sāttvika nature.

44. O Lord of the masters of Yoga! Even Masters of Yoga cannot comprehend the nature and the extent or the inscrutable functions of your Yoga-Māyā. What to speak of Daityas like us?

45. Therefore, pray be propitious unto us—Graciously help me to get out of the dark well of house-holder’s life which is different from the Shelter of your lotus-feet which are sought after by persons who are free from desires. Subsisting on whatever (fruit, etc. dropped automatically from the trees) I get at the foot of trees which afford shelter to all, I shall move about alone with a serene mind or (if association with others is necessary) in the company of pious people who are friendly to all.

46. O Ruler of all jivas! Be pleased to impart your command to us and absolve us of all our sins. O Lord! For a person who abides by your command faithfully is not subject to the injunctions and interdictions of the scriptures.

The glorious Lord said:

47. “In the first Manvantara, sage Marīci had six sons by his wife Uṛṇā. They were the gods (in that Aeon). They laughed at god Brahmā when they saw that he was ready to cohabit with his daughter.

48. On account of that ‘misdemeanour’ (as god Brahmā interpreted their laughter and cursed them), they were born in the race of Asuras as the sons of Hiranyakaśipu and were taken away by Yogamāyā.

49. They were born as sons to Devakī and were (immediately) murdered by Kaṁsa. Even now mother Devakī is lamenting for those children and they are now here with you.

50. For soothing the grief of our mother, we shall take them from this place to her. There they will be liberated from the curse (of Brahmā) and thus freed from the fever of affliction they will return to their celestial region.

51. Smāra, Udgītha, Parisvaṅga, Pataṅga, Kṣudrabhṛt and Gṛṛin—in all these six (sons of Marīci) shall attain to their happy state again through my grace.”
52. Having explained his mission to Bali, he took charge of those sons. Worshipped by Bali, both of them returned to Dvārakā and presented her (dead but now restored) children to the mother.

53. Seeking her children (so brought back to her), Devakī had her breasts filled with milk. Hugging them and placing them on her lap, she smelt their crowns repeatedly.

54. Overwhelmed with motherly affection at the touch of her children, and being over-joyed, she suckled them: she was too much deluded by Viṣṇu’s Māyā by which the whole cycle of creation continues.

55. Having sucked the nectar of her milk which was left over there after Lord Kṛṣṇa’s sucking, and due to the contact of the person of Lord Nārāyaṇa, they regained their self-knowledge.

56. Bowing to Kṛṣṇa, Devakī, their father Vasudeva and Balarāma, they ascended through the ethereal region to their places while all beings were witnessing it.

57. The divine Devakī was so much flabbergasted to see the arrival and departure of her dead children that she thought it to be the illusion created by Kṛṣṇa, O king.

58. O king Parīkṣit! Innumerable are these and such other miraculous exploits of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme soul of Infinite powers, O descendant of Bharata.

Sūta said:

59. He who devoutly and constantly listens to and recites to others this account of Lord Kṛṣṇa of eternal fame and glory—the account extolled by the venerable son of the sage Vyāsa which absolves the world of all sins, and which fills the ears of Lord’s devotees with delight or is like ornaments to the ears of Lord’s votaries, gets his mind concentrated in the Lord and attains to his region of eternal bliss.
CHAPTER EIGHTYSIX

Elopement of Subhadrā : The Lord’s Grace on Śrutadeva

The King (Parikṣit) said :

1. O Brāhmaṇa sage! We would like to know how (my grand-father, the ever victorious) Arjuna married the sister of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, as she was my grand-mother.

Śrī Śuka narrated :

2. While the mighty Arjuna was travelling over the earth for pilgrimage to sacred places, he arrived at Prabhāsa where he happened to hear about his maternal uncle’s daughter (Subhadrā).

3. He further heard (the report) that Balarāma would like to give her in marriage to Duryodhana, while others opposed it. As he was desirous of securing her (as his wife), he disguised himself as a recluse bearing a triple staff.\(^1\) and went to Dvārakā.

4. With a view to accomplishing his object, he stayed the months of the rainy season, at that place. He was now and then worshipped by the citizens as also by Balarāma who did not recognise him (and was unaware that he was Arjuna).

5. It is reported that one day, he was invited as a guest and brought to the palace by Balarāma, where he partook of sweet dishes served to him with devotion.

6. He espied there that youthful girl who captivated the hearts of warriors. With his eyes blooming with love, he set his heart agitated by passions, on her.

7. As soon as she saw him who was fascinating to the hearts of women, she also fell in love with him. She fixed her heart and gazed on him with smiles and bashful glances.

---

\(^1\) The three staffs indicate his control of mind, speech, and action. The word danda stands for restraint. The Smṛtis of Manu 12.10 and Dakṣa 7.30 declare that a man is called tri-danda who has restraint over speech, mind and body.
8. Brooding over her constantly, he was eager to get an opportunity to elope with her. As his mind was distracted with over-powering passion for her, he could get no peace of mind.

9. With the consent of her parents and Śrī Kṛṣṇa, that great warrior carried her away as she came out of the fort in a chariot to visit a shrine on the occasion of a great festival of gods.

10. Immediately after getting into the Chariot of Subhadrā, he took up his bow, routed all the soldiers who tried to obstruct him. Like a lion taking away his share, he carried her even as her Yādava relatives were screaming.

11. Hearing the report (of Subhadrā’s elopement with Arjuna), Balarāma got enraged like an ocean on a full moon day. But he gradually calmed down when Kṛṣṇa and other well-wishers clasped his feet (and tried to pacify him).

12. Balarāma was pleased to send to the bride and bride-groom presents and marriage-gifts consisting of a big amount of money, articles of furniture, elephants, chariots, male and female servants.

12A VR’s Text adds:

Yādavas and Pāṇḍavas who were already relatives became very much delighted with mutual affection. Now listen to another anecdote of Kṛṣṇa’s affection for two of his devotees.

Śrī Śuka resumed:

13. There was a great Brāhmaṇa, known by the name Śrutadeva. He felt to have accomplished all the goals in life by his unflinching single-minded devotion to Kṛṣṇa. He was serene, full of spiritual wisdom and un-attached to objects of pleasure.

14. He lived in the country of Videha, at Mithilā (its capital modern Janakpur). Though he was a householder, he carried out all his duties and responsibilities within whatever came to him without any effort.

15. Luckily, through the grace of God, he used to get just what was absolutely necessary for his bare maintenance and nothing more. He was, however, quite contented with it and performed all his duties in the proper manner,

16. The protector (King) of that State, Bahulāśva by name, a descendant of Janaka was also free from egotism, dear Parīkṣit. Both Śrūtadeva and Bahulāśva were beloved of Lord Kṛṣṇa.

17-18 Being pleased with both of them, the glorious Lord had his chariot brought by Dāruka. The almighty Lord rode the chariot and set out for the country of Videha (modern Tirhut or North Bihar) in the company of sages like Nārada, Vāmadeva, Atri, Kṛṣṇa (Kṛṣṇa-Dvaipāyana Vyāsa), Paraśurāma, Asita, Āruṇi, I myself (Śuka), Bṛhaspati, Kaṇva, Maitreya, Cyavana and others.

19. At every stage in that journey, citizens and villagers received him on his arrival, with articles of worship and offerings in their hands, O king, just as they would do unto the Sun rising in conjunction with planets.

20. Men and women from the countries of Ānarta, Dhanva, Kuru, Jāṅgala, Kaṅka, Matsya, Pāṇcāla, Kunti, Madhu, Kekaya, Kosal and Arṇa as well as others drank with their eyes his lotus-face illumined with noble smile and affectionate looks.

21. (As he proceeded), Kṛṣṇa, the Preceptor of the three worlds, conferred insight into and knowledge of the Truth and the state of fearlessness (i.e. Liberation from Samsāra) on people, the blinding darkness of whose vision had been completely dispelled by his gracious glances. Hearing on the way his own glory celebrated in songs by gods and men—his world—wide spotless (pure) glory which destroys inauspiciousness and sins—He slowly and leisurely journeyed to Videha.

22. Hearing Lord Kṛṣṇa’s arrival (in Videha), villagers and citizens thereof became delighted and they came forward to welcome him with presents and other offerings in their hands.

23. When they saw Lord Kṛṣṇa of hallowing renown, their countenance, and hearts (as if) bloomed with ecstasy. With their palms folded on their heads, they bowed to him. and the accompanying sages of whom they had only heard before.

24. Believing that Kṛṣṇa, the Preceptor of the world had come there to shower his grace on him personally, both the king of Mithilā as well as the Brāhmaṇa Śrutadeva prostrated themselves at the feet of the Lord.

25. With their palms folded to pay obeisance, both the king of Mithilā (Bahulāśva) and Śrutadeva simultaneously invited Kṛṣṇa along with the sages accompanying him, to accept their hospitality.

26. The Lord accepted the invitation of both of them. With the desire of pleasing them both, he (assumed two forms and) entered (severally) the houses of them both, without being perceived by the other.

27-29. When Lord Kṛṣṇa and sages, whose even names never reached the unrighteous ears, visited his house, the high-minded Bahulāśva, the descendant of the family of Janaka brought excellent seats (and offered them). When they were comfortably seated, he paid obeisance to their feet with intense devotion. His heart was transported with joy and eyes were bedimmed with tears of joy. He washed their feet and sprinkled his own head as well as those of the members of his family with that water which purified the world. He then worshipped the Lord and sages whose minds were devoted to God by means of sandal paste, flowers, cloths, ornaments, fragrant incense, lamps and offered them oblations of water, cows and bulls.

30. When they were fed with sumptuous meal to their heart’s content, he joyfully placed on his lap the feet of Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa). Pressing them gently, he spoke in sweet words pleasing them all, as follows:

The King (Bahulāśva) said:

31. “O all-pervading Lord! You are the in-dwelling soul (antaryāmin) of all beings, the witness to everything and self-illuminating. It is hence that you revealed yourselves to us who remembered your lotus-feet.

32. You have often declared that neither your brother Balarāma (the incarnation of Śeṣa), nor your consort goddess
Śrī, nor your son (God Brahmā) is as dear to you as a person who is exclusively devoted to you. It is to vindicate the veracity of your statement that your Lordship has revealed yourself to our view.

33. What person cognisant of the knowledge that you offer your own self to those serene sages who regard nothing (even their bodies) as their own (and contemplate on you) will abandon your Lotus-feet?

34. You have incarnated in the family of Yadus for putting an end to the Sāṁsāra of persons who are whirling in that cycle of birth and death. And you have extended your glory which can completely wash out the sins of the three worlds.

35. I bow to you, O glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa of unlimited wisdom and intellect; you are the divine sage Nārāyaṇa who quietly perform penance (for the happiness of the world).

36. O perfect lord! Be pleased to stay in our house along with the sages for some days and purify this family of King Nimi by the dust of your feet.”

37. Thus entreatingly invited by the king, the Lord, protector of the universe stayed for some days at Mithilā, bestowing happiness and well-being on men and women of Mithilā.

38. Like Janaka (the king of Mithilā), Śrutadeva was overjoyed to find that Kṛṣṇa had arrived and stayed in his house. It is traditionally reported that he was so much transported with joy that he waved his cloth and danced.

39. Bringing mats and seats of Kuśa grass, he seated them comfortably. He warmly greeted them with words of welcome. With great joy, he and his wife washed their feet.

40. With that water, that highly blessed Brāhmaṇa sprinkled himself and all the members of his family and relations. Feeling that he had accomplished all his ambitions in life, he was transported with ecstasy.

41. He propitiated them by worshipping them with whatever articles of worship he could procure, such as fruit and other articles (e.g. sandal-paste, flowers), cool water scented with the plant Andropogon Muricatus (called Vāḷā in Marathi), fragrant earth (musk?), Tulasī leaves, Kuśa grass and lotus flowers and with food conducive to the promotion of Sāttvika qualities.

42. He tried to reason with himself, "O! How wonderful! How did this association of mine who am fallen in the dark well of household life, take place with Lord Kṛṣṇa and the gods on the earth (Brāhmaṇas) who have enshrined Lord Kṛṣṇa in their hearts and the dust on whose feet has the sanctity of holy waters."

43. When the guests were offered warm hospitality and were comfortably seated, Śrutadeva, along with his wife, children and relatives waited upon them and touching the feet of Kṛṣṇa, submitted to him as follows:—

Śrutadeva said:

44-45. "It is not only to-day that the Supreme Person has revealed himself to our vision but (long ago) when, having created the universe with his potencies, he had his presence therein by virtue of his personal power. But he has actually revealed to our vision to-day. Just as a man in the state of sleep mentally creates another dream world, world of his own through the influence of Avidyā on his mind (or by the force of your Māyā) and entering into that dream-world appears as objective reality.

46. You always shine in the hearts of those pure-minded persons who constantly listen to and speak about your glories: who always adore you and pay obeisance to you and converse with each other about you. (But it is my great fortune that you have manifested yourself within the range of my sight).

47. Even though you abide in the hearts of those whose minds are distracted by their Karmas, you are very far away from them and you cannot be comprehended by their mental powers such as Egotism (Ahaṅkāra). But you are quite nearest to those who have developed spiritual qualities by listening to and singing of your glories, contemplating on you, etc.

48*. Salutation to you who reveal yourself as the Supreme Soul (and confer liberation from Saṁsāra) to those who

48* (1) VR: Salutation to you who dispense both bondage and liberation from Saṁsāra. Those who know the Supreme Soul as he is, attain to know the (real nature of the) Soul as different from the body (and thus do not identify their body with their Soul) and who have allotted Samsāra (the cycle of births and deaths) to those who wrongly identify the body with the soul (and are thus separated from you). You control both the principles like Mahat, etc. which are the evolutes of Prakṛti and are thus 'caused' or products and the Prakṛti itself which is uncaused, but to both of these the jīva is subject (and hence he whirls in the Samsāra). By the force of your Māyā potency the vision of others is screened but yours is ever unobstructed.

49. As you are the Almighty Lord, be pleased to command us, your servants, what services we should render to you. Your very revelation to the view of men instantaneously puts an end to all their sufferings."

Śrī Śuka said:

50. They say that when the Lord heard Śrutadeva's appeal (as presented by him), the glorious Lord who annihilates all the agonies of those who bow and thus submit themselves to him humbly, took him by the hand and similingly spoke to Śrutadeva:

him. According to your will you ordain death to those who have not given their mind to you. You assume an incarnation for conferring grace on jīvas and not do so due to the force of Karmas. You are not partial in not bestowing Liberation from Samsāra on those whose vision is clouded by your Māyā and do not realize you properly.

(ii) VJ : It is beyond my capacity to propitiate you except by offering salutation to you who bestow all Purusārthas (desired objectives in human life) on those who comprehend the Paramātman correctly. You are all-pervading. You take up various forms according to your will. You pervade the gross universe which is the product (or evolute of Prakṛti) and also the subtle causeless i.e. eternal Prakṛti. It is due to your infinite Potency that your vision i.e. knowledge is always unobstructed.

(iii) VT : It is due to your grace that we came together and I could see you. For those who realize you, it is your Śrī-Vigraha (original form of God) which removes the fear of death. You control this transient world (which is a product) and your own region which is eternal. By the force of your Māyā the vision of those interested in this world is clouded but not of those who are related to your region.
The Lord said:

51. O Brähmaṇa Śrutadeva! Please note that these sages who move with me purifying the people with the dust on their feet, have come here with the intention of conferring their grace on you.

52. Gods, sacred places and holy waters gradually purify people by their sight, contact and worship after a long period of time. But that is instantaneously accomplished just by the sight of these most exalted souls (the Brähmaṇas—).

53. A Brähmaṇa, by his very birth, is superior to all other beings. What needs be said of a Brähmaṇa who is endowed with penance, learning, contentedness and devotion to me?

54. Even this Personality of mind endowed with four arms is not dearer to me than a Brähmaṇa. A learned Brähmaṇa is the very embodiment of Vedas while I, of gods. A proof (Praṇaṇa) is Superior to what is to be proved (Prameya) as it depends on Pramāṇa. As Vedas are Pramāṇa and gods, the Prameya, the Superiority of the Vedas (and consequently of Brähmaṇas) is automatically obvious.

55. Persons of evil mentality do not understand this truth. Out of jealousy they disregard their preceptor, me, Brähmaṇas who are my ownself and entertain reverential attitudes to idols (and symbols, etc.) as adorable objects.

56. Perceiving me as the All-pervading Ātman everywhere, a Brähmaṇa cherishes the idea that this universe consisting of mobile and immobile creation and the principles such as Mahat and others which constitute the universe, are nothing but my forms.

57. Therefore, O Brähmaṇa Śrutadeva, worship these Brähmana sages with the same devotion and faith as you have in me. If this is done, I am directly worshipped but not by any other means even if it involves considerable expenditure of wealth and show of grandeur.

Śri Śuka said:

58. Thus commanded by the Lord, he worshipped Kṛṣṇa and those excellent Brähmaṇa sages as being the same (as one Ātman) with the same devotion and attained the goal of saints (Mokṣa). Even king Bahulāśva of Mithilā also attained the same state.

59. O king Parīkṣit! The glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa who is devoted to his votaries stayed with his two devotees. Having enlightened them in the true path to Mokṣa as enunciated in the Vedas, he returned to Dvārakā.

CHAPTER EIGHTYSEVEN

Śruti Gitā

(Hyman of Praise by The Vedas)

Parīkṣit requested:¹

1. O Brāhmaṇa sage! How is it possible for the Vedas, conditioned as they are with guṇas² and their products, to carry out their function directly with reference to the Supreme Brahman which is beyond specific indication and hence indefinable, devoid of guṇas and (beyond the range of perceptibility) is transcendental to the causal (cause-effect) relation.

1. Referring to the concluding verse of the last chapter—86.59—Parīkṣit doubted the competence and capability of the Vedas to declare or describe the Supreme Brahman.

2. SR explains: The Śruti texts are expressed in and consist of words. Words are characterised by their ‘powers’ technically known as Mukhyā, Lakṣāṇā and Gaṇatī, or by their power by which it expresses, indicates or suggests the implication either by means of (i) abhidhā (denotation, “the meaning belonging to the word by social consensus or convention (Sanketa) which primarily made the word at all), (ii) Lakṣāṇā (the secondary signification. The standard SK. example is Gaṅgāyām ghoṣah—‘The cowherd colony is in or on the Gangā’. Here in or on means not on the water-current of the river but on the bank of the river (technically called Jahalalakṣāṇā). Or Kuntāḥ Prawiṣantā “spears enter” i.e. ‘persons bearing the spears enter’. Something additional to the thing mentioned viz. spear-bearers is implied. This is called a-Jahal-Lakṣāṇā. The 3rd power of the word is Vyaṅjana—’suggested or insinuated sense.’ Thus if a cool breeze is implied by saying ‘the cowherd colony is on the Gangā’, it will be Vyaṅjana.

KD has explained in details SR’s commentary adding his illustrations to elucidate it. Thus he gives the sub-division of abhidhā viz. rūḍhi, yoga and Śri Śuka explains:

2. The Almighty who is above limiting conditions and ever-liberated evolved the intellect, the senses, the mind and the vital breaths of all embodied beings (Jivas) for the enjoyment of various objects, for bringing about their birth, for their transmigration to various other-worldly regions, for experiencing pleasures, etc. thereof and for their Final Liberation (where all speculation or ideation ceases to function). He created these for helping Jivas attain their four objectives of life, viz. artha, dharma, Kāma and Mokṣa.

yoga-rūḍhi. Thus names of persons Rāma, John, etc. are by social convention (rūḍhi) but nṛpati. ‘The protector of the people’ ‘a king’ is etymological (Yoga or Yaugika). But Pātha-ja (born out of mud) may mean a lotus or a frog but is by convention and etymology used for a lotus flower. This is Yoga-rūḍha.

The thrust of Parīkṣīt’s submission is “How can Brahman which is transcendental to Padārtha come with the range of words of Śruti.

As ŚR, succinctly states it: evam padārthatūdṣyogād apadārthasya ca vākyār-thatūdṣyagān na śruti-gocaratvam Brahmanah |

The position taken by other important annotators may be briefly summarised as follows:—

VR: The Supreme Brahman is indefinable either as a cit (conscious) or acit (unconscious, material) entity. It is beyond three guṇas. It is absolutely different and distinct from other intelligent or unintelligent existence. How could the Śruti’s being verbal in nature, denote or describe Brahman directly.

VJ: The Supreme Brahman is indefinable, void of guṇas, distinct from Sat and asat (The causal matter and its product). While Śruti are words and as such can connote qualities or denote things having qualities. This being the case how could Śruti speak of the Supreme Brahman? Did they directly describe it or indicate its properties?

By Śuka’s epithet—Brahman—VJ takes ‘a sage whose all desires are accomplished.’

KD: Śuka concedes that when after the withdrawal of the universe, the Prakṛti ceases to be and there exists only formless, attribute less Brahman, this Brahman is beyond the power of Śruti to describe. But when the universe is created and the individual souls (Jivas) which lay dormant or dissolved in the Prakṛti are granted their subtle-bodies (liṅga Sarira) and are given scope to achieve their purpose in life, be it dharma, artha, kāma, or mokṣa, God is the Controller of Māyā and is hence called the Almighty Lord (Praḥa). To such Jivas, Śruti describe That (Brahman) thou (art) etc. But when the power of words ceases to be and the Śruti find it beyond their capacity to speak about Brahman, they assume silence which is an eloquent guidance (87.60-112).
3. This is the secret essence about the Brahman which is enshrined in the Upaṇiṣads and which is treasured up in their mind by the ancestors of our ancestors (like Sanaka, Sanandana, etc.). He who faithfully and with devotion preserves it in the mind becomes rid of the limitation of the body etc. and attains the Sumnum bonum.

VR: The controller of the universe invested the jīvas (individual souls) with their bodies for favouring them with the opportunity of propitiating him as well as attaining their prosperity here and attainment of Mokṣa or nīḥśreyas hereafter, and for gaining the knowledge of the self which leads to mukti (Final Emancipation), and removing the notion of difference about their essential nature. VR: alternately explains Kalpāṇḍya as “for the sake of the sportive activities regarding the creation, etc. of the universe.”

VJ: The Lord has created the intellect, the senses, the mind and the vital breath for jīvas so that words (mātrās) indicate him directly that he is distinct from Sat and asat (or subtle and gross Prakṛti) and in order that they should take to meritorious activities (bhavārtham) such as svādhyāya and Pravacana. The ‘words’ do not indicate attainment of heaven but obtaining merits for realization of the Supreme Self. VJ interprets Kalpāṇḍya as “for knowledge of the Supreme Self’s (Paramārtha jñāṇa)

VT: The Lord has created the intellect, the sense-organs, the minds and the vital breaths of various categories of jīvas like the human beings who were lying dormant or in a dissolved state along with the Prakṛti after the great Pralaya (dissolution of the universe) for the sake of understanding the Vedas and thereby to make them realize their Self (the principle of jīva) and for visualizing the Supreme Self (the bhāgavat-tattva) called here as akalpana (that which is devoid of māyā).

VB: The logically established view (Siddhānta) is that Brahman should be regarded of that nature as it is described in Upaṇiṣads (Vedānta). In the evolution of the world, the Lord created (1) Intelligence, (2) Sense-organs, (3) the mind and (4) vital breaths (Prāṇas) in this serial order and their respective function is (1) mātrā (2) another transmigration of the soul (3) for ātman and (4) akalpana. He insists that this order of the objects of Intelligence, etc. should be observed.

_Sa kramoṭrāpi grāhyam evam sarvopayogārtham, yato Bhagavāṃścatuṣṭayam utpāditavān, anenaiva sarvānubātikā paramartya-iti Śukahṛdayam/_

1. Puruṣeṇaṃ puruṣaśāyih : (1) By Vāmadeva, Prahlāda and others—VR (ii) By God and others—VJ.
2. akihana—A person who regards nothing as worth praying for or worth attaining—VR.
3. Kṣemau gacchet—Getting all his doubts resolved by pondering over the Upaṇiṣads should attain to the Lord.
4. Here, on this topic, I shall narrate to you in details an ancient legend concerning the great sage Nārāyaṇa and containing a dialogue between Nārada and the sage Nārāyaṇa.

5. On one occasion, during the course of his tour of the world, Nārada, the beloved of the Lord, went to the hermitage of Nārāyaṇa (i.e. Badarikāśrama), to visit that anci-tent sage.

6. It is reported that in this Bhārata varṣa, from the beginning of the Kalpa, the sage Nārāyaṇa has been engaged in performing penance coupled with righteousness, spiritual knowledge, self-control and mental tranquility for the prosperity of the people here and their spiritual good hereafter.

7. Nārada paid obeisance to Nārāyaṇa who was seated in his hermitage surrounded by sages, residents of the village called Kalāpa, and put him this very question, O scion of the Kuru family.

8. In reply to him, the glorious sage Nārāyaṇa, in the midst of the sages who were listening, told Nārada, the gist of the discussion on the para Brahman, which took place between the residents of Janaloka.¹

The Venerable Lord (Nārāyaṇa) said:

9. O son of the Self-born god Brahmā, in the days of yore in Jana-loka, there was held a seminar on the para Brahman (i.e. it was a discussion in which participants both listened and spoke and thus shared their views and experiences about the nature of the para Brahman with others) among the mind-born sons of Brahmā who were sages observing lifelong celibacy.

10. When you had been away to Śveta-dvīpa to see the the Aniruddha form of mine, a thorough and well-rounded discussion on the para Brahman took place—a discussion in which all the Śrutis were discussed, co-ordinated and synthesized. In that seminar this was definitely the very question you put to me.

¹. This is fifth of the seven divisions of the universe and is situated above Maharloka.
11. Although they (The mind-born sons of Brahmā) were all equal in status from the point of learning, austeric penance, virtuousness and so much unparalleled in abounding grace that to them friends, enemies and the indifferent ones were equal. They made one of them, viz. Sanandana as the expounder while others became eager listeners.

11A VR adds:
I shall explain to you all your queries, O sinless one. Now listen to me.

Sanandana said:

12-13. After swallowing up (at the time of the Pralaya) all the universe created by him, the Supreme person along with all his (creative and protective) potencies (such as prakṛti puruṣa, kāla) was as if lying asleep (in his yogic trance). At the end of the period of Pralaya, Śrutis (i. e. the deities presiding over them which were created by his first exhalations at the beginning of the creation of the universe), awakened that Supreme person singing the hymns which appropriately described his true nature, just as bards and attendants of an emperor approach to wait upon him early in the morning while he is still asleep, and awaken him by singing sweet songs eulogising his famous heroic exploits.

Śrutis said:

14*. Be gracious to manifest your glorious exalted nature O invincible Lord. Be pleased to exterminate the beginningless

1. KD: This was a Brahma-Mahā “sacrifice in the form of spiritual discussion.” Just as in sacrifices, though the sacrificial priests know the whole of the Veda, the priests recite only that much portion of the Veda appropriate for the rite and that too pertaining to the part of the duty (Kṣaṇa) assigned to them, similarly, in this Brahma-mahā although all of them were equal in all respects, they gave the Kṣaṇa of ‘speakership’ to Sanandana.

14* The gist of VR’s lengthy explanation:
O invincible Lord, be pleased to free all beings from Avidyā, as you, being merciful by nature, take cognisance of only the good qualities ignoring the defects or evil qualities in beings (Sā'parādha-janeṣvapi Kaścid guṇa-letō'sti cet tam apeksya' nu graha'nīlās tuvaṃ /). Avidyā, by the three guṇas causes the jīvas to whirl in Samsara investing them with evil. You are all powerful and are endowed with six excellences (as enumerated in the Viṣṇu P.) implied in Avidyā (Nescience) of all those beings which are vested with mobile and immobile bodies, as the guṇas (like Sattva, rajas and tamas) possessed by Avidyā are exhibited with the evil object (of obscuring the ever-blissful nature of the Soul). You are, by your very nature, endowed with all the powers, blissfulness and authority (and hence you have kept Māyā or Avidyā under control.) O Lord! who as their indwelling controller evoke all the powers in all beings! It is only the Veda which can describe you to some extent as (some times—such as at the beginning of creation) you (appeared to) work by way of sport in conjunction with Māyā but as a matter of fact you always abide in your ever blissful state of infinite knowledge and delight.

your epithet Bhagavān. You invest all powers in mobile and immobile corporeal beings. At the time of gross creation, when you work in association with Prakṛti and Puruṣa, Vedas can describe you.

VR: Concludes his Commentary stating his Viśiṣṭādvaita stance, as follows:—

14-1. ŚR quotes the following Śruti (i.e. Upaniṣadic) texts attributing creation to the Supreme Person

(1) Tato va imāni bhūtāni jāyaṇe | yena jātāni jivaṇti | yat prayantya-bhisamjananti | tad viṣṇuḥ-svāsa—Taitt. Up. 3.1.

Here creation, subsistence and dissolutions of all bhūtas is attributed to Brahman.

(2) To Brahmāṇām vidadhāti pūrvan yo vai vedāṇāca prahīṇoti tasmai | tam ha devatma-buddhi-prakāśam munusvā vai sarāṇam aham propadya—Śvetāsvatāra Up. 6.18).

Here god Brahmā’s creation and his trustee-ship of the Vedas by the Supreme Man is mentioned.

(3) Satyaṁ jñānām anantam Brahman /
Yāh sarvajñäh sa sarva-viṣ | Taittirīya Up. 2,1r
The infinite knowledge and omniscience of the Reality is stated.

(4) Ya ātmano tiṣṭham ātmānam niyamajati /
God’s being the inner controller is described.

VJ: (The gist only):

Be pleased to manifest your glory by being compassionate to your votaries. O invincible Lord! Remove the screen to your will-power and do away with the cover of Prakṛti which obscures Jiva’s qualities under the 15* The sages recognize that the universe that is perceived is the perfect Brahman (yourself) as it is the Reality (Brahman) that remains in the end (at the time of Pralaya). The Brahman is not sufferings in Samsāra. Due to Prakṛti the inner qualities like infinite power, of Jīva which is your reflection, do not shine. You invest all beings such as Śri, Brahmā, and others in this universe when you are associated with Prakṛti (which according to Smṛtis is one-eighth of the time of the dissolved state). The Vedas can follow you i.e. your commands and interdictions while during the stage of Pralaya, the Śrutis remain as mere hymns of your praise. VJ ends his com, with a quotation from Madhva Ācārya which affirms the equivalence of the Bh. P. with Śrutis.

15* (1) As Pūrvapakṣa ŚR quotes RV 8.44.16a. (which is repeated in all the Vedas e.g. Tait. San. 1.55.1a, Vāj. San. 3.12a) and states that the Śrutis refer to Agni and Indra and not to me (Para Brahman). The uttara pakṣa (the reply) is given in this verse.

(2) KD closely follows SS.

(3) Sudarsana Śūrya and VR :

When all the things evolved out of Brahman at the time of creation are withdrawn at the time of Pralaya and only Brahman (the cause of all things) remains. Just as earthen wares are created out of and ultimately reduced to the earth (their material cause), the gross perceptible universe is said to be Brahman from which the universe and all things included in it are created and of which they are constituted and within which they are withdrawn. Hence, the knowers (the seers of the Vedas) have devoted their mind and speech to you (who are the firm support). The foot-steps resting on bed-steads are as good as placed on the ground as the bedsteads have the earth (floor) as their support.

15*A. VJ's Text reads the 1st half differently :

You are beyond the eternal darkness called Mūlaprakṛti. It is through Vedas that your real nature is known. You are not subject to modifications. Hence, sages i.e. learned persons like Brahmā and others resigned their thoughts, words and actions to you. Just as the feet of men resting on the firm earth get full support and do not fall, the thoughts, words and actions of these sages do not prove untrue as you, to whom they have dedicated them, are the Supreme-most.

15* VB (Summary) :

The universe itself is Brahman—Śrutis and experience support this. When all modifications cease to be, Brahman remains. VB quotes Tato va imāni bhūtāni jāyante, etc. (Tait. Up. 3.1.1). Just as earthen wares are made out of and ultimately reduced to earth, so it is Brahman out of which everything is evolved, and the reality that remains is Brahman. Hence, the seers of the Vedas have made you the centre of their thought, word and deed. Even misapprehensions are also intrinsically Brahman (Bhramad api sur-kīto Visayāḥ paramārthaḥ bhagavān eva bhavati) Just as foot-step placed anywhere rests in the ultimate analysis, on the earth.
subject to modifications. It is from the Brahman that the rising and setting i.e. evolution and dissolution of the universe of modifications take place, just as the clay (the material cause) remains constant though its modifications (the earthen-ware like pot, pitchers, etc.) are made and unmade. Hence, sages have concentrated their mind and speech on you and not on the modifications (things in the world). How can the feet placed by men (on stones, bricks etc.) not be regarded ultimately as rested on the terra firma itself. (Similarly, if Šrutis describe some modifications of yours, they ultimately describe you who form the basis, the substratum of them all).

16*. It is, hence, O Lord of Māyā (constituted of the three guṇas viz. (Sattva, Rajas and Tamas) that spiritually wise and thoughtful people immerse themselves into the nectarian sea of your stories which completely wash off the dirt (sins or impurities) of the entire world and have rid themselves of sins and (all types of) afflictions.¹ Need it be said, O Supreme Lord, that those who, by virtue of their self-realization, have cleansed all passions and evil propensities from their heart and have warded off the effects of Time (such as old age) will enjoy your state of eternal, infinite bliss?

17*. Persons are alive (lit. bearers of life) in the real sense of the term only if they are your devoted followers, otherwise they are merely respiring bellows. It is due to your grace (i.e.

16* VJ: O Lord of three worlds! Persons deeply learned in philosophy (darśanas) take a plunge in the sea of nectar of your stories which wash off the impurities of all people, have rid themselves of all the miseries of the world. Need it be said, O Supreme Lord, that the Liberated Souls whose afflictions from their hearts and the effects like birth, old age etc. caused by Time are wiped out by God himself and who resort to and worship you will enjoy the state of eternal, infinite bliss, have not to undergo any sufferings.

1. SR quotes as an authority.

Yathā puṣkara-palāta āpo na śiṣyanta evam evam-vidi pāpam karma-śiṣyate

Chāndogya Up. 4.14.3.

17* VJ: It is by your entry into Brahmā, Rudra and other presiding deities of Mahat, Ahaṁkāra and other principles that they could create this Egg of the universe. Those who bore ill feeling towards you (asukṛdah) believe that everything is unreal. And their life is nothing but respiring like bellows and their exhalations are sighs expressive of their suffering in hell. The three presence or interpenetration) that (insentient) Principles like Mahat (cosmic intelligence), Ahamkāra (cosmic ‘I’-ness’) and others could create this egg of the universe or body (macrocosm as well as microcosm). You are that Supreme Being that enter into and animate the five vestures of the body enshrining the soul (the virtues consisting of food, vital breath, mind Vijnāna and bliss) and assuming their form, he knows them all. But factually you are not connected with them and abide in the last (called Brahma-puccha in Tait. Up. (2. 1. 5)). You are distinct from the gross and the subtle—the ultimate eternal Reality which alone remains after the destruction of all others.

18*. Out of those paths (of Brahma-realization explored and laid down) by (ancient) sages, those whose eyes are blinded by gravel or rajas i.e. have gross outlook, contemplate Brahman as being at the abdomen (as presiding over the plexus called Manipūra, located at the navel). Followers of Āruṇi who have subtler vision contemplate Brahman in the cavity of the heart (at the plexus or nerve centre known as Anāhata Cakra). O infinite Lord, the meditator thence proceeds upward (by the channel or path called Susumnā) upto the crown of the head (to the plexus called sahasrāra the exalted position of the lustre of Brahman. He who reaches this position does not recede to fall again into the jaws of death.

categories the lowest i.e. human beings, middle i.e. sages and Gandharvas, the highest i.e. Indra and other gods and their leader god Brahmā knows and disseminates by his teaching the knowledge of your eternal, infinite, unparalleled blissful nature and your being transcendental to Sat and Asat (sad-asataḥ Param). He is eligible to attain a form similar to the Lord.

1. VR : has stoutly opposed the idea of Brahmapuccha. According to VR : this verse emphasizes that the human life is useless if not devoted to the Lord. Persons who, though endowed with sound sense organs, indulge in enjoying objects of senses instead of engaging themselves in propitiating the Lord merely live and breathe like bellows.

2 VR : l. ṛṣī - vartamasu—The paths of worship as prescribed in the Vedānta—VR.

3. Paramān dhāma—The highest position is the centre between the eyebrows.

VR : classifies these worshippers as follows :—

(i) Vaivānara-vidyā-nistha : Those who look upon gastral fire as a form of Brahman.
You enter the various living species evolved by you, though as their (material) cause, you were already existing there. Of your own accord, you assume those forms like fire (lying dormant in the fuel and appearing similar to the size and shape of the fire-wood though as Fire it is undifferentiated one) and appear smaller or greater, higher or lower. Hence, persons whose judgment is clear and who do not expect any return (either here or hereafter) for their acts realize your true nature as being the only Reality, Pure, undifferentiated immutable in all these unreal forms.¹

20. (The scriptures say) that the individual soul abiding in the body created and shaped by his former acts, is not limited by anything that may be termed as cause and effect. It is a part or ray of yourself who are endowed with all potencies. Having come to this conclusion regarding the nature of the individual Soul, wise men in this world, with unflinching faith and devotion, contemplate on your feet to which all righteous acts prescribed in the Vedas are dedicated and in consequence of which they attain to liberation from Samsāra (lit. State of getting no rebirth again).

(2) Dahara—vidyā-nisṭha—Followers of Aruṇi who look upon God as being in the cavity of the heart (ḥṛdaya-puṇḍartkāntaragata'kāśarūpam tadv upāsate)

(3) Those who follow the parisara paddhati i.e. the path of suṣumṇā.

(ii) ¹V J : also classifies the contemplatists on Brahman as follows:—

(1) Possessors of subtle insight (Kū ṁ padṛṣṭāḥ Śūksma dṛṣṭayah) into Brahman and his attributes contemplate Brahman as Udara (udarapūrṇam Brahman) or Perfect, full, infinite, Brahman.

(2) Followers of Aruṇi meditate upon Brahman as hṛdaya (one abiding in the heart).

(3) The followers of the sage Maṇḍūka contemplate Brahman as dahara i.e. subtler than the sky and our vital breath lead to It. But those who follow the Parisara method and contemplate Brahman as passing from the heart through Brahmaṇāḍī to the crown of the head such meditators do not fall a victim to kṛtānta—God of death.

19* V J (Only the difference is noted) quotes Tantra Bhāgavata as his authority. In the innumerable living species you are like jīva in them and assimilate yourself with those beings like fire in fire-wood. The Vital breath knows you. Great persons mentally go near you who are the eternal principle in the decaying forms and contemplate on you.

1. See Up. 6.11.
21*. O controller of the universe! You have assumed a corporeal form for shedding light on the true nature of the self which is difficult to comprehend. Those persons who have recouped from their exhaustion (caused by whirling in the cycle of Saṁsāra) by immersing themselves in the ocean of the nectarine stories of your glorious deeds and have renounced their homes (relatives, property, etc.) through their association with your swan-like votaries who take shelter in your lotus-feet, do not covet even for liberation from Saṁsāra.

22*. When the nest1 (in the form of the body in which the soul dwells) follows the path that leads to you, it is useful as one's own self, well-wisher and a beloved person. Though you are always ready to help and are thus favourably disposed and the real well-wisher and loving, it is unfortunate that people of suicidal mentality do not take any delight or interest in you and do not worship you with some form of devotion. They wrong-

21* KD : gives a gist of this and states that the quality between God and the votary is synthesized into one-ness by intense devotion and exhorts to renounce the Karmas-religious rites prescribed by the Veda and engage oneself completely in the devotion to God.

(ii) VJ : O Lord whose essential nature is extremely incomprehensible those who have deeply studied the Vedas who have exhausted themselves in churning the extensively vast ocean of your glorious deeds and have been thereby released from Saṁsāra, have come to realize that you are the source of the Vedas and the "fruit" to be conveyed by them, and worship you by performance of sacrifices and meditation.

22* (1) VR. construes differently:

(i) If this nest i.e. the physical body is placed in your way (by devoting to your worship, etc.) you are just like the very soul, a well-wisher and a beloved person always ready to help.

(ii) KD: Poetically illustrates how a person forgets the Lord and engages himself into Saṁsāra and finally comes to grief. Hence, one should be absorbed in the devotion and worship of Ātman.

1. Kudāya—that which dissolves into the earth i.e. this physical body.

(iii) VJ reads differently.

Through the association of and for worshipping sannyāsins or Swan-like ascetics who are attached to your lotus-feet, some have renounced their houses, kith & kin and do not aspire to attain Mokṣa (liberation from Saṁsāra) which is the fruit of propitiating you, O Lord. They are devoted to you who are the most beloved one. They look upon this transient nest (This physical body) as good and dear and a selfless relative who guides by the path leading to you.
ly entertain attachment, etc. to the physical body which is so wretched and wander in this Samsāra which is extremely fearful.

23*. That state of yours which sages, the practitioners of rigorous Yogic path, contemplated in their hearts by restraining their vital breath, the mind and senses thoroughly, is also attained by your adversaries by constantly thinking of you, and also by the women (Gopīs of Vraja) whose hearts were enamoured of and attached to your mighty arms which were like the body of Śeṣa. The Lord of serpents, as well as we (the presiding deities of Śrutis) who realise you as equal to all and omnipresent and cling to your lotus-like feet, are the same (i.e. equal) in your eyes.

24*. Alas! O Lord, how can one who has come into existence and passed away, at a later stage after you, can possibly presume to know you who existed anterior to all creation. It is from you that the sage (god Brahmā) was born. After Brahmā came into existence both the classes of deities (viz. (1)

23* VJ’s Text combines the last two lines in verse 22 and the first two lines in verse 23 of ŚR’s text. (The gist only): Persons with wrong beliefs and course of meditation do not realise the Supreme Soul. Their minds being rooted in wrong notions suffer eternally in Hell and are invested with a condemned body from hell to hell. The enemies of sages who directed by Mukhya Prāṇa (Chief vital breath) know the way to Mokṣa and worship you as (present in) the hṛdaya (heart).

24* KD : You, being the author of the creation and dissolution of the universe, are anterior to all. Hence, you are beyond the comprehension of all. If we submit to your feet and follow the nine-fold path of devotion, you impart spiritual knowledge out of Grace. Hence, the path of devotion is the best of all. (HV Hari-Varadā) 87.488-510

(1) VR (Summary):

devagāna ubhayesa:—Two groups of sages: (i) Sanaka and others leading ascetic life and (ii) Marici and others engaged in propagating species and world activity. When you withdraw even the Śāstra (Vedic Lore) within you and go to sleep, there is neither Sat (phenomenal intelligent being) nor Asat (phenomenal intelligent creation) (the rest similar to ŚR).

(II) VJ’s Text is a combination of the latter half of verse 23 and the first half of the present (No. 24) verse (only the gist of different interpretation is given.) You alone know your essential nature. The eternal Vedas seek the nectar of your lotus-feet but cannot properly comprehend you who are characterised by existence, consciousness and bliss. You are very kind to Jīvas who devoutly remember you.
adhyātmika—deities presiding over sense-organs, mind and (ii) adhidaiva—those presiding over the celestial world. When, withdrawing every thing within you, you go to sleep, at that time, there exists neither Sat (the gross phenomena) nor Asat (their subtle causes like Mahat, Ahaṅkāra, etc.) nor the product of these two viz. this psycho-physical organism called body, nor the velocity of Time, nor any Śāstras (Śruti texts) from which your nature can be known.\(^1\)

25*. Those who postulate the evolution of the universe or being from non-being or the non-existent (as the Vaiṣeṣika school does) or who believe in the cessation of the existent (twenty one types of miseries as Mokṣa or Liberation (as the Nyāya school does) or who posit the distinctness and plurality of Souls (as the Sāṅkhya and Naiyāyikas, etc. do) and those who affirm that the fruit of (sacrificial and other) Karmas are real (as the followers of the Mīmāṁsā school hold)—all these propagate their misconceptions. It is due to ignorance about you (which leads persons to believe in the misconcept of diversity that the Puruṣa is comprised of the three guṇas or modifications of Prakṛti. It cannot exist in you as you are the embodiment of pure knowledge and absolute consciousness.\(^2\)

1. ko adhā veda ka iha pravocat /
kuta ṣīrā, kuta iyoṁ viṣṭiṁ ||
aṛṣā-devā asya visarjanena thā ko veda yata dibhūva //—RV 10.129.6.

Also : yato vāco nivartante aprāpya manasa saha //—Tait. Up. 2.4.1

25* KD : elucidates ŚR’s refutation of the view of Patañjali that the Brahman evolves out of Asat i.e. the Jiva attains Brahmahood though originally he did not possess it. He has incorporated the translation of the quotations from Upaniṣads (that are given below) into his lucid commentary.

VR : Only the difference from ŚR is noted as VR is a long Com. (second half) : Those who think that Prakṛti of three guṇas and the jīvas (intelligent beings) are distinct and are not controlled by Supreme Brahma are under the influence of Avidyā (nescience). But you transcend Prakṛti and Puruṣa and yourself are Perfect, Infinite consciousness.

2. In refuting the other schools of thought the author of the Bh. P. based this verse on Śruti Texts like the following :—

(i) Sad-eva somvedam agra āstī / Chāndogyā Up. 6.2.1
(ii) Brahmanva san Brahmapnoti / Bṛhad. Up. 4.4.6.
26*. All the universe including the Jīva, comprised of the three guṇas (modifications of Prakṛti) is a projection of the mind. It appears to have a real existence as it is superimposed on you. Those who have realized the Ātman (the soul) regard all this (subjective and objective) universe as Sat, i.e. really existent as it is the projection of the Ātman Himself. Just as persons seeking gold do not discard (ornaments which are) the modifications (of gold) as they are essentially gold, the knowers of the Self come to the conclusion that this Universe (both subjective and objective) is their very self as he (the Ātman) made it and then entered into it.

27. Only those persons who devotedly serve (i.e. worship) you as abiding in all beings as their Indwelling soul, disregard-

(iii) avidyāyām antare vartamānāḥ / svayam dhīrāḥ paṇḍitam manyamānāḥ //
Jaghanyamānāḥ pariṣyanti mūdhhāḥ / andhenaiva niyamānā yathāndhāḥ // Muṇḍaka 1.2.8.

ŚR was a follower of the advaita school of Śaṅkara. But like Śaṅkara, he was an ardent devotee at heart. After every verse of the Śruti gītā he composes one verse conveying the gist of that verse. At the end of his rendering in a verse the gist of this 25th verse, he expresses his ardent desire for Liberation by repeating the names of God who is both Śiva and Viṣṇu. He prays:

Śrīman Mādhava Vāmana Trinayana Śri Śaṅkara Śrīpate /
Govindatī muda' vadhān Madhupate muktāh kadā syām aham //

26* (i) PR: The mind of all beings including that of a human being, constituted as it is of three guṇas which apparently shows to produce some effects cannot do so in your case (It cannot realize you). But your devotees who worship you and meditate upon you, purify their heart and realize that the Universe is Sat—a Reality as it is not different from Paramātman or Brahman—the universe, which is the effect or a synthesized whole of the subtle principles of sentient and non-sentient beings is Brahman.

(ii) VJ's: Text combines the last two lines of Verse 25 with the 1st two lines of the present verse:—To regard that the jīva is bound by three guṇas like Śattva and others is ignorance. Only the unrighteous postulate that your mind is constituted of three guṇas. Supra-human beings like gods with better insight, know that you transcend these guṇas and are an embodiment of supreme bliss and it is the Jīvas that suffer from miseries.

27 (1) KD: extends this devotion to the spiritual preceptors as well.

(II) VR: Out of mercy for those averse to you you control them like cattle and bring to the right path by teaching them the path of righteousness. Those who are not averse to you and are your votaries purify other ignorant persons.
ed Death and planting their foot on the head of Death attain Liberation (from the cycle of births and deaths). But to those who turn away their face from you, howsoever, learned they be, you bind them down like beasts by your commandments (of injunctions and interdictions ordained in the Śrutis). Only those who cherish devoted love to you purify themselves as well as others but not those who are averse to you!

28*. Being self-illuminating as the embodiment of knowledge as you are, you control the power of the sense-organs of all beings, though you yourself are devoid of senses¹ (in your formless aspect). Hence gods who are bound by Nescience (Avidyā) and who partake of the offerings oblated to them by men (under their dominance) offer worship and homage to you (just as tributary princes collect revenue from their subjects and pay tribute to their overlord, the emperor). The progenitors of the world execute the duties of their offices to which they are appointed through your fear² just as tributary kings do unto their emperor in this world.

(III) VJ : the text is a combination of the last two lines of verse 26 and the first half of verse 27 of ŚR.

As gold is the material cause of an ornament of gold which is its modification and as such it is not discarded as separate from gold, the Lord who interpenetrated and illumined the universe after its creation has his own essential nature unchanged. The permeator of the universe is the same absolute God. Those who serve you as abiding in every principle of reality set their foot on the head of death and become Liberated.

1. (i) a-pāṇi-pādo javano grahitā / Paṭātyacaksuḥ sa śrṇotyakarṇaḥ // sa vetti vedyāḥ na ca tasya vetā // tam āhur agryaṃ puruṣam puruṣam //
   —Śvet. Up. 3.19

28*. VR : It is by your will-power that you bring about creation, etc. of the universe. You have all the powers of the sense-organs concentrated in your hands as you are the absolute.

2. bhīṣaśmād vātah pavate, bhīṣodeti sūryaḥ / bhīṣāśmād Agnīś cendraś ca mṛtyur dhāvati pāneamah //
   —Tait. Up. 2.7.1.

   yathā’gniḥ kṣudrā visphulīṅgā vyuccarantyevam evaśmād atmanah sarve pṛānaḥ, sarve ṭokāḥ, sarve devaḥ sarvaśi bhuṭāni vyuccarante /
   Brhad. Up. 2.1.20.
29*. O Lord! You are eternally free and far beyond the reach of Māyā. But when you are pleased to sport with that beginningless Māyā or Avidyā by your mere glance (without coming into contact with her), all the mobile and immobile beings invested with their subtle bodies come into being. But their bodies depend on the causal (latent) karmas of those beings which have come into existence by your (above-mentioned) glance. You are beyond the ken of sense-organs and the mind. Like the sky, you are impartial—equal to all. None kindred to you, none stranger.

[From the point of subtleness and impartiality] you are comparable to the Void² (śūnya in its positive aspect), incomprehensible to speech and mind.

30. O Eternal Lord! If (it is postulated as Śāṅkhyas and schoolmen of similar views do, that) individual souls be infinite in number, each eternally existent and all-pervading, their being under control (of another i.e. you) is not possible.

29* (I) KD refutes ‘voidness’ conveyed by the term śūnya. śūnya means ‘un-manifest’ ‘beyond the range of word’. He discusses fundamental problems about the nature and size (whether atomic or co-terminus with the body) of the soul. He discusses the concepts of ‘bondage and ‘liberation’, ‘plurality’ and ‘oneness’ of the soul. (The discussion is too lengthy to be compressed in a foot-note).

\[
asad và idam agra āsīt / tato vai sad ajāyata /
\]

—Tait. up. 2.7.1

(I) VR: (Summary only).

All beings mobile and immobile are invested with a body through which they are made to suffer agonies caused by Prakṛti. Emancipation from these sufferings is possible only by the gracious glance of the Lord. All sentient (and non-sentient) beings constitute your body. As nobody can be separate and distinct from you, you are their Protector. None is equal to you. Nothing pre-existed you. You are all-pervading like the sky and are not tainted by any contact.

(III) VJ.'s text combines verse 28 c, d and 29 a, b of ŚR's text. The gist of 29 a, b : VJ. quotes with approval Śaṅgilya's opinion. If one were to hold that Liberation (from sanātana) is secured through the gracious glance of Viṣṇu, then it must be admitted that all beings whirl into sanātana due to the will of God.

30*. VR : (only the difference from ŚR is noted).

The view that that which permeates the universe is both the ruler and the ruled, is not correct and the holders of the view have failed to see the truth.
(It is illogical to hold that equals are sub-ordinate *to equals.) And, hence, (the statement) that you control them or they are controlled by you is not possible. Their being controlled is possible only if the contrary is true (i.e. if the jivas be limited or conditioned, finite and non-eternal). That (i.e. you or Brahman) which originates or produces as an evolute anything (viz. the jiva in this case) and thus forms its part (as the material cause) and is thus immanent in it, can control that evolute (the jiva). And this controlling power is not known to them who pose to know it¹, for it, being beyond the range of words and thoughts, what they come to know is defective.

31*. To postulate the creation of the jiva either from the beginningless Prakṛti (i.e. to regard the jiva as a product or transformation of Prakṛti) or from the eternal (birthless) Puruṣa or from a combination of both Prakṛti and Puruṣa is not tenable (for Prakṛti is jāda—inert—while the jiva is the intelligent, animating principle of life and as such it cannot be created by the inert Prakṛti. The second and the third alternative subjects Puruṣa to modifications). Just as bubbles are apparently formed out of interaction of water and air, jivas apparently seem to come into existence through the Prakṛti and Puruṣa (as the material and instrumental causes. But the Brahman is the only reality and) the so-called creation of jivas being unreal, they, with all their several names and forms, merge in you as the rivers merge into the sea (and lose their identity) or all juices (from various flowers collected by bees) get dissolved into (what is ultimately called) honey.¹

1. yasyāmatam matam tasya, matam yasya na veda saḥ / avijñātam avijñātam, vijñātam avijñātam ||

—Kena Up. 2.3

¹) VR: Just as bubbles (temporary by nature) are created by the inter-action of water and wind (which are as compared with bubbles—permanent in nature), jivas are formed from the combination of Prakṛti and Puruṣa both of which are birthless (eternal). It is due to your support that they bear different names and forms as a god, a man, etc. At the time of Pralaya (dissolution of the world) they merge in you leaving their names and forms as rivers do, etc.

(II) VJ: Prakṛti and Puruṣa are eternal, unborn and inseparable. Jivas come into existence conditioned with a body (like that of bubbles on water).
32*. Comprehending thoroughly that misapprehension (viz. the identification of the body with the Soul) has been implanted by your Mâyâ (leading to repeated births in Sâmsâra) intelligent and discerning persons cherish profound love and devotion to you who emancipate them from the cycle of births (and deaths). How can there be any fear of Sâmsâra to those who have resorted to you for refuge? For your brow of three ‘tyres’ (i.e. Time or a year consisting of three seasons, viz. the summer, the rains and the winter) strikes terror constantly in the heart of those who do not seek asylum with you.

33. Persons who, neglecting the feet of one’s spiritual preceptor, try to control the extremely restless, unbroken horse in the form of their mind, by trying to subdue the senses and controlling the breath, undergo great troubles for the means of controlling the mind, and are beset with hundreds of miseries in the Sâmsâra. Such persons are like merchants embarking on a voyage without securing the services of a helmsman (to pilot the boat.)

34. What (happiness) can men derive from one’s kith and kin, sons, wives, wealth, houses, landed property, chariots and other vehicles—nay the very life-breath itself—when you, the very embodiment of every kind of blessing, are easily available by his side in the form of Âtman, ready to confer blessings on him who seeks asylum with you? What thing in this Sâmsâra which is by its nature transient and essentially devoid of any substance, can give pleasure to a person who is ignorant of the above-mentioned truth (about your blissful nature) and endeavours to get sexual pleasure.

35. Sages who have enthroned you on the lotus of their heart and hence the water with which their feet are washed, is

32. *VJ : How will your brows inspire fear of Sâmsâra in the hearts of those who completely submit themselves for your grace?

VJ. : Sages, gods and others who through holy scriptures realize that you alone are Sat, the Real, independent existence, and concentrate their heart on your lotus-feet which annihilate all sins, O Supreme Man, such persons do not even once approach the abode of Hara i.e. are not at all affected by Ahaṅkāra (Egotism).

It is noteworthy that VJ. specifically uses “Hara” and “Rudra” for Ahaṅkāra.
capable of destroying all sins, are completely free from lust and pride and they go on pilgrimage to various sacred places and holy waters on the earth. Those who have but once set their heart on you, the Atman, the receptacle of everlasting bliss never again turn their mind to (the enjoyment of) the household life which robs man of his excellent virtues (like fortitude, serenity of mind, etc.)

36*. (The following is a refutation of the view of the Mīmāṃsakas regarding the reality of the world).

If you agree that as this (world) is evolved out of the Reality (Brahman), it must be real, (we say that) that is not the case. This (your) argument is fallacious. In some instances, no invariable concomitance is observed. (The effect does not necessarily follow the nature of the cause. e.g. A son is found different from the father.) In some cases, the so-called evolute is false (e.g. the "mis-perception" of a rope (a reality) as a serpent (which is unreal). Hence the world is not real like the (Brahman). If (you argue that the "mis-perception" of a serpent is caused by the presence of the rope and ignorance about the reality, similarly) the world is the product of both (Brahman and Avidyā), we reply that still the world is not real. It is super-imposed on the Reality called Brahman. We appreciate the usefulness of this theory. The illusion theory is admitted as it explains the transactions of the phenomenal world, and such transactions are carried on by blindly following traditions. Your speech (Vedic texts promising reward for ritualistic acts such as performance of sacrifice, etc.) deludes through the manifold powers of words (such as lakṣaṇā, vyāñjanā, etc.) persons who have become dullwitted by blind faith in Vedic rituals.1

36*. VR differs: If as you say, whatever is born of Sat—real existence—may not be real, you must show where this view fails and where it is totally disproved. The dull-witted followers of the path of Karma, are deluded through blind tradition.

1. \textit{tad yat heva \textit{karma-cito loko kṣṭyate \textit{evam eva'\textit{mutra pumya-cito lokah kṣṭyate}}}}

—\textit{Chāndogya Up. 8.1.6}

Thus many Vedic texts do not subscribe to Mīmāṃsāka's contention that the Vedas advocate the path of Karma only.
37*. This phenomenal world was not in existence at the beginning before its creation. After the dissolution, the world shall cease to exist. In the intervening period, being superimposed on you, the Absolute Existence, it appears to be real. Hence, the world is compared with various modifications of material substances (e.g. bangles, armlets, crowns of gold, a pitcher or a dish of earth). It is like a figment of imagination with no basis in reality. But ignorant people regard it as the Reality.

38. When the individual soul (Jīva) embraces Māyā under the influence of Nescience (Avidyā), he assumes her guṇas and wrongly identifies himself with the body, sense-organs etc. Thus losing (forgetting) his pristine glory and blissful nature, he succumbs to death (and is involved in the cycle of birth and death i.e., Samsāra). On the contrary, even as a serpent casts off his slough, you discard Māyā. Hence, you have preserved within you divine nature, infinite power and eight supra-human mystical powers. Thus you shine with your infinite power and glory.

39. If the Yogins who try to control their senses do not exterminate the roots of passions from their heart, you, even though abiding in the hearts of these hypocrites, are not accessible to them, are like a diamond (necklace) worn round the neck but forgotten by the wearer. These yogins, after gratifying their own senses are flanked with miseries on both the sides, O Lord—One from Death i.e., Samsāra that has not been over-

* VR differs:

   It is only the ignorant who believe that this universe did not exist before creation and it will be non-existent in future and, therefore, it is not existing at present also and that it is unreal like a figment of fiction.

 VR: (The gist only).

The Jīva, being deluded by Māyā is invested with a body (which is product of Prakṛti). Through the body he enjoys objects of senses and identifies himself with it and is subjected to death. He is thus robbed of his inherent knowledge and other qualities.

 As usual VJ's text is a combination of verse 38.c.d and 32. a.b.: Yogins who are desireless and firm in the path of renunciation are blessed by the Lord with a life-free death and he grants them blissful Mokṣa.
come and on the other hand, from you who still remain unrealized.

40*. O glorious Lord (endowed with six excellences) ; he who has realized you, does not feel the effect of pleasure or pain as a consequence of meritorious or sinful acts as determined by you. Hence, he is not aware of the Vedic injunctions and interdictions which are binding on other embodied beings. (They are not binding on him as he has realized that the soul is distinct from the body.) You are every day ushered through the ears into the heart and are enshrined there in the hearts of men with sage advice and precepts transmitted from generation to generation. And you are ultimately attained by them as you are the final goal called Mokṣa.

41. Even lords of celestial regions (like god Indra, Brahmā) have not been able to fathom you or know your limit as you are Infinite. Even you have not done so, due to your infiniteness, as within you abide heaps of innumerable Eggs of Universes each along with its seven protective sheaths, which propelled by Time float about like particles of dust (driven by the wind) in the sky. Due to the infinite greatness of yours, Śrutis, finding that they end in you (as their goal), convey you indirectly by negating everything else than you.

_The glorious Lord (Nārāyaṇa) said :_

42. Having thus heard the exposition of the Śrutis regarding the Soul—Sanaka and other (mind-born) sons of Brahmā who had already accomplished their spiritual perfection, now worshipped Sanandana (who was their guide or resource person at the spiritual seminar).

43. The essence of all the Vedas, Purāṇas and Upaniṣads was in this manner churned out and extracted by those noble-souled Sanaka and other brothers who were the earliest creation of god Brahmā and who traversed through the sky.

44. O son of god Brahmā (Nārada)! You bear in mind with faith this exposition about the (nature of the) soul which 40*. ēṣa nityo mahimā Brahmaṇasya na karmāṇa vardhate no kaṇṭaṇ, etc.

*—Brhad Up. 4.4.23
is capable of reducing to ashes all the desires of men and then you may move about, at will, anywhere in the world.

Śri Śuka said:

45. Having received with faith and reverence what was thus expounded to him by the Sage Nārāyaṇa, Nārada, the self-controlled observer of life-long celibacy who could retain in memory what he had heard but once, and had already accomplished his purpose (in life), humbly submitted as follows:

Nārada submitted:

46. "Obeisance to that celebrated Lord Kṛṣṇa (Nārāyaṇa) of spotless hallowing glory, who assumes charming forms for the non-recurrence of birth (i.e. emancipation from Samsāra) of all beings.

47. Having thus respectfully bowed that first Sage Nārāyaṇa and his other high-souled disciples, Nārada straight-way arrived at the hermitage of my father, Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana.

48. He was warmly received by the worshipful sage Vyāsa. Seating himself comfortably, he described to him (Vyāsa) in details what he heard from the lips of the sage Nārāyaṇa.

49. O king Parīśit! I have in this way replied to you in details the question that you put to me (by reporting to you the hymn sung by Śrūtis) with a view to bringing out how far the Brahman which is attributeless and undefinable, can be reached by the mind.

50. One should constantly contemplate Lord Hari who keeps the Māyā at a distance from him due to his absolute state; Who is the architect of the universe, planning its beginning, middle and end. He is the Controller of the unmanifest Prakṛti and of Jīvas. After creating the universe, He entered into it along with Jīvas and controls them. Having taken asylum with him, the Jīva protects himself against the Māyā. Having attained to him, the Jīva sheds his ignorance, just as a man who falls deep asleep loses the consciousness of his person (body).
CHAPTER EIGHTYEIGHT

God Rudra Saved

The King (Parikṣit) enquired:

1. Out of gods, Asuras or human beings, whoever worship (and propitiate) god Śiva who himself has renounced all worldly pleasures are blessed with wealth and enjoyment of pleasures, but not so in the case of those who are the votaries of Viṣṇu though he is the consort of the goddess of wealth.

2. We entertain a grave doubt and we desire to know (its solution) as to why the goal (i.e. the fruit achieved) of those who worship these two deities of different dispositions, is quite contrary to their expectation? Why do the Devotees of the Lord of Laksīmi do not get wealth and while those of Śiva become rich?

Sākta said:

3. God Śiva is ever associated with his Śakti. He is invested with three guṇas viz. Sattva, rajas and tamas and is the presiding deity of the three types of (Cosmic) ego characterised by the guṇas, viz. sattva (or vaikārika ego), rajas (taijasa type of Ego) and tamas (or tāmasa type of ego).

4. Out of these three types of ego were evolved sixteen modifications or products (viz. mind from the sāttvika ego, ten sense-organs from rājasīc type of ahaṃkāra and five bhūtas or elements from the tāmasic type of ego). He who adores one of these potencies is blessed with all types of earthly prosperity.

5. Lord Hari, on the other hand, is unaffected by and hence devoid of the attributes (of Prakṛti). He is the Supreme Person far beyond the range of Prakṛti. He is omniscient and is a witness to everything. A person who worships him becomes bereft of guṇas.

6. After the conclusion of the Horse-sacrifice, while listening to the exposition of the righteous duties, your grandfather, King Yudhiṣṭhira asked this very question to Kṛṣṇa.

7. The glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa who descended into the race of Yadu for blessing people with the Summum bonum (by showing the way to Mokṣa) was very much pleased with that question and explained to him who was very desirous and eager to listen to him.

The Lord explained:

8. I gradually relieve a person of his wealth on whom I wish to bestow my grace. Then his own relatives, finding him penniless and hard-pressed with adversity and sorrow-stricken, forsake him (of their own accord).

9. When (he finds that) all his efforts with the desire of acquiring wealth have been futile, he becomes despondent and forms friendship with persons who are devoted to me. Then only I shower my grace on him.

10. My grace is the revelation of myself i.e. of Brahman. It is too subtle (to be comprehensible), Pure consciousness and infinite Reality (existence).

10A*. The intelligent person who realizes it as his ownself is liberated from Samsāra. Hence, people avoid me as one too difficult to be propitiated and turn to other gods (to worship).

11. Thereupon, having obtained sovereignty and prosperity from gods who are easily and quickly propitiated, they become arrogant, puffed up with pride and maddened. They forget the very gods who have bestowed boons on them and despise them.

Śri Śuka said:

12. Gods Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Śiva and others are competent to pronounce a curse or grant boons. But dear Parikṣit, God Śiva and Brahmā accord grace or curse instantaneously. (The moment they are pleased or displeased), but not so god Viṣṇu.

13. As an illustration of this, those versed in ancient lore cite the ancient legend how god Śiva after giving a boon to Vrkāsura, found himself in danger.

10A* Additional half verse from the vrndāban edition (Quoted from Bh. P. in Bengali script).
14. There was an Asura called Vṛka, the son of Śakuni. That wicked-minded fellow saw Nārada on the way and asked him which god out of the trinity (of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva) was easily and quickly propitiated.

15. Nārada advised him, "Do propitiate god Śiva and you will quickly accomplish your purpose. He gets pleased with slight merit and is enraged at the slightest offence.

16. When the ten-faced demon Rāvaṇa and Bāṇa eulogised him like bards, he bestowed on them unparalleled prosperity and sovereignty in consequence of which he found himself involved in serious troubles (Rāvaṇa uprooted mount Kailāsa, the residence of god Śiva and Bāṇa made him the protector of his capital city).

17. Being thus advised, that Asura began to propitiate god Śiva by offering to him the oblation of his own flesh chopped from his body, through the mouth of the fire-god, at the place called Kedāra in the Himālayas.

18. Out of desparation for not being able to visualize god Śiva (in spite of the sacrifice of his flesh), the Asura, on the seventh day, (took a bath in the holy waters of that place) and began to cut with sharp weapon his head with wet matted hair.

19. At that time the highly merciful god (with matted hair) who was brilliant like the fire-god, came out of the sacrificial fire. Just as we would do (to prevent our friends from suicide), he held both of his arms with his own and prevented him from that act. By the blessed touch of Śiva, his body became healed of wounds and perfect as before.

20. He spoke to him, "Dear Asura! It is enough (desist from offering your head to me). Seek of me any boon you desire and I shall confer it on you. I am pleased even if water is reverentially offered to me by people devoted to me. You have unnecessarily tortured your body so cruelly.

21. That extremely sinful demon sought the god a boon that spelt terror to all living beings. (He requested as a boon:) "May every body die on whose head I shall lay my palm."

22. Hearing that prayer, Lord Śiva got depressed at heart (for a moment), O Parīkṣit. But laughingly he said,
"Yes. Be it so." and gave the boon which was like giving nectar to a serpent.

23. The Asura who was thus granted boon, was really desirous of laying his hand upon Gauri (Parvati, the spouse of god Śiva). And they say that with a view to testing the efficacy of that boon, he advanced to place his hand upon the head of god Śiva himself. And god Śiva was seized with terror at his own act (of granting the boon.)

24. Agitated with terrific fear and trembling, he began to run fast to the northern direction with the demon pursuing (close on his heels). He ran traversing the whole of the earth, the heaven and the end of cardinal points.

25. Lords of gods did not know how to counteract or intervene and they kept quiet. At last Lord Śiva went to Śvetadvipa the ever-refulgent region of Viṣṇu lying beyond the sphere of darkness.

26. There abides Lord Nārāyaṇa in person, the ultimate resort of those who have renounced everything for the Lord, and hence have attained serenity of mind (by getting rid of passions like love, hatred, etc.) and have refrained from all forms of violence, an abode having attained which a person never returns to Samsāra.

27. Perceiving the predicament of god Śiva, the Lord who destroys all afflictions, assumed the form of a small boy by his Yoga-māyā and manifested himself at a distance.

28. Shining like fire by his refulgence and adorned with his girdle of munja grass, deer-skin, staff and a rosary of Rudrākṣa beads and with darbha grass in his hand, he paid obeisance to the demon as if in deep humility.

_The Lord said:_

29. O son of Śakuni, evidently your honour is much exhausted. Have you come from a long distance? Have rest for a short while (for a minute) (If proper care is taken of this body,) it fulfills all the cherished desires like the heavenly wish-yielding cow.

30. If the matter is fit for our ears, (i.e. if there be no objection in hearing of your intention) O mighty one, let me know on what you have set your mind. Generally a man desires to accomplish his purpose with the help of his chosen assistants.

Śrī Śuka said:

31. When he was thus accosted in such nectar-showering words, the demon felt refreshed and confided to him (Viṣṇu) all that he had done before.

The glorious Lord (disguised as a Brahmaśīrin) remarked:

32. If this be the case, we do not believe in his (Śiva’s) words; for he has been reduced to the State of a goblin (Piśāca) by the curse of Dakṣa, and is now the king of Pretas and Piśācas (evil spirits).

33. If you regard Śiva as the preceptor of the world and still have faith in him, O king of Dānavas, you may easily test the truth of his words this very moment, O dear Asura, by placing your palm on your head.

34. If the words of Śiva are found to be false, you straightway kill that liar so that he may not live to utter a falsehood again.”

35. In this way his mind was changed by the wonderful and extremely soft, winning words of the Lord. And the wicked-minded fellow in utter forgetfulness placed his palm on his own head.

36. That very moment the Asura fell down with his head split up as if he was struck down with vajra (thunder-bolt). And there were applauding shouts like “Victory” “Salutations” and “Well-done” in the heavens.

37. When the wicked demon Vṛkṣa was killed, gods, sages, manes (ancestors) and Gandharvas let down showers of flowers and god Śiva was rescued from a dangerous situation.

38-39. To god Śiva who was thus saved, spoke the glorious Lord Viṣṇu: God Mahādeva! This sinful fellow has been killed by his own sins. O Īśa (Controller of the world)! What creature who has committed sin (or offence) against the great can possibly be safe and happy? What need be said when the offence is committed against the controller of the universe and the father of the world like you?
40. Whoever hears or relates this account of Liberation of god Śiva (from mortal danger) by Lord Viṣṇu, the Supreme Soul, who is the veritable sea of incomprehensible powers, becomes emancipated from Samsāra (the cycle of births and deaths) and becomes free from the danger of enemies as well.

CHAPTER EIGHTYNINE

Supremacy of Viṣṇu Vindicated:

Restoration to Life of Brāhmaṇa's Sons

Śri Śuka said:

1. On one occasion, sages were engaged in performing a sacrificial session (of a long duration). O king, in that session a question was raised for discussion as to who of the ruling gods (i.e. Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and Śiva) was the greatest.

2. In order to satisfy their curiosity, they deputed the sage Bhṛgu, the son of god Brahmā, to ascertain the truth. And he went to the assembly of god Brahmā.

3. In order to test the worth of that god, Bhṛgu, did not pay him homage or chant any hymn in his praise. The worshipful god Brahmā (took it as an affront and) was enraged with him, and was as if aglow with his burning wrath.

4. Considering that the insulting person was his own son, the self-born god Brahmā quenched the fiery wrath provoked in his mind, by restraining himself, just as fire is extinguished by water (which is its own product.)

5. From the assembly of god Brahmā, he repaired to mount Kailāsa (the abode of god Śiva). God Mahādeva was delighted (at his brother’s surprise visit) and arising from his seat, he proceeded to embrace him.

6. But Bhṛgu showed no desire for it (avoiding him) with the remark, “you tread evil path, (flouting the authority of the Vedas) you have adopted the heretic way of life and apply ashes of dead bodies from burning grounds). The tradition goes that the god flew in rage and with fiery eyes, he snatched up his trident and rushed forth to strike him.

7. His consort Pārvatī, however, fell at his feet and pacified him with sweet words. Thereupon Bhṛgu proceeded to Vaikuṇṭha where Lord Viṣṇu abides.

8-9. God Viṣṇu was then lying on the lap of the goddess
Śrī (Lakṣmī). Bhṛgu kicked Him with his foot on his chest.
The glorious Lord Viṣṇu, the resort of all saints, got up (in reverence) along with the goddess Lakṣmī. He alighted from the bed-stead and bowing down reverentially to the sage addressed him, “Welcome O Brāhmaṇa sage; please have some comfortable rest on the seat for a while. O mighty sage, it behoves you to forgive us, as we were not aware of your arrival.

10. “O great sage! Your feet are so very soft and delicate, my dear!” With these words he began to massage soothingly the feet of the Brāhmaṇa with his own hands.

11. “Be pleased to purify me along with my realm and the protectors of the world that are within me, with the water washing the feet of your worship—water which sanctifies even the holy waters of sacred places.

12. Worshipful sire! From to-day I have been the sole abode of goddess Lakṣmī. With my sins completely washed off by the touch of your feet (which symbolise knowledge) the goddess of prosperity (Lakṣmī in the form of Śrī Vatsa mark) shall ever reside on my bosom.”

12A. Vṛṣṭi's Text.

And let the mark (of your foot-print on my bosom) be known by the name Śrī Vatsa from to-day.”

Śrī Śukā said:

13. When Lord Viṣṇu addressed him thus, Bhṛgu felt deeply satisfied and happy with his melodious words in a deep low tone. He remained silent as his voice was choked with over-whelming feeling of devotion, his eyes, over-flowing with tears.

14. Returning to the place of that sacrificial session, Bhṛgu fully recounted to those sages who were well-versed in the Vedas, what he experienced (in the realm of the three gods).
15. Listening to that report the sages were wonder-struck and had their doubt (about the supremacy of the three gods) dispelled. They came to believe god Viśṇu to be the Supreme-most god, who bestows tranquility and fearless State (Mokṣa).

16. For god Viśṇu is directly the fountain head of righteousness, spiritual knowledge, renunciation (of four kinds) in association with eight kinds of mystical powers (Siddhis) and glory, which cleanly washes off the dirt (sins) of the soul.

17. He is called the highest goal of sages and of pious people who have completely renounced violence, are serene, endowed with equanimity of mind (or out-look of equality towards all) and non-attachment.

18. His beloved personality is constituted of pure Sattva-guna; Brāhmaṇas, his beloved deities. Persons of keen and subtle intellect who are of serene mind and who covet for no blessings, resort to him.

19. He has three forms which are invested of Māyā consisting of three guṇas : The Rākṣasa, the Tāmasic form, Asura, the Rājasic and gods, the Sattvic form. (He is unattached to all these guṇas but) Sattva is the means of attaining the lore of Bhakti and he is thus associated with Sattva.

Śrī Śuka said :

20. In this way, the Brāhmaṇas who were performing the sacrifice, came to this conclusion for dispelling the doubts of the people. By worshipping the lotus-feet of the Supreme Person, they attained to his blissful state.

Śūta said :

21. This story is the very nectar scented with the fragrance of the Lotus-mouth of Śuka, the son of the sage Vyāsa. It celebrates the glory of the Supreme Person of hallowing renown. It dispels the fear of the cycle of births and deaths (samsāra). The wanderer in this cycle of transmigration, who constantly drinks this nectar with the goblets of his ears, gives up fatigue of wandering through the paths of Samsāra.

Śrī Śuka began to narrate :

22. It is traditionally reported that on one occasion, at Dvārakā, the newly born son of a Brāhmaṇa woman died immediately as he touched the ground (i.e. the moment she delivered the child, it expired), O descendant of Bharata!

23. The Brähmaṇa took the dead body of the child and placed it at the gates of the royal palace and over-whelmed with grief and depressed in mind he wept bitterly and said.¹

1. VF’s Test supplied the back-ground with the following additional verses.
23.1. On one occasion Śri Kṛṣṇa embarked on performing a horse-sacrifice and he sent out a horse consecrated for the sacrifice, to go round the world.

23.4. In a short period of time, they went round the earth and brought back the consecrated horse, O prominent Bharata.

23.5. Hearing the report that Lord Kṛṣṇa was desirous of performing a Horse-sacrifice, O Parikṣit, sages who performed penance for a long time and observed their religious vows rigorously, came to attend it.

23.6-7. Having appointed sacrificial priests like Hotṛ (to recite the hymns and mantras from the Ṛgveda), Adhvaryu (the officiating priest expert in the Yajurveda), Udgātṛ (to chant the hymns from the Sāmaveda) and other priests to officiate over the sacrifice as per prescribed procedure, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa performed the ceremony of declaration of that day (of commencing the sacrifice) as the most auspicious (Punyātha-mangala) by sages and prominent Brähmaṇas who were experts in the sacrificial lore and got himself consecrated for the sacrifice.

23.8. Kings and rulers of various countries who, with their refulgent crowns and diadems, looked brilliant like gods, came to attend upon him (at the sacrifice).

23.9. Pāṇḍavas and other kings who were eager to see the sacrifice and were invited by Kṛṣṇa came to Dwārakā, O King Parikṣit.

23.10. While the glorious celebration of the horse-sacrifice was going on, Brähmaṇas got thoroughly satisfied with the feasts and gifts of cloth, cows, land and gold.

23.11. Being initiated as a sacrificer, Śri Kṛṣṇa saw to it that the prominent Brähmaṇas got to their satisfaction all their desired objects as well as fed with whatever they wished to eat.

23.12-13. While kings occupied their respective seats all round and the cane-bearers, making a sound of the canes, were declaring “Silence please,” a certain Brähmaṇa with roots of grass (or a cane) in his hand, rushed in and standing at the gate of the sacrificial hall, raised-up his hands and cried out loudly in affliction. His throat was parched with hunger, face dried up, tears were flowing from his eyes and with distressed heart, he cried out thus:
24. "I have lost my child, because of the sin of a base kṣattriya (ruler) who is a hater of Brāhmaṇas, wicked-minded, greedy and voluptuous.

25. Subjects who serve a king who takes pleasure in violence, is of a bad character and has no control over his senses, perish by being subjected to perpetual impoverishment and unending miseries."

26. In this manner, the Brāhmaṇa sage screamed out the same condemning appeal the second and the third time and left the dead body of the child at the royal gate.

27. Hearing that cry while he was near Śrī Kṛṣṇa Arjuna enquired with the Brāhmaṇa when his nineth child was lost.

28. "Is there no Kṣattriya in your house (i.e. in this city) who can wield a bow? These Kṣattriyas (Yādavas who cannot protect their subjects) are not better than Brāhmaṇas engaged in this sacrifice."

29. The Kṣattriya (rulers) of that Kingdom where Brāhmaṇas being robbed of their wealth and being bereaved of their wives and children, have to grieve helplessly, are verily no better than actors on the stage who fill their belly by playing the role of Kṣattriyas.

30. O worshipful Sir, as both of you are so helpless here, I hereby undertake to protect the child that will be born of you. If I fail to fulfil my pledge, I shall enter fire (and burn myself down to death) and expiate myself of that sin."

1. Here Vṛ's Text adds:

25.1. Repeating this (above blame) again, the Brāhmaṇa screamed out again, out of extreme anguish.

25.2. Hearing that, self-respecting Arjuna rose from his high seat near Kṛṣṇa and approaching the Brāhmaṇa enquired.

25.3. "How many children have you O Brāhmaṇa? What is the trouble with you? You tell me everything unreservedly. I shall try to make you happy."

25.4. When (sympathetically) enquired thus, the Brāhmaṇa reported: "As soon as my child is born it is immediately taken away that very moment from the lying-in-chamber by some unknown agency, dear Sir."

2. These Brāhmaṇas are performing this sacrifice for these wretched Kṣattriyas who cannot protect their subjects—VJ.
The Brāhmaṇa remarked:

31. Saṅkarṣaṇa (Balarāma), Śrī Kṛṣṇa, Pradyumna the foremost archer and Aniruddha, an unparalleled hero have not been able to protect my child.

32. Even the Lords of the world found the achievement of this feat impossible. It is childish on your part to boast like this. We simply don’t believe in it.

Arjuna said:

33. O Brāhmaṇa, I am neither Balarāma, nor Kṛṣṇa nor Kṛṣṇa’s descendant. I am verily that Arjuna, the wielder of the bow famous by the name Gāṇḍīva.

34. Please don’t underestimate my prowess, O Brāhmaṇa; even the three-eyed god (Śiva) was delighted with it. I shall defeat the god of death in battle and restore your progeny, Sire.¹

1. Here Vṛṣṇi’s Text adds:

34.1. Having inspired confidence in the Brāhmaṇa with this assurance O king, Arjuna requested Kṛṣṇa, “O Lord, please give me permission to go for (protecting the child of) the Brāhmaṇa.

34.2. You may continue your Horse sacrifice with these great men.” To Arjuna who was requesting permission to go and who had equipped himself with his quivers and Gāṇḍīva bow, Kṛṣṇa spoke with a smile.

Lord Kṛṣṇa said:

34.3 “I shall have to come personally. It won’t be possible (for you to protect the child), O Arjuna. The spirit that killed the child, appears to be extra-ordinary.”

Arjuna replied:

34.4. Indra despite his alliance with the rulers of the spheres, was defeated by me at Khāṇḍava. The three-eyed god Śiva in the guise of a Kirāṭa, was pleased by me with my valour in a battle (with him).

34.5. The demons Nivāta-Kavacas, the residents of Hiraṇyapura, who could not be conquered even by Indra, were killed by me in a fight.

34.6. Can there be any evil spirit more powerful than that, O slayer of demons? Why do you frighten me? Please give me permission to go just now.”

Śrī Śuka said:

34.7. Kṛṣṇa who was thus persuaded, gave permission to Arjuna to go. Arjuna, equipped with his (Gāṇḍīva) bow, went out of the sacrificial hall.

34.8. He ascended his spacious chariot with the banner of the monkey emblem hoisted over it. He placed the Brāhmaṇa in front of him and rode round the village.
35. The Brähmaṇa, so confidently assured by Arjuna, went home pleased at heart, as he had heard the exploits of Arjuna.

36. When the time of delivery of his wife approached, that eminent Brähmaṇa entreated Arjuna anxiously, “Pray protect my child from death.”

37. Arjuna sipped water (as Ācamana) and bowing to the great god Śiva, he invoked all his divine missiles and kept his bow Gāṇḍīva ready.

38. Arjuna as it were encaged the lying-in-chamber by creating a fence of arrows charged with mantras of various missiles on all side, above and below that chamber.

39. Then the wife of that Brähmaṇa gave birth to a son who cried well (repeatedly), but in an instant, he bodily vanished through the sky.

40. Then the Brähmaṇa censured Arjuna in the presence of Kṛṣṇa blaming himself, “Look at my folly, in placing faith in the empty bragging of an impotent person.

41. Who else can be capable enough to protect my child whom neither Pradyumna, nor Aniruddha, nor Balarāma nor Śri Kṛṣṇa were able to protect.

42. Fie npon Arjuna, the boastful liar! Fie upon the bow of his who indulges in self-advertisement (self-flattery). The wicked fellow, out of his stupidity, brags to restore back what has been snatched away by Fate.”

34.9 Arriving at the village of that Brähmaṇa, he helped him get down from the chariot. When he heard that the Brähmaṇa’s wife had retired into the lying-in-chamber, Arjuna told him, O king.

Arjuna said:

34.10. “Go to your house, O Brähmaṇa. I have given complete protection to you on all sides. Please go and comfort your wife who must be afraid.”

1. VJ’s Text adds:

36.1. When Arjuna was thus requested, he ascended his chariot and mounting the string on the Gāṇḍīva bow hastened to the proximity of the room of confinement.

36.2. The Brähmaṇa also entered that lying-in-chamber and in a short while cried for Arjuna’s help.
43. While the Brāhmaṇa sage was reproaching him, Arjuna used his mystical lore and quickly went to Saṁyamanī, the capital of the god of death (Yama).

44. Not being able to trace the child of that Brāhmaṇa he visited (and explored) the capital cities of the great gods like Indra, Agni, Nārāyaṇa, Soma, Vāyu and Varuṇa and with his weapon ready, he went to the subterranean regions and to regions higher than the celestial region and many other regions.

45. As he could not trace the child and had failed to fulfill his pledge, he prepared himself to enter fire but was prohibited by Kṛṣṇa from doing so.

46. (Kṛṣṇa said) “I shall show you the sons of that Brāhmaṇa. Please do not disrespect yourself in this way. Those (who are censuring you now) will permanently establish (and sing of) our pure spotless glory.

47. Having comforted him with these words, the glorious Almighty Lord ascended his divine chariot along with Arjuna and sped towards the west.

48. Then passing over the seven island-continents and the seven oceans dividing those continents, the seven mountain-ranges and the Lokaloka mountain (which divides the visible world from the region of darkness), he entered the region of darkness.

49. O prominent Bharata! In that pitch-black darkness, his horses, Śaibya, Suvīva, Meghapuṣpa and Balāhaka lost their way and could not proceed.

50. Noticing their plight, Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Master of all experts in Yoga, discharged ahead his discus Sudarśana which was effulgent like one thousand suns shining simultaneously.

51. Piercing through that extremely horrendous, palpably thick all-pervading darkness, the effect of Prakṛti or created by the Lord himself with its exceedingly enormous lustre, the Sudarśana discus with the speed of the mind (quick like a thought or imagination) cut its way like the arrow of Rāma

1. A mythical mountain that encircles the earth and is beyond the seven continents and the encircling sea of fresh water. The sun's rays do not reach beyond that mountain.
discharged from the bow-string penetrated through hostile army.

52. Following the path cut by the discus, (the chariot reached the end of darkness), Arjuna saw that Supreme, Infinite, dazzling lustre beyond that dark-region (of Prakṛti). But his eyes became dazed and he closed the eyes.

53. Thereafter he entered water (the ocean) adorned with huge billows lashed up by powerful tempestuous gales. Verily he saw then a wonderful mansion highly resplendent with thousands of columns of brilliant jewels.

54. And in that mansion, he beheld the presence of the Serpent Śeṣa (Ananta) who was the most formidable yet wonderful to look at. He was radiant with brilliant jewels on each of his thousand hoods, with two fierce eyes. His body was white like the Himālayas but was black at the neck and in the tongue.

55. He beheld the all-pervading Lord of infinite powers resting on the soft and comfortable coils of serpent Śeṣa. The complexion of that most exalted Super-human being was dark like a cloud surcharged with water. He wore a yellow garment. He had a cheerful countenance and beautiful longish eyes.

56. The effulgence of the numerous precious jewels in his crown and the refulgence of his ear-rings enveloped (like a halo) and lit up his profuse curly locks of hair. He had eight long beautiful arms. He wore the brilliant Kaustubha gem round his neck and had the Śrī Vatsa mark (on his chest), and he was decorated with Vanamālā (a garland of five colour-ed forest flowers reaching upto the knees).

57. He was the Lord of Supreme gods who was attended upon by Sunanda and Nanda, the chief of his guards, by the discus Sudarśana and other weapons in a corporal form and by his four potencies, viz. Puṣṭi (grace), Śrī (splendour, beauty and affluence), Kirti (Fame) and the Invincible potency (Māyā) and eight miraculous powers (Siddhis).

58. Śrī Kṛṣṇa bowed to the Infinite Lord who was himself in another form, Arjuna filled with awe at his sight, paid him obeisance. Both of them stood with folded palms. The Perfect Person, the controller of Brahmā and other lords (presiding deities) of the spheres, smilingly addressed in a deep and sonorous voice to them.

59. "The sons of the Brāhmaṇa were brought by me desirous of seeing you both. Both of you have incarnated on the earth by your part-manifestations for the protection of righteousness. Having killed the demons who have become a burden to the earth as soon as possible, return to our presence.

60. Both of you are famous sages Nara and Nārāyaṇa who have already accomplished all blessings. But for the maintenance of the world-order, you both have set a model of righteousness for others to follow.

61-62. Thus commanded by the glorious Supreme Deity, those two dark-complexioned heroes (Śrī Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna) accepted the mandate, respectfully bowed to the Perfect Being, and taking with them the sons of the Brāhmaṇa returned with delighted hearts to their home by the same route they came. They restored to the Brāhmaṇa his sons grown up according to their age but similar in appearance as their father saw them (at the time of their birth).

63. Having visualized the shining region (known as Mahākālapura of Viṣṇu (or the glorious power of Viṣṇu, Arjuna was exceedingly astonished. He realized whatever prowess and manliness is possessed by a man is due to the grace of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.¹

64. Displaying in this way many feats and exploits, Śrī Kṛṣṇa, enjoyed worldly pleasures as well as worshipped the

---

1. Here VJ’s Text adds:

63.1. Śrī Kṛṣṇa re-entered the sacrificial hall which was filled to its capacity with family priests, Brāhmaṇas and sacrificial priests, and eminent Kṣatriyas.

63.2. With the approval of the Brāhmaṇas, he went through the expiatory rites prescribed for moving out of the sacrificial precincts during the consecration period.

63.3 O excellent Kuru! After completing the sacrifice according to Śāstric procedure, he satisfied the Brāhmaṇas granting all their desired objects. He worshipped the sacrificial priests and other sages.

63.4. Having performed the concluding bath (auabhṛtha majjaṇa) in the great river Yamunā, the excellent member of the Yadu race passed his time happily in the company of great sages.

(Here ends the hundredth chapter in VJ’s text)
Supreme Deity by performing great sacrifices on an exceedingly superior scale.

65. The glorious Lord was himself endowed with overflowing affluence, power, etc. just as god Indra showers down water profusely in the proper (i.e. the rainy) season, he also in due time incessantly bestowed all the desired-objects on his subjects, Brāhmaṇas and others.

66. He personally slew a number of unrighteous Kings and eliminated the remaining irreligious ones through Arjuna and others. He easily enforced abidance by the righteous path (and thus re-established dharma) all over the world through Yudhiṣṭhira and other virtuous Kings.

CHAPTER NINETY

The Song of Queens : Resume of Kṛṣṇa’s Sports.

1-2. The Lord of the goddess Śrī (i.e. Śrī Kṛṣṇa) lived in great comfort and happiness in his capital city of Dvārakā. It was richly endowed with all types of affluence and prosperity. It was peopled with leaders of the Vṛṣṇi clan and by their women who were always dressed in immaculate, gorgeous garments. They were sparkling with the radiance of blooming youth. While they played with balls, etc. in their mansions, they appeared like flashes of lightning.

3. On the roads and streets, there was a heavy traffic—the highways being crowded with young elephants exuding ichor, well-adorned soldiers, richly caparisoned horses, chariots resplendent with burnished gold plates.

4. It was richly surrounded with parks and pleasure gardens beautified with rows of blossoming trees which were resounded with the musical notes and warblings of birds and humming bees.

5. Lord Kṛṣṇa who was the sole beloved consort of sixteen thousand queens, assumed as many various attractive forms as he had queens and severally sported with them in their separate resplendent palaces of surpassing affluence.

6. The swimming pool in each of these mansions was full of crystal clear water scented with the pollen of full blown lotuses of various kinds such as Kalhāra, Kumuda and was loud with the warbling of birds.

7. Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of prosperity, entered the waters of those (swimming) tanks and sported freely. His bosom (lit. body) was smeared with the saffron paste applied on the breasts of his queens as they embraced him (during the water-sports).

8. His glory was then sung by Gandharvas and Śūtas; Māgadhas and Bandins were gleefully playing upon musical instruments like mṛdaṅga, kettle-drums, tom-toms and lutes.

9. Śrī Kṛṣṇa was being drenched with jets of waters discharged through syringes by his consorts who were laughing all the while. He, in return, profusely sprinkled water on them and thus he sported with his spouses like Kubera, King of Yakṣas, playing with Yakṣa women.

10. Their thighs and breasts became prominent to view through their wet Saris (garments). While they were sprinkling water on Kṛṣṇa, they advanced to him on the pretext of snatching away the syringe from him and embraced him. Due to a thrill of passionate desire (at the touch of Kṛṣṇa’s person) their countenances beamed with great pleasure and they appeared brilliant and beautiful.

11. Śrī Kṛṣṇa got his garland (Vanamālā) tinged with saffron from the breasts of his consorts (while they embraced him). The knot of his locks of hair was loosened (during that amorous sport). Sprinkling and being sprinkled with water by his youthful wives, he sported with them like a king-elephant surrounded by she-elephants (spouting jets of water on him).

12. (At the end of the water-sport) Śrī Kṛṣṇa and his spouses gave (as gifts) their clothes and ornaments to the male and female dancers and those who lived by the profession of vocal and instrumental music.

13. While Śrī Kṛṣṇa was sporting thus, his (graceful) gait, (sweet) talk, (amorous) glances and (winning) smiles as well as his jokes, dalliances and embraces enchanted (and carried away) the hearts (of his queens).
14. So sang the queens of Kṛṣṇa as they being absorbed in him, remained speechless. While they were intensely thinking of the lotus-eyed Lord, they, sometimes, behaved like dullard and sometimes like a lunatic, uttered the following verses. Please listen.

The queens said:

15. "O she-osprey! Lord Kṛṣṇa has covered his ever wakeful consciousness and has gone to sleep at night. Why don’t you sleep? Why have you lost your sleep and are wailing? O friend, has your heart too been pierced deeply by the noble sportive glances of the Lotus-eyed Lord, like us?

16. O Cakravāki (Red goose), at night you close your eyes but alas! you continuously lament so piteously! Is it because you cannot see your mate? Or are you a female slave like us of the Lord and desire to wear on your braids of hair the garland that rolls on (and is touched by) the feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa.

17. O ocean, why is it that you roar and thunder incessantly and do not get any sleep at all? Is it because you have been deprived of your beautifying ornaments like the gem Kaustubha and others! you have been reduced to our irrecoverable stage (who are deprived of our beautiful painting on our breasts, etc. by contact with Śrī Kṛṣṇa at the time of amorous sports).

18. O moon, you have grown emaciated as you are a victim to the incurable disease of consumption. Hence, you are incapable of dispelling darkness with your rays. Is it due to your loss of memory, like us about the sweet secret talks indulged in by Lord Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa) that you have lost your power of expression? At least you look like that to us. (We think it that way).

19. O Southern wind from mountain Malaya, what act unpleasant to you has been committed by us that you provoke the passion of love in our heart which is already torn and tattered by the side-glances of Śrī Kṛṣṇa?

20. O beautiful cloud, (due to your similarity to Kṛṣṇa in complexion and his quality of removing the sufferings of the miserable—by showering your grace in the form of water) you are really a beloved friend of the Lord of Vādavas (Śrī Kṛṣṇa) who is adorned with Śrīvatsa. Hence you, being attached to him with bonds of love like us, are lost in his meditation. Your heart too must be agitated with keen anxiety and is excessively anguished for him. You are, therefore, constantly remembering him and shedding profuse tears like us. Contact with Śrī Kṛṣṇa is really very painful.

21. O Cuckoo, blest with sweet notes! Your melodious cooing is so sweet like nectar that it will infuse life into the dead. You imitate the sweet voice and utterances of our beloved Lord. Please tell me what pleasant services, I may do to you to-day.

22. O generous-hearted mountain, you are the supporter of the earth. You neither move nor speak anything. It appears that you are deeply absorbed in thinking about some great object (or project). Do you long to place the lotus-feet of the delight of Vasudeva (Śrī Kṛṣṇa) on your breasts (Breast-like peaks) as we pine to do?

23. O rivers! O ye wives of the sea! (This being the summer) at present, your deep beds and pools are dried up; you have grown emaciated. Lotuses no longer beautify you. Just as we, being deprived of the amorous glances of our beloved consort, the Lord of Mathura, are robbed of our hearts and have become extremely lean and thin, you are denied the love-laden glances of your Lord in the form of rain showers (and are reduced to this plight).

24. (By chance there arrived a swan. Regarding it to be an emissary of Kṛṣṇa, one of the queens addressed it). Welcome, O dear Swan! Be seated. Have some milk to drink. Tell us some news about Śrī Kṛṣṇa the descendant of Śūra. We look upon you as a messenger (between us and Śrī Kṛṣṇa). Is the invincible Lord hale and hearty? Does he of fickle friendship remember what he confided and professed to us in our privacy? (If you say that he has deputed you as he remembers us) O insignificant emissary (who come from a faithless lover) why should we resort to him? (If he invites us to make friends as you say) convey our message when Śrī (the goddess Lakṣmī) who cheating us all, monopolised his company is not with him. If he says, “How is it possible that she who is exclusively devoted to him can be avoided”, ask him “Among all women is Śrī the only woman who is devoted to him? Are we not so?”

25. It is by virtue of such deep constancy and devotion to Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the masters of Yoga that the consorts of Kṛṣṇa attained to the Supreme State of Mokṣa.

26. Kṛṣṇa’s great glory is widely sung in exquisite poetry and songs. Even if (Kṛṣṇa’s sports celebrated in songs are) heard, they irresistibly attract the minds of women. What need be said of those who had the privilege of seeing him directly?

27. How is it possible to evaluate the greatness of those women who had the privilege to regard the Preceptor of the world as their husband and render him loving service by shampooing (pressing) his feet (and such other personal attention).

28. The Lord who was the asylum of the righteous and saintly people, himself followed the religious injunctions prescribed in the Veda and demonstrated (to the world) again and again that the objectives of human life, viz. religion (righteousness), wealth, enjoyment of worldly pleasures can be secured even in the householder’s stage of life.

1. Vṛṣṇi’s Text Adds:

28.1-2. When Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the wielder of the Sudarśana discus was ruling over the world, the city of Dwārakā, the abode of the Vṛṣṇis, which was twelve yojanas in length, was densely peopled by Sages, Brāhmaṇas, Kṣattriyas, bards and was all the while (permanently) decorated (due to the festivals carried on there all the year round).

28.3-6. (In order to see Lord Kṛṣṇa) Sages of tranquil minds and always engaged in observing religious vows, used to come from sacred places like Pīṇḍāraka, Kurukṣetra, Śaṅgrāma, Puṣkara, Vārāṇasi, Prayāga, Venkata (Tirupati), Śrī-Puratan, from far off places like Gokarna and beautiful Candra-tirtha (the source of the Kāveri from Brahmagiri in

2. Near Golagar in Gujarat, sixteen miles to the east of Dwārakā. It was at this place that sages cursed Samba that he would give birth to a Pestle (Musala) which will destroy the Yādavas—vide infra 11.1.

3. Śrī sāla in Karimnagar district of Andhra Pradesh. It has a temple of Mallikārjuna, one of the twelve jyotirlingas of god Śiva. Nāgārjuna, the famous Buddhist philosopher, founder of Madhyamika School, lived here.
29. Śrīkṛṣṇa who practised supremely ideal righteous way of life of a house-holder, had sixteen thousand and one hundred queens.

30. Of those jewels of women, eight queens of whom Rukmini was the foremost and (the names of) their sons have been already detailed to you in order of seniority, O king!

31. Each of the (Sixteen thousand and one hundred) queens had ten sons from Kṛṣṇa. It means he had ten sons born from each queen. For the Lord's course was never futile (VT. clarifies that no sexual contact of Kṛṣṇa was unfruitful).

Coorg.) from Sahyādri, Bhogukṣetra (Broach), Kumāra-hill¹, from the banks of the holy Godāvari, from the Narmadā, from Śūrpāraka (Sopara, Thana Dist. Maharashtra), Prabhāsa, the holy Badarikāśrama from the holy Naimisāranya and the inaccessible Brahmadvarga².

28.7. The sages were of different categories (observing different types of vows): Some subsisted on water, some on mere air; some abstained from food altogether but all of them were firm in the observance of vows, some were clad in bark garments and deer-skin, some grew matted hair, while others had clean-shaven heads.

28.8. Some bathed thrice a day, some strictly observed the vow of silence, some were engaged in the study of the Vedas, while others in reciting praises and hymns to gods.

28.9. Some devoted their minds to contemplation, some determined on meditative trance. Some had only skin and bones in their persons, a bundle of veins and arterics.

28.10. O king Parikṣit! These serene-minded sages came from all directions. These meditators on Reality always waited upon Lord Kṛṣṇa, O emperor.

28.11-12. The city of Dvārakā was resounded with the sounds of Kṣattriyas of mighty prowess and of Brāhmaṇas whom penance was the wealth, of Śūtas and Māgadhas who were devoted to singing the glories (of the Lord) and by the auspicious sounding (playing) of musical instruments and by the loud recitation of the Vedas (by Brāhmaṇas).

28.13. By virtue of the presence of the God of gods, Dvārakā became the most prominent of all sacred places and foremost among all holy places of (sacred waters) which wash off sins.

¹. Probably Kraṇḍacagiri, a hill at a distance of one mile from Tiruttani station of the Southern Railway. There is a temple of Kumāra or Kārttika-svāmin on the hill, GAMI, P. 107.

2. Probably the Brahmagiri hill near Tryambakeshwar Nasik District Maharashtra. The other claimant for this name is the hill in Coorg, the Source of the Kāveri. VJ is silent about the identification.
32. Although all those sons were of mighty Prowess, eighteen out of them were great “chariot-warriors” who achieved noble renown. Listen to their names:

33-34. (They are as follows) “Pradyumna, Aniruddha, (Cārudeśa) Dīptimān, Bhānu, Sāmba, Madhu, Bṛhad-bhānu Citra-bhānu, Vṛka, Aruṇa, Puśkara, Vedabahu, Śrutasdeva Sunandana, Citra-bāhu, Virūpa, Kavi and Nyagrodha.

VR’s Text adds:

34.1. Trivakra’s son Upakrhoa was exclusively devoted to Kṛṣṇa. He was a direct disciple of Nārada. He adopted the vow of life-long celibacy.

34.2. The Sāttvata Tantra was composed by him. It has laid down Vaiṣṇavite purificatory rites for women, Śūdras and slaves (after which they are admitted to Vaiṣṇavism). By studying the Tantra, one attains Liberation from Samśāra.

35. Out of these sons of Kṛṣṇa (the enemy of Madhu), O Indra among kings, Pradyumna, the son of Rukmiṇī was the first and he was just like his father in all respects.

36. That great (chariot) warrior married the daughter of Rukmi. He begat by her (a son named) Aniruddha who possessed the might of ten thousand elephants.

37. Aniruddha, himself a grandson of Rukmi through his daughter, married the grand-daughter of Rukmi (through his son). Vajra was born of her and only he survived the destruction from the pestle (in the civil war among the Yādavas).

38. The name of Vajra’s son was Pratibahu whose son was Subāhu. From Subāhu was born Śāntasena and he begat a son called Śatasena.

39. No king born in this family (of Śrī Kṛṣṇa) was destitute of wealth or less prolific in progeny or short-lived or weak or inimical to Brāhmaṇas.

40. Even within the period of tens of thousand of years it is not possible to enumerate all those born in Yadu’s family who became famous for their great deeds.

41. It is heard (by tradition) that there were three crores eighty eight hundred teachers for the children of Yadu’s family.
42. Who can enumerate the number of the noble-souled Yādavas? King Ugrasena was attended upon by billions of warriors (lit. ten thousand times ten thousand lakhs) of sons.

43. Those very wicked demons who were killed in the wars between gods and demons, were born again as human beings. They became arrogant and troubled the people.

44. For their chastisement and control, gods were commanded by Hari and they descended in the race of Yadu. There were one hundred and one families of Yādavas.

45. The glorious Lord Hari was the guide and controller of all the Yādavas. All the Yādavas who obeyed his command and followed him prospered in every respect.

46*. The Vṛṣṇis dedicated their minds to Śri Kṛṣṇa so completely that they were not conscious of their own self while doing bodily actions like sleeping, sitting, wandering, speaking, playing, bathing and other (acts of daily routine).

Additional verses in VJ's text.

46A. With the sacrificial material produced by his Yoga-māyā, he performed sacrifices for twelve years at Kurukṣetra and thereby worshipped the Supreme Soul (which was identical with his self), the main substance or gist of all the Vedas.

46B. He was consecrated for sacrifice by Kṛṣṇa-dvaipāyana (Vyāsa), Viśvāmitra, Asita, Sāndipani and Paraśurāma as the preceptors. The Lord of meritorious renown, his elder brother of pious reputation were worshipped by Uddhava.

47. (That Śri Kṛṣṇa’s renown is the holiest of all the holy places and Lord Kṛṣṇa is the best and most prominent of all gods is not wonderful). O King Parīkṣit, when the holy Lord (the holiest of the holy) incarnated in the family of Yadus, it made the holy water of the heavenly Ganga that issues from the water (used for) washing his feet, inferior in holiness to his hallowing renown. (He is so great that) both who hated him or were affectionate to him attained to the same state of being similar to him. Goddess Lakṣmī for whose favour gods and others are striving, has devoutly dedicated herself to him exclusively. His name whether heard or uttered (even once) dispels everything inauspicious. By him were taught the duties to every gotra. He wields in his hand the discus (Sudarśana) which symbolises the Time-spirit (which destroys all). Hence, it is not wonderful that he lightens the burden of the earth.

46* VR : VJ : Though they associated with Śri Kṛṣṇa in activities such as sleeping, sitting, etc. with him, they did not realize that he was Lord Viṣṇu himself but thought him to be a prominent Yādava.

48. Victorious is Lord Kṛṣṇa who is the sole refuge of all people (and abides in each of them as their indwelling soul). (As a matter of fact, he is eternal and birthless). That he incarnated himself from Devakī is a matter of (ignorant) talk only. Though he is attended upon by prominent Yādava warriors it is with (the might of) his arms that he annihilated all unrighteousness. He completely destroys the sins of all—the mobile and immobile (e.g. grass, creepers, trees and other beings. With his resplendently beautiful countenance and winning smiles, he enhances love in the women of Vṣraja and the cities (and makes them attain to Mokṣa by subduing carnal love.

48. A VJ’s Text adds:

A man should continuously meditate upon Lord Hari, the Supreme Soul, who is the creator, sustainer and the destroyer of the universe; who after creating the universe entered into it (as the Antaryāmin-indwelling soul), who assumed the form of a sage (Vyāsa) and composed this compilation of Purāṇas; having attained to him Śiva gets rid of the bonds of Prakṛti and like a bird in sleep, becomes free from the attachment to his body and property and remains in a state of blissful conscious existence, with no fear of returning to birth or Samsāra.

49. He who is desirous of developing devotion to the (lotus) feet of Śrī Kṛṣṇa should listen to the stories of the sportive deeds of the Supreme Lord—the Lord who is trans-

1. VJ’s Text reads differently from this onwards:
With his arms and lotus-feet set on the earth for lightening the burden of the earth. His personality is the abode of Lakṣmī. By his charming looks and smiling glances, he appeared like the God of Love to them.
cendental to Prakṛti and who for the vindication of the path of righteousness ordained by himself, has assumed different sportive forms (such as the Fish, the Tortoise and others) and performed (miraculous) sportful arts suitable to that form and capable of destroying all Karmas.

50. By attentively listening to, reciting and constantly meditating on the glorious stories of Lord Mukunda, a man attains to his region which is beyond the jurisdiction of the god of Death (or the Time-spirit) of irresistible force and for the sake of attaining which even the rulers of the earth renounced their (comfortable) house-holder’s life (and their kingdoms) and betook themselves to the forest (and performed penance).

VJ’s Text adds:

50A. He who devoutly and with faith listens to or narrates to others, the life and deeds of Lord Kṛṣṇa (as glorified by Śuka, the son of Vyāsa) of immortal and blissful glory which completely destroy the sin of the world and are a beautiful ornament to the ears of His devotees, can concentrate his mind on the glorious Lord and ultimately attain to his blissful region where there is no fear from any quarter.
X SKANDHA—APPENDIX

(Additional Chapters in VJ’s Text Ch. No. 50 in VJ’s Text)

CHAPTER FIFTY—I.5

Jarāsandha’s Second Expedition

Sri Śuka said.

1-4. The mighty king Jarāsandha, the son of Bṛhadratha, who was day and night remembering andsmarting under the previous discomfort (by Lord Kṛṣṇa), invited all the allied princes in the third month (after the defeat) and inspired them to make preparations of war—with the allied forces of the kings of Matsya (mod. Alwar and parts of former states of Jaipur and Bharatpur)*, Mālava, of Cedi (Bundelkhand and adjacent part of Madhya Pradesh), Kuru, Pāñcāla (Rohilkhand but formerly the country from the foothills of the Himālayas upto the Chambal), Kerala, Kulinda (Garhwal and a part of Saharanpur district), Kuntala (Southern Mahara-shtra), Avanti (country round Ujjain), Kāśi, Gandhāra (former districts of Peshawar and Rawalpindi and Eusofzai country—now in Pakistan), Sṛṇijaya, Kaliṅga (Major part of Orissa esp. the South of it). Kekaya (country between the Bias and the Sutlej), Andhra, Daśārṇa (Eastern Malva and Bhopal District), Vang (Western Bengal), Sindhu (lower part of Sindh), Madra (country between the Ravi and the Chinab), Trigartta (Jalandhar and a part of Lahore district), Sauvīra (upper Sindh and southern Punjab) and the warriors from the mountains—all making up an army of twenty-three Akṣauhausti.

5. Accompanied by this army, he crossed the country of Magadha and proceeded towards the West (to Mathura). He, as it were, was dragging with him all the kings with their divisions of the elephants, cavalry, chariots and infantry.

* The identifications of the territories with their modern counterparts is as per N.L. De's GDAMI.
6. Having come to besiege Mathurā, he camped on the bank of the Yamunā, surrounded with the tents of a number of kings and camp followers.

7-8. He entertained himself listening to the eulogies sung by the bards such as Śūtas, Māgadhas and bards and rested. Hearing of the great preparations of war by the mighty king of Magadhas, Kṛṣṇa convened a conference and planned with Balarāma, Vasudeva, Uddhava, Akrūra, Śaineya, Āhuka and Sāraṇa.

9. Having properly planned the strategy at night in consultation with these, he summoned the best of his warriors at dawn before the sunrise.

10. The Lord of incomprehensible nature, divided his army consisting of the four divisions—elephants, horsemen, charioteers and foot-soldiers—in three detachments. Kṛṣṇa deployed these against the army of Jarāsandha, the king of Magadhas as follows:

11. Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of demon Madhu sent Balarāma, Hārdikya, Gada and Sāraṇa by the left side.

12. He sent by the right side Sātyaki, Vipṛthu, Prthu and Uddhava along with the army.

13. The Lotus-eyed Lord accompanied by some charioteers, himself entered the vast army of the king of Magadha directly from the front.

14. The army (of Jarāsandha) mixed up of numerous elephants, horses, chariots and foot-soldiers at random was unsuspectingly asleep on the bank of the Yamunā and was enjoying itself happily.

15-16. While the sun was rising on the eastern mountain and the darkness (of night) was being dispelled, and birds were warbling in their nests everywhere, and lotuses were blooming and swarms of bees were sweetly humming, Kṛṣṇa entered the terrible, invincible army of the king of Magadhas.

17. At that time, the horses (of the enemies) were unsaddled and tethered in a line here and there; and at that time the elephants had no armour on their backs, O King!

18. The soldiers had not taken up their arms and even their hair were not tied. They had not put on their usual coats of mail, and were not riding their horses or vehicles.
19. The chariots were not yoked with horses and the flags were not raised (showing their unpreparedness). At this time, Kṛṣṇa wearing a yellow garment made his way into the army of the Magadhan king.

20. Seeing an army attacking them on three sides, all the kings became confused and were not able to know what to do.

21. Some warriors rallied together, while others fled away out of fear. Some soldiers took up their arms and counter-attacked the enemies (Yādavas) in the battle.

22. Some soldiers had their armours shattered while others had their legs, thighs and arms cut off. Some with their eyes grown red with anger attacked the enemies (the Yādavas).

23. Some soldiers of great valour rode the unsaddled horses and crushing the enemies in the battle, earned a bright, unblemished glory for themselves.

24. Kings suddenly roused from their sleep found the destruction of their army. Some of them put up a fight even without weapons essential for fighting.

25. Some deserted their camps and entered into deep forest. Some approached Jarāsandha, King of Magadhas and hailed, “Be successful in the battle.”

26. Govinda entering the inimical forces single-handed in his chariot, killed a number of warriors who put up a fight with their weapons.

27. The mighty Balarāma also surrounded by a big detachment entered the Magadha army by the left side and routed the Magadhan forces.

28. The mighty armed Śaineśa also attacked with his big army consisting of elephants, cavalry, chariots and infantry, by the right side and gave the enemy sound drubbing.

29. In this way, the army under the leadership and protection of the king of Magadhas was beaten on all sides, and being terrified, took to their heels in all the directions in a moment.

30. Sātyaki of the Vṛṣṇi clan pursued the army upto five yojanas and destroying the Magadhan force, he returned from the battle a victor.
31. Kṛṣṇa forcibly caught a number of elephants big like hills along with their accoutrement, tomaras, goads, etc. He collected as spoil chariots along with the weapons, flags and horses yoked to them and carried them to Mathura.

32. In that battle, Kṛṣṇa got as spoils innumerable umbrellas inlaid with gold jewels, numberless chowries, crowns, belts, gold armlets, earings and valuable clothes.

33. As per instructions of Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of Kaṁsa, Balarāma, the wielder of the plough as a weapon, brought a vast amount of spoil such as Jarāsandha’s treasury, the vehicles, subjects, women of Jarasandha’s harem, weapons and ornaments. He presented the wealth collected in the battle to Ugrasena, the king of Yudus.

CHAPTER FIFTY—II

Ch: 50 in Vj’s Text

The Third Siege of Mathura: Jarāsandha’s defeat

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Jarāsandha who boasted himself as a leader in battle was defeated by Kṛṣṇa, the destroyer of Madhu. He then proceeded to Śoṇitapura¹ to see Bāṇa, the son of Bali (for help).

2-5. Hearing that his friend defeated in the battle by Kṛṣṇa was coming with his circle of allied kings, Bāṇa of one thousand arms, the ruler of Dānavas went forward to meet and receive him with well-adorned elephants, caparisoned horses, chariots of various shapes, warriors, bevies of courtesans, bands of bards like Sūta, Magadhas and bards with flags and banners, umbrellas, auspicious trumpets and drums beating, with gold buntings or festoons, multicoloured lamps, pitchers and mirrors. They were extremely close friends and mutual sympathisers.

¹ Assamese claim Tejapur as ancient Śoṇitapura, but from Harivarhā (ch. 174) it seems that the ancient Śoṇitapura is situated in Kumaun on the bank of the Kedār-Gaṅgā at a short distance from Gupta Kāśī—GDAMI p. 189.

6. Both of them, solicitous as they were of mutual interests, paid respects to each other. Addressing Bāṇa, in the royal assembly, Jarāsandha spoke:

7. "Be pleased to note this, O king of Dānavas! I was taken in (in a dastardly surprise attack) at night by the wicked-minded cowherd (Krṣṇa) of unrighteous behaviour and robber-like bravado-ness.

8. Many mighty rut-exuding (youthful) elephants and horses, and a number of chariots along with all the equipments and arms there-in were plundered by him.

9. These princely allies of mine did not tolerate (the idea of) my engaging him in a single-handed duel. I was prevented from doing so by these kings who participate in my joys and sorrows, victory and defeat.

10. I have now come here for your majesty's audience. O Lord (of Dānavas)! Be pleased to render (some military) assistance (to us)." When addressed thus (and being acquainted with Jarāsandha's plight) Bāṇa, the son of Bali, took him (and his allies) to his own capital (Śoṇitapura).

11. He immediately arranged for the reception of the assembly of princely allies with a high feast, bath, beds, perfumes, and leaves of piper-betel (together with areca-nuts, catechu) for chewing after meals.

12-13. He honoured all the royal personages with presents. When Jarāsandha, the foster-son of Jarā, had enjoyed the reception, taken rest and seen the curiosities worth-seeing (in Bāṇa's Capital and comfortably occupied a golden seat after duly decorating himself (with princely ornaments), the king of Dānavas respectfully addressed the assembly of kings.

Bāṇa said:

14. O Jarāsandha! Please do understand it. No empty promise is uttered by me. These elephants, these horses, this kingdom, all these subjects and whatever else is in my possession is absolutely at your disposal.
Sri Śuka said:

15. Having promised thus, Bāṇa, the son of Bali, gave to the king of Magadha sixty thousand elephants, hundred thousands of chariots and one million horses swift in speed like the wind and the mind.

16. Bāṇa, the son of Bali, further gave him a contingent of three hundred Dānavas wellknown for their expertise in use of black magic in warfare, equal (in competence and military skill) to himself.

17. He also supplied him with innumerable palanquins of various types, umbrellas, chowries, ornaments, dress (clothes) as well as treasures (or utensils), beds, seats and such other requisites, O King.

18. Bāṇa ordered his ministers Kumbhāṇḍa and Kūpakarna, the best ones among the Daityas, to help Jarāsandha, O scion of the Kuru race.

19. What a great difference is between Lord Hari who is strong enough to annihilate the combined forces of all gods and Asuras in the world and the poor two ministers of Bāṇa, Kumbhāṇḍa and Kūpakarna? (There cannot be any comparison at all).

20. Not comprehending the (Supreme) power of Viṣṇu, the kings being destined to meet death and encouraged (and instigated) by the king of Magadha, again made war-preparations against Yadus.

21. Taking leave of Bāṇa, the king of Magadha set out of Šoṅitapura. Accompanied with many kings and with four wings (viz. elephant-corps, cavalry, chariot-division and infantry) under his command, he reached Mathura in the course of some days.

22. He besieged that city of high towers, balconies, ornamental arches, wells, gardens and parks and massive fortification and blockaded its gates.

23. He tried to demolish the walls of the city with innumerable spearlike (pointed) rods, axes, pickaxes, clubs and stones hurled with catapults.

24. As the fortification of the city was being knocked down, Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, enraged at the report of the return of Jarāsandha, the king of Magadhas, caused the beating of the war-drums (to alert all people summoning them to fight).

25-26. With Sātyaki, Kṛṣṇa-varman, Ugrasena, Gada, Āhuka and Vasudeva at the vanguard and accompanied by well-armed and fully provided armies of chariots, cavalry, elephant-corps and foot-soldiers, the two heroes of immense might and with perfectly undisturbed minds, rushed out like two ferocious lions.

27. Getting out of Mathura, the lotus-eyed Kṛṣṇa loudly blew out his big conch Pāñcajanya terrorising the enemies at heart (by its blast).

28-29. Thereupon broke out the fight between Yadus and Kṣatriyas. The Dānava ministers of Bāṇa, Kumbhāṇḍaka and Kūpakarna who were expert in the military use of black magic and possessed of great prowess, and accompanied with their Daitya army, fought with Vṛṣṇis with illusory tactics of warfare.

30. Perceiving that his army was suffering through the illusory magical method of fighting, he dispelled all the illusion within a wink of the eye by “Knowledge-missile”. He then directed Sātyaki and Kṛtavarman, both of whom were eagerly desirous of fighting, and said:

31. “As both of you have an ardent desire for fighting, you give an extremely terrible fight with those two Daityas who are haughty and extremely desirous for fighting. Thus ordered, those two extremely powerful warriors immediately engaged in the bitterest fight, O King.

32. It is not at all a miracle how Lord Kṛṣṇa with one bow in the hand, single-handedly engaged a hundred Kṣattriyas in a battle, for Hari is verily the (Indwelling) Soul of all, O king.

33. Some elephants fell down dead with their trunks lopped off, and a large number of horses with their necks cut off lay down dead, O King.

34. The earth was scattered over with disjointed chariots shattered to pieces.

35. Soldiers with their bodies besmeared with blood and with their feet (legs), thighs and arms hacked down, fell like Kintūka trees full of blossoms (red flowers) lying uprooted with its main roots cut.

36-37. Volleys of arrows with feathers of kites and peacocks at the butts, polished with oil and well-knit by knots, with golden feathers and pointed arrow-heads were seen discharged from the Śārṅga bow, ten on each soldier, a hundred on every horse, a thousand at every chariot and ten thousand on each of the elephants of the hostile army. That was a tremendously awful miracle to see.

38. Finding his army of fourfold divisions (infantry, cavalry, the chariot-corps and elephants) being soundly drubbed that way, Jarāsandha, the king of Magadha, driving in his chariot with the ensign bearing the emblem of a horse, attacked Balarāma,

39. Recollecting his previous enmity (due to his defeat by Balarāma), Jarāsandha was enraged at the sight of Balārma’s great chariot with gold-plated yoke and palmyra ensign and dashed at him with a mace (gaddā) in his hand and spoke (challenging him) as follows:

40. “Quickly take up your pestle (-like club) with which you desire to vanquish and conquer the enemies in the battle. Hurry up and demonstrate to me the power of your arms, before I strike you down with my mace.

41. Challenged in this way by the king of Magadhas, Balarāma, with his eyes fired with rage, grasped his terrible pestle brilliant like lightning, just as Yama, the son of the Sun-god, takes up his rod at the end of the world.

42. Brandishing in a circle the pestle for one thousand times, Balarāma, the wielder of the plough as his weapon, quickly discharged that pestle exuding fumes of fire and capable of subduing the pride of the enemies, and roared like a lion, O King!

43. Jarāsandha along with the horses, charioteer and chariot, became agitated by the pestle hurled by Balarāma’s arm and found himself cheated in underestimating (Balarāma’s strength).

44. Thereupon wielding his mace hard as iron and big like a hill-top, Jarāsandha, making the earth quake under his pace, rushed at Balarāma.
45. Balarâma, the son of Rohiṇī, perceived him rushing at him without a chariot. He too left his chariot on the battle-field and dashed at him on foot.

46. As all beings were witnessing it, Māgadha (Jarāsandha) overwhelmed with wrath, brandished his heavy mace made of hard iron, and attacking Balarâma, struck him down with the mace and roared.

47. Perceiving the on-coming mace hard as a rock striking against his chest, Balarâma caught hold of it by his left hand, O scion of the Kuru race!

48. Hurling aside the mace, he hit a blow with his fist Jarāsandha on his chest. The mighty son of Rohiṇī caught the powerful Jarāsandha in his arms.

49. Entwining between his legs the stomach of Jarāsandha, he held his neck under his arm-pit, whereupon both of them rolled on the ground.

50. While they were falling, Balarâma was on Jarāsandha O King. But within a moment, Jarāsandha of immense power brought him under him.

51. Both of the heroes, with their eyes red with anger, stood up and again caught hold of each other like two terrific elephants maddened with excuding ichor.

52. Those extremely enraged ferocious warriors intent on killing each other, dashed their chests against each other, and tried to drag (each other on the battle field).

53. Thus dragging each other in an area of ten thousand bows, they reduced to powder the trees and rocks that were in the vicinity, O King!

54. Jarāsandha the highly proud hero, disengaged himself and picked up his mace. Even the most powerful Balarâma of incomprehensible nature, stood up and taking his pestle in a moment began to strike him with it.

55. In that combat Balarâma struck Jarāsandha with his pestle, on his head, in between his chest and shoulders, on the shoulders, arms, navel thighs, knees, stomach and chest, many times.

56. The proud Magadha king hit hard Balarâma on the chest, neck, mouth, forehead, chin, shoulder, navel, hips as well as his sides simultaneously.
57. While Balarāma and Jarāsandha were striking down each other in the combat, the kings became nervous about fighting and were extremely troubled.

58. Thinking that the king of Magadhas was approaching death, they gradually lost their heart and became less inclined to fight.

59. Extremely powerful Sātyaki who was fighting Kumbhāṇḍa was pierced with three arrows by the minister of Bāṇa, in the battle.

60. The mighty-armed Sātyaki, being extremely hurt, heaved heavy breaths like an angry serpent. In order to kill Kumbhāṇḍa in the fight, he took five iron arrows.

61. Then a great uproar arose in the army of the Daitya minister, when Sātyaki of powerful arms, pulled the string to his ears and hit Kumbhāṇḍa, the minister of Bāṇa, in his navel, throat, forehead, chest and crown, O tiger in the Kuru race.

62-63. Thus pierced with the arrows, Kumbhāṇḍa fell down unconscious on his seat in the chariot. Seeing that he had lost his consciousness, the charioteer, grieved at heart, immediately carried him away from the battle in his chariot, O prominent Bharata!

64. Perceiving that Kumbhāṇḍa had left and was in the peril of life, Kūpakaṇa, the demon whom Kṛtavarmā engaged, left Kṛtavarmā and departed from the battle-field.

65. Both the demons left the battle-field without taking leave of the king of Magadhas, even though they were not relieved by him. Accompanied by their remaining army, both the daityas returned to Śoṇitapura by the same way they came.

CHAPTER FIFTY-III

(Ch. 52 in VJ’s text) ; Conquest of Kārvirapura)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Finding that the army of Bāṇa had deserted them and they themselves were extremely troubled by the volleys of weapons (from the Yādavas), the princes became dispirited, O excellent king!

2. Seeing that the dānava army had already departed, and the hostile princes were exhausted, and Kṛṣṇa was fighting on, Balarāma felt that his strength had increased.

3. In that combat, he caught hold of the lock of hair on Jarāsandha’s head by his left hand and wanted to strike him on his head with his pestle.

4. At that moment, Balarāma heard a clear distinct incorporeal voice, loud like thundering clouds in the sky: “O Balarāma, Jarāsandha is not to be killed by you. Happily return from the battle.”

5. Hearing that voice from the heaven, the mighty Balarāma left him and riding his chariot returned from the battle-field, praised highly by multitudes of Brāhmaṇa sages, Siddhas, bards and songsters.

6. Now Jarāsandha, the foster son of Jarā, hanging down his head and accompanied by kings who were defeated in the battle and surrounded with a small force that was left after being killed in the battle, retired from the fight and proceeded to his capital.

Śrī Śuka said:

7. Lord Kṛṣṇa of great splendour, covered the inimical forces with volleys of arrows and put to flight those kings, killing a majority of them in the battle.

8. He was followed by songsters and bards like Śūta, Māgadha and Bandins who were highly pleased with him, and were singing of his glory and by highly learned Brāhmaṇas who were loudly singing his panegyric.

9-12. Followed by these, the glorious Lord entered the city of Mathurā which was populated with citizens who were delighted and happy—a city with high walls of fortifications and lofty arched gates, decorated with flowing banners and with lighted lamps. As he entered by the royal road, he shone beautiful, showered over with flowers and with fried grains with folded palms by ladies occupying the tops of mansions. The citizens of Mathura who were eager to please them, presented to Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, the descendants of Madhu, highly precious presents, excellent garlands, of flowers and ointments. Kṛṣṇa the prominent one among Yādavas, in this way passed by the royal road.

13-15. Entering the spacious assembly hall and occupying the excellent seat, the hero Kṛṣṇa, along with Balarāma and intelligent Sātyaki, was honoured by Yadus and Brāhmaṇas like Indra by gods in the heaven. Holding consultations with the intelligent statesmen and noble-souled old Yadus such as Ugrasena, Uddhava, Akrūra (to mention the prominent ones) who were present there, Lord Kṛṣṇa was allowed to go with Balarāma as his companion and helpmate.

16. Being desirous of seeing Gomanta, the best of mountains, and the great fortress at its top, both of them set out in the morning from Mathura and proceeded to the South.

17. The glorious Lord Hari accompanied by Balarāma crossed the Yanunā and passed through many countries, mountains, rivers and hills.

18-20. While passing by the way, they saw on a raised part of a forest an extra-ordinarily distinguished sage sitting at the root of a tree. The sage had a mass of matted hair on his head. He was clad in bark garments and the hide of a deer and had a Kamandalu (a water pot of a gourd) by his side. He was glorious like the Sun in lustre. He subsisted on spiritual knowledge and bliss and was surrounded with hundreds of disciples. Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, the protectors of the world, were extremely glad to see him.

21. Both the heroes with due formality and alertness paid their respects to him. The glorious lord Kṛṣṇa spoke to the prominent sage as follows:

22. “I bow to you O Paraśurāma of the Bhārgava clan! O glorious son of Jamadagni who regard penance as wealth! We are known as Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa. Has our name ever reached your ears?”

23. Bhārgava who was thus addressed by Vāsudeva gazed at the two descendants of Madhu (just to probe their spiritual nature). The noble Paraśurāma with his eyes blooming with affection spoke as follows:

24. “Welcome to you the best one among the Yadus and to your noble-souled elder brother! I know that you are the supra-sensuous Lord who are born in the Yadu clan.

25. You are the primary cause of all the effects (created things). You are the ancient-most person in this Universe. Salutations to you, O lotus-eyed Kṛṣṇa, the sole cause of all the worlds.

26. For what purpose are both of you whom the universe pays respects, have arrived here?" When thus inquired by Paraśurāma, the son of Jamadagni, Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa spoke out.

27. "We desire to see Gomanta for the inaccessible fortress on its top, O powerful lord!" Hearing that, Paraśurāma, the son of Jamadagni, spoke to Kṛṣṇa.

28. "May it be so, O mighty-armed one! You may go with your elder brother to Gomanta. At the foot of that hill, there is the city of Karavīra protected by Śrgāla Vāsudeva, but he will not tolerate you (encroaching). After killing him in a battle, you can occupy the mount called Gomanta'.

30. Thus instructed by Paraśurāma, the son of Jamadagni, Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, the descendants of Madhu, took leave of the omniscient sage and proceeded to the southern direction. Both of them saw the mount Gomanta covered over with sky-scraping, big trees.

32. They also saw at its foot the city of Karavīra with high portals, ramparts varied in construction and wonderful mensions, palaces and towers.

33. Kṛṣṇa, the wielder of conch, discus and a mace loudly blew his conch. Hearing that blast of Kṛṣṇa's conch, Śrgāla Vāsudeva became overwhelmed with rage and taking with him his massive army of the infantry, the cavalry, the chariots and the elephant corps, he attacked Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, the delight of Yadus.

35. He as if completely covered those Mādhava brothers with a flood of (discharged) arrows. Seeing that formidable army, the two most prominent Yādava heroes fought with them on foot, in the battle, and made that army extremely agitated and troubled by volleys of arrows and threw it into confusion.
37. On seeing that, king Śṛgāla, full of rage, rushed against them both. Observing him approaching in his chariot with a bow in his hand, Lord Vāsudeva checked his progress just as the coast-line does to the flow-tide of the sea.

38. Both the mighty Vāsudevas who were extremely enraged fought with each other with the intention of finishing with the enemy.

39. As the fight proceeded that way, Lord Govinda in a moment cut off the head of Śṛgāla Vāsudeva along with its resplendent crown.

40. Seeing that their master was killed, the soldiers of his army who were still left alive, ran in all directions.

41. Thereupon, both Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa entered the big city of Karavira. Both of them were worshipped as their dear lords by Brāhmaṇas and merchants.

42. Under the guard of his soldiers, Kṛṣṇa arranged to send Śṛgāla Vāsudeva’s elephants, horses, chariots, soldiers, treasures and wealth.

CHAPTER FIFTY-IV

Kṛṣṇa Crowned : Jarāsandha’s Defeat

Śrī Sūka said:

1-4. Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa ascended the prominent mountain Gomanta which was covered with lofty trees and creepers. It was thickly overgrown with Sāla, Tāla (palmyra), and Tamāla trees and was beautified with Priyāla and Aśoka trees. It was enriched with Kadamba, Nimba (Neema), Hintāla, Pūga, Punnāga trees. It appeared beautiful with groves of plantain trees and was resonant with cooing of joy-

1. Most probably Kolhapur in the Bombay State. But if Gomanta is Goa, the distance between the two renders the suggestions doubtful, unless the fort of Panhāla is identified with the Gomanta hill.

2. Here ends C. 52 of VJ.’s Text.
ful cuckoos. The trees thereof were shaken a bit by the swarms of humming bees and jumping monkeys. It appeared beautiful with palm trees the branches of which were bending down with the burden of their fruits. It was watered with a number of cataracts. It abounded in crystal water and cool dense shadows. They saw and enjoyed that beautiful landscape.

5. On the mountain, they went up the peak called Pravarṣaṇa where clouds always sent forth their showers without break.

6. Ascending that peak, those two great Yadus surveyed all directions. Enjoying themselves they lived on the best of the mountain, to their hearts' content.

7-8* In the meanwhile, in the milky ocean the best among oceans which is the abode of the God of gods, Viṣṇu, the wielder of conch, discus and a mace, the glorious mighty-armed Bali, the son of Virocana who visited it, took away the crown of the God of gods which was studded with costly jewels.

9. The crown was wonderfully wrought in a thousand rich saffires (Indranila stones) and was studded with hundred of precious Gomeda stones. It was shining with rubies, big blue precious stones and pearls.

10. It was richly set with Pusparāga (a kind of precious stone) and corals. It was made of celestial gold. Having come to know that the diadem was taken away by the Dānava hero, Garuḍa, the king of birds, and the incharge protector of the city, instantly pursued him.

11. Overtaking the irresistible king of Dānavašas on the way and putting up a terrible fight with him, he vanquished the prominent demon.

12. Taking away from him the crown, a veritable heap of jewels, which was brilliant like the Sun, he (Garuḍa) on his way back saw lord Hari, the son of Devakī.

8*. It is hard to believe that the great king Bali who donated his kingdom of three worlds to Viṣṇu in the form of a dwarf (Vāmana) could be tempted to steal the crown of Lord Viṣṇu whose greatest devotee he was.
13. He was sitting along with his elder brother on the beautiful and the best of mountains known as Gomanta. He immediately placed on his head that heavenly ornament—Viṣṇu's crown. Bowing down to his feet with his own head, he began to sing his praise.

_Garuḍa said:_

14. “I salute again and again lord Nārāyaṇa who has assumed a human form for some special mission, and who is extremely dear to all. My salutations to Nārāyaṇa who is the cause of the destruction of the enemies of gods and (as Inner Controller) is witness to the actions of everyone.

15. Being yourself the same Nārāyaṇa, you assume the form of god Brahmā and create all the Universe. As Nārāyaṇa, you protect it and ultimately assuming the form of Śiva (as hisātman) you destroy it, O glorious Lord.

16. I know that you are that god Viṣṇu, the Lord of all gods—who have incarnated on the earth as the scion of the Yadu race. I am Garuḍa, the son of Vinatā, your humble servant. O Lord! Be pleased to command me what I should do.”

_Sri Śuka said:_

17. Addressing the God of gods thus, Garuḍa, the king of birds, knelt before him on the ground, bowed him and stood before him with folded palms.

18. Seeing Garuḍa the prominent one among birds, Kṛṣṇa the greatest of Yādavas, with his countenance blooming with affection, touched his head (the best part of the body) with hands.

19. “You may go wherever you like, O blessed one. Come in time when you will be remembered by me.” Commanding him thus, he discharged him. Balarāma and Keśava, the lords of the world, who subsisted on the fruits and roots and drank of waters from flowing streams, descended from the top of that mountain and arrived at Karavirapura.

21. Having stayed there for four months both of them returned to the city of Mathurā taking with them a big army, O prominent one among Bharatas.
22. Hearing that king Śrīgāla was killed, Jarāsandha became overwhelmed with anger and surrounded with a vast army, he also came there, O great Kuru!

23. Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa battled with him for seven days. In that seven-day-war the king of Magadha with his enormous army was completely defeated.

24. He returned to the country of Magadha along with a number of Kṣatriyas. Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa who were expert in Dharma, entered the city of Mathurā along with their followers, while they were being praised by songsters and bards like Sūta and Māgadha.

(After this see Verse No. 42 in Ch. 50)

CHAPTER FIFTY-TWO—I

(After 56 in V.J.'s Text)

Kṛtavarmā Deputed to Hastināpara

Śrī Śuka said:

1-2. On one occasion Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devakī, in company of Balarāma and Sātyaki was being waited upon by kings of various countries in the royal assembly. He heard there from Brāhmaṇas, participants in a sacrificial session that Drupada, the king of Pāṇcālas was taken captive by young sons of Kunti in the battle, O scion of Kuru race.

3. On hearing that, the Imperishable Lord became glad at heart and deputed Kṛtavarmā to the city of Hastināpara to know the details.

4. On going to Hastināpara, Kṛtavarmā sought the audience of Bhīṣma, the aged grand-father of Kauravas accompanied by Droṇa, Vidura, Dīṛtarāṣṭra and Kṛṣṇa.

5. He paid respects to king Yudhiṣṭhira along with his four brothers. Kṛtavarmā, the son of Hṛṣīkeśa, paid special respects to Kunti.

6-7. Yudhiṣṭhira on his part inquired about Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of Kaṁsa, as well as about his companions, about the killing of Kālayavana and victory over Jarāsandha, and the slaying of Vāsudeva, the ruler of Karavīrapura as well as the building up of the city of Dvārakā in the sea.

8-10. On knowing the facts (about the above events) and the slaying of Harīsa and Đibhaka and Brahmadatta the invincible, Yudhiṣṭhira regarded that the sovereignty of the three worlds had permanently been secured in his hands. Kṛtavarmā was honoured by providing comforts, engagement in conversations and other ways of receiving the guest, by the sons of Pāṇḍu and by Kuntī whose eyes were overflowing with tears of affection. Kṛtavarmā took leave of his relatives and also of Kuntī.

11-12. He duly paid respects to the sons of his maternal aunt who were knowers of Dharma. He was permitted to leave by Bhīṣma, the son of Gaṅgā and by Dhṛtarāṣṭra, O sinless king! He was also given leave by Vidura, Karna, the king of Aṅga, Drona, Kṛpa, by the intelligent Aśvatthāman as well as by Duryodhana.

13. Taking leave of them all, Kṛtavarmā departed from the city called Hastināpura and at the time of sunset, he arrived at Dvārakā, the head-quarters of Vṛṣṇis.

14. Entering the celestial assembly-hall which was attended by a number of kings he saw there Kṛṣṇa who was occupying a high seat of gold.

15. To Kṛṣṇa who was wearing a Vanamālā and who was being fanned with chowries by many servants, he reported in details everything as he saw or heard it.

16. Hearing the detailed report of what happened in the capital city Hastināpura of the Kauravas, Lord Hari, the Ruler of the world, learning of the valorous deed of the sons of Pāṇḍu became overwhelmed with joy.
CHAPTER FIFTY-TWO-II

Balarāma marries Revati*

King Parīkṣit said:

1. O great sage! I wish to hear from you in details who was the king named Revata and how he was instructed by god Brahmā (to give his daughter in marriage to Balarāma).

Śrī Śuka replied:

2. Formerly (in the Kṛta Age), there was a king called Revata. He was expert in the essentials of dharma and artha. A glorious daughter was born to him whom he named Revati.

3. He went to god Brahmā to consult him to whom he should give his daughter, as she was sought after by kings of various countries even though he did not propose her to anybody.

4. At that time in the assembly-hall of god Brahmā, two Gandharvas, Hāhā and Hūhū, were singing. They were experts in all the subtle excellent points in evolving music (such as presentation of the gamut in proper pitch and according to measured beats).

5. The king waited outside for some time expecting some interval in the musical concert. When it was concluded, he paid his respects to god Brahmā and sought his advice.

6. “O glorious Lord! This is my daughter. To whom I should give her in marriage?” To him the lotus-born god Brahmā asked, “What prince you like most?

7. Name to me all other rulers of the earth as well, O scion of the Kuru race!” Thereupon Revata enumerated to him the names of kings who were ruling over various countries.

8. Hearing the names of those kings, Brahmā laughed aloud and spoke to Revata, “O king; Many yugas have elapsed since you came here,

9. While you were listening to the musical performance of these Gandharvas (which you are not eligible to hear) for a

* To be read after verse 15 of ch. 52 (original).
It appears to be an elaboration of supra 9.27-36.
moment. Where are those kings whom you regard suitable for your daughter, O king?

10. By this time, O tiger among kings, there are born two lords of the world in the house of Vasudeva. Those two descendants of the Yadu race are called Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa.

11. O king! Give your daughter in marriage to Balarāma out of them.” When he was thus advised, the king paid obeisance to him and returned to his city.

12. He gave his beautiful daughter to Balarāma of mighty arms. But being born in the first (Kṛta) Age, she was of a big stature. Balarāma of powerful arms laid his plough on her shoulder and pulling her down made her of his equal stature.

CHAPTER FIFTY-FIVE

(VJ’s Text — Chapter-68)

The Story of Pradyumna’s Birth

The following are the additional introductory verses in VJ’s Text:

Śrī Śuka said:

1-2. Having propitiated Śiva, the God of gods, the bestower of blessings on the world and having pleased the god residing on mount Kailāsa, with his penance, Lord Hari got a son from Rukmiṇī called Pradyumna. The hero was endowed with excellent beauty, generosity and other virtues. He was the god of Love (Kāma) re-incarnated after being burnt (by god Śiva).

The King Parīksit said:

3. Be pleased to narrate to me what sort of son and of what name, Hari got after visualising god Śiva with the object of getting a son, and after securing the requisite boon.
CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE—I

(VJ.'s Text—Ch. 65)

The Pārijāta Tree Taken by Śri Kṛṣṇa

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Having slain the extremely formidable demon Narakāsura, Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the exterminator of dānavas, mounted Garuḍa and set out of Prāgjyotisapura, O King.

2. While flying through the sky with his consort Satyabhāmā, Lord Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa) went to the capital of heaven to pay respects to Aditi, the mother of gods.

3. Arriving at the gates of heaven, god Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa) blew his highly resounding conch of great sound. Hearing that blast, the denizens of heaven approached to receive him with respectful offerings (e.g. water for washing feet and other articles of worship).

4. Worshipped by gods with devotion and humility and with their minds free from mental distress and fear, He entered the beautiful celestial palace of the Lord of gods.

5. There, Indra with his queen Śacī worshipped him presenting him jewels, celestial ornaments and clothes, perfumes and beautiful garlands.

6. Thereupon he proceeded with his spouse to the city of his mother Aditi. Noticing that her son Acyuta was coming, she received him.

7. Hari paid respects to her. With deep affection, she received with blessings the best of Yadus whom she had not seen for a long time.

8. Instructed by Kṛṣṇa, Satyabhāmā also, placed the earrings (of Aditi) at the feet of her mother-in-law and bowed down to her, O descendant of Kurus.

9. Having recovered her ear-rings she was deeply satisfied and hugged her daughter-in-law. With her eyes overflowing with tears of joy, Aditi, the beloved spouse of sage Kāśyapa, exclaimed:

10. There shall never be old age, deformity or discord with your beloved in your case through my gracious blessings. Positively rest assured, O auspicious lady!
11. Having taken their leave of the goddess Aditi and also of celestials, Keśava (Krṣṇa) accompanied with Satya-bhāmā mounted Garuḍa and proceeded onwards.

12. While the god (Krṣṇa) and the goddess (Satya-bhāmā) were being borne by the high-souled mighty Garuḍa, they beheld a wonderful garden sending forth excellently sweet scent. It was the Nandana garden so beloved to Indra, the husband of Śacī and hence well-guarded.

13. Noticing that garden full of divine fragrance and rich in blossoms, Satyabhāmā took Krṣṇa by hand and said, “O Keśava, I wish to enter into this wonderful garden and to indulge in sports for a while.

14. To respect her words (of request), Keśava got down from Garuḍa and entered the garden that was guarded by servants of Indra.

15. She saw there the heavenly trees resonant with the humming of intoxicated bees, bent down with the weight of fruits and thickly over-strewn with pollen dust of flowers.

16-17. The tender foliage of the trees was moving in gentle breeze and was rendered beautiful and attractive with sweet warbling birds. While sauntering therein, she happened to see the great Pārijāta tree. With her eyes full of wonder and curiosity, she asked Lord Krṣṇa, “What is the name of this tree? It is really wonderful in all the three worlds.”

18-20 The enjoyers of the fruits of this tree must be really lucky as they have all their desires fulfilled thereby. The space at its foot (roots) is paved with corals, its huge trunk is all gold; it is covered with tender leaves of sapphires and platform round it is built of shining Vaidūryas (Lapis Lazuli). It blossoms forth in ruby-flowers and is laden with ripe fruits in the form of gomeda stones. It is shining with the flower-filaments of diamonds. It is beautified with hundreds of big branches of lustrous emeralds.

21. This tree has fascinated my heart thoroughly. If I am really loved by you, the tree should be taken away to our city (Dvārakā), O Lord of the world!

22. Seeing me sitting (resting) under the shade of this tree, your other queens would look upon me as your beloved—must spouse of all, O sinless Lord!”
23. When urged thus by his beloved consort Satyabhâmâ, Kṛṣṇa, the son of Devaki, explained: “This tree is not to be removed from the Nandana garden, O gracious lady.

24. Formerly when this tree emerged while the milky ocean was being churned by gods and Asuras, this was given to Indra by all who participated all the fruits (or “jewels” evolved out of the churning of the ocean).

25. It is not proper for me to take this jewel of a tree away, setting at nought my friend Indra, the performer of hundred Kratus, O lotus-eyed lady, as I always follow the path of righteousness.

26. If an attempt for taking away this Pârijâta is made, a terrible fight with gods ambitious to gain victory is inevitable, O smiling beauty (lit. lady beaming with smiles)!”

27. When Satyabhâmâ was thus addressed by the God of gods, Satyabhâmâ retorted to Lord Hari, “Why do you frighten me with such deceptive arguments, O slayer of Kaśî?

28. That unmannerly Śacî did not courteously receive me and honour me when I visited her. She is proud of her husband’s prowess.

29. O Acyuta! If I am really your beloved, this Pârijâta tree must be taken away at any cost. If I be not so (beloved), desist (from the attempt) immediately.”

30. Thus importuned by Satyabhâmâ, Kṛṣṇa ignored contemptuously the guards, uprooted the tree and placed it on Garuḍa.

31. The forest-guards then resisted Kṛṣṇa while some sped hastily to report to Indra the incident.

32. (They insistently protested): “O Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa, this tree is worshipped by celestials. This must not be taken away. If you (just try to) take it away, you will instantly reap the fruit of that act.

33. You will never reach your capital with this tree, O Kṛṣṇa. You will find Indra (pursuing you) close at your back with his weapon (Vajra) raised (to strike you).”

34. Some forest guards quickly approached Indra who was sitting with his queen Śacî. Seeing him they reported, O King!
35. “Disregarding all gods including (Her majesty) Indrāṇī as well as your majesty, Kṛṣṇa’s spouse has taken away the great tree Pārijāta.
36. While resisting her we prohibited her in clear terms. But that beloved spouse of Hari is so elated with the pride of her husband’s prowess that she reproached us and carried away the tree.”

Śri Śuka continued :

37. Hearing this offensive report, god Indra looked at Śacī who was sitting by his side and like a serpent hit with a stick, did not tolerate that insult.
38. Proclaiming immediate preparation for fighting and mobilising all his soldiers and summoning the guardians of various spheres for the battle, the Lord of gods marched out.
39. The army of gods followed Indra equipped with thunder-bolt and riding the excellent elephant Airāvata of four tusks.
40. The fire-god, securely accoutred in his panoply and riding his horse, armed himself with a terrific Śataghni and a tail-like ladle, rode to the battle.
41. The valorous Yama (god of death) armed himself with his rod and riding his he-buffalo and accompanied with mahā-Kāla and others followed Indra with a view to fight.
42. Nirṛti of great splendour rode in his man-borne vehicle. The mighty-armed god, armed with a sword, set out for the battle, O King.
43. Varuṇa hastily mounted his alligator of terrible forms and with his noose raised in his hand started after Indra to fight.
44. The wind-god clad in coat of mail and armed with a Tomara (Javelin) rode his (swift) black-antelope and followed the Lord of gods to fight with Kṛṣṇa, the wielder of (Sudarśana) discus.
45. Kubera, in his palanquin carried by four men and armed with a Mudgara (a club) rushed out hastily with a desire to fight with Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa).
46. God Śiva, mounting his big bull and bearing a sharp pointed trident and accompanied with an army of ten million goblins went with Indra for fighting.

47. Drums, conchs, Mrdaṅgas, Paṇavas, Kettle-drums and gomukhas (a musical instrument), heavenly gold wind-instruments and innumerable cymbals were sounded.

48. With the thumping of iron tyres of chariot, harsh neighing of the horses, roaring like lions and loud striking of their arms, loud shouts of challenges for fighting.

49. And with hundreds and thousands of gods shouting, “Halt, stop: Where do you go? Don’t go.”

50. Brandishing and waving their mass of arms and urging on their vehicles (for speed), hundreds and thousands of the gods were competing to be in advance.

51. With terrific twanging of the bow-strings and innumerable lusty shouts like lions, the impatient gods rushed forward to attack (Kṛṣṇa) as (a pack of) jackals rushing against a lion.

CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE

(VI.’s Text Ch. 66)

Satyabhāmā defeats Gods.

Sri Suka continued :

1. Perceiving that gods are rushing forward to attack them, Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the world, remarked to Satyabhāmā, “Here have arrived your guests, these gods”.

2. While the Lord of gods was speaking thus, the warrior-gods despatched (against Kṛṣṇa) roared and discharged a volley of arrows on Kṛṣṇa, O descendant of Kuru.

3. Then, confused at the sudden calamity, Satyabhāmā took up the Śaṅga bow and with a volley of arrows cut off the shafts discharged by the warriors from heaven.
4. Thereafter advanced Kubera the Lord of wealth, surrounded by a number of Yakṣas and twanging the string of his palm-tree high bow plated with gold at both ends.

5. Discharging arrows with feathers of gold and now and then roaring like a lion, he rushed forward in the battle and shouted, “Stop, Stop.”

6. Satyā (Satyabhāmā) hit forcibly his big belly with five sharp arrows that cut him to the quick, O King.

7. Being deeply wounded by her arrows in the battle, the god of wealth discharged three bhalla arrows at the beloved of Lord Hari and gave out a lusty shout.

8-9. Even before those shafts could reach her, she cut them with three arrows with crescent-shaped head. And the queen (Satyā) struck the forehead of Kubera, the Lord of Guhyakas, with eight Vatsa-danta (type of) arrows swift like the mind, O prominent Kuru. Extremely pained with those arrows, Kubera, the son of PULASTYA, was over-whelmed with rage.

10-13. In that combat, he discharged twenty-one sharp arrows but Satyabhāmā, with her seven shafts, cut each of them into three pieces within half a second (wink of the eye). While they were in the air, Satyabhāmā, the beloved of Hari, flew into rage and cut into two the big bow of Kubera at its hold (in the middle) with an arrow with crescent-shaped head. Kubera, the Lord of riches picked up another bow and stringing it, discharged a volley of arrows, wrathfully breathing like a serpent. But queen Satyabhāmā with ease (as in a sport) cut down all those arrows with her Sannata-parva shafts (of hard knots). It was a miracle as it were to see. Kubera, thereupon, wrathfully glared at Satyabhāmā.

15-16. “Look at my prowess I shall kill you outright today”, growled he. With a desire to wipe out his defeat and humiliation and while all gods were gazing, he fixed an excellent arrow with a crescent-head on his bow tall as a palmmyra tree, to kill queen Satyabhāmā.

17. Anticipating his plan (in mind), the consort of Hari cut his bow just in the middle (at its hold), with an arrow with a horse-shoe shaped sharp head, O best of Kurus.

18. Then Kubera, the protector of wealth took up his formidable Mudgara (club) that terrified demons and brandishing it hundred times, hurled it at the queen (Satyā).

19. Krṣṇa with his left hand (easily) caught hold of that extremely terrible club as it was rushing towards her and seeing at him laughed loudly.

20. Thereupon, Kubera, the Lord of wealth retired from the battle and fled away. Krṣṇa spoke highly of his queen, embraced her with great regard.

21. When Kubera took to his heels in the battle with Krṣṇa, the enemy of Karma, Varuṇa raising his noose attacked Krṣṇa in a combat.

22. Perceiving the advance of Varuṇa who rode a crocodile, Garuḍa of formidable strength pounced upon him like a tiger springing on an ox.

23. Terrific was the fight between Garuḍa and Varuṇa, like the combat between Bali and Indra in the war between gods and demons.

24. Varuṇa, the Lord of waters, threw the noose about the neck of Garuḍa and angrily dragged him like one lion dragging another.

25. Lifting up Varuṇa, the Lord of waters with the ends of his wings and catching hold of the crocodile in his claws Garuḍa hurled them into the sea.

26. Having lost his mount and catching hold of his noose with great difficulty, Varuṇa ran away on foot from the battle-field to his abode whence he came.

27. When Varuṇa retired from the battle-field, the Wind-god and the Fire-god jointly attacked Krṣṇa, O the best of Kurus!

28. The Fire-god discharged five arrows, while the Wind-god fired three shafts. Their fight with Krṣṇa was wonderful to look at.

29. Thereupon, Govinda, exterminator of enemies, laughed loudly and pierced the Fire-god with one arrow and the Wind-god with seven.

30. Deeply and forcibly struck on the chest with one shaft with horse-shoe-shaped head, the Fire-god realized that Krṣṇa was extraordinary and quickly fled from the battle-field.
31. Noticing that the Fire-god had run away from the battle and that his whole body was bristling with arrows, he (the Wind-god) was overwhelmed with pain.

32. He realized that it was lotus-eyed god Viśnū who had appeared on the battle-field. He retired from the battle as he wanted to save his own life.

33. Thereupon mounting his he-buffalo and raising up his refulgent rod, Yama, with his eyes reddened with rage, attacked Kṛṣṇa in the battle.

34. Noticing Yama with his big rod raised up (to strike at him,) the lotus-eyed Kṛṣṇa hurled his mace at him and felled it from his hand.

35. The heavy blow of his mace on his rod made Yama's hand tremble. Turning his back, the god of death ran away with his buffalo, O scion of the Kuru race.

36. Beholding the discomfiture and retreat of Yama, Nirṛti was overwhelmed with fear and judging his power, did not come to fight.

37. But god Śiva of great heroic lustre, armed with a trident and mounting his bull, attacked Kṛṣṇa with his enormous army of goblins.

38. Those two mighty valorous heroes well-known in the world engaged in a terrible combat, each with an ambition to defeat the other.

39. Piercing Kṛṣṇa with ten arrows and Garuḍa with five, Śiva roared out in the battle, Stop, Stop.

40. Taking up his Śārṅga bow, Kṛṣṇa, the destroyer of cities of enemies, hit Śiva, the rider of the bull with thirty arrows simultaneously.

41. In that combat, Garuḍa, the destroyer of serpents, harassed the bull with his pointed bill, both of his claws and wings.

42. Discharging again fifty Nārāca arrows at him, Kṛṣṇa engaged Śaṅkara, the benign god who blesses the world, in the fight, O ruler of the world.

43. Śiva, got enraged and brandishing his sharp-pointed formidable-looking trident hurled it at Vāsudeva (Kṛṣṇa), O King.
44. Noticing the trident rushing at him, Kṛṣṇa hurled his heavy demon-destroying mace Kaumodakī at it, to ward it off.

45. It is traditionally reported that both the weapons --- the Kaumodakī mace and the trident --- buffeted each other in the sky and giving out huge flames both of them simultaneously fell into the sea.

46. Felling down the trident into the sea, the mace Kaumodakī returned to Viṣṇu’s (Kṛṣṇa’s) hand and the trident also to that of Śiva.

47. The serpent decorated god Śiva raised up his sharp sword and spurring his bull with his heels, he attacked Kṛṣṇa in the combat.

48. Promptly seizing the bull by his two horns, Garuḍa hurled god Śiva along with the bull to a distance of hundred bows (four hundred cubits).

49. Thereupon god Śiva, the wielder of trident with the bull as his mount, left the battle and speedily went back to his pce, O best of Kurus!

CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE—III

(VI.'s Text — Chapter No. 67)

Pārijāta planted in Satyabhāmā’s Palace

Śrī Śuka continued :

1-2. Thereupon Indra, the King of gods put on his royal diadem, equipped himself with a quiver of arrows, armed himself with a bow, mounted on his huge elephant Airāvata and remembering the words of Śacī regarding the Pārijāta tree, attacked Kṛṣṇa in the battle, like an elephant attacking a lion.

3. Beholding him advance, Lord Hari, the conqueror of inimical cities, blew his high sounding conch filling all the quarters with the blast.

4. Attacking Kṛṣṇa and twanging his big bow, he hit Kṛṣṇa with an extremely pointed arrow with a sharp horse-shoe-shaped head in the combat.
5. Wounded on the chest with that \textit{Ksura\textasciitilde{pa}} arrow by the King of gods, Hari laughed loudly and applauded him, "Well done Indra! This is just like you (worthy of the King of gods.

6. Still again the King of gods set ten shafts on his bow (long and curved) like a great serpent and stretching the bow-string up to his ears, discharged them at \textit{K\textasciitilde{s}\textsc{na}} and his discus and roared like a lion.

7. In the meanwhile, \textit{K\textasciitilde{s}\textsc{na}} the noble-souled slayer of \textit{K\textsc{arna}} cut into three all the arrows with one shaft in the midway (as they were coming), and hit Indra with ten excellently whetted shafts as if in a sport, O descendant of Bharata.

8. Those shafts pierced through Indra’s body along with the armour and were seen coming out with great force smeared with blood.

9. Indra again set sixteen arrows on his bow and stretching (the bow string) discharged them, but \textit{K\textasciitilde{s}\textsc{na}} cut them with three shafts.

10. Still again with thirty shafts, Hari hit the King of gods in the battle and all those arrows struck deep in Indra’s chest.

11. Indra then flew in rage like a serpent hit with a stick and with his goad he impelled his big elephant to attack Garu\textsc{da}.

12. Goaded on by Indra the elephant approached Garu\textsc{da} and dashed at his chest with his four tusks.

13. Thereupon, Garu\textsc{da} tormented the elephant called Air\textsc{v}ata with his bill, wings and claws, O descendant of Kauravas.

14. And while all beings were gazing, he raised his terrible \textit{Vajra} which inspired awe among D\textsc{an}avas and hurled it at Vi\textsc{\textasciitilde{snu}} (\textit{K\textasciitilde{s}\textsc{na}}).

15. As that \textit{Vajra}, the weapon of Indra, reached him, Vi\textsc{\textasciitilde{snu}}, the slayer of Madhu caught it in his left hand and laughed loudly.

16. Being deprived of his weapon and his mount (elephant) tormented by Garu\textsc{da}, the King of gods retreated from the battle-field hanging down his head in shame.

17. Finding Indra frustrated in his object and intending to run, Satyabhāmā laughed loudly at the King of gods and said taunting.

Satyabhāmā said:

18. Come on Śakra. Don’t retreat, O wielder of the thunderbolt. It is not proper for Śaci’s dear lord to take to flight.

19. Your queen Śaci, the daughter of Pulomā, drunk with the pride of sovereignty and elated with the prowess of her husband as she is, will at once think low of you (and insult you) defeated as you are in the battle.”

20. Hearing this taunting speech of queen Satyabhāmā, Indra looked her in the face and addressed to the slyly smiling queen.

Indra said:

21. Confronting on the battle-field the father and preceptor of the three worlds by whom are brought forth the gods, demons, the great serpents, Yakṣas, Siddhas, Gandharvas (the divine musicians), Kinnaras, goblins, ogres and others, who can avoid facing the humiliation of defeat?

22. We who subsist on sacrificial oblations, expose our childishness by opposing the incomprehensible Lord, like the weakling of a calf appears to oppose its mother at the time of sucking her milk.”

23. Having replied thus to Satyabhāmā, the daughter of Satrājit, Indra folded his palms, bowed to Lord Vāsudeva and prayed, O the best descendant of Bharata!

Indra prayed:

24. Hail to you O God of gods, the lotus-eyed Lord of Lakṣmī! Be pleased to pardon me all my faults, O protector of the world.

25. You are kind and affectionate to those who seek resort to you. It does not behove you to abandon me of whom you are the sole asylum—me who am extremely foolish and uncontrolled.

26-27. The elephant Airāvata (my mount), the thunderbolt (my special weapon), this Pārijāta tree, sovereignty over gods and this Amarāvatī (my capital town)—in fact everything
(in this universe) is under your control. I am your obedient servant. Whatever you wish to take away from this place may be taken away by you at will.

28. O Govinda! I shall explain to you the fundamental reason of opposing you. You are now wholeheartedly interested in the mortal world.

29. If this wish-yielding tree Pārijāta is taken by you there, the earth becomes indistinguishable from the heaven.

30. It is hence that I opposed you, O tiger among the Yadus—O god, I may, therefore, be forgiven by you who know what should and what should not be done.

Śri Śuka said:

31. Thus addressed by the king of gods, Janārdana, the God of gods, with a smiling countenance, spoke to him, O the greatest Kuru.

The glorious Lord said:

32. “Absolutely no fault has been committed by you, O Indra. If any fault has been committed, it is mine, for there is no distinction between you and me.

33. Whatever is now done by you, irrespective of its being good or bad, has been committed by me, O thousand eyed god. Please do not brood over the matter at all.

34. This excellent-most Pārijāta tree will, as per my direction, come to the Nandana garden of its own accord, when I (departing from the earth) ascend to the heaven.

35. When the King of gods was thus addressed by Vāsudeva, O best of Kurus, the king of gods apologised to Kṛṣṇa, Satyabhāmā and Garuḍa.

36-37. May my son and your brother-in-law Arjuna, also known as Bibhatsu, be protected by you.” Repeating this request again and again, Indra, getting leave to depart, got back his Vajra and returned to his capital with all protectors of different cardinal points. Kṛṣṇa, the delight of Yadus bade good-bye to Indra along with the protectors of all the cardinal points.

38-39. He ordered Garuḍa: Let us make a move to Dvārakā. Garuḍa, the enemy of serpents, easily bore Kṛṣṇa, Satyabhāmā and the Pārijāta tree and went to Dvārakā. He entered the beautiful city of Dvārakā adorned with many gates and portals.

40-41. It was brilliant, decorated with flags, buntings and festoons. Its floors were cleansed and besprinkled. He was worshipped with the attending prominent Yadus by offering him presents, betel-leaves, garlands, perfumes, pigments and unbroken grains of rice. He was saluted and greeted with flourish of trumpets and other instruments sounded on auspicious occasions, as well as with loud chantings of Vedic hymns.

42-43. Kṛṣṇa entered the heavenly assembly-hall Sudharmā which was attended by (a council of) elders. He bowed down to Āhuka (Ugrasena), Vasudeva and his elder brother Balarāma in order of seniority. He was duly honoured by them (reciprocally). In that assembly, he occupied an exalted seat of gold.

44. Kṛṣṇa appeared resplendent like Indra attended upon by prominent persons like Bṛhaspati and other protectors of the world in heaven.

45. Kṛṣṇa got the great tree Pārijāta planted in the palace of Satyabhāmā. It was surrounded on all side with pavements of precious stones.

46. Learning that the son of Devakī was coming with a big host of ladies, all the women of Yādava clan came there to see them.

47. Vasudeva as well as all ladies headed by Rohiṇī came to see Lord Kṛṣṇa, returned safe, hale and hearty after conquering the enemy.

48. Beholding that his mother in company of Devakī had come, Kṛṣṇa bowed down to them. They in their turn honoured him with blessings.

49. Similarly, seven beloved queens of Kṛṣṇa such as Rukmiṇi and others who were supremely beautiful and richly adorned, approached their Lord and paid respects to him.

50-51. Revati, the beloved spouse of Balarāma, the famous Trivakrā, Durgā, Subhadrā and Tārā and other ladies of Bhoja, Vṛṣṇi and Andhaka clans with their faces blooming with joy and affection came to see, out of curiosity, Lord Kṛṣṇa who had returned hale and hearty after vanquishing the enemies and brought with him a bevy of ladies and Satyabhāmā as also the celestial Pārijāta tree brought from heaven.

53. All the ladies gathered there showered on Kṛṣṇa's head fried grains of rice, flowers and unbroken rice-grains and returned to their respective homes.

CHAPTER SIXTY-SIX—A

Slaying of Pauṇḍraka and others

(This corresponds to VJ.'s Text ch. 69. It gives the following additional verses in the Introduction)

Śrī Śuka said:

1.1-1.3: It is reported that at that time there was a king called Pauṇḍraka, O scion of the Kuru race. Getting information of Kṛṣṇa's absence from Dvārakā, he laid siege to that citadel of Vṛṣṇis with a big army and subjected it to attacks. Balarāma, Śāyakya, Vasudeva, Udhava, Ugrasena and other prominent Yādava warriors treated him (with their military preparations) in a manner suitable for a guest who comes at such a time.

King Parīkṣit enquired:

1.4 Who was that Pauṇḍraka? What country did he rule over? Whose son was he? Be pleased to narrate all this to me, O sage.

Śrī Śuka narrated:

1.5 The king of Kāśī had no male issue. He gave his daughter Sutān to Vasudeva on condition of giving his kingdom as dowry.

1.6 A son with long arms and brilliant like the sun was born to them. He was called Pauṇḍraka. He was powerful, full of prowess and pride.

1.7-1.8 As he was the son of Vasudeva, he was called Vāsudeva. when he became a major the great glorious Vasudeva entrusted to him that kingdom (of Kāśī) along with the treasures, army, chariots and other vehicles. Then Vasudeva married Kaṁsa’s younger sister Devakī who was like a goddess.

1.9 Being interned by Kaṁsa, the king of Bhojas, Vasudeva could not even once visit Karvirapura.

1.10 Being ever-conscious of the unbearable step-motherly relation and of having no brother of his own, the king of Kāśi lived in awe of Yadus.

1.11 Hearing the report of Kṛṣṇa’s absence from Dvārakā, he stormed it at night but he was defeated by Balarāma and Śaineya (Sātyaki).

1.12 Having suffered a heavy loss of thousands of horses, elephants and foot soldiers, he quietly retreated in the latter part of the night to the city of Vārāṇasi.

1.13 When the night was over and the day dawned, Śrī Kṛṣṇa returned from Badarikāśrama by his mount Garuḍa and came to Dvārakā which was well defended by Balarāma.

1.14 He was received with flags and offered water to wash his hands and feet and the usual presents after arrival, by Yādavas, Vṛṣṇis and Andhakas who reported to him the whole story. Then he entered the council hall.

1.15 Once Paunḍraka the powerful king of Kāśi.........

(After this follows verse 1-b in ŚR.’s Text in ch. 68)

CHAPTER EIGHTY-I

The Story of the Brāhmaṇa Sridāman

I’7.’s Text begins :

1-2A. When the mighty-armed Su (Dur) yodhana was struck down by the mace (of Bhīma) in the battle (and died subsequently), even the glorious Lord Govinda, having accomplished his desired object (of lightening the burden of the earth) made arrangement of leaving the desolate battle field.

2B-5. Kṛpa, Kṛtavarmā and the prominent chariot-warrior Aśvatthāman were the only three great warriors in the army of Su(Dur) yodhana. The survivors on the other (Pāṇḍava) side were the five Pāṇḍava warriors, the mighty Sātyaki, Yuyutsu, the son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra by a Vaiśya woman and other eminent people of whom Kṛṣṇa was prominent. As their leader and accompanied by elderly sages, he went to Hastināpura for the condolence of Dhrtrāṣṭra and he consoled Gāndhārī, Dhrtrāṣṭra and the highly intelligent Vidura.

6-8. With difficulty he installed Pāṇḍavas to carry out their functions in governing their kingdoms. He was glorified by hosts of sages and bards like Sūtas, Māgadhhas and Bards and was followed by sons of Pāṇḍu whose eyes were flowing with tears of joy. He took his leave of them, all of whom were sorry, missing him (after his departure). Hari returned to Dvārakā in a chariot brilliant like the Sun. With the loud blast of conchs and beatings of drums and the loud chorus of auspicious Vedic hymns and of incantation of mantras repeating the declaration of the day being auspicious he entered Dvārakā.

9-12. The city was decorated by the citizens with various kinds of arches and waving flags and fluttering banners and its grounds (streets, squares, etc.) were sprinkled and washed by them. He was attended upon by citizens who carried in their hands a specific kind of vessel tuffed with tender shoots,¹ and by young prominent courtesans adorned with ornaments and by women of the cities and by Brāhmaṇas and their sons, grandsons and with brothers who brought in their hands lamps, mirrors, pots full of water, flowers, fruits, entire grains of rice.

13-14. Hari entered that excellent city on an auspicious day and was worshipped with due formalities. He entered the world-famous celestial assembly-hall Sudharmā and paid respects to Āhuka, Vasudeva, Balarāma and bowed to all mothers who were seated on high seats of gold.

15. He took his seat there and was duly worshipped by prominent Yādavas. Like unto the moon surrounded by the constellations of stars and planets in the sky, he shone there (in the assembly hall among the Yādava chiefs).

16-17. Day and night he was attended upon by the powerful monarchs who survived (the Mahābhārata war) and also by sons (of the monarchs killed) who were installed on the thrones of their respective kingdoms. Lord Kṛṣṇa, the support of the Universe, placed Yudhiṣṭhīra in the front (of the world as the bonafide emperor, but through him) he governed righteously the earth whose burden had now been lightened.

¹. Aṅkura-pūrita-pālika-pātra-viśeṣah—VJ.
CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapters</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. Sage's Curse: Imprecating the Annihilation of Yadu's Race</td>
<td>1887</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. Bhāgavata Dharma; Nārada's Narration of King Nimi's Dialogue with Jāyanteya and others</td>
<td>1890</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. Discourses on the Māyā, the means to transcend it, the Brahman and the Path of Action</td>
<td>1902</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. Description of the Lord's Incarnations by Drumila</td>
<td>1916</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5. Nature and Fate of non-Devotees: Yuga-wise Methods of Worshipping the Lord</td>
<td>1920</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6. Lord Kṛṣṇa Requested to return to Vaikuṇṭha: Uddhava's Desire to follow him</td>
<td>1928</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7. Śrī Kṛṣṇa's Spiritual Guidance to Uddhava: The Legend of the Avadhūta and his Preceptors</td>
<td>1936</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8. What the Avadhūta learnt from the Nine Preceptors from the Boa-Constrictor to Piṅgalā</td>
<td>1947</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9. The Discourse of the Avadhūta Concluded</td>
<td>1952</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10. How the Jīva is Ensnared in Saṁsāra</td>
<td>1957</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11. Characteristics of Bondage and Liberation and of Devotion</td>
<td>1963</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12. Importance of Association with Saints. The performance and Renunciation of Prescribed Karmas</td>
<td>1974</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13. The Spiritual Knowledge Imparted by the Divine Swan</td>
<td>1981</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14. The Path of Devotion and the Method of Meditation</td>
<td>1990</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15. The Super-normal Powers Attained by Yoga</td>
<td>1996</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16. Description of Viṣṇu's Glorious Manifestations</td>
<td>2003</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
17. The Sacred Duties of a Celibate and a Householder 2010
18. Duties of Hermits (Vānaprastha) and Sannyāsins 2019
19. Exposition of Spiritual knowledge, its Realization and Yogic Disciplines 2027
20. Elucidation of Karma, Jñāna and Bhakti Yogas 2035
21. Criteria for determining the good and the evil 2041
22. Enumeration of Principles (Tattvas). The Distinction between Prakṛti and Puruṣa 2050
23. The Song of a Recluse (Bhikṣu Gītā) 2060
24. Elucidation of Sāṁkhya yoga 2070
25. The Three Guṇas and their Workings 2076
26. The Song of Aila (Purūravas) 2082
27. The Yoga of Active Service 2086
28. The Essence of the Path of Knowledge (Jñāna Yoga) 2095
29. Bhakti Yoga Recapitulated: Departure of Uddhava to Badarikāśrama 2104
30. Extermination of the Race of Yādavas 2112
31. Lord Kṛṣṇa’s Return to Vaikuṇṭha 2119

SKANDHA XII

Chapters

1. Dynasties of the Kali Age 2123
2. The Evils of the Kali Age 2130
3. Dharma (Righteous way of Life) in every Yuga: Efficacy of God’s Name 2135
4. The Four-Fold Pralaya 2143
5. Śuka’s concluding Precept Concerning Brahman 2150
6. Takṣaka Bites Parīkṣit: Janmejaya’s Serpent Sacrifice: Classification of Vedas in Different Branches 2152
7. The Branches of the Atharva Veda: Characteristics of the Purāṇas 2165
8. Mārkaṇḍeya's Penance and Praise of Lord Nārāyaṇa 2170
9. The Lord Exhibits His Māya 2177
10. God Śiva's Boon to Mārkaṇḍeya 2182
11. Significance of the Various parts of the Lord’s Image: The Retinue of the sun-God per month 2189
12. A Synoptic Review of the twelve Skandhas of Śrīmad Bhāgavata 2197
13. The extent of Each of the Eighteen Purāṇas: The Glory of the Bhāgavata 2205

APPENDIX 2209
INDEX 2213
SKANDHA ELEVENTH

CHAPTER ONE

Sage’s Curse: Imprecating the Annihilation of Yadu’s Race.

Sri Suka (The Son of Bādarāyaṇa) said:

1. Accompanied by Balarāma and the Yādavas, Kṛṣṇa brought about the annihilation of the Daityas (some through Balarāma, some through Yādavas and the rest like Pūtanā, Kaṁsa, etc. himself). (In the case of near relatives whom he could not destroy personally) he (being the indwelling soul of all) instigated a fast-growing virulent feud (culminating in the war between Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas) and lightened the burden of the earth.

2. Using as his means (the cause of) Pāṇḍavas whose wrath was extremely (and frequently) provoked by their enemies (Kauravas) through fraudulent gambling, scornful insults, dragging (their queen Draupadi) by the locks of her hair and such other humiliating acts, the Lord removed the burden of the earth by causing the mutual destruction of the kings who assembled there (in Kurukṣetra) as allies on either side (as these were Daityas born as his relatives).

3. Having destroyed completely the kings and their armies which caused a burden to the earth through his Yādava clansmen who were protected by his arms, the Lord of incomprehensible nature (and boundless powers) pondered: “Though (apparently) the burden of the earth has been lightened, I do not consider it as really removed as long as the irresistible clan of Yadus still continues to exist. (It will not be proper for me to annihilate personally my own clansmen openly).

4. Being always under my protection, this clan which has become unrestrainable through ever-increasing power and prosperity, can never be defeated (and destroyed) by others (even by gods). Having instigated an internal discord leading to their total (mutual) destruction like a forest of bamboos consumed by fire (sparked by their mutual friction), I shall retire quietly to my abode (Vaikuntha)."

---

1.- The existence of the powerful invincible, vast Yādava clan was intolerable to Lord Kṛṣṇa—EK.

5. Having made up his mind thus, the Almighty Omni-present Lord of true, effective resolve, withdrew (to their respective places in the higher world) his own race, making the curse of Brāhmaṇas as the pretext (with a view to establish the greatness of Brāhmaṇas).

6-7. The Supreme Lord Kṛṣṇa retired to his abode after captivating the eyes of persons with his superb personality which surpassed the world in beauty¹ (and made people’s eyes unwilling to see anything else), and by his words he fascinated the hearts of those who remembered them, by his foot-prints he suspended the movements and actions of those who espied them (and had thus concentrically attracted to himself all the propensities of the people who saw him), and after having spread his glory all over the earth—his glory which can be sung in beautiful verses and which if heard or recited, people would easily cross over the darkness of Nescience and Saṁsāra.

King Parīkṣit enquired:

8. How is it that the curse of Brāhmaṇas affected² the Vṛṣṇis who were devoted and friendly to Brāhmaṇas; were extremely generous; always rendered services to elderly persons and had their minds devotedly attached to Kṛṣṇa.

9. What was the occasion of the curse? What was its nature? How could discord be sown among Yādavas who were of one mind? Be pleased to narrate to me in details everything about this.³

Sri Sūka explained:

10. Possessing a personality comprised of everything that is beautiful in the world, engaged in performing ideally

¹. Or which imparted beauty to the world—ŚR.
². Nārada used to stay at Dvārakā so that he should not be affected by Dakṣa’s curse. If Dakṣa’s curse was ineffective due to the presence of Kṛṣṇa in the case of Nārada, how could the Brāhmaṇa Sages’ curse descend upon the Vṛṣṇis at all—EK. 1.280
³. EK. explains that the Will of Lord Kṛṣṇa to annihilate the Yādava clan is the real cause of the Brahmanical Curse (1.284-85).
auspicious acts even though he had all his desires accomplished, enjoying himself in his home at Dvārakā, the Lord of liberal wish-bestowing glory felt his mission still incomplete and desired to annihilate his own clan.

11-12. Having accomplished highly blissful and auspicious actions glorifying which bring merits and singing of which wipes out the dirt (sinfulness) of the Kali age, he stayed as Kālā (the God of destruction) in the house of Vasudeva, the Lord of Yadus. Sages such as Viśvāmitra, Asita, Kaṇva, Durvāsas, Bhṛgu, Anāgiras, Kāśyapa, Vāmadeva, Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Nārada and others took leave of him and went to the (holy place) Piṇḍāraka.¹

13. Youths of the Yādava clan who were playing there approached those Sages and though really impudent, they feigned to pay respects to their feet in mock humility, and put a question to them.

14-15. They dressed Samba, the son of Jāmbavati in the clothes of a woman and said, “This dark-eyed damsel is pregnant and desires to ask you, O Brāhmaṇas—She feels shy of asking you directly. But She is desirous of having a son and will deliver soon. You are of unfailing vision. Be pleased to tell whether she will have a male or a female issue”.

16. O King! The Sages who were thus being cheated (as a practical joke), got angry and replied, “O stupid fellows! She will give birth to a pestle which will exterminate your race”.

17. Hearing that (predictive curse), they became extremely terrified. They at once undressed the belly of Samba. And lo! They found a veritable iron pestle in it.

18. “What folly have we—unlucky fellows—committed? what will now people say to us?” In such a perplexed mood, they went home, taking the pestle with them.

19. With pale, withered faces, they took it to the royal assembly hall. And in the presence of all Yādavas, they reported the whole matter to King Ugrasena (and not to Śrī Kṛṣṇa).

¹ This is near Golagar, sixteen miles to the east of Dvārakā (Saurāstra)—GDAMI, P. 157.
20. Learning of the unfailing curse of Brähmaṇas and seeing actually the pestle, the citizens of Dvārakā were shocked with astonishment and were quaking with terror.

21. Āhuka (Ugrasena), the king of Yadus got the pestle reduced to powder and caused it scattered over the high seas and did the same to the remaining piece of the iron pestle which could be so reduced.

22. Some fish swallowed up that iron piece while the particles of the powder were borne by the sea waves to the shore where they grew into a kind of reed called Erakā.

23. (As Fate would have it) the fish (that swallowed the irreducible iron piece of the pestle) was caught in a net along with other fish in the sea, by some fishermen. The piece of iron found in the bowels of the fish was fixed at the point of his arrow by a hunter.

24. The glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa knew all the facts. The Supreme Ruler as he was, (he could have but) he did not wish to counteract (and render ineffectual) the curse of the Brähmaṇas. He, being the Destroyer himself, approved of it (as he desired to exterminate the Yādavas).

CHAPTER TWO

_Bhāgavata Dharma : Nārada's Narration of King Nimi's Dialogue with Jāyanteya and others_

_Srī Sūka said:_

1. In his ardent longing and eagerness to wait upon Kṛṣṇa, Nārada frequently used to stay at Dvārakā despite Dakṣa's curse of eternal wandering to him, as the curse was ineffective at Dvārakā which was protected by the arms of Lord Kṛṣṇa, O best of Kurus.

2. What person possessed of sound senses and hemmed in by death on all sides1 would possibly neglect to resort to and adore the lotus-feet of Mukunda (for which possession of sense-organs only, and not caste (varṇa) and stage of life (āśrama) is the qualification, etc.) which are meditated upon and adored by the best of immortals (such as god Brahmā, Śiva and others).

1. VR. reads _sarvadṛḍyataṁ_ 'in no way affected by death' and this adj. qualifies the 'lotus feet of Mukunda'.

3. On one occasion, when the divine sage Nārada visited his house and was duly worshipped and was comfortably seated, Vasudeva respectfully bowed to him and submitted as follows:

Vasudeva said:

4. "Just as the arrival of the parents is for bringing the well-being of the children or the movements of those great souls who follow the path of the Lord of excellent glory, are conducive for the good of the indigent and helpless, the movements of your worship are for the welfare of all embodied beings.

5. The working of the deities (e.g. showering of rains) may contribute either to the misery or happiness of created beings. But actions and behaviour of pious souls like you who have concentrated their minds on Lord Acyuta, tend exclusively and solely towards the happiness of all.

6. Deities (i.e. the grace they confer) depend on meritorious acts (such as sacrifices etc.). Like the shadow of a person (imitating him reciprocally), they serve their votaries in the same way as their devotees worship them with meritorious acts. But the pious and the righteous people are always kind and compassionate to the afflicted and needy under all circumstances.

7. We, however, request you, O Brāhmaṇa sage, to explain to us the paths of righteousness which lead to the propitiation of the glorious Lord and by listening to which with faith and devotion, a mortal being is emancipated from all fears (i.e. is liberated from Samsāra).

8. Formerly, in my previous incarnation in this world, I worshipped the Infinite Lord, the bestower of emancipation from Samsāra, with the desire of getting progeny but not for Liberation from Samsāra, as I was deluded by the Māyā (deluding pōtency) of the Lord.
9. O sage of well-observed vows! Be pleased to instruct us to that course (in this life) whereby we shall directly and easily be liberated from the Samsāra teeming with various kinds of miseries and beset with fears and dangers on all sides."

Śrī Śuka said:

10. Solicited thus by the highly intelligent Vasudeva on this question, the divine sage Nārada being reminded of the excellent qualities of Hari, became pleased with him and spoke to him thus:

Nārada said:

11. "O foremost Sātvata! Your honour has wisely resolved on this course, wherein you enquired of me, as to what courses of behaviour and virtues delight the Lord and purify all (from sins, etc.).

12. O Vasudeva! This righteous course of conduct (viz. Bhāgavata dharma) if heard, recited, pondered over, accepted with reverence or appreciated approvingly (when followed by others), instantaneously purifies even those who are the enemies of gods or are hostile to all creatures.

13. The most auspicious and glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa whose name, if heard or sung is meritorious, is brought to my mind and memory to-day, by you.

14. On this point, this ancient historical legend is told. It consists of a dialogue between the sons of Rṣabha and the great-souled king Nimi of Videha.

15. Svāyambhuva Manu had a son by name Priyavrata. His son was Agnīdhra from whom was born Nābhi, whose son was well known as Rṣabha.

16. The knowers say that he was a ray (an amśa) of Lord Vāsudeva who had descended on the earth with the intention of propagating the righteous path leading to Mokṣa (Liberation from Samsāra). He had a hundred sons, all of whom were well-versed in the Vedas.

17. Out of them, Bharata, the eldest son, was exclusively devoted to Nārāyaṇa (the supreme soul). It is reported that this wonderful continent is known after him as Bhārata-Varṣa.
18. Having enjoyed the pleasures (of sovereignty) of this earth, he renounced it. He propitiated Hari by austere penance and it is reported that he attained to the Lord's abode after three births.

19. Out of those hundred sons, nine became the rulers of the nine continents all around, and eightyone of them became Brāhmaṇas, authors of treatises on rites and rituals (and religious acts).

20. The remaining nine highly fortunate sons became sages, capable of propounding the highest truth. They exerted on the spiritual path, were sky-clad (naked)¹ (lit. wore girdle of the air) but were highly expert in the spiritual (ātmic) lore.

21. (Their names were:) Kavi, Hari, Antarikṣa, Prabudha, Pippalāyana, Āvirhotra, Drumila, Camasa and Karabhājana.

22. They realised that this universe, both cause and effect or gross and subtle², is nothing but the Glorious Lord.

1. (i) They were without clothes, but not naked—VR.
   (ii) EK gives a spiritual description of their nudity: They were clad in cīdākṣaṭa (sky in the form of Brahma). They tied the knot of the threads of Prāṇa and Apāna (inhalation and exhalation in respiration) at the navel, which resulted in uniting the knot of their state as Jīva and it became their sacred thread (Brahma-Sūtra).
   —EB, 2.175-178

2. Sadasadātmakam: VR as usual interprets this as the conscious or intelligent and unconscious or unintelligent principles which constitute the body of the Lord and are inseparable from him.'

VJ. stoutly rejects the view of the identity between the universe and God or Paramātman, for the adj. sad-asadātmakam precludes it and the lakṣāṇā (jahad-ajahad) is not soundly authoritative. According to VJ: They realised that the nature of the Lord pervades all causes and effects, but is different and distinct from individual soul (jīva). The gross universe is also different from Hari (God). It is as the internal abiding soul (antarāyāmin) that he pervades all and quotes as authority:

EK gives a highly idealistic interpretation: Though their bodies were different, they were spiritually one. They looked upon all people as their own self. The sages have realized that there is nothing but Brahma everywhere, and the universes, beings or elements, due to their identity with Brahma, have no separate existence. To them the triad—the seer, the act of seeing and the thing seen was the Self itself. They were so absorbed in Brahma that they were not aware of movements, being, becoming, etc. In such a stage, their wandering over the earth took place.

EB.2 185-188
himself and not distinct from their self (ātman), and ranged over the earth.

23. They were not attached to anything. They freely went about their way, as their paths were unobstructed. They wandered at will in the worlds of gods, Siddhas, Sādhyas, Gandharvas, Yakṣas, human beings, Kinnaras and serpents as well as in the spheres of sages, Cāraṇas, the lord of goblins, Vidyādharas, Brāhmaṇas and Go-loka.

24. On one occasion, by chance, they happened to attend1 the sacrificial session of the noble-souled Nimi (the King of Videha) conducted by sages in the Bhārata Varṣa (known also as Aja-nābha).

25. On seeing those most ardent devotees of the Lord who were brilliant like the Sun, the sacrificer (King Nimi), (the presiding deities of) the sacrificial fires (viz. Gārhapatiya, Āhavaniya and Dakhina²) and Brāhmaṇaś (officiating as sacrificial priests)—all of them stood up to show respect.

26. On coming to know that they were staunch devotees of Lord Nārāyaṇa³, Nimi, the King of Videhas was greatly delighted. When they were comfortably seated, he worshipped them with all the formalities, according to their seniority.

27. The king who was highly pleased (with their visit), bowed low with great humility and submitted to them who were effulgent by their own personal lustre, like the mindborn sons of Brahma-deva (like Sanaka, Sanandana).

King Nimi of Videha submitted:

28. I believe you are direct attendants of the glorious Lord Viṣṇu (the slayer of demon Madhu); for the people (devotees) of god Viṣṇu are always on the move for purifying the people.

1. EK: They arrived there at the time of pārśvāhū.

2. These fire-deities were visible only to these nine sages to whom they paid respect—EK 2.201.

3. The Bh. P. gives a special place of honour to the devotees of Lord Nārāyaṇa “But of crores of siddhas who are free from attachment and have realised the self, a person who is absolutely devoted to Nārāyaṇa (Nārīyaṇa-paraś) is very difficult to find”—Bh. P. 6.14.5.
29. To Jivas (embodied souls who are invested with a body in every birth) the attainment of human body (birth as a human being) ephemeral though it may be, is very difficult yet valuable (as it serves a means of liberation from Samsāra. Even in this rare (and transitory) form of existence, I consider that it is rarer still to meet persons beloved of Viṣṇu.

30. O sinless ones! We, therefore, ask you about (the pathway to) the summum bonum. For in this worldly existence association with saints or the righteous, even for half a moment is like the find of a valuable treasure.

(Just as an ordinary person finds delight in obtaining a treasure, we get the Supreme delight in the company of saints).

31. If we are competent to listen to them, be pleased to expound to us those righteous duties and observances propitiatory to the Lord. So that the Eternal (birthless) Lord may be so pleased as to confer even his Self to the suppliant (devotee).

Narada said:

32. Respectfully solicited by king Nimi, those worshipful sages complimented the king along with the priests (officiating over the sacrifice) and the members of the sacrificial assembly, and gladly spoke† to the king one by one as follows: O Vasudeva.

Kavi said:

33. I believe that uninterruptedly worshipping and meditating on the lotus-feet of Lord Viṣṇu is the surest and safest means of ensuring protection from fears from any quarter. In this samsāra, a man’s mind gets always bewildered by the fear (of three types of miseries), caused by mistaking this

1. Śr. quotes two couplets enumerating the following topics about which king Nimi raised the questions:

   (1) Bhāgavata dharma; (2) devotees of the Lord; (3) Māyā; (4) Means of dispelling Māyā; (5) Brahman; (6) Karma Theory; (7) theory of re-incarnation; (8) jīva and vāsanās (9) Tīka-dharma.
extremely worthless body, etc. for the soul. But through the worship of the Lord, that fear is completely dispelled.\(^1\)

34. For those means and courses of conduct which have been taught (prescribed) by the Lord, for easily attaining realization of the Self even by ignorant persons—Be sure that those are the duties which please him the most and lead easily to self-realization.

35. By betaking one’s self to those paths, O king, no person will ever go astray. (This path is so safe and easy that) even if one runs with his eyes\(^3\) closed (i.e. is ignorant of \textit{Sruti}s and \textit{Srīmūta}s which are regarded as eyes) will not miss his path (and take the wrong way). (And even if he hurries across the path of devotion, jumping in haste from one step of \textit{Bhakti} to another out of the nine steps (viz. \textit{Śravaṇa} ‘hearing the Name of the Lord’, \textit{Kīrtana} ‘glorifying the deeds of the Lord’, and others), he would not stumble (into \textit{Samsāra} again or miss the fruit of his devotion).

36. Whatever a person does by his body, speech, mind, cognitive and conative sense-organs, intellect and ego and by the force of nature\(^3\) (as formed by his previous \textit{karma}s), he should dedicate all such\(^4\) (voluntary and involuntary) acts to the Supreme Lord Nārāyaṇa\(^5\).

1. \textit{VR} : All fear disappears when the Lord is meditated upon as the \textit{Indweller} (\textit{Antaryāmin}) of this entire universe consisting of the sentient and non-sentient (\textit{Vīśvasya kṛṣṇasya cid-acidātmakasya jagata ātmato veda)nadarātmayā yato pāsane kṛte sati iñiyarthah).

2. “\textit{Sruti}s and \textit{Srīmūta}s constitute two eyes of a Brāhmaṇa. One who does not know one of these (either \textit{Sruti} or \textit{Srīmūta} is squint-eyed) but who knows neither is blind ” Quoted by \textit{ŚR} and others:

3. \textit{anusṛta-svabhāvāt}—\textit{SR}. alternatively explains: Although the Soul is uncontrolled with the body, unaffected by passions or untainted by external acts, owing to superimposition of ignorance, he forgets his essential blissful nature—regards himself as belonging to a particular caste, etc. All acts which this ignorant \textit{jīva} performs, should be resigned to the Almighty Lord.

4. All acts prescribed, non-prescribed and prohibited by \textit{Śastra}s—\textit{VR}.

5. \textit{EK}, in his learned com. (\textit{svīr} 346-453) construes the verse differently: stating generally that acts voluntary, involuntary, prescribed by the Vedas,
37. Due to the force of the Lord's Māyā, loss of memory (of the real nature of the Self), misapprehension about one's real self (leading to the belief in the identification of one's physical body with the self—such as 'I am a god', 'I am a man' etc.) are caused in a person who has turned away from the Lord. When one identifies one's self with what is other than the Self (viz. one's body), it leads to fear (regarding other persons as enemies, friends etc. for he has lost the insight of seeing the Brahman—everywhere). Hence, a wise person should discern that his preceptor is the Deity and his own self and worship the Lord with unflinching, exclusive devotion till one is liberated from Samsāra.

38*. For, this duality called Samsāra has no real existence, but appears to be so like dreams (in sleep), and day-dreams or social duties or by force of nature as a consequence of one's acts in his previous birth—all such acts be dedicated to the Lord. This is the Bhāgavata dharma in a nutshell. EK takes every term from the text, explains it with illustrations how that act is to be resigned to the Lord. The realization of the coalescence or one-ness of the triad—The doer, the act of doing, and the thing done—(for example the seer, the seen and the act of seeing) is the way of dedicating the act to God. He illustrates this by applying the trinity formula to each sense. EK emphasizes that motionless physical posture in a trance is not the real samādhi. Such a trance is equivalent to swooning. Samādhi is an uninterrupted dedication of one's self to Brahman, Śrīkrṣṇa transported Arjuna to a supertrance and directed him to participate in the Mahābhārata war. The real propitiation of God is the natural, automatic, dedication of all our natural, voluntary and involuntary karmas to the supreme Brahman.

(i) SS. (Sudarsana Sūri):

dvaya—The twin notions about the identity of the soul with the body and their independent existence distinct and separate from God's personality.
Karma—sankalpa—vikalpam manah—

The Mind which under the powerful influence of karmas of the past lives broods over the anxieties for maintaining one's body, etc. (Sankalpa), and desires for obtaining enjoyment like flower-garlands, sandal-paste, etc. (vikalpa).

(ii) VR : Though the two notions viz. identity of the body and the Soul and the independent existence of oneself from God though unreal, are entertained in the mind like the dreams (in sleep) and fancies or hallucinations (in the waking state). Hence the necessity of controlling the mind which under the stress of the previous Karmas weaves out Sankalpa (Self—delusion about the identity of the body and the Soul) and Vikalpa (our indehallucinations (during wakefulness), on account of the mind of the persons who broods over it. A wise person should, therefore, control his mind which brings forth the ideations and doubts. It (devotion to God with controlled mind)\(^1\) will lead to Fearlessness i.e. Liberation from \textit{Samsāra}.

39. (As control of the mind is very difficult, an easier way to Mokṣa is enunciated.)

Hence, one should (devoutly) listen to the highly auspicious (stories of) the incarnations and deeds of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the wielder of the discus Sudarāsana, in this world. (If that too is impossible due to their being innumerable), he should sing the names signifying the descents and sportive acts of the Lord, without feeling fear or shame of being mocked at, and lead a life without attachment.

40. A person who adopted the above-described course of devotion as a sacred vow (to be strictly and constantly observed), develops an ardent love for the Lord by singing the names of his beloved Lord Hari. His heart is melted with love and devotion. He laughs loudly (feeling elated at winning over the Lord by his devotion), cries (feeling that he was neglected so long by the Lord), (out of over-eagerness) screams out (‘O Lord! Be pleased to be gracious unto me’), bursts out into songs (out of ecstasy) and dances like a mad person. Unconventional as he is, he transgresses the ways of the world.

\(^1\) Cf. \textit{māna eva manusya-bhūtah}

\textit{kāraṇam bandha-mokṣaye://}

--\textit{Miśra, Up} 6.34
41.* Such a devotee would bow to every being with absolute devotion as unto Hari’s Person whether it be one of the five elements such as the sky, the air, the fire, the water or the earth, or heavenly luminaries such as the stars, the planets, or living beings, the cardinal points, plants and herbs, etc., the rivers and the seas and mountains (regarding them as a part of Lord Hari’s body).

42. Just as a person who eats food finds satisfaction, nourishment and relief from hunger simultaneously with each morsel of food, similarly to a person who has completely submitted himself to the Lord (the triad, viz.) sincere devotion, realization of the supreme Lord and aversion to other objects (of senses) appear and are found together simultaneously.

43. The devotee of the Lord who steadily and without any interruption worships the feet of Lord Acyuta, attains (simultaneously) the triad, viz. devotion, renunciation of worldly objects and realization of the Lord and through them he directly attains the supreme peace1 or liberation from Samsāra.

The king (Nimi) requested:

44. Be pleased to describe to me the devotee of Lord Hari (who attains the above-mentioned triad simultaneously). What are his characteristics (that distinguish him from) among fellow-men how he behaves and how he talks and what are his distinguishing traits which endear him to the Lord.

---

* VR: The devotee should regard himself as an integral part of the God’s person. By understanding the world as a part of God’s body, he becomes quiescent and controls his mind.

EK. gives a highly poetic description of the realization of the Brahman in everything, everywhere (EB. 2,580-602)

 EK: The triad means:

(i) bhakti—loving devotion to all beings,
(ii) anubhava or prāpti—Direct God-realization
(iii) virakti—non-attachment to one’s body, wife, children, etc.

1. S.S. & VR—Śanti—subsidence and disappearance of the six types of sufferings of a being such as: hunger, thirst, grief, delusion, old age and death.

 VJ. : King Nimi enquires after the gradations of votaries.
Hari replied:

45. He who sees his own self (who is Hari himself) existing in all beings as Brahman and realizes that all (mobile and immobile) creations are established in his own Self which is Brahman (or Hari) himself, is the foremost of all devotees.

46. One who cherishes affectionate devotion to the Lord, friendly feelings towards his Votaries (who entirely depend on him), compassion to the ignorant and indifference towards his enemies is a second-rate votary (as he entertains difference in outlook toward them as contrasted with the "fore-most" type described above).

47. (Believing that Lord Hari is present only in his image and not elsewhere) he who desires to worship and worships with faith Lord Hari and does not respect his votaries and other creatures is an ordinary ignorant votary.¹

48. Even though the sense-organs receive their objects of enjoyment (if the devotee's heart is so much absorbed in Lord Viṣṇu that) he feels neither repulsion nor joyous attraction toward them and looks upon this universe as the Māyā of Viṣṇu, such a devotee is of the highest order.

¹. SR. quotes a Tantra text which proves the identity of Hari with the Individual Soul (Ātman) due to his all-pervasiveness and logically accurate knowledge (ātataṭṭhitā, pramāṭṭhitā) and as such He is the Inner Controller of even insignificant insects with no diminution in his six excellences of infinite dimensions due to his association with insignificant creatures. In brief, he who sees the immanence of the glorious Lord everywhere and in everything is the best votary of the Lord.

E.K.: There is a great variety in the external appearance and behaviour of the votaries of God, but he who realizes the complete (identity of his Self, Brahman and all beings—he within all and all within himself—is the best devotee of the Lord.

V.R. He who realizes the implication of the epithet "Vāsudeva"—The Lord being in all and all beings as well as himself existing on the support of the Lord, or being a constituent part of the Lord, is the best devotee.

V.B. refutes the notion of "Supporter and the Supported" of Rāmānuja and establishes the non-duality (advaya) doctrine and the knower of this is the best votary.

1. Cf. Isā Upan., 6 & 7

(1) V.R.: This verse does not condemn image-worship but image-worship without devotion to Lord's votaries is depreciated, as such narrow concept of devotion obstructs the fruition or benefit of Lord's worship.
49. He is the foremost among the Lord’s votaries who, by dint of his constant memory (meditation) of Hari is not deluded by (and affected with) the conditions i.e. sufferings in worldly existence such as: The birth and death affecting the body, hunger and thirst (harassing) the vital principle (prāṇa), fear, (worrying) the mind, strong desire (exciting) the intellect and fatigue exhausting the sense-organs.

50. He is verily the best among the Lord’s devotees in whose hearts the seeds of desires for enjoyment and passions and of actions do not germinate at all and who have Lord Vāsudeva as their only resort.¹

51. He is verily beloved of Lord Hari who is not attached to his body nor is affected by superiority complex on account of his birth (in a high family) or deeds (e.g. penance performed nor by his position in a particular class in society, stage of life or his caste (such as mūrdhāvasikta—born of Brāhmaṇa father and Kṣatriya mother).

52. He who does not entertain the notion of distinction between ‘mine’ and ‘another’s’ in respect of his property or even his own body, who is equal to all beings² and serene-minded, is the best among the votaries of the Lord.

53. He should be regarded as the leader of the followers and devotees of Lord Viṣṇu who will not allow the remembrance of the Lord to be interrupted even for half a winking time

* EK: The five ‘places’ or components of bondage are the physical body, sense-organs, mind, intellect and the vital principle and they are affected by hunger, thirst, fear, sufferings (Klāta), birth and death. The great sufferings undergone at these ‘places’ are called ‘The properties or conditions of Samsāra’. EK takes these sufferings one by one and shows how absorption in the remembrance of the Lord brings immunity to the devotee from them, as he is not affected by any of them at all.

¹EB.2.664-691

1. Verses 48-50 describe how a great devotee behaves,

(i) VR. explains that this egalitarianism is due to his belief that all souls are intelligent in nature and one with Brahma, and physical bodies are products of the unintelligent prakṛti.

(ii) VJ differs:

The notion of identity of Ātman and Paramātman is not entertained by him while in Samsāra or in his pure stage in Mokṣa. He cites a number of authorities to support the Dvaita notion of distinction between jīva and Brahmaṇā.
for gaining the sovereignty of the three worlds. Nor does he waver even for half the twinkling of the eyelid from the lotus feet of the glorious Lord—the feet sought after by gods and others who have not subdued their self.¹

54. When (once) the fever (in the form) of afflictions in the heart of the devotees (who have submitted themselves absolutely to the will of the Lord) is completely subsided by the cool moon-light emanating from the gem-like (crescent-shaped) nails on the toes of the Lord with very long (universe-covering) strides (or possessing great prowess), how can it (the trouble) arise again? How could the solar heat affect when the moon has risen?

55. That person is said to be the chief of votaries whose heart the Lord does not vacate, as his feet are (tightly) fastened with bond of affection therein—Hari who destroys all the accumulated mass of sins, even if his name is uttered unconsciously or under restraint.²

CHAPTER THREE

Discourses on the Māyā, the means to Transcend it, the Brahman and the Path of Action

The King (Nimi) said:

1. We are anxious to know the (nature of the) Māyā (the Will Power) of the Supreme Lord Viṣṇu which deludes those (gods like Brahmā) who themselves are endowed with

1. I differ from ŠR and EK on the interpretation of ajitātma—suradībhīḥ. ŠR dissolves the comp.—ajit—Harau eva—ātmā yeṣam te/ ‘whose mind is fixed on the invincible Lord’. But if gods have fixed their mind on the Lord, why should they have to hunt after (to find out) the Lord on whose feet they have already fixed their mind? If the gods have not subdued their ego or self, then alone they will try and seek the feet of the Lord. Hence, my above interpretation.

2. ŠR: Verses 51 to 53 describe the nature of a devotee. That ‘He sings the name of the Lord’ should be regarded as the answer of ‘what a devotee does’. The summary of all these is given in verse 55.
such deluding powers. May your worshipful sires be gracious enough to enlighten us (about Māyā’s nature).

2. I am a mortal being scorched by the fever (afflictions) of Samsāra. I do not feel satiated while listening to your speech describing the nectar-like sweet stories of Hari, which are an antidote against the fever in the form of miseries in Samsāra.

Antarikṣa said:

VR’s Text Adds:¹

2.1. The glorious Lord wishing to become many through his Māyā, created this universe. Though Jīva is pure spiritual essence, free from three guṇas, Māyā invested him with a body controlled by guṇas. The identification of the soul with one’s body is the delusion of Jīva (jīva-bhrama).

2.2. This Jīva-bhrama (delusion of the Jīva) is explained with reference to the waking, dreaming and the sleeping states of the Jīva (tat-prayukta-jāgrat-svapna-suṣupti-rūpāvasthātrayasambandhān ca vadan bhraman prapañcaayati/) The waking state is the misapprehension with reference to external sense; the dreaming state is with relation to the mind; in the sleeping state, the memory is dormant, unmanifest like seeds; and the fourth state is the Jīva’s condition in relation to paramātman. In this stage the Jīva is separate from the body which is the product of Prakṛti and that is the liberated state (prakṛtipari-ṇāmaka-satvār dhāvāh muktyavasthā iti)/.

2.3. The Jīva is pure consciousness untainted by passions etc. and free from states like dreaming, sleep, etc. He appears through Māyā to be possessed of those stages.

2.4. When the jīva realizes the transitory nature and futility of three forms of Māyā, he desists to work for trivial pleasures and becomes serene (upa-samyāti, bahiḥ, kṣudra-sukhār-thavyāpārān nivṛtto bhavātī).

¹ VR’s text adds here the above four verses but the Bhāgavata Vidyā-pītha (Ahmedabad) edition gives only the commentary of VR on these verses and not the original text. From what can be gleaned from the commentary, the above appears to be the contents of those verses.
Antarikṣa explained:

3. It is for the sake of enjoyment of objects and liberation of the embodied souls, his own rays, that the ancient-most Prime Person, the cause of all creation (or the Indwelling soul of all beings) evolved these great and small bodies, out of the five gross elements, O mighty-armed king.¹

4. In this way having entered as the inner-dweller (for the well-being of all the jīvas) into beings which are created out of the five elements,² God divides himself and appears as one (in the form of the mind), and ten (in the form of five cognitive and five conative senses), and enables them to enjoy the guṇas or objects of senses.

5. The master of the body—the jīva enjoys the objects of senses by means of sense-organs illumined (by the knowledge or activated) by the Inner Controller. He misapprehends this created body as himself and gets attached to it. (This is due to Māyā.)

6. The jīva who is conditioned with a physical body, performs with his sense-organs acts, as motivated by the tendencies resulting from acts done in the previous birth. He experiences both the pleasant and unpleasant fruits of karmas and revolvs in this Samsāra.³

7. In this way, going through various corporeal existences (in consequence of his Karma) which carry with them innumerable facts...

¹ SR states that Māyā, being indescribable, only its effects, viz. creation of the universe, etc. can be described. But according to EK, Māyā is unreal (miḥyā), non-existent like the son of a barren woman, the sky-flower, ‘water-catering centre’ of mirage, etc. The term avidyā means that which never exists.

—EB 2.32-52.

² EK: God enters his creation in the form off essential characteristics such as liquidity of water. Similarly, he devided himself in the sense-organs by becoming their essential function such as ‘seeing’ of the eye, ‘taste’ of the tongue. That we can enjoy an object through our senses is due to the particular capacity of the sense which (the capacity) is God.

—EB 2.86-129.

³ This verse explains why a jīva is not liberated after enjoying the objects of senses but suffers unending revolutions in Samsāra—SR.
able evils and miseries, the jīva, being helpless, experiences repeated births and deaths upto the dissolution of the universe.

8. When the dissolution of the gross elements is impending, the beginningless and endless eternal Time-Spirit forcibly withdraws this manifest universe consisting of gross substances and their subtle guṇas into its unmanifest cause (the mūla-prakṛti).

9. (When such dissolution is imminent) at that time a severe draught—absolutely rainless—will devastate the earth for one hundred years. And the scorching sun with its heat enhanced by the (destructive) Time-Spirit shall completely consume the three worlds by its heat.

10. Huge flames of fire emanating from the (thousand) mouths of the (serpent god) Śeṣa and burning the nether-world from its bottom, soar up high, burning down every thing and helped by the wind, they envelop the universe on all side.

11. The clouds of deluge called Aṅgālīka with each line of drop as thick as the trunk of an elephant, will pour down for one hundred years incessantly and the whole universe is sub-emerged in cosmic waters.

12. God Brahmā the Person (Deity) presiding over the universe leaves his conditioning universe (which has been now dissolved), enters the subtle Unmanifest like the fire entering into the unmanifested principle of fire, when the fuel is completely consumed.2

13. The earth being deprived of its distinguishing characteristic—smell is transformed into water and the water being divested of its special property, viz. liquidity, is changed into fire.

1. It is eternal Viṣṇu who as Kāla withdraws, etc.—V.J.

2. ŚR: After the termination of his office, god Brahmā should merge INTO Prakṛti like all jīvas, if god Brahmā be not a devotee of God. But he being a devotee of the Lord, is absorbed into Brahma. V.J. also accepts the merging of god Brahmā into paramātman. VR. takes this sing. Vairājya puruṣaḥ as representing all jīvas withdrawn into the mūla-prakṛti and the illustration of fire shows that their knowledge is narrowed down in that merged state. EK quotes Bh. P. 10.2.32,33 and emphasizes that bhakti (devotion) is the precondition of mukti (liberation). Merely the office of Brahmā is not enough for mukti.
14. Deprived of its property of colour by the Sātvartika (universe-ending) darkness, fire merges into air and air (vāyu) deprived of its special characteristic touch, is lost into the ether (or the sky). The ether in its turn, being divested of its characteristic property, viz. sound, by the Supreme Soul in the form of Time-Spirit (Kālātman) the ether gets merged into the ātman i.e. Tāmasic Ego.

15.* Sense-organs and Intellect enter the (rājasika) Ego while the mind along with the presiding deities of senses merges into the (sāttvika) Ego. And this Ego, with all its (sāttvika, rājasika and tāmasika) characteristics, merges with the Mahat which in its turn enters the Prakṛti.

16. We have now described to you the Māyā of the glorious Lord, characterised by three colours (i.e. guṇas such as sattva, rajas and tamas) and which brings about the creation and carries out the maintenance and destruction of the universe. What more do you wish to hear?

The King Nimi submitted:

17. O great sage! Be pleased to expound the way whereby persons who have identified their ‘I-ness’ (soul) with the gross (physical) body, will easily cross over this Lord’s Māyā from which it is very difficult to get liberation by persons with uncontrolled minds. Is there any path other than bhakti which has already been mentioned (supra 11.2.37).

Prabuddha explained:

18. Persons leading a householder’s life (living as husband and wife) and following the path of Karma for the removal of miseries and attainment of happiness, should observe and consider how contrary results are met by them.

19. (They should also consider:) What pleasure is derived from wealth which is so very difficult to obtain and

---

* VJ: The process of dissolution is as follows: Ākāśa into the Tāmasic Ego; senses, mind, intellect with their presiding deities into Taijasa Ego. The threefold Ego and its products into the Mahat which in its turn merges into Ātman. The Vīraṭ puruṣa withdraws all effects into their causes, and he enters into the subtle Unmanifest.
which (when obtained) entails nothing but miseries—a veritable death of one’s own? Or what happiness one can get after acquisition of houses (property), children, relatives and cattle which are so very transient.

20. One should know that in the same way (as in this world), the other (celestial) world, attained by performance of karmas is transient (and full of miseries). There is rivalry with the equals, jealousy towards the superiors and the fear of destruction (and termination of the period of the stay in celestial regions)¹, as we find it among the dependent princes (under an emperor), here (on the earth).

21. A person desirous of knowing the highest good, therefore, should resort to a preceptor who is expert in logical exposition of the Brahman couched in words (i.e. Upanisads and Srutis) and has realized the Supreme Brahman and (the sure index of which is that he) is well-established in the serenity of mind (and detachment).

22. Regarding his spiritual preceptor as his own self and his Deity (Hari), he should, by rendering sincere and devoted service to his preceptor, learn (and practise) the duties and ways of life of Lord’s votaries, so that Lord Hari who is the soul of the universe and confers self-realization (on his devotees), becomes pleased with him.

23. In the initial stage, one should learn (and practise) to detach his mind from everything (such as wife, children, property) and attach his mind to the pious persons (devoted to the Lord), and also should cherish mercy (to the subordinate and inferior beings), friendliness (with the equals) and modesty (towards the superiors) accordingly.

24. He should further imbibe the virtues of (mental and physical) purity, practise penance or religious duties, cultivate forbearance, observe silence (i.e. avoid unnecessary wastage of words), study the scriptures, practise straight forwardness, celibacy, non-violence and balanced attitude of mind under the stress of contradictory conditions (e.g. pleasure and pain, respect and insult, etc.).

25. He should realize that the Soul, as an intelligent existence, has pervaded the world and is the (omnipresent) Lord, the controller of the universe; and he should live in solitude, should not cherish any attachment to his house (property, relatives, etc.), wear washed rag-cloth or bark-garment (as dress) and remain contented with whatever one gets.

26. He should entertain firm faith in the scriptures glorifying the Lord, but should not denigrate scriptures of others. He should control his mind (by breath-control—prāṇāyāma), speech (by silence) and deeds (by non-attachment) should speak the truth and control his internal organ (the mind as well as the external senses).

27. He should always listen to, glorify and meditate on the incarnations, deeds and excellences of Lord Hari of miraculous deeds, and learn to dedicate all his acts (including performance of sacrifice and such other religious acts to him.

28. He should also learn to resign unto the Supreme Lord all his performances of sacrifice, worship, charitable gifts, penance performed, muttering of sacred syllables or names of God, his activities and whatever is dear to him such as (scents, flowers, etc.) and dedicate to the service of the Lord wives, children, houses (property) and his very life itself.

29. Thus he should entertain friendly relations to persons who have realized Lord Kṛṣṇa as their very Soul and as their protector or as the controller of all jivas. He should adore the Lord as abiding in both the mobiles and immobiles especially in men, and chiefly in the righteous men who observe their religious duties and out of them, specially in the devotees of the Lord.³

1. EK. explains that this dedication implies complete non-attachment to wives, children, etc. —EB. 3.565.

2. Udbhayatra: He should try to worship the Lord as abiding in the heart but if the Lord cannot be visualized within in spite of meditation, he should worship the images of the Lord which are both mobile and immobile. The chief images at ancient sites like Dwārakā or Pandharapur are the “immobile images” while the images on worships at home are “mobile” —EB-3.569-571.

3. Under mahātṣa EK. includes guru or the spiritual preceptor as the most important person to be served, as the guru and Brahman are identical—nay the guru is superior, as he introduces us to Brahman. And everything should be dedicated to the guru. —EB-3.576-581.
30. He should learn how to discuss with each other and sing of the sanctifying glory of the Lord. And in this way, in association with these, he should (forget rivalry, jealousy, etc. and) find spiritual joy, happiness and complete freedom from all miseries.

31. Remembering themselves and reminding each other of Hari who annihilates the mass of sins instantly, their devotion is developed unto Love divine and out of the thrill of ecstasy of this divine Love, the hair all over their bodies stand on their end (and this spiritual delight of the disciples, gives the spiritual preceptor the highest delight¹).

32. Devotees (who have reached such a stage) behave in an unconventional manner. They sometimes weep (out of anxiety to visualize him), some times burst out into laughing and feel delighted (at his remembrance), some times they go on talking (about his sportive acts), some times they dance (in ecstasy), some times they sing of him and imitate his acts. In this way, coming to realize him and attaining the Supreme bliss, they remain silent.

33. He who thus learns (and practises²) the duties and the way of life of the devotees of the Lord, develops Love divine and thereby becomes absolutely devoted to (and absorbed in) Lord Nārāyaṇa, and easily crosses the Māyā which is otherwise very difficult to transcend.

King Nimi asked:

34. As you are the foremost among those who have realized the Brahman, it behoves you to propound to me the nature of Brahman or the Supreme Soul which is also designated as Nārāyaṇa (Do the terms Brahman, Paramātmā and Nārāyaṇa denote the same attributeless entity or imply any special feature?).

¹ EK. vide EB 3.576-614.
² EK. emphasizes that one should resort to a spiritual preceptor and under his guidance learn and practise the duties and way of life of the Rhāgavatās. —EB 3.615.
Pippalāyana replied:

35. O lord of kings! Please do understand that to be the Supreme Reality, which (as Nārāyaṇa) is the cause of the creation, sustenance and dissolution (of the universe) but (being eternal and beginningless) is himself un-caused (and indulges in the above activity without any cause or motive); which (as Brahman) exists persistently in three states namely those of wakefulness, dream and deep sleep as also in the fourth supra-conscious) state, both during Samādhi (trance) as well as outside in other states also, animated by which (as Paramātman) the body, senses, vital breath and the mind carry out their own function (The three aspects viz. Nārāyaṇa, Brahman and Paramātman constitute one and the same Reality?

36.* Even as sparks of fire can neither illumine nor burn the fire, (their source) neither the mind, speech, the power of seeing, intellect, the vital breath and the sense-organs can enter (i.e. reach and comprehend) the Brahman. The word (i.e. the Vedas) which is (regarded as) authoritative in matters relating to Ātman indirectly hints at it by inference, as it denies

1. Although ŚR distinguishes the three aspects of Reality, viz. as the creator etc. of the universe (Nārāyaṇa), eternal existence in all states of consciousness, Samādhi, etc. (Brahman) and the animator of the body, vital breath, etc. (Paramātman), EK says that it is all Nārāyaṇa and to facilitate the realization of Brahman, he puts forth the Paramātman aspect and emphasizes that that which is within man as animator is the Brahman and Nārāyaṇa and that Paramātman, Brahman and Nārāyaṇa are one.

—EB 3.630-646.

* VJ: The terms mind, speech etc. indicate their presiding deities such as Rudra, Sarasvatī, Sūrya, Brahma, etc. These deities cannot comprehend the Paramātman. Lakṣmī the presiding deity of Veda cannot do it. The Veda conveys him negatively by eliminating what is not Paramātman. The goddess Lakṣmī indirectly conveys him to her cause.

VR : (The gist):

Flames are attributes of fire. Just as fire cannot be the object of cognition of flames, Brahman cannot be cognised by the mind, senses or the jīva. The Word (Vedānta or Śruti) conveys Brahman as its purport or implication. If the Brahman were non-existent, the statement of inability of senses or the mind to cognise it is meaningless. Denying the senses, etc., the power of cognition means that Brahman does exist and that the Veda is the only means of knowing the Brahman.
itself the power to describe it directly in positive terms. But in the absence of Reality, no negative description is possible.

37.* At the beginning (before the creation of the universe) there was one (Brahman) which came to be known as threefold Pradhāna consisting of the attributes Sattva, Rajas and Tamas. By the predominance of Rajas or its active creative power, it is called Sūtrātmā or Hiranyagarbha and with the dominance of Sattva or the power of knowledge it is termed as Mahat. When the condition of Avidyā is invested, it is called Jīva (Individual Soul) or Ahamkāra (Ego). This one Brahman becomes many and shines as deities (presiding over senses), the cognitive and conative senses and objects of senses as well as the resulting fruit, (viz. the experience of pleasure and pain, etc.) through his immensely powerful Māyā. The gross (i.e. the effects) and the subtle (i.e. their causes) are both (caused and) illumined by Brahman which is beyond the reach of both.

38. This soul (Ātmā) was not born and shall not die;

* EK: At the beginning there was only the Brahman Om. It became threefold in its three mātṛās, A-U-M of the nature of the three attributes, viz. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas. When these attributes are all in a balanced stage, it is called Pradhāna.

—EB, 3.703-701.

VR : (The gist only) Pradhāna is the common thread of Sattva, Rajas and Tamas. Mahat, Ahamkāra and Jīva are its products. The Jīva experiences the fruits of his acts—pleasure and pain through his senses. The Brahman is different from them and the intelligent and unintelligent creations constitute his body.

VJ : The verses summarise different views which identify Brahman with the Jīva, etc. These views are not correct. Brahman is distinct from and greater than what is known as cause and effect. [tayoh kārya-kāraṇayoḥ param vilakṣayaṁ bhinnam Brahma iti.

 VR (The latter half) : In every category of life (such as in the bodies of god, sub-human beings, etc.) the soul is always connected with Prākṛti, till he attains liberation (ā-mokṣat-Praṇāmi-sambandhavān) though essentially it is pure intelligence and knowledge (Jhāna-mātra-svarūpa). It is through the influence of senses that he appears to be divided and transformed, while he activates the body.

VJ. quotes his authorities and states that Brahman is always present as unmodified essence & unmixed consciousness, in all things which are subject to birth, death, change, etc. Just as the vital breath is called by the sense through which it functions, Brahman is described differently. Tathādriyagataḥ pṛṇas teṣāṁ Śaktyā vikalpate | evam sad-rūpakam Brahma tat-tacchaktyā vikalpyate || ekam eva mahā-sakti-pṛṇasyaḥpi bala-pradām ||
He neither grows nor does he decrease; He is the knower—the witness—of the times of the different states (such as youth, old age) of all bodies (just as the seer is different from the body). He is all-pervading, eternally unchanging pure consciousness-cum-existence. As in the case of Prāṇa, this consciousness-cum-existence appears as many, under the influence of senses.

39.* In whatever category of body—whether born of eggs or from wombs or from seeds or from sweat—the jīva is born, the vital force (prāṇa) follows him (himself remaining the same, unaffected by the category of the body), (similarly) when all the sense-organs (which are active in wakefulness) and the Ego (which functions in the dream state) remain oblivious (as in a deep sleep), the soul being devoid of conditioning states, alone persists in that stage as can be inferred from our remembrance (of having enjoyed a sound sleep).

40. If with intensive devotion generated through desire for seeking the feet of the lotus-navelled God, a person, by his own mental efforts, cleanses all the dirt and impurities clogged on his heart due to three guṇas and acts (resulting in merit or sin), the Soul (which pre-exists there) directly reveals himself in that extremely pure heart like the light of the sun become visible to clear eyes.

The King requested:

41. Be pleased to describe to us that Path of Action (Parama Yoga) being purified by which a man quickly shakes

39.* VR. (The latter half) : When we become oblivious of our body and the activities of the sense-organs, the Ego and the mind remain in abeyance (as in deep sleep), we jīvas realize the existence of the self (...dehāva-bhāsan vinā pāthavād ātmā svar āpa-prakāśo bhavati.)

EK. In deep sleep, the Ego lies dormant in Avidyā; hence we cannot visualize ātmān. It is after the elimination of Avidyā and Ego that the self-or Brahman is revealed.

—EB. 3.733-35.

VJ : (The gist only)

In the various categories of bodies jīva enters through the medium of Prāṇa and Paramātman. If Paramātman were absent, jīva could not have any memory of his state of deep sleep mṛtyu-sūpti-prabodhāder niyantā Hari ekādśī.
off all Karmas and attains the supreme knowledge attainable only through disassociation from all actions.

42.Formerly, I asked this very question to Sages (like Sanaka and others) in the presence of my father (Iksvaku). But those (mind-born) sons of god Brahma did not answer it. (Pray be pleased to explain to me the reason of their silence.

Avirhotra replied:

43. The classification of Karma into Karma (duties enjoined by Vedas), Akarma (acts prohibited by Vedas) and Vikarma (omission of Karma and commission of Akarma) belongs to the sphere of the Vedas and not within the range of ordinary parlance of men.

As the Vedas are the revelations from God, even wise sages stand confounded in their interpretations. (The sages whom you questioned were omniscient. But then you were of pre-mature age and could not have understood their explanation. Hence their silence then).

44. The Veda implies something deeper and different from what appears to be the superficial interpretation of the text. Just as a child is tempted with something sweet to make it swallow (the unpalatable) medicine (the object of the medicine being restoration of the child’s health and not the sweet thing that the child gets immediately after gulping down the medicine), similarly, the real object of the Veda is to liberate one from the bond of Karma and its consequence, for which Karmas are apparently prescribed.

45. (One should not indulge in dereliction of the prescribed Vedic duties from the beginning, prematurely thinking that liberation from Karmas is the real object in life). If a person being himself ignorant and having no control over his senses, does not perform the duties prescribed by the Vedas, due to the Adharma (the course of unrighteousness) in which he is involved by Vikarma (non-performance of the prescribed act and commission of the acts prohibited by the Veda), he goes from death to death (as he remains entangled in Samsara).

46. He who performs acts prescribed in the Veda but has no attachment to the fruits thereof and dedicates them to the Supreme Ruler, attains to that state of accomplishment\(^1\) (i.e. Mokṣa) in which Karma or its fruit does not bind him. The promise of fruits of Karmas is meant to create interest in the Karma.

47. Whoever is desirous of instantaneously cutting as under the knot (of egotism) of the heart of his self which is Brahma himself, should, in addition to the Vedic rites, perform the worship of Lord Keśava in the manner prescribed in the (Pāñcarātra) Tantra.

48. After getting oneself initiated (in the Tāntrika path) through the grace of the spiritual preceptor\(^2\) and being shown the technical method of worship by his guru, he should worship the Supreme Person in the form of (whatever) image (of the Lord) that he likes the best.

49. In a thorough clean state of the body, he should sit in front of the idol of God. He should cleanse his body (internally) by means of breath-control and other practices. He should armour himself by assigning the protection of various parts of his body to different deities\(^3\) and worship Lord Hari.

50-51. He should first purify the articles of worship (like flowers by removing insects if any and sprinkling water), the ground (by sweeping and washing), his ownself (by Nyāsa and

1. ŚR. explains; Just as a child is tempted to gulp medicine by offering ‘the fruit’ of sweet-meats, the promise of heaven to a sacrificer is for persuading a person to perform the Vedic Karma. He quotes Brhad. Up. and shows that Karma is an accessory of spiritual knowledge and the performer of Karma realizes it and loses the zest and attachment for Karmas. This non-attached pure state of mind leading to the realization of Brahma is attained by him. VR. thinks that such a person gives up all Karmas leading to Samsāra and attains Mokṣa.

EK. defines naiṣkarmya as the Karma dedicated to God and such Karma leads to realization of Brahma.

—EB. 3.793-802.

2. VD. insists on the selection of proper guru. Quoting a number of Purāṇic and other texts, he asserts that the spiritual preceptor should be a Brāhmaṇa householder possessing spiritual qualities, etc.

3. Nyāsa: —Assignment of the various parts of one’s body to different deities which is usually accompanied by prayers or pronunciation of some sacred symbolic syllables and corresponding gesticulations.

—ASD. P. 306.
concentration of the mind) and image of god (by removing the previous coating of sandal-paste and other articles). He should then purify, by sprinkling with water, his own seats and keep ready at hand articles of worship (such as water for washing the feet of Deity and other materials of worship). With his heart serene and concentrated, he should invoke the Lord (in the image, mentally). Performing the six nyāsas from the heart onwards, he should chant the mūla-mantra (the sacred syllables or names received by him from the preceptor) and worship the Lord with the available articles of worship as abiding both in the image and in his heart (wherein he should also instal him).

52-53. He should perform the worship of the image of the Lord including the various limbs of his persons, and the arms and emblems he holds (such as the discus Sudarśana and others) and the attendant deities (like Sunanda, Garuḍa). He should worship each form of the Lord chanting the sacred Mantra peculiar to it, offering water to wash his hands, feet and for ācamana (rinsing the mouth), etc. He should bathe the Deity and decorate it with cloth ornaments. According to the prescribed rites of worship, he should worship the Lord with sandal-paste, flowers, Akṣatas¹ (unbroken grains of rice to be applied to the Deity’s fore-head only), garlands, he should burn scented incenses before him and wave lights before him and offer food. After eulogising the Lord with appropriate hymns, he should prostrate himself before the Lord (i.e. Lord’s image).

54. He should worship the image of Hari (before himself) contemplating himself as being one with Hari. He should then place the relic of worship (such as flowers, etc.) on his own head, and deposit the image of Hari in its proper place and Lord Hari in his own heart.

55. He who worships the Lord, the Supreme Soul as present in the fire, the sun, the water, etc., in the guest (who arrives unexpectedly) and in his own heart, is liberated (from Saṁsāra) before long.

¹ As ŚR. notes the akṣatas are to be used for application on the forehead of Hari and not elsewhere in the worship. He quotes an authority which prohibits the use of akṣatas in Viṣṇu-worship and the Ketaki (flower) in Śiva’s worship.
CHAPTER FOUR

Description of the Lord’s Incarnations by Drumila

King Nimi said:

1. Be pleased to describe to us those various deeds performed by Lord Hari in his various incarnations which he has taken at his own sweet will, in the past, present and future.

Drumila replied:

2. He is a person of childish (immature) understanding who seeks to count the innumerable excellences and attributes of the Infinite Lord. It may be possible for him in the course of a long period of time and with extreme difficulty, to count the particles of dust on the earth, but never the excellences of Almighty Lord—the resort of all powers.

3. When, with the five elements evolved out of himself, Nārāyaṇa, the First Prime Deity, created this universe known as Virāj, like his own body, and entered it with a ray or part of his own (as Inner Controller) he came to acquire the epithet Puruṣa (the Indweller in the body).

4. The assemblage and arrangement of three worlds rest on the support of the Lord’s personality. Both the cognitive and conative sense-organs of all embodied beings function due to his sense-organs only. He is by himself knowledge or consciousness. It is through his birth that creatures derive their physical strength, the energy and strength of their senses and activity. Through Sattva and other attributes (viz. Rajas and Tamas), he became the Prime Agent of creation, subsistence and destruction of the Universe.

5. At the beginning of creation (of the Universe) this Prime Deity, in association with the attribute rajas appeared as Brahmā for the creation of universe; (associated with the attribute Sattva), he become Viṣṇu, the dispenser of the fruit of sacrifice and the protector of the twice-born castes (Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya and Vaiśya) and the religious order; associated with his attribute tamas, he became Rudra for the destruction of the universe. In this way, he from whom the creation, protection of the universe ever continues through the instrumentality of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra, is the First and Foremost Deity.

1. Or: The three worlds constitute a part of and exist within his person—SR.

6. As Nārāyaṇa and Nara, the foremost of the sages and of perfectly serene mind, he was born of Dharma and his spouse Mūrti, the daughter of Dakṣa. He expounded to sages (like Nārada) the path of action leading to the realization of the Soul (who is characterised by actionlessness). He practised (an ideal type of) penance and his feet are still served (and worshipped) by prominent sages.

7. Suspecting with the apprehension that this sage (Nārāyaṇa-Nara) covets to take possession of his position (as the king of heaven), Indra deputed Kāmadeva, the god of love, along with his troupe. Being ignorant of his (Nārāyaṇa’s) spiritual greatness, Kāmadeva went with his paraphernalia—a bevy of celestial damsels, the vernal season and the gentle wind (from the sandal-forests of Malaya) to his hermitage at Badarī, and hit him with shafts in the forms of side-glances of heavenly damsels.

8. Knowing perfectly well that the indiscretion has been committed by Indra, he laughed loudly without even slightly feeling the touch of pride (at his own moral strength). He assured the trembling visitors, “O (mighty) god of Love, O (South) wind, O heavenly damsels, do not be afraid. Please accept our hospitality (If no hospitality is offered, the hermitage would be as good as void). May our hermitage be non-void (i.e. worthy of its existence).”

9. When the sage Nārāyaṇa who removed their fear addressed them thus, the gods who bent their head low with shame, submitted to him, “O all-pervading Lord who are transcendental to the Māyā, this unpurturbedness in you is not surprising. You are the Supreme Self subject to no modifications, and your lotus-feet are respected with obeisance by hosts of sages who revel in the bliss of self-realization.

10. (It is not surprising that we should behave according to our nature and create obstacles in your penance). A number of obstacles are created by gods in the path of your servants (devotees) who want to transcend the abode of gods (the heaven), and attain directly to your highest region. No impediments obstruct the path of others who offer in sacrifices the respective shares of gods as oblations. But as you are the protector of your devotees, your votary sets his foot on the heads of obstacles (and trampling them down ascends to Vaikuṇṭha).

11. (When your non-devotees perform penance they fall a victim to us—the erotic passion or the passion called Anger). Those who cross the immeasurable oceans in the form of tempters like us overcome hunger, thirst, (extremes of climate in) three seasons (viz. the summer, rains and the winter), winds and curb the palate and the sexual urge, succumb to futile anger and thereby waste their austerities in uttering imprecations). They are like ocean-crossers who get themselves drowned in the cavity caused by a cow’s hoof.”

12. While they were praising him thus, the Almighty Lord, (in order to humble down the pride of beauty of celestial nymphs and others) created by Yogic Power and showed them women of marvellous beauty, all well adorned with costly ornaments and garments, waiting upon himself.

13. When those attendants of gods (viz. Kāma, the spring season, heavenly ladies) saw women beautiful like goddess Śrī, (their pride for their own beauty was humbled down and) their own complexion became faded at the excellence of the superior beauty of those women and they were enraptured with fragrance of their bodies.

14. The god of the Lord of gods (Nārāyaṇa) laughingly told them who were bowing to him with humility, “Choose any one of these women who is suitable, as an ornament of the celestial world.”

15. Saying “so be it”, the servants of gods complied with his Command. They selected Urvaśi, the most beautiful among heavenly damsels and repaired to the celestial regions following her.

16. They paid their respects to Indra in the assembly of gods and while all gods were eagerly listening, described to him the superior spiritual power of Nārāyaṇa at which Indra was astonished and became afraid (at his indiscretion in offending Nārāyaṇa).

17. It is for the good of the world that Lord Viṣṇu incarnated with a ray (part) of his own, in the form of a swan (to expound Jñāna yoga to god Brahmā when questioned by his sons), as Datta (the son of Atri) as the ever celibate Sanatkumāra, as our father Rṣabha. Taking the form of Hayagrīva (a horse-necked God), he killed the demon Madhu and recovered the Vedas from him.

18. In his incarnation as a Fish, at the time of deluge (at the end of Kalpa), he protected Manu, the earth and the sages and (seeds of all) plants and herbs. In his descent as a divine Boar, he killed demon Hiraṇyākṣa, the son of Diti, while he was lifting up the earth from the bottom of the sea. Assuming the form of divine Tortoise, he supported the mount (Mandara) on his back at the time of churning the ocean for nectar. Descending as Hari, he rescued from the jaws of a crocodile the afflicted king of elephants who appealed to him for succour.

19. He rescued the sages (called Vālakhilyas) who were thumb-sized and who, while they went to fetch samidhīs for sage Kaśyapa, fell into a hollow created by cow’s hoofs who were drowning as if in a sea (and were therefore, ridiculed by Indra) and were praying him (for life). He absolved Indra also who was involved in the darkness (of the sin of slaying a Brāhmaṇa) due to his killing of Viśrtra (who was a Brāhmaṇa). He set free the heavenly ladies who lay helplessly imprisoned in the houses of Asuras. For ensuring freedom from fear for the righteous people, he incarnated as a Man-lion and killed Hiranyakāśipu, the King of Asuras.

20. In every Manvantara, during the wars between gods and Asuras, he incarnated with his rays for the sake of gods and killing the leaders of Asuras, he protected the three worlds. Appearing as the divine Dwarf (Vāmana), he, under the pretext of requesting for alms took away this earth from Bali and gave it back to gods, the sons of Aditi.

21. Incarnating as Paraśurāma, the conflagration born in the Bhṛgu clan for destroying the forest in the form of Haihayā family, he extirpated the Kṣatriyas from the surface of the earth twenty times. As Rāma, the consort of Sītā, he constructed a bridge across the sea (to Laṅkā) and killed the ten-headed Rāvana destroying his sort of Laṅkā. Victorious is Rāma whose glory destroys the Sins of the world.

22. For the removal of the burden of earth, the eternal, birthless Lord will take birth in the race of Yadus, and will accomplish feats which would be very difficult even for gods to perform. Then he would incarnate as Buddha and would delude by his disputations and dialectics those who, though ineligible, will try to perform sacrifices. And ultimately at the end of Kali Age, he will descend as Kalki and exterminate the Śūdra rulers.

23. O mighty-armed Janaka (Nimi)! Innumerable are such incarnations and deeds of the Lord of the universe of immense glory (a few of which have been recounted to you.

CHAPTER FIVE

Nature and Fate of non-Devotees: Yuga-Wise Methods of Worshipping the Lord

The King (Nimi) enquired:

1. O sages, foremost among those who have realized the Ātman! What is the condition and fate of those persons who do not mostly adore Lord Hari and whose desires are still unsatiated and whose minds and senses uncontrolled?

Camasa replied:

2. From the mouth, arms, thighs and feet of the Supreme Person were severally originated the four varṇas (classes of society) along with the Āśramas (Stages in life). According to their predominant characteristic qualities (viz. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas and their combinations), they were distinctly classified as Brāhmaṇa, Kṣattriya, Vaiśya and Śūdra.

1. SR states that this verb in the present tense (Jaṭāti) indicates that this dialogue took place while Rāma was alive. The use of the future tense with reference to Kṛṣṇa and others supports this view.
3. Out of these, those who do not adore the Supreme Ruler, their direct Originator, either through ignorance or through negligence of that Great Person, lose their present status and fall down into hell.

4. Women, persons from Śūdra and such other classes (who are denied the opportunity and hence) are away from (the places or chances of) hearing the stories of Hari and also from listening to the songs of the excellent qualities of Hari,\(^1\) deserve compassion from sages like you. (It behoves you to guide them in the path of Devotion.)

5. But Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and Vaiśyas, by virtue of their original birth, and second birth through their Upanayana (investiture of the sacred thread) ceremony (become eligible for studies, performance of sacrifices, etc.), stand in the proximity of Lord's feet. But even they are deluded (to become attached to the fruit of their Karmas) by accepting the Arthavāda (apparent and superficial meaning) of the Vedas.

6. These persons are ignorant of the method of performing Karmas (without getting themselves involved in the fruits of the acts), being conceited fools, they regard themselves as the learned ones (and hence do not seek guidance of others for the technique of performing Karmas without getting bound by them). These fools being fascinated and impatient by the sweet words of the Vedas (promising happiness in heaven) indulge in sweet talk.

7. Due to the influence of Rajas, they are ruthless in their designs; are lustful and revengeful like serpents. These wicked, conceited hypocrites laugh at the real devotees who are beloved of Hari.

8. Addicted to sexual pleasures, they adore (and cajole) women. Living in houses dominated with craving for conjugal pleasures, they talk to each other of their (present and prospective) achievements (or they wish each other to be blest with wives, children, prosperity). They perform sacrifices without observing the correct procedure or distribution of (adequate) food or giving of (the due) sacrificial fees. They kill animals for personal appetite unmindful of the consequences of such destruction of life.

---

\(^1\) Or : are far from i.e. cannot approach those who extol the excellences of the Lord (in Kirtana).

9. Being elated with the pride of wealth, prosperity, lineage, learning, munificence, personal beauty, physical power and superior aptitude for action, these wicked people get blinded and despise not only righteous devotees beloved of Lord Hari, but also the Supreme Lord Himself.

10. Persons lacking in the wisdom do not care to listen what is explicitly sung in the Vedas about the Supreme Lord—that he is the eternal principle permeating everything like the sky and is the beloved-most Indwelling soul in all embodied beings. They interpret the Vedas suitably as sanctioning their desires (for women, wine, etc.).

11. It is the natural tendency of creatures to indulge in sexual intercourse, and enjoy non-vegetarian food and wine. No injunction for these is necessary from the Veda. The Veda provides a check over this by allowing sexual intercourse with one's married wife (at the proper time of the period), eat meat at the end of a sacrifice and drink wine during the Sautrāmaṇi sacrifice (but never otherwise). The real intention of the Vedic injunctions (in these matters) is to make a person abstain from them.

12. The only object of wealth is to bear fruit, viz. dharma. It leads to spiritual knowledge and direct realization of the soul and supreme peace (mokṣa). But people utilise their wealth for the family or personal comfort and fail to take cognisance of the god of death, the formidable and inexorable enemy of their bodies.

13. The smelling of wine (in the Sautrāmaṇi sacrifice) is laid down as its intake (and no drinking of liquor is permitted); a beast is to be (symbolically) offered to the deities (by touching it) in sacrifices, but no killing for meat-eating is allowed; similarly, sexual intercourse (with one's wife) is to be indulged in for procreation but not for sexual enjoyment. But people do not understand this pure course of their own dharma.

14. But those wicked persons who do not know the real nature of Dharma, and being obstinate and haughty, consider themselves to be righteous and kill beasts without any remorse and are reciprocally eaten by those very beasts in the next world in hell.

15. These godless people hate Lord Hari—their very indwelling self who abides in the bodies of others as well (as their Soul); and fixing their attachment to their mortal body and its relatives (wives, sons, etc.), they fall down deep into hell.

16. Those who have not grasped the correct knowledge of Reality and have crossed the stage of total ignorance (by possessing imperfect knowledge) regard themselves as non-momentary (permanent), and pursue the three objectives of human life (Dharma, Artha and Kama); such persons (who thus follow a suicidal path) ruin themselves.

17. Such people shrouding their Self in ignorance and with their desires unrequited, mistake ignorance (i.e. Karma) for knowledge. Being thwarted in achieving their objects and their hopes and wishes being frustrated by the Time-Spirit they ruin themselves (and suffer misery).

18. Persons, averse to Lord Vasudeva, are compelled against their will to abandon their household, children, friends and wealth (property) acquired by them with great efforts and are forced to enter into the dark hell (i.e. ignorance).

The King Nimi said:

19. Be pleased to explain to us now, in which ages (yugas) of what complexion and form and by what names is the Lord known and with what rites of worship he is worshipped by men.

Karabhajana replied:

20. In the ages Krita, Treta, Dwapara and Kali, Lord Keśava assumes different forms, complexions and names and he is to be worshipped in different ways.

21. In the Krita age, the Lord is of fair (white) complexion, has four arms, wears matted locks of hair, is clad in bark-garments and deer-skin; he puts on a sacred thread and carries in his hands a rosary of Rudrākṣa, a staff and a water-jar of gourd.

1. Aturya nama te lokā andhena tamasa" uṣṭāh/ iāns te pratyaḥbhigacchanī ye ke cātmahana janāḥ || Iṣa, Up.
22. Men of that Age are quiescent by nature; entertain no feeling of enmity, are friendly towards all and look upon all beings as equals. They worship the Deity with penance, meditation, control of mind and the senses.

23. The Lord is addressed with the epithets Haṁsa, Suparnā, Vaikuṇṭha, Dharma, Lord of Yoga, Amala, Īśvara, Puruṣa Avyakta (the un-manifest) and Paramātman (the Supreme Soul), in that age.

24. In the age called Tretā, he the Lord is red in complexion, has four arms and wears a zone of three cords (round his waist indicating initiation), he has golden locks of hair. He, being the embodiment of sacrifice as described in the three Vedas, carries in his hand śruk, śrubā (ladles and spoons for offering oblations in the fire and other accessories for performing sacrifices.

25. In that age, righteous men who are the expounders of the Vedas, worship Lord Hari, the embodiment of gods, through (rites prescribed in) the three Vedas.

26. He is then called Viṣṇu, Yajña, Priśnigarbha (the son of Priśnī, the wife of Prajāpati Sutapas), Sarva-deva, Urukrama, Vṛṣākapi, Jayanta and Urugāya.

27. In the Dvāpara age, the Lord is bluish (like the atasi-hemp-flower) in complexion. He wears yellow silken cloth and bears all his original arms (like Sudarśana discus, Kaumodakī mace and others). He is distinguished by his characteristic marks like Śrivatsa (on his bosom).

28. In that age, people desirous of knowing the Supreme Brahman worship that Supreme Man characterised by the emblem of a sovereign emperor (white umbrella, chouries, etc.) with (the rites prescribed both in) the Vedas and Tantra texts.

29. Salutations to Vāsudeva, bow to Saṅkarṣaṇa; obeisance to Pradyumna and Aniruddha, to you O glorious Lord (in the four manifestations or Vyūhas).

30. Hail to the (perfect) sage Nārāyaṇa, the Supreme person, the All-pervading Lord, the Ruler of the Universe, the Indwelling Soul of all created beings.

31. It is in this manner, O Lord of the earth, that they extol the Ruler of the universe. Now listen to me how people worship him with rites prescribed in various Tantric Texts.
32. It is known to all that highly intelligent and discerning people, through sacrifices mostly consisting of chanting his name and extolling his glory, worship that Lord of dark complexion but brilliant (like Sapphire) in lustre. The Lord who is perfect in every limb, beautified with ornaments (like Kaushtubha gem and others), equipped with his weapons and missiles (like the discus Sudarśana) and accompanied with his attendants (like Sunanda and others).

33. O Supreme Person! Protector of the votaries (who bow to your feet), I salute your lotus-feet which are even worthy of being meditated upon, which end all the insults and insubordinations (suffered from the members of the family and one's own sense-organs), bestow all the desired objects, the resort of all sacred places, are praised by god Śiva and Brahmā, an asylum—worthy of taking refuge, annihilate the afflictions of your servants (devotees) and which is a boat for crossing the sea of Samsāra.

34. O the most religious-minded King (Nimi), I bow to the lotus-feet which, at the word of his father (Daśaratha), resigned his prosperous kingdom which was covetable even to gods and hence was very difficult to give up, and departed to the forest, and which gave chase to an illusory deer which was desired by his beloved (Sītā)—To those lotus-feet I bow, O exalted Person.

35. In this manner, O King, glorious Lord Hari, who confers all blessings, is worshipped under different names and forms appropriate to the Age (e.g. Kṛta, Tretā) by men belonging to the particular Age.

36. Noble discerning persons who know the excellences and essentials, appreciate Kali Age in which all the desired ideals in human life are fully accomplished by merely singing the name and deeds of Hari.

37. To persons who are wandering in the cycle of Samsāra in this world, there is no higher gain than this¹ (glorification and singing the name and deeds of the Lord); for it is by virtue of it, that a person attains sublime serenity and the Samsāra in his case comes to an end.

1. EK. Poetically explains how four types of muktis (liberation), viz. salokātā, sanātītā, sarūpatā and sṛṣyātā are attained during the Kirtana (glorification of Hari's names and deeds)—EB 5.425-440.

38. Persons belonging to the ages like Kṛta and others (Tretā and Dvāpara) wish to be born in the Kali Age, O King. It is certainly in the Kali age alone that persons exclusively devoted to Lord Nārāyaṇa will be born.

39-40. O great King! such (exclusive devotees of Lord Nārāyaṇa) will be born in some place here and there (in Kali age), but a majority of them will be born in the Dravidian lands wherein flow the rivers, the Tāmraparṇī, the Kṛta-mālā, the Payasvini, the sacred-most Kāverī and the western Mahānadi. People who drink water from these rivers become pure in heart and generally turn into votaries of the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, O ruler of men.

41. (With the realisation that Lord Vāsudeva abides everywhere and hence) entertaining no notion of difference (or absolutely giving up all duties prescribed by Sāstras, he, who, with all his heart, seeks resort in Mukunda (Viṣṇu), the shelter of all beings, is under no obligations of gods, sages, creatures, relatives and people, nor is he the servant of any of these. (Hence the performance of the pañca-mahāyajñas which is obligatory for all according to Sāstras, is not applicable to him. He is above the prescriptions and interdictions of the Sāstras).

42. (A devotee stands in no need of expiation for the non-observance of the prescriptions of Dharma). As Lord Hari, the Supreme Ruler, abides in the heart of his devotee who sought shelter at his feet, giving up attachment to his body, etc., (and is not propitiating any other god), the devotee (does not go astray but) if perchance, he commits any sin (due to the force of previous karma), Lord Hari absolves him of all sins.

Nārada said:

43. Thus having listened to the exposition of the course of duties meant for the devotees of the glorious Lord, Nimi, the king of Mithilā, became highly delighted. Accompanied by his family priest, he duly worshipped the nine sages, the sons of Jayantu.

44. Thereupon, immediately all the Siddhas vanished while all people remained merely looking on. The king also practised the duties (the Bhāgavata way of propitiating the Lord) and attained to the highest state (viz. Mokṣa).

45. O highly fortunate Vasudeva! If entertaining no attachment and with devout faith, you follow the Bhāgavata course of conduct, you also will reach the highest goal.

46. The whole world is filled with the fame of you both (Vasudeva and your queen Devakī) as the Supreme Lord Hari is pleased to accept you as his parents (lit. is pleased to be your son).

47. Your soul has been already purified by cherishing parental affection to Kṛṣṇa (as your son) by his sight, embrace, conversation as also by sleeping and sitting with him and by feeding him.

48. If inimical Kings like Śiśupāla, Pauṇḍra, Śālva and others brooded over him with hatred (all the while) while sleeping, sitting, etc. and had their mind transformed, as it was deeply impressed with his gait, graceful activities, glances, etc. and could attain to the semblance of his personality (the Sarūpatā type of liberation), what need be said of those whose mind is deeply attached to him.

49. You should not entertain the notion that Lord Kṛṣṇa is your child; for he is the Supreme Ruler, the soul abiding in all beings, the immutable transcendence who has concealed his Supreme nature by assuming a human form, by the dint of his Māyā potency.

50. In order to annihilate the demonic Kṣattriyas who, being vćorable Asuras, were a burden to the earth and for the protection of the good and for conferring liberation from Saṁsāra on them, Lord Kṛṣṇa has descended on the earth, and his glory spreads all over the universe.

Śri Śuka said:

51. Having listened to this, the highly fortunate Vasudeva and the blessed-most Devakī were extremely astonished and the infatuation (of parental affection to Kṛṣṇa) was dissipated (from their mind).

52. Whoever with a concentrated mind understands and retains in memory the sacred account (of the discourses of nine Siddhās) will shake off the illusion (of Saṁsāra) here and become eligible to attain the Brahma-hood.
CHAPTER SIX

Lord Kṛṣṇa Requested to return to Vaikuṇṭha: Uddhava’s Desire to follow him

Śrī Suka resumed:

1. Then after the departure of Nārada who discoursed with Vasudeva about the spiritual love discussed in previous chapters, god Brahmā accompanied with his (mind-born) sons (like Sanaka, Sanandana and others), gods (such as Indra), and Lords of creation (e.g. Marici and others) approached Kṛṣṇa at Dvāraka. And god Śiva who blesses all beings with happiness or the Lord of the past and the future creation, also came there, surrounded by hosts of goblins.

2-4. The divine Lord Indra with Maruts (the forty-nine wind-gods), the (twelve) sun-gods, (eight) Vasus, two Aśvini-Kumāras (divine physicians), Ṛbhus, Aṅgirās, (eleven) Rudras, (the group of ten deities known as) Viśve-devas, the Sādhyas and other divinities, Gandharvas (celestial musicians), Apsarās (divine damsels and dancers), Nāgas, Siddhas, Cāraṇ- as, Yakṣas, Sages, Manes, or human ancestors, along with Vidyādharas and Kinnaras—all arrived together at Dvāraka with a desire to see Lord Kṛṣṇa—Kṛṣṇa who, by his attractive personality, fascinated the minds of all human beings, and spread all over the worlds his glory which washes off the sins of all people.

5. In that city brilliant with the splendour of abounding prosperity and affluence, they, with unsatiated eyes, gazed at the wonderful form of Lord Kṛṣṇa.

6. They covered the foremost of Yadus (i.e. Lord Kṛṣṇa) with (garlands of) flowers available only in the celestial garden (like Nandana) and eulogised that Lord of the universe, with hymns couched in charming words conveying wonderful thoughts (arranged as in rhetorics).

Gods praised:

7. With our reasoning faculty, cognitive and conative senses, our vital principle (activitating our bodies), mind and speech, we lay ourselves prostrate O Lord, at your lotus feet which are contemplated upon within their hearts by those who are full of devotion unto you and wish to extricate themselves from the complicated strong noose (net) of Karmas. But we are wonderfully lucky on visualizing you directly while bowing, for the meditators can merely contemplate without seeing you.

8. Stationed (as a controller) in the three guṇas (sattva, rajas and tamas), you create, protect and destroy this manifest, incomprehensible universe within yourself through your Māyā power consisting of its three guṇas. But, O invincible Lord, you are not at all affected by any of these acts (mentioned above). For you are absolutely free from attachment and other defects and are completely absorbed in your obvious eternal, essential bliss.

9. O praise-worthy Lord! The purification of the minds of persons with evil propensities (like sensualism, etc.) does not effectively take place to that extent, through worship, learning, Vedic studies, charitable gifts, penance and other ritualistic acts (prescribed in Śāstras) as that brought about in the minds of persons with sāttvika nature, through the ever-increasing pure faith and devotion engendered by listening to your glory, O Supreme Lord.

10. May your feet be like a fire to burn down our inauspicious and evil inclinations (to enjoy worldly pleasures)—your feet which are born (i.e. contemplated) by sages in their hearts moistened (with devotion), for the sake of the summum bonum (or Mokṣa), which are worshipped by your devotees in Your (four) manifestations (viz Vāsudeva, Saṅkarṣaṇa, Pradyumna and Aniruddha) for the attainment of glory similar to you which, the self-possessed and intelligent ones (out of your votaries) worship three time a day, with a desire to transcend the

1. ŠR quotes a traditional verse which gives a different list of the eight parts of the body in prostration sājaṅga namaskāra) They are : feet, hands, knees, chest, head, sight, mind and speech. The verse is as follows :

    dombhyām padabhyaṁ jānūbhyāṁ urasaṁ śrastaṁ dṛśā /
    manasaṁ vacasā ceti praṇāmaṁ śaṅgaṁ tṛṣṭāḥ√

2. Savanāsāḥ (Literally) : According to the time when the soma juice is extracted out of the Soma plant in a sacrifice, which is done three times a day, viz. in the morning, at noon and in the evening.
Svarga (and attain directly Vaikuntha which is beyond the region called Svarga).

11. (Your feet)—which are contemplated upon, O Lord, by sacrificers taking in their palms purified and controlled (by Śāstric injunctions), the oblation according to the procedure laid down in the three Vedas, for offering them into the sacrificial fire and which are meditated upon by Yogins in their Yogic practice with a view to comprehending your Māyā (the bestower of super-human mystic powers) and thereby aspiring to possess those powers, and which are worshipped every-where (and at all times) by the highest type of your votaries (who are free from all desires), for the sake of liberation from Samsāra.

12. O Lord! May your feet ever act as a fire burning down all evil propensities in our hearts—your feet which accept with pleasure, as duly offered, articles of worship, the faded garlands of forest flowers (offered by your devotees) with which even this glorious goddess Lakṣmī envies like a rival co-wife.

13. O glorious Lord! May your feet purify all the sins of us, your votaries—your feet, O perfect and almighty Lord, which (at the time of ousting Bali from his kingdom) covered the universe in three strides but which (in the second stride) reached Satyaloka, whence it shone as the topmost flag of which the river Gaṅgā flowing over the three worlds, became a threefold streamer; which struck terror and assured from

1. ŚR raises the objection that in a sacrifice the deity (e.g. Indra) to whom the oblation is to be offered, is to be contemplated by pronouncing the word Vajra and not the Lord, and answers that whatever deity is thus contemplated, it is the Lord of the sacrifice who is ultimately meditated, though the deity to whom oblation is so offered be Indra or Varuṇa, etc.

EK. separates the Yogis from the seekers of Siddhis. According to EK. (1) sacrificers, (2) Yogis, (3) Seekers of the nature of the Māyā and (4) the highest types of desire-less votaries meditate upon the Lord’s feet. These votaries realize that the Lord is every-where, hence they worship him so.

2. Out of six categories of the servants of the Lord, viz. sages, Sātvatas, Ātma-vids (Seekers after the Self), sacrificers, Yogis and the highest votaries, the last type of devotees are more beloved of the Lord than even goddess Lakṣmī—ŚR.
fear the armies of Asuras and gods respectively and which leads the righteous to the heaven and the wicked to the hell.

14.* May the feet of the Supreme Person (Puruṣottama) enhance our happiness—Puruṣottama under whose control as the Time-Spirit, all embodied beings like god Brahmā and others who are harassing each other (by warfare, etc.) obey like bulls controlled by the nose-string (perforated through their nose) and (you) who are transcendent to both Prakṛti and Puruṣa.

15. You are the Supreme Person (Puruṣottama) the ultimate cause of the emergence, continuance, and disappearance of this universe. The Śrutis call you, the Time-Spirit, as the controller and destroyer of Prakṛti, Puruṣa and the Mahat (principle of cosmic intelligence). As time (counted by a year of twelve months), you possess three navels (three four-monthly periods of the Summer, the rainy season and the winter) and with inexorable yet imperceptible speed, you are engaged in finishing with all.¹

16. Having derived seminal power from you, the Puruṣa (Īśvara) of unfailing energy deposits with Māyā the principle called Mahat like a child in the womb, that Mahat, being endowed with that seminal force creates out of itself this golden egg (universe) with its (seven external) sheaths² enveloping it.

17. O Lord of sense-organs! Inasmuch as you are not attached even while enjoying the objects of senses evolved by

* VJ. takes the presiding deities of the senses which cause pleasure or pain as the ‘gods’ who are under the control of Hari’s feet. The nose-string is the span of life of hundred years The Lord has no attachment to these embodied beings. The almighty Time-Spirit is superior to Prakṛti and Puruṣa.

1. Cf. asmāt kṣaram attīk‘ham akṣarād api cottaṃah/ato‘smi loka Vede ca prathītyaḥ Puruṣottamaḥ]////

—BG, 15.18

. VJ. gives a Purānic turn to this process of evolution as follows: Pradhāna=Lakṣmi, Mahat=the four-faced god Brahmā, Śeṣa=Āhānkāra. But the explanation is complicated: Parabrahman or Nārāyaṇa sported with Lakṣmi during mahā-pralaya, brought forth Puruṣa who infused his energy into Lakṣmi (Pradhāna) and the four-faced god called Puruṣa and Gāyatri called Pradhāna are created and Gāyatri called Śraddhā through Gāyatri known as Pradhāna”.

2. The Sheaths are: the five gross elements, the mind and ego.
the modification of the guṇas—the attributes of your Māyā, you are, therefore, the sovereign Lord of the mobile and immobile creations, while other jivas (or even Yogins) are afraid of (i.e. are bound by longing for) the objects of enjoyment they have renounced or do not exist.

18. You are unattached to the sense-objects for with all their seductive charms (like arrows of the god of Love) and other erotic ways of effectively conveying the messages of love communicated by their arched eyebrows expressing their heart-felt love and through their smiles and side-glances, your sixteen thousand wives were not able to affect or agitate your mind.

19. The streams of nectar in the form of your sweet stories and rivers like the Gaṅgā that flow forth washing your feet—both are capable of deterring all the sins of the three worlds. Your votaries who abide by the pure duties prescribed for their stage of life and class in the society partake of both kinds of Tīrthas (holy waters)—one in the form of your glories extolled in the Vedas and the other the water of the Gaṅgā flowing forth from your feet—the former, by means of their ears and the latter, with their bodies.

20. God Brahmā, the performer of a hundred sacrifices, accompanied by god Śiva and other celestials eulogized Lord Hari (in a hymn) and standing up in the sky (all the while) bowed to Kṛṣṇa and submitted the following prayer.

_Brahmā said:_

21. O Lord! You were formerly entreated by us to relieve the earth of her burden; that has been accomplished by you according to our prayer; O Indwelling Soul of all.

22. The righteous course of life has been firmly established by you among the pious people who are pledged to the truth. Your glory which washes off the sins of all the world, has been diffused in all directions.

23. Incarnating yourself in the race of Yadu, and assuming excellent-most charming form, you have performed deeds of extra-ordinary powers for the good of the world.

24. O controller of the World! Those righteous people who, in the Kali age, listen to and extol your (sportive) deeds, will easily cross the darkness (of Samsāra).
25. O Supreme Person, hundred and twenty five Autumns (years) have elapsed since your worship appeared in the family line of Yadu, O Lord.

26. O Support of the universe! No work that was to be achieved for the sake of gods, has remained unaccomplished. As to your race, it is as good as extinct through the curse of Brähmaṇas.

27. If you are pleased to approve of it, be pleased to re-enter your own supreme abode and protect us, your servants along with all the worlds and their guardian deities (by blessing us with a visit to our region and accepting worship from us).

The Veṅkaṭeśvara edition adds

Sri Śuka said:

27-A. The glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa who was thus praised by gods like Brahmā and others, the Lord who assumed a human form through his Māyā, approved of their prayer and repied to them, O King.

The Lord replied:

28. I have already determined whatever you have spoken to me, O Chief of Gods. All of your work has been accomplished and the burden of the earth has been lightened.

29. That this clan of Yādavas, grown insolent by their prowess, valour (required for defence and aggression in battle) and affluence, is desirous of subjugating the whole world, but like unto the shore keeping in check (the flow-tide of) the ocean, I have controlled them.¹

30. If I depart from the earth without destroying this enormous clan of power-drunk, insolent Yadus, the whole world shall be destroyed by this surging tide of Yadus which has crossed its limits.

31. The process of annihilation of the Yādava family has been already set in motion by the curse of Brāhmaṇas. It is after the complete destruction of this race that I shall visit your region (en route to Vaikuṇṭha). O sinless Brahmadeva.

¹. Vṛ: Yādavas...are desirous of returning to celestial region (Yādavas were the gods who descended in the Yādava race to help God achieve His purpose. They are naturally eager to return to their own region). (But this interpretation is not consistent with the next verse).

Sri Suka resumed:

32. Thus, addressed by Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the universe, the self-born god Brahmā paid obeisance to him and returned to his region along with the hosts of gods.

33. Then, noticing that serious evil omens were appearing over the city of Dvārakā, the Lord advised the elderly Yadus who had assembled there.

The glorious Lord said:

34. These extremely ominous portents are verily appearing on all sides; and an imprecation from Brāhmaṇas which is very difficult to avert, has now been pronounced against our race.

35. Hence, it is not desirable to stay any longer here, if we wish to remain alive, O elderly Yādavas. Let us start just today to go to the highly sacred place Prabhāsa. Please do not delay any further.¹

36. It was at Prabhāsa, that the moon god who, under the curse of Dakṣa, was affected with consumption, but was immediately cured of the disease by performing ablutions in the sacred waters thereof, regained the waxing of his digits.

37-38. Let us perform ablutions in the sacred waters thereof (at Prabhāsa) and please our manes (ancestors) and gods by offering libation of water. Let us also feed worthy Brāhmaṇas with dainty, tasteful food and devoutly donate valuable gifts to deserving persons. It will be by virtue of our precious charitable gifts that we shall cross over (i.e. be absolved of) all our sins, as people cross the sea with the help of boats.

¹ SR explains that Yādavas who were arīyas of Devas were not eligible immediately to attain Mokṣa. Had they died at Dvārakā, they would have straight-way attained Mokṣa like the flight of bird. Hence Kṛṣṇa led them to Prabhāsa whereafter death, they would attain immediate prosperity and gradually attain Liberation in due course.
Sri Śūdra said:

39. Directed by the Lord in this way, O delight of your family, the Yādavas made up their minds to shift to that sacred place and began to get ready their chariots.

40-41. O King, observing these (preparations of Yādavas) and having heard the advice given by the Lord, and noticing the terrible portents, Uddhava, who was earnestly devoted to and waiting upon Lord Kṛṣṇa, approached him in a secluded place (i.e. when he was alone). He bowed at the feet of the Lord of the rulers of the world, with his head and with folded palms, he submitted to Kṛṣṇa as follows:

42. "O Supreme Ruler of gods, O Master of yoga, O Lord of hallowing glory, I believe that your lordship means to depart from this world after exterminating this Yādava race, inasmuch as, you, though competent to do so, did not counteract the curse of Brāhmaṇas.

43. O Kṛṣṇa, I cannot bear separation from you even for half a moment. Hence, O Lord, take me also with you to your region.

44. Your sportive acts, O Kṛṣṇa, which are highly auspicious to people, are sweet like nectar to the ear after tasting which once, people cease to have any other craving for wealth, wives, children.

45. How can we, your devotees who have attended upon you while you were in bed, were sitting, wandering, staying at home, bathing, playing or having your meal, live without you (lit. abandon you) who are our very soul. (We shall not be able to bear separation from you).

46. (It is not through the fear of Māyā that we pray you thus. We, your slaves, who adorn ourselves with garlands, scents, garments and ornaments enjoyed and given up by you and ate the remnants of your food, shall certainly overcome your Māyā.

47. Sages who subsist on air,1 who exert themselves in penance and observe strict celibacy for life, become tranquil, sinless renouncers of worldly life and attain to your abode called Brahman.

---
1. v.1. Vata-rasandh—who are sky-clad i.e. naked.
48-49. But we, O great yogin, who wander in this world through the paths of Karma will cross over the impassable darkness (of Samsāra) by conversing with fellow-devotees about you, remembering and glorifying your acts, speech, movements, smiles, glances and jokes and whatever you did to carry out your role as a human being."

50. When thus implored (by Uddhava) O king Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Son of Devakī addressed his exclusively devoted servant¹ and beloved devotee Uddhava as follows:

CHAPTER SEVEN

Śrī Kṛṣṇa’s Spiritual Guidance to Uddhava:
The Legend of the Avadhūta and his Preceptors

The Lord replied:

1. O highly blessed Uddhava! What you have spoken to me (about my future plans (Supra 6.42) has been decided by me (to execute). God Brahmā, Śiva and guardians of the spheres eagerly desire my (return and) stay in heaven (i.e. Vaikuṇṭha).

2. The mission—the work of gods—for which I incarnated along with a ray of mine (my anāśa—Balarāma) on the earth in response to the prayer of Brahmā, has been completely accomplished by me.

3. The clan (of Vādavas), already consumed as it is by the imprecation (of the Brāhmaṇas) will surely be exterminated by mutual infighting and the sea will overflow and submerge this city on the seventh day (when I am no more here).

¹ EK : Uddhava was such a beloved servant of Kṛṣṇa that he had access to him when Kṛṣṇa’s nearest and dearest relatives, his chief queen Rukmīṇi, his parents, sons like Pradyumna were not allowed to see him and Kṛṣṇa used to give his choicest gifts to Uddhava.

—EB.6.404-411
4. As soon as I leave this world, it will, before long, lose all its auspiciousness, as it will be overcome by Kali (the Dark Age), O pious one.

5. You should not live here any longer when I have withdrawn myself from this world; for in this Kali Age men will be more interested in unrighteous ways.

6. You also should give up all attachment and friendship with your kith and kin and concentrating your mind on me firmly, you wander over the earth looking upon all with impartiality.

7. Whatever is perceived by mind, speech, eyes, ears (and other cognitive and conative senses), know that that is a product of Māyā and mind and that it is transient.

8.* The notion of difference or diversity is the misapprehension of a distracted and unrestrained mind. It results in good and evil consequences. (It may be argued that by its enjoining of injunctions and interdictions, the Veda supports the notion of difference. But that is not correct). The distinc-

* (i) EK. A person who forgets the identity of his Soul with the Supreme Soul conceives the misapprehension of diversity and develops the notion of good and evil. This notion leads to the triad of karma, akarma and vikarma. All physical, verbal and mental activities are karma. The act when performed (without attachment) leaves no ‘seed’ (the effect or fruit of the karma). Such a ‘seedless’ act is Akarma. The act which is done irrespective of its prescriptive or prohibitive nature is Vikarma. As the jīva is born out of Avidyā all his acts are due to and full of Avidyā (EB.7.57-71.)

(ii) VR. : (The gist only) The Paramātman is one and all other entities form a part of his body and are controlled by him. To regard independence of entities is misapprehension. A person with such misapprehension experiences pleasure, pain, etc.

Karma = The prescribed act (both of daily routine and occasional).
Akarma = a prohibited act.
Vikarma = an act giving various fruits (vividha-phalāya Codṣom Kāmyam Karma).

A person with the notions of good and evil is disturbed with the thought of Karmas and their consequences.

(iii) The notion of one’s own agency of acts irrespective and independent of God creates good and evil and the snare of saṁsāra; one who knows that the God is the real agent or doer, is liberated. Due to Rajas and Tamas, the mind is confused with karma, akarma, etc.—VJ.
tion between the prescribed act, its non-commission and prohibited action is meant for the guidance of those who possess the misapprehension of good and evil (The Veda is for the guidance of those who are affected with avidyā).

9. Therefore, controlling all your sense-organs and concentrating your mind (on me, train yourself to) visualize all this vast universe within your own self and to see that your own soul in (i.e. identical with) Me, the Brahman (The identity of the Brahman and the Soul explains the latter’s capacity to pervade or contain within itself the whole universe).

10. Being well-equipped with the knowledge (of the essential teachings) of the Vedas and the Self-realization (of those teachings) and the realization of the identity of your soul with the (souls of) all embodied beings, you become stated with the (Supreme) bliss of self-realization and you shall experience no obstacles (from gods, etc.)

11. He who is above the sense of good and evil is like an innocent child. He does not desist from a prohibited act with the consciousness of its being evil (but due to his previous hallowed impressions—good saṁskāras that he abstains from doing an evil act). Nor does he perform a prescribed act with the desire of deriving its good fruit (but his pious saṁskāras lead him to do so. Hence, there is no danger of such person becoming way-ward).

12. He is a friend and well-wisher of all beings, tranquil in mind, possessed of firm knowledge (of Vedānta) and its realization. He looks upon the Universe as identical with me. Verily he is never involved in the miseries of saṁśāra.

Śrī Śuka said:

13. Uddhava, the great devotee of the Lord, who was thus instructed by the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, became eager to

1. ŚR. One should perform the prescribed karmas till self-realization after which gods, etc. shall not dare trouble you for the non-performance of karmas.

Cf. tasya ha na devās ca nābhūtya tiṣate / ātmā hi eva eṣām sa bhavati//

—Brhad. Up. 1.4.10
know the truth. He prostrated himself before Acyuta (Śrī Krṣṇa) and submitted as follows:

_Uddhava said:

14. O Lord (bestower of the fruit) of Yoga, O ultimate secret treasure of the knowers of Yoga or the abode of Yoga, O embodiment of Yoga O the source (the first propounder) of Yoga¹, renunciation without any expectation in return (which is the characteristic of sannyāsins) has been taught to me by you for my Final Beatitude (or Mokṣa).

15. But I think that such renunciation of desires is very difficult to practise, O Perfect Lord, for those whose minds are addicted to sense-objects (of pleasure)—nay it is all the more difficult—(practically) impossible—by those who are not your devotees, O the Indwelling Soul of all beings.

16. O Lord, I am ignorant. My mind is deluded with the notion of 'I-ness' (my identity with my body) and 'mine-ness' (the notion that all my wife, children, property, etc. are mine) created by your Māyā. Hence, O Lord, instruct (this servant of yours in such a way as he (I) can practise it and attain that (degree of) renunciation propounded by you.

17. I do not see even among gods who can expound to me the nature of the Soul except You who are self-illumined (all-knowing) Ātman and the only Reality. All the embodied gods like Brahmā and others have their minds deluded by Māyā and look upon external objects as the only reality.

17A*.
18. Being scorched by miseries in life, my mind had

¹. Uddhava gave these epithets to Śrī Krṣṇa to imply that your above-mentioned teaching is meant for Yogis and sannyāsins, but what about your ignorant devotees like me who are not competent to practise it—ŚR.

* VR. adds: (Their minds are deluded by Māyā which is not removed by mere reasoning and argument of those who make enquiries about it, unless they associate themselves with the Lord's devotees who have the experience (of bliss) of the lotus-feet of the Lord. Such association is possible even to those who lead a householder's life and have undergone three types of miseries and their burden of sins being thus lightened, they are less inclined to sensual pleasures (tāpa-trayā' bhi-taptānāṁ... nṛṇāṁ khalu sat-saṅgamaḥ syāt nātu viṣāya-lālasānām/).
become dissociated with the world\(^1\). I, therefore, seek asylum with you, O Nārāyaṇa, the friend of all living beings, who are the Omniscient Supreme Lord abiding in the eternal, time-less, Vaikuṇṭha and who are devoid of all defects, infinite in time and space (transcending them both).

The Lord said:

19. It is well known that persons who investigate with themselves (even without the guidance of a spiritual preceptor) the true nature of the world, lift themselves by self-effort and become free from longings for worldly pleasures.

20. The Ātman (Soul) is the real preceptor and guide of oneself, especially in the case of human beings; for he can arrive at what is his own good by (rational logical reasoning using the tools of knowledge like) direct perception and inference.

21. It is in human life that people of mature judgement who are experts in the Paths of Knowledge. (Sāṅkhya) and Yoga, realize me quite distinctly as being endowed with all powers.

22. Many (categories of) bodies with one foot, two feet, three feet, four feet, multiple-footed and foot-less have been created by me. Out of them the human body is the dearest to me.

23. In this human body those who are alert and vigilant, directly endeavour to find me, the Supreme Ruler who cannot be ascertained by means of the qualities or attributes (of jīva such as intelligence) which are themselves within the range of perception or by inference\(^2\) (based on inferable evidence).

24. As an illustration on this subject, they narrate the

\(^1\) V. 1. nirvīṇadhīriha muhuḥ—I who am every now and then scorched, etc.

VJ. reads aharāhaḥ for nirvīṇadhīriha muhuḥ in ŚR. It means ‘everyday I am being scorched, etc.’ Both the v.1.s are good emendations for ahamu ha.

\(^2\) ŚR. cautions that Ātma should not be regarded as inferable. By inference we know that Ātma is distinct from tangible objects like the body and from inferable objects as well. By inference we can understand Ātma’s distinctness from the body, attributelessness and pure nature.
following ancient legend of a conversation between a recluse who had realized Brahman and was of immeasurable splendour and king Yadu (of immense power and intellectual brilliance)

25. On seeing a certain youthful, Brāhmaṇa ascetic¹, a knower of Brahman full of (spiritual) wisdom wandering fearlessly, king Yadu, an expert in Dharma put to him the following question:

Yadu said:

26. Whence did you, though (apparently) inactive, come to possess such extraordinary penetrating intelligence and wisdom (in so youthful a stage), endowed with which and enlightened (in the nature of Brahman) you roam about in this world like a child.

27. Generally men try to attain religious merit, wealth and enjoyment. They evince desire to know the nature of the Soul but they are motivated with a desire for longevity, fame and fortune.

28. You are physically capable (able-bodied), wise, skilful and alert, good-looking, nectarlike sweet in speech (and none of the factors which cause indifference or incapability in active life like weakness, ignorance, want of skill or ugliness are found in You). Still you behave as if you are a dunce, lunatic or as one haunted by a ghost.

29. While people are burnt with the forest conflagration in the form of passions, and covetousness, you are not even touched by that fire and stand immune like an elephant immersed in the waters of the Gaṅgā (and hence untouched by a forest-fire).

30. Be pleased to explain to us who are making this enquiry seriously, the cause of your blissfulness in your own self, even though you are devoid of objects of pleasure and are leading a single (unmarried life), O knower of Brahman.

1. VD. & RR identify him with the sage Dattātreya on the strength of Supra 11.7.4 :
yogardhim āpur abhayin Yadu-Haivyādyah
Avadhūta—a philosopher (Brahma-vid).
Monier Williams—SK. Dictionary, p.100.
The glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa said:

31. When respectfully questioned thus by the highly intelligent Yadu who was friendly to Brāhmaṇas, the blessed Brāhmaṇa sage, duly honoured, explained to Yadu as he stood bowing to him in modesty.

The Brāhmaṇa (Dattātreya) explained:

32. Many are my preceptors whom I have selected (and accepted) through my own judgement, O King. Please listen to the names of those preceptors from (each of) whom I assimilated (some specific) wisdom and I wander all over the world free (from worldly troubles).

33-35. The earth, the air, the ether, water, fire, the moon, the sun, the pigeon, the boa-constrictor, the sea, the moth, the bee, the elephant, the honey-gatherer, the deer, the fish, the courtesan Piṅgalā, the osprey, the child, the maiden, the blacksmith, the serpent, the spider and the wasp—these twentyfour have been adopted as teachers by me. It is from their special ways of behaviour that I imbibed whatever lessons were useful to me in life.

36. I shall explain to you fully what lessons I picked up from each preceptor, O son of Nāhuṣa. Please do understand them, O tiger among men.

37. From the earth, I learnt the vow (of firmness and forbearance) to remain undisturbed even when trodden over (and mal-treated) by other beings. With the full knowledge that they (these oppressors) are working under the influence and will of the Providence, a strongminded wise person should not deviate from his path of duty (dharma).

38. As a disciple of the mountain (which is a part of the earth and the products from which such as trees, grass, water-currents are meant for the use of others) a righteous person should learn to resign all his activities for the good of other beings. And also as a pupil of the tree (which is another part of the earth and which allows itself to be cut, uprooted and transplanted at the will of others), he should learn that he is meant for others and be useful according to their will.

39. Just as the wind in the form of the life-breath (expects food and water for subsistence and not form, taste and other objects of senses), a sage should be satisfied with bare necessities of subsistence and not crave for objects of sense-pleasure. He should however manage to take in that much (which may not result in starvation) which (if not taken) would cloud his mental faculty and obscure his knowledge; nor should he get his mind and speech distracted (by the desire for sense-objects).

40. Just as the wind is unattached (to the natural beauty or the burning of the forest), a yogi, though participating in the surrounding objects of senses of various characteristics (such as hot, cold, sweet and others), should keep his mind aloof and unattached from the excellences and defects of these sense-objects.

41. Just as the wind, though a carrier of scents and odours (which are due to the particles of the earth wafted by it), is distinct from the smell, a yogi should bear in mind that though he has entered the earthly bodies and (is the basis of and hence) appears to possess their characteristics (such as childhood, youth, fatness, slimness, etc.), and have his sight (mind) fixed on his self which is distinct from the body and its attributes.

42. A contemplative sage should comprehend that his soul though invested with the physical body, is identical with Brahman and as such interpenetrates and permeates all mobile or immobile creation—all-pervading yet unconnected like the sky¹, (which is unlimited and untouched by other objects).

43. Just as the sky is not touched by the clouds tossed about by the wind, the Person (Soul) is not affected by the products of the Time-spirit and by things such as fire, water and food.

44. Water in a holy spot is by nature pure, smooth, soft and sweet and purifying by sight, touch and chanting of its name. Similarly, a sage should become a friend of men and make them pure (by absolving them from sins). (The Avadhūta learnt this from water).

45. The Avadhūta learnt from the fire to be Brilliant

¹. V.7.5. v.1. nabhanat vitatasya—'all-pervading like the sky' is better than ŚR.'s nabhastvāṃ vitatasya.
(with his spiritual knowledge), aflame (as his supreme knowledge is enhanced and made brighter like a flaming fire), formidable (as the sage remains unperturbed even under stress), with his belly as his vessel (for keeping food i.e. completely devoid of all belongings). Like fire, a self-controlled yogi does not take in what is impure, though he may accept anything and everything offered to him.

46. Like the fire (sometimes lying hidden in the fuel or ashes), the sage remains unnoticed (among common men); sometimes (like a fire ablaze) he becomes known to others and is worshipped by the seekers of spiritual good. (Just as the fire consumes only what is offered as oblation in sacrifices) the sage eats whatever is offered by pious donors and burns down the sins committed by them in the past and the future.

47. Just as the fire assumes the shape and size of the fuel (e.g. a log of wood, etc.) in which it abides, the all-pervading Lord-Atman—(though unrelated to the body) appears to possess that size and shape of the bodies whether high or low (like that of gods and sub-human beings) in which he has entered, after creating it through his Māyā.

48. The six stages beginning with birth and ending with death, which are brought about by the Time-spirit of unmanifest course, belong to the body and not to the Soul, just as the appearance and disappearance of the digits of the moon are caused by the Time to the digits of the moon and not to the moon itself.

49. The births and deaths of bodies though eternally taking place due to the inexorable force of Time flowing like a rushing torrent, do not affect the Soul, just as there is a beginning and end to the flames of fire and not to the Fire itself.

50. Just as the sun evaporates the water with its rays and is not affected (either by sucking up water or showering it as rain), a yogi enjoys the objects of senses with his senses or rejects them according to the (exigencies of) time, but he is in no way attached to those objects.

51. To those who regard the gross, physical body as the Atman, the Atman though essentially one, is regarded as different due to the different bodies wherein he abides, just as the Sun, though one, but when reflected in different reflecting media, appears as many (and different) to persons of gross understanding (the Ātman though one appears as many and different, due to its limiting conditions (upādhis).

52. Excessive attachment or over-association with anyone should never be contracted by a person. If he does so, he will come to grief like the dull-witted he-pigeon (in the following legend).

53. A certain dove built a nest on a tree, in a certain forest. He lived with his mate, a female dove, for some years.

54. Their hearts tied together with the bonds of love, the pair of pigeons led a conjugal life binding together each other's eyes with eyes, body with body and heart with heart.

55. It was in the mutual company that they slept, ate, flew about, stood, chatted, sported together and fearlessly wandered in the rows of forest trees.

56. The female dove satisfied his conjugal desires and was (reciprocally) treated with sympathetic affection by him. The dove, being of uncontrolled senses, procured for her whatever she desired, irrespective of the strain involved in obtaining it.

57. At the proper period, the female dove conceived for the first time, and laid down the eggs in the nest, in the presence of her mate.

58. In due time, by the inconceivable powers of the Lord, well-formed fledglings with delicate body covered with soft down, were (by natural process) born out of the eggs.

59. The pair of parent birds who were so affectionate to their off-spring nourished their young ones and felt happy as they heard their chirping and sweet indistinct warbling.

60. The parents were greatly rejoiced at the soft touch of their wings, charming movements, sweet cooings and their approaching to meet them.

61. Deluded by Viṣṇu's Māyā potency, the hearts of those dull-witted birds were closely knit together by love and they reared their young ones (with anxious care).

62. On one occasion, the pair of parent-birds went out into the forest in search of food for their young ones. They wandered for a long time into the jungle.
63. By fateful chance, a fowler who went about in the forest, happened to see those young birds. He spread out his net and caught them, as they moved about their nest.

64. Both the male and female doves were always anxious to nourish their little ones, and they had gone out (in search of food) and returned when they gathered some.

65. Seeing that her young ones are caught in the net and crying, the female dove was overwhelmed with grief and rushed at them screaming.

66. Ensnared in the bonds of ever-increasing affection through the deluding Potency of the Lord, the mother-dove who saw her young ones caught in the net was bewildered and forgot herself, and was herself entangled therein.

67. Seeing his own young ones dearer to him than his own life and his own life-mate dear to him as his own self also caught up, the male dove was deeply distressed and bewailed sorrowfully:

68. “Alas! Look at the calamity that has befallen me of scant merit and evil mind. I have been still unsatiated and have not accomplished any object in life. But my household life which is the source of three objects of life (puruṣārthas) is ruined.

69. My mate who was a match for me in all respects and agreeable in everything, looked upon her husband (me) as a deity. But (now) abandoning me in a desolate house, she is going to heaven with her good children.

70. Such as I am, bereaved of my wife and children, what interest have I to lead the miserable life of a helpless widower, in a deserted house?”

71. Even though he saw them (his mate and young ones) entangled in that net and struggling for life in the clutches of death, the poor, thoughtless dove flung himself in the snare.

72. Having caught the householder-dove, his female mate and young ones, the ruthless fowler was accomplished of his purpose and returned home.

73. In the same way, a householder of poor sense takes delight in conjugal life and with his mind perturbed, goes to ruin along with the family (kith and kin) while trying to maintain it like the bird-dove in the above legend.

74. Birth in the human life is like an open gate to Liberation from Samsāra. He who, having obtained such a birth as a human being, is still attached to the life of a householder, is regarded by the wise as a person fallen from eminence to which he has climbed.

CHAPTER EIGHT

What the Avadhūta learnt from the Nine-Preceptors from the Boa-Constrictor to Piṅgalā

The Brāhmaṇa continued:

1. Pleasure as well as pain engendered by the senses may be experienced in the celestial and internal regions by all embodied beings. A wise man, therefore, should not hanker after them, O King.

2. Like a boa-constrictor lying without any effort or activity, a sage should subsist himself on whatever food (providentially) comes to him (without any effort), irrespective of its taste (whether extremely delicious or distasteful) or of the quantity obtained (whether much or little).

3. If no food comes to the lot of a sage who vows to live only on the food that Providence sends to him, he should not exert for it, but like his (preceptor) — huge serpent, should lie down for days together without food but should not strive for it.

4. Though endowed with a body full of physical strength, mental energy and soundness of sense-organs, the sage should lie down remaining actionless yet sleepless. He should not strive to do anything for food, though he may possess powers of his sense-organs.

5. Like the limitless, unfathomable, unperturbable deep sea of clear translucent water, the sage should be quiet, absorbed in meditation, unviolable, inscrutable, unaffected by time, space, etc. and unperturbed by passions.
6. Just as a sea does not overflow its limit when rivers in floods fall into it, nor does it dry up with the drying up of rivers, the sage should not feel elated when his desires are fulfilled nor be depressed at disappointments, but should be completely devoted to Nārāyana (and not pay attention to worldly objects).

7. On seeing a woman, a veritable deluding potency of God, a person who has control over his senses is fascinated with her alluring gestures and movements and like a moth flying into the fire, falls into dark hell.¹

8. With his mind enticed by women, (wearing) gold ornaments, rich dress, and other things created by the deluding Potency of the Lord (Māyā), the infatuated person, losing his discrimination, regards them for his enjoyment and ruins himself like a moth in the fire.

9. Without causing any trouble to any householder, a sage should accept food only in small quantities and that too, barely sufficient for the maintenance of his body. In this respect he should follow the course of a bee.

10. Just as a bee collects honey from flowers big or small, a skilful and clever person should assimilate the essence of the Śāstras great and small.

11. A recluse should not accept alms with a view to storing (a part of) it, for the evening or for the next day. He should use no other vessel than his palms (for accepting food) and his stomach (as storage). He ought not to be a hoarder like the bee.

12. A recluse should not lay by any food for the evening or for the morrow. If he were to do so like a bee, he will perish along with his store.

13. A mendicant should not touch, even with his foot, a young woman (doll made of wood), for he will be bound

1. ŚR. quotes a famous verse which describes how a moth, a black-bee, an elephant, a deer and a fish fall a victim severally to the objects of senses like a form, scent, touch, sound and taste and the five symbolic preceptors from this verse onwards are meant to teach detachment from objects of senses. The verse quoted is as follows:

   "pātānga-mātānga-kuraṅga-bhrṅga-mindḥ hatāḥ pāṅcabhir eva pāṇca/ekaḥ premādi sa katham na hanyate, yah sevate pāṅcabhir eva pāṇca" (with passion) like an elephant fettered while touching a female elephant!

14. A wise person should never try to contact a woman (of another person) for he should know that she is his veritable death, just as an elephant is killed by more powerful tuskers.

15. Wealth hoarded by greedy misers painstakingly is neither enjoyed by them nor it is given in charities but it is enjoyed by another powerful person (knowing the location of the treasure) and that also by still another even as a gatherer of honey knows the place of the honeycomb (the store of honey) by external indications and misappropriates it.

16. Just as a honey-gatherer (is the first enjoyer of honey collected by bees), a recluse is the first to enjoy the fruit (i.e. food prepared by householders) of the wealth amassed by the householders with great pains and which they expect to enjoy.

17. From the deer which got ensnared by being beguiled with the music (musical notes) of the hunter, an ascetic living in a forest should learn the lesson that he should not listen to vulgar songs (creating erotic passions). (He should rather listen to songs about the Lord).

18. It was while enjoying the vulgar dance, instrumental music and songs of young women that Ṛṣyaśṛṅga, the son of a female deer (from sage Vibhāṇḍaka) became a toy in the hands of those women.

19. A person being tempted by alluring tastes through his uncontrolled tongue, loses his reasoning capacity and meets his end like a thoughtless fish allured by baits.

20. By observing fast wise persons quickly bring under control all their senses except the tongue (the sense of taste) which grows all the more powerful during famishment.

21. Even if a person has controlled all other senses (except the tongue), he cannot really be said to have subdued them, till he has conquered the sense of taste. When the sense of taste is subdued, all the senses become controlled.

22. Formerly, in the city of Videha (i.e Mithilā), there liyed a courtesan called Piṅgalā. Please listen to what I have learnt from her O Prince.
23. On one occasion, the public woman adorned herself to exhibit her charms to the utmost, at the proper time, and waited outside the door with the intention of enticing a paramour to a rendezvous.

24. O prominent Person! As she saw men passing by the way, she, being covetous for money, thought them to be wealthy patrons coming to pay her as her paramours.

25. When the passers-by came and went their way (ignoring her), the woman, who earned her living by prostitution, indulged in the (false) hope that some other wealthy man would turn up and could approach her with a rich fee.

26. In this way, her inordinate hopes being thwarted, she lost her sleep. She kept on standing at the door, going in and out till it was past midnight.

27. Due to frustration of her hopes of earning money, her mouth parched up, and she became dejected at heart. But the despondency caused by her anxiety engendered a sense of real happiness in her.

28. Now listen from me the song of the woman whose mind was utterly frustrated and disgusted: “Complete indifference to worldly objects is like unto a sword in a man’s hand to cut asunder the cords of desire.”

29. Dear King, just as a man without any spiritual knowledge cannot give up his sense of “mineness”, a person in whose mind the sense of complete dispassion (for worldly objects) has not dawned, will not be able to rid himself of the ties to the body.

Piṅgalā said:

30. Alas! Look at the extent of delusion of mine who have not controlled my mind and senses. Thoughtless as I am, I covet the fulfilment of my desire even from a worthless paramour.

31. Ignoring this eternally proximate paramour (viz. the Indwelling Soul), capable of giving real delight and bestower of sumptuous wealth on me, I, in my infatuation, resorted to a contemptible fellow who is incapable of fulfilling my desires and who confers nothing but misery, fear, grief and delusion.
32. Alas! I have uselessly put my soul to affliction by leading the life of a public woman—the most reproachable trade. By selling myself to a miserly pitiable woman-addict I expected to get wealth and pleasure.

33. What person other than myself would seek (for enjoyment) the male body which is like a house, the framework (like beams and rafters) of which is made of bones, covered with skin, hair and nails, provided with nine doors dissipating filth and full of dirty excretion and urine.

34. In the whole city of Videha (Mithilā), I am perhaps the only foolish and wicked woman who expect to get pleasure (from persons) other than this Acyuta who confers his own self to devotees.

35. He is the beloved-most friend, protector and the very Self of all embodied beings. I shall submit myself to him and enjoy myself with him like goddess Lakṣmī.

36. To what extent can men, subject to birth and death, and gods, who are overtaken by Time, give pleasures to their wives (for all pleasures have a beginning and an end).

37. It appears that Lord Viṣṇu has been pleased with me for some unknown act of mine (in my past life). Hence this dispassion which ultimately leads to happiness has been engendered in my heart, full of evil desires.

38. But for the grace of the Lord the afflictions of an unlucky woman like me would not have caused this feeling of disgust and renunciation which enables a person to cut asunder all attachment, and attains (mental) peace (and spiritual bliss).

39. Respectfully receiving on my head, the blessings (and the grace) of the Lord, I shall rid myself of vulgar desires caused by low associations, and seek shelter in the Supreme Lord.

40. Contented and subsisting on whatever comes to me by the will of Providence, I shall, with full faith in the Lord who is my own Self, enjoy myself with him as my beloved.

41. Who else is capable of protecting a person who has fallen in the deep well of Samsāra, and whose eyes (power of discrimination) are blinded by objects of senses and whose person is swallowed by the serpent (boa-constrictor) in the form of Time.

42. When a person observes that this world is practically devoured by the serpent in the form of Time, he becomes alert and is disgusted with all worldly objects. He realizes that his Ātman is the protector of his Self.

_The Brāhmaṇa (Avadhūta) said:_

43. Coming to this firm conclusion and having thus cut off the evil libidinous craving for paramours, she was established in serenity and took her seat on the bed.

44. Certainly (the state of being haunted by) hope is the greatest misery and freedom from hope is the happiest state, just as when Piṅgalā gave up all hope for a paramour, she enjoyed a happy sleep.

CHAPTER NINE

_The Discourse of the Avadhūta Concluded_

(Lessons from the remaining seven preceptors)

_The Brāhmaṇa continued:_

1. Acquisition of whatever persons crave most to possess is certainly the cause of misery. He who realizes this and (wishing to overcome his propensity for possession) becomes a complete ‘Have-not’, attains infinite happiness.

2. More powerful birds of prey which had got no piece of flesh, attacked and pecked the he-osprey who possessed one. But by dropping that flesh, it (the he-osprey) got relief and happiness.

3. I am not affected by honour or dishonour. I have no anxiety for my house, wife and children (as I have none). Like a child, I range over the world at will, sporting in the bliss of Ātman and delighted within my own Soul.

4. (O king, in this world) only two (types of) persons are free from anxiety and are immersed in the Supreme bliss—one is an innocent ignorant child and the other is one who has transcend ed the guṇas.

5. In a certain place, a maiden herself had to receive the guests who had come to see her (for selecting her as a bride) while her relatives (parents etc.) had gone out somewhere.

6. While she was pounding alone (secretly) paddy for entertaining them with food, the bangles of shell in her wrists began to give out loud jingling sound.

7. The intelligent girl felt it shameful (to disclose that the bride had to do such work), broke the bangles one by one till only two remained on each of her wrists.

8. Even the pair of bangles created a noise as she pounded (the paddy). She, therefore broke one from each pair (with the result that) no sound was produced from the remaining one.

9. O vanquisher of enemies, I learnt this lesson from her, while I was roaming over the world with the desire of knowing the true nature of the world.

10. If many persons live together there will be quarrels; if two live together there is a talk. Hence a person should wander alone without any companion like the single bangle on the wrist of the girl.

11. Having achieved firmness of the sitting posture and controlled the breath, a person should concentrate his mind (like an archer on his target and by means of renunciation and Yogic practice, he should vigilantly keep his mind steady.

12. The mind, when concentrated in him, sheds off gradually the particles of karma-dust. With the development of Sattva guṇa, he shakes off the Rājasic and Tāmasic tendencies and enters into Nirvāṇa, like a fire (automatically) extinguished (when the fuel is completely burnt). (Such a stage is known as asamprajñāta samādhi).

13. In that stage, a person whose mind is completely absorbed in the meditation of his Self, does not remain conscious of anything inside, or outside just as the manufacturer of shafts was so much absorbed in his work of making arrows that he was not aware of the procession of the king passing by his smithy.
14. Like a serpent a sage, therefore, should go about alone, (avoiding company of others), have no house, should always be vigilant (in his spiritual practice) and take shelter in caves. He should see to it that he is not marked out by his behaviour (just as the poisonousness or non-poisonousness of a serpent is not discernible from his trail). He should be sparing of words and lead a solitary life.

15. In the case of man who himself is mortal, the attempt to build a house (and maintenance of a family, etc. implied in it) is fraught with great troubles and is fruitless ultimately. But a serpent enters into a house prepared by others (such as an ant-hill or a hole prepared by a mouse) and lives happily. A sage should emulate his example and not bother about constructing a residence.

16. Like a spider withdrawing its web spun out and spread over by it, the Almighty Lord Nārāyaṇa through his potency of time, withdraws, at the end of the Kalpa, this universe which he has created through his Māyā Potency.

17. The Supreme Lord (then) remains alone, one without a second (i.e. devoid of any differentiation) himself self-supported (self-born). He was the support of all the universe. When he has reduced all his powers like sattva, rajas and tamas to the state of equilibrium with his own force called time, he exists as the First (Ancient-most, unborn) Person, the controller of Pradhāna (wherein all the Guṇas are merged) and of Puruṣa (that is of Matter and Spirit).

18. He is the highest goal to be attained by god Brahmā and other liberated Souls. He is designated (by Śrutis) as Kevala (Absolute, unconditioned). He is (as it were) a vast reservoir of absolute bliss unconditioned by any limitations.

19.* By his Potency (called time) which needs no other

1. VJ gives better interpretation: 'He should thoroughly and uninterruptedly be absorbed in the meditation of the Lord abiding in the cave of his heart'.

* VJ: He is not conditioned by a gross, physical body. He is the Antaryāmin (Inner controller) of Kāla (Time). At his own free will, he manifests himself through Time and agitates Māyā i.e. Prakṛti which is under his control and makes her prone to creation. He creates through Prakṛti, the thread (Śūtra) or (Prāṇa) and god Brahmā. assistance, he agitated his Māyā constituted of three guṇas and (through this agitated Māyā) created the Sūtra (thread) or the principle called Mahat, O vanisher of enemies (like lust, anger, etc. Hence, you need not be afraid of the power of this Sūtra or Mahat).

20.* They have declared the Sūtra to be the manifestation of three guṇas which evolves this universe of multifarious aspects. It is in the Sūtra that the universe is woven. It is due to Sūtra (in the form of vital breath that a person wanders through the cycle of births and deaths).

21. Just as a spider extends through its mouth the cobweb from its heart, sports with it and again swallows it, so does the Supreme Ruler evolve, protect and withdraw the universe.

22. It may be out of love, hatred or fear, but on whatever object an embodied being concentrates his mind entirely, he attains to the semblance of that object.

23. The larva (captured and) confined in its (captor’s) nest by the wasp, O King, continuously broods over it (through fear), and without losing its original body, it assumes (i.e. is transformed into) the semblance of the wasp.

24. In this manner, from these several preceptors I learnt this wisdom. Now listen as I shall explain to you the wisdom I learnt from my body, O king.

25. My body has been my preceptor as it causes in me dispassion and (engenders in me) discrimination. It creates dispassion as it is subject to birth and death and is in the (final analysis) the source of ever-increasing afflictions. It promotes discrimination, as through it I comprehend correctly the fundamental principles of this universe. I, however, have arrived at the conclusion that this body belongs to others (parents who gave birth to it—or birds and beasts of prey who may eat it).

* They saw that the three guṇas are evolved out of Māyā. It is in the Māyā or Prakṛti that the universe is woven and Jīva gets involved in Samsāra as it is invested with Prakṛti—V.J.

1. Cf. Vāyu vai Gautama sūtram, vāyunā vai sūtrand’yaṁ ca lokah, paṇaṁ ca lokah savāṇi ca hūtāṁ sandhāhāni — Brhad. Up. 3.7.2
Realizing this, I roam about without entertaining any attachment to the body.

26. It is with the desire of securing pleasure and comforts for this body that a person, with great strain to himself maintains his wife, children, earns money, raises cattle, and keeps servants, houses and relatives. But in the end (at the time of death), like a tree leaving its seed behind for the growth of another tree, it perishes providing for (his re-birth in) another body.

27. The tongue drags a person in one direction to satisfy his taste with tasty eatables; thirst, to another; the organ of generation, still to another direction for sexual intercourse; the senses of touch, hearing and stomach severally to different directions; the nose (sense of smell) still to a different direction (to enjoy perfumes); his quick eyesight, to another and all his organs of action in their own respective directions. In this way, like co-wives pulling (lit. tearing up) the lord of their house (in their own direction), the senses and organs tear up a person.

28. Having created, with his inherent power, the birthless Māyā, various kinds of bodies (i.e. species) such as those of plants and trees, reptiles, mammals, birds, biting insects (like mosquitoes), fish (and other aquatic animals), he remained unsatisfied. But when God created the human being with an intellectual capacity capable of realizing the Brahman or Supreme Being, He became delighted. *

29. Having secured, at the end of many transmigrations, birth in this very rare human body which, though transient, is capable of attaining the highest object in life, viz. Mokṣa (liberation), a wise person should endeavour at the earliest, to attain the summum bonum, before his body had not fallen a prey to death. For, objects of senses can, however, be enjoyed everywhere in all species.

30. In this manner, with the sense of dispassion developed and with the light of spiritual wisdom dawned in me, I wander over the earth, free from all attachments and egotism.

31. Knowledge obtained from one preceptor may not be stable, convincing and comprehensive\textsuperscript{1}. This Brahman is verily one without a second, but it is sung variously by different sages.

Cf. Aitareya Up. 2.3ff

\textit{The Lord said}:

32. In this manner, the Brāhmaṇa, of deep knowledge, replied all the questions of Yadu and took his leave of Yadu. He was duly respected and prayed by the king. With pleasure, the Brāhmaṇa wended his way.

33. Having carefully listened to the philosophical exposition of the Avadhūta, Yadu, the ancestor of our ancestors, became completely free from all types of attachment and looked upon all as equals.

\section*{CHAPTER TEN}

\textit{How the Jīva is Ensnared in Samsāra}

\textit{The Lord said}:

1. Alertly observant of the righteous duties (prescribed in the Pāñcarātra and other Vaiṣṇavite systems) taught by me, completely dependent on me, one should, without entertaining any desire (for the fruits of his actions), observe the course of duties prescribed for one's respective social class (\textit{varna}), stage of life (\textit{āśrama}) and family traditions\textsuperscript{2}.

2. With his mind purified (by the observance of his prescribed duties—\textit{dharma}), he should (always) note how all the

1. Here ŚR clarifies that Upaniṣadic sages like Śvetaketu and Bhṛgu did not have more than one spiritual preceptor. But the spiritual guidance received by them pertained to the identity of Brahman & the Ātman. Here the 'knowledge' means clarifications of minor doubts which can be resolved by logical reasoning; for this a number of 'preceptors' or 'examples' are useful.

2. EK. classifies \textit{Karma} into four categories: \textit{nitya} (to be performed daily), \textit{naimittika} (occasional), \textit{Kāmya} (performed for fulfilment of desire) and \textit{Prāyatascīta} (expiatory). All these should be dedicated to the Lord. EB, 10.46-66.
stable, convincing and comprehensive. This Brahman is verily one without a second, but it is sung variously by different sages.

The Lord said:

32. In this manner, the Brâhmaṇa, of deep knowledge, replied all the questions of Yadu and took his leave of Yadu. He was duly respected and prayed by the king. With pleasure, the Brâhmaṇa wended his way.

33. Having carefully listened to the philosophical exposition of the Avadhūta, Yadu, the ancestor of our ancestors, became completely free from all types of attachment and looked upon all as equals.

CHAPTER TEN

How the Jīva is Ensnared in Samsāra

The Lord said:

1. Alertly observant of the righteous duties (prescribed in the Pāñcarātra and other Vaiṣṇavite systems) taught by me, completely dependent on me, one should, without entertaining any desire (for the fruits of his actions), observe the course of duties prescribed for one’s respective social class (vārṇa), stage of life (āśrama) and family traditions.

2. With his mind purified (by the observance of his prescribed duties—dharma), he should (always) note how all the

1. Here SR clarifies that Upaniṣadic sages like Śvetaketu and Bṛgu did not have more than one spiritual preceptor. But the spiritual guidance received by them pertained to the identity of Brahman & the Ātman. Here the ‘knowledge’ means clarifications of minor doubts which can be resolved by logical reasoning; for this a number of ‘preceptors’ or ‘examples’ are useful.

2. EK. classifies Karma into four categories: nīya (to be performed daily), naimittika (occasional), Kāmya (performed for fulfilment of desire) and Prāyatucitta (expiatory). All these should be dedicated to the Lord. EB, 10.46-66.
endeavours of embodied beings, who, believing objects of sense pleasures to be real, are addicted to them and are frustrated, leading them to the contrary results.

3. Just as the objects seen in the dream-state, or the hallucinations of a day-dreamer have no existence in reality and are futile (as they present both desirable and undesirable things unrelated to the main objective of human life), similarly, the notion of difference (in relation to Ātman as a celestial being, human being) caused by Guṇas is illusory or meaningless.

4. A person who is solely devoted to me should perform disinterestedly the obligatory (e.g. Sandhyā, pañcamahāyajñas and occasional (e.g. Śrāddha for ancestors) types of acts but should abstain from acts (to be performed for the fruits thereof). But a person who has entered into the investigation of the nature of the Soul or god need not respect and follow the injunctions of the Vedas, prompting the performance of (sacrificial and other) acts.

5. One who has exclusively devoted himself to me should continuously practice the five vows (such as non-violence, truth, possessionlessness) known as Yama and occasionally vows (such as penance, charity, silence) called Niyama. He should wait upon his spiritual preceptor, who is full of serenity, has realized me (as his Self) and is devoted to me.

6. Such a disciple should be free from pride, envy; he should be alert, watchful, free from attachment. He should be

1. taiva-jñāna (i) Realizing and contemplating the real nature of his soul and the Supreme Soul—VR.
   (ii) Definitely ascertaining the means of attaining Puruṣārthas (objects of human life)—VJ.

2. VJ. takes a contrary view: Just as dream-visions.... and fancies of day-dreamers are different from reality and hence fruitless, similarly the notion of one-ness or identity is baseless as it is the apprehension of the faculties of the mind, but not of the essential powers of the self.

3. VJ defines Niyamā Karma as that done with a correct understanding of Paramātman and done without any desire for return:

   nayakānām jñāna-pramāna ca naytām iti ca'cyate

4. Śr. quotes a Smṛti text as authority. It means: ‘A person desirous of Liberation from samsāra should not turn to kāmsa (promising fruits in return) and nisiddha (prohibited) karmas but only the daily obligatory (nīpa) and occasional types of acts (karmas).”
patient, thoroughly devoted to the preceptor, keen on knowing the truth; he should not try to find fault with others and should not waste of his words unnecessarily.

7. He should be indifferent and unattached to his wife, children, house, lands, relatives, property, etc. He should realize that all his purpose is common to all.

8. The Soul is distinct from both the subtle and the gross bodies. He is the seer (the witness) and self-illuminating even as the fire which illumines and burns is different from the fuel that is burnt and lighted up.

9. Just as a fire which has entered into the wood and is burning it, assumes the qualities i.e. states of that piece of wood such as coming into existence, going out of existence, its smallness and bigness and its varieties of forms (but is itself distinct from the fuel), so does the Ātman which is distinct from the body, assume the states of the body (Though he has no birth, death, growth, size, forms, etc.)

10. For what is called the body is created out of the (three) guṇas of (the Māyā of) Lord Puruṣottama and the saṁsāra (the cycle of birth and deaths) is the consequence of the false identification of the Soul with the body. It is only through the real knowledge of the (distinctness between the body and the) Ātman that this misapprehension of saṁsāra is removed.

11. This being the case, by means of deep investigation

1. ŚR. explains that as Ātmā abides in all bodies and thus all share the same purpose, viz. happiness, etc., there is no propriety of claiming them exclusively as his own. This leads to dispassion.

2. VJ : The individual Soul and the Supreme Soul are different and distinct inter se from the body and other products of non-intelligent Prakṛti.

3. VJ : This is the view of the ignorant who identify the individual Soul and the Supreme Soul.

4. EK. compares the soul involved in Soṁśvra to a king who dreams that he is a beggar. When in the morning, the family priest comes and wakes him up he realizes that he is a king and not a beggar as he regarded himself to be so long. The spiritual preceptor is the priest and the Jīva involved in Saṁsāra is the dreaming King. When instead of aham (I), he realized SauHam (I am He—Brahman) then the misapprehension of Saṁsāra is dispelled.
(into reality), a person should properly realize that the absolute, transcendental soul abiding in the product (viz. his body) is different from the body, and then gradually dispel the misapprehension that this phenomenal world is real.

12. The spiritual preceptor is the supporting (lower) piece of wood and the pupil is the supported (upper) piece. Instruction is the process of friction (or joining together of these pieces), and the knowledge is the fire that brings happiness.

13. This highly purified intellect (of the capable disciple) (when sharpened by the spiritually capable teacher) drives off the Mayā which is caused by Guṇas. Burning down (i.e. dispelling) guṇas (objects of senses and senses) and the universe that is created by them, this intellect too, automatically disappears like fire, when the fuel is completely consumed.

14-16*. If you believe in the multiplicity of these agents or doers of Karmas and the enjoyers of the (consequent) pleasures and pains, and in the eternity and separateness of the world, the Time, The Śāstras and individual Souls (as the mīmāṃsakas do), if you hold that all objects have a continuity (or eternity) while they undergo constant change,

1. An echo of Tait. Upa.:
   ādṛtyah pūrva-rūpam|antevāst uttarn-rūpam|
   vidyā sandhiḥ|pravacanam sandhānam|

   —Tait. Upa. 1.3.2.

   According to VJ, this knowledge burns down the grass in the form of the notion of identity between Jīva and Brahm..
   (Jīvasya Brahma—bhāva—buddhi—tṛṇa—dahanam/)

2. Vaiśāradī—pertaining to Viṣṇu who terminates the Saṃsāra characterised by pleasure and pain—VJ.

* VJ : (The gist only) The distinction between all jīvas is natural, and according to their mutual difference, they are invested with different bodies and the character of their knowledge differs naturally. Jīvas of the highest order are eternal, and from the point of their body, they are said to be born; they enjoy only happiness while the second and third may experience a mixture of happiness and misery or only misery.

VR : Though the Praṇātī Karma may be the means of achieving Puruṣārthas, all embodied beings are subjected to the six states of body (such as birth, youth, death and the consequent miseries) according to the species in which they are born, due to the influence of Time and its division.
and that the intelligence becomes changed according to the forms of different objects perceived by it, O Uddhava, even if this be the case, due to frequent (forced) associations (of the Soul) with different bodies and due to the force of the division of Time, all embodied souls are repeatedly subjected to the different states of births, deaths, etc.

17. Even here (from your argument) it becomes obvious that there is absence of free will in the case of doers of actions and there is no choice for the experiencers of pleasures and pains. What happiness can there be to one who is dependent (and at the mercy of others) ?

18*. Not an iota of real happiness exists for those embodied souls who are learned (and expert in the technique of performing Vedic Karmas; nor is misery the lot of the ignorant; Hence, the sense of pride (of knowing the correct technique of performance of Karma) is vain and futile.

19. Even though some people happen to know the means of obtaining happiness and averting miseries (and the principle of Free Will be accepted), even such knowers are ignorant of the means of counter-acting (successfully) the power of Death.

20. What achievement of object or a desire can give happiness when Death is near him? No object can give pleasure to a victim who is being led to the place of execution.

21. The heavenly happiness promised by Vedas is also vitiated with envy, jealousy, termination and decay, as in the case of pleasure experienced on the earth. And there are many impediments and chances of failure in the accomplishment of desires as in the case of Agriculture.

22. Even if a religious act is properly performed without any impediment in its successful conclusion, listen to the nature of the celestial position attained by him.

* VR: Experts in the technique of performance of Karmas find it very difficult to collect materials, etc. at the time of performance of the Karmas and are nervous due to the transient nature of its fruits. Or Even great gods like Brahmā do not enjoy unmixed happiness, as they are aware of the end of the tenure of their office. But fools entertain futile egotism about it.

VJ - Even the wise, being attached to their bodies, have no real happiness. What need be said of the ignorant proud persons?
23. Having worshipped gods (like Indra, Varuṇa, etc.) by performance of sacrifices in this world, the sacrificer goes to the celestial world. He enjoys like a god heavenly pleasures that he has earned through his meritorious acts.

24. In a lustrous celestial car (provided with all luxuries) earned by his meritorious acts, he, wearing a rich, attractive dress, sports with the celestial damsels while being glorified by Gandharvas in song.

25. While sporting with the heavenly nymphs in a celestial car which is adorned with small jingling bells, and which goes according to the will of the occupant, he is so absorbed in celestial pleasures that he is not aware of his impending fall.

26. He heartily enjoys himself in the heaven so long as the fund of his merits is not exhausted. But when the balance of merits is exhausted, he is pushed down by Time and he falls down reluctantly.

27. If, due to the association with unrighteous people, a person takes delight in impiety or loses control over his senses, being passionate and libidinous, he becomes miserly, avaricious and addicted to women and heartlessly injurious to living beings.

28. He kills animals in violation of Śāstric injunctions and worships the hosts of goblins and ghosts therewith. Such a person inevitably falls into various hells and ultimately enters the hell of terrible darkness (i.e. is born as an immobile).

29. What happiness can there be to a mortal person who, in the present birth (as a human being) perpetrates deeds that result in miseries and in consequence of which acts, he has to assume another body?

30. Regions and their rulers whose span of life extends to the end of a Kalpa (432 million years) are afraid of me. Even god Brahmā whose life is of two Parārdha years fears Me.

31. Guṇas i.e. senses and organs create (i.e. are the cause of) Karmas; a guṇa (like Sattva etc.) motivates the senses to actions. This Jīva, being endowed with sense-organs, enjoys the fruits of his acts.

32. So long as the unbalanced condition of guṇas prevails, manifoldness (and difference) will be projected on Ātman (which, as a matter of fact, is one). As long as the (apparent) multiplicity in the Soul remains, the state of dependence (of the Jiva) shall persist.

33. So long as the dependent state of the Jiva continues, there will be fear from God. Hence, those who take resort to gunas become overcome with grief and delusion.

34. When there is an imbalance in the three gunas of Māyā (and there is agitation of the gunas), ignorant people call me by various names such as Time (Kāla), Soul (Ātman), scriptures (Āgama), the World (Loka), the Nature (Swabhāva) and Dharma.

Uddhava asked:

35. How is it that the Ātman, though associated with and present in the gunas of the body, is not bound by them? Or if he be independent, how does he get involved in them? (What is the correct position in the matter) O Lord.

36. By what characteristics is a bound or liberated Soul be recognised? How does he behave? With whom is he found sporting or wandering? What things does he enjoy or cast away? How does he lie or sit or go about?

37. O Acyuta! You are the foremost among those who solve problems. I am really confused. How can the same Ātman be both eternally bound and ever-free? Be pleased to explain this problem to me.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

Characteristics of Bondage and Liberation and of Devotion

The glorious Lord said:

1.* The characterisation that 'I am bound' or 'I am liberated' is determined with reference to gunas, and it has no

* ŚR.: OR: The statement that 'The individual soul is bound or liberated' is made on the basis of its being subject to or free from the predispositions of gunas and it does not refer to its real nature. The gunas are relation to my essential nature. But guṇas have their roots in Māyā. Hence, there is neither liberation nor bondage to me. This is my decision (with reference to this notion of bondage).

2.* Grief and infatuation, pleasure and pain, and the condition of the body (viz. birth and death and change of body) are the work of Māyā (and are not real, but are wrongly attributed to the Soul). Just as a dream is only an unreal appearance (pārvata) of the mind (or intellect), so is Samsāra illusory, unreal.

3. O Uddhava! Please understand that knowledge and ignorance are my potencies which are in existence since the time immemorial, and both are the creations of my Māyā. These potencies bring about bondage and release in the case of embodied beings.

under my control. As I am their controller, liberation or bondage are not applicable to me.

VR and SS: (Sudarṣana Sūri) emphasize that the bondage and liberation positively affect the Jīva (individual) and not the Supreme Soul or God.

VJ. The statement ‘Bound’ or ‘Liberated’ refers only to Jīva who is affected by the three guṇas of Prakṛti which is under my control. Hence the notion of bondage and liberation is not applicable to me.

SD. When the Jīva which is bound by guṇas resorts to me, he is liberated. Cf. BG.7.14.

* Both SS & VR hold that what is ‘non-eternal’ (anitya) is ‘un-essential’ (avastava) but it is not false or unreal (mithyā). Hence grief, etc. caused by Māyā or Prakṛti under my control are related like a dream to a jīva. The dream and Samsāra both are real but not eternal conditions of the jīva, and they have an end. Hence, Samsāra is not the essential state of jīva. The main thrust of the argument is: Svapna-prapātasya vādastavaṁ nāṁnityatvam eva na tu mithyātvam. Both SS & VR quote Bhād. Up. 4.310 as the authority for their stance (na tatra rathā na ratha-yogāḥ, etc.)

VJ: Grief, pleasure etc. are experienced in a dream due to ignorance that it is dream. Similarly, due to the ignorance of his own essential nature, jīva suffers in Samsāra. Samsāra is not false (mithyā) and is indestructible but it can be warded off: saṁśrīḥ satyapi na vāstavī pratijñāntum āstakā—svapna-dṛṣṭāntena saṁśrasya na mithyātvam ucyate. This quotation is used by SD & BP.

VC. It is due to the condition (upādhi) of avidyā that the jīva accepts and authorises to himself (and experiences) sorrow, delusion etc. in the subtle body. They are not a part of jīva’s essential nature. They are caused by avidyā and hence, mithyā (saṁśrīna vāstavī...) .Sokamohādindāṁ māyā-sṛṣṭatvamā saṭyate‘pi... jīva avidyākālapitastadān mithyātvam.
4.* O highly intelligent Uddhava! Though I, as ātman, am one, it is in relation to Jīva (who is my reflection and as such Aṃśa—a particle—of mine) that the eternal bondage exists due to Āvidyā (ignorance), and the other state i.e. emancipation from Samsāra comes to take place through vidyā (knowledge).

5. I shall now explain to you the distinction between one in bondage (namely the individual Soul or Jīva) and the other who stands altogether emancipated (viz. Ātman). They are characterized by two opposite sets of qualities though both are seen abiding in one and the same individual.

6. These are two fine-winged birds (viz. the Jīva and Śiva the Indwelling Self both of whom are distinct from the body¹. They are (inseparable) companions and kindred in (their being spiritual in) nature. Through Divine will (Māyā), they share the same abode on the tree² (viz. the body, their habitat). One of them (the Jīva) eats the fruit of the

* VR. states that though bondage exists from eternity it is terminable by spiritual knowledge. VJ. holds that the jīva and paramātman are two distinct entities. The Jīva is subject to bondage and liberation and is under the control of paramātman.

 VR & VJ. believe that both jīva who is subject to bondage, and Paramātman who is independent, omniscient abide in the same body, though the latter is not subject to bondage.

 According to VR. the two wings of Jīva are righteous and unrighteous acts (dharma dharmānu) while that of the other bird, Paramātman, are absolute defect-lessness and absolute excellences. The ‘nest’ of the Jīva and Paramātman is in the heart of the tree (the body). The pippal-fruits are the objects of senses such as sound, form, etc.

VJ. quotes his authorities and asserts that the other bird—the Lord—enjoys happiness only but never experiences what is bad or evil.

EK. explains that jīva is called a bird as it flies from tree to tree (occupies one body or birth after another). The existence of the other bird and the terms sadṛṣau and sakhāyau refute atheism and establish the existence of God.

EB. 11.159-184.

1. Cf. dvā suparnā sayujā sakhāyā
candāṃ varṣam pariṣasadā tayor ekaḥ pippalaṁ svadvatī anāśmaṁ anyo bhicākasati //

—Mugdaka 3.1.1-Svetāsva 4.6

Pippala tree (i.e. experiences pleasure or pain as the fruit of the previous karmas to be enjoyed while in the body. The other (viz. Śiva or Isvara) does not partake anything of it, (i.e. is above pleasure and pain, karmas, etc.), yet is more powerful (in spiritual wisdom).

7. (Out of the two) the bird who does not eat the fruit of the Pippala tree (i.e. does not enjoy the fruits of karmas) knows himself as well as the other. But not so the eater of the Pippala fruits (Śiva, the enjoyer of the fruits of his karma). He is entangled in Nescience and has been in bondage since eternity; while the other (Śiva or God) being full of (spiritual) knowledge, is eternally free.

8. Even though a Śiva, endowed with correct knowledge (i.e. a liberated Soul) happens to abide in a body (due to his past karmas), is not conditioned by (and attached to his) body like a person who is awakened from his dream, remains unattached to his body in the dream. On the contrary, a person with the wrong notion of his being identical with his body, when as a matter of fact, he is not conditioned by it, becomes confined to it like a dreaming person who feels bound within the dream-body, when really he is un-connected with it.¹

9. A person possessing spiritual wisdom should remain unaffected (by love, hate etc.) without feeling that he is involved in the act, when the objects of senses which are the products of guṇas (like form, taste, smell) are apprehended by senses which are also modifications of guṇas.²

10.* An ignorant Śiva, abiding in this body which is under the conrol of his Fate or past acts, regards himself to be the doer of an act, which is actually being done by his sense-organs which are the products of guṇas, and remains confined

¹. GD.: The verse states the differentia between a bound (buddha) and a liberated Soul.

2. tattva-vittu mahābāho guṇa-karma-vibhāgayoh/ guṇā guṇeṣu vartanta iti matuḍ na sajjate/! —BG. III.28

VJ.: The ignorant Śiva, who abides in the body under the control of the Lord, regards himself as the doer of actions in which he is dependent on the Lord, and gets confined to the body.
in it (due to his) (false) notion of being the agent of that act).

11-12. Understanding this, a man of spiritual wisdom (engaged in activities like) lying in bed, occupying a seat, taking a walk or performing ablutions and in (the activities of the cognitive and conative sense-organs such as) sight, touch, smell eating food, hearing, etc, does not get bound like an ignorant person. He allows his senses to enjoy their objects. Though he abides in the physical body (which being a modification of Prakṛti is) called Prakṛti, he is not contaminated by it like the sky (which pervades everything but is not contaminated by anything), the Sun (which, though reflected in the water or mirror is untouched by the reflecting media), or the air (which as the vital air-prāṇa moves through all parts of the body and still is unconcerned with it, and which as a wind, moves in any direction without being fixed or attached anywhere)¹

13. All the (varieties of) doubts of such persons are cut asunder with the sword of his clear, penetrating insight sharpened by his total renunciation. He discards the sense of diversity like a person, awakened (to reality) from a dream state, does about (scenes in) dreams.

14. Even though a Jīva is abiding in the body, if the functions of his life (breathing), senses, mind and intellect are free from purposeful thought or motivation, he is never fettered by the attributes - the guṇas - of the body (involving pleasure and pain).²

15. He is a spiritually wise (and liberated) person who remains unaffected even when his body is troubled by cruel

¹ ŚR.: Verses 11 to 13 explain Uddhava's question about the way of behaviour of a true Bhāgavata. But ŚR's explanation is on a lower plane on verse 12.

² EK. says that these verses treat the behaviour of the absolutely liberated person. EK. draws a highly idealistic picture in which he poetically describes in details (from ovis 263 to 393) how in every action, a liberated soul, being ever absorbed in the bliss of Brahman, is a part of his spiritual life, where the triad of act-action-actor is non-existent. In all these acts, even his sexual intercourse is shown in its spiritual light.

No annotator of the Bh. P. has risen to the staggering spiritual height of EK. in his com. on these three verses.

² This verse explains Uddhava's question 'how a liberated person behaves.'
beast or wicked persons or is by chance respectfully worshipped with due attentions somewhere by some persons.¹

16. Being devoid of attributes good or bad (or being above the sense of good or evil), a sage looks upon all with an equal eye. He does not praise him who does a good turn to him; nor does he blame him who does or says something evil about him.

17. A sage should not do, speak or contemplate good or evil (about anyone or anything). (Detached from the worldly way of life) a sage should revel in (the bliss of) his own Self.
Assuming such a way of life, he should move about like a dull person.

18. A person who has plunged deeply in the verbal revelation of the Brahman (i.e. is well-versed in the interpretation of the Vedas or Vedic philology), but is not so in the realization of the Supreme Brahman (by engaging himself in meditation, etc. prescribed for it), gets labour (on the Vedic studies) as the fruit (of his verbal knowledge of the Veda and not the realization of the Supreme Brahman), like a man who keeps a cow which has ceased to be a cow (and is incapable of yielding milk).

19. Dear Uddhava! A person who maintains a cow that has been milked to (the period of) dryness (and no longer yields any milk), a faithless wife², a body under the control of another person (for support), wayward children, wealth not utilised on the worthy (cause or recepients) and speech not glorifying me or my name, is visited by misery after misery.

20. A wise man should not cultivate barren (i.e. wasteful) speech which does not contain glorification of my hallo-wing acts of the creation, maintenance and destruction of this universe or the sportive incarnations taken (by me) at the prayer of the world (or popular incarnations like Rāma, krṣṇa, etc.).

¹ Verses 15-17 reply Uddhava’s query “What are the characteristics of a liberated person?”

₂ Śr.: quotes Tājñavalkya: A sage is not angry against a person who pricks him with a thorn nor is pleased with one who anoints him with sandal.
He treats both of them equally.

² Śr. interprets asati as Kāmatūṁśa—a frigid or an old wife. EK adds quarrelsome and insubordination to lack of character in explaining asati.
21. Having thus removed by dint of critical investigation (on the lines described in the above verses), the wrong notion\(^1\) of seeing diversity with reference to Ātman, and having resigned (with full concentration) one's thoroughly purified mind to me who am the all-pervading Lord, he should completely withdraw himself from all activities.\(^2\) (Mere scholarship in religious works is not enough.)

22. If you are not able to concentrate the mind firmly in the Brahman, carry out your duties resigning all acts to me, without expecting any fruit in return (from them).

23-24. Listening with faith and devotion\(^3\) extremely auspicious stories about me which purify the world, singing them (to others as in a kīrtana) and contemplating on them and enacting my Aṅgajīva and deeds performed by me (during the kīrtana\(^4\)) and observing faithfully the duties pertaining to the three puruṣārthas (viz. dharma-righteousness, artha—wealth and kāma—enjoyment of pleasures) with a view to please me\(^5\) and entirely depending on me, one develops unswerving devotion in me who am Eternal, O Uddhava.

25. It is through devotion developed in association with saintly persons that he becomes my real votary. Verily such a

---

1. VJ. enumerates the following wrong notions according to the Dvaita school: (1) Identity between the Jīva and Lord, (2) The one-ness of soul—all jivas make one existence, (3) The gross world is not real.

2. VR: One should abstain from Pramaṇī marga which leads the jīva from one life to another.

3. EK. details here how to avoid the four types of obstructions while listening to and contemplating about the name and deeds of the Lord. He describes the three types of devotional love (viz. Sattvika, Rājas and Tāmasa) generated in the audience. He however, emphasizes the importance of the fourth type which transcends these three and makes the listener forget himself completely—absorbed in the meditation of the Lord like 'a crystal of salt fallen into the sea'.

---EB. 11.706-25.

4. EK. describes how to represent these by giving examples of lifting of Govardhana, etc. ibid. 735-37.

5. EK. To real devotees the Lord is their dharma, artha and kāma. He automatically—without conscious or deliberate intention—resigns all his acts to the Lord. The real votary is endowed with spiritual wisdom and all his acts are per se dedicated to the Lord. This real Bhāgavata devotion is called saṅviti in Vedānta and Sakti in Śaivism.

---EB. 11.748-774.
devotee easily attains to my exalted state (or Vaikuntha) as pointed out by the righteous.

Uddhava submitted:

26. O Lord of hallowing glory! What kind of person is regarded as a saint (Śādhu) by you? (What are his characteristics?) What type of devotion is respectfully appreciated by pious devotees (like Nārada) and would be useful to attain to you?

27. O Ruler of gods like Brahmā! The Controller of the world! Be pleased to explain this to me who have prostrated myself before you and am full of loving devotion to you and have sought your shelter, O Lord of the world.

28. You are the Supreme Reality (The Brahman) untainted and unattached like the highest sky, transcendental to Prakṛti. It is at your own free will that you have assumed a distinct finite personality and have descended (on the earth).

The Lord replied:

29. Such a sage is compassionate; he never envies or harms any creature; is full of fortitude; firm and strong in truthfulness; of pure mind (untainted by jealousy, etc.); equipoised in pleasure and pain (unaffected by joy and sorrow under the above conditions); obliging unto all.

30. His mind is never perturbed by desires; his senses are fully under control; he is gentle-hearted; of pure (perfectly moral) conduct; devoid of all possessions; free from desires (or evil activities), moderate in eating and drinking; serene in mind; firm in his own dharma, seeking asylum in me and contemplative by nature.

1. This shows that the Lord is distinct from the non-sentient Prakṛti and sentient jīva—VR.

2. Who has assumed a finite form due to intense desire of His devotees—Śr. EK. elaborates this. But to attribute ‘Will’ or the pressure of the wishes and the prayers on the Supreme Brahman is rather strange, if the pure Upaniṣadic concept of Brahman is accepted. In works on Bhakti (as in the present case), however, God is humanised (Translator.)
31. He is ever alert and vigilant; of deep mind (remaining undisturbed under exciting circumstances); full of grit (in the face of danger); free from six worries\(^1\) or bodily defects (viz. hunger and thirst, grief and infatuation, old age and death); Though himself indifferent to worldly honour, pays respect (to the worthy); possesses aptitude and willingness to impart knowledge; a sincere friend; merciful in behaviour and endowed with spiritual knowledge.

32. He is the best of saints who (finding them to be distractions and obstructions in meditating on me or concluding definitely that everything will be obtained through devotion to me or becoming ineligible to perform karmas due to his unflinching firm devotion) neglects his duties though they are prescribed by me (in the Veda) and even though he knows full well the merits accruing from performing those duties and the evil consequences of disobeying them; and (thus in preference to his prescribed duties) is engaged in my worship.

33. Realizing me or (if unrealized) contemplating on me as unlimited by time and space, as the Inner Soul abiding in all and essentially characterized by ‘Is’-ness, (existence) knowledge and bliss those who worship me exclusively, are definitely regarded by me as the best of devotees.

34.\(^*\) To behold, to touch, to embrace and to worship my idols or other representations (like Śāligrāma and others) and my devotees, render personal service to them, to eulogise me, to extol and chant my deeds and excellences with utmost humbleness;

35. To listen to my stories with deep faith and devotion, to meditate upon me constantly, to offer to me all that one acquires, to dedicate oneself to me entirely for my service, O Uddhava;

36. To recite (and describe) my incarnations and deeds, to participate joyously in my festivities (like Janmāśātmi—the birth anniversary of Lord Kṛṣṇa), to celebrate my festivals

---

\(^1\) ŚR. quotes the following defects about which people worry: Kṣut-piṭās, soka-mohau, jara-mṛtyu, sad-ūrmayaḥ \(^*\) Verses 34-41 describe the characteristics of devotion—ŚR.

in my temple with musical entertainments such as vocal and instrumental music and dancing and purāṇa recitation and discussion.

37. To go in procession for pilgrimage (to places sacred to me) on all annual festivals and to offer me flowers, sandal paste and (vegetarian) food, to get initiated in the Vedic and Tāntric way of worshipping me and to observe vows sacred to me (like observance of fast on the Ekādaśī day).

38. Devout enthusiasm in installing my image (in temples), individual and cooperative endeavour to lay out flower-gardens, orchards, playgrounds, and construction of temples and towns:

39. To render service in my house (temple) like a sincere servant by sweeping and washing, plastering with cowdung the floor and decorating it with ornamental drawings figures without expecting anything in return for this service;

40. One should be free from pride (about the service rendered to God) and should be free from hypocrisy. One should not even mention what good one has done. One should not use for one's private purpose anything that is offered to me, including the light of the lamp.

41. Whatever is desired most to oneself in the world or whatever is dearest to one's heart should be dedicated to me. Such offering results in infinite and everlasting good.

42. O blessed Uddhava! The Sun, Fire, the Brāhmaṇa, the cows, devotees of Viṣṇu, the sky, the air, water, earth, one's own heart and all the creatures are 'the places' (objects as media) of my worship (through which worship should be offered to me).

1. Thousands of people in Maharashtra go in group-processions to Pandharpur on the ekādaśī (the 11th day in the bright half) of Āśāḍha and Kārttika, and hundreds of them on other ekādaśī days.

2. Śrī. clarifies that this restriction is limited to the movable and immovable things (such as dress, pots, ornaments, etc.) presented to the Lord and not to estables, flowers so offered. On the contrary, he insists that some portion of the estables should be accepted as prosadā. He quotes a Smṛti which states that other gods and our ancestors should be offered a remnant of the food, etc. offered to Viṣṇu.

_Viṣṇor niveditānena yaś taryayā devatāntaram/pitṛbhyoṣ caiva tad deyam taddānāntyāya kalpate_
43. A person should worship me in the Sun by praising the Sun with hymns from the three Vedas, in the (sacrificial) Fire, with offering oblations to it, in prominent (deserving) Brāhmaṇaṣas, with warm hospitality and in cows with offering of grass, etc.

44. (One should worship me) in the votary of Viṣṇu with the fraternal affection,¹ in the heart and the sky, through deep undisturbed contemplation, in the air, with the knowledge that I am the chief vital power (mokhyapraṇa); in water with water mixed with flowers sesameum seed, rice, etc.).

45. (A man should worship me) in the earth (levelled, squared and consecrated for sacrifice²) with the mystic syllable of Mantras, in one's own body with all the comforts (permitted by ṣāstras) and one should worship me in all the creatures as their In-dwelling Soul, by looking upon all beings as equals (impartially without any love or hatred towards anyone.)

46. In these 'places' of worship, one should contemplate with concentrated mind, my form with four arms wielding in each the conch, (Pañcajanya), the discus (Sudarśana) the mace (Kaumodaki) and a lotus (respectively) and with a serene and gracious countenance.

47. He who, with a concentrated mind, worships me in this way, by performing sacrifices and by constructing tanks and other amenities to the public, develops pious devotion unto me and my constant remembrance will be awakened through service unto saints.

48. Generally, there is no other expedient (to God-realization) except the path of devotion generated in association with saintly people, for I am the chief support and refuge of the pious saints.

---

¹ E.K.: No caste-distinction should be considered about the devotees of Viṣṇu. Devotion and not caste is the criterion here. EB. 11. 1395-1408.

² E.K. says that the raised plot of earth should be like a cow and Śeṣa or Amenta, the supporter of the earth is to be worshipped. EB. 11. 1429-33.
49. Now, after this, listen to the top-most secret which deserves to be closely guarded¹ which, however, I am divulging to you as you are my servant (devotee), well-wisher and a friend, O scion of the Yadu race.

CHAPTER TWELVE

Importance of Association with Saints:
The Performance and Renunciation of Prescribed Karmas.

The Lord said:

1-2. Neither the path of Yoga (consisting of eight stages like postures—āsanas, breath-control—prāṇāyāma, etc.), nor the philosophy of Sāṅkhya (or the knowledge of twenty-four categories and the realization of Puruṣa being different from Prakṛti), nor the path of Dharma (consisting of non-violence, truth etc.), nor the recitation and study of the Vedas, nor penance (like the observances of vows like Kṛchra, (Cāndrāyāna), nor adoption of Sannyāsa (or renunciation) nor performance of sacrifices nor constructions of works of public amenities (like digging of wells, laying out gardens, construction of free lodging houses-dharma-fālās, etc.) nor religious gifts and donations, nor self-deny ing vows (such as fasting on the Ekādaśi day), nor yajña i.e. worship of gods), nor the internal repetition of mystic mantras nor ablutions in sacred waters nor the observance of rules of bodily and mental purity and discipline (Niyama) nor the vows of self-control² capture me in the heart of the devotee as does the association with saints which exterminates all attachments.

¹. Out of the paths of knowledge and devotion, the path of devotion is superior and association with saints helps to accomplish this. The paths of knowledge and Yoga may or may not lead to liberation from saṁśāra as they are dependent. Association with saints is self-dependent and efficacious to enable one to cross the saṁśāra with certainty—ŚR.
². EK.: Twelve vows of Yama and Niyama each.
3.6 It is through their association with saints that a number of demons (Daityas or Diti’s sons), evil spirits (Yatu-dhānas), beasts, birds, Gandharvas (celestial musicians), Apsaras (celestial dancing girls), serpents, Siddhas, semidivine beings like Čāraṇas, Yakṣas and Vidyādharas, out of human beings persons of Vaiśya and Śūdra communities (merchants, peasants, cowherds and labourers), women and outcastes and other beings* dominated by Rājasika and Tāmasa nature, have attained to my region (Vaikunṭha) in various yugas, O sinless Uddhava.

Many (daityas and asuras like Vṛtra, the son of Tvaśtr, Prahlāda, the son of Kayādhū, Vṛṣaparva, Bali, Bāṇa, Maya and Bibhīṣaṇa; subhuman beings like) Sugriva, Hanumān, Jāmbavān, the bear and the elephant-king (of the well-known legend Gajendra-mokṣa); (birds like) Jaṭāyu (who gave his life for rescuing Sītā from Rāvaṇa);¹ Vaiśyas like Tulādāra² and outcasts like the hunter Dharma-vyādha³; women like the hunch-backed Trivakrā, Gopīs of Vraja and the wives of Brāh-mana-sacrificers (described in the Skandha) and many others have attained to my place.

7. Those (above-mentioned) persons had not studied the Vedas; nor did they serve and sit at the feet of great scholars (for Vedic studies); they did not observe vow or perform austere penance.⁴ But they attained to me, thanks to the association with pious saints.⁵

* To this list EK. adds Guhaka and Jarā Vyādha who pierced Krṣṇa with an arrow.

GS. clarifies who was the saint associated with each of the individuals mentioned here: Thus the pairs of the demon and the associating saints were Prahlāda and Nārada; Bali and Prahlāda; Bāṇa and god Mahādeva; Bibhīṣaṇa and Hanumān.

1. Vide Vālmiki Rāmāyaṇa (Aranyakāṇḍa sargas 14,50,51, 67, 68),
2. A vaiṣya of Kāśi. He imparted spiritual knowledge to sage jājali—
(MBH. Śānti, chs. 261 and 262.)
3. Vyādha from Mithilā. He preached dharma to Kauṣīka, a Brahmin
(MBH. Vana, chs. 207-216).
4. All these ways do not lead to Mokṣa and are inferior to sat-saṅga (association with saints).
5. VJ.* states that Godhead is attained by them not without means—the means being sat-saṅga.
8-9. It is only through the force of intensely loving devotion\(^1\) (to me), that Gopīś, cows, trees, beasts and other dullwitted persons, serpents like Kāliya (of Vṛndāvana) became accomplished of their purpose and easily attained to me who am inaccessible to those who endeavour to realize me through Yoga, Sāṅkhya, liberal donations, observance of vows, austerities, performance of sacrifices, expounding of the sacred books, study of the Vedas and turning into a recluse sannyāsin).

10. When I was taken away along with Balarāma to Mathurā, by Akrūra, the son of śvaphalka, the Gopīś whose hearts were deeply attached to me through intense devotion, felt excruciating pangs of separation from me, as they had none else (in view) who could give them spiritual bliss.\(^2\)

11. Those various nights which they passed like half a second (lit. half the winking time of the eye-lids) while I was available for company (in Rāsa dance and various other sports) at Vṛndāvana, were, after separation from me, felt by them as long as a kalpa (432 million years of mortals).

12. Just as sages lost in meditation are not conscious of (their bodies and the world consisting of) names and forms, or even as rivers after entering into the sea (lose their identity of name and from and become one with the sea), the Gopīś

---

1. With VR. God should be the object of intense passion—be it love or hatred and it leads to mokṣa (bhāvo‘tra kāma-bhuyadveśād-rūpābhīprāyu-viśeṣa-parāḥ...tasya kaivalyam nāma paratvam ukṛṣṭatvam iti yāvat).

But VJ refutes it. According to VJ., Devotion is the highest form of love. The word Kevalena excludes hate or other feelings and other courses for attaining to God. Kevalena viśeṣapāt na dveṣa-yuktā bhaktir muktisādham —VJ. Even before realisation by Śāstric knowledge the dullwitted were devotees.

2. EK. in commenting on verses 10-13 loses himself in poetic ecstasy in describing the spiritual love of Gopīś and Lord Kṛṣṇa’s response to them. In the beautiful description of Rāsālīlā and other sports, there is nothing earthy—on a lower sexual plane. Though, the Gopīś were ignorant they felt the force of Lord Kṛṣṇa’s supreme nature and the Love divine. Their intense devotion and pure love were beyond the capacity of a man to requite and elevate them to their blessed state. There was nothing sexy about the Gopīś. As EK. puts it, their desire for Kṛṣṇa wiped out all sexual desire from them (12.153-157). The whole passage (EB. 12.124-214) deserves to be read from the original.
whose hearts fastened with exclusive love and devotion to me, became totally unconscious of this (i.e. their own person, their close relatives like husbands and sons and this world as well as that (which was at a distance i.e. even the next world).

13. Ignorant of my essential supreme nature, the Gopa women were enamoured of me whom they regarded not only their lover but a paramour.\(^1\) Hundreds and thousands of such women in this way attained to the Supreme Brahman by contact with me. (It is through contact with the good that Gopis came to know me to be the Supreme Person and attained Mokṣa).

14-15. Hence, O Uddhava, (transcending everything) ignore Vedic injunctions and prohibitions, renounce both Prawṛtti and Nivṛtti types of karmas, and give up what is learnt and what is to be learnt. With exclusive devotion to me seek shelter in me only who am the Soul of all embodied beings. Protected by me, you will have no fear from any quarter i.e. you will attain Mokṣa)

_Uddhava submitted\(^2\):

16. Even though I have been attentively listening to your speech, O Lord of experts in yoga, the doubt in my mind is not resolved and my mind is puzzled.

---

1. VJ. explains ‘jāra’ as one who wears out (erases) saṁsāra.

E.K. explains that Krṣṇa did not go to any Gopi’s house but as soon as a Gopi felt passion for Krṣṇa, he immediately satisfied it (mentally?). Just as when a piece of stone touches the Vairāgara, the stone is instantly transformed into a diamond, the (mental) contact with Krṣṇa transformed Gopis into Bhaktas and all were absorbed in Brahman. Association with the good is so efficacious.

2. Uddhava’s doubt is natural. Krṣṇa started with the advice of doing the Karmas prescribed by him in the Vedas and Pañcarātra Ṭgama. Now he asks to renounce all Karmas. Vedic injunctions and interdictions. The first doubt is whether the soul is the agent of an act; and secondly whether prescribed karmas should be performed or renounced—ŚR.
17. This is that perceptible Supreme Lord who infuses life in all and who manifests himself within the nerve-centres or plexuses (cakras) known as Mūlādhāra and others (existing in the internal parts of the human body). With the prāṇa impregnated with nāda (called parā speech), he enters the ‘cave’ (known as ādhāra cakra, located near the anus). He proceeds (ahead) assuming the subtle mental form (known as paśyantī, and Madhyamā forms of speech in the spiritual plexuses called Maṇipūra and Viśuddhi located at the navel¹ and at the throat² respectively. He reveals Himself in the mouth in the form of short and long notes, accents (such as udāta, anudāta and svarita) and articulate sounds (like the velars, palatals, dentals, etc.). This is the grossest speech-form (called Vaikhari) of the Vedas and its branches.*

18. Just as fire which exists in the subtle unmanifest form as heat in the atmosphere (the sky), when churned with force and helped by the wind manifests itself as a spark (which

*, EK. was an expert yogi. He took this opportunity to explain the five main and five subsidiary varieties of prāṇa (the vital air), their places and functions. He further explains the details of the six cakras, the ‘unbeaten’—everexisting sound, the development of speech from the subtle (parā) stage to its gross (Vaikhari) stage. He goes out of way and explains the progress of the Yogi from the Ājñā cakra to the sahasrāra—the final stage in Yoga. (EB. 12.311-352). He adopts reflection theory (bimba-pratibimb-bodha) and assumption of the body by the Soul is called ‘entry into the cave’ (293)

1.  tadbhyādeśe tu Maṇipūram mahāprabham !
   manivad bhinnāṁ tat padmaṁ Maṇipūram tathocayet|

A Tantra-work quoted in ŠKD (Śabda-Kalpa-drūma vol.III P.576)

2. ŠKD Vol.IV p.436. It is the source of all the 16 vowels. Both the Tantra work and Tantra-sāra are quoted here.

3. SR. quotes cātviṁśa rākṣaṁ śarīrītām padāni etc. from RV.1. 164.45 (also AV. 9.10.27) which states that the first three forms of speech being hidden in the cave are not known to men. It is the 4th form—Vaikhari—whereby they communicate. In explanation of the above Śruti, SR. quotes a verse from a hymn to the Sun (Sūrya-Stuti) from Sāmba pāñcāśikā. Both of them are quoted by GS. VD and others.

, VR.: The function of the organ of speech is under my control (vāgindriya-vyāpārya. ātmāyāt vātām caho) VJ. Vedic speech is the medium of my manifestation (viśeṣena Vedādīkaṁ mama vyakti-sthānam/) is the middle form). When it is oblatted by offerings of ghee (and other sacrificial objects) it flares up ablaze (in gross form), similarly, I (who am unmanifest) manifest myself in the form of (Vedic) speech.

19. (Just as the articulate speech is my manifestation) manual activity, locomotion, evacuation of the bowels, urination, functions of the cognitive and conative organs (such as perception of smell, taste, sight, touch and audition), the determination in mind, cognition or discriminative knowledge identification of body and the Soul (the ego), Sūtra (or Pradhāna), the modifications of Sattva, Rajas and Tamas d (the whole of the universe)—all are my manifestation.

*20. This life-giving Principle—Īśvara designated as jīva—was certainly manifest, eternal and one without a second (in the beginning). He is the shelter of the three guṇas—sattva, rajas and tamas (or he assumed three guṇas). He is the source (creator) of the lotus in the form of the universe. In course of time, due to the development of the powers of speech and other organs (by embracing Māyā) he appears as many just as a seed sown in fertile soil sprouts forth in different shapes (like the different-shaped parts of the tree grown out of that seed).

1. V. J. interprets some terms differently. Thus Saṅkalpa = the mind, Vijnāna = intellect (buddhi), Abhimāna = a particular working of the mind, Sūtra = Vāyu, modifications like Sattva-tamas = the egg of the universe and other things.

* VR.: This (jīva) is certainly atomic, essentially unchangeable, eternal and one by nature. He is dependent on three guṇas (guṇa-traya vatyah) and is subjected to birth in the universe which is the product of water. In the course of time, his power is depleted due to the notion of ego, identification of the body with the soul etc. and appears many in the form of a god or a human being, etc., just as seeds sown in soils (of different constituents) appear different according to the components of the soil.

V. J.: Next to me and Lakṣmi, Brahmā who was born out of lotus, was the first Jīva or the possessor of three attributes—knowledge, bliss and power. He is subtle, the first-born. He created the principles from Ego (ahāṅkāra) to Prthvi (the earth) and entered into them without diminishing his powers. To the knowers of the Truth, he appears in many forms to control his creation just as rice and other needs grow forth in many sprouts.
21. Just as a piece of cloth exists in the expanse of the threads (of which it is woven), it is in this (Ātman or God) in whom the entire universe is woven warp and woof (i.e. God pervades the universe internally and externally. But just as Threads can exist in the absence of cloth—for example before weaving,—God can pre-exist and post-exist the universe, but the universe cannot exist independent of God). This tree of samsāra is so old that it has no beginning. It has an inherent tendency to karmas (actions). It puts forth flowers and fruits in the form of enjoyment and liberation from samsāra. (Understanding this nature of samsāra, one should give up karmas or activities with attachment).

22. This tree (of samsāra) has two seeds—merit (punya) and sin (pāpa), hundred (s) of roots (viz. innumerable cravings). The three guṇas (sattva, rajas and tamas) are its three stalks. The five elements (mahābhūtas) are its main branches, which exude five kinds of juice (sap, viz. sound, taste, touch and such other five objects of enjoyment of the five cognitive senses). It has eleven subsidiary branches in the form of five cognitive and five conative sense-organs and the internal organ (viz., the mind). Two fine-winged birds (viz. the tri-doshas or humours of the body such as wind, bile and phlegm). It bears two fruits, viz. pleasure and pain. It extends right up to the solar region (The Yojis who make their way through the sphere of the Sun transcend samsāra).

23. (Persons attached to samsāra are the avaricious) vultures which frequent the villages and being greedy eat but one fruit (viz. misery—Even the merit leading to the heaven results in misery and hence is of the nature of misery. The other birds (recluses who have renounced samsāra are full of discrimination and stay away in forests. They are the swans—(Hamsa—a higher order among recluses) who eat of the other fruit (of eternal bliss. He who realizes through the service and grace of spiritual preceptors that it is the One Supreme Soul who appears in multifarious forms through his Māyā power (out of his desire to be many), has really understood the (essence of the) Vedas.

* VJ. attributes different significance to different numbers in this verse: Thus the two seeds of the universe are Brahmā and Sarasvatī. Rudra Indra and Candra, the presiding deities over the Ego, Intellect and the Mind are the three stalks. The birds are two classes of people—the followers of Prajñā and Nīṣṭā, the three barks are the three guṇas. The two fruits are the karmas leading to samsāra and those leading to Mokṣa (Liberation).

24. In this way by propitiating and serving the spiritual preceptor and through exclusive devotion unto me, and with the keen-edged axe of spiritual knowledge, cut asunder the subtle body enveloping the jīva (which causes rebirth). Remaining perfectly vigilant, a (spiritually) wise person should attain to Ātman. It is after this (attainment to Ātman) that you should abandon even the weapon called Vidyā (with which you cut off the subtle body of the jīva).

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

The Spiritual Knowledge Imparted by the Divine Swan

The Lord said:

1. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas are the attributes of the Intellect (Buddhi called here as Prakṛti) and not of the Self. Therefore by (re-inforcing the attribute) Sattva, one should overcome (the tendencies of) the other two (viz. Rajas and Tamas) and then by developing Sattva (in the form of perfect tranquility) one should subdue Sattva (characterised by virtues like truthfulness, etc.)

2. When Sattva becomes dominant, it develops in Man dharma which is characterised by devotion to me. Sattva develops by use of Sattvika things and then leads to dharma which is of the nature of Devotion to God.

3. Righteousness characterised by devotion to me is the best form of virtue. It enhances the potency of Sattva which eliminates Rajas and Tamas. When these two are weeded out, unrighteousness which has its roots in these two is automatically exterminated.
4*. Scriptures, water, progeny, sacred places, time, acts, birth, meditation, mantras and purificatory rites—these ten factors are the determinants in promoting a guna.

5. (Out of these) whatever is approved of as Sāttvika by persons expert in Śāstras and of mature judgement is (reliably) Sāttvika; (the acts, etc.) that they censure is Tāmasa and that about which they are indifferent is Rājasa.

6. For the purpose of development of Sattva guna, one should use Sāttvika things. Sattva guna leads to righteousness from which spiritual wisdom arises and it (goes on developing till it) results in the attainment of Self realization which eliminates ignorance and gunas whereby the gross and subtle bodies come into being.

7. Just as forest-conflagration caused by the friction of bamboos gets extinguished after completely burning down the bamboo forest, in the same manner this body which is the pro-

* BP. enumerates these on the basis of ŚR's explanation of the 6th verse but has given it a sectarian Vaiṣṇavite turn to the list as follows:
(1) Scriptures e.g. Vedas and Āgamas like Pāncarātra, (2) Sacred waters like those of holy rivers like the Gaṅgā, (3) Prajā—saintly people (4) Lonely place (proper for meditation), (5) Time—like Brāhma Muhūrta (roughly 4 a.m. to 6 a.m.); (6) acts done without any attachment or expectation in return; (7) birth-life after the thread ceremony or the initiation for a sacrifice (8) Meditation on Viṣṇu; (9) Mantra (sacred formula about Viṣṇu such as Om nama bhagavata Vāsudeva); (10) rites—Vaiṣṇavite ones such as branding god's names on one's person, wearing Vaiṣṇavite mark of sandal, etc. on the forehead.

1. ŚR. enumerates them as follows: (1) Scriptures leading to renunciation of Sanhāra, and not heretic texts or those of the path of Pravṛtti (Karma-mārga); (2) Sacred waters and not scented water or wine; (3) Recluses or saints who have renounced their household and sanhāra; (4) Brāhma-muhūrta for meditation; (5) Daily religious duties not acts with a desire (for heaven) or black magic; (6) Birth i.e. initiation into the Vaiṣṇava or Śaiva path but not those of Śāktas, (7) meditation of god Viṣṇu; (8) Mantra like OM (9) Purificatory rites pertaining to one's mind.

2. To the argument that knowledge arises by listening to the 'great sentence' (that art thou) and hence the development of Sattva or Dharma are superfluous; ŚR. explains that spiritual Knowledge increases to that duct of the unequal forces of gunas ceases to be by the mutual friction and destruction of the gunas.

Uddhava said:

8. How is it that people indulge into enjoyment of sense-objects like a dog or a mule or a goat, even though most of the mortals generally know that enjoyment of such objects is the source of calamities.

The Lord replied:

9. The perverted notion\(^1\) of I-ness (identifying the body with the soul) springs up in the heart of a deluded person with such a force that the terrible rajas takes (complete) possession of the mind though (originally) it (the mind) is born of Sattva.

10. In the mind of a person bedevilled by the Rajas, arises first the notion of enjoyability of an object and then the special enjoyable features (and thoughts about the ways and means of attaining them) are thoroughly rooted in it. Ultimately owing to constant thinking on the excellent aspects of the objects, an irresistible passion for them is engendered in the mind of men of such perverted notion.

11. Being completely diluted (and swept off) by the vehemence of the Rajas, he loses his control over his senses and organs and being at the mercy of his carnal desires, rushes into acts even though he clearly foresees their painful consequences.

12. Although a man of knowledge and wisdom may get his intellect distracted and overpowered by Rajas and Tamas, he should assiduously and with alertness control his mind and realizing the evil consequences (of the enjoyment of such objects) should not be attached to them.

13. Having achieved steadiness or bodily posture and control over the breath, one should, at the proper fixed time, gradually concentrate his mind on Me with vigilance and without feeling despondent (in case of distractions).

much extent to which one realises the one-ness of Jiva and God and ignorance causing the bondage of the subtle and gross body recedes.

1:\(\text{-- That one is an independent agent of an action—V.J.}\)
14. The means whereby the mind can be withdrawn from all other objects and can be easily and properly concentrated in me has been proclaimed by me through my disciples like Sanaka and others.

_Uddhava submitted:_

15. I wish to know the form you assumed when you imparted the knowledge of this Yoga to Sanaka and others (as they were earliest in creation and as such much anterior to you who are born at the fag end of Dvāpara.

_The Lord replied:_

16. Sanaka and others, the mind-born sons of god Brahmā asked their father about the subtle and the ultimate stage of yoga¹ (or the knowledge or realization of the Lord).

_Sanaka and others submitted_

17. O Lord! The mind naturally gets attached (and enters) the objects of enjoyment, while the objects (so enjoyed) enter into the mind (by implanting themselves as latencies). How can a person wishing to transcend them both in order to get himself liberated from Samsāra divorce them mutually?

_The Lord said:_

18. At this submission of the problem, the great self-created god Brahmā, the Creator of all beings, contemplated deeply over it, but as his mind was engrossed in the activity of creation, he could not pin-point the root of the question.

19. With the desire of knowing the solution of the problem (lit. going to the other end of the question) god Brahma-deva concentrated his mind on me. Assuming the form of a swan² I presented myself near him.

---

¹ About the subtle process of Yoga and the nature of the Soul (or the Lord)—EK.
² Just as a swan has the capability to separate milk from water (if a mixture of the two is presented to it), the Lord went there to show them the process of separating the object of senses from the mind—ŚR.
20. Seeing me, they approached me and bowed my feet, with god Brahmā as their leader, they enquired of me (through Brahmā) ‘Who are You?’

21. When I was thus accosted by the sages who were eager to know the truth, please listen attentively from me, O Uddhava, what I explained to them.

22*. If there be non-difference or non-multiplicity in the reality (i.e. the real entity) of the Soul (and if you are putting the question with reference to the Soul), how can such a question arise, O Brāhmaṇas, and on what basis can I reply (as due to one-ness of Soul, I cease to be a distinct entity).

23  (If your question is relating to this physical body of mine it is equally meaningless). When, in reality (from the point of the constituents of the physical bodies of all beings) all beings are the same substance inasmuch as they are constituted of the same five gross elements. Hence the question “Who are you” is merely a verbal expression signifying nothing.¹

24. Please grasp this firmly that whatever is perceived by mind, expressed by speech or apprehended by sight or by any other sense is Me and nothing else but Myself.

25. The mind enters (gets enmeshed) in the objects of senses and the objects (permanently) imprint (their latencies)

*(i) The question “Who are you” is untenable as both sentient and non-sentient entities and the Paramātman are one. For I am the Inner-Controller of you all—The questioners.

    evam praśī-ndhi yuṣmdākam apyaham antārdme’tyuktam bhavati

—VR.

(ii) If in your view, the reality about Paramātman be one (not-many) how can the question “Who are you” be tenable? If you presume manyness of the reality, the use of the singular number to many is untenable.

    (aṇeṣaṃsin bahutva-saṃkhyā-viśiṣṭe vastuni ekatva-saṃkhyā-viśiṣṭatvena vaktum anupapannatvaḥ)

—VJ.

 All the five categories of beings viz., gods, human beings, manes (piṭṭs), Gandharvas and Asuras are inferior to Hiranyagarbha and are not fit to be worshipped and as such are equals. Owing to this uniqueness of mine whom god Brahmā and others worship, this question is superfluous.

—VJ.

1. vācāṛambhāyāṃ vikāro nāmādeyam—Chāṇḍogya Up. 6.1-4

 Both guṇas (objects of senses) and the mind get burnt by the fire of knowledge—VJ.
on the mind and both the objects and the mind constitute the body of the jīva whose soul is I myself, O my (grand) sons.¹

26. * Realizing my one-ness with him, the jīva should renounce (and free himself from the bonds of) both the mind which gets involved into sense-objects by constantly indulging into them and the sense-objects born of the mind which leave their imprints on it. (in the form of reminiscences).

27. Wakefulness, the dream-state and deep sleep are the three states of the mind caused by the (dominance of) three guṇas,² the jīva, being the witness of these states, is conclusively determined to be distinct from them.

28.  As this bondage is superimposed on the Ātman by Buddhi (mind or intellect) and is thus the cause of saṁśāra (involvement in the cycle of births and deaths) and as this (wrongly) attributes the functions of guṇas to Ātman, one should firmly establish oneself in me who, as the fourth state, transcend those three states (and thus give up this bondage). And hereby the mind and the sense objects get (automatically) divorced.

29. Comprehending thoroughly that bondage is caused to the Soul due to Ahamkāra (false identification of the body with the Soul) and that it compromises the original blissful nature of the Soul, and is thus the cause of misery, he should abhor it. He should (then) establish himself (through meditation) in the fourth state, viz. Lord Vāsudeva and give up all thoughts about sense objects (and be free from the fear of saṁśāra).

30. So long as the notion regarding the reality of diver-

¹. The combination of the objects of senses and the mind which constitutes the body is an adjunct or the limiting condition superimposed on jīva which is essentially Brahma—ŚR.

*. It is by contemplation of my essential nature that both are divorced from each other. madräpe cintyamāne sati...cittam guṇāṁstya jati guṇāṁ cittaṁ tyajantii—VR.

2. VR quotes an authority which attributes wakefulness to sattva, the dream-state to rajas and deep sleep to tamas.

 (The gist only) Paramāṭman is not affected by the three states (viz. wakefulness, dream and deep sleep). When the jīva who is a part of Paramāṭman's body becomes firmly established in him, he transcends these three states and works out the divorce between the objects (guṇas) and the mind—VR.
sity (in the world) is not completely removed by means of various reasonings, the man is (as good as) asleep (i.e. ignorant) though he be awake i.e. diligent in performing karmas, like unto a dreamer thinking himself awake while he is actually in a dream.

31. All objects other than the self (e.g. the physical body) being unreal, the differences created by them (for example difference in varnas, castes and Ātramas—stages in human life), the goals promised (e.g. godhood in the heaven) and their causes (viz. acts prescribed in the Vedas for attaining these goals) are all unreal and non-existent like scenes in a dream.

32.* He who, while in the waking state, experiences through all his cognitive and conative sense-organs the external objects which are transient and changing every moment, who, while in the dream state, enjoys mentally objects similar (to those perceived in wakeful condition) and who, in deep sleep, withdraws them all, is one and the same, the controller of all sense-organs and the witness of the three states (of wakefulness, dream and deep slumber), as he (being the common factor in these states), remembers them all.

33. Having reasoned thus logically and arrived at the definite conclusion that these three stages of the mind (describ-

1. nānārthadhāḥ—(i) VR: Failure to understand the difference between the body and the soul or intelligent being leading to the misconception of difference as god, man, etc.
   (ii) VJ.: The mistaken notion that the jīva is not different from Hari and Hari has become many and the jīva is an independent agent. He quotes as his authority (without naming).

   bhinnasya tuve-bhāvena tathākasya ca bhedaah
   jñānam na nārthā-dhīḥ prakta ||

2. ajña—One who cannot see the reality correctly as it is (asamyag-darśi)

* VJ : Lord Hari, present in the right eye, and known as Viśva, shows to jīva (who is ever dependent on him) various momentary things in the wakeful state. Viśṇu is present in the throat and is the controller of senses and is called Taijasa. He shows in the dream state all objects similar to those in wakeful condition and their imprints are in the heart. In the state of deep sleep, he is present in the heart and is called Prājña. He withdraws all senses, gives the bliss of sleep to the jīva. As noted by Śrītaś as well as Śrutis, Hari, the Supreme Lord, is the Ruler of senses and the witness of the three stages of wakefulness, dream and deep slumber. Hence to regard Paramātman and jīva as identical is a mistake.
ed above) are caused by the (three) guṇas (of Māyā) and are superimposed on me (as jīva) by my own deluding potency, and having cut asunder the Ego (Āhāṅkāra), the root and receptacle of all doubts (about the identity of Paramātman and the jīva) the plurality of jīvas, etc.) with the sharp sword of knowledge whetted by inference (arrived at by logical concomitance and discontinuation), by precepts of the saints (as well by śruti texts (Bṛhma Śūtras and Upaniṣads), a person should contemplate me as abiding in his heart.

34.* One should realize that this (phenomenal world) is simply an illusion, only a play or work of the mind, which is just apparent and evanescent, extremely unsteady like the illusion of a circle described by a revolving fire-brand. He should see through it that consciousness, though one, appears as many and that threefold difference in states brought about by the projection of the three guṇas is nothing but Māyā (illusion).

35. Having withdrawn his eye (thoughts) from that (visible world, his body, etc.), he should rid himself of all thirsts (the eśānās—desire for money, reputations, etc.) and remain inactive and silent. Thus becoming desireless, he should remain absorbed in the bliss of self-realisation, If, in spite of this, the body, etc. is perceived (when not in meditation) for sheer physical needs such as due to hunger, thirst, calls of nature), it, having been once discarded as unreal (and something other than the Ātman), will not (be powerful enough to) create any misapprehension or illusion (and disturb one’s meditation), although the memory or the impressions of the body or of the phenomenal world may remain till the death of one’s body.

36. A person who has attained perfection in spiritual wisdom (and is absorbed in the bliss of the Soul) is not conscious whether his transient body is in the sitting posture or standing, even though by means of that very body he has realiz-

* VJ. (Only the difference in interpretation noted) One should realize that Paramātman becomes many under different conditions is a wrong notion. To regard Viśādhan or blissful Brahman as different in different forms is a mis-apprehension. It is the wrong notion projected by the three guṇas, sins and other conditions.

(Satstodibhis tribhir guṇais tat-sargais tat-kāryañā āpōdibhir kṛtah paryāpta-vikalpo mithyādham nam iti eśāḥ)
ed the essential nature of his Atman. He is unaware if his body comes or goes to any place according to his Karma or the will of the Lord, just as a man dead drunk with wine is not conscious whether his garment is on his person or has fallen off.

37. So long as the fund of merits and demerits (Karmas) which has brought the body into being, is not exhausted, this body (along with its vital principle and sense-organs) definitely continues to survive, as it is under the control of the Providence. But a person who has mastered all the stages of Yoga till the final stage called Samādhi (Perfect concentration and absorption in the Atman) and has realized Reality, does not resort to the dreamlike unreal world (his body, relation, property, etc.) any more than an awakened person to the objects in the dream.

38. What has been expounded by me now to you, O, Brāhmaṇas, is the secret essence of the paths of Sānkhya and Yoga. Please know me to be Yajña, Lord Viṣṇu himself who has come here with the object of teaching (and explaining) to you (the secret of) the righteous path.

39. I am the ultimate goal of the paths of Sānkhya and Yoga, of virtue (both in its theoretical and practical aspects), of prowess, of prosperity, of glory and of self-control, O the best of Brāhmaṇas.

40. All excellent attributes like impartiality, non-attachment which are not caused by the qualities like sattva, rajas and tamas, find an asylum in me who am devoid of ordinary qualities and above wants, the friend (of all beings), nay the very Soul of them all.

41. In this way, sages like Sanaka and others got their doubts explained by me. Having worshipped me with intense devotion, they extolled me in hymns and praise.

42. Duly worshipped by them and celebrated in hymns by the great sages, I returned to my own region while Brahmā and other sages were just witnessing.
CHAPTER FOURTEEN

The Path of Devotion and the Method of Meditation

Uddhava said:

1. Expert expositors of Vedas state that there are many courses leading to the final emancipation of the Soul. Are they important in their own way depending on the adopter or is one of them prominent (in preference to the rest), O Kṛṣṇa?

2. The path of Devotion which is self-dependent (or disinterested) has been taught by you, O Lord. By following it, all attachment is warded off and the mind establishes itself in you.

The Lord replied:

3. In due course of time, this word of Mine which came to be designated as the Veda became extinct at the time of Deluge. At the beginning of Creation (of the universe), I communicated it to god Brahmā. It consisted of the dharma (the righteous duty) of devoting one's mind to me exclusively.

4. The Lore was taught by Brahmā to his eldest son (Śvāyambhuva) Manu. From him (Manu) the seven Brāhmaṇa sages, Bṛṣgu and others, learnt it.

5. From those fathers (of creation) their progeny, gods, Dānavas (demons), Guhyakas (Yakṣas) human beings, Siddhas Gandharvas, Cāraṇas, Kindevas (secondary deities), Kinnaras Nāgas (serpents), Rākṣasas (Ogres), Kīṁpuruṣas (sub-human species with man-like appearance) and others learnt it. But being born with the dominance of different proportion of attributes like Sattva, Rajas and Tamas they were of varied natural proclivities.

7. The natural tendencies which distinguish the different species from one another, differentiate their understanding as well. It is according to the nature of these that different and varied verbal expression (and interpretation of the Vedas) severally flow out.

8. It is in this manner that due to a variety in their natures, there is a diversity of understanding owing to hereditary and traditional interpretations (even though they themselves have not studied the Vedas) while others accept anti-Vedic heretic views.

9. Men whose minds are deluded by my Māyā enunciate various means of achieving the highest good according to their past acts (Karmas) and tastes.

10. Some (i.e. Mīmāṃsakas) hold that performance of (sacrifices and other) acts prescribed in the Vedas leads to the summum bonum; others (viz. poets and writers on rhetorics) regard (good) renown as the highest blessing. Sages like Vātsyāyana regard sexual enjoyment as the highest blessing; Yogīs advocate truthfulness, self-control and quiescence (as leading to the highest goal). Realists (like politicians) say that affluence, executive power as the highest purpose in life; some regard performance of sacrifices, worship of deities, austerities, gifts, self-denial (like the vows yama and niyama) as the highest goal in life while materialists advocate liberality and enjoyment as the highest goal.

11. All these (above-mentioned) regions are the culminations of their acts and as such they have a beginning and an end (i.e. are temporary). They give rise to grief, end up in ignorance, afford trivial pleasures and are full of grief and anxiety (even while they are being enjoyed).

12. O gentle Uddhava! How can the (incomparable) happiness be enjoyed by people who have given themselves to sensual pleasure—the happiness which is shared with me by persons who have given up attachment to all things without expecting anything in return, and have dedicated their mind to me.

13. All quarters are blissful unto him who owns nothing in this world, is self-controlled, serene in mind, regards all as equals and finds perfect delight in me.

14. He who has dedicated his heart to me does not hanker after the highest post (of god Brahmā) or the position of the rulership over gods or sovereignty over men or lordship over the subterranean regions or the mystic power of yoga or the Final Emancipation (Mokṣa) from which there is no return to Samsāra. He wishes to have nothing else but me.

15. Neither god Brahmā (who is born from me) nor Śaṅkara nor Śaṅkarāṇa (my brother Balarāma) nor my Consort, goddess Śrī, nay not even my Soul is so dear to me as (a devotee like) you.

16. I always follow the foot-steps of a sage who expects nothing (in return for his penance or service), is tranquil, free from the feeling of enmity, looking all with an equal eye (regarding all impartially as equals), so that I can get myself purified.

17. Others cannot comprehend (much less realize), the immeasurable extent of the pure blissful state of mine which is unsullied by desires but which is enjoyed by the ego-less exalted souls who are perfect ‘have-nots’ (possessing nothing), and whose hearts are not attached to anything but are exclusively devoted to me; whose minds are tranquil, full of kindness to all beings, and whose hearts are untouched by desires.

18. My devotee, who (in the primary stage), may not have control over his senses, will be disturbed by (the attraction of) the objects of senses, but is not generally overpowered by them due to his intense growing devotion.

19. Just as fire which is ablaze with flames reduces fuel to ashes, similarly devotion concentrated on me, burns down all the sins, O Uddhava.

20. Neither the path of Yoga nor that of Sāṅkhya or Dharma (righteous duties prescribed by Veda) or the study of the Vedas or performance of austerities or renunciation lead a person attain to me as does the intensive and well-advanced devotion.

21. I, the very beloved soul of saints, am realized through unswerving devotion and faith. Exclusive devotion established in me purifies even outcastes like the cāṇḍālas from their lowly birth.

22. Neither Dharma (righteousness even though) coupled with truthfulness and mercy nor knowledge reinforced by austerities can thoroughly purify of sins a person who is devoid of devotion.

23. How can the heart be cleansed of impurities without the development of Devotion? And can intense devotion be

---

1. ŚR.: So that I can purify all the worlds which abide in me.
indicated if the hairs do not stand (out of devotional love), and the heart melted with intense emotion (for god) and the tears of joy trickled down (the cheeks).

24. He is really overwhelmed with intense devotion whose voice is choked with emotion and oral expression is faltering, whose heart melts (through his love for the Lord), who laments frequently (at his separation from the Lord) and laughs at time (with the sweet memory of the Lord’s mercy).
Throwing away all bashfulness (or unmindful of social etiquettes), he sings loudly and dances—such a person endowed with my devotion purifies the world.

25. Just as gold, when heated in fire, sheds off its dross and attains its pure state, so also the Soul rids himself of his impurities (and imprints of previous karmas) in heart through (intense) devotion to me and immediately gets absorbed in me.
(lit. resorts to me).

26. The more the heart (of a person) gets purified by constantly) listening to and glorifying my sanctifying storties (and repeating my name), the more it is able to visualize the subtle thing (viz. Paramātman), just as the eye can perceive minute objects (or underground treasures) when medicinal (or mystically charged) collyrium is applied to it.

27. (Just as) the mind of a person constantly brooding over objects of senses gets attached to them, the mind of a person who is constantly meditating on me becomes absorbed in me.

28. Therefore giving up all thoughts of unreal worthless worldly objects as imaginary things or cravings in a dream you should purify your mind with exclusive devotion unto me and firmly concentrate it on me.

29. Avoiding from a distance association with women and those associated with women\(^1\) (and those who cherish the misleading notion of one’s identity with the Lord), a person should subdue his mind and sit in a comfortable secure solitary place and contemplate on me shedding off all sluggishness.

30. No such trouble or bondage would take place in association with others as a person would suffer in the company of women or those who are addicted to women.

\(^{1}\) and works like Vātsyāyana’s Kāma-sūtra (ŚR)
Uddhava submitted:

31. May you be pleased, O Lord of Lotus-eyes to enlighten me on the methodology of meditation—in what manner, in what form and as what, a person desirous of Liberation should contemplate you.

The Lord explained:

32-33. Seated on a level seat (which is neither too high nor too low and is covered with a soft blanket (keeping) one’s body erect, in a comfortable bodily posture (not necessarily a particular yogic posture like Padmāsana), placing the palms (open) on the laps and fixing one’s gaze on the tip of the nose (for mental concentration), one should cleanse the path of vital breath (the respiratory system) by the process of Prāṇāyāma—slow inhalation (with the left nostril) called Pūraka, retention of breath known as Kumbhaka and slow exhalation of Recaka (with the right nostril) and in the reverse order, one should slowly practice it (prāṇāyāma) retaining all the while control over the senses (technically known as pratyāhāra).

34. One should propel with one’s breath the sacred sound Ohm which, like a fine thread of lotus, is uninterruptedly jangling like a bell in the heart and then invest it with a nasal sound.¹

35. In this way, he should invest his breath with Prānava (Ohm) and practise the breath-control ten times, at three times (morning, noon and the evening). Thus, he will attain control over his breath within a month.
36. He should contemplate that the heart that lies in the interior of his body like a lotus-bud drooping down with its stalk upwards (like the flower of a plantain tree) has blossomed with its eight petals and pericarp turned upwards and opened.

37. He should conceive that the son, the moon and the fire are placed one over the other in the pericarp (of that lotus). He should contemplate in that fire, my form so auspicious to meditate upon.

38. He should visualize my form as symmetrical, graciously gentle, with a charming countenance and four long beautiful arms, extremely graceful with a shapely neck, beautiful cheeks and bright smiles.

39. (He should contemplate my form as having) dazzling alligator-shaped ear-rings beautifying my symmetrical ears, wearing garments of cloth of gold, in complexion dark-blue like clouds, and bearing on (the right and left side of my bosom the Śrī-vatsa mark and the abode of the goddess Śrī.

40. (He should conceive my form as) embellished with a conch (Pāñcagajanya), a discus (Sudarśana) a mace (Kaumodaki) a lotus and a garland of forest-flowers (Varnamālā), with feet embellished with shining anklets and surrounded with halo of effulgent Kaustubha gem.

41. (He should meditate on my form as) adorned with a resplendent crown, bracelets, a girdle and armlets, beautiful in every part of the body, fascinating to the heart and with beautiful countenance and eye shedding grace (on the devotees) and very comely and delicate. One should concentrate one’s mind on all the parts of my form.

42. Having withdrawn one’s senses from their objects, a wise person should, with the help of his intellect, the controller of the chariot in the form of one’s body, direct it, concentrating on me completely.

43. After withdrawing the mind so spread over the whole of my personality, one should (try to) concentrate on one limb only. He should now no more think of other limbs but should contemplate on my countenance beaming with smiles.

44. Withdrawing his mind which is thus fixed up there
(on my face), he should (now) concentrate it on the sky (i.e. my form which is the ultimate cause of all). (Lastly) diverting his mind from that, he should establish himself in me, the Absolute Brahman, and should not think of anything else (merging all the distinction between the subject, object and the process of thinking).

45. When one has thus established his mind (and intellect in me), he visualises me in his own self and his self in me the Universal Soul, just as (an individual) light is merged with the elemental light.

46. The mind of a yogi who concentrates his mind in this extremely intensive course of meditation, will, in no time, attain to the state of nirvāṇa (perfect serenity and bliss) and the misapprehension regarding substance, knowledge and action (or the triad of the Seer, Seeing and the Seen or the three types of miseries resulting from Fate, beings or forces of nature) completely disappears.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

The Super-normal Powers Attained by Yoga

The glorious Lord continued:

1. Super-normal powers (Siddhis) attend upon a yogin who has subdued his senses, is devoted to me, has attained breath-control and has concentrated his mind on me.

Uddhava said:

2. By what (type of) concentration and by what methodology, what kind of super-normal power can be mastered? How many such mystic powers are there, O Acyuta? You are the bestower of such powers to Yogins (and You alone know it).

The Lord explained:

3. Eighteen kinds of super-normal powers and (the same number of corresponding modes of) concentrations (for attaining these Siddhis) have been proclaimed by those who are thoroughly proficient in Yoga. Out of them, eight are found in their perfection in me¹ (and are found to a lesser extent in those who have attained similarity of form to me) while the remaining ten are acquired by the increasing dominance of sattva-guna.

4. Atomization, levitation and magnification are the three super-normal powers pertaining to the physical body of the Yogan. The power called prāpti means the ability to act through the senses of others by establishing contacts with deities presiding over those senses (and thus a Yogi can control all beings); Prakāmya is the power to enjoy all things (in the heaven) described in the śāstras and those hidden under the earth as well as objects in the visible world. It is 'Ruling capacity' is the ability to use Māyā (and other lower powers) for attaining one's desire.

5. Vasitā (self-control) is non-attachment to objects of sensuous enjoyment² and the eighth super normal power is the ability to enjoy fully whatever pleasure one wishes (and hence it is called Kāmavasāyitā). O gentle Uddhava, these eight powers are considered to be inherent in me³ (to the highest degree).

6. Immunity from changes of this body (such as hunger, thirst, grief, delusion, old age and death), ability to see and hear from any distance, power of reaching bodily to one's desired destination with the speed of the mind, ability to assume any form (at will), capacity to enter the body of any other person (leaving one's own body in a secure place).

¹. VR.: They are useful in attaining to me while the other ten are conducive to the enjoyment of objects in this world and lead to saṁśāra again.

². EK.: They are attainable in their perfection only to those who have established themselves in me but they, being absorbed in me and unaware even of their body, are indifferent to them. The remaining ten manifest and present themselves to a person full of pure sattva. —EB. 15. 38-41.

³. Whereby one attains my characteristics—EK.

². It is only one of these super-normal powers, that the aspirant after me can hope to get after utmost efforts—EK.
7. (Ability) to cast off one's body at will, (capacity) to see (and participate) in the sports of gods with celestial nymphs, the accomplishment of one's desired objects and ability to exercise authority without any obstruction or insubordinate.

(These ten are the minor mystical powers).

8. Ability to know the past, present and the future, mastery over and capacity to remain unaffected by the pairs of opposites (like heat and cold, pleasure and pain, etc.), capacity to read the minds of others, the power to neutralise the effects of the fire, the water, the poison and such other things and to suffer no defeat (in any undertaking).

9. These super-normal powers which are accomplished through specific Yogic concentrations have been specially mentioned by me. Now learn from me what type of mystic power is attained by which type of concentration and its procedure.

10. He who concentrates his mind (which also is subtle like an atom) on me as abiding in the subtle form of elements (tanmātrās) and adores me as a subtle element attains the power of atomizing his body.

11. Focusing his mind on me and contemplating me, the all-pervading Supreme Soul as ensouling the principle called Mahat and extending the mind to that dimension, attains the super-normal power of 'magnification' and concentrating the mind on me as abiding in any of the bhūtas (gross elements) he possesses the all-pervasiveness of that particular element.

12*. Having (concentratedly) devoted his mind on me as abiding in the atoms of the gross elements, (and meditating upon me as the subllest of subtle division of Time) the Yogan attains the power of subtleness.

13. Having thoroughly concentrated his mind on me wholly as abiding in the Sāttvika type of Ego (Ahamkāra) and regarding me as the indwelling Soul of all the sense-organs, the yogīn attains the mystic power called Prāpti (enabling him to function through the senses of others).

* VJ. Attaching his heart on me as the pervader of the most subtle division of time and the subtle-most atoms of the elements the Yogan attains the power of subtleness.
14. He who establishes his mind on me as abiding in the Sūtra (in its all-contacting aspect)\(^1\) attains the mystic power of the highest order called Prākāśyā\(^2\) possessed by me as ensouling me in the Mahat tatva which is born of the Atiṣṭa.

15. He who concentrates his mind on me as Viṣṇu (the pervader of universe), the Controller of the Māyā consisting of three guṇas and the Indweller of Time attains the mystic power of impelling all bodies and the individual souls.

16. The Yogin who focuses his mind on me as Nārāyaṇa, the Fourth Principle,\(^3\) one specifically designated by the term ‘Bhagavān’\(^4\) attains the same characteristics as mine and becomes the master of power called Vaiśākha (absolute non-attachment to everything though he controls them all).

17. The Yogi who concentrates his pure mind on me as the atrephrenless Brahman, attains Supreme Spiritual joy

---

1. VR. explains that although the Mahat is mentioned in the previous verse (No. 11) there the emphasis is on its physical aspects while here the Sūtra aspect of the Mahat connecting it with all things, is implied. VJ. interprets that the Sūtra is the chief vital breath (mukhya prāṇa) which pervades the Mahat.

2. According to VJ. Prākāśyā is the supreme capacity to know the Vedas and everything else (sarva-vedādi-jñāna-sraiṣṭhyāpādakam prākāśyam) and it is obtained through the favour of Pṛṇa, Bhārati and Mahāviṣṇu:

   Sarva guṇās tu Pṛṇasya Paramātma-prasādataḥ prāṇa-Viṣṇoḥ prasādema bhāratiḥ samprakrtiśāḥ

   EK. states that with this Supernormal power (when gifted by the Lord) the yogi is capable of creating crores of Brahmāṇḍas (EB. 15.85-86) But ŚR specifically asserts that the yogi never gets the power of creating the universe:

   na tu viṣṇu-srṣṭiyā-kaṛitrīva-Lakṣaṇam /

1. There have been different opinions about the previous three stages transcended before attaining the fourth: The following are the 1st three stages:

   ŚR.: (1) Virāṭ (2) Hiranyagarbha and (3) Kāraṇa
   EK.: (1) Jīva (2) Śiva and (3) Prakṛti

   (2) Wakefulness (jāgrati), dream state (svapna) and deep sleep (Svapṇa)

2. ŚR quotes the famous verse which enumerates the six excellences of the Lord, viz. absolute mastery over the universe, perfect righteousness, highest glory, afluence, perfect knowledge and complete dispassion.

   aisiṣṭhayasya saṃgrasya, dharmasya, yasasah śrīvaḥ / jñāna-vairāgyavastaciva saṃsthan bhaga ittraṇāḥ// and bliss when all desires cease altogether (Hence it is called Kāmāvāsāyida).

18. He who fixes his mind on me, the Lord of Svētadvipa, who am absolutely pure (uninfluenced by Rajas, and Tamas), and the very Dharma incarnate, attains whiteness (i.e. absolute purity untainted by guṇas), and becomes free from the six waves or changes (viz. hunger and thirst, old age and death, delusion and grief which affect all beings).

19. This swan (i.e. the individual soul) who mentally meditates on the (ever-abiding “unstruck” spiritual) sound in me who am the Soul of the sky (and the cosmic vital breath as well), attains the supernormal power of hearing (from any distance), the sounds of all beings (as all words or utterances repose in the sky.)

20. With his eye-sight united with the Sun and the Sun with eye and meditating on me in the solar-ocular union becomes endowed with a subtle vision and can view everything in the universe (This is the dūra-darśana siddhi).

21*. When the mind and the body along with the vital breath are properly established in me,¹ (one attains the miraculous power called mano-java and) due to the efficacy of this method of meditation. The body is transported (with the speed of the mind) wherever the mind goes (This is the “dūrāgamana-siddhi”—potency to go anywhere at will).

22. When a Yogi utilises his mind as the material cause and desires to assume whatever form he likes, he can transform himself that way at his sweet will, as he depends on the power of contemplating on me (who am of inconceivable potency and of innumerable forms).

23. If a person accomplished in the power of entering another person’s body has perfectly controlled his vital airs and senses desires to enter the body of another person, he should contemplate that he has occupied that body. Leaving his own (previous) body (along with the chief vital air—prāṇa and the astral body he should enter the external cosmic air and thus enter in the form of air (through the nostrils of that

* When, in contemplation, the mind and vital breath along with the body are correctly established in me—VR.
body) into the new body as a six-legged black-bee does (from one flower to another). (This power is known as para-kāyāpraveśa (entrance into another person’s body).

24. (Controlling the downward movement of the vital breath) by blocking the rectum with one’s heels and pushing up (by slow degrees), the vital air (through susumnā nāḍī) through the heart, chest, throat and the crown of the head, he should then propel it through the aperture in the crown of the head (which is called Brahmaraṇḍha) directing it to its destination—The parabrahman (or any other state he wishes to have)—and cast off his physical body.

25. If a Yogi is desirous to enjoy sportive life in heaven, he should contemplate on the pure Sattva in me. And celestial damsels of sāttvika nature attend upon him with their celestial cars.

26. A person who establishes his mind in me who am reality and is absolutely devoted to me, attains and enjoys the objects of his desires to have at a particular time and in the specific manner, according to his will.

27*. He who is established in my state who am the ordainer of all and quite independent, shall never meet reverses anywhere and his order will be like my commandment (which can never be thwarted). (This is the potency of inviolable commandment—apratihatājñā.

28. The yogin whose mind has become (absolutely) pure by devotion to me and who is conversant with the way of concentrating his mind on me (who am the creator, protector and destroyer of the Universe), attains the knowledge of the past, present and future along with that of the birth and the death (of himself and the world as well as the mind of others).

29. The sage whose mind reposes in contemplation on me (who am above the pair of opposites like heat and cold), gets his physical body seasoned with yoga and is not adversely affected by fire and other (troubles from water, wind, cold, arms, etc.), just as aquatic animals are not affected by water. (This power is called advandvata or 'transcendence over opposites' which leads to avastambha siddhi or power of neutralisation of the harmful forces).

30. He who meditates (with a concentrated mind) on the various forms and incarnations of mine (exhibiting various powers and) adorned with the tri-vatsa mark and my missiles (like Sudarśana, etc.) and accompanied with my banner (with the emblem of Garuḍa), umbrella and chowries, would never be vanquished.

31. All the supernormal powers detailed above attend upon the sage who propitiates me according to the appropriate methods of concentration (described in the above-mentioned verses).

32. What super-normal power can be difficult to accomplish in the case of a sage who, having controlled his senses, subdued his mind and mastered breath-control, firmly concentrates his mind on me?

33. But in the case of persons who practise the excellent course of yoga in order to realize me through my grace, the wise call these siddhis as impediments, as they involve waste of time (in God-realization).

34. Whatever super-normal powers are accomplished through birth (e.g. power of aviation to birds or gods), medicinal plants, penance, and utterance of mantras,¹ are all obtained through yoga, but one cannot attain the highest fruit of yoga (viz. emancipation from samsāra) through these other means.

35. Being the source and the Lord of all these super-normal powers, I am their controller. Equally I am the master of yoga (paths of union with God), of Sāṅkhya (the path of knowledge leading God-realization), of Dharma (righteous duties as ordained by the Vedas), and even of the exponents of Brahma (or the Veda).

¹. janmauṣadhimantra-tpoh-samādhiḥ siddhayāḥ.

—PYS.4.1.
36. I am the Soul of all embodied beings, their Inner Controller who pervades them (even externally), though I myself am unenclosed. Just as the (five) elements permeate living beings in the world from inside and outside, so I pervade them all and still retain my independent existence.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Description of Viṣṇu’s Glorious Manifestations*

Uddhava said:

1. You are the veritable Supreme Brahman having neither the beginning nor end. You are unobscured (by Māyā or its products). You are the Maker of creation, protection and destruction of all beings.

2. Although you are very difficult to be cognized by persons who have not controlled their minds, O Lord, persons who have understood the real import of the Vedas propitiate you (by contemplating on you in the proper manner), in your real form as abiding in all beings high or low.

3. Pray, be pleased to narrate to me the various objects or beings (in which you have manifested yourself and¹), by devoutly contemplating on you through which the great sages (of yore) have attained final beatitude.

4. You are the creator and Protector of beings. As their Inner Controller, you abide in them without being manifest to them. Being deluded by your Māyā, the beings cannot see you who, however, perceive them all.

* If the previous chapter bears comparison with the Viśhūti-pāda of the Tosaṭātras by Patañjali, this chapter is an echo of chapter X of the BG. called Viśhūti-yoga. A number of verses and parts of verses being common both to this text and the BG., verses are not quoted in Footnotes to conserve space.

¹. And the procedure of contemplating on you in those several objects and beings—VJ.
5. O Lord of infinite glories! Be pleased to describe unto me whatever glorious forms of yours have been vested by you with special powers and have been manifested on the earth, in the heavens, in the subterranean regions and in all the quarters. I bow to your lotus feet which are the abode of all sacred places.

The glorious Lord said:

6. O Uddhava! You are the excellent one among persons who make (intelligent) queries (with proper understanding). A question similar to this very question was put to me by Arjuna who was eager to fight with the enemies, at Kurukṣetra.¹

7. Knowing that killing one's kinsfolk for the purpose of obtaining a kingdom is both censurable and irreligious, he, like a common man, came to believe (falsely) that he would be the killer and the other soul would be killed by him and he desisted from fighting.

8. At that time that tiger-like (Valiant) hero who was made to realize (the correct philosophical position in the matter) by logical reasoning, spoke to me in the same manner at the battle-front, as you did now.

9. I am the (Indwelling) Soul, a friend and the Ruler of all these beings, O Uddhava. In fact I constitute all beings; I am the Creator, Protector and Destroyer of these beings.

10. I am the motive force among the mobile; I am the Time-Spirit (Kāla) among those that bring other things under control. I am the state of equipoise of the guṇas and I constitute the property natural in things possessing properties.

11. I am the sūtra, the first evolute of Prakṛti—the active aspect in the products of guṇas; I am the greatness or the principle called Mahat among things with large dimensions. Among the subtlest of things, I am the vital Principle and among the invincibles, I am the mind.

12. Of the Vedas, I am god Brahmā (Hiranyagarbha who is the first teacher of the Vedas); of mantras, I am the

¹ Strictly speaking Vinaśana designates the spot in Kurukṣetra where the Sarasvatī disappeared (MBH, Vena 82.111) but here the battlefield of Kurukṣetra in general is implied.
Prañava (Om) constituted of the three syllabus (A U M); of the sounds represented by the letters of the alphabet, I am (the first sound) A; of all the metres, I am the Gāyatrī metre (consisting of three feet).

13. I am Indra out of all celestials and the fire-god among all the Vasus. Of the Sun-gods, I am Viṣṇu and out of the (eleven) Rudras, I am Lord Śiva.

15. Out of masters of super-normal powers (siddhas), I am Kapila; out of birds, I am Garūda, I am Dakṣa out of Prajāpati (The lords presiding over creation) and am Aryamā out of the manes or departed ancestors.

16. O Uddhava! Know that I am Prahlāda, the king of Asuras among the demons (Daityas). Out of constellations and medicinal plants, I am Soma, and I am Kubera out of Yakṣas and Rākṣasas.

17. Know me to be Airāvata (the elephant of Indra) among mighty elephants and Varuṇa, the Lord of aquatic animals. Know me to be the Sun among the heavenly luminous bodies emitting heat and light and the Lord of the terrestrial globe among human beings.

18. Out of horses, I am Uccaiḥśravas and gold out of (excavated) metals; out of deities dispensing justice and punishment. I am Yama (the god of Death) and out of serpents know that I am Vāsuki.

19. I am Lord Ananta (Śeṣa) out of the serpent-kings and a lion (lord of beasts) among animals with horns and fangs. Know me to be the fourth Āśrama, (sannyāsa) among the Āśramas (stages of life) and the first Varṇa (Brāhmaṇas) among the classes in society.

20. I am the Gaṅgā among sacred rivers and streams and the sea among all the reservoirs of water. I am the bow among weapons and god Śiva, the slayer of Tripura, among archers.

21. Among all abodes, I am mount Meru (the abode of gods) and of all steep and inaccessible places, I am the Himālayas. Out of trees, I am the Pippal tree and I am barley of all the (food yielding) plants.

22. Out of all sacrificial priests, I am Vasistha, and Brhaspati (the preceptor of gods) among the experts in the Vedas. Out of all the leaders of armies, know me to be Skanda and god Brahmā of all persons who show people the right path.

23. Out of all sacrificial performances, I am Brahma-yajña (the recitation and teaching of Vedas) and non-violence (even by word) out of all sacred vows. Out of all purifying agents like air, fire, sun, water and speech (vāk), I am the purifying power—the sanctifier of all purifying agencies.

24. Out of the (eight) steps or limbs of yoga, I am the absorption of the Self (in Brahma) or Samādhi. I am political wisdom among those who are ambitious of conquests; among the scientific systems of thought, I am the scientific thought system that distinguishes between the matter and spirit (ātman and anātman). I am the insoluble doubt in the quest of the theories of perception of knowledge (known as Khyāti as akhyāti of Mimāmsakas, Śūnyakhyāti of Buddhists, asat-khyāti of Naiyāyikas, etc.).

25. I am Satarūpā (the first woman, Svāyambhuva Manu’s wife) out of women, and Svāyambhuva Manu (the progenitor of the human race) out of men. Out of sages, I am Nārāyaṇa and (Sanat—) Kumāra among the observers of celebacy.

26. Of all the duties of righteousness, I am Sannyāsa (the assurance of protection against fear); of all causes conducive to security, I am the thought concentrated within (on the self). Of all the means of retaining secrets, I am sweet.

---

1. Which satisfies gods, sages, manes, living beings and the universe —EK

2. There are five Khyātis, each espoused by a different school of thought. They are enumerated below:
   ātma-khyātis asatkhyātis akhyātiḥ khyātis anyathā tathā 'nirvocana-khyātis ityeta khyāti-pañcakam vijñāna-Śūnyamāṁśa-tarkāduśita-vidyāṁ manam.

3. Resigning all desire for the reward of all actions to the Lord (anabhisanhitā-phalo dharmaḥ)—VR.
speech and silence. Of all couples, I am god Brahmā (who divided his person in man and woman).

27. Of all the divisions of Time,¹ I am Sanvatsara (a year) and of all seasons, I am the spring (consisting of the months of Caitra and Vaiśākha). Out of the months (of a year), I am Mārgaśīrṣa and out of all constellations of stars, I am Abhijit (that forms the last part of the asterism Uttarāśāḍhā and the first of Śrāvaṇa).

28. Out of yugas, I am the Kṛta Age and of all intelligent bold thinkers,² I am Asita and Devala. I am Dvaipāyana (son of Parāśara and Satyavatī) among all the classifiers of the Vedas. Of wise politicians, I am the self-controlled Śukra.

29. Among all the divine persons possessing the knowledge of creation and destruction of the universe and the individual and the spiritual wisdom and nescience³, I am Vāsudeva while among the supreme devotees of the Lord, I am you (Uddhava).⁴ Of all the Kimpuruṣas (demi-gods similar to monkeys) I am Hanumān, while among all the Vidyādhāras I am Sudarśana.⁵

30. I am the ruby out of all precious stones; I am the lotus-bud of all delicate and lovely objects. Of the grass of the darbha-type I am Kuṭa. Out of all oblations to fire, I am butter made from cow’s milk.

31. I am the wealth of the industrialists and businessmen (or those who strive to make money). Among all the gamblers, I am fraudulence. I am fortitude among the endurant persons and the energy among the energetic strivers.

---

¹ Of all those who are vigilant (ŚR.)
² Persons with fortitude to undergo pair of opposites like pleasure and pain—VR.
³ ŚR. gives the definition of Bhagavān as follows:
   utpatīṁ prelayaṁ caiva bhūlādām agatiṁ gatiṁ
   Vetti vidyāṁ avidyāṁ ca sa vācyo bhagavān iti/!
   but VR and VJ. follow the usual description of being endowed with six excellences like jñāna, āsītavya, etc.
⁴ With VJ. the seniority of the best devotees is as follows: Bhima, Draupadi, Balarāma, Arjuna and lastly Uddhava.
⁵ vide Supra X. 34.12-18.
32. I am (physical and mental) virility and might among the strong and I am desireless action (of devoted service) among the Śātvatas (the votaries of the Lord). I am the first Supreme manifestation (viz. Vāsudeva) among all the nine manifestations¹ (Vyūhas of the Lord worshipped by followers of the Pāñcarātra Āgama).

33. Out of Gandharvas, I am Viśvāvasu and am Pūrvavacitti² out of celestial damsels. I am stability among the mountains and the property of scent of the earth.

34. I am the taste among water (liquids). I am the Sun among the bright luminaries; I am the lustre of the Sun, the moon and the stars. I am the sound (the essential characteristic) of the sky.

35. Of all those who are friendly to Brāhmaṇas, I am Bali and I am Arjuna among the warriors. I constitute the creation, sustenance and destruction of all the beings or elements).

36. I am the functions of the sense-organs such as locomotion, expression, excretion, receiving and enjoyment as well as touching, tasting, hearing and smelling. I am the sense of all senses (i.e. the inherent power to perform these functions).

37. I constitute the seven principles which are of the nature of both the cause and the effect, viz. the subtle elements—tanmātrās—of earth, air, sky, water, fire and Ego (Ahaṅkāra) and Mahat; I am also the (sixteen) modifications (which are only the effects and not cause, viz. five gross elements, ten cognitive and conative sense-organs and the mind), the individual soul (who is above causal relation) and the Unmanifest (Prakṛti which is only the cause of all) and (the

¹ GD. enumerates them as follows: Vāsudeva, Saṅkarṣaṇa, Pradyumṇa, Aniruddha, Nārāyaṇa, Hayagriva, Varāha, Nṛsiṁha and Vāmana

² VR. (as can be deduced from his predecessor SS) is off the mark to enumerate the usual ten Avatāras of Viṣṇu, deleting Kalki from the list.

V.J.'s list as usual is unique.
three modifications of Prakṛti, viz.) Sattva, Rajas and Tamas¹ as well as the Transcendental Supreme Brahman.²

38. I form the aggregate of these (Twentyfive principles) the knowledge (of their characteristics) as well as the consequent realization of the definite Truth. Nothing exists without my presence anywhere, as I am both the Supreme Ruler as well as individual soul, the modifications (of Prakṛti) or guṇas as well as the products of these guṇas.³

39. The (impossible task of) taking a count of all atoms can be done by me in course of time, but the reckoning of all my manifestations is impossible as millions and millions of universes are continuously being created by me.

40. Wherever there is majesty, affluence and celebrity, authority, modesty, liberality or beauty, fortune, capability, forbearance and precise knowledge of the Truth, there exists my part-manifestation (āṁśa).

41. All these manifestations of mine have been briefly described to you. But these are nothing but freaks of imagination (like the unreal sky-flower) which are only verbally expressed.⁴

42. (Hence) control your speech; rest amin your mind, practise breath-control, subdue your sense-organs, bring your intellect under control by your (sāttvika) intellect so that you will not be liable to return to the path of Saṁsāra.

43. The recluse (striver on the spiritual path) who does not strictly control his speech and mind with his reasoning power, finds that his sacred vows, austere penance and liberality in gifts leak away like water from an unbaked jar.

¹ SR. quotes the following Sāńkhya Kārikā byĪsvara Kṛṣṇa bringing out the implication of this verse:

māla-prakṛti avikṛti-mahodādyāḥ Prakṛti-vikṛtivayah sapta/
śodāsakal ca vikārah, na prakṛti na vikṛtih Puruṣah∥

² Poram—But I am distinct from them as I am the controller of those principles—VJ.

³ I constitute the duality known as God and the individual soul, the guṇas and their products, the Inner Controller of the body as well as the body—SR.

⁴ They are produced directly by my will power and are conveyed by the Vedas—

(māt-saṅkalpa-mātra-janyāḥ vdeḥ vedena)—VR.
44. Therefore, devoting himself solely and unflinchingly to me and with his intellect full of devotion to me, he should control his mind, speech and breath. It is then alone that he attains Liberation from Samsāra—which is the end of the journey.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

The Sacred Duties of a Celibate and a Householder

Uddhava said:

1. Formerly (in the previous Kalpa), You have proclaimed the righteous course (Dharma) which was chiefly characterised by Devotion to you. It was conducive to the well-being of persons eligible to follow (the duties prescribed by Vedas) for the (four) classes of Society (varnas) and the (four) stages of life (Āstamas), but also to all human beings in general.¹

2. O Lotus-eyed Lord! It behoves you to kindly explain in details the prescribed course of duties (ordained for everyone) by observing which Devotion (Bhakti) may be developed in men.

3. O mighty-armed Lord of Lākṣmī! It is reported that in times of yore, you assumed that form of a divine swan² and taught this righteous course of a supreme and blissful nature to god Brahmā, O Lord.

4. But, as a pretty long time has elapsed since it was proclaimed by you, it does not at present survive (in human memory) in this mortal world, O slayer of enemies.

¹ dvipadāmapi—This implies that men who do not belong to any varṇa or āśrama (are beyond the pale of Hinduism) may be benefited by developing devotion to the Supreme Self—VJ.
² vide Supra XI.13
5. There is no person other than you who can propound, practise or defend the Dharma in this world, O immortal Lord. Nor was there any in the assembly of god Brahma which (the presiding deities of) arts and lores attend in a personal form.

6. O Slayer of Madhu! When this terrestrial globe is left by you who are the founder, protector and expounder (of this Dharma) who is there to teach this (practically) inexistent course of righteousness, O Lord?

7. Therefore, O Lord who know all the dharmas, be pleased to expound to me the righteous course characterised by (and leading to) devotion to you, its nature and its procedure as advisedly prescribed to each of us.

Śrī Suka said:

8. Thus solicited by the most prominent of his servants (devotee), the glorious Lord Hari was highly pleased and propounded the eternal course of righteous duties conducive to the welfare of mortal beings.

The Lord said:

9. Your query is intimately concerned with and conducive to dharma, inasmuch as it leads to the highest good of men who observe the duties prescribed for (their respective) Āstrama (stage of life) and Varna (class in society). Please listen to its exposition, O Uddhava.

10. In the beginning (of this Kalpa), in the Kṛta Age, there was only one class among men¹ and that class was known as Ḥamṣa. By their very Birth, people accomplished all their objects in life (by propitiating me and doing nothing else except my devotion). Hence that age came to be known as Kṛta.

¹. EK: The society was class-less as there was no division of men in four classes. No recitation of Vedas of different branches and no Karmas were prescribed for observance. The one-class society was called Ḥamṣa as all men were always engaged in the uninterrupted japa of so’ham (their identity with Brahma) EB. 17.63-64.
11 In that first Age, Praṇava i.e. Om constituted the (entire compilation) of the Vedic text (which thus contained no prescriptions and interdictions).

12. At the beginning of the Tītā Age (after the Kṛta-yuga) the three-fold Vedic lore (consisting of the Ṛgveda, Śāma-veda and Yajurveda) was manifested from my heart through my breath, O blessed Uddhava. Out of that trinity of Vedas, I (who am of the nature of sacrifice) became of threefold (sacri-ficial) functions (viz. those of Hotṛ, Udgātṛ and Adhvaryu).

13. From the Person of the cosmic Man, the classes of society (vānas) viz. Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya, Vaiśya and Śūdra sprang (respectively) from the mouth, arms, thighs and feet (of the Cosmic Person). And they were severally characterised by their own righteous duties and conduct.

14. The order of householder originated from my loins, and that of life-long celibates from my heart, the order of forest-dwelling hermits from my chest and the order of Sannyāsins from the crown of my head.

15. The natures of persons belonging to the different classes and orders of society follow the source of the limbs (of the Cosmic Man) from which they are evolved. The lower the limb (as source of evolution), the lower the nature of activities, the higher the member of the body (as the source), the nobler the activities.

16. Control over the mind, restraint over senses, auster-rities, (physical and mental) purity, contentment, forbearance, straightforwardness, devotion to me, mercifulness and truthfulness are the natural qualities of Brāhmaṇas.

17. Majesty, strength, courage, valour, endurance, liberality, industriousness, firmness, friendliness to Brāhmaṇas—these are natural qualities of Kṣatriyas.

18. Faith (in Vedas and preceptors), firm adherence to liberality, absence of hypocrisy, rendering service to Brāhmaṇas dissatisfaction with amassed wealth (urge to acquire more)—these are the characteristics of the Vaiśyas.

19. Rendering sincere service to twice-born castes (Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and Vaiśyas), cows and gods and satisfaction with what one gets therein are the natural characteristics of Śūdras.
20. Absence of cleanliness, falsehood, thieving, heterodoxy or want of faith, quarrelsomeness (without a proper cause) strong lust and violent anger and inordinate covetousness—these are found in the nature of the lowest castes.

21. Non-violence (in thought, word and deed) truthfulness, abstention from taking what is not given, freedom from lust, anger and greed, desire to work for the happiness and welfare of all beings—these constitute the righteous duties of all classes of society.

22. Having undergone purificatory rites since his conception and having obtained the second birth through the investiture of the sacred thread (upanayana), the twice-born boy should control his senses and reside in the house of his preceptor and recite the Vedas, study the interpretation thereof as per instructions of the preceptor.

23. (During celibacy) he should wear a girdle of the sacred (Muñja) grass (round his waist), a deer-skin, and have a staff, a string of beads, the sacred thread and a jar of water (made of gourd) and matted locks of hair; he should not brush his teeth nor use clothes washed at a laundry. He should not use a painted seat but should hold sacred grass in his hands (as a symbol of Purity and humble approach to the teacher).

24. He should observe silence at the time of bath, taking meals, offering oblations to the sacred fire, repeating sacred syllables (japa) and at the time of excretion. He should not pare his nails nor remove the hair from the armpits and secret parts of his body.

25. He should observe strict celibacy and should not voluntarily allow his semen to escape. In case of involuntary escape (as in wet-dreams), he should take bath, perform breath control and repeat the Gāyatṛī mantra.

26. Pure of body and with concentrated mind, he should silently repeat the Gāyatṛī mantra (while performing sandhiyā) both in the morning and in the evening and should worship the Fire god (by offering oblations), the Sun-god (by performing sandhyā) and other gods and wait upon the preceptor

1- Silence need not necessarily be observed during the sandhiyā-performance at noon—SR. EK.
(who initiated him with the Gāyatri-mantra), the cows, Brāhmaṇas, elderly men.

27. He should look upon his preceptor as myself (god himself) and should never disrespect him in any way. He should not peep into his weak points considering him an ordinary mortal, for the preceptor represents all gods in himself.

28. He should offer to his preceptor whatever alms and anything else he gets, both in the morning and in the evening. Observing self-control, he should use only what is permitted by his teacher.

29. While rendering service to the preceptor, he (the pupil) should wait upon him with humility (as one of his subordinates), (following him) when he goes out, (resting vigilantly) while he sleeps,¹ (shampooing his feet) when he sits to rest, standing nearby with folded palms when he sits.

30. Behaving himself in this manner and observing strictly his vow of celibacy, he should live in the preceptor’s house without indulging into pleasure, till his course of studies is completed.

31. If he is desirous of attaining Maharloka and the Brahmaloka (or god Brahmā’s region where Vedas attend in person as stated in verse 5 above), he should adopt the vow of life-long celibacy and dedicate his person² to his preceptor for advanced course of studies.

32. Resplendent with Vedic lustre and cleansed of all sins, he should entertain the notion of non-difference (with the universe) and worship me, the Supreme Lord in the sacrificial fire, the preceptor, himself and in all beings.

33. A person who is not a householder (i.e. a celibate or a recluse) should scrupulously avoid (lustful) look, touch, conversation of jokes and such other contacts with women. Nay he should avoid the sight to a sexual intercourse of animals.

34-35. (Physical and mental) purity, Ācamana (sipping water before beginning a sacred rite, etc.) bathing, offering

¹. When the teacher is in bed, the pupil should not be there but rest vigilantly somewhere nearby to be able to attend if called.—EB. 17.320.
². With a view to repay the debt of the preceptor—ŚR.
twilight-prayers (to the sun both in the morning and in the evening), straight-forwardness, visiting sacred places, repeating (silently) sacred syllables (mantras), abstention from touching the untouchable, from eating the forbidden articles of food and from speaking with the un-speechworthy, firm faith that I abide in all beings and control over the mind, speech and the body—This rule of discipline is enjoined to all stages of life (Āstrama), O delight of your family.

36. In this way, the life-long celibate (Brāhmaṇa) who has burnt down all the seeds of Karmas by his rigorously austerer penance, and had become absolutely pure and is devoted to me becomes resplendent like fire.

37. If a celibate student who has completed the study and investigation of the Śāstras (according to his need in life), wishes to enter the next stage of life viz. that of a householder, he should pay the educational fees to his preceptor and with the permission of his preceptor, he should take the bath (for terminating his celibate stage, technically known as the Samāvartana samskāra).

38. He should enter the house (i.e. householder's stage of life, if sexually inclined) or the forest (i.e. the life of a Vānaprastha, if he desires to purify his mind). If that excellent Brāhmaṇa is already of pure heart, he should renounce the world (and become a sannyāsin). Or (if he so pleases) he may pass from one stage of life to another but never in the reverse order e.g. from Sannyāsa to Vānaprastha etc. (The āstrama order is not binding on my devotees).

39. A person wishing to enter the householder's stage should espouse a befitting girl, with no defect (in heredity, habits or character), junior to him in age and belonging to his own caste (class, varṇas.)

(It is only after marrying the girl of his own caste

1. EK takes the last two, viz. Faith in the immanence of Brahman in all beings and control over mind, speech and the body as common to all Varṇas and Āstamas.

2. Unless a person is absolutely devoted to me, the āstrama order is binding on him. This rule is not binding on my devotees (ŚR).
if he be sexually unsatisfied) he should take a girl from a class in the prescribed serial order.¹

40. (The duties of) performance of sacrifices, Vedic study and conferring charitable gifts are binding on all twice-born classes (viz. Brāhmaṇa, Kṣattriya and Vaiśya) but acceptance of gifts, teaching of Vedas and (actual) performance of sacrifices are the (additional) duties of Brāhmaṇas.

41. A Brāhmaṇa who considers that acceptance of gifts from others is detrimental to his austerities, Brahmanical (i.e. spiritual) power and glory, should live by the other two means of livelihood (viz. teaching the Vedas and acting as a sacrificial priest). He who feels these two vocations as detracting (to his spiritual position or power,) should live by gleaning grains of corn from the field (when the owner has taken away the produce).

42. This body of a Brāhmaṇa is not certainly meant for trivial enjoyments. It is intended for undergoing distress and austere penance in this world, and infinite bliss (of Mokṣa) after death.

43. He whose mind is content with (what he gets by) gleaning grains of corn (from the fields after the owner had reaped and taken home the food-grains and from the marketplace when the market day is over) and who observes the pure and noble duty of offering hospitality to guests and has dedicated his heart to me and is not much addicted to his house (though himself a householder) attains to eternal spiritual peace.

44. Like unto a boat saving a man drowning into a sea, I promptly save from calamities those persons who redeem a Brāhmaṇa devoted to me or as a matter of that anyone who has dedicated himself to me but is undergoing hardships.

45. Like a father protecting his children from difficulties a king should defend his subjects against all calamities. Just as a king-elephant lifts out (of mire) other elephants of his group and comes out of it by dint of his own power, the wise and courageous king should (after redeeming his subject) extricate himself out of the difficulty by his own efforts.

¹. ŚR. quotes a Smṛti which allows the anuloma order in marriage: Thus a Brāhmaṇa can marry a girl from Kṣattriya, Vaiśya and Śūdra classes; a Kṣattriya from Vaiśya and Śūdra varnas and a Śūdra can marry only a Śūdra girl.
46. A king who discharges his duties in this manner, shakes off in this very life, whatever inauspiciousness and evil (that has clung to him), by the merit accruing to him by his just rule over his kingdom and in a celestial car brilliant like the sun, he goes to heaven and enjoys heavenly pleasures in the company of Indra (king of gods).

47. In times of adversity, a Brāhmaṇa should take to the commercial profession and should surmount the difficult times by selling non-prohibited articles. If, however, he still gets into difficulties (by suffering a loss in his business), he should make his way through that emergency by taking to the sword, but he should never resort to a dog’s way of life (by undertaking lower jobs).

48. During distress, a Kṣatriya should adopt the profession of a Vaiśya or live by hunting or should take to livelihood of a Brāhmaṇa (by accepting a teaching job, but he should never take to the life of a Śūdra.

49. Under adverse circumstance, a person from Vaiśya community should follow the vocations of a Śūdra-artisans like mat-weaving. But once he had overcome the difficulty, he should not hanker after the censurable calling (recommended by Dharmaśāstra to the lower strata of society).

50. A house-holder should according to his financial position, look upon gods, sages, manes and other beings as my embodiments and every day worship them by offering oblations in sacrificial fires uttering the word svāhā at every oblation to a particular deity in the case of gods. Study and recitation of Vedas (technically known as Brahma-yajña, meant for sages), oblations (of water known as Tarpaṇa and Śrāddha for departed ancestors) accompanied with the pronunciations of the word svadā, offering of food (bali) to living beings and serving of food to guests (known as Manusya-yajña.

1. A Brāhmaṇa is not allowed to sell articles like salt, wine etc. (by Dharmaśāstra)—ŚR. To this list EK adds—Ghee, oil, sesameum, cotton (EB. 17.457).

2. Gautamasmṛti regards a soldier’s profession superior to that of a merchant but soldierly profession involves kīṃśa (injury to life). Hence the Lord’s preference to the Vaiśya way of life—ŚR.
51. Without causing any hardship to his dependants (wife, children, servant, etc.), one should perform sacrifices as per proper rites and formalities with the wealth got without any efforts (as by legal inheritance) or with money earned by following one’s profession or with the wealth obtained by fair means.

52. One should not entertain attachment to the members of one’s family. Even though one be a householder, he should not be negligent in his devotion to God. An intelligent person should realize that the unseen enjoyments in heaven (promised by the Purva Mimamsa) are as momentary as the visible world.

53. Companionship and association with one’s sons, wives, kith and kin is momentary like the get-together of travellers (for drinking water-). With the change of one’s body (in the next birth), they part company like a dream that disappears with the sleep.

54. Having thus realized the truth after deep thought, and staying in his house (unconcerned) like a stranger or a guest, he, being devoid of the notion of ‘I-ness’ and ‘mine-ness’ (with reference to his body, relatives and property) is not bound by (and attached to) his household property and leads the life of one liberated while alive.¹

55. Having propitiated me alone through devout worship in the form of performance of duties prescribed for a house-holder, my devotee may continue to stay at home (as a house-holder) or live in a forest as an anchorite (Vanaprastha) or become a recluse (sannyasin) if he has got children (and a continuation of his race).

56. But he whose heart is deeply attached to his household and eagerly pines for getting money and children and is obsessed with sex, is a man of poor understanding. Such a fool is bound with the notions of ‘I-ness’ and ‘mine-ness’

57. “Alas! My parents are aged. My wife and my young children—all of them have no protector without me!

¹. SD. ‘free from desires and attachment’

EK. ‘Is automatically liberated even as a householder’ VR, VJ, BP read mukta for mukta and interpret as ‘one who has concentrated his mind in samahita’.
How can those helpless and miserable persons live without me?"

58. With his heart thus overwhelmed and distracted with anxious attachment to his house, this dull-witted fellow remains dissatisfied and dies while brooding over them and enters the blinding darkness (of hell after death).

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Duties of Hermits (Vanaprastha) and Sannyasins

The glorious Lord continued:

1. A person desirous of entering the Vanaprastha (the third stage of) life should either entrust his wife to the care of his sons or take her with him. He should spend the third quarter of his life (upto the age of seventyfive years) in a forest.

2. He should live on bulbous and other roots, fruits which are regarded as pure and which grow in forests. For clothing he should wear bark-garments, mats of grass and leaves and deer-skins.

3. He should allow to grow the hair on his head, beard, nails and dirt (dust) on his body. He should not brush his teeth. He should dip his body in water (like a pestle, without cleansing his body) three times (morning, noon and evening) a day and sleep on bare ground (without using even grass or leaves to cover it).

4. In summer, he should perform (what is technically known as) Pañcāgni sādhana i.e. exposure of the body to the heat of fire from four quarters while the fifth fire, viz. the sun is scorching from the sky. In the rainy-season, he should observe the vow of Ahrāvakāta i.e. drenching the body in heavy showers and in the winter he should stay immersed in the water upto the neck (and observe the udaka-vāsa vrata). He should perform penance following the above way of life.
5. He may eat what is baked on the fire or fruits, etc. ripened in course of time. He may subsist on what is pounded in a mortar or crushed with a stone or powdered with his teeth as mortar and pestle.

6. He should, with his own effort, procure whatever is required for his subsistence. Though he has full knowledge of his environments, of the season, and of his own capacity, he should not use it for storing (food, fruits, etc.) for some other occasion. Nor should he accept what is offered by others.

7. He should perform the prescribed periodic sacrificial duties with oblations of the forest produce and Purodāsa (prepared out of them). But under no circumstances should a Vānaprastha worship me with animal sacrifices as laid down in the Śruti texts.

8. Maintenance of sacred fire and regular offering of oblations to it (Agnihotra), performance of half-monthly sacrifices on the New Moon day (Darśa) and the Full Moon Day (Pūṇamāsa) and the seasonal sacrifices performed at the beginning of the months of Kārttika, Phālguna and Āṣāḍha (which mark the beginnings of the main seasons in India), have been prescribed for a Vānaprastha by Vedic teachers.

9. The sage who becomes spread over by a web of (protruding) veins (i.e. is reduced to a skeleton for want of flesh) by performing penance as described above, propitiates me who am the embodiment of Tapas (austerities) and comes to me passing through the region of sages (via Mahar-loka, etc.)

10. Who else can be more foolish than the person who dissipates for fulfilling flimsy desires such as great penance performed with enormous troubles and capable of securing him Mokṣa?

11*. When, shaking with decrepitude, he becomes incapable of observing the duties prescribed (for the Vānaprastha

---

1. labdhe nava nava'noopādye purānam tu partiyajet

---

*BH.P.VII. 12, 19.

* ŚR. explains: A Vānaprastha who continues to perform penance to the end of his life attains Mokṣa. If at the end of the Vānaprastha period, stage), he should withdraw within himself the three sacred fires (viz. Ahavanitya, Gārhapatya and Dakṣīṇa which he is maintaining for Agnihoṭra) and concentrating his mind on me, he should enter fire.
XI.18.16.

12. When a genuine feeling of renunciation is generated towards the worlds or to even higher blissful regions obtained by merits) as no better than the hell (full of tortures and miseries), he should withdraw (as per procedure laid down in śāstras) all the (three) fires within himself and enter the order of sannyāsins.

13. Having worshipped me as per Śāstric instructions, and having gifted everything what one has to the sacrificial priest, one should deposit the three sacred fires within his own Inner Self (antar-yāmin) and he should enter the order of sannyāsa completely free from any longings.

14. In the way of a Brāhmaṇa who is bent on renouncing the world as a sannyāsin, gods create impediments in the form of his wife and others (for dissuading him from sannyāsa), as they are afraid that he would supersede them, and attain Brahman.

15. If a sage entering the order of sannyāsa requires any clothing other than his loin-cloth (kaupīna), he should take only that much as is sufficient to cover his private parts. Except in case of emergency or critical plight (such as serious illness), he should not have anything that he has renounced (at the time of becoming a sannyāsin) with the exception of a staff (symbolic of his being a sannyāsin and a water-jar (made of gourd).

16. A sannyāsin should place his foot forward only when the ground is purified by eyes (that is, it is scanned and found free from living beings and thus there would be no violence to life in stepping over that spot). He should drink water puri-renunciation is generated in his mind (even dimly), he is eligible to become a Sannyāsin. But in case of premature incapacitation (if he becomes incapable of observing his vows before the end of that stage), the above self consignment to fire is recommended.

1. A Vanaprastha should perform the Prajāpatya sacrifice and also eight śraṭṭhas before becoming a Sannyāsin—SR.
fied by straining it with a piece of cloth. He should utter a word after convincing himself that what is expressed thereby is true. He should adopt a course of conduct according to the dictates of his conscience.

17. Silence, renunciation of acts (for fulfilling one’s desires) and the control of breath, these are the internal controls of speech, body and mind. Dear Uddhava! He who does not have these controls, is no Sannyāsin as one does not make a real sannyāsin with a bamboo-staff.

18. Avoiding the houses of the reproachful, one may go for alms to the houses of all the four Varnas (castes) among the Brāhmaṇas. He should go to seven houses without giving pre-intimation and should be content with whatever one gets.

19. He should go to some reservoir of water (a lake, a river, etc.) outside the village or town. After sipping water (as Ācāmana) in silence, he should sanctify the food (sprinkling it with a few drops of water charged with twelve Praṇavas, should divide that food in four parts (alotting them to Brahmā, Viṣṇu, the Sun-god and living beings and immersing Viṣṇu’s part into water and placing the one for living beings on the ground), he should finish the remaining holy food. (He should not store anything for the future).

1. E.K.: Repetition of God’s name of OM constitutes the control of speech. Breath control is the daṇḍa of the body and concentration in the Brahman is the control of the mind. —EB. 18.97-102.

2. E.K. clarifies: Before the advent of the Kali age, this was the rule. But in the Kali age, Brāhmaṇas follow different non-Brāhmaṇa professions and vocations. So we have all the four Varnas in the Brāhmaṇa community itself. In the Kali age a sannyāsi should limit himself to the houses of Brāhmaṇas only. The exception of a reproachful Brāhmaṇa is of course binding. —EB. 11. 104-113.

3. JG and VC. classify Brāhmaṇas as follows:
   (1) Those who live on gifts (dāna) from others.
   (2) Teachers of Vedas and Śāstras.
   (3) Those who maintain themselves on fees received at sacrifices.
   (4) Those who live upon foodgrains gleaned from fields and market places.

   Thus the mode of living (vyttībheda) is the criterion in deciding the Varnas among Brāhmaṇas.

4. VR. advises that a recluse should beg in the houses of Brahmin—Brāhmaṇas first and then Brahmin-Kṣatriyas, etc.
20. With his senses and mind under control and perfectly unattached, he should wander all over the world without a companion, indulging in the recreation and bliss of his soul. Engrossed in his Self, he should view all with an equal eye.¹

21. Staying in a lonely yet safe place and with his mind purified by devotion to me, the sage should deeply meditate upon the one-ness of the Self and its identity with me.²

22. By application of his spiritual knowledge he should investigate into the nature of the bondage and liberation of the soul (and understand that) distraction of senses (to their objects of enjoyment) is the bondage and subjugation and control of senses is the Mokṣa.

23. Therefore, controlling the group of six enemies (i.e. passions like lust, anger, avarice, etc. or five senses plus the inner sense—the mind) the sage should renounce trifling pleasures of senses, enjoying thereby the great bliss within his Self. While contemplating on me, the sage should carry on his pilgrimage on the earth.

24. He should travel over the earth full of sacred lands, holy rivers, mountains, forests³ and hermitages, entering cities, villages, cowherd settlements and caravansaries just for begging alms.

25. A Sannyāsin should frequently visit the hermitages of the Vānaprasthas. For (the food he gets is prepared out of foodgrains gleaned from cornfields and market places and) by such food from gleaned food-grains, his mind becomes quickly purified and free from delusion, and he attains liberation.

26. He should not look upon this (sweet food or other objects of pleasure) as real, for whatever is visible is bound to perish. With his mind detached to objects in this world or in the next, he should cease to work for gaining them (here or hereafter).

1. V.R.: He should see that both sentient and non-sentient are a part of the body of the Lord.

2. V.J.: The sage should contemplate that the Lord is different from Jīva and that I am the Supreme Being established by the Veda (… Śrutiya mayā siddham ātmānam ekam mukhyam cintayed abhedena jīvenaikyam na cintayed) –

3. E.K. gives a suggestive list of holy places.
27. He should, by logical reasoning, realize that all this world and this body constituted of mind, speech and vital breath is nothing but Māyā (Illusion) superimposed on the Ātman. He should renounce it and stabilising himself in his blissful self, he should never remember the world (or saṁsāra).

28. My devotee who is established in spiritual knowledge, unattached to the world and does not long for anything (including Mokṣa) should renounce not only the duties (and attachment) pertaining to his āśrama but even its external distinguishing marks. He should go on in his life without being governed by the Śāstric rules in the matter—(Not that he should give up purity, bathing, etc. but he should not be a subject to Śāstric injunctions).

29. Such a person, though full of wisdom, should behave like a child (with no sense of respect or disrespect). Though well-versed in a skill, he should assume dullness. Though deeply learned, he should show himself as insane (as he has to please nobody). Though master of Vedas (and faithful to their teaching) he should behave like an animal.

30. He should not take interest in discussion about Vedic interpretation (whether pertaining to sacrifices or rules of conduct). Nor should he be a non-believer in the Vedas or one expert in Logical reasoning. He should not be a participant in fruitless discussion.

31. Full of wisdom and fortitude, he should not be afraid of anybody. Nor should he frighten away the people. He should forbear harsh words nor should he insult anyone. For the sake of his body, he should not entertain enmity with anyone.

32. For the Supreme Soul is but one. He abides in all living beings as well as in one’s own-self, just as the Moon (only one entity) is reflected in different vessels full of water. All beings even from the point of physical bodies are one, as they are made of the same gross elements. (Hence there is no propriety in cherishing enmity with anyone).

33. He should not become despondent, if sometimes he did not get alms; nor should he feel elated if he gets food in time. Full of fortitude, he should realize that both these (getting alms or failing to get it) are in the hands of the Providence.

34. (This does not mean that one should not go out for alms). He should try to get alms for subsistence; for it is proper and essential to sustain life. It is by sustaining life that truth can be investigated. And it is by realization of the truth, that one gets Liberation from Samsāra.

35. A sage should accept whatever food comes to his lot by the will of the Providence—whether it be excellent or otherwise; similarly, he must accept whatever clothes and beds as may be offered to him.

36. Just as I carry on my activities as a sport, a man of spiritual wisdom should practise his habits of cleanliness, ācamana (sipping of water before taking food, etc.), bath, and not in compliance of the rule of the Dharmaiśtra. He should behave similarly in other matters.

37. He has no sense of difference in him any longer. Whatever such sense there might have been, has disappeared since his realization of me. Occasionally such a sense of perception may appear till the fall of his body, but thereafter he merges in me.

38. A person who is self-controlled and has become disgusted with objects of pleasure which (he knows) end up in misery, but is not enlightened in duties leading to my realization, should approach a sage as his preceptor.

39. Full of devout faith and with malice towards none, he should devotedly serve his teacher respecting him as if he is myself, till he realizes his Brahman.

40. But he who has not controlled the group of six enemies (viz. six passions like lust, anger, avarice, etc. Or his five senses and the mind) and whose mind the controller of his senses, has been deeply attached to objects of pleasures, is devoid of spiritual knowledge and dispassion and only makes his livelihood by the triple staff (the symbol of being a Sannyāsin).

41. Such a person is a violator of Dharma. He deceives gods (by denying them their sacrificial oblations which he would have offered as a house-holder), himself (by being deprived of household-comforts he would have got, had he not been a Sannyāsin), me who abide in him (as he fails to realize me). His sins are not completely consumed and he loses his world as well as the next.

42. The essence of the righteous course of conduct of a recluse (Sannyāsin) is self-control and abstinence from violence; that of the Vānaprastha (the renouncer who stays in a forest) consists of performance of austerities (as prescribed for this stage of life in Śāstras) and (attainment of) spiritual knowledge that of a householder constitutes of the protection of beings, and performance of pāñca-mahā-yajñas (offering of oblations to gods and ancestors, offering of food to preceptors, guests etc.) while that or a twice-born (a boy who has taken a new spiritual birth by the investiture of the sacred thread and has become a) Brahmacārīn—a celibate student—is the service of his preceptor.

43. Celibacy (i.e. abstinence from contacts with one’s wife on nights prohibited by Śāstras), penance, (mental and bodily) purity, contentment, friendliness to all creatures constitute the Dharma (the pious duties) of a householder—(Please note that a householder) who goes to his wife on the days (sanctioned by scriptures) is also a celibate person, while devotion to me is a sacred duty common to all (irrespective of their particular Āśrama).

44. A person who worships me by observing the pious duties (laid down for his particular Varga and Āśrama) as mentioned above without any expectation in return or (does not deviate to some other god or to some other purpose), and who sees me as abiding (as an antaryāmin) in all beings, attains to the (highest type of) Devotion\(^1\) to me in a short while.

45. It is by such unswerving (life-long) devotion, O Uddhava, that the devotee attains to me, the Supreme Ruler of all worlds, the source of the creation and destruction of all,

---

1. EK.: This is the fourth stage of Devotion, ‘The Supreme Bhakti’ as compared with which all the four types of Muktiṣ (types of liberation) are quite valueless—EB. 18.324-25.
and hence the cause of everything, the Brahman himself (or the creator of the Vedas).

46. A person whose heart is purified by observing the pious duties prescribed for his particular social class (Varṇa) and stage in life (Āśrama) and who has understood my nature, attains both spiritual wisdom and my direct realization reaches me in a short time.

47. This is the righteous course of conduct of persons belonging to the four social classes (Varṇa) and their four stages of life (Āśrama). When this very course is reinforced by devotion to me, it becomes the supremely efficacious means of attaining the summum bonum (Mokṣa).

48. I have thus explained to you, O good Uddhava, whatever you had enquired of me. It is in this way that my devotee, while following the path of righteous duties (specified for his particular Varṇa and Āśrama), attains to me who am the Supreme (Brahman).

CHAPTER NINETEEN

Exposition of Spiritual Knowledge, its Realization and Yogic Disciplines

The Lord said:

1.* He who is endowed with Śāstric learning leading to direct Ātmic realization and has not to depend on logical reasoning, should understand that this world of difference (as well

1. ŠR.: The presiding Deity in Vaikuṇṭha. The devotee attains the Mukti called Śaṁśaya (vicinity to the Lord)

EK.: The devotee attains to the fourth Bhakti called the Supreme Devotion, full of the highest bliss in which God and the devotee become one.

—EB. 18. 325-332.

* EK: When bodily activities ego-lessly take place and one is absorbed in spiritual bliss without enjoying sense-objects and one’s knowledge is intuitive (not depending on logical reasoning) that is the stage of ‘self-realization’. In that stage, knowledge and means to it, as well as contemplation—everything is ‘lost’, as there is neither bondage nor liberation as both of these are illusory products of Māyā.

—EB. 19.25.39
as the dialectic process of negating it) is the illusion caused by my Māyā and should ultimately consign this knowledge unto me (This is termed as Vidvat-sannyāsa).

2. None else but I am the beloved to the spiritually enlightened person. Only I am accepted (by him) as his objective (goal to be achieved) as well as the means of achieving it. I am the Svarga (i.e. worldly prosperity) as well as the Mokṣa (the state of final emancipation from Samsāra), to him. Nothing except me is dear to him.

3. Persons who are endowed with spiritual knowledge i.e. know the distinctness of Ātman from the body and Prakṛti and realization of the self (i.e. knowledge that Paramātman is both the goal and means to attain to Him) are able to cognise (and reach) my highest state. Such a knower bears me up with his spiritual enlightenment and hence he is the beloved-most to me.

4. The stage of (spiritual) perfection attained by even a single particle (or ray) of knowledge cannot be brought about and reached by performance of austerities, visits to sacred places and ablutions in holy waters, muttering of mantras, charities (e.g. donations of cows, gold, land), prescribed purificatory acts (according to Śāstras).

5. Hence, O Uddhava, securing vijñāna i.e. the bliss of one-ness with Paramātman by means of jñāna i.e. realization of the spiritual knowledge (of the identity of the jīva and Param-ātman and being endowed with the knowledge (Jñāna) and its realization (Vijñāna, mentioned above), worship me devoutly.

6. It is reported that having worshipped me by means of the sacrifice in the form of Jñāna and Vijñāna (as explained above) in their heart, sages of yore have attained to spiritual perfection (i.e. absorption in me).

7.* The three-fold modification¹ (viz. those resulting from

* VJ. slightly differs:

Birth and other states of the body are transferred from the body to the Jīva (due to ignorance), though he is really unconcerned with them. The Lord being non-physical is not affected by them at all. Liberation is attainment to the Lord after casting off this psycho-physical organism.

1. viz. the birth, existence and death of the body—EK.
the mind or self, caused by fate and by elements and living beings of which you are the substratum, is nothing but illusion (Māya). It did not exist in the beginning or at the end but appears in the middle (just as the misapprehension of a serpent or a garland, in stead of the reality of its being a rope, does not exist before it is misapprehended or after the clarification of the reality). When birth and other states (viz. existence, growth, transformation, decay and death) affect this body of yours, what do they affect you who are the basis of these modifications. For (as in the case of misapprehension of a rope as a serpent) what exists before the beginning of the misapprehension (viz. the reality of a rope) and what remains after it (is cleared up viz. the existence of a rope) does exist in the middle also. (Just as the rope, the substratum of these changes, remains the same, unaffected by them, you are not touched by the six changes in the body from birth to death).

Uddhava said:

8. O Lord of the universe! Be pleased to elucidate to me, in details, this ancient, extremely pure (and hallowing) traditional (convincing, spiritual) wisdom accompanied with renunciation and intuitive knowledge, in such a way (as will dispel my ignorance). O embodiment of the universe! Please explain to me your path of Devotion (Bhakti-Yoga) which is sought after by the great (gods like Brahmā).

9. O Lord! To a person troubled on all the sides by threefold afflictions (viz. those caused by fate, through bodily or mental disorders and caused by other beings or elements) and tormented with the scorching miseries in this terrible path of Samsāra, I do not see any other place of shelter except the umbrella of your pair of feet which (in addition to affording cool shade-protection from the miseries of Samsāra) shower nectar (of spiritual bliss)¹ on all sides.

10. O Supremely glorious Lord! Be gracious to lift me up who have fallen in the dark abysmal hole of Samsāra wherein bitten by the serpent of Death, this person (I myself) is extremely thirsting after low pleasures of senses. Be kind to sprikle me on all sides with your words leading me to the liberation from Samsāra.

¹ Bliss of liberation from Samsāra—VR.

The glorious Lord said:

11. Formerly, King Yudhishthira (who was friendly to all beings) asked this very question to Bhīṣma, the foremost among the observers of the path of righteousness, while all of us were in the audience.

12. After the termination of the internecine war among the Bharata clans (at Kurukṣetra), he was greatly perturbed and despondent on account of the death of his friends and relatives (in that war). After listening to a number of discourses on various points of Dharma (religion and righteousness), he asked him about the paths of righteousness leading to the emancipation from Samsāra.

13. I shall now recount to you those discourses which were full of precepts on spiritual wisdom, dispassion, Ātmic realization, faith and devotion, as I heard them from the lips of Bhīṣma.

14. It is my (considered) decision that that is the real jñāna (spiritual wisdom) by which one can perceive in all beings, the (twenty-eight principles consisting of the) nine (viz. Prakṛti, Puruṣa, mahat, ahamkāra and the five tan-mātrās or subtle elements), the eleven (the five cognitive senses, five conative organs and the internal-organs or the mind), the five (gross elements viz. the earth, water, fire, air and the ether) and the three (guṇas viz. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas) and also that the Paramātman as permeating these all.

15. This is definitely the (real) viññāna—that a person does not now perceive (as he did in the initial stage) the plurality of principles as being real or that the many principles are permeated (through and through) by the one Para-Brahman but that Para-Brahman is the only Reality (and the other principles, etc. are unreal). He should also see clearly that the origination, continuation and destruction are concerned only with entities which are constituted by three guṇas (and as such they are transitory and unreal).
16. That alone is the Real Existence which continues to exist at the beginning, in the end as well as in the middle and persists while one evolves leads to another and remains unabsorbed in the process of involution (as the residue at the end).

17. The Vedic text, direct perception, tradition and inference—these are the four (authoritative) tools of knowledge. As plurality of phenomenal world is not supported by any of these authoritative instruments of knowledge, a (spiritually) wise person gives up the concept of plurality.

18. As all sacrificial and ritualistic acts (which lead to heavenly life) are the effects and hence subject to change (and transient), a wise person should perceive that all the eventual fruits of such acts including the position of god Brahmā are inauspicious and transitory like the visible ones.

19. I have already expounded to you the path of Devotion, as you cherished a liking for it. I shall expound to you once again the most effective method of the Bhakti-Yoga, O sinless Uddhava.

20-23. Sincere faith in the nectar-like stories about me, constant rehearsal of my glories, unswerving faith and devotion to my worship, singing hymns in my praise, deep reverence in rendering service to me, to prostrate before (touching the ground with eight parts of the body) for bowing me, rendering greater devotion to the worship of my devotees, the perception of my presence in all beings, directing all bodily activities for dedication to my service, to sing exclusively of my glories, to resign the mind to me, renunciation of all desires, to give up for my sake wealth, enjoyments and pleasures (if they come in the way of devotion to me) and dedication to me of the performances of sacrifices, charitable acts (donations, etc.), offering of oblations, repetition of mantras, observance of vows and austere penance done for my sake—all these (definitely) lead to Devotion.

* VR: The true knowledge recognises the fact that existence is the essential nature of Ātman as he does not change with the change of the body (as a god, a man or a sub-human being) and remains at the end (even in Mokṣa where physical bodies do not exist).
24. O Uddhava! It is by performing such acts (of devotion) by persons who have dedicated themselves to me completely, that real Devotion to me is engendered in them. What other objective in life (of such a devotee) remains unaccomplished?

25. When the mind, full of the attribute called Sattva and hence perfectly tranquil, is resigned to me, the person (concerned) becomes endowed with righteous spiritual wisdom reinforced with dispassion and reaches the state of Ishvara.

26. When (on the contrary) the mind is dedicated to things other than I (viz. persons and objects in Samsara), it goes astray with senses and getting stained by Rajas and attached to asat (Tamas or transitory objects) it becomes the reverse of above (i.e. becomes unrighteous, ignorant, full of passions, etc.)

27. That (act or course of conduct) which promotes devotion unto me is the real Dharma (righteousness); the perception of the one-ness of the Soul is spiritual wisdom; non-attachment to guṇas (the objects of senses) is the real dispassion; and possession of mystic powers (such as atomization, magnification, levitation and others is the state of Ishvara.

Uddhava said:

28. O vanquisher of enemies! What are the different observances which are laid down as Yama (self-control) and what varieties of vows are prescribed as Niyama? What is the nature of Śama (spiritual quiescence)? What constitutes Dama (Self-restraint)? O Kṛṣṇa, what is the definition of forbearance (titikṣa) and that of moral courage? O Lord!

29. What is the nature of charity and of penance? What is real bravery? What is truthfulness? What constitutes Rta (moral or divine Law)? What is real renunciation? What wealth is desirable? What is a sacrificial performance and what is the nature of Dakśinā (sacrificial fees to be offered to sacrificers)?

30. Where lies the real strength of manhood, O Lord of Lakṣmī? What is the real fortune or gain? O Keśava, what is the Supreme Love and the highest type of modesty (Hṛt)?
What is the real adornment? What is the nature of pleasure and pain?

31. Who is (really) a learned man and who is a fool? What is the (correct) path? What amount to going astray? What is Svarga (celestial world) and what is a hell? Who should be regarded as a kinsman and what is a home?

32. Who is rich and who is poor? Who is pitiable and who is the master (controller)? Be pleased to elucidate to me the contraries of these, O Protector of the righteous.

The Glorious Lord replied:

33-35. Abstention from causing any injury to others, to speak to the point what is true yet agreeable, to abstain (even mentally) from appropriating what belongs to others, absolute non-attachment, modesty, abstention for accumulating or storing anything in one's possessions, faith in Sāstras celibacy, firmness in Dharma, forbearance, fearlessness (or to afford protection from fear) (These twelve constitute the yama observances). Purification of the mind as well as of the body, repetition of a mantra or God's name, austerities, offering oblations (to gods) deep faith and reverence for Sāstras, hospitality, performance of my worship, visit to sacred places, working for the good of others, contentment and rendering service to preceptors. These are Yamas and Niyamas, twelve each in number, prescribed for the followers of the path of Prowtiti and Niṣṭāti. If these are observed, thy confer prosperity or emancipation (from Samsāra) as desired by the observers.

36. Śama is devoutly and firmly establishing one's intellect (or mind) in me; Dama is the control of senses; Tiitkṣā is to bear up quietly with afflictions; Fortitude (Dhṛtī) is the complete control over the palate and the sex.

37. The highest type of charity is abseption from harming other creatures; austerities consist of abseption from desires (of enjoyment); heroism lies in conquering one's natural cravings and to look upon all as equal i.e. one-ness (i.e. Brahman) everywhere is truthfulness.

38. Wise persons say that sweet yet truthful speech is the Rta and non-attachment to one's actions is cleanliness and (not mere bodily cleanliness); renunciation is giving up the notions of ‘I’ and ‘mine’ as well as desires of fruit here and hereafter (and not merely deserting one’s home).

39. Righteousness or taking to the path of God-realization is the desirable wealth (and not money, cattle and property). I am the sacrifice (and should be performed with this knowledge and not as a ritualistic performance). Spiritual enlightenment is real sacrificial fees Dakṣinā and not gold and other things offered as such); the real strength is the control of breath (which leads to the control of the mind).

40. Fortune is my divine state having the six attributes (such as rulership, piety, glory, affluence and others and not mere favour of luck); The highest gain is (sincere) devotion to me; learning consists in perceiving the underlying one-ness of the Ātman (and not mere erudition) and Hṛt is the abstaining (with repulsion) from doing a prohibited act (and not the sense of shame after committing it).

41. Śrī (Adornment) lies in good qualities such as absence of desires (and not gold crown and other ornaments); happiness consists in transcending the sense of both pleasure and pain (and not mere enjoyment); Misery lies in craving after pleasures from fulfilment of desires (and not scorching from fire, etc.). He who knows the path of liberation from the bondage of Samsāra (or has the true knowledge of the nature of the bondage and emancipation) is a real Paṇḍita.

42. He is a fool who conceives that his body and its belongings constitute the Ātman. It is proclaimed that the true path is that which leads (the follower) to me (God-realization and the wrong path is the path of Samsāra (Praṇātī Mārga) which causes the distraction of the mind. Svarga is the predominance of the Satto guṇa.

43. Hell connotes the ascendancy and sway of the Tamoguṇa, O friend Uddhava! The (spiritual) preceptor is one’s (real) relative and that is me only. The human body is the house and one who is richly endowed with excellent qualities is a wealthy person.

44. He who is discontented is a destitute and he who has no control over his senses is a pitiable wretch. He is the master whose mind is not attached to guṇas (objects of senses), while the reverse of this (i.e. the slave) is a person who is addicted to the pleasure of senses.

45. In this way, O Uddhava, all your queries have been clearly explained by me. What more need is there for a lengthy discussion? The following is the criterion of deciding what is good and evil: It is evil to pry into the weak points and merits (of a thing) while the habit not to think of them both is good.

CHAPTER TWENTY

Elucidation of Karma, Jñāna and Bhakti Yogas

Uddhava said:

1. Injunctions and interdictions regarding specific acts are ordained by the Vedas which are commandments of you, the Supreme Ruler. And they consider the goodness and badness of acts with reference to the good and evil consequence of those acts. (This being the case, how is it that you say that it is evil to pry into the weak points and merits, while the habit not to think of them both is good (Supra 19.45).

2. It is the Veda which distinguishes between the order of merit of different castes or social classes and stages in life, of the merit-based gradation of persons born from the marriage of the high caste man with a lower caste woman and the low caste man with a higher caste woman. It points out the merits or otherwise of the material, venue, age and season (proper for performing sacrifices) as well as (the acts which lead to) heaven and hell.

3. How is it possible to follow your word (the Veda) which is characterised by expressions laying down injunctions and interdictions and which leads men to liberation from Samsāra, unless one has the power of discrimination between the good and the evil.
4. The Veda, a form of your word, serves as an eye to manes, gods and human beings, O Supreme Ruler. It helps them to get insight into the ‘unseen’ (i.e. the heavenly region or liberation from Samsāra) and the end and means of attaining them.

5. It is through the Veda, your own command, that the notion of distinction between the good and the evil, is derived and not independently by anybody’s individual opinion or by nature. When that distinction (recognised by the Veda) is refuted by the Veda itself that (naturally) causes bewilderment.

_The Lord replied:_

6. With the desire of securing final beatitude (Mokṣa) to beings, three types of Yogas (courses of disciplines) have been expounded by me. They are the path of knowledge, path of (desireless) Action and path of Devotion (and they correspond to the Brahma, Karma and Upāsanā sections of the Śruti).

In no part of the Veda, any other means or path of liberation has been propounded.

7. Out of these paths the path of knowledge is meant for those recluses who are nauseated with ritualistic acts (and the ephemeral nature of the promised happiness accruing from them) and consequently have given up such Karmas. But the Path of Karma is prescribed for those who hanker after the fulfilment of their desires and are not disenchanted with such (ritualistic) acts.

8. The path of Devotion is conducive to the attainment of Liberation in the case of a person who by a lucky chance has come to cherish a devout faith in my stories (and in the efficacy of my name) etc. and who is neither disgusted with nor deeply attached to the performance of (prescribed religious) acts.¹

One should continue to perform (prescribed religious) actions till he does not feel disgusted.

9. A person should continue to perform the religious acts prescribed for his particular caste and stage of life till he

---

¹ V.J. believes that gods belong to this category.
(being disenchanted with the futility of the promised fruits from those Karmas) feels disgusted with them or till devout faith in listening to my stories (meditating upon me and such other form of Bhakti ) is not engendered in him\(^1\)

10. O Uddhava! A person who follows the religious duties (prescribed for his particular class (Varna) and stage in life (Aśrama) and worships me through performance of sacrifices without cherishing any interest in the fruits thereof does not go to the heaven or hell unless he commits an act prohibited in Śāstras (either by commission or by omission).

11. If, while existing in this body (or the world), a person strictly follows the course of religious duties prescribed for him (i.e. for his particular caste and stage in life) and leads a sinless, pure life, he naturally gains pure knowledge or if he is lucky enough may find devotion engendered in him (as Devotion is superior to knowledge).

12-13. Both the inhabitants of the celestial world and the denizens of hell desire to be born (as human beings) in this world, as this life leads to the attainment of Liberation (from Samsāra) by means of the paths of knowledge and Bhakti which is not possible in the special bodies with which the heavenly or hellish beings are vested. A wise man should not long for heaven just as he would not desire for the infernal region. Nor should he desire to be reborn in this world, as it is due to the attachment to one's body that he blunders (and does not attain liberation).

14. Realizing this (speciality of the human body) and being aware that though this human body is capable of attaining Mokṣa (Liberation from Samsāra) it is after all mortal, a person should not be negligent and exert for attaining Liberation (lit. non-return to this world) before he is overtaken by death.

15. The bird (the individual soul) who has built its nest on the tree (viz. this body) which is being mercilessly hacked down by persons cruel like the god of death, feels happy in abandoning its nest and the tree, if it is not attached to it.

1. VJ. thinks that the Path of Karma is expounded in this verse as the performance of Karmas is a must till spiritual knowledge dawns or devotion is engendered in the mind. It is the Karma-path which purifies the mind and renders one eligible for the path of knowledge or devotion.
16. Likewise a person, knowing that life is being mercilessly hacked by day and night and trembling with fear discards all attachments and desires. And after realizing the Supreme Self he settles in the state of perfect bliss.

17. He is certainly a perpetrator of spiritual suicide who would not (even) attempt to get over the sea of worldly existence (Samsāra) even when he, by a lucky chance (through the grace of God), has easily obtained this excellent boat in the form of the human body which, the main spring of all good fruits¹, is extremely difficult to procure and which is not only equipped with all accessories (useful for all purposes) and piloted by the helmsman in the form of the spiritual preceptor, but also is propelled by me like a driving favourable wind.

18. When, on foreseeing (the evil consequences of attachment to the fruits of Karmas) a person gets disgusted with actions prescribed in the Śāstras (and meant for obtaining some ulterior motive as its fruit) and thus becomes unattached and indifferent (to the fruits of the Karmas), he should control his senses and, by constant practice of directing his mind to contemplation on the Self (Ātman), steady it in meditation (on the Self).

19. If, the mind, while being made to concentrate steadily (on the Self) begins to stray (towards objects of sense) immediately and thus becomes unsteady, the Yogī should be vigilant and try to bring it back under control by conciliatory method (by making some slight allowance to its inclination).

20. Exercising control over breath and subduing one’s senses, he should not remain negligent about the vagrancy of his mind but watch it vigilantly and with his reasoning capacity reinforced with Sattva, he should bring his mind under control.

21. Like unto a horseman breaking an unmanageable horse by allowing its inclination in the beginning (and tightly bridling it just at the proper moment), the established method of repeatedly withdrawing the mind (by the above-mentioned conciliatory process) by knowing its natural inclination, is regarded to be (the proper path to) the highest Yoga.

¹. The human body is called Ādya as it alone is eligible to realize Brahman and a being can attain god-head through this body only out of eighty four lakhs of species—EBK.
22. With a thorough understanding of the (fundamental) principle of the Śāṅkhya system (of thought), he should contemplate the chain of causation in the evolution (from Prakṛti creating the Mahat—subtle elements—gross elements—his own body) and in the involution (the reverse of the above process from his body to Prakṛti) of all objects, till his mind becomes serene.

23. The mind of a person who is disgusted with the world (due to pondering over the evolution and involution given in the Śāṅkhya philosophy) and becomes renunciated and contemplates repeatedly the teaching of his preceptor, becomes free from all evil thoughts (such as identification of the body with the Self.)

24. It is by means of the path of Yoga like Yama (self-control) and others and by the knowledge gained by thorough investigation of the ultimate principles (viz. Sat—being and a-sat non-being) or by worship and propitiation of my images or symbolic representations, that the mind should be made to contemplate on me, the Supreme Soul which is the only object.

25. If (per chance) a Yogi happens to commit an iniquity through mistake or lapse on his part, he should burn down that sin by the process of Yoga (like meditation of the Lord, repeating the Lord’s name, etc.) but should never resort to other expiatory rites.

26. Firm devotion and strict observance of duties prescribed for one’s own class in society (Vṛṇa) and stage in life (Āśrama) has been called a merit (the opposite of which is obviously demerit or sin). An action—an inborn tendency of living beings to do something—is impure by nature. A distinction between merit and demerit (or virtue and fault) has been drawn (with a view to make people avoid the wrong course). A restriction has been imposed on actions (Karmas), as it is intended that all attachment (to worldly objects) be given up.

27. When devout faith in my stories is awakened, a person becomes disenchanted with all the acts (religious rites, sacrifices, etc. enjoined by the Vedas). He knows that they (i.e. the rewards promised as a result of those karmas) are full of miseries, but is not able to renounce them (due to a wavering state of mind).

28. Under such circumstances, he should cherish faith in me and with a firm resolution should worship me, full of love and devotion. Even while he continues to enjoy objects of pleasure (or has a longing for them), he should damn them as sources of misery.

29. A sage who constantly worships me according to the Path of Devotion expounded by me previously, finds that all the deep-rooted (and hence apparently in-eradicable) desires in his heart disappear, as I am established therein.

30. The very moment, I, the Soul of all, am realized, the knot (of ahamkāra) in the heart is snapped; all his doubts are cut asunder, and all his Karmas are exhausted.

31. Hence neither spiritual wisdom (jñāna) nor renunciation (vairāgya) is a general pre-condition for attaining the Final Beatitude (mokṣa) (in the Path of devotion) if the Bhakti-Yogin (the follower of the path of devotion) has intense devotion to me and has his mind firmly fixed in me.

32-33. What is secured by performing prescribed Vedic Karmas or by undergoing austere penance or by spiritual knowledge or from dispassion or by following the path of Yoga or by pious liberal donations as also by other means of attaining spiritual bliss—all this my devotee fully and easily realizes by the path of Bhakti whether it be svarga (Heaven) or mokṣa or even my abode.

34. But pious people who are wise and absolutely devoted to me desire nothing, even if absolute liberation from which there is no return to Samsāra, is conferred on them by me.

35. Desirelessness is, therefore, the highest and the most efficacious way to attain the sumnum bonum. Hence real devotion is engendered in him who longs for no blessings and solicits nothing.

36. Merit and sin resulting from the commission or omission of the enjoined or interdicted acts are not binding on those who are absolutely devoted to me, are even-minded and have realized me who am transcendental to reason.
37. In this way, those who follow these paths proclaimed by me, attain to the blessed abode of mine, which the learned know as the Supreme Brahman.

CHAPTER TWENTYONE

Criteria for determining the good and the evil

The Lord said:

1. Those persons who discard the path of devotion, spiritual knowledge and righteous (desireless) actions which have been expounded by me (and which lead to me), and seek trivial pleasures through fickle senses, continue to wander through various species in samsāra.

2. Firm adherence to the course of duties to which one is eligible (by Śāstric prescription) is described as virtue while the reverse of it (i.e. strayed devotion to another man’s duties to which one is not eligible) is a fault. Such is the definite decision about them both (i.e. about virtue and fault)¹.

3. Even if things (or acts) be similar, the decisions that it is pure or impure, virtue or fault, auspicious or inauspicious, are made for the guidance of investigation so that one may control one’s inclination towards them.

4. O sinless Udbhava! It is for the sake of distinguishing the righteous way from the unrighteous, what is pure and what is impure, has been decided for regulating the behaviour—what course of conduct is permissible for kings (under emergency some concession has to be given to a ruler for adopting the inauspicious or impure means or to an individual for the bare maintenance of his life but to store such impure substances is forbidden). Such a (sinless) course of conduct has been shown by me (in the form of smṛti-writers like Manu and others) for the guidance of those who are the bearers of the responsibility of showing the path of religion.

¹ VR. Though the factors of an act (such as Time, Place, agent, mantras or the particular karma be the same, they present two different sides of eligibility. It is after investigation that one can decide whether it is good (leading to auspicious consequences) and bad (resulting in evil consequences).

5-6. The elements, viz. earth, water, fire, air and sky, united with the Soul, constitute the causes of the bodies of all beings, from god Brahmā to an immobile. Even through the point of material bodies and the Ātman all creatures are constitutionally the same, it is, however, to enable these creatures to attain their respective objectives in life (viz. Dharma, Artha, Kāma and Mokṣa) that the Veda has given them diverse names and forms (about their respective Varṇa and Āśrama) and enjoined their respective code of conduct.

7. It is for regulating what work should be done or what act be prohibited that qualities like goodness or badness have been ordained by me with respect to time, place and other conditions, as well as with reference to substances or things (like rice) to be obtained, O pious-Uddhava, (my object being to ensure the attainment of the fruits of Karma¹.

8. Out of countries, those tracts of land where black-antelopes are not found are unholy, and it is still more so, if people there-of cherish no devotion to Brāhmaṇas. Even if hallowed by the presence of black deer, the tract known as Sauvīra² (i.e. lacking in pious people) or Kiṅkita³ (Eastern Bihar, Bengal and Orissa and inhabited by the uncultured people or having the majority of Mlecchas or a barren place, is unholy.

1. Karmaṇāṁ niyamārthāṁ phala-sādhana-rthāṁ /—V.J.
2. Variously identified with upper sindh (VR and N.L. De) or northern Saurāstras along the Gulf of Cutch (Rhys Davids) SR. is led away by grammatical derivation.
3. It appears that in the old Smṛti period, these states were not completely Aryanised. Hence a visitor to them, except on purpose of a holy pilgrimage, had to expiate the sin of visiting it, by the rite of investing the sacred thread. VR quotes a smṛti text as follows:

   *Anga-Vanga-Kalingesu Saurāstra-Megadhesu ca /
   Tirtha-yātrāṁ vina ātmaṁ punāṁ samśkrām arhati /*
9. That period of time is regarded as auspicious or good which is proper for performing Vedic rites either due to adequate supply of materials (for that rite or sacrifice) or by its very nature (e.g. the early part of the day). But the time when the materials for the rite are not available or there are politically, unsettled conditions and earthquakes etc., or when the period is unfit for performance of religious rites (e.g. during the mourning period), that period of Time is considered to be bad or inauspicious.

10. The purity or impurity of a substance depends on the contacts with some other thing (e.g. washing with water purifies a thing, while if contacted with urine it becomes impure), or by the word (e.g. in case of doubt about purity, the decision of a learned Brāhmaṇa), or by purification (e.g. sprinkling flowers with water purifies them, but by smelling they lose their sanctity for worship), by passage of time\(^1\), or by the bigness or smallness of size (e.g. a big lake cannot be polluted by the touch of a man of the depressed class but it is regarded ‘polluted’, if the tank is a small one.)

11. (The same thing becomes pure to one and impure to another). The purity or the impurity of a thing depends upon the physical strength or weakness\(^2\) (Time of receiving) the information or knowledge\(^3\) and affluence;\(^4\) (certain things are pure or impure in relation to different places, states and other circumstances). Hence the incurrence of sin depends on the time and other circumstances\(^5\).

1. ŠR. quotes a Smṛti which lays down:
   Rainwater stored in reservoirs should be used for drinking but it should be avoided for the first three days. As for water stored at other times, one should wait for ten days after which it attains purity.

2. Eating food during the period of solar or lunar eclipse is prohibited as sinful to normal people but is permissible to the aged, sick or weak persons.—ŠR.

3. If the birth of a child in the family is informed within ten days, the nearest kins have to observe a seclusion but the same information after ten days has no such binding effect.—ŠR.

4. To use soiled or old clothes is permissible to the poor, but a rich person incurs sin by using them—ŠR.

5. For example: It is sinful not to wear a gold ring at the time of performing śraddhā or other religious duties. But it is not sinful if they are
12. The purity of (food) grains, utensils of wood, bones (like ivory), textiles, liquids like oil, ghee, metals like gold and deer skins and earthen wares, bricks etc. is decided by Time, air, fire, earth and water either jointly or severally.

13. By applying which things an object smeared with an impure thing removes that impure coating, and foul smell and restores its normal state to it, is called the purifier.

14. A ‘twice-born’ person (even a Śūdra is to be included in this category) should purify himself by sanctifying acts and factors like bathing, giving charitable gifts, performance of penance, age (of eligibility for performing a certain act) physical power, initiatory rites like investiture of the sacred thread, performance of sandhyā, remembrance of the Lord and his name, and then proceed to perform his prescribed duty.

15. The purity of Mantras depends on correctly knowing its procedure and application from the proper preceptor. Resigning a Karma to me, is the purity of that act. Religious merit is acquired through the purity of above-mentioned six (viz. place, time, substance, agent, the sacred formula—the mantra and the righteous act performed). The opposite of it results from the absence of these circumstances.

16. (Intrinsically a thing or an act is neither good nor bad). Under some circumstance a merit turns out to be demerit. (Acceptance of help of a thing in emergency may be condoned but the same is a fault in normal condition), but by a quirk of fate, it may be vice versa. The Vedas have ordained some injunctions for the regulation in deciding merit and demerit (or for creation of dispassion about objects of senses), but confusion in understanding them fundamentally cuts the distinction.

17. Those who are already sinners, commission of an act similar to other sinner is no longer a demerit. Sexual intercourse with one’s married wife (during the prescribed not worn in regions infested by robbers. ŚR. quotes a Śrauti text which lays down that the factors of time, place, physical and mental condition, materials, its objects and other relevant circumstances must be taken into account before determining the purity of a thing or a person.

period) is not a sin for a householder, though it is so for a Sannyāsin. He who lies on the ground has no further fall.

18. From whatever object or course of action, a person desists, he becomes free from attachment. This Dharma (righteous course of action) is the source of well-being and removes grief, delusion and fear.

19. By mistaken attribution of agreeable qualities to (sense-)objects, man comes to cherish attachment for them. From attachment springs up the desire to possess it, and desire leads to quarrel among men (for securing it for one's self).

20. A quarrel breeds irrepressible anger which is followed by infatuation. And the all-round grasping capacity and judgement of man is soon swallowed up (and obscured) by this self-delusion.

21. O pious Uddhava! A man devoid of intellect and judgement is reduced to the stage of non-existence. He fails in (accomplishing) his purpose in life, even as a man who has lost his consciousness or is dead.

22. Through deep attachment to worldly objects, he does not realize himself nor the Supreme Self. He wastes his life in vain like a tree, breathing mechanically like bellows.

23. Just as a promise of delicious (eatables) is made (to children) before administering a dose of (wholesome yet unpalatable) medicine, this promise of fruits to be reaped (in heaven) is made for creating a liking (for religious duties), as an introduction to the elucidation of the (path to the) summum bonum or Mokṣa, even though it does not lead men to the final beatitude.

24. Even though they are the cause of misery (viz. bondage in Samsāra) to the Soul, men, by their very nature, are attached in their heart of hearts to their desires and belongings (like cattle) to their life and to their relatives.

25. How can a wise person (or the Veda) direct persons who are ignorant of their own real interests (or the highest spiritual bliss) and yet put implicit faith in the Vedas which promise cattle, long life¹, progeny etc., through performance of sacrifices wander in the path of misery (of Samsāra) and (after enjoying the celestial life) enter the dark hell in the form of plant life?\(^1\)

¹"Span of life, power of the senses—VR."

26. Not comprehending this real purport of the Vedas, some persons of low understanding (of Asura mentality) mistake flowers (i.e. flower-like heavenly enjoyments) for the fruit of eternal bliss in Mokṣa. But the real knowers of the Veda) like sage Vyāsa) never do so\(^2\).

27. Persons hankering after sensual desires are miserly and avaricious. They regard the flower (the flowery pleasures in heaven) as the fruit (of Liberation from samsāra). They are stupefied by the Fire-cult, and at the end of their life go by the path of smoke (dhāma mārga), and fail to realize their self and their real region, viz. Mokṣa.

28. Like unto persons whose vision is bedimmed with mist, they, to whom ritualistic performance or killing beasts for sacrifices appear as the real teachings of the Veda and are bent on gratifying their carnal desires, do not know me who am stationed in their very heart (as their Inner Controller)—me who constitute this universe, and from whom this world has been created, O dear Uddhava.

29. If persons have a liking for eating flesh and would like to kill animals, they should restrict this injury to life to the performance of sacrifices (in which the flesh remaining after oblations is shared by all as prasāda—the grace of gods). But this (performance of animal sacrifices) is not an obligatory duty.\(^3\) Without understanding my implied meaning expressed indirectly, these persons who are addicted to sensual

---

1. VJ. raises the objection that the scripture which misleads people to momentary pleasures would cease to be Veda (katham iti viṣayābhinivesṇa tame viṣatās tān punas tēṣu viṣayeṣu Vedaḥ katham yuḥṣyān na katham api yunakti / unmattra-vākyasyāmāprāpti-bhayād iti šeṣaḥ /

2. VJ.: Persons of Asura nature being ignorant of the true purport of the Vedas speak of the heavenly happiness when they really mean that Liberation from saṁskṛta is the real fruit. VJ. thinks that Asuras (i.e. persons of Asura nature) are implied in these verses.

3. Some editions add: “Hearing this commandment of the Veda, people are not deluded into such acts.”
pleasures\(^1\), unnecessarily kill animals and get themselves troubled and tortured by them after death.

30. Those wicked persons who take delight in killing animals for sport, (outwardly) worship gods, manes and lords of beings by the slaughtered animals oblatted in performing sacrifices, but they really want to gratify their addiction (to flesh).

31. Painting in their mind (the rosy picture) that the next world which is unreal like a dream, non-existent, yet charming to the ear, is certainly real, they spend their resources (in performing sacrifices) entertaining the hopes of blessings (in the next world), just as a merchant, (abandoning his present fortune) stakes the whole of his property (in a dubious sea voyage) in the hope of earning more wealth (and loses both).

32. Persons in whom these attributes, viz. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas are ingrained, worship gods headed by Indra who, being possessed of Sattva, Rajas and Tamas, take delight in them but they do not worship me (who transcend the \(guṇa\)s).

33. They strongly hope that by worshipping god with performance of sacrifices in this world (during their life-time), they would enjoy themselves with heavenly pleasures (in the next world) and at the end of that celestial life, they would be born in noble lineage and live in palatial mansions.

34. With their minds distracted by the flowery language of \(Karma-Kāṇḍa\) holding out promise of heavenly life) these proud and highly obstinate persons (steeped in perverse notions) do not like even the mention of my name.

35. (As a matter of fact the \(Vedas\) advocate the path of renunciation). Although the \(Vedas\) deal with the three subjects (viz. those concerning ritualism, devotion and spiritual knowledge), they teach mainly about the \(Brahman\) and the \(Ațman\)\(^2\)

---

1. SS & VR add here: \(urthā paśūn vihimsanti hiṃṣante pretya tais tu te j\)
2. VR.: They teach that the Supreme \(Brahman\) is abiding as the Inner Controller in all beings (\(sārūnātātma-bhūta-Para-brahma-viśayāḥ\). They deal with the nature of the Supreme \(Brahman\), His attributes and the path of \(Brahma-ṛéalization.\)
(that the Ātman and Brahman are identical). The Vedic texts (mantras) or their seers present their exposition in an indirect way, as such presentation (with hidden import) is liked by me (it is expected that only the pure-hearted persons are eligible to know the real import of Vedas. If others follow it literally, they will be misled and give up their karmas (religious duties) prematurely).

36. The Veda, the verbal form of the Brahman, is extremely difficult for comprehension. It constitutes the vital air (The Parā stages of speech), the mental faculty (the Paṭyānti and Madhyamā stages of speech at the mental plane) and the oral expression (the Vaiśhāki stage). From the cosmic point of view the cosmic prāṇa is limitless and unending, too deep for comprehension and unfathomable like the sea.

37. It is presided over (from within) by me who am all pervading, master of infinite powers, the attributeless, changeless Brahman, the inner Controller and perceived in all created beings in the form of 'unstruck', (anāhata) sound like fibers filling the stalk of a lotus.

38. Just as a spider evolves (lit. vomits) out of its mouth woolly cob-web fibers from its heart, the Lord in the form of Hiranyagarbha, through Prāṇa (the vital air) manifests himself in the form of Veda. Essentially he is absolutely blissful. With the material of eternally abiding unstruck, (anāhata) sound emanating from the cavity of the heart through the medium of the mind, he brings out various sounds represented in the letters of the alphabet.

39-40 The Lord who is the embodiment of the Vedic meters and essentially sweet (lit. nectarine), manifests out of Om...

* (i) EK: After explaining how Prāṇava evolves from the Parā vēṣā till it is expressed orally (with the vaishñi he states that despite the efforts of sages like Vyāsa, Sumantu, Jaimini and others, the Veda has remained incomprehensible, but it is the Lord who knows the inner subtle meaning of the Veda.

(ii) VY: Veda is incomprehensible except through my Grace. The terms prāṇa etc. in the verse designate god Brahmā and others which preside over senses. The Veda is too deep etc. like the sea for the ineligible persons (āpaśādikātrīnaḥ).
the \textit{Vaikhari} form (of speech) which flowed out in a thousand ways beautiful with various sounds classified as consonants, vowels, sibilants ($\check{S}, \breve{S}, S$), semivowels ($y, r, l, v$). Such proliferated \textit{praṇava} (OM) became expanded in various languages and was characterised by metres each consisting of four more letters than the previous one, and is (in a way) limitless. The Lord who creates this unlimited Vedic speech, also withdraws it\textsuperscript{1} within himself.

41. (In the \textit{Vedas}) there are many metres like Gāyatri, Uṣnik, Anuṣhtubh, Brhati, Paṅkti, Triṣṭubha, Jagati, Aticchanda Atyaṣṭi Atijagatī and Virāṭ.

42. Nobody else except I in this world, knows the real implication—the very heart as to what the \textit{Veda} prescribes, what it explains, what it prohibits after making a statement.

43.* It lays down injunctions of worshipping me (through performance of sacrifices—This is the \textit{Karma} Kāṇḍa).

1. VR. : All the articulated sounds are evolved out of OM (\textit{Praṇava}). It is ever-abiding and of unlimited extent, expressing wonderful ideas in four chief metres (each foot of which is longer by four syllables than that of the previous metre). It is \textit{Praṇa} which evolves and withdraws this speech.

2. VJ. : It is only the vital breath who, through my Grace knows it (...cet ko vāyur maṇ-praṇaddāt vetti)

* (1) ŠR and GD : Just as the sap derived from the seed by the sprout proliferates into branches but the original sap runs all through these branches, leaves etc., the Lord, the “sap” of \textit{Praṇava}, pervades all the branches of the \textit{Veda} which is a proliferation of Om.

ŠR. pays obeisance to the eternally-free promulgator and Knower of the \textit{Veda} who enlightened him on what is \textit{Ātman}. This Supreme Ruler is his preceptor and his preceptor is the Almighty Lord. ‘To him I bow’.

(2) VR. : The \textit{Veda} states that the difference such as a man, a god, a subhuman being etc., is the modification of \textit{Prakṛti} and this difference has nothing to do with the individual Soul (\textit{jīva}). The \textit{veda} finally concludes that I (the Lord) am distinct from every other principles (\textit{vedaḥ} ... deva-mana-yād-bhiddam māyā-mātram prakṛti-ātmani anūdyaṁ jīva-saurūpe pratiṣiddhyam ... sarma-tattva-nilakṣāna-mat-pratipādāmanam paryāvasita-vyāpāro bhavatītyevāvān evam yātāh!)

(3) VJ. : There is no difference in my incarnations. I am Viṣṇu in each of them. The bondage of \textit{samsāra} is due to my will. By following the path of devotion, the spiritual knowledge dawns and the \textit{jīva} is liberated. Stating this the \textit{Veda} which depends on Vāsudeva for its support sinks into silence. --
It declares my Nature (as gods to be worshipped and enunciates the path of Devotion or, and it removes Upāsanā Kāṇḍa) external universe that is imposed on me (i.e. the part called knowledge—Jñāna Kāṇḍa). I am verily the purport of the entire Veda. Basing itself on me, the Veda first explains diversity (in me) as the result of Māyā—(Finally) denying the reality of diversity, the Veda assumes silence (is merged in me. Ultimately I alone stay existent).

CHAPTER TWENTYTWO

Enumeration of Principles (Tattvas) The Distinction between Prakṛti and Puruṣa

Uddhava enquired:

1. How many fundamental categories or principles have been enumerated by sages, O Lord of the Universe? We have heard you enumerate them as nine, eleven, five, three—in all twenty-eight categories—previously.¹

2-3. Some say that the number of categories is twenty-six, others twenty-five, some others seven; some declare it to be sixteen, four and eleven respectively; while some others state that it is seventeen, some, sixteen while some others thirteen. Be pleased to explain to me, O Long-lived one, with what standpoints the sages severally declare (lit. sing) such a variety in the total number of categories.

The Lord replied:

4*. Though it is not supported by Reality what those Brāhmaṇas (experts in Vedas) declare is but correct as all the

(4) JG.: The Veda feels that it has achieved its purpose by entire dependence on Lord Kṛṣṇa. He quoted BG. (XV. 15). Vedaiṣ ca sarvair aham eva vedyaḥ etc.

*. VR: when the Brāhmaṇas accept my Māyā or Prakṛti as the basis for classification, what position is impossible and hence untenable. Hence all the positions taken by Brāhmaṇas stand to reason.
categories are mutually inclusive. What theory is not tenable (lit. difficult to establish) when my Māyā potency is accepted.

5. “The reality is not as you stated; what I affirm is correct.” The cause of difference among such disputants is my insurmountable potencies¹ viz. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas which create innumerable mental tendencies.

6*. Difference (of viewpoints or theories) which becomes the subject of arguments among the disputants arises due to the cogitations (and resulting permutations and combination) of these powers. But when the control of the mind and the senses is achieved, the cause of disputation disappears and as a sequel, wrangling or discussion ceases altogether.

7. Due to the mutual inclusiveness of the categories, the enumeration of categories varies according to the stance adopted by the speaker in explaining them as cause and effect, (resulting in the inclusion of effects into causes).

8. Even in only one category all the other categories are found included, irrespective of their inclusion either as a cause or an effect.

9. As there is the possibility of offering a logical reasoning for the causal relations of these categories as well as their enumeration as advanced by these disputants, according to their capacity of argumentation, we, therefore accept the position presented by them.

10. As realization of the Ātman by self-effort is not possible in the case of a person possessed by nescience or ignorance which has no beginning, another person who knows the truth is essential for imparting the truth to him. (This preceptor being God as distinct from Jīva, the number of categories becomes twentiesix according to these disputants).

11. (But those who hold that the number of these principles is twentyfive and not twentiesix argue:) There is not the slightest distinction between Puruṣa (Individual Soul) and ¹ VR. regards Prakṛti, Mahat, Abhāṅkara, etc. as God’s powers.

* According to VJ, wrong apprehension is due to the different powers of the Lord and the wrangling on different viewpoints is due to different attitudes of the mind. Once the mind is concentrated on the Lord through sense-control, misapprehension disappears.
Iśvara (God), as both are characterised by intelligence and consciousness). The assumption that they are mutually distinct and different is not correct. (The argument that God must be posited for imparting Self-realization is untenable as) (Self-knowledge or the faculty of knowing is inherent in sattva-guna which is a constituent of Prakṛti.

12. Prakṛti is nothing but the equilibrium of the attributes or modifications known as Sattva, Rajas and Tamas. They (Sattva, Rajas and Tamas) are the cause of the creation, sustenance and destruction of the universe respectively. Thus they are the attributes of Prakṛti and never that of Ātman.

13. In this (Sāṅkhya) system of thought, knowledge is regarded as the modification of the attribute called Sattva, action, that of Rajas and ignorance, that of Tamas. Time is the cogitating principle disturbing the equilibrium and agitating the guṇas while Nature is the Šūtra or Mahat.

14*. (After elucidating the three categories mentioned (v. one above) the Lord enumerates the nine principles in that verse as follows :)

Puruṣa (The Intelligent Principle), Prakṛti (The Primordial Matter), Vyakta or Mahat (the principle of Cosmic intelligence) Ahamkāra (the cosmic Ego), the sky, air, fire or light, water and the earth—these are the nine categories enumerated by me.

15. The senses of hearing, touch, sight, smell and taste—are the faculties of cognitive senses. While the organs of speech, hands, the organ of generation, the organ of excretion are the conative organs. The mind, however, is both a cognitive and conative (internal) organ, dear Uddhava.

16. Sound, touch, taste, smell and colour or form—these are the five varieties of objects of senses, while locomotion, expression or speech, excretion (including urination and defecation) and manual skill are the functions of the organs of action.

* V.R.: Puruṣa and Prakṛti constitute the body of Paramātman. Ahamkāra includes all sense-organs and the five elements have in them five objects of senses.
17. At the beginning, at the time of creation of the Universe, Prakṛti assumes the functions of both cause and effects. Through its attributes Sattva and others, it assumes the state of being created, while the unmanifest Purusa remains as a witness.

18. The Mahat and other categories being agitated and impregnated with the energy of the glance of the intelligent principle (Purusa) combine together and create the egg of the Universe, reinforced with the power imparted by Prakṛti.

19. Those who hold that there are only seven categories state them as follows: Five categories beginning with the ether, knowledge i.e. knower or Jīva (Individual soul) and the Ātman (Supreme Soul), the support (of the seer and the seen, the subject and the object). The body, sense organs (and five) life breaths are evolved from these.

20. According to those who hold that the number of categories is six, they are as follows: Five elements and the sixth is the Supreme Person. Combining with the elements which are evolved (out of himself) by him, he created this universe and entered into it (as Antaryāmin, the Inner controller).

21. *(Another view mentioned in verse above holds that) the number of categories is only four. These are as follows: Fire, water and food i.e. the earth, which are born of the (fourth category viz.) Ātman. Like the evolution of things made up of parts, the creation of the universe (which too consists of numerous parts) has taken place out of these (four categories).

22. (In verse 3 above, a view holds that the total number of categories is seventeen.) When the total number of categories is spoken of as seventeen, they are enumerated as follows; Five gross elements, five subtle elements¹ (mātrā = tān-mātrā); five

* It is not understood why VR includes the explanation of eleven categories here when a later i.e. 24th verse deals with eleven categories. According to VR the Ātman, five elements and five (cognitive) senses make up the eleven categories.

1. EK takes mātrā = objects of senses, EB 22.2-4.
(cognitive) senses, mind and the Ātman, the seventeenth category.

23. When (the principles or categories are) counted as sixteen, the Ātman (the thinking Principle) is also spoken of as the mind (the rest being as in the above verse). They (number of categories) are said to be thirteen, when the five elements (Bhūtas), five senses, the mind and soul in two forms (viz. Individual soul and the Supreme Soul) are calculated together.

24. Another view which holds that the total number of categories as eleven, is as follows: The Soul (including the mind) consists of five elements (Bhūtas) and five senses. While eight Prakṛtis (viz. mahat, Ahaṅkāra, mind and five elements, combined with Puruṣa (the intelligent Principle) make up the nine categories.

25. In this way different enumerations of fundamental categories have been hypothesized by old sages (to clarify the difference between Prakṛti and Puruṣa. All of them are tenable as they are cogently supported by (logical) reasoning. How can a theory proposed by the wise be unbecoming?

Uddhava submitted:

26. O Kṛṣṇa, although (as you say it) Prakṛti (Primordial nature) and Puruṣa (the intelligent Principle possess by their very nature different distinctive characteristics, (in our practical life) no difference between them is noticeable as they are mutually dependent and inter-related. (The Ātman is found in the physical body which is the product of Prakṛti while Prakṛti is found in the Ātman, as both body and Soul appear identical).

27. For the Ātman is noticed in the Prakṛti (the physical body being a product of Prakṛti), while the Prakṛti is found in the Ātman. (The very concept of “I” is impossible unless Prakṛti and Ātman are together, O lotus-eyed Lord, it behoves you to remove this grave doubt in my mind, by your decisive words supported by skilful logical reasons, O Omniscient Lord.

28. It is through your grace that the individual Souls (jīvas) receive enlightenment. It is due to your power (called Avidyā or Nescience) that knowledge of the Jīvas is obscured. You alone and nobody else knows the course and working of your own Māyā.

The Lord replied:

29. There is a fundamental difference between Prakṛti (the psycho-physical organism called the body) and Puruṣa (the Soul), O eminent Uddhava. This (body) is subject to changes (such as boy-hood, youth, old age, etc.) as it is created out of the disturbance of the balance of guṇas (while the Soul is changeless and self-existent).

30. Dear Uddhava my Māyā which is constituted of three guṇas, creates through them manifold differences and concepts about them, in various ways. The creation which is subject to modifications is of three types—Adhyātma, Adhidaiva and Adhibhūta.

31. (For example) The sense of sight is Adhyātma. The form or colour (i.e. the object seen) is Adhibhūta and the anūta or part of the sun present in the ocular sense is Adhidaiva. These are interdependent (any one of them depends on the other two) for its existence. But not so that (the sun) which exists independently in the sky. In the same way the Soul (Ātman) who is the cause of the Adhyātma etc. is different from them. It is by virtue of his own inherent power of consciousness that he illumines other agents (such as Adhyātma) which shed light on others. Similar (threefold) nature can be predicated about the senses of touch, hearing, smell and taste and of the mental faculties (ego, etc.)

1. SS.VR. and VJ. interpret Prakṛti in a broad sense as 'the created universe'.

(i) VR: This created universe consisting of Adhibhūta, Adhidaiva and Adhyātma, is evolved out of Aharadhāra which in turn is the evolute of Prakṛti. Aharadhāra as applied to an individual is a synthesis of Ātman (or psychic) qualities expressing love, hate and physical qualities like corpulence, etc.

(ii) VJ: There is a cardinal difference between Prakṛti and Puruṣa. The confusion between the two is due to misapprehension caused by Tana-guna. The universe is a creation of the combination of guṇas in different proportions, with a particular guṇa dominating the whole combination.
32. Ahamkāra (the ego) is the modification caused by the agitation of guṇas (as a result of the disturbance of their equilibrium) caused by the Time-spirit or the Supreme Ruler (who is thus an instrumental cause). It is an evolute of the Mahat, of which Prakṛti is the material cause. It is of three types viz. Vaikārika (from Sattva guṇa), Aindriya (from Rajo-guṇa) and Tāmasa (from Tamo-guṇa). It is the Ahamkāra which causes the notion of difference and delusion.

33. The Ātman is essentially pure knowledge. The controversy about the existence or non-existence of difference (between the Soul and the body or Ahamkāra is due to non-realization of the self. Though it has no basis and is meaningless (as it lasts till self-realization), it is true that it will not disappear from the minds of those who are averse to me—their very self.¹

Uddhava said:

34-35. Be pleased to explain to me how persons whose minds have turned away from you, accept (are born into) and give up (in death) various bodies high or low as determined by their own karmas, O Govinda. This phenomenon is very difficult to comprehend (properly in all its aspects) by persons of poor understanding. Generally there is a scarcity of persons who know this as all people are deluded (by your Māyā).²

The Lord explained:

36. The mind of men as modified by the subtle impressions left by karmas and accompanied by the five (subtle)

1. VJ : Such people presume existence for the non-existence and vice versa. Perceiving what is contrary to reality these people identify Jīva with Īśvara and deny the reality of the universe (A dig at Advaitavāda). According to VJ—difference between Jīva, Īśvara and the reality of the universe is true, but the opponents deny it and hence the controversy.

2. VJ thinks that the purpose of Uddhavas’ asking this question is to know if there is any other cause of the transmigration of the soul.

(sāśvadhanāḥ jīvād-bhūta-mṛti kid pryay, Karmatara kāraṇaḥ kim iti prechati Uddhavah).
senses, transmigrates from one region (i.e. body) to another and the Soul though distinctly different from them, follows (due to the influence of Ahamkara.)

37. The mind is under the dominance of (the residual impressions left by) Karmas. According to their influence the mind (at the time of death) broods over the objects actually experienced (during the life-time) or heard (as promises of future fruits of karmas as stated in scriptures. (After death) he becomes manifest (i.e. is reborn) among the objects contemplated by him and the previous objects (in the last existence) are lost in oblivion. Thereafter, the memory connecting the previous existence with the present birth becomes lost.

38. Due to excessive attachment to the present body and objects of enjoyment or due to some mysterious reason a person does not remember (anything about) his body, etc. of the last existence. Such total obliviousness is verily the death of a being. (It is the body that is forgotten and dead and not the Soul).

39. And they (scriptures) opine that the (new) birth of a being consists of the identification on the part of the jiva with the objects of enjoyment i.e. with a particular body just as one imagines oneself identical with the body in one's dreams or in a day-dream (forgetting that his body in the wakeful condition is different, O liberal Uddhava.

40. In this manner, in the present dream state, the jiva does not remember his previous dreams or reverie and looks upon himself as a newly born person, though as a matter of fact he is the same old already existent person.

41. When a new body which is the site of the ten sense-organs, is born or the mind, the basis of the senses, identifies itself with a new body (in a different birth), the threefold distinction (viz. a particular body being the highest, the middling and the lowest, Or of being in the wakeful, dreamy or sleepy state, Or the body, the mind and senses) though unreal, becomes apparent in the Atman who alone is real. Due to false identification with them, the Atman becomes the cause for the idea of internal and external differences (i.e. He enjoys external objects of senses and experiences internal-(mental) states such as pleasure, pain etc.). Even as an individual Soul (jīva) creates (out of himself) a number of unreal bodies and sees himself as many in a dream or the father of a wicked son, though himself impartial, looks upon differently with the friends and foes of his wicked sons.

42. (In order to confirm Uddhava’s feeling of renunciation, the Lord adds unasked).

It is every moment that bodies of creatures come into being and go out of existence, through the force of Time of inexorable velocity. But the velocity is too subtle to be perceptible to gross senses.

43. Just as in the cases of changes (in size of) flames, the flow of the current of a stream and changes in the (green or unripe, yellowish or ripe) appearances of fruit, so in the case of all created beings, changes in age and other factors (such as physical strength, lust, skill, etc. are brought about by (the continuous current of) Time.

44. (Even though the luminous particles in a flame appear and disappear every moment) the statement is made that ‘This is the same lamp’, (and although particles of water flow down the current giving place to other ones at the same spot in the stream of water) it is asserted that ‘this is the same water of the stream’,¹ similarly when the persons whose life is a waste (due to ignorance) say, ‘He is the same man,’ their notion and talk is unreal (for changes take place in the body every moment. The notion of unchanging absolute identity is incorrect).

45. Even this (ignorant) person is neither born nor dead due to the seed of his karmas. The Ātman is immortal. It is an illusion to predicate birth and death in the case of Ātman, as in the case of fire (which survives to the end of the Kalpa but) which is regarded as enkindled or extinguished due to the limiting condition of the piece of wood with which it is associated.
46. Entry into the womb, existence in the womb, birth, childhood (upto the age of five), boyhood (upto the age of sixteen), youth (upto the age of fifty), middle age (upto the age of sixty), old age and death—These are the nine stages of the body.

47. These fanciful states of the body (which are not related to the Soul), both high and low, are identified as one’s own due to associations with Guṇas. It is seldom that someone disowns them and casts them off (through the Grace of God).

48. One’s own birth can be inferred from that of one’s son and death, by that of one’s father. But he who clearly understands that birth and death are related to the body, this knower is the Ātman who is not subject to and characterized by both (birth and death).

49. Just as the knower of the sprouting of a plant and of its end, is different from the plant itself, so also the Ātman who is the seer, is distinct from the body.

50. An ignorant person does not distinguish his Ātman from his body in this way and becomes infatuated with the object of the senses and identifies himself with the body, and thus becomes a subject of transmigration or Samsāra.

51. He wanders in the whirligig of Samsāra by being born as a sage or a god by doing actions dominated by sattvā-guṇa; by his association with rajas he is born among Asuras or human beings, and through association with tamas, he goes to the state of evil spirits or sub-human beings.

52. Just as one imitates the artistes while one witnesses a dance or attends a musical performance, in the same way the Ātman though free from desires or inactive, witnesses the qualities of Ahamkāra and is prompted to imitate them.

53-54. Just as trees (though stationary) on the bank of a flowing stream of water appear to be moving or when the eye is set rolling, the earth appears to be rolling; or just as reveries and dream visions though unreal give the pleasurable and painful experience to one, similarly, the samsāra that is the pleasures or the pains experienced therein are unreal, O descendent of Dāśārha.
55. Though from the point of reality, worldly objects have no existence, the \textit{saṁsāra} does not vanish in the case of a person who broods over them, just as a person experiences evils in a dream.

56. Therefore, O Uddhava, do not enjoy the objects of pleasure with the senses which are by nature evil (unreal). Please understand that it is merely an illusion which shows difference which is reflected in the \textit{Ātman} due to ignorance about its true nature.

57-58. Even if scolded, insulted, defrauded, envied, belaboured, fettered, deprived of the means of livelihood or defiled with actual spitting and urination and thus persecuted in various ways by the wicked and the ignorant, and thus subjected to a difficult situation, an aspirant after Final beatitude should extricate his \textit{Ātman} by dint of his own self.

\textit{Uddhava submitted:}

59. Please explain to me in such a way as I may understand it, O prominent among the eloquents. I consider this outrage of the wicked on my self as simply unbearable.

60. Nature (or Attachment to one’s body) is too powerful even for learned people, (they will certainly revolt against such treatment) except in the case of those who are absorbed in performing the (course of) duties enjoined by you, and have become quiescent by securing asylum at your feet.

\textbf{CHAPTER TWENTYTHREE}

\textit{The Song of a Recluse (Bhikṣu Gitā)}

\textit{Śrī Śuka (son of the sage Bādarāyana) said:}

1. When thus prayed by Uddhava, the foremost of his devotees, Lord Kṛṣṇa, the prominent leader of the Dāśārha clan, whose glorious exploits are worth listening, appreciated the speech of his servant (devotee) and explained to him in details.
The glorious Lord said:

2. O disciple of Brhaspati! Verily there is hardly any such perfectly pious soul who is capable of consoling his mind which is pierced by the harsh abrasive language of the wicked.

3. A person is not so much pained when pierced by arrows in his vital parts, as he is by the shaft-like cruel words uttered by the wicked, cutting to the quick.

4. In this context, a holy ancient legend is (traditionally) told, O Uddhava. I shall describe it to you. Please listen to it with full concentration of mind.

5. This legend is sung by a certain recluse who was maltreated by the wicked, but who retained the composure of his mind by remembering it to be the consequence of his Karma ripened into fruition.

6. In the country of Avanti (country around Ujjain in Madhya Pradesh), there lived a certain twice-born (Brāhmaṇa) tycoon of enormous wealth, a merchant-cum-agriculturist by profession. He was so miserly that he made his own body, sons, wife, deities, guests and servants to suffer by his parsimony. He was a woman-addict, greedy and most irascible by nature.

7. He never showed the courtesy of greeting his relatives and guests, at least orally. In his desolate house (devoid of religious activities), he did not satisfy himself by catering to its needs and desired objects, at the proper time.

8. His sons and relatives hated him for his wickedness and miserliness. His wife, daughters and servants felt disgusted with him and did nothing that would please him.

9. With this type of Yakṣa (ghost—) like guardian of wealth who was destitute of both the purusārthas in life (viz. righteousness and enjoyment of pleasure), and had thus fallen from this world as the next, the five deities of the five daily great sacrifices (mahāyajñas) viz. gods, sages, forefathers, sub-human beings and men (all of whom are claimants to our earnings) got enraged with him.

10. O highly liberal Uddhava! As all the fund of his merit got exhausted due to his neglect of the (above-mentioned five) deities, even his entire wealth which was amassed by him with great labour and pain was lost.

11. Some of the wealth of that wretched Brähmana was appropriated by his relatives. Thieves robbed some of it, while the rest was taken away by Providence, Time, government and other people, O Uddhava.

12. In this way when he became destitute of wealth, was devoid of righteousness and pleasures in life and was neglected by his relatives, he, being despondent, was lost in deep insuperable anxiety.

13. A deep sense of despair overwhelmed that pitiable Brähmana, while he was brooding over it for a long time, and was lamenting over it, with his throat choked with tears.

14. He mourned to himself, "Alas! What a pity! In vain have I subjected my body to hardship gaining neither religious merit nor any worldly pleasure. And all the hardship for acquisition of wealth was also lost.

15. Generally, the wealth hoarded by the miserly never confers any happiness on them. In this world, it causes affliction to their selves (minds and bodies), and after death it leads them to hell.

16. Just as even a small spot of leprosy mars even an otherwise covetable beauty, so avarice, even of the smallest degree, spoils the pure spotless glory of the glorious and praiseworthy excellences of the virtuous.

17. It is the lot of people to undergo hardships in acquiring wealth, to experience fears and anxieties in preserving and increasing it while acquired, and to suffer delusion when it is lost or spent in enjoyment.

18-19. In the opinion of the public, the fifteen evils found in men viz. theft or misappropriation, violence, falsehood, hypocrisy, lust, anger, pride, arrogance, dissensions, enmity, distrust or breach of faith, rivalry, addiction to women, wine and gambling—all these are rooted in wealth. Therefore, a person desirous of securing the highest good, should renounce even from a distance the evil, the misnomer of which is artha (wealth).

20. Brothers, wives, parents as well as friends—all of whom are tied with bonds of affection—get separated—nay, are instantly made sworn enemies for a paltry piece of coin (a cowrie shell).

21. These (near ones) become agitated and are incensed (lit. burn with anger) even for a paltry amount of money. They suddenly snap bonds of friendship, immediately abandon him out of rivalry to kill him.

22. Having obtained birth in the human species which is sought after even by immortal gods, and even the highest status of Brähmana, they discard it. Having thus ruined their self-interest, they get degraded into an evil state (viz. hell).

23. Having (fortunately) secured birth in this human body which is a gateway to the heaven (svarga) and Final Emancipation (mokṣa), what person will feel attached to wealth which is the centre (abode) of all evils.

24. He who does not share his wealth with gods, sages, manes, living beings, relatives and kinsmen (all of whom are claimants of that wealth)¹ nor does he spend it on himself, is merely a Yakṣa, (a ghost—) guardian of his wealth and he falls down into hell.

25. My life and strength have been wasted in the fruitless attempt to acquire wealth. It is with these (three) that wise people attain the Final Beatitude. Aged (and devoid of strength and wealth as I am), what good can I accomplish now?

26. For what purpose does a learned person, aware of the evils of wealth, constantly put himself into the vain efforts of acquiring wealth, the desire for which is fruitless? It is certain that this world is thoroughly infatuated by the deluding potency of some (indescribable) person.

27. What purpose of a person who, caught in the jaws of death, is being devoured by death, could be served by riches or by them who bestow wealth on him or by the objects of pleasure or by those who confer such objects on him or by actions which may lead to a new birth?

1. It is regarded that what one acquires does not belong to him only individually, but gods, sages, etc. are also instrumental to that gain and as such these claimants should be propitiated by the daily five maha-yajñas.
28. It is certain that Lord Hari, the embodiment of all gods, must have been graciously pleased with me and has brought me to such a state. For the despondency (that has been engendered in me by His grace) is the boat (which will help me cross the ocean of samsāra).

29. In the remaining part of my life, I, in whom the sense of renunciation has awakened, shall remain self-complacent (in my mind), and shall cease to be careless about my object in life (viz. working for final beatitude), and shall dry up my body in performing penance.

30. May the gods, the divine rulers of the three worlds bless me with their grace in this state (of working for my own salvation). (My life may be very short) but the ancient pious king Khaṭvāṅga¹ attained the region of Brahman (realized Para Brahman and became one with him) within the brief span of Muhūrta (45 minutes).

The Lord said:

31. Having deliberated and resolved in his mind in this way, that pious-most Brāhmaṇa of Avanti loosened the knots (of Ahamkāra and the feeling of mine-ness) in his heart, and turning into a quiescent recluse, he became a sage engrossed in meditation.

32. Having brought his mind, senses and breath under his control, he wandered over this earth, entering towns and villages only for begging alms, wearing no external characteristics (about his being a recluse) and forming no attachment to anything.

33. Seeing that aged, dirty (nude) recluse, evil-minded persons (in the town) maltreated him in various humiliating ways².

34. Some took away his triple bamboo staff (a symbol of total renunciation), some his begging bowl, and others, his

¹. vide Supra II.1.13 (Vol. I. P. 154 and Ft. note No. 505).

². The ill-treatment meted out to this nude, unclean (as SR put it) mendicant as given in the following verses, is similar to that given to Mahāvira, the 24th Tirthankara of Jainas, as described in the Ācārāga Sūtra, I 19. The textual similarity between these two texts is worth noting.
water-jar (of gourd), some, his seat, some, his string of beads and others, his quilting of rags and strips of cloth.

35-36. (To make a show of return) they showed and returned those articles to him and instantly snatched them away from him. While the poor fellow was eating food he got by alms, on the bank of the river, those sinners urinated on his head and spat on him. They forced the silent sage to break his (vow of) silence, and if he refused to speak, they belaboured him.

37. Alleging that he was a thief, some threatened him with words of abuse. Shouting "Bind that fellow". "Tie him down", some people tied him with ropes.

38. Some reviled him contemptuously. "He is a rogue carrying (the triple-staff as) an outward emblem of piety. He has become a bankrupt (depleted in wealth) and is driven out by his relatives, he has therefore adopted to this form of livelihood.

39. (others would say) "O he is quite robust and stout-hearted like a big mountain. He seeks his end by (assuming the vow of) silence. He is relentless like a crane".

40. In this way some ridiculed him; some broke wind against him. Like a toy, they tied him, whilst others, encaged him.

41. Whatever type of affliction that came to his lot—whether caused by the elements, or by his Fate (or gods) or his own body he took it in his stride reconciling himself with it, as ordained by his Fate, in which he must acquiesce.

42. Persecuted thus by the dregs of the society, who wanted to bring about his downfall (by making him abandon his saintly life), the Brāhmaṇa, remaining firm in own Dharma (course of righteous duties) and strong in fortitude of the Sāttvāc type, sang the following song.

1. This is defined in BG 18.33 as follows:
   The unswerving firmness whereby through Yoga, the functions of mind, the vital breath and senses are regulated, is called sāttvika.
The Brähmana said*

43. Neither these persons, nor any deity or myself (body), nor planets nor Karma nor the Time-spirit is the cause of pleasure or pain. But as it is said (in the \textit{truitis}), it is the mind alone that is the real cause of these, for it is the mind which sets into motion (the wheel of) \textit{Samsāra} (worldly existence).

44. It is this powerful mind which creates i.e. sets in motion the \textit{guna}s (viz. \textit{sattva}, \textit{rajas} and \textit{tamas}). From those \textit{guna}s proceed \textit{Karma}s of wonderful, various kinds which are white (\textit{sāttvika} or meritorious), black (\textit{Tāmasic}, sinful) and red (\textit{Rājasika} a mixture of merit and sin). It is from these that various species of life (corresponding to the colours of characteristics of the \textit{guna}s) proceed.

45. The \textit{Aitam} is perfectly unconcerned and inactive, though associated as the Inner Controller with the mind (which is actively engaged in \textit{Samsāra}). He is shining like gold i.e. is characterised by His potency of perfect knowledge. As a friend or director of mine i.e. of the \textit{jīva}, he stands merely as a witness with his vision unobstructed. But that very \textit{jīva} (individual soul) assuming the mind as identical with the Self, enjoys the objects of the senses, becomes attached to the (three) \textit{guna}s and gets entangled in the bondage of \textit{Samsāra}.

46. The control of the mind is the ultimate goal of charitable gifts, observance of righteous duties (prescribed for one's caste and stage in life), abiding by the rules of discipline called \textit{Niyama} and \textit{Yama}, study (of philosophy), performance of acts enjoined in the \textit{Vedas} and observance of good vows (e.g.

* ŠR calls this soliloquy of the Brähmana as \textit{Aṣṭādaśa sloki Gītā} in eighteen verses).

 VJ:—The Supreme Soul, with unclouded vision, witnesses the activity of the mind of the individual soul. That activity is the cause of \textit{Samsāra}. But the Supreme Soul is unconnected with it as he is the embodiment of pure bliss. He is my friend. It is the \textit{jīva} in the bondage of \textit{Samsāra}, who is deeply attached to his mind which forms his subtle body. It is the \textit{jīva} who is addicted to objects of senses and pursues them.

1. They are: purity, contentment, penance, study of \textit{Vedas} and singing the name of the Lord.
2. They are: Non-violence, truthfulness, non-stealing, celibacy and owning no property.
fasting on the Ekādaśī day). For the Supreme Yoga consists of withdrawal of the mind from all (external) things and concentrating on the Paramātman.

47. Tell me what he has yet to accomplish by giving charitable gifts (and other acts mentioned above), if his mind is perfectly serene and established in the Supreme Self. What good purpose can charitable gifts etc. serve, if one’s mind is distracted, uncontrolled and inactive (through sluggishness, etc.)?

48* If the mind is subdued other senses as well as gods presiding over them (automatically) come under control. But the mind is not subjugated by anyone. The mind is thus a formidable deity, who is mightier than the mighty.¹ He who can bring the mind under control, is the god of gods.

49. Without conquering the invincible enemy of inexorable force which cuts one to the quick, some persons infatuated (by Māyā) inflict a ruthless war upon other mortals, and make friend of some enemies of others and remain indifferent with still some other persons.

50. The bodies are the creation of the mind (and not real). Identifying themselves with their bodies as “mine” and “I” the people whose intellect (mind) has become blind entertain the false notion that ‘this is I’, “He is another—other than I”, and thus under this misapprehension they wander in the darkness (or Samsāra) which being limitless is difficult to cross.

51. If an individual person is posited to be the cause of

* (1) SS. states that the grace of the Lord is necessary for controlling the mind.

(ii) VR. takes the formidable deity as the Supreme Lord, and interprets : The Supreme Lord, resplendent in his own splendour, should be worshipped by pious acts like charitable gifts, etc. He keeps the mind attracted towards him. He is mightier than the mighty and rules over the gods who are the presiding deities of the senses. They are afraid of him.

1. SR. quotes a Śruti as follows :

```
       manuvāte sarvam idam bāhiṣṭaḥ / đā'nyāya mano vakam anviyāya / bhitṣmo hi devah sahasāḥ sahyān /
```
pleasure or pain (experienced by us), the Atman (who is neither a doer nor an experiencer) has nothing to do with it. That (passive and active) relation (of giving and experienc- ing pleasure or pain) is between two bodies (of the doer and of the sufferer), which are (after all) made of dust. If a person bites his own tongue with his teeth, with whom should one get angry for the pain.

52. If the presiding deities of our senses be presumed to be the cause of our pair, how is it related with the Atman (who is unconcerned with it)? For it is with the two organs of the same body that the modification, viz. giving and receiving pain is concerned. When one limb of a body strikes another limb of the same body, with what part of the body can a man get angry?

53. If (it be argued that) one's own self is the cause (of our joys and sorrows), then the very nature of the soul being responsible (for the pleasure or pain) none else can be the cause. (But even the Atman cannot be the cause as he is not insane to create trouble for himself). If there is any other cause than the Atman, it cannot be real (as only the Atman, the all-pervading Brahman, is real). That being the case, there is neither pleasure nor pain in reality. Where is then the cause to get angry?

54. If it is presumed that planets are the cause of pleasure or pain, planets can affect a body that is born\(^1\). How are they related to the Atman who has no birth? Moreover, astrologers state that good or evil planetary influence, affect the planets. But the Atman is neither the body nor a planet. With whom should the Self flare up?

55. Granted for the sake of argument that Karma is the cause of pleasure and pain. But how does the Atman come into the picture? Karma is possible when one and the same body

\[^1\] ŠR. explains astrologically, when the planets are in the unfavourable houses of the horoscope (the 8th, the 12th, etc.) of a person then they harass him. But this trouble is to the body due to the identification of a presiding deity of a planet with the body. The planets create trouble \textit{inter se} due to their enmity. But Purusa (the Self) is unconcerned as he is neither the body nor a planet.
happens to be both sentient and insentient (for only the insentient can undergo a modification and sentiency is a condition precedent of action). But the material body is non-sentient (and hence incapable of undergoing experience of joy, sorrow, etc.), while the Self is pure sentiency. With whom can he get wroth? For, Karma, the supposed cause of pleasure or pain, does not exist at all.

56. Even if the Time-Spirit (Kāla) be regarded as the cause of one's pleasure and pain, it has no relation with Atman (as it is a part of Brahman with which the Ātman is identical. It is generally agreed that the whole never troubles its part. For example:) A flame is not destroyed by the fire. (It goes out when its limiting condition viz. fuel, is burnt down), so also the coldness of ice does not deaden with cold its particles. With whom can the Ātman flare up as there is no scope for duality or pairs of opposites in the Supreme (Brahman)?

57. The Ātman is transcendental to prakṛti. Hence no pair of opposites (such as pleasure and pain can be imagined to affect the Paramātman either through the instrumentality of anything, at any time or place, in any way, as it is possible in the case of Ahamkāra (Ego) which is of the nature of (or cause of) Samsāra. One who has realized this, has nothing to fear from created beings.

58. Therefore, basing myself firmly on this conclusive faith in the Supreme Soul which the ancient-most great sages espoused (with careful deliberation), I (a poor recluse as I am) shall get over the uncrossable ocean of darkness (i.e. Samsāra by resorting solely to the feet of Lord Mukunda.

The Lord said:

59. Having lost his wealth, he became disgusted (with Samsāra). Overcoming his feeling of despondency, he became a recluse and wandered all over the world. Though he was ill-

---

1. VR. puts it a bit differently:

The Ātman being sentient and of intelligent nature cannot be attributed pleasure or pain under the force of Time. If Time is regarded as the cause of the Soul's pleasure or pain, Time must be regarded as the cause of the heat of the fire or the cold of ice (and not their real nature).
treated in this way by wicked people, he remained steadfast to his course of righteous conduct (unflinchingly). The sage sang the following song:

60. “There is no other person (except one’s ownself) which causes weal or woe to one’s self. This mundane existence consisting as it is, of friends, foes and indifferent persons, is nothing but delusion of the mind caused by darkness (ignorance of the Self)”.

61. Therefore, O Uddhava, having concentrated your intellect (mind) firmly in me, make all possible efforts to control your mind. This is, in brief, the entire teaching of Yoga.

62. A person who, with a concentrated mind, muses over, listens to or recounts to others this song of the recluse which teaches the control of the mind with the realization as the Supreme Lord¹, will not be overpowered by pairs of opposite states like pleasure and pain.

CHAPTER TWENTYFOUR

Elucidation of Śaṅkhya Yoga

The Lord continued:

1* Now, I shall elucidate to you fully the Śaṅkhya doctrine as definitely and conclusively ascertained by ancient sages (like Kapila and others). Having realized this (philoso-

---

¹ ŚR : Though the Supreme Soul is one without a second, all the quality arises through Prakṛti and Puruṣa due to Māyā, and it (the quality) dissolves into him again. A person who realizes this after close enquiry and contemplation, becomes free from the delusion of quality.

2. Śaṅkhya—(i) correct knowledge about the Prakṛti, Puruṣa andĪśvara as being distinct from one another—VR.

(ii) Correct knowledge of the Truth (‘as it is in reality’)—VJ.

(iii) The discriminative knowledge of what is the Soul and the non-Soul—VC.
phy) thoroughly, a man can immediately shed off the illusion³ (in the form of duality like pleasure-pain, etc.) caused by the erroneous notion of difference (between oneself and others, etc.)

2* In the beginning, during the Pralaya stage (when the universe did not exist and), before the Yuga—period—(began to run its course), in the first Yuga called Kṛta when people were accurate in discriminating between the reality and its semblance or illusion, the seer (or the subjective consciousness) and the totality of the objective existence were identical (one only) undifferentiated substance completely absorbed in Brahmaṇ.

3. That entire undifferentiated Reality, viz. the Brahmaṇ is beyond the reach of speech and the mind. It (the Brahmaṇ) became (as if) dual² in the form of Māyā or objective existence and that which is reflected in it, viz. the Jīva.

1. bhrama—The illusion in regarding one's body as the Soul or an absolute being—VR.
   Vikalpa—(i) The body and the illusory super-impositions caused thereby—VC.
   (ii) Illusions regarding one's body, household, etc.—SD.
   vide supra III Chapters 26-27.

* (1) VR : (i) In the Pralaya stage, before the creation of the universe, at the beginning of the creation during the incomparable Kṛta-Yuga (the first Yuga period) and in the case of persons who could discriminate between the triad of the principles called cid, acid and Īśvara, Knowledge i.e. essential nature of the Supreme Soul (Paramātman) was but one—the total identity between knowledge and its object being absolutely undifferentiated by name and form.

or (ii) Both knowledge (i.e. the essential nature of jīva) and its object (viz. Prakṛti) were entirely one, undifferentiated by name and form.

(2) VJ : At the beginning of the creation, in the Kṛta Yuga knowledge and its object were one (factually real). There was no scope for doubt or mistake in the correct comprehension of the objective reality.

(3) SD : Brahmaṇ was possessed of the potencies of Prakṛti, Puruṣa etc. The Jīva (individual soul, the objective reality, Prakṛti) were undifferentiated from Brahmaṇ as their cause cf. sad eso saumya idam agr a diti /
   —Chāndogya 6.2.1.

2. VR. : Assumed two forms viz. Māya and phala (the final goal) but JG. takes phala as the Prakṛta viśeṣa of Brahmaṇ. According to VJ. : In the
4. Out of the two, one is Prakṛti possessing two aspects\(^1\) (viz. the cause and effect), and the other aspect is Knowledge (Jñāna) and it designated as Purusa.

5.* From Prakṛti which was being powerfully agitated by me and by the glance of the Lord in the Purusa form (or by the unseen destiny of Jiva), were evolved the guṇas, viz, Sattva, Rajas and Tamas.

6. From the three guṇas was evolved the Śūtra\(^2\)—the first modification characterised by the (cosmic) activity and then (was evolved) the Mahat (The Cosmic intelligence). The Mahat in conjunction with Śūtra underwent modification and Ahamkāra (Ego) was evolved therefrom. It deludes the Jivas.

7. Ahamkāra\(^3\) (egotism) is of three types : Sattvika (or Vaikārika), Rājas (or Taijasa) and Tāmasa. It is both intelligent and non-intelligent or material by nature and is the cause of Tan-mātrās (the subtle objects, of sound, touch etc.) cognitive senses, conative organs and the mind.

8. From the Tāmasa (type of) Ahamkāra, the evolutes of which are the (five) Tanmātrās, came into existence the (five) gross elements (like the sky, air, wind, etc.) From the Taijasa (or Rājas) type came into being the (ten cognitive and conative) sense-organs. From Vaiśvata (or Sattvika Ahamkāra) were Kṛta age, knowledge was one with reality and hence pure. In the Tretā age, it became divided and gave rise to doubt and in the Dvapara age, it developed into perversity.

1. Ubhayātmika : (i) Being of the nature of cause and effect : ŚR.
   (ii) EK. Being of a nature of both-ness, one essential Reality constituting of Śiva and Śakti aspects, both of which are non-dual—EB. 24.97-101.

* VJ. uses mythological terminology all through. At the beginning of evolution through me were born out of Lakṣmī, Brahmā (Purusa) and Gāyatri (Prakṛti). Through Lakṣmī and myself, Prakṛti evolved three forms viz. Gāyatri, Sāvitrī and Sarasvatī presiding respectively over the guṇas, Tamas, Rajas and Sattva.

2. The concept of Śūtra as an evolute of guṇas and as a predecessor of Mahat is the contribution of the Bh. P. and is not found in the Classical Sākhya. EK. faithfully follows the text of the Bh. P.

3. Though usually translated as ‘egotism’ which is a later semantic development, its original connotation evades translation. G.J. Larsen (in his classical Sākhya), suggests ‘Self-awareness’, ‘I-ness’. The latter appears to me more appropriate.
evolved the eleven deities\(^1\) (presiding over the sense-organs and the mind).

9. All these principles were impelled by me (with my energy) and were made to work conjointly. They created the egg of the universe which to me—(The Inner Controller of this Vairāja) became an excellent dwelling place.

10. In that egg laid on cosmic waters, I manifested myself (and lay as Nārāyaṇa on the sheet of that water). From my navel sprouted forth a lotus called Viśva (as it was the cause of the universe). And the ‘self-born’ god Brahmā appeared there (thus Vairāja re-manifested himself as a god with four faces).

11. Endowed with the principle of energy (rajas) and equipped with penance (and knowledge) and through my grace, god Brahmā, the Soul of the universe, created the worlds with their protecting deities, consisting of three regions, viz. Bhūr-loka (the earth with seven subterranean regions like Atala Vitala and others), Bhuvar-loka (the aerial region above the earth) and Svar-loka (consisting of Mahar, Jana, Tapas and Satya lokas)

12. Svar-loka or heaven is the abode of gods. Bhūloka (the terrestrial globe) that of all mortal beings including men. Beyond these three regions (in maharloka, Janaloaka, etc.) lies the abode of Siddhas.

13. Below our sphere of the earth, god Brahmā created the subterranean regions (known as Atala, Vitala, etc.) as the abodes of Asuras and Nāgas. All the fruits of karmas performed by those who are under the influence of three guṇas are enjoyed in the (above-mentioned) three spheres.

14. Mahar-loka, Jana-loka and Tapo-loka are regions free from all impurities. These are the destinations of those who practice Yoga, perform austerities or become sannyāsins. But my region, Vaikuṇṭha is the destination of those who practice the Yoga of devotion (Bhakti).

\(^1\) ŚR. enumerates them as follows: Deities presiding over quarters, the wind-god, the Sun-god, Pracetas (Varuṇa), two Aśvinikumāras, the Fire god Indra, Upendra (God Viṣṇu), Mitra (Prajāpati) and the Moon-god. They are refugent with their splendour and hence called devas (Prakāśa- swelling).
15.* By me, the Almighty creator in the form of time-spirit which apportions the fruits of Karmas, this world which is bound up with karmas, is made to go up (to Satya-loka) or down to the insentient stage in this stream of guṇas (according to the nature of Karmas done by these beings).

16. All beings (or objects) whether minute or big, thin or stout which are in existence, are constituted by the pair, Prakṛti and Puruṣa.

17. Whatever forms the beginning as well as the end of a thing, certainly constitutes its middle also. It is the real entity (as it pervades all the states). Modifications have been only perceptual and of practical nature, as the ornaments are of gold or pots, of the earth.

18. The real entity at the basis of the product is that which the earlier existence adopts as the material to evolve the latter existence or that which is, in a given case, considered to be the beginning and the end of a certain effect.

19. Prakṛti is the material cause of what is regarded as sat (real existence from the practical point of view or mentioned in the previous verse). The Supreme Person is its support (presiding authority). And the Time-Spirit is the revealer of it (which does so by disturbing the equilibrium of guṇas). And I, the Brahman, constitute this triad (of Prakṛti, Puruṣa and Kāla).

20. (He proves the reality of Brahman due to his persistence before, during and after the existence of the universe—). As long as my glance (the Divine Will) is there, this enormous process of creation proceeds in due order from cause to effect (or father to son) continuously. It continues for the enjoyment of the jīva (who, due to the influence of three guṇas takes birth in various species for enjoying the fruits of his Kar-

*. ŚR. : All destinations except the Lord’s region Vaikuṇṭha, are of short duration. A jīva can rest eternally in Vaikuṇṭha. One should give up the path of Karma and take to Bhaktiyoga. The verse thus preaches renunciation.

VR. The creation of the universe consisting of categories like Mahat and others, continues to proceed while I will it. The universe has two aspects—intelligent (cid) and Non-intelligent (acid) and is invested with three guṇas. As I will it, the universe exists and gets dissolved.
mas) up to the end of the universe (till the glance of the Lord lasts).

21.* This universe (vīrāt) in which the creation (subsistence) and dissolution of the worlds (along with creatures inhabiting them) take place is pervaded by me. It (with all the fourteen spheres—bhūvanas arranged in it) becomes eligible for dissolution into its five components (the elements).

22. (Here the process of involution of the universe is described).

(At the time of the dissolution of the universe due to a severe drought of one hundred years) the (bodies of) the mortal (creation) are withdrawn into the food, and the food, into the food-grains, the seeds, into the earth (which being burnt down by the solar heat from above and the poison-fire of Sānkarsana from below) is reduced to its subtle state of smell.

23. Smell gets absorbed into waters and the waters into its essential characteristic Rasa (taste). Rasa gets dissolved into the (elemental) fire or light which (in its turn) is merged into (its essential characteristic) colour.

24. Colour is withdrawn into the element—air which is reduced to its essential property Touch. Touch gets dissolved into the ether (sky) which is reduced to its subtle state sound. The cognitive senses and conative organs get merged into their own sources (viz. their presiding deities like the Sun, Indra, Varuṇa etc.)

25. The causes (or deities presiding over senses) get dissolved into their controller; the mind along with the deities gets merged into Sāttvika Ahamkāra. Sound (the essential characteristic of the ether) is dissolved into Tāmasa Ahamkāra and that powerful Ahamkāra (which includes Sāttvika, Rājas and Tāmasa types) is withdrawn into Mahat.

26. That great and mighty principle Mahat (which possesses the potencies of knowledge and actions) highly

* VR : When I, through Time, will like to destroy the Brahmanda consisting of various bhūvanas or spheres for the enjoyment of jivas, it becomes fit to disintegrate into five (gross) elements.

 VJ. states that here the categories and their presiding deities are spoken of in the same words. (We should understand that) the deity presiding over food—is absorbed in the deity presiding over seeds or food grains.
endowed as it is with guṇas is withdrawn into its cause the three guṇas which in turn get dissolved into the Unmanifest (Prakṛti) And that Unmanifest Prakṛti becomes merged with the Time-Spirit which has ceased to function.

27. The (operation-less) Time-Spirit becomes one with the jīva, the Maker of the Universe who directs Māyā (and is full of knowledge. The jīva gets integrated with me, the birthless (eternal) Ātman. The absolute Ātman who is to be inferred from the process of evolution and involution of the universe abides (eternally) by himself.

28. How can any illusion or misapprehension caused by the (wrong) notion of difference, arise at all in the mind of a person who makes searching enquiries about the Ātman and how can any misconception (if arisen at all) continue (to linger) just as darkness would, after the rise of the Sun in the sky?

29. This is the process known as Sāṃkhya. This (differentiation between what is Ātman and what is Not-Ātman) cuts the knots of all doubts in one’s heart. This has been explained to you by me. The omniscient one knows all things great and small, or he knows the truth about cause and effect or the past, present and future, from the point of evolution and involution.

CHAPTER TWENTY FIVE

The Three Guṇas and Their Workings

The Lord said:

1. Now listen to me attentively as I explain to you, O excellent person, how guṇas when unmixed with each other (and acting in that pure state), affect severally the behaviour of a human being.

2. The effects of Sattva are: Control of the mind and that of senses, forebearance, discrimination, observance of one's religious duties or penance, truthfulness, mercy, memory (or prompt remembrance of Śāstric teaching), contentment, renunciation, non-covetousness, faith, avoidance of unbecoming acts (not even looking at them), charity, straightforwardness, modesty, and satisfaction in the bliss of the Self.

3. The effects of Rajas are: Lust after sensual pleasures, activity, arrogance, insatiable greed, pride, seeking heavenly blessings for prosperity, the sense of differentiation (between oneself and others), voluptuousness, quarrel-mongering, liking for self-praise, affection, ridiculing others, show of power, hard exertions through power.

4. The effects of Tamas are: Intolerance, miserliness, deceitfulness, violence, begging, hypocrisy, langour, quarrel-someness, sorrow, delusion, despondency, stupour, expectation, fear and indolence.

5. These are the effects of Sattva, Rajas and Tamas respectively. These are exhaustively enumerated by me. Now listen from me the effects of their combinations.

6. The expression of the notions ‘I am’ and ‘Mine is’ etc. is the effect of the combination of guṇas. Whatever act is done by the mind, objects of senses, the senses and the vital breath—all these transactions (in life) are the combinations of these guṇas.

7. When a person is enthusiastically working to attain (the three puruṣārthas) viz. Dharma, Artha and Kāma, each of such pursuits is a combination of three guṇas and they are conducive to the creation of faith (about Dharma) or attainment of wealth and satisfaction of sense-pleasures (which are Sāttvika, Tāmasa and Rājasa respectively).

8. If a person is deeply attached to activities characterised by Pravṛtti (this-worldly-ness) and is intensely attach-

1. SR explains: When we say “I am quiescent, passionate or irascible” or that “These qualities (quiescence, passionateness) are mine”, it expresses the idea of mine-ness—which is due to the mixture of these guṇas. The mind is Sāttvika, bhūtas (elements) are Tāmasa, while sense-organs are Rājasa. Naturally when an act involving the use of or working of the mind, senses, sense-objects and the vital breath takes place (as normally all acts are so involved), they become the product of the combination of guṇas.
ed to the house-holder’s life, and performs righteous duties (prescribed for his stage of life), there is a combination of guṇas (as attachment to household is Tāmasa, his worldly praṇīti is Rājasa while righteous duties are Śattvika).

9. From (a person’s) self-control and other qualities, it may be inferred that he is endowed (mainly) with Sattva-guṇa; from his inclination to lust and such other qualities, the person is dominated by Rajo-guṇa and from (passions like) anger (avarice etc.), it should be inferred that he is possessed with Tamo-guṇa.

10. But when, without expecting anything in return, a person resorts to me (and worships me), through the duties prescribed for him by Śāstras and adores me with devotion, one should know that person to be of Śattvic nature—the same holds good in the case of women.

11. When with expectation of securing worldly pleasures a person worships me through (performance) of righteous duties prescribed for him by Śāstras, it should be understood that he is Rājasika by nature; but when he does so with a desire to cause injury to others (his enemies, etc.), one should know that he is Tāmasika by nature.

12. The guṇas—Sattva, Rajas and Tamas—affect the Jīva (individual Soul), and (as such) they have no concern with me. They are engendered in the mind of the Jīvas. A person who is attached to bhūtas (i.e. the worldly objects which are products of bhūtas) is bound down by them to Samsāra.

13. When the illuminating, pure and auspicious quality of Sattva domineers over the other two, then a man is happily united with righteous tendencies, spiritual knowledge and other qualities.

14. When Rajas from which spring attachment, notion of difference and which drives one to activities, triumphs over the two (other) guṇas, a person becomes restive and unhappy, indulges in activities and aspires after fame and wealth.

15. When Tamas which stupefies discretion, obscures one’s vision and renders one dull, overpowers both the Sattva and Rajas, a person suffers from grief and delusion, becomes sleepish and becomes harmful and beggarly enough to expect help from others.
16. When the mind becomes serene, senses quiescent and averse to their objects, and there is fearlessness about the body, and the mind feels no attachment for anything, you can be sure that there is Sattva-guna which leads to my state.

17. When the mind gets agitated through passionate activity and his intellect (judgment) gets distracted, his senses are restless, the organs of action have no ease and the mind is in confused state, know that it is the dominance of Rajo-guna.

18. When the faculty of understanding fails and the mind becomes powerless to grasp the objects and drooping its activities (temporarily) ceases to function, and when darkness (ignorance) and despondency prevail, know that it is the dominance of Tamo-guna.

19. When the Sattva-guna is in ascendance, the power of gods increases, when the strength of Rajo-guna enhances, the power of Asuras becomes dominant and when the Tamo-guna grows in strength, the Rākṣasas grow in strength, O Uddhava¹.

20. One should regard the working state of beings due to Sattva-guna, dream state due to Rajas and deep sleep due to Tamoguna. The fourth state which is the Ātman itself should be regarded persistent through all the previous three stages.

21. The Brāhmaṇas i.e. persons who follow the course of righteous duties prescribed in the Vedas, through the dominance of Sattvaguna go higher and higher up unto Brahma Loka, but with overwhelming Tamoguna, they go down lower and lower to state of immovables. And in between these two states shuttle the human beings due to Rajo-guna.

22. Persons at the time of whose death Sattvaguna is predominant, go to the celestial world. Those who give up the ghost while Rajoguna is ascendant, return to human world. Those who depart from the body while the Tamoguna is powerful, go to hell. While those who are above these three gunas (even while they are alive), come to me (and merge).

23. The course of righteous duties prescribed by the Sāstras (irrespective of their nature as obligatory or occasional), if performed and dedicated to me or without any expectation in return from it, is Sāttvica; that which is done with some expectation of fruit is Rājasa. And the act done with some vindictive (harmful) (or hypocritical or jealous) motive is Tāmasa.

¹ SR explains: Here the senses which tend toward Nipṛtti, Pravrtti and delusion are respectively regarded as of the form of gods. Asuras and Rākṣasas.

24. Knowledge that tries to cognize nothing but the Atman (excluding all other objects) is Sāttvika; that which comprehends the Self along with its conditioning body is Rājasic; knowledge of the uncultured (such as ignorant children, the physically handicapped) is Tāmasic, while knowledge that concerns me only transcends all the three guṇas.

25. Residence in forests is regarded as Sāttvika; dwelling in a village or town is Rājasa; while staying in gamble houses is Tāmasa. Dwelling in my shrine is above these three guṇas.

26. A doer of an action who is not attached to and expecting any fruit in return is called a Sāttvika agent. One who has become blind with attachment (for the fruit of an action in return) is remembered a Rājasic agent, while he who has lost his discrimination between what is right and wrong (but still does it) is called the Tāmasic agent. But a person who entirely depends on me is an agent who transcends the guṇas.

27. Faith in Atman as taught in the Śāstras is Sāttvika, that in ritualistic acts and other duties prescribed in the Vedas is Rājasa. Faith in unrighteous acts as righteousness is Tāmasa while that in my service (worship, meditation, etc.) is beyond the influence of all guṇas.

28. Food that is nourishing, wholesome and obtained without exertions is Sāttvika; that which caters to the taste (and is palatable) is Rājasa, while that which is impure, nauseating and causing some disease is Tāmasa.

29. Happiness which is felt in (the realization of) the Self is Sāttvika; that which arises from the objects of senses is Rājasa: pleasure that comes through delusion and low taste is Tāmasa. But the spiritual bliss arising from realizing me transcends the three guṇas.

30. Thus three guṇas constitute everything such as substance (e.g. food in verse 28 above), place of residence (vide verse 25), fruit (verse 29), time (verse 13-16), knowledge (verse 24) the act (verse 23), the doer (verse 26), faith (verse 27), state of consciousness (verse 20), form of existence (verse 21) and final destination (verse 22).

31. Whatever is seen, heard or contemplated by the intelligence—in fact all entities which are pervaded by Purusa and Prakriti, are the products of three gunas, O prominent person (lit. O bull among men).

32. All these transmigrations of a person (i.e. of his Soul) are caused by these gunas and his actions. The individual (Soul) by whom these gunas which are engendered in the mind are completely subdued and who, by means of the Bhakti-yoga (path of devotion), is firmly established in devotion to me, becomes eligible for my state i.e. final emancipation, O gentle Uddhava.

33. Therefore, having fortunately obtained this (human) body which is eligible to attain both Jñāna (knowledge) and Vijnāna (Realization of the Self), a wise and intelligent person should thoroughly shed off their attachment to gunas and seek resort in me by worshipping me.

34. Therefore, free from attachment to sense-objects and with his senses brought under control, a wise person should worship me devoutly and with alertness. Concentrating his mind on me, he should discomfit Rajas and Tamas by developing the Sattva guna.

35. Becoming a contemplationist, he should subdue Rajas and Tamas by cultivating the Sattva guna and by strengthening himself by desirelessness, he should bring Sattva also under control. Freeing himself from guna, the jiva should shed off the subtle body (the cause of his jiva-hood) and attain to me.

36. The individual Soul (Jiva) who is thus emancipated from his subtle body (or Jiva-hood) and also from gunas arising in the mind, becomes permeated with my presence (i.e. becomes one with Para Brahman), and the Jiva does not go out for enjoyment of external objects nor turns inward for enjoying them mentally. (He is liberated while alive in thisbirth).
CHAPTER TWENTYSIX

The Song of Aila (Purūravas)

The Lord said:

1. He who having obtained this human body (existence) capable of perceiving my real nature, and having adopted the path of devotion so pleasing to me, duly attains to me who am Supreme Bliss and the Supreme Soul abiding in his heart.

2. Emancipated completely by dint of his knowledge from the Jiva-hood constituted of guṇas, and though living in the midst of objects of senses which are unreal, he does not get attached to them, as they are created by (and hence dependent upon) Māyā (and as such) are perceived falsely.

3. One should never associate oneself with unworthy persons who seek to satiate their hunger and gratify their sexual desire. For like a blind man following another blind person, the followers of such sensualists fall into blinding darkness.

4. Emperor Purūravas, the son of Ilā, who was well-known far and wide, became mad due to his separation from Urvasī. When he regained his normalcy and decided to resign, he sang the following song:

5. As Urvasī forsook him, the king lamented loudly and like a mad person, unaware of his nudity, followed her crying, “Wait, O cruel wife, do stop”.

6. His mind being completely fascinated by Urvasī, he enjoyed trivial pleasures through nights year after year and remained unsated. He was not aware of the years that passed away nor those coming in.

Aila (Purūravas) said:

7. Alas! How terribly vast is the extent of my infatuation! My mind has been soiled (and spoilt) by my libidinousness. I was not even aware of the loss of (the major part of) my life, while my neck was being clasped by the queen (Urvasī).

1. For the legend of Purūravas vide Supra IX, 14,32-47.
8. Hypnotized by her, I could not know when the sun arose or set. What I pity, that being enamoured of her, I was unaware how days amounting to a number of years just flitted away.

9. What a shocking self-delusion! I, the sovereign ruler of the world, the crest-jewel of kings, was made a pet-deer of women.

10. The woman who spurned me (contemptuously) like a blade of straw even though I was a ruler with royal grandeur (and paraphernalia). And I, weeping like a madman, went after her in nakedness.

11. What majestic lustre, power or Lordship could there be in me, who like a donkey kicked (by a she-donkey) followed the woman as she deserted me.

12. What is the value of that learning, penance, liberality, scriptural scholarship, resort to solitude or observance of silence in a man who has lost his heart to women.

13. Fie upon me! A fool who, though impervious to his self-interest, fancy myself to be a learned man and who, even after being installed as a sovereign ruler, was subdued and roped like a bull or a donkey by women.

14. Although I had been enjoying the intoxicating nectar of the lips of Urvasī for years together, my inborn lust for her is not satiated, like fire fed with oblations (of ghee).

15. Who else than the glorious Lord Viṣṇu, the Lord of those who revel in the spiritual bliss of the Soul, is capable to deliver my mind from (the clutches) of a wench who captivated it.

16. Even though I was advised by the queen (Urvasī) in well-argued speech (recorded in a Vedic Sūkta) the deep infatuation entrenched in my mind does not disappear, as I, being perverse-minded, had not controlled my mind.

17. What offence has been committed by her against me? Or what wrong can be attributed to a rope against a person who, not knowing its real nature, mistook it for a ser-

---

1. The famous verse attributed to King Yayāti in MBH Ādi. 85.12.

nājātā kāmāh kāmanām upabhogena śāmyati / avidū kṛṣṇa-vorimeva bhūya eva bhīverdha tu // pent? It is I who could not subdue my senses, am responsible (for this tragedy).

18. What a lot of difference there is between a (woman’s or a human) body full of dirt, stinking with bad odour and impure and the attributes of being like a flower (clean, sweet-smelling, pure). But these attributes are superimposed on it (a woman’s body) through Nescience.

19. It cannot be definitely determined whether this human body belongs to parents (who procreated it), or to the wife (one’s life-partner), or to the employer, or to the fire (which ultimately consumes it) or to dogs and vultures (in case it is not cremated but lies unclaimed) or whether it belongs to the Soul (who abides in it) or to friends and well-wishers?

20. What a pity that a man should be fascinated with this disgusting body which disintegrates into worms (if interred), faeces (if eaten by carnivorous animals), and ashes (if cremated), and appreciates it as a beautiful feminine countenance with shapely nose, beaming with charming smiles.

21. What difference is there between people like me who enjoy pleasure in a feminine body which is nothing but an accumulation of skin, flesh, blood, nerves, fat, marrow and bones and worms who enjoy themselves in feces, urine and pus.

22. A person knowing his personal interest, should under no circumstances associate himself with women or persons addicted to women; for the mind gets agitated only when there is a contact between objects of senses and senses and not otherwise.

23. A thing that is not spoken about, seen or heard creates no passion or desire for it. A person who does not direct his life-breath (mind or sense-organs to external objects), gets his mind steady and serene.

24. Therefore, one should not associate with women or women addicts through the medium of senses. For the group of six (internal) enemies (like lust, anger, greed and others) cannot be trusted even in the case of wise people. What need be said of (ignorant) persons like me?
The Lord resumed:

25. Singing loudly the song (of his life) in this way, Pururavas, the King of the Kings, left the realm of Urvasi. He realized me as his own self, and having shaken off delusion by virtue of this knowledge, he retired from worldly life.

26. Therefore, an intelligent person should dissociate himself from evil company, and associate himself with the saintly people; for it is these pious saints who would cut off his deep attachment (to sense-objects) by their wise precepts.

27. The saints devote their minds to me without expecting anything in return. Being desireless, they are serene, viewing all beings as equals (as they are none else but Brahman). They have superseded the notions of mine-ness and I-ness (i.e. identification of the Soul with the body). They are not affected by the pair of opposites (like joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain) and are perfect have-nots (property-less).

28. It is in the company of these supremely fortunate persons, O highly blessed Uddhava, that my legends are told and these stories absolve the listeners from all sins.

29. Those persons who listen to these (my) stories, extol them in songs, devoutly appreciate them and are devoted to me with faith and reverence, get devotion engendered in them.

30. What else remains to be achieved by the saints who attained real devotion towards me, the Brahman, who am endowed with infinite qualities and potencies and who am conscious blissfulness incarnate.

31. Just as cold, fear (of darkness) and darkness fly away from a person who resorts to the fire, similarly, those who wait upon and worship saints, become free from fear, ignorance and apathy.

32. Even as a strong boat is to those who are drowning in the sea, saints, serene-minded knowers of the Brahman are the best life-savers to those who are tossed about and are drowning in the sea of Samsara.

33. Just as food is the very life of living beings, I am the shelter to the afflicted. Righteousness (pious acts) is the wealth (investment) in the other world, the saints are the support (resort) of those who are afraid of repeated transmigration of the Soul in future.

34. The saints confer the (inner) vision (of the Brahman) on those who associate with them, even as the sun bestows the external eye (to see nature). Saints are deities, the near and dear relatives, the very soul, nay they are even myself.

35. It is traditionally recounted that Purūravas who divested himself of all longing for the realm of Urvaśī (and pleasures in her company); renounced all attachment, and revelling in the spiritual bliss of the Ātman, went about all over the world.

CHAPTER TWENTYSEVEN

The Yoga of Active Service

Uddālaka said:

1. Be pleased to explain to me the Yoga of active service (Kriyā-Yoga) consisting of the propitiation of your worship, O Lord! What type of votaries worship you? With what motive do they propitiate you? What is the procedure of their worship, O Lord of Sāttvatas.

2. Sages like Nārada, the worshipful Vyāsa and Bṛhaspati, the son of Aṅgiras, the preceptor (of gods), have repeatedly asserted that this course is conducive to the Final Beatitude to men.

3. The teaching that was issued from your lotus-mouth was the same which the glorious unborn god Brahmā communicated to his sons of whom Bhṛgu was the chief, and also what god Śiva imparted to his divine consort Pārvatī.

4. That teaching is approved as meritorious to persons belonging to all castes (Varnas) and stages in life (Āśramas). I believe it is the best course conducive to emancipation from Samsāra even for women and Śūdras.

5. O Lord with eyes like lotus-petals! Be pleased to elucidate that course which unties the bondage of Karma (permanently) to me who am your beloved devotee, O Lord of the masters of this universe (the Trinity of gods—Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra).

The Lord replied:

6. Limitless is the Karma-kāṇḍa (as courses and practices of ritualistic worship of the Lord are infinite). I shall, however, describe that to you succinctly and in proper sequence.

7. My worship is threefold—Vedic, Tāntric and a synthesis of these two. But of these three modes, one should offer me worship according to the method of his choice (and suitability).

8. Learn from me the method how a person, having attained the status of a twice-born when he is invested with a sacred thread according to the injunctions laid down in the Vedas, should worship me, with faith and devotion.

9. With sincere devotion and without any fraudulent motive (of expecting some fruit or ulterior objective in return), a person should worship me, the preceptor (or the father of world) with the articles of worship (by offering these to me) through the medium of an image or an altar of a sacrifice or the fire or the Sun or the waters or (image enthroned in) his heart or of a Brāhmaṇa.

10. For bodily cleanliness, he should first brush his teeth and take his bath. While bathing he should use earth (and other materials) for washing, muttering all the while Vedic and Tāntric mantras (sacred formulae).

11. After the performance of the Twilight prayer (Sandhyā, Brahmayajña, etc.) and other duties which have been enjoined by me through the Veda, he should, with a pure, solemn determination (of propitiating me) perform my worship which sanctifies (i.e. relieves one from the bondage of) karmas.

12. An image is said to be of eight kinds: It may be made of stone or of wood or of metals (like gold, silver, etc.) or of earth or of sandal paste or may be a painting (on the wall) or of sand or a mental image or made of a precious stone.

13. An image which is the shrine of the Lord, is of two kinds—movable (e.g. a Śālagrāma pebble) or immovable.
While adoring an immovable image, āvāhana (invoking the presence of the deity) and udvāsa (or visarjana, a farewell to the deity) are not necessary, O Uddhava.

14. In worshipping a movable image, one can exercise a choice whether invoking and evoking of the deity in the image should be done. But in the case of an altar of sacrifice both must be done. If the image be not of earth (or sandal-paste) or a painted picture, it may be bathed, but in the case of other material, it should be sprinkled with water.

15. My worship through the medium of images should be performed with excellent articles. But a sincere (guileless) devotee may worship me with whatever articles are available to him. In the case of worshipping me in the mind, it should be done with articles created by the mind with utmost devotion.

16. Bathing and decorating an image pleases me the most, O Uddhava. In the case of an altar, invocation of the specific deities at their respective places by means of mantras is desirable (or placement of twenty-five Tattvas—categories or principles by uttering twenty-five letters from ka to ma). In the case of sacred fire, oblations with ghee be offered.

17. In the Sun-god, worship with Arghya (respectful offering of water and other articles of reception) and prayers is the most pleasing to me; and in water, with libations of water and flower, etc. Even if mere water is offered with faith and devotion by my votary, it gives me the highest pleasure.

18. What need be said if sandal-paste, incense, flowers, lamp, food, etc. are presented to me as offerings. On the contrary, even if rich gifts in abundance be offered to me, by a non-devotee, it does not contribute to my pleasure and joy.

19. Purifying oneself (by taking a bath) and collecting together all the requisite articles of worship, seated on a seat of Darbha-grass with the Darbha’s pointing to the east, one should face the East or the North or face the image of the god, if it was immovable.

20. Consecrating his person by Nyāsa (which consists of assignment of the various parts of the body to different deities accompanied with prayers and corresponding gesticulations) and the respective parts of the image, he should touch it with his hand and clean it (by removing sandal-paste, flowers etc. of the previous worship) and should also duly consecrate the pitcher (kalasa) containing water for bathing the deity and other vessels for sprinkling water.

21. He should sprinkle that consecrated water from the Kalasa) and sanctify the shrine of the deity, the articles of worship and one's own person and also fill the three vessels with water and articles of worship).

22. The worshipper should consecrate the three vessels containing water for washing the feet (padya), hands (Arghya) and sipping (Acamana) of the deity, with the Mantras called Hridaya (heart), Sirsan (head) and Sikhā (Tuft of hair on the head) respectively, and then pronounce the Gāyatri Mantra over them all.

23. One should contemplate on my transcendental atomic (subtle) amsha (part) of Paramatman which abides in the 'Lotus' of the heart in one's body, which is dried up by the (gastric) wind, and parched up with fire at the Ādhāra cakra (a spiritual nerve-plexus presumed to be located at the navel), but revived by the sprinkling of nectar issuing from the moon located in the forehead. It is beyond the 'un-struck' (spiritual) sound (anāhata nada) which is the fifth part of Praṇava (the remaining four being A, U, M, Bindu or nasal sound) and it

1. ŚR. gives the following details. The three vessels with water are meant for washing the feet (padya), hands (arghya) and for sipping (acamaniya) water for the deity. The water for washing the feet of the deity should contain small grains of Šyāmāka rice, blades of Dūrvā grass, lotus flower and a herb called Viśnukrānta or Aparājita. The water for washing the hands of the deity should contain the following eight articles: sandal-paste, flowers, unbroken grains of rice (aksata), of barley. blades of Kusa grass, sesame seeds, mustard seeds and blades of Dūrvā grass. The water for sipping or rinsing the deities' mouth should contain nutmeg, cloves, berries called Kakkola or Kankola. The list is commonly given by all commentators with a few additions. SD. states that if any article is wanting Tulasi leaves should be substituted.

2. GS. gives them as follows:

ihrad namah, stirsnd svadh, and sikhayai vasat.

3. It is as follows:

tat-savitur varenyam bhargodeva śāya dhīmahi dhiyo yo nah prasodayā is meditated upon by Siddhas (who have attained spiritual perfection).

24. When his own body is permeated by that divine particle (ań̄̄ka) or contemplated as his ātman (like a house illumined by the light emanated from a lamp, the worshipper should be (himself) full of my presence and invoke me and worship me with mentally created articles. He should then invoke my presence in the image (to be worshipped), perform the Nyāsa (assigning the various syllables of the Mantras to the part of its body) and then adore me that way.

25-26. After constructing mentally a throne¹ (seat) for me, and with the nine powers² attending upon it, he should conceive that there is (on the seat-cover designed over it) a shining lotus of eight petals beautified with a pericarp and filaments. With a view to secure success here and emancipation from samsāra hereafater, he should, according to Vedic and Tāntric procedure of worship, offer me water for washing feet (pāḍya), washing hands and rinsing the mouth.

27. He should duly worship in the serial order the discus the Sudarśana, the conch Pāñcajanya, the mace Kaumodaki, the sword Nandaka, the bow Śrīgā as well as the arms of Sankarṣana, viz. the plough and the pestle, in the eight quarters and the Kauśubha gem, the Vaijayanti garland and the śrīvatsa mark (all the three on the chest of the Lord in their respective places).

28. Similarly, he should worship the eight attendants (Pārśads) of the Lord, viz. Nanda, Sunanda, Pracānda, Caṇḍa as well as Mahābala, Bala, Kumuda and Kumudekaṇa,

---

1. ŚR. gives the following concept of this seat. It has Dharma or Righteousness, Jñāna or Knowledge, Vairāgya or Renunciation and Aśīvarya or Rulership as its legs in the South-east, South-west, North-west and North-east corners and the opposites of the above viz. Unrighteousness, Ignorance, Attachment and lack of rulership as its four sides and the three guṇas—Satya, Rajas and Tamas as the planks at the base.

2. ŚR. enumerates the following nine potencies of the Lord, Vimalā—purity, Utkarṣa—exalted state, Jñāna—Knowledge, Kriyā—activity, Yoga—Yogic Supernormal powers, Prahut—modesty, Satyā—truthfulness, Isāna—Sovereignty and Anugraha—Grace.
standing around the Lord in eight directions and Garuḍa facing Him in front.

29. He should also adore by the usual offering of water to wash hand, etc., Durgā, Vināyaka, the sage Vyāsa and Viṣvaksena (all these surrounding the Lord in the four corners), His own spiritual guide (standing to the left of the God), and the guardian deities of the eight quarters, each in his respective position, all of them facing the Lord.

30. If he can financially afford to do so, he should every day give me (and my attendants) bath with water fragrant with sandal paste, Uṣtra (a fragrant root of the plant Andropogon Muricatus), camphor, saffron and aloe-wood chanting all the while Mantras during the bath.

31. He should chant (while bathing the deity) the svanaghrāṇamūṇāka (the section of the Taittirīya Āranyaka beginning with the mantra: svanaghrāṇam ghrāṇam pariveda venam (T. A. 3. 11. 1a) the Mahāpuṣuṣa Vidyā, the Puruṣa sūkta (RV. X. 90) and texts of the Śāmaveda known as Rājān-sāma (and Rauhiṇa sāma).

32. My votary should lovingly decorate me appropriately with clothes, sacred thread, ornaments, decorative drawings on my body (on cheeks, chest, etc.), garlands of Tulasi leaves and sandal pigments.

33. My worshipper should offer to me with faith and reverence various articles (of worship) such as water for washing feet and rinsing the mouth (for sipping), sandal-paste, flowers, Akṣatas (grains of unbroken rice), scented fumes, light and articles of food.

34. If he can afford it financially, sugar and milk preparations, ghee and butter, cakes, pastes and sweet-meats,

1. It contains the following Mantra:
   jitaṁ te puṇḍarikākṣya namaste viśva-bhāvana
   Subrahmaṇya namaste'stu mahāpuṣuṣa-pūrvaja

2. It begins thus:
   Indraṁ naro nemadhitā havante
RV. 7.27.1a, TS. 1.6.12.1a, SV 1.318a
VJ. includes the recitation of Viṣṇu Sūkta, Samudra Sūkta, Pavamāna Sūkta in addition to the above.
porridge made of wheat flour with ghee and raw sugar, curds and soup of pulses should be offered to me.

35. Every day or (if that is not possible due to financial stringency) at least on holy days (like the eleventh day both in the bright and dark half of the month, etc.) or in the birthday celebrations of the incarnations of God, perfumed oil, paste of saffron and camphor (for massaging my body), a mirror (to show me my reflection), tooth brush for cleansing the teeth, bathing with pañcamṛtas or five articles like milk, curds, ghee, honey and sugar, to be finally washed clean with pure fresh water), sweet food for eating should be offered to me and music and dance should be presented on these days.

36. (To those who wish a higher type of fruit, worship of sacrificial fire is recommended as follows: A sacrificial receptacle sufficiently hollow in the middle prepared as per prescribed rules, in the earth along with three zone-like constructions and platforms around it be prepared and fire be deposited in it and when sufficiently kindled, he should collect it with his hand.

37-38. After spreading the Kuśa grass on all sides (as per usual procedure), he should sprinkle water on all the four sides of the receptacle of fire and after performing the procedure of Anvādhāna (depositing fuel¹ and other things in the sacred fire), the worshipper should contemplate me in the fire, as being brilliant in complexion like red-hot molten gold, with four beautiful arms equipped with a conch, a discus, a mace and a lotus, gracious and serene in appearance, clad in raiments of golden colour like pollens of a lotus flower.

39. (He should contemplate me as) adorned with a lustrous crown, with bracelets and a girdle and excellent armlets; with śrīvatsa mark on the chest, and shining Kaustubha gem (round the neck), and a garland of forest flowers (Vanamālā)

40. Having contemplated me (as such), he should offer the sacrificial sticks soaked in ghee into the fire. He should then pour into the fire two offerings of ghee specifically called Āghāra¹ and ājyabhāga² and should offer other oblations soaked in ghee.

1. The sacred fuel and articles to be offered are to be placed to the north of the fire. They are to be sprinkled with consecrated water taken in a spoon before offering them to the fire.

41. A wise person (knower of these technicalities) should pour the offerings into the fire, uttering the fundamental Mantra³ (Om namo Nārāyanāya) and some portion of the oblations with each of the sixteen verses of puruṣa sūkta. He should then give oblations (through the sacrificial fire) to Dharma and other gods according to the sequence given above (vide verse 25 above), uttering the name of the deity (in the Dative case and adding the word Svāhā every time. Finally, at the end of the sacrifice a thanks-giving oblation to fire with the Mantra Agnaye visṭakṛte svāhā is to be offered.

42. Having worshipped me and paying me obeisance, he should offer worship to the attendant deities (Nanda, Sunanda, etc.) muttering all the while the Mūla Mantra (Om namo Nārāyanāya) meditating on the Supreme Brahman, viz. Nārāyaṇa.

43. Having offered water for sipping, he should hand over the remnants to viśvakṣena. Then he should offer betel leaves containing spices and aromatic substances making the mouth sweet-smelling. He should conclude by mantra-puspa (showering flowers on me).

44. After singing and extolling my excellences, dancing before me, imitating my past lilās (sportive actions), recounting and listening to my stories, he should remain immersed in that blissful state for a while.

45. Eulogizing me by singing various hymns found in ancient texts as well as those in the current language (of the masses), he should lay himself prostrate before me with the prayer, "may you be propitious unto me, O Lord."

¹ In this, ghee is to be sprinkled across the sacrificial pit from the north to the south and vice versa, muttering the sacred formulae prajāpataye Svāhā, Indrāya Svāhā.
² Offering ghee to the sacrificial fire uttering the sacred formulas Agnaye Svāhā, Somāya Svāhā.
³ This being the Pāñcarātra Sādhanā, they won't use the mantra Om Namo Vāsudevāya, though some modern commentators do so.
46. Placing his head on my feet and clasping them (my feet) by both of his hands (he should pray) "protect me, O Lord. Afraid of the sea of saṃsāra full of alligators in the form of death, I have sought protection in you."

47. He should then reverentially place on his head some flowers, etc. from my worship as a gracious gift from me. If withdrawing of the spiritual light invoked in the image is necessary, he should contemplate that the divine light in the image is now withdrawn and merged in the Supreme Light in the lotus of his heart.

48. One may worship me at any time and in any form (image, picture, etc.), in which one entertains devout faith. For being the Soul (Inner Controller) of all I abide in all beings as well as in the Self of the worshipper.

49. He who worships in the manner described above, according to the course of active yoga as taught in the Vedas and the Tantras, receives from me accomplishments of his desired objectives, both here and hereafter.

50. After installing my image, he should get a fine durable temple or shrine built for it; (he should get) beautiful flower-gardens laid out for it, and establish foundations (or endowments) for the regular performance of my daily worship as well as for celebration of festivals and for pilgrimage.

51. He who makes formal grants of lands, markets, villages and towns for the perpetual continuation of my worship etc. every day as well as on specially sacred or festive occasions, attains to that divine state in which he can enjoy lordly blessings similar to mine.

52. By installing my image, one attains the sovereignty of the entire globe (in future); by building a temple or a shrine, he is sure to get dominion over the three worlds; by performing worship and rendering other services, he can attain to the region of god Brahmā. But he who serves me in all the above-mentioned three ways, attains a state of (blissful) equality with me.

53. A person who follows the path of disinterested devotion to me, directly attains to me only. He who worships me in the manner described above, is blessed with the Bhakti Yoga (the path of real devotion to me).
54. He who confiscates the endowment founded either by himself or by others for the sake of the deity or Brâhmaṇas, is destined to be born as a feces-eating worm for ten crores of years.

55. Whatever fruit is destined for the actual agent of a deed, awaits also his colleague, his director or the appreciator of it, as all these are the collaborators in that act. And in the next world, everyone of them shares the reward or retribution in proportion to their contribution to that deed.

CHAPTER TWENTYEIGHT

The Essence of the Path of Knowledge

(Jñāna Yoga)

The glorious Lord said:

1.* Realizing that the universe—a product of Prakṛti (Primordial Nature) and Puruṣa (Spirit) is nothing but one substance (viz. the Brahmā), a person should neither praise nor censure the serene or violent nature and action of others.

*SS and VR: (i) One should realize that the Lord (i.e. my-self) is the Inner Controller. VR adds: The universe is the body of the Supreme Soul (me). One should realize that the universe consists of the sentient (eit), non-sentient (acid) and Īśvara.

(ii) VJ. interprets para as the opponent who fails to see the difference between the Brahmā and Īśvā. (paraḥ Śatrūḥ, Īśvā-Brahmanor vailakṣaṇya-satyatāyā asahamānatāt). The actions of such an enemy (an advaitin) are evil and should not be applauded but censured! (What a gospel of hatred in the name of the Lord!

VJ. adds: One who perceives that the universe along with the non-sentient Prakṛti and Hiranyagarbha (Puruṣa) is pervaded by the Supreme Soul (Paramātmā) and is the real knower.

(iii) Ek. holds the eit-vilāsa-vāda about the universe due to the influence of Jñānānte or Kāśmirī Saivism.
2. He who applauds or condemns the natural inclinations and corresponding actions of others, immediately deviates from his own purpose (of attaining spiritual wisdom) as he, thereby, develops attachment to what is not real.

3. When the sense-organs which are the product of the Taijasa type of ego (caused by Rajas) are over-powered with sleep (and cease to function), the individual soul (jiva) remaining confined in the body, strays in the realm of illusions (Māyā) and witnesses dreams (which are unreal), and if the mind is still over come with torpidity, loses the consciousness of the body, sinks into death-like deep sleep. Similarly, the person who perceives the outward differences only (and fails to grasp the underlying oneness—the Reality) is distracted by illusory objects of senses and is ultimately sunk in utter darkness.

4.* When the quality itself is unreal, the problem of what is auspicious (or commendable) or inauspicious (or censurable) that too to what extent, does not arise at all; for whatever is uttered by the tongue (i.e. perceived by our sense-organs) or conceived by the mind is illusory and unreal.

5. Even though the reflection of an image or the reflection of a sound, ocular illusions like a mirage are unreal (and unsubstantial), they do create an effect (on the mind of the seer or hearer). In the same way, this body or other things arouse fear till death (till every thing is dissolved into Prakṛti.)

6. It is only the Almighty Supreme Soul who creates this universe and is both the creator and the created, the protector and protected. Being the universal Soul, he is the withdrawer and the withdrawn. (He is thus both the material and instrumental cause of the universe).

*(i) VR: The Soul is different from the body and it is wrong to identify them. The body is ever-changing (but the Soul is the same). There is no propriety in praising the body of a celestial as good or condemning the body of an insect as bad, as they are the modifications of the same Prakṛti and the body is not the Soul or Ātman.

 VJ. Being the almighty Lord, the creator etc. of the universe he creates himself into various forms, sustains them (or lives with other created beings) and withdraws them at will. The universe is thus real and not Māyā—illusory (Satya-sankalpaṇa satya-karmaṇa paramēvaiva pravṛtti śrīśatvaḥ idam sarvaṁ satyam na mithyābhūtam)
7. Hence, no being or reality other than the Supreme Soul existing independently out of the created universe, has been observed or stated (by the Vedas). The three-fold appearance of creation, sustenance and destruction of things\(^1\) in the \(\text{Atman}\) is baseless\(^2\). Thenceforth, do understand that this threefold universe (consisting of the seen and the process of seeing) is the product of g\(\text{unas}\) and is caused by M\(\text{aya}\).

8. He who understands thoroughly this \(\text{J\=n\=ana}\) and \(\text{Vij\=n\=ana}\) as expounded by me, does neither deprecate nor praise others but moves about in the world (far above partiality or duality) like the Sun.

9. Concluding through logical proofs like direct perception, inference, scriptural authority and self-realization that every thing (including the universe) which has a beginning has an end, a person should move about in the world shedding off attachment to everything.

\textit{Uddhava said}:

10. (As you say it) the \(\text{Sams\=ara}\) (the transmigration or experience of pleasure and pain) is related neither to the Soul who is the intelligent self-luminous seer nor to the body which is the seen (or the object, an unintelligent non-self). The fact of the matter is that the transmigration does take place. (Be pleased to explain) to whom \(\text{Sams\=ara}\) is related.

11. The soul is not subject to decay, attributeless, pure, self-luminous like fire and is unobscured by anything (such as Nescience), while the physical body is non-sentient like wood. Now which of these two are affected by \(\text{Sams\=ara}\) (the cycle of births and deaths)?

\textit{The Lord replied}:

12. So long as there is a contact between the indiscriminate \(j\text{iva}\) and the body, senses and vital breath, \(\text{Sams\=ara}\), though it has no reality, continues to bear fruit (by giving pleasure, pain, etc.)

---

1. \(\text{or the \'adhibhautika, \'adhidaivika and \'adhy\=atmika universe—SR.}\)
2. \(\text{The notion that Param\=atm\=a is the \'Seman\=dy\=st, the \'Aseman\=dy\=st or the Nimitta _cause is baseless. The Brahman is the material cause of the universe—VR.}\)
13. Just as (due to brooding over objects in the wakeful condition) a person in dream experiences pleasure or pain or witnesses objects which have no real existence, this samsāra, though non-existent in reality, does not cease to persist in the case of a jīva who constantly thinks over objects of senses.

14.* Just as the state of dreaming brings a number of (unreal yet) evil experiences to a person who has not wakened up from sleep, but that very dream is not capable of deluding a person when wide awake.

15. (Feelings and moods like) grief, joy, fear, anger, greed, delusion, cravings and others as well as the states of birth and death, are seen related to (a jīva due to his involvement with) Ahamkāra (‘I’-ness), but not to the Ātman.

16. The soul who is presiding over the body, senses, vital airs and the mind, identifies himself with them and abides in them, is called jīva. His subtle body is constituted of guṇas (like Sattva etc.), and (residual impressions left after performing) Karmas or actions. He is variously sung (i.e. designated) as Śūtra or Mahat. Being controlled by Time-Spirit (or Īśvara), he revolves in the cycle of life and death (Samsāra).

17. Having cut off the sword of spiritual knowledge sharpened by means of contemplation, this baseless, apparent multiplicity of forms like the mind, speech, vital breath and

---

* VR : When the spiritual knowledge enlightens a person, he ceases to identify his body with the Soul and has no attachment (tad dehātmābhīmāna-rūpa-mahā-janana-dvārā sukha-duḥkha-krś na bhavati /

EK : When the infinite Ātman, transcendental to Māyā, becomes the basis of Māyā, he is called Antarātmā. He pervades the Māyā and still remains infinite. He is hence called Paramā Śūtra. As he is the controller of the Māyā, he is called Īśvara, the Ruler. When the Ātman is reflected in Nescience (Avidyā), he is called jīva (individual Soul), with a powerful feeling of his identification with the body, he became Ahamkāra (Ego) In this way, EK describes how the Ātman transformed himself into Mind, the ten sense-organs, the subtle body and its cause, viz. the three guṇas, the objects of enjoyment, śūtra Prakṛti and its agitator, the Time-spirit. Hence the Ātman is in every object. After describing in details how every object is constituted of Ātman, EK concludes that ‘Bondage’ (of samsāra) consists in identification of the Soul with the body and the realisation that the Ātman is unrelated to the body, is called Liberation (Mokṣa).

the body—all unsubstantial (yet variously manifested unrealities), the sage should rove all over the world, without ever being subject to desires and temptations.

18. Spiritual wisdom consists of discrimination between what is eternal (The Brahman) and what is non-eternal. The means to attain it are the study of the Vedas, penance (i.e. abiding by the duties prescribed for one’s Varna and Asrama), direct (personal) experience, tradition or spiritual guidance from the preceptor and logical inference. This wisdom convinces that the absolute entity (viz. Brahman) that was at the beginning of the universe, and remains after the destruction of the universe, exists in the middle also and it (the Brahma) manifests the universe as well as is the cause of it.

19. Just as gold bullion before it is wrought into beautiful forms exists as gold before as well as after its modifications (as ornaments, coins or other decoratives), and is the same gold even in the middle when it is called by different names (as bangles, ear-rings, etc.) similarly, I exist before the creation and after the dissolution of the universe and I am given different designations in the middle, (while the universe exists as such. Thus the universe is not separate from me).

20.* O Uddhava! From the point of both invariable concomitance and logical discontinuance, the Brahma is real. It is the fourth principle beyond the mind (vijnana) which is subject to three states (viz., wakefulness, dream-state and sleep) caused by three gunas (viz. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas) which create the three-fold universe comprising the cause i.e. the sense-organs (Adhyatma) the Effect i.e. the elements (Adhivâta) and the doer i.e. the presiding deities over the senses (Adhidiva). He (the Brahma) reveals triads and persists when the above-mentioned threefold distinctness ceases to appear as when a person is merged in Samâdhi (transcendental meditation).

21. That which did not exist before the creation and does not survive after it, has no existence in the middle period.

* VJ: This Brahman is vijnana. It leads the jiva to three different destinations (Liberation, Samsara and hell). Being beyond the realm of the triads (of states, gunas, etc.) the Paramatman exists eternally independent. except merely in name. This body which was not Ātman either before it came into existence or after its death, cannot be Ātman while the body exists. That by which anything is caused is the same as the effect that is manifested. (The effect of that which is revealed is impossible without the cause or the revealer. That is my considered opinion in the matter.

22. Though this universe of modifications appears to exist, it is non-existent. It is the modificatory creation (of Brahma) through Rajoguṇa (and as such it is a product or effect which is revealed). But the Brahman is self-existent (not a product of anything but the cause of everything else), and is self-luminous (self-revealed yet the revealer of others). Hence, it is Brahman alone which shines manifested as the diverse wonderful universe consisting of the senses, the objects of senses (viz. subtle elements), the mind (including the deities presiding over the senses) and the gross elements.

23. Having completely dispelled (lit. cut off) all doubts regarding the nature of the Ātman by convincing proofs (such as scriptural authority, tradition, direct experience, etc.) of correctly discriminating the Brahman and by discarding the notion that the non-Ātman (viz. the body or the universe) the Ātman, as also through the grace of the preceptor of deep spiritual knowledge, a person should stay immersed in the Supreme bliss of the Self dissociating himself from all the cravings of the senses for enjoyment.

24. The Soul is (distinct and different from and hence) not the physical body of earth. Nor is he the senses (which are instruments), their presiding deities (who are the modifications of Prakṛti), the vital breath, elements like the ether, air, water, fire and the earth; nor is he the mind, intellect, the reason and the ego, as they depend on food (for nourishment). He is

1. vacāranibhaṇam vikāro nāmadheyam | —Chāndogya Up. 6.1.4.

2. tam eva bhānant anubhāti sarvam |
   tasya bhāsā sarvam idam vibhāti ||
   —Katha 5.15.
   Śvetāśvatara 6.14
   Muṇḍaka 2.2.16

3. VR. This word connotes the transcendental Supreme Brahman but the term Brahma in the last foot—Brahmendriyārtha, etc. is used in the sense of Prakṛti.
also not the object of senses and Prakṛti which is the state of equilibrium of guṇas (as they are non-sentient).

25. What benefit can accrue to my devotee who has properly realized my nature by correct discrimination, by control of his senses which are the products of three guṇas? Or what blemish is there to him if the senses get distracted? What effect can there be on the sun if clouds surrounded it or disperse from it?

26. Just as the sky is not affected by the (drying, burning, drenching, and soiling powers of) wind, fire, water and the earth, nor by the (heat, cold, etc.) of the coming and passing of seasons, in the same way, Brahman which is eternal (indestructible) and transcendental to the (cosmic) ego⁴ is never soiled by the dirt of Sattva, Rajas and Tamas which are the causes of Samāsāra.

27. However, so long as Rajoguṇa which soils the mind with attachment to sense-objects is not completely wiped out, all associations with the objects (senses) created by Māyā should be scrupulously avoided by the yoga of intense and unswerving devotion to me.

28. Just as a disease which is not properly treated medically, annoys patients by its frequent virulent recurrence, the mind of an imperfect Yogi whose passions and the karmas resulting therefrom have not been completely burnt down, becomes passionately attached to every thing (objects of senses, property, relatives, etc.) and brings about the fall of a Yogi who has not attained perfection.

29. Yogins who are frustrated in the attainment of their goal by interruptions created by god, men or other beings (or by the adhibhūta, adhidaiva and adhyātma types of difficulties) (and die in an imperfect stage) again take to the path of Yoga (in the next birth) by virtue of their Yogic practice in the previous existence, but never turn to the elaborate path of Karma.

30. An ignorant person being impelled by some power (may be God’s will or his previous Karma or destiny) performs

* VJ. thinks that this verse applies to Hari and not to his devotees.

1. VR.: The Ātman which is expressed by the word ‘I’.

(aham-sabda-sagyam ātman-varam-apī)
some acts (e.g. taking meals) till his death and undergoes modifications (such as experience of pleasure or pain). A spiritually wise person though living in the domain of Prakṛti or Māyā is thus subject to it, but he is free from the cravings of his senses as he has experience of the spiritual bliss of the Soul.

31. (Here is the description of ‘asamprajñāta samādhi’). He whose mind is concentrated on and established in the Self-Atman is unaware of his body irrespective of whether it is standing, sitting, walking, strolling, lying down, passing urine, eating food or doing any other natural activity.

32. Even if a man of spiritual wisdom happens to perceive the unreal objects of extraverted senses (like those experienced by touch, taste, smell, etc.), due to their many-ness, he reasons that they are other than the self and he, therefore, does not regard them as real like a person who has risen from sleep regards the objects of his vanishing dream.

33. Dear Uddhava! Before the dawn of spiritual knowledge, this body marvellously wrought by (three guṇas) and karmas was regarded as not distinct from the self (due to absence of discriminating power). But this (misconception of the identity of the soul and the body during the state of bondage) is dispelled by spiritual knowledge; for the soul is neither taken (perceived) nor forsaken!

34. Just as the sun-rise would disperse from the eyes of men darkness (that obscured their vision) but does not create a new thing (like a pitcher, etc.) which was not there, similarly a thorough discriminative realization of the self dispels the darkness of ignorance blinding the intelligence of man.

35. This (ever-present eternal) Soul is self-luminous (absolutely unsoiled by ignorance), unborn, immeasurable (beyond the ken of logical reasoning), unlimited by time and space (hence not subject to modifications of growth, decay, etc.) self-luminous (capable of cognising every thing), one without a sec-

1 SS and VR : The Soul is not apprehended as the physical body (saying ‘I am fat’ etc.) nor is subject to creation and destruction (sarga-

-saṁkhāra-di-bhāk)
ond, beyond the range of words. It is when impelled by it that the speech and life-breath function.¹

36. But it is self-delusion to entertain the notion of difference in the Soul who is absolute. For even this delusion about difference² (has to depend on the Soul) as it has no other support than the Soul³.

37. It is the view of some persons who regard themselves as learned that duality in what is perceptible by names and forms (i.e. this body and the external world) and in what is constituted of five elements, is irrefutable and the statements in (texts of) Vedânta are merely complimentary (artha-vâda). But this conviction (of the so-called learned people) is meaningless⁴.

38. If a yogin who has not yet attained perfection in Yoga (lit. is yet unripe in yogic practices) but is still striving in yoga, be visited by (some such difficulties (as bodily indisposition, etc.) the following procedure is prescribed (as a remedy).

39. He should cure some of these (viz. troubles from heat and cold) by yogic concentration (on the moon and the sun), some (caused by flatulence and other abdominal troubles) by various (yogic) physical postures, and some others (caused by evil planets, serpents, etc.) by penance, mantras (sacred formula) and medicinal herbs.

40. He should overcome some obstacles (caused by lust and anger) by intensively meditating on me. by singing my name and glorifying me while others (caused by hypocrisy and arrogance) leading to evil consequences by attending upon persons who are past-masters in yoga.

41. Some persons try to keep their body in sound health and preserve their youth by various expedients and then they begin the yogic practice for attaining miraculous powers.

1. Kena Up. 1

2. viz. the difference with reference to the body and its condition —VR.

3. neha nandati kiścāna—

4. VR. regards the above views of the self-conceited as delusion of the mind.
42. But this cause should not be approved (and adopted) by the wise, as, after all, the physical body is perishable like fruits of a tree (and these efforts are in vain).

43. Even if the body of a person who takes yogic exercises every day becomes exceptionally strong (and lasting to the end of a Kalpa), he should not give much importance to it believing it to be imperishable. He should discontinue that yoga of physical culture and devote himself to me.

44. If a yogi entirely entrusts himself to me and devotes himself scrupulously to the practice of yoga (as detailed by me), he may not be hindered by obstacles. Becoming totally free from all desires and yearnings, he should enjoy himself thoroughly immersed in the bliss of self-realization.

CHAPTER TWENTYNINE

_Bhakti Yoga Recapitulated:

Departure of Uddhava to Badarikāśrama

_Uddhava submitted:

1. O Imperishable Lord! It is my considered opinion that the course of yoga as enunciated by you is impracticable to those who have no control over their minds. Pray, be pleased to elucidate to me (in easily understandable terms) that spiritual path by following which an ordinary person will attain perfection without any difficulty.

2. Aspirants after yoga who endeavour to concentrate their minds are subjected to great strains in controlling their mind, and feeling fatigued and frustrated in attaining mental serenity, they become despondent, O lotus-eyed God.

3. Hence, O Lotus-eyed Lord of the universe, swans i.e. those who can discriminate between what is essential and unessential (i.e. your devotees) joyfully resort to your lotus-feet which yield nectarlike spiritual bliss but these arrogant followers of the karma and yoga path devoid of your Bhakti—do not resort to them as they are confounded by your Māyā.

4. What wonder is there, O Imperishable Lord, that you abide by the will of your servants who have dedicated themselves exclusively to you? Even though your foot-stool gets polished with the crests of the glorious crowns of great rulers like god Brahmā and other rulers of the world (while they prostrated themselves at your feet), you took delight in the friendship of beasts (monkeys like Sugrīva, Hanumān), O friend of all living beings.

5. What person who is grateful and conscious of the gracious blessings bestowed by you upon your dependants (devotees who resort to you) can forsake you, the Inner Controller, beloved-most and Ruler of all beings? What person will accept something other than you which, though leading to good fortune, make us forget about you? (or who would worship some other god for securing great fortune or celestial world?) What object is inaccessible to us who devote ourselves to the dust of your feet?

6. O Ruler of the universe! Wise persons who gratefully remember your gracious favours and are full of spiritual bliss, realize that they cannot repay your obligations even during the longest span of life like that of god Brahmā; for you are present externally as the spiritual guide and internally as the Antar-āmin (the Inner Controller) and thus you dispel all inauspiciousness (sins, evil desires) of all creatures and manifest your true nature to them.

Sri Suka said:

7. When respectfully inquired thus by Uddhava who was deeply affectionate to him at heart, Lord Kṛṣṇa whose sport is the evolution of the universe, and who, by his potencies viz. Sattra, Rajas and Tamas, has assumed three forms (viz. that of Viṣṇu, Brahmā and Śiva respectively) and is the Supreme Lord of the rulers of the universe, with a winsome smile replied affectionately to him.
The Lord said:

8. It is with pleasure that I shall explain to you the course of righteous duties which are exceedingly auspicious and pleasing to me. By following them with devotion, a mortal being can overcome the unconquerable death (Samsāra).

9. Remembering me diligently, one should perform all his duties dedicating them to me. He should resign and concentrate his heart and mind to me and should find delight in doing duties pertaining to me.

10. He should resort to the holy lands (and sacred places) frequented by my saintly devotees, and he should follow the course of conduct of my devotees whether they be gods, Asuras or human beings.

11. Either individually or in a group he should arrange to celebrate, on holy days (like Ekādaśī) pilgrimages, processions or great festivities accompanied with songs, dances and other royal arrangements worthy of great kings.

12. He should consider that he visualizes me only, manifested in all beings, both internally and externally, like the sky. With a pure, sinless heart he should see me within himself also.

13-14. In this way, O greatly enlightened Uddhava, he should establish himself in pure knowledge and should consider all created beings as being the God himself and respect them all. He who looks with an equal eye (without making any difference in) Brāhmaṇas and low caste peoples, a robber and one devoted to Brāhmaṇas, the sun and the spark of fire, a cruel and merciful person, (such impartial person) is really the spiritually wise person.

15. A person who invariably considers me to be present in all human beings, finds that before he is free from the (feeling of) inimical competition (with the equals), jealousy (against superiors) and contempt (towards the inferiors) along with his egotism.

16. Disregarding one's friends and relatives who smile at him in ridicule and setting aside the viewpoint (about the superiority) of one's person and giving up the sense of shame, should prostrate himself like a staff in bowing to all beings upto a dog, a Cāndāla (a man of the lowest caste) a cow and a donkey."

17. He should continue to propitiate me orally, mentally and physically in this manner, so long as the perception of my presence in all beings is not engendered in him.

18. To him everything appears as permeated with Brahman by virtue of his knowledge that God is everywhere. Realizing this clearly and with all his doubts clarified, he should cease to participate in Karmas (or follow the path of Karma).

19. It is my considered opinion that out of all the pathways to God, to perceive my presence in all beings in one's thought, word and deeds is the most efficacious one.

20. Dear Uddhava! Even if merely a beginning is made, there is no danger of the slightest loss (of the exertions made) in the righteous course of conduct prescribed by me, as it is free from wishful expectation, and it has been so systematically ordained by me as it would not be affected by guṇas. (It is not the ordinary Dharma laid down by Smṛti-writers like Manu).

21.* Whatever fruitless exertion of a worldly nature such as fleeing out of fear, lamenting out of grief, etc., if dedicated to me who am of transcendental nature, attains the status of Dharma (as in the case of Karhṣa's fear, Gopi's love, Śīṣupāla's hatred).

22. That one should attain to the Real through the unreal (body) and reach me, the immortal eternal Lord, by means of this mortal coil—This is the most intelligent act of an intellectual and the highest sagacity of the wise.

23. What has been expounded to you up till now by me either in details or in brief, constitutes the complete epitome of the definitive teaching on Para Brahman. This is difficult to grasp even for gods (though they are sāttvic by nature).

1. Strangely enough VJ. distinguishes between Brāhmaṇas and others in the list and lays down that one should physically lay prostrate before Brāhmaṇas but in the case of Cāndālas and others he should bow mentally only. (Brāhmaṇadīn prati bhāman daśgavam naman arṣtiślokaḥ pādaḥ prati manasāśmarapam iti bhedāḥ)

* VJ. Acts of devotion, worship, contemplation on other deities is a fruitless exertion (taddāyas tatra kriyāndīpa-prayaścīto nirarthaḥ eva)

24. This spiritual knowledge has been repeatedly imparted to you with clear logical reasoning. A person who digests this will get all his doubts resolved and will be liberated from Sānśṭra.

25. He who will treasure up in his memory my lucid, well-reasoned exposition of your queries, will attain to the eternal Supreme Brahman which is the secret (knowledge) of the Vedas.

26. I, of my own accord, will reveal myself to the expositor of the Brahman who would clearly explain this knowledge to my devotees.

27. He who would loudly read out this sanctifying, supremely holy text (containing my teaching), will every day make others see me by the light of spiritual wisdom, and will himself get purified (by realizing me in his mind purified by Yoga⁰).

28. He who devoutly and with concentrated mind listens to this every day and develops supreme devotion unto me, is never bound by Karmas.

29. O friend, have you fully realized the true nature of Brahman? Has your infatuation and the grief that tormented your heart disappeared, dear friend?

30. This knowledge should not be imparted to a hypocrite, a nonbeliever, a cheat, an unwilling listener, a person who is not devoted to me or an ill-mannered fellow.

31. You should expound this to persons who are free from the above-mentioned defects, are friendly to Brāhmaṇas and (reciprocally) liked by them. You should teach this to those who are pious, holy and to Śūdras and women if they are devoted.

32. Once this spiritual wisdom is properly imbued, nothing remains to be known by the aspirant of (spiritual) knowledge, just as nothing remains worth drinking when once the exquisitely sweet nectar is sipped.

33. (There may be many things worth knowing and means of achieving object in the case of non-devotees, but I am

¹. yoga-parituddhama manassë sakti-kuloṣṭhitii bhavaḥ—VR everything to my devotee. Hence you seek resort in me alone.)

Whatever objectives or purposes are accomplished by means of (spiritual)knowledge, performance of righteous duties, yogic practices, pursuit of commerce and agriculture, and wielding ruling power—that is all the main four objectives in life (or Purusārthas), I myself am to you¹.

34. When a mortal being has renounced all courses of actions (prescribed in Śāstras) and has dedicated his self to me, I select him as the receptient of my Special Grace. He then, attains immortality and certainly becomes eligible to be one with me sharing my divine powers of omnipresence, omnipotence, etc.

Śri Śuka said:

35. Having heard the speech of the Lord of hallowing renown, Uddhava, to whom the path of Yoga (union with the Almighty Lord) was thus lucidly explained, folded his palms (in reverence) and with his eyes overflowing with tears of joy and throat choked with overwhelming affection, he was unable to express himself.

36. With courageous efforts, he controlled and stabilised his mind which was agitated with overwhelming affection. Feeling (with gratitude) how blessed he was (by the Lord), he folded his palms (to pay obeisance) and touching His lotus-feet with his head, he submitted to the most prominent hero among Yadus, as follows:

37. “The pitchy darkness of delusion clasped by me so far, has been dispelled by your mere enlightening presence (what need be said about your illuminating discourses?) O creator of god Brahmā, can cold, darkness or fear (of any of these) overpower a person who is sitting adjacent to the fire (or the sun).

38. (Your compassion is limitless). Compassionate as you are, the brilliant lamp of spiritual wisdom has been given to me again. What grateful person would like to abandon the soles of your feet and resort to others for shelter.

¹. ŚR attempts to explain how each of the four purusārthas are covered by the activities mentioned in this Śloka.

39. The strong bonds of (the net of) my affection for (my clansmen like) Dāśārhas, Vṛṣṇis, Andhakas and Sāttvatas which were extended by you through (the agency of) your Māyā, for the expansion (procreation) of our race, have been cut asunder by you with the weapon of self-realization.

40. Obeisance to you, great yogin. I have approached you for protection. Be pleased to so guide me as I should find incessant joy from and affection for your lotus-feet."

_The Lord Commanded:_

41-42. Dear Uddhava! In compliance of my command, do you go to my hermitage called Badarī. Absolve yourself of all impurities there, by performing ablutions and sipping the holy waters of the sacred Gaṅgā which became sanctified by contact with my feet. Having shaken off all your sins and impurities by the very sight of the Alakanandā¹ put on bark garments and subsisting on forest-products (like fruits, roots), stay on unaffected by any longing for pleasures and comforts, my dear.

43-44. Forbearing all experiences of opposite states (like heat and cold, pleasure and pain) continue to be straightforward and good in your behaviour. With your senses under control, serene and with your intellect (mind) concentrated on your Ātman, remain endowed with spiritual knowledge and self-realization. Pondering deeply and constantly and realizing whatever you have so assiduously learnt from me, you dedicate your mind and speech to me and continue to constantly abide by the duties prescribed by me. (If you do so) you will transcend the three courses (of existence caused by three _gunas—Satvā, Rajas and Tamas, viz. birth in the heaven and on the earth as a human being or a sub-human being or the three states of wakefulness, dreaming and deep sleep) and shall attain to me (who am beyond Maya).

1. A tributary of the Gaṅgā. Its source is traced by Captain Raper a little way beyond Badrināth at a waterfall called Vasudhārā (Śkanda P. Viṣṇu Khanda III. 6).

—GADMI, P.3.

Srī Śuka narrated:

45. Thus commanded by Lord Kṛṣṇa (devotion to whom terminates Samsāra), Uddhava circumambulated him by the right and placed his head on his feet. And even though he transcended the pairs of opposites like joy and sorrow, his heart melted (at the juncture of departure) and he moistened his feet with tears.

46. Nervous and afraid at the imminent separation from the Lord whose affection was extremely difficult to give up, and too much grieved to be able to leave him, Uddhava was deeply agonised. Bearing on his head the wooden sandals (given out of grace as a parting gift) of Lord Kṛṣṇa, Uddhava bowed to him again and again and proceeded to Badarikāśrama.

47. Firmly installing him on the throne of his inmost heart, the great devotee of the Lord reached Viśāla (i.e. Badarikāśrama). Scrupulously following the course of (devotional) duties taught by Kṛṣṇa, the one Friend of the world, Uddhava ultimately attained to his state.

47A. (The 2nd line in VJ'S Text)

Having practised penance as instructed by the (only real) Friend of the universe, he attained to Vaikuṇṭha, the region of Hari.

48. Whosoever tastes with deep reverence even so little of this nectar of spiritual knowledge overfull with the ocean of spiritual bliss, taught to his devotee Uddhava by Lord Kṛṣṇa, whose feet are resorted to and served by the masters of Yoga—he gets Final Emancipation from Samsāra along with the world (the people) who associated themselves with him.

49. I bow to the Supreme Person, designated as Kṛṣṇa, the First cause of the universe, the Author of the Vedas, who

1. In order to reconcile this with Skandha III where Maitreya and Uddhava were given spiritual guidance by Kṛṣṇa, SR states that while on his way to Badari, Uddhava heard of Kṛṣṇa's going to Prabhāsa. He hastily returned and found him sitting alone. Maitreya also came there, Kṛṣṇa gave them spiritual guidance. But Skandha XI is silent about Uddhava's return.
in order to terminate the Samsāra (transmigration of the Soul) of his devotees following the path of renunciation (nivṛtti), and to dispel the fear of old age, death, etc. of his servants following the path of Pravṛtti, extracted like bee the (honey-like) essence of the Vedas in the form of spiritual knowledge and self-realization and gave it to his devotees (following Nivṛtti Mārga) and offered the immortalizing nectar churned out of the sea to his servants (such as gods for drinking).

CHAPTER THIRTY

Extermination of the Race of Yādavas

The King (Parīksit) enquired:

1. When Uddhava, a great votary of the Lord, repaired to the forest (at Badarikāśrama), what did the glorious Lord, the creator of all beings, do at Dvārakā?

2-3. When his own race was threatened with annihilation by the curse of Brāhmaṇapās, how did the Lord of Yādavas cast off his body which was beloved-most to the eyes of all. His personality, so charming that women, having but once looked at it, could not take away their eyes from it; which having once entered into the ears of the saintly persons gets (as if) inscribed in their heart and never leaves it (i.e. is never forgotten by them,): Whose glorious splendour when extolled by poets, brings special charms to their words and enhances respect for them; having seen that form occupying the (charioteer’s) seat in Arjuna’s chariot, the warriors who were slain in the (battle at Kurukṣetra) in his presence, attained a form similar to him.

* This is merely a summary of the internecine feud among Yādavas. A blow-by-blow account of the fight is given in the Mausala Parva of the MBH. It appears more reliable as there we find the dead bodies of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa traced and duly cremated (MBH, Mausala 7.31), Kṛṣṇa did not go physically to the next world as the Bh. P. wants us to believe in this chapter.
The sage Śrī Śuka replied:

4. Noticing terrible portents appearing in the sky, on the earth and in the mid-air, Kṛṣṇa addressed the Yādavas who were seated in the assembly hall called ‘Sudharmā’, as follows:

5. “O foremost of Yādavas! These terrible portents of a serious nature like unto the flags of the god of Death (Yama) are appearing in Dvārakā. We should not tarry here even for a short while.

6. Let women, children and old people go from this place to Šaṅkhoddhāra. We shall go to the holy place Prabhāsa where the Sarasvatī flows to the west.

7. We shall take our bath there, observe a fast and serenely meditate. We shall also worship our deities with ablutions and application of sandal-paste and offering other articles of worship.

8. Having received the benediction (of Brāhmaṇas) by the recitation of sacred Mantras and performance of expiatory rites, we shall worship them with gifts of cows, land, gold, cloths, elephants, horses, chariots and houses.

9. For this is the surest procedure to avert evil and the best means of ensuring auspiciousness. Worship of gods, Brāhmaṇas and cows definitely brings prosperity to beings both here and hereafter.”

10. All the (council of) elder Yadus attentively listened to this advice of Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of demon Madhu. They agreed with his proposal, ferried across the sea in boats and drove to Prabhāsa in their chariots.

11. At Prabhāsa, as per instructions of the Lord, whom they regarded as their deity, the Yādavas performed with great faith and devotion, all the rites conducive to their prosperity.

1. The island of Bati (Beyt) at the north-western extremity of the gulf of Cutch. Viṣṇu is said to have killed Šaṅkhāṣura and recovered the Vedas from him here. GDAMI, P. 177.
2. Somanath or Deva paṭṭana near Veraval in Saurashtra.
3. Now called Raumākti. On the bank of this river under an aspen tree, Kṛṣṇa passed away—GDAMI, P. 181.
12. At that very sacred place, as Fate would have it, Yādavas lost their judgement and drank the highly intoxicating sweet beverage, a liquor called Maireyaka by the filtrates of which the reasoning faculty is completely lost.

13. There broke out a bitter conflict between the proud and haughty warriors who were dead drunk with a strong liquor and were deluded by the Māyā of Kṛṣṇa.

14. Infuriated with rage, those desperadoes fought each other with bows, swords, spears, maces, iron clubs, and lances on the sea-shore.

15. Confronting each other in their chariots, elephants etc. decked with banners flowing in the air, and riding on donkeys, camels, bulls, buffaloes, mules and human beings (slaves), the highly intoxicated Yādava warriors struck one another with arrows even as wild elephants dash against each other with their tusks.

16. With increasing intense hostility while fighting, there were duels between Pradyumna and Sāmba, Akrūra and Bhoja, Aniruddha and Sātyaki, Subhadra and Saṅgrāmājī, terrible (uncle and cousin) of the (same) name Gada (one being the brother and the other a son of Kṛṣṇa), Sumitra and Suratha as combatants.

17. While others like Niśatha, Ulmuka and others the chief of whom were Sahasrajit, Śatajīt and Bhanu became blind with intoxication and deluded by (the Māyā of) Lord Kṛṣṇa, challenged each other and meeting at close quarters struck each other mercilessly.

18. Forgetting their mutual friendly relations, all the clans of Yādavas such as Dāśārhas, Vṛṣṇa, Andhakas, Bhojas,

1. SKD III., P. 786 gives the following ingredients of this wine:

   Stidhr asurasaiḥ pakvair apakvair āsavo bhavat /
   maireyam dhātakī-puspan guḍa-dhānānmasanhitam ||

   I could not trace this verse in Mādhava-nidāna if by ‘Mādhava’ that work is indicated in SKD. From its name it (the liquor) appears to be a stimulant.

2. The MBH describes how Yuyudhāna’s criticism of Kṛtvarmā’s dastardly attack on the sleeping Pāṇḍava army, sparked off the struggle. The whole report (MBH Mawal 3.1766) reads like an account by an eye-witness.
Sātvatas, Madhus, Arbudas, Māthura and Śūrasenas, the Visarjanas, the Kukuras and the Kuntis (out of them some were domiciled in countries like Arbuda, Mathura, and Śūrasena) fought with one another.

19. Sons fought with fathers, brothers with brothers, maternal uncles with their sister’s sons, nephews with uncles, friends with friends, well-wishers with well-wishers and clansmen with clansmen, as all of them were stupefied and deluded (by Hari’s Māyā).

20. (After a time) when the (stocks of) arrows was being exhausted and bows (which they used like sticks) got broken and their weaponry was finished, they (pulled out and) clenched into fists the Īraka grass (that grew abundantly on the shore) as weapons.

21. And lo! The Īraka grass when held by them in their fists, became adamant like hard iron-bars with which they struck their adversaries. When forbidden by Kṛṣṇa, they (turned against him and) attacked him.

22. O king! Being infatuated they looked upon (kṛṣṇa) and Balarāma as their enemies. Those desperadoes determined to kill them and attacked them, O king.

23. At this, they (Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) on their part became enraged, O Parīkṣit (scion of the Kuru race). They uprooted a handful of Īraka grass which (automatically was transformed into iron bars wherewith they struck back and moved about in the battle, killing (Yādavas with their iron clubs).

24. The wrath intensified with jealousy of Yādavas who were bedevilled by Brahmanical curse and whose minds were completely perverted by Kṛṣṇa’s deluding potency which wrought their complete annihilation even as fire sparked off by friction of bamboos, reduces the whole forest to ashes.

25. When all clansmen belonging to his race were thus done to death, Lord Kṛṣṇa felt that all the remnant of the burden of the earth had been lightened.

26. Repairing to the sea-shore, Balarāma entered into Yogic meditation on the Supreme Person and uniting his soul with the Supreme Soul, left this mortal world.¹

¹ The MBH. differs in details (vide MBH Mausala, 4).
27-28. Noticing the passing away of Balărâma, the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, son of Devakī, quietly went to a Pippala tree and sat down on the ground (with his back resting against its Trunk) manifesting his (original) radiant four-armed personality dispelling the darkness of all the quarters with his brilliant lustre like a smokeless fire.

29. (His form) was bearing the Śrīvatsa mark, blue like a rainy cloud, brilliant like burnished gold, wearing a pair of silken garments and the most auspicious (in appearance).

30. His lotus-like countenance was graced with charming smile and was adorned with bluish locks of hair and eyes beautiful like lotus; it was beautified with dazzling alligator-shaped ear-rings.

31. It was adorned with a (brilliant) zone, sacred thread, a crown, bracelets, armlets, a necklace of pearls, (a pair of) anklets, rings and the Kaustubha jewel.

32. His person was encircled by a Vanamālā (a garland of special sylvan flowers). It was attended by his weapons in

(1) When Kṛṣṇa saw his sons killed, he used all his divine weapons and finished with the Yādavas.

(2) Bahbhu and his charioteer stopped him telling him “most of Yādavas are killed, let us find out where Balărâma is”. (MBH Mauṣala 2.43-47).

(3) Bala-Rāma was found resting under a tree. Kṛṣṇa deputed Dāruka to Arjuna to take away women and children from Dvārakā.

(4) When Bahbhu whom he deputed to protect women and property at Dvārakā was killed in Kṛṣṇa’s presence by a hunter’s arrow.

(5) Kṛṣṇa told Balărâma to wait till he returned from Dvārakā making arrangements for the protection of women and children.

(6) Kṛṣṇa went to Dvārakā and requested his father Vasudeva to protect women (and children) till the arrival of Arjuna at Dvārakā.

(7) He reported what happened at Prabhāsa and informed him of his decision to spend the rest of his life (along with Balărāma) in performing penance.

(8) On his return, he found Balărâma giving up his life by a Yogic process.

(9) Wandering in a pensive mood, he decided to give up his body and he lay in Yogic Samādhi when he was pierced with a hunter’s arrow.

Was it the second attempt on Kṛṣṇa’s life when the first-mis-aimed arrow killed Bahbhu instead of Kṛṣṇa?
their personal forms. He was seated with his lotus-like reddish (left) foot on his right thigh.

33. A hunter called 'Jarā' who fixed on the point of his arrow the un-pulverized remnant of the iron pestle ('born' from Sāmba) pierced therewith his foot which appeared in shape like the mouth of a deer (wrongly presuming him to be a deer).

34. Seeing that it was a four-armed person (whom he hit), the horrified perpetrator of the (homicidal) sin prostrated himself at the feet of Kṛṣṇa, the enemy of Asuras, touching his feet with his head.

35. 'It is sheerly out of ignorance that this has been committed by me, O Madhusūdana. It behoves you, O faultless Lord of hallowing glory, to pardon me for this sin.

36. This sinful act against you has been committed by me, O Lord Viṣṇu, whose constant remembrance, the wise say is efficacious enough to destroy the ignorance of men.

37. Therefore, put an end to my life immediately, O Vaikuṇṭha (Viṣṇu) so that I should not commit such an offence against any other righteous person.

38. (If you agree that my shooting an arrow at you is not my fault but the effect of the Brahmanical curse, I submit) even god Brahmā, his sons, god-like Rudra and others, and the Vedic seers (the masters of the divine words) have failed to grasp the working of your Yoga Māyā. How can we of impious birth whose vision has been blind-folded by your Māyā can say anything about this sportive act (līlā) of yours? (Be gracious enough to kill me and absolve me of my sins.)'

The Lord replied:

39. 'Be not afraid, O Jarā, Get up. What you have done is exactly what was willed by me. (Cast off your body and) with my permission, do you go to heaven, the region of the righteous people.'

40. Thus commanded by the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa who takes any form at his will², the hunter circumambulated (by

---

1. Supra Bh. P. XI.1.17.
2. Lord's form, constituted of pure Sattva. disappeared. His apparent form was only an outward semblance of his real form—ŚR.
118

the right) Lord Kṛṣṇa, bowed to him and went to heaven in a celestial car.

41. Dāruka was tracing Kṛṣṇa by his foot-prints, came in search of him. He identified the spot by the scent of the Tulasi borne on the wind and he stood before him.

42. He saw his Lord there seated at the foot of the Aśvattha tree, attended upon by his sharp brilliant weapons in person. With his eyes bedimmed with tears and heart overflowing with loyalty and affection, he jumped down from (the charioteer's seat in) the chariot and immediately fell at his feet.

43. (Dāruka said :) O Lord, just as one feels lost in darkness, at night, after the setting of the moon, ever since I did not see your lotus-feet, my vision was enveloped in darkness, and was completely lost. I do not see directions (how to behave as well). I have lost the peace of my mind.”

44. Even as the charioteer (Dāruka) was speaking thus, his chariot with its flag bearing the ensign of Garuḍa, soared up into heaven along with horses, while Dāruka merely looked on (agape).

45. Even the celestial weapons of Viṣṇu followed the chariot. Lord Kṛṣṇa then addressed his charioteer who was dazed at heart with utter astonishment (at the happening).

46. You go to Dvārakā, O charioteer, and report to the Yādava kinsmen thereof the internecine conflict and mutual slaughter of our clansmen, Balarāma's passing away and my present condition.

47. Warn them that the sea will submerge the city of Yādavas (Dvārakā) abandoned by me. Hence you (i.e. both Dāruka and the remaining inhabitants of Dvārakā) alongwith their kinsmen should not stay at Dvārakā.

48. Taking with you the members of your families at well as our parents, all of you go to Indraprastha, under the escort of Arjuna, on the way.

49. Establishing yourself firmly in spiritual wisdom and remaining indifferent (to weal and woe) you follow the spiritual path proclaimed by me. Realizing that all this universe or Samsāra is nothing but the creation of Māyā (and hence unreal) you should attain spiritual peace of mind.
50. Thus commanded Dāruka went round Lord Kṛṣṇa (by the right-hand side) and bowing him down again and again and placing his feet on his head (i.e. touching them with his head), he went to the city (of Dvārakā) with a heavy heart.

CHAPTER THIRTYONE

Lord Kṛṣṇa's Return to Vaikunṭha

Śrī Śuka said:

1-2. (After the departure of Dāruka) there arrived god Brahmā, god Śiva along with his consort Pārvatī, gods led by the great Indra, Sages along with the progenitors of the world, manes, Siddhas, Gandharvas (Celestial singers), Vidyādharas, great serpents, Cāraṇas, Yakṣas and Rākṣasas, Kinnaras, Apsaras (celestial nymphs), Brāhmaṇas like Maitreya and others (or birds inhabiting the region of Garuḍa).

3-4. All of them were desirous and extremely eager to witness the glorious ascent of the Lord to his region. Glorifying in their songs the exploits and incarnation of Lord Kṛṣṇa the descendant of Sūta, they crowded the sky with rows or their aerial cars and rained on him showers of flowers with the deepest devotion, O King.

5. Beholding god Brahmā (the grand-sire of the universe) and other celestials who were his own glorious manifestations, that all-pervading Lord concentrated his mind on the Supreme Self and closed his lotus eyes in samādhi (meditation) with a view to avoid the expected requests of the gods to visit their respective regions.

6. By the technical Yogic process called Ṇgneyi whereby the Yogi concentrates his mind on fire and burns down his body, the Lord did not consume with fire his world-enchanting form which was very auspicious for concentration and meditation (and was the support of the world) but entered with his body his own realm tatāḥ Śatīre Rāmaśya Vāsudevasya ca bhayoh „anvisya dāhavyāmāsa puruṣāvāḥ ṛṣṭakārībhiḥ”

7. Kettle drums were sounded in the heavens; flowers were showered down from the sky. And Truth, Righteousness, Fortitude, Glory, and Prosperity quitted the earth and followed him (to Vaikuṇṭha).

8. Gods and others (who assembled there), of whom god Brahmā was prominent, were not able to behold (or even cognise) Lord Kṛṣṇa of inscrutable ways, while he was entering his own realm (Vaikuṇṭha) and they were left dazed in utter astonishment.

9. The passing away of Lord Kṛṣṇa could not be perceived by gods, just as the trail of lightening in the sky after its passing across the mass of clouds cannot be seen by (mortal) human beings.

10. Witnessing the (incomprehensible) Yogic way of Hari's disappearance, gods headed by Brahmā, Rudra and others were wonderstruck and glorifying it, they returned to their respective regions.

11. O King, please note that the incarnation, disappearance and the (sportive) activities among human beings (Yādavas) of the transcendental Lord, are nothing but histrionics staged by dint of his Māyā Potency, like those of a theatrical performer. Having created this universe by his great Will Power (without any outside material or agency), and having entered it as Antaryāmin (Inner Controller) and sported (into it), he withdraws it within himself in the end, and abides established in his own (glorious) state.

12. Was that Lord incapable of protecting his own person who with (i.e. while he was in) his mortal body brought back to his teacher Sāndīpanī, his son who had been snatched away to the region of Death (Yama), who restored you to life while you were (practically) burnt by a great missile (Brahmāstra discharged by Aśvatthāman) and who vanquished Rudra, the destroyer of Yama and transported (his assassin) the hunter bodily to the celestial world?

13. Though he alone was the sole cause of the subsistence, evolution and destruction of the entire universe as he was the whistle controller of all powers, he did not wish to leave his person behind in this mortal world, as there was no propriety in retaining a mortal body in this world and wanted to demonstrate the glorious state of those who are established in the Self. ( Had he left his body in this world, the Yogins would have preferred to stay on in this world.

14. He who gets up early in the morning and devoutly glorifies the passage to the Supreme State by Lord Kṛṣṇa, will reach that highest stage to which none is superior.

15. Dāruka (the charioteer of Kṛṣṇa), bereaved of Kṛṣṇa arrived at Dvārakā. He fell at the feet of Vasudeva and Ugrasena and bathed them with tears profusely.

16. He reported to them, O King, of the total destruction of the Yādava clans. Hearing that heart-rending tale, people (of Dvārakā) were over-whelmed with grief and fainted.

17. Deeply agitated at their bereavement from Kṛṣṇa and beating their faces and heads (with uncontrollable grief), they hastily rushed to the spot where their kinsmen lay lifeless.

18. When Devaki, Rohini as well as Vasudeva were unable to see their sons Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa, they were so afflicted with grief that they lost their consciousness.

19. They were so intensely stricken with grief at their separation from Lord Kṛṣṇa that they gave up their life then and there.1 The Yādava woman embraced their husbands and ascended the funeral pyres (burnt themselves in the fire).

20. The wives of Balarāma as well clasped his body and entered fire. Queens of Vasudeva embraced his body and the daughters-in-law of Kṛṣṇa clasped each the bodies of their respective husbands like Pradyumna and others, and consorts of Kṛṣṇa like Rukmiṇī and others with their hearts fixed on him entered the fire.2

1. The MBH differs. After Arjuna's arrival at Dvārakā, he held consultations with Vasudeva about taking away Yādava men and women with their kit. Vasudeva cast off his ghost by the Yogic process, and his four chief queens immolated themselves in the funeral pyre of Vasudeva—Mausala 7.15-25.

2. MBH states that only Rukmiṇī, Gāndhāri, Saibyā, Haimavatī and Jāmbavatī immolated themselves in fire, while Satyabhāma and other dear wives of Kṛṣṇa went to the forest for performing penance.

—Mausala 773-74.
21. Deeply afflicted with the grief of separation from his dearest friend Kṛṣṇa, Arjuna consoled himself by pondering over the words of spiritual wisdom addressed to him (in the Bhagavad Gītā and the Anu Gītā) by Kṛṣṇa.

22. In the order of seniority of his relatives who were killed in the fight and had their races cut off, Arjuna arranged for the proper performance of the obsequies (for their welfare in the next world.)

23. The sea immediately inundated the city of Dvārakā, forsaken by Hari, with the exception of the palace of the Lord, O great king.

24. It is the auspicious-most of the auspicious and by its very remembrance it removes all evils (including sins), for the glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa, the slayer of demon Madhu, always abides there.

25. Arjuna escorted women, children and old men, the survivors of the massacre and rehabilitated them at Indraprastha (the previous capital of Pāṇḍavas) and coronated Vajra (the son of Aniruddha, scion of the royal Yādava family) there, as their king.

26. Having heard the report of the destruction of their (Yādava) friends from Arjuna, your grandfathers installed you (on the throne of Hastināpura) as the successor of their dynasty, and all of them proceeded to the Great path (to the other world).

27. The moral (person) who with devout faith would glorify the incarnations and sportive acts of Lord Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa), the God of gods becomes absolved of all sins.

28. He who sings the above-mentioned auspicious-most sportive acts of the glorious Lord Hari in his boyhood, and his delightful incarnation and great feats achieved therein-which he has heard here (in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa or elsewhere, would have engendered in him, supreme devotion and would attain to the goal reached only by Parama Hamsas (i.e. recluses of the highest order).
SKANDHA TWELFTH

CHAPTER ONE

Dynasties Of The Kali Age

King Parikṣit requested:

1. When Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the ornament of the race of Yadus, retired to His glorious abode (in Vaikuṇṭha), whose dynasty continued to rule over the earth? Be pleased to narrate that to me, O sage.

Śrī Śuka said:

2-3. O king, Puraṇjaya, who has been named as the last prince in Bṛhadratha’s dynasty, is yet to be born. His minister Śunaka will, however, assassinate his master Puraṇjaya and will instal his son Pradyota, as the king on his throne. His son will be pālaka whose successor will be Viśākhayūpa from whom will be born Rājaka.

4. Rājaka’s son will be Nandivardhana. These five Pradyotas will enjoy the (sovereignty of the) earth for one hundred and thirty eight years.³

5. Then there will be born Śiśunāga whose son will be Kākavarna. His son will be Kṣemadharmā. He will beget a son called Kṣetraṇa.

---

1. Bh. P. IX.22.49 refers to him as Rupuṇjaya.

2. Historically Pradyotas did not rule Magadha. Buddhist records and Purānic accounts make Caṇḍa Pradyota, a contemporary of Bimbisāra, as the founder of a dynasty in Avanti and not in Magadha. It is possible that Rupuṇjaya might have been treacherously murdered by his minister but he was succeeded by Bimbisāra, the founder of the Magadhan empire: BVBS Vedic Age, P. 328

3. The list of Kings of the Pradyota dynasty differs considerably from Pargiter’s in The Purāṇa Text of the Dynasties of the Kali Age.

2ndly, The Pradyotas did not supplant the Bāhrdrathas & rule over Magadha. The Śiśunāgas did it and it was Bimbisāra who founded the Śiśunāga dynasty and not Śiśunāga. The Pradyotas ruled at Avanti. Caṇḍa
6. He son will be Vidhisāra who will have Ajātaśatru as his son. His son will be Darbhaka while the future son of Darbhaka is Ajaya.

7. Nandivardhana will be the son of Ajaya, while Mahānandi will be the son of Nandivardhana. In this way, there will be ten kings from the Śiśunāga dynasty which will rule (Magadha) for three hundred and sixty years.¹

8. O mighty Kuru, in the Kali age, they will enjoy the earth to that much period of time. The son of Mahānandi, a mighty king, will be born from the womb of a Śūdra woman.

9. He will be a certain Nanda, the master of a mahāpadma (treasury) and an exterminator of Kṣatriyas. After him, all kings will be as bad as Śūdras and irreligious.

10. Like another Paraśurāma², the Scion of the Bhṛgu race, Mahāpadma will rule over the entire earth under one sceptre (or royal umbrella) and his command will never be violated by any one.

Pradyota, Udayana, Bimbisāra Ajātaśatru were in a way contemporaries of Mahāvira & the Buddha and the historical information available shows that Pradyotas did not intervene the Bṛhadhratha & Śiśunāga dynasties of Magadha.

1. There are some similarities in the names of the descendants of Śiśunāgas as given in the Bh. P. and Pargiter's Purāṇa Text List. But instead of Bimbisāra, being the historical founder of the Śiśunāga dynasty, he is represented as the 5th & Ajātaśatru as the 6th descendant of Śiśunāga in the Bh. P.

2. The apparent similarity between Mahāpadma and Paraśurāma is limited to putting an end to the dominance of traditional Kṣatriya families. Mahāpadma, perhaps being insulted by blue-blooded ancient Kṣatriya Kings because of his birth from a Śūdra woman, seems to have made it his policy to eliminate the dominance of these ancient Kṣatriya rulers. Hence this apparent similarity. The account of Mahāpadma as recorded by the Greek author Curtius makes him the son of a barber. Jainas (Pariśis ṣavarvan Ānavakakā-Sūtra) confirm Curtius. The Buddhist texts (Mahāvamsaṭīkā) regard Nandas as of ‘un-known lineage’ (aṅkāṭa-kula). This unanimous tradition confirms the low origin of Mahāpadma—which is a title meaning ‘a lord of infinite army’ or ‘of immense wealth.’ His real name is Ugrasena according to the Mahābodhiya (and it is confirmed by Greeks).
11. It is traditionally reported\footnote{1} that Mahâpadma will have eight sons of whom Sumâlya was prominent. These kings will enjoy this earth for one hundred years.

12. A certain Brâhmaṇa\footnote{2} on whom the nine Nandas were completely dependent (and practically at his mercy) will uproot them. After their extermination, the Mauryas\footnote{3} will enjoy the sovereignty of the earth in the Kali age.

13. That very Brâhmaṇa, it is reported, will crown Candragupta. His son will be Vârisâra whose son will be Aṣokavardhana.

14. Aṣokavardhana's son will be Suyaśas who will beget Saṅgata. From Saṅgata will be born Śāliśuka whose son was Somaśarmā.

15-16. From his loins will be born Śatadhanvan and his son will be Brhadhratha. Thus there will be these ten Maurya kings\footnote{3} who will enjoy the kingdom of this world for one hundred thirty seven years.

1. SR names him as Kauṭilya, Vâtsyâyana or Câṇakya. But Câṇakya or Viṣṇugupta who uprooted that dynasty was their sworn enemy and he outwitted and out-maneuvered Râkṣasa and destroyed Nandas. Can this be Râkṣasa, the trusted but gullible minister of Nandas (vide Mudrâ-Râkṣasa) on whom Nandas depended completely.

2. VJ is obviously quoting a wrong tradition that Mauryas were the descendants of Murâ and belonged to the low caste of fishermen. Now it is accepted that Candragupta belonged to the Kṣattriya class of Moriyas ruling over Pipphalivana (Probably in U.P.)—BVB’s The Age of Imperial Unity, pp. 17 and 56.

3. According to VP 4.24.28-32 the Mauryan kings are: (1) Candragupta, (2) Bindusâra, (3) Aṣoka-vardhana, (4) Suyaśas (5) Daśaratha (not mentioned in Bh. P.) (6) Sâmyuta (7) Śaliśuka (8) Somaśarmā, (9) Śatadhanvâ (10) Bhradratha. Pargiter's Purâṇa Text list mentioned above shows much discrepancy about the number, names and order of the Mauryan kings; Bh. P. agrees with the combined versions of Matsya and Vâyu Purânas. Out of these different names of Aṣoka’s successors, the reality of Daśaratha is established by his three inscriptions on Nâgârjuni hills. Jain texts treat Samprati (mentioned in Matsya P.) as a patron of Jainism as Aṣoka was that of Buddhism. King Śaliśuka is mentioned in the Gârgi-Saṃhitâ. No Purâṇa or Buddhist source claims Candragupta, the founder of the dynasty, as Jaina (even a convert). The final coup in 187 B.C. managed by Pusya-mitra ended the Maurya Rule—(For details vide the Age of Imperial Unity).
16A. (Having killed the Maurya king Bhadratha, his commander-in-chief of the army Puṣyamitra of Śuṅga race will be the ruler himself). Puṣya mitra's son will be Agnimitra to whom Sujyeṣṭha will be born.

17. His son will be Vasumitra who will beget Bhadraka who will have Pulinda as his son. His son will be Ghoṣa to whom will be born Vajramitra as the son.

18. The next ruling prince will be Bhāgavata from whom will be born Devabhūti as it is reported. These ten Śuṅga kings will enjoy the kingship of the earth for a little over a hundred years.

19-20. Later on, O king Parikṣit, the earth will pass under the control of the Kaṇva dynasty of every poor merit. Having killed the dissolute monarch Devabhūti Śuṅga (through a female slave), the highly intelligent Vasudeva himself will rule over the earth. His son will be Bhūmitra whose son will be Nārāyaṇa. Nārāyaṇa will have a famous son called Suṣarmā.

21. In this way, kings of the Kaṇva dynasty will enjoy rulership of the earth for forty-five years from 75 B.C. to 30 B.C. though the Purānic statement is three hundred forty-five years of the Kali age.

22. Murdering king Suṣarmā of the Kaṇva dynasty, his low born servant Bali of the Āndhra race, one of the wretched most persons, will rule over the earth for some time.

1. Not in SR’s text. Strangely enough VJ thinks Śuṅga as the proper name and Puṣyamitra his caste.

2. The list of Śuṅga kings in the Bh. P. concurs fairly well with Pargiter’s Purāṇa text list. But the Bh. P. states ten as the number of Śuṅga kings but actually names nine kings. SR however clarifies that Puṣyamitra, the commander-in-chief of Bhadratha Maurya, who was killed by Puṣya-mitra should be regarded as the 1st Śuṅga king and thus makes the number of kings ten. SR states that the period of this dynasty was 112 years. Thus the Śuṅgas ruled from circa B.C. 187 to 75 B.C. This dynasty did not only stem the tide of Greek and other foreign invaders but rejuvenated Hinduism by performing an Aśvamedha sacrifice. The spread of Bhāgavatism under them is remarkable.

—BVB. Age of Imp. Unity, pp 95-99

3. The author of the Bh. P. does not know that his real name is Simuka and uses the adjective ‘Powerful’. As Pargiter’s Dynasties of the Kali Age (DKA) (P. 38, Notes 14, 16) shows, other Purāṇas use similar adjectives baliyasa, bali with reference to Simuka. The consensus of Purāṇas on ‘Simuka’
23. After him his brother called Kṛṣṇa will be the next king. His son will be Śāntakarna and his son Paurṇamāśa

24. Lambodara will be his son and from him will be born king Cibilaka. He will beget Meghasvāti whose son will be Aṭamāna.

25. Aniṣṭakarmā and Hāleya will then follow. Hāleya’s son will be Talaka. He will beget Purīṣabhīru who will be succeeded by his son king Sunandana.

26. Sunandana will have a son called Cakora who will be succeeded by eight sons known as Bahus collectively, the youngest of them being Śivasvāti, the vanquisher of enemies. He will beget a son called Gomati-putra whose son will be Purīman.

27. The succession of princes after Purīman will be Medaḥśiras, Śivaskanda, his son Yajñaśri and his prince Vijaya and his successors Candravijña and Salomadhi.

28. These thirty kings\(^1\) will enjoy the sovereignty of the world for four hundred and fifty six years, O delight of the Kuru race.

as the name of this king is confirmed by numismatics and in Buhler’s List of Brāhmaṇi Inscriptions. The author of the Bh. P. seems to be a staunch orthodox Brāhmaṇa, so like Candragupta Maurya, Simuka or Bali is called Vṛṣala though his descendants like Gautami-putra Śātakarni (in Nasik inscriptions) assume the title eka-Brāhmaṇa (the unique Brāhmaṇa). The prejudice against Āndhras as Dasys dates from the Aśvamedha. Simuka is called Rāja Simuka-Satavāhana and as the legend goes Satavāhanas or Śālivāhanas were of mixed Brāhmaṇa and Nāga origins (Dvārakā-Janakī). The epigraphic evidence of the associations of Satavāhanas with Śakas and Nāgas shows that the orthodox Brāhmaṇas regarded them as vṛṣalas or degraded Brāhmaṇas or outcastes despite Satavāhana’s claim to Brāhmaṇahood—

The Age of Imp. Unity, pp. 106-107, etc.

\(^1\) The Bh. P. actually enumerates 23 kings though in conformity with other Purāṇas, the number of kings is stated as thirty. Pargiter’s single unified list of Purāṇa Text (DKA pp. 38-43, 71-72) and his co-ordinated list (DKA-36) show differences in names of the kings. The list of 30 kings as given in Matsya P. is quoted in The Age of Imp. Unity, pp. 706-707.

Vīṣṇu P. (4.24.5) correctly calls these kings Āndhra-bṛhṛyas, for after the Āndhras probably (as happened in the case of Śunyas and Kāṇvas) the servants of the Āndhra rulers became the rulers and came to be known as such. …
29. At their capital Avabhrti1, seven Abhira princes will rule the earth, ten kings of Gardhabhi dynasty and sixteen of the Kanka (Saka) race—all of them very greedy and lewd will hold the sway.

30. They will be succeeded by eight Yavana rulers (Bactrian Greeks), and fourteen kings of the Turushka race. Again there will be ten kings of Gurundha (Probably Marundas vide DKA P.45) race and eleven of the Mauna (Huna) dynasty.

31-33. These kings (beginning from Abhiras up to Maunas, viz. sixtyfive kings will enjoy the sovereignty of the earth for (a total of) one thousand ninetynine years2 And the eleven Mauna (Huna) kings will rule over the earth for three hundred years, O king. When their dynasty ended, at the capital town of Kilikila, kings Bhutananda, Vangiri Sisunandi and his famous warrior brother Yasanandi will reign for one hundred and six years.3

34. They will have thirteen sons called Bahlikas. Then will rule the Ksatriya Prince Pushya-mitra and his son Dumitra.

35. All these will be contemporary kings ruling over different states. Seven of these will be the rulers of Andhra and seven kings of Kosal. The kings of Vidura and Nisadha also will be out of these Bahlikas.

36. There will be a king of Magadhas called Visvasphurji. He will be well known as Puranjaya the second. He will reduce the higher castes to the status of Pulindas, Yadus and Madrakas.4

1. SR is simply offering a conjecture when he explains 'Avabhrtyas,' as the rulers of Avabhrti.

2. The above four verses, viz. 29-33 mention some local dynasties. References to other Puranas and Pargiter's DKA (Dynasty of the Kali Age) show that some of them were contemporaries. Hence the duration of these dynasties viz. 1099 years as given in the Bh. P. is not correct. In fact, the author of this chapter of the Bh. P. is less critical and relies on hearsay evidence. Some of these are foreign tribes viz. Sakas (called Kanka in the Bh. P.) and Hunas (called Maunas here).

4. BVB. AGE Imp. Unity regards Visvasphurji as a foreign ruler of Magadha, p. 177 Ft. Note No. 3.

SR gives Visvasphurji the credit of creating the subcastes like Pulindas.
37. That powerful but wicked-minded prince will establish a caste-less society where there will be no reverence to Vedas and Brāhmaṇas. He will exterminate the Kṣatriyas as well. In his capital city of Padmāvatī, he will enjoy a well-guarded state from Haradwar to Prayāga in the valley of the Gaṅgā.

38. The twice-born castes of Saurāṣṭra, Avanti, Ābhīra, Śūra, Arbuda and Mālava countries will become fallen (due to lapse or non-performance of samśkaras, such as the investiture of the sacred thread) and the rulers of these people will be mostly of Śūdra castes.

39. Śūdras, persons fallen from higher castes, Mlecchas all bereft of Vedic culture and way of life—will be the rulers over the banks of the Sindhu and the Candrabhāgā (the Chinab), the city of Kaunti and the region of Kaśmīra.

40. O Parīkṣit! All these contemporary kings will be as good as Mlecchas, bent on unrighteousness, falsehood, miserly and ferocious.

41. (With no compunctions) they will murder women, children, Brāhmaṇas, slaughter cows. They will covet after the women and property of others. Subject to vicissitudes of fate and overwhelmed with joy or grief, they will be poor in strength and of short duration of life.

42. Devoid of culture or purificatory ceremonies (right from inception) of righteous deeds and dominated by rajās and tamas, these Mlecchas in the guise of Kṣatriyas will exploit their own subjects.

43. The subjects inhabiting those lands will emulate their rulers in their habits, character, way of talking and coming in conflict with each other as well as their rulers, will perish.
CHAPTER TWO

The Evils of the Kali Age

Śri Śuka began to narrate:

1. Thereafter, day after day, under the force of the inexorably powerful Time, righteousness, truth, purity, (both physical and mental), forbearance, mercy, duration of life, physical power, and sharpness of memory shall go deteriorating.

2. In the Kali age, wealth alone will be the deciding factor of nobility of birth, righteous behaviour or merits. And only brute force will be the only standard in the arrangement or decision of what is righteous or just.

3. Mutual liking (and not family pedigree, social status etc.) will be the criterion of selecting a partner of life in marriage; cheating is the order of the day in business relations; satisfaction of the sexual pleasure is the only consideration of masculine or feminine excellence and worthiness and wearing of the sacred thread (Tajñopavita) (and not the pious behaviour or Vedic or Śāstric learning) is the outward index of Brāhmaṇahood.

4. External marks (such as a staff, deer-hide) and not the observance of the vows and restrictions of a particular Āśrama (or stage of life) has been the only index of a particular Āśrama of a person and is the only guide to greet mutually when they meet each other. Justice has become weak and partial through the inability of the party to bribe these administering it¹; and garrulity has been the hall-mark of scholarship.

5. Want of affluence is the cause of one’s impiety or bad name while hypocrisy is the index of goodness. Mutual consent and not the Śāstric way) is enough for marriage. And mere toilet alone is a substitute for bathing.

6. To go to distant place of sacred waters (and not attendance on one's preceptors or elders) is looked upon as pilgrimage and wearing long hair a sign of beauty. The highest purpose of life is to fill one's belly and arrogant

¹. Poverty will prevent the party from getting justice—ŚR.
audacity (and not the statement of the facts as they are) is regarded as veracity.

7-8. Maintenance of one’s family will be looked upon as skill; It is for self-advertisement of one’s fame of piety that righteous deeds are to be performed; In this way the whole world will be populated by wicked people: and he who among Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras, becomes the mightiest will be the ruler.

9. When the subjects are deprived of their women and loot of the wealth by greedy, merciless, robberlike Kṣatriyas the subjects will seek shelter in mountains and forests and subsist on leaves, roots, meat, honey, fruits, flowers and seeds (and such forest-products).

10. Being oppressed by draughts or famines and heavy taxation and being subjected to excessive cold, biting winds, (blistering) sunshine, (driving) downpour of rain, snowfall, mutual rivalry, the people are going to perish.

11. People will be tormented by hunger, thirst and diseases and will be overpowered with anxieties. And the maximum span of human life in the Kali age will be fifty (lit. thirty plus twenty) years.

12. When through the evil effect of the Kali age, the physical bodies of embodied beings become emaciated and reduced, the prescribed ordinances of the Vedic path pertaining to different classes of people and stages of life become lost.

13. When (in the Kali age) religion will be predominantly heretical, and kings will be as good as robbers and men will be earning their livelihood by theft, (economic offences) mendacity, wanton violence to life and such other pursuits.

14. When all classes of the society (Varṇas) will be as good as Śūdras, cows will be reduced to the size of she-goats (in yield of milk also); all Ātāmas (stages of life) will merge in the householder’s stage of life (there being no celibates or recluses) and the term “relative” will connote the relations of the wife only.

15. Medicinal herbs will have minimal efficacy; big trees will be stunted (and would afford neither shade nor relief) like the Śāmi trees; the clouds will be giving lightning flashes and clapping of thunders (but no rain) and the houses will be desolate (as there will be no hospitality as it was in previous ages).

16. In this way, when people have undergone such hardships—just at the end of the Kali age, the Lord will incarnate himself in his Sāttvika form for the protection of religion.

17. Lord Viṣṇu is the Creator and Preceptor of the mobile and immobile creation. He is the Controller of the world and the inner Soul abiding in all beings. His advent (on the earth) is for the protection of the path of righteousness and for wiping out all the Karmas of the righteous and to lead them to Final Emancipation from Saṁsāra.

18. It is in the houses of Viṣṇuyaśas, the noble-souled Brāhmaṇa chief of the village called Šambhala, that Lord Kalki will be incarnated.

19-20. The Lord of the Universe, endowed with eight Spiritual powers (like anīmā, etc.) and excellences (like solemnity of vows or truthfulness) was unsurpassed in splendour and glory. Riding on a fleet horse called Devadatta, he would traverse over the whole earth on the horse; will massacre with his sword capable of subjugating the crores and crores of robbers and wicked miscreants who posed themselves as kings.

21. (To indicate the beginning of the Golden Age—Kṛṣṇa Age) Thereupon, when the entire class of robbers, thieves and such enemies of the society is annihilated both in the town and in the country, the minds of the rural and urban population become pure by the touch of the wind wafting the sacred fragrance of pigments on the person of Lord Vāsudeva.

22. When the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the very embodiment of strength, is enthroned in their heart, their progeny will naturally be extremely powerful.

23. When Lord Hari the Protector of righteousness, will descend on this earth as Kalki, there will be the advent of the Kṛṣṇa Age (Golden Age), and the children who will be born thereafter will be of pious (Sāttvika) disposition.

1. A village near Moradabad in Rohilkhand, 80 miles to the east of Delhi. It is ‘Sambalaka’ according to Ptolemy.

—GDAMI, p. 176
24. When the Moon, the Sun and the Jupiter are in conjunction in the same zodiacal house and the star Puṣya is in ascendance, the Kṛta age dawns.¹

25. All the kings belonging to the Lunar and Solar dynasties who have ruled in the past, or are reigning at present or will govern in the future, have been briefly described to you.

26. The period commencing from the birth of your worship to the coronation of Nanda would come to one thousand one hundred and fifteen years.²

27-28. Of the seven stars comprising the constellation the Great Bear, two of those asterisms come to view first, in the east (viz. Pulaha and Kratu). Midway between them in the north-western line, is noticed a star or a constellation (of the group of Aśvini, Bharani, etc.) at night. Those Heavenly Sages i.e. the stars Pulaha and Kratu remain associated with that intervening constellation for a period of one hundred human years. Those Sages (stars) are now associated with Maghā during your reign.

29. When (the Maghās were in that position) the self-illuminating personality comprised of pure Sattva of Lord Viṣṇu who came to be known as Śrī Kṛṣṇa retired to his region,

---

¹ ṢR: Here the simultaneous entry of these planets is indicated. Otherwise every twelfth year when the Jupiter is in the zodiacal sign of Cancer, there are at least two or three New Moon days when this phenomenon occurs. Hence Simultaneous entry of these three planets is the sine qua non of Kṛta Age.

² As ṢR. notes this statement is ambiguous. But the author of the Bh. P. is not much at fault, as we have not yet been able to fix the date of the Mahābhārata War. Pargiter, on the basis of various statements in Purāṇas has tentatively suggested 950 B.C. as the date of that war. But Jayaswal, A.C. Das and other Indian scholars favour 1500 B.C. Pusalkar in BVB's Vedic Age (p. 273) concedes 1400 B.C. as the date of the Kurupāṇḍava War. The discussion of the date of the Mahābhārata war is beyond the scope of this note. But I still believe in Ray Chaudhari's evidence presented in his Political History of Ancient India from the Accession of Parikṣit to the Extinction of the Gupta Dynasty, p. 9, 1923, and regard Parikṣit as belonging to 900 B.C. This date has no relation with the composition of the present text of the Bh. P. as shown in Intro. to Volume I of the Bh.P.
Kali immediately entered the world and people began to take delight in sinful ways.

30. While the Lord of the goddess Lakṣmī used to touch the earth with his lotus-feet, till then Kali did not dare to encroach upon the earth.

31. When those seven Divine Sages (Ursa Major) enter the constellation Maghā, there will be the advent of Kali lasting for twelve hundred celestial years (i.e. 432,000 human years).

32. When these Great Sages (the asterisms, constituting the Grear Bear) will proceed from Maghā to Pūrvāsādhā, Kali will be more powerful since the ascension of king Mahāpadma Nanda.

33. Experts in ancient Lore have stated that on the very day—nay at that very hour—Lord Kṛṣṇa retired to his region, the Kali Age has set in.

34. At the termination of the period of one thousand divine years of the fourth i.e. Kali age, the Kṛta age will dawn again and the minds of men will get the revelation of the Self from within.

35. Just as the career or ups and downs in the history of Manu's race has been described, in each age, the history of Vaiśyas, Śūdras and Brāhmaṇas in various ages should be understood to be similar to them (age after age).

36. It is only the names of the noble-souled persons described so far and of whom (neither kingdom nor race survives except) the legendary account enshrining them remains, (nothing but) their fame only survives, on the earth.

37. Devāpi, the brother of Śantanu, and Maru, the descendant of the Ikṣvāku race—both of them possess very great Yogic powers and are still living in village called Kalāpa (Near Badarikāśrama in the Himālayas).

38. At the end of the Kali age, both of them, under the instructions and command of Lord Vāsudeva, will come forward and will promulgate and establish the ancient religious order with its institution of Varnas (Classes of people) and Āśramas (Stages of life) once again as before.

39. This cycle of four Yugas (Ages) viz. Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali runs in this order on the earth for the sake of created beings.
40. O king Parīksit, these kings described by me and many others (not mentioned by me) all claimed that the earth was theirs. But ultimately they had to leave it and passed away.

41. The physical body which (when alive) is designated as King is ultimately called worms (if buried or left un-interred and is turned into worms), or “Excrement” (if eaten by beasts or birds of prey and after digestion or non-digestion thrown out as faeces) or Ashes (if cremated). It is for this body that one perpetrates sins and commits violence against living beings. Does he not know that this sinful conduct leads to hell?

42. How will this entire earth held under their own (undisputed sovereignty) by my forefathers and now held under my sceptre, pass on the same way to my son and grandson and his race?

43. Rulers who are unwise (indulge in such thoughts anxiously), look upon their physical body made up of heat, water and food as their Soul, and the earth as their personal property, ultimately quitting them both, sink into oblivion.

44. O Parīksit, All those lords of the earth who enjoy the earth by dint of their personal power, have been reduced by Time to mere themes of stories when people narrate the past events.

CHAPTER THREE

Dharma (Righteous Way of Life) in every Yuga :
Efficacy of God’s Name

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Perceiving how kings are eagerly occupied with the plans of conquering her, this earth laughs at them saying, “How stupid! These kings who themselves are but playthings of (the god of) Death aspire to conquer me!
2. Though they are aware (of the inevitability of death) these kings have reposed over-confidence in (the longevity of) their personal body which is momentary like a bubble of water. Hence the ambition or desire of these rulers of men is definitely futile.

3-4. (They plan in their minds):
"Having first conquered the group of six (Five cognitive senses+Mind) of our own self, we shall subjugate the counsellors, executive officers, relatives or confidants, citizens, conductors of elephants or army officers of other kings and then after removing all "thorns" (socially undesirable elements), we shall thus gradually bring under our control the earth engirdled by the seas." These kings whose hearts are thus tied down to their hopes and desires, do not perceive the god of Death who is near (and ready to snatch them away).

5. Having conquered me as far as the sea, some of them (being more ambitious) enter the sea (for naval victory and conquest of other island-continents). "Of what importance is this conquest against our self-control? Emancipation from Samśāra is the proper reward of self-control."

6. O scion of the Kuru race! These foolish kings wish to conquer me through war, when great Manus and their sons and descendants had ultimately to abandon me and to depart as they came (leaving me here behind).

7. Feuds and fights for me break out between fathers and sons, and between brothers and between those wicked Kings whose minds are possessed with the notion of mine-ness with reference to their kingdoms.

8. "This entire earth belongs to me only and not yours, O fool. "Contending and competing thus, kings kill each other and die for my sake."

9-12. Pṛthu, Purūravas, Gādhi, Nahuṣa, Bharata, Arjuna (of a thousand arms—Sahasrārjuna), Māndhātā, Sagara, Rāma,

1. SR: Extremely dull-witted are they who desire to attain sovereignty by practising control over senses.

GS: Sovereignty being transitory is an insignificant gain as a result of self-control; emancipation from the misery of Samśāra is the real recompense, for it is eternal.
Khaṭvāṅga, Dhundhumāra, Raghu, Ṭṛṇa-bindu, Yayāti, Šaryāti, Śantanu, Gaya, Bhagiratha, Kuvalayāśva, Kākutstha, Nala (the king of Niśadha), Nṛga, Hiraṇya-Kaśipu, Vṛtra, Rāvaṇa, the scourge of the people (who made people to cry), Namuci, Śambara, Naraka, Hiraṇyākṣa and Tāraka, and many other Daityas and Kings who were the emperors of the world, all possessed of knowledge, valiant, vanquishers of all others but of themselves, remained unconquered.

13. Though they were mortal by nature, they cherished the strongest attachment to me as if I belonged to them. But they were frustrated in accomplishing their desires, and were reduced as names in legends, by the inexorable Time or Death, O King.

14. O King Parīkṣit! It is with the intention of elucidating (the knowledge of) the unsubstantial nature of the world and to create (a sense of) renunciation about it, that these legends of those illustrious persons who after spreading their great renown in this world, had passed away, have been narrated to you. And all this (picturesque) narration is not mere display of words but bears vital relation to the highest truth!

15. But if a person is desirous of attaining pure (selfless) devotion unto Lord Kṛṣṇa he should incessantly listen every day to the exposition of the excellent attributes and great deeds of the Lord of hallowing renown (viz. Viṣṇu) which are always glorified in songs (by his votaries and pious persons) and which destroy all evils and inauspiciousness.

King Parīkṣit enquired:

(Thinking that devotion unto the Lord cannot be engendered due to the evil influence of the Kali age, the King asks)

1. Although respectable annotators like SR, VR, interpret quite to the contrary, viz. 'The non-relation of these legends to the highest or real purpose', I feel that the explanation of GS, suits the context better, despite the next verse which contrasts the difference between the glory of these kings and that of the incarnations of Viṣṇu and exhorts one to listen to the glory of Lord Kṛṣṇa constantly.
16. “Be pleased to explain to me (in details) the course resorting to which, people can shake off and destroy the accumulated evils of the Kali in the Kali age itself, O revered sage!

17. Kindly tell me (something) about the Yugas (the Ages or Aeons), the special course of duties prescribed for each Yuga, the duration of the life and the deluge (Pralaya) of the universe, the course of the omnipotent Time-spirit which is the potency of the great-souled Lord Viṣṇu.”

Śrī Śuka began to narrate:

18. In the Kṛta Age, Dharma (righteous course of conduct) as adhered to by the people of that age, proceeds on all its four legs. And Truth, compassion, penance, (self-control and meditation) and affording protection to all (irrespective of friendly or inimical relations) are the four legs of that Perfect Dharma, O King.

19. The people of that age were generally full of contentment and compassion, friendly to all beings, serene and peaceful, self-controlled, forebearing, finding spiritual bliss in their souls, looking upon all as equals (and practising no discrimination between their people and others) and engaging themselves in spiritual exercises such as meditation, etc.

20. In the Tretā Age, one-fourth part of each of the leg of Dharma gets gradually disabled by each of the four legs of Adharma (unrighteousness) viz., falsehood, violence, discontent and discords respectively.

21. In that age, people were keen on performance of Vedic rites and were devoted to austere penance. (The five sins—pañca-śūnās—in the life of a house-holder are inevitable but people were not given to too much of violence. Nor were they lewd or addicted to the pleasure of senses. They used to exert for the first three purposes of human life, viz. Dharma (religious merit), Artha (wealth) and Kāma (worldly pleasures, enjoyment). They were sincerely devoted to and advanced in Vedic studies, and Brāhmaṇas were regarded to be the highest Varna (class of society).

22. In the Dvāpara age, the four feet of the Dharma, viz. Penance, Truthfulness, Compassion and Protective and charitable attitude to all diminish by half with (the growing influence of) the four characteristics of unrighteousness (adharma) viz. violence, discontent or covetousness, falsehood and hatred.

23. In that age, people hankered after fame or glory, were prone to the performance of great sacrifices, indulging in the teaching and the study of the Vedas, endowed with great affluence, maintaining big families, joyous by nature. Brāhmaṇas and Kṣattriyas were then the most important classes of society.

24. In the Kali age, only one quarter of each of the four feet of Dharma remains. And that too goes on diminishing day by day by the powerfully increasing ‘feet’ of Adharma (unrighteousness) to such an extent that ultimately it becomes extinct.

25. In that (Kali) age, people will be greedy, take to wicked behaviour, will be merciless, indulge in hostilities without any cause, unfortunate, extremely covetous for wealth and women (or worldly desires) and higher social status will be attained by Śūdras, fishermen and such other (former backward) classes.

26. The attributes viz. Sattva, rajas and tamas become manifest in men. And being impelled by the force of the Time-spirit, their influence varies (waxes or wanes).

27. When the mind, intellect and sense-organs are dominated by Sattva and when there is genuine liking for (spiritual) wisdom and knowledge and performance of asceticism, one should know that it is the Kṛta age.

28. O intelligent king! When embodied beings (people) show devotion and liking for the first three purposes of human life, viz. dharma, artha and Kāma and the attribute called rajas controls the attitude of people, note that that is the Tretā Age.

29. When the time (i.e. the attitude of people) is controlled by a mixture of rajas and tamas, and when greed, discontent, pride, hypocrisy, jealousy predominate and men like to perform religious acts for achieving desirable ends, it is the Dvāpara Age.

30. When deceit, falsehood, lethargy, sleepiness, violence, despondency, grief, delusion, fear, poverty-stricken-ness prevail, that is the Kali Age which is characterised by tamas.

31. As a result of Kali’s influence, mortal beings become dull-witted, unlucky, voracious, destitute of wealth yet voluptuous, and women, wanton and unchaste.

32. Countries will be ravaged by robbers and miscreants; the Vedas will be condemned by heretics; kings will exploit the subjects (lit. Rulers will be men-eaters), and twice-borns like Brāhmaṇas will be given to the gratification of their sexual desires and other appetites (lit. filling the belly).

33. Celibates (belonging to the Brahmacarya stage of life) will cease to observe their prescribed vows of study, purity and celibacy; householders (in stead of helping others by alms-giving) will take to begging; hermits (of the Vānaprastha stage will leave forests where they retire for penance), will resort to villages (and towns) and Saṅgāsins will be extremely greedy of money.

34. Women will be short-statured but voracious, noted for fecundity and shameless. They will be harsh-speakers, given to theft, fraud and dare-devilry.

35. Petty-minded people (with no moral values) conduct business transactions and merchants will be fraudulent. Even when there is no emergency or imminent danger people will follow trades or pursuits censured by the righteous.

36. Servants will resign their services of the masters who are excellent in all respects but have become penniless. Masters will dismiss even their hereditary servants when they are in distress (through physical disability, etc.) and people will not maintain cows when they cease to yield milk.

37. In the Kali age, men will abandon their parents, brothers, friends and relations and establish their friendliness on sexual basis. Their affection being centred on their relation with women, they will seek consultations from their wives’ relatives (such as sisters and brothers-in-laws) and will be miserable.

38. Earning their livelihood under the guise (and make-up) of recluses and sages, Śūdras will accept charities. People ignorant of religion, will occupy high seats (and pulpits) and will (pose to) preach religion.
39. People will have their minds weighed down with constant anxiety and fear, due to devastating famines and heavy taxation. The land being devoid of food-crops, people will be always afflicted with the impending fear of droughts.

40. Being destitute of clothing, food, drink, bed, sexual satisfaction, bath and adornments, people in the Kāli age, will appear like ghosts.

41. In the Kāli age, even for a paltry amount of a Kākīnīkā (20 cowries), people will fight, throwing to winds all friendliness and good will. They will even kill their own relatives or give up their dear lives (commit suicide for such a petty amount).

42. People will not protect even their aged parents. Low-minded persons bent on satisfying their sex and filling the belly will not care for their sons even though they may be clever and skilful in all respects.

43. O King! During the Kāli age, the minds of the human beings being perverted by heretic doctrines will not generally worship Lord Acyuta, the supreme Father and Preceptor of the worlds, the lotus-feet of whom are bowed by the lords of the three worlds.

44. During the Kāli age, people will not worship the Lord by uttering unawares whose name even unconsciously, a dying man or a person afflicted (with care or disease), falling or trembling, becomes absolved and free from all the impediments of Karmas and attains to the highest goal (viz. mokṣa-emancipation from saṃsāra).

45. The Supreme Person, the glorious Lord Viṣṇu abides in the hearts of all and dispels all the evils of men arising out of the influence of Kāli from substances, place and mind.

46. If the Lord enthroned in the heart (of all) is listened to or glorified (by chanting his name or singing his glory) or meditated upon, worshipped or even paid respect to (by some other way), he shakes off (and thus absolves man of) his sins committed and accumulated in thousands of births.

1. VI takes this opportunity to hit at the advaitins and explains Pāñcāgī-Viśhīna-Catasaṭḥ as 'those whose minds are deluded by the heretical doctrine known as advaita-tātra.'
47. Even as the fire applied to gold burns off and thus destroys all the impurities or metallic alloys mixed with gold, Lord Viṣṇu who is abiding in the heart (or Soul) destroys all evil thoughts (or sins) in the hearts of Yogins.

48. The inner heart of a man does not attain that much absolute purity by means of (Vedic or Śāstric) learning, penance, breath-control (prāṇāyāma), sense of friendliness to all beings, ablutions in sacred waters, observance of vows, giving of (munificent) charitable gifts and muttering silently (His prayer), as it does by (meditating upon) the infinite Lord who is enthroned in the heart.

49. Hence, O King Parīkṣit, with all your power of concentration, enthroned Lord Keśava in your heart. Meditating upon him with full concentration at the time of death, you will attain the highest goal (viz. Mokṣa).

50. This glorious Lord who is the supreme Ruler of the universe should be meditated upon with full concentration, by persons who are about to die. Dear Parīkṣit! He is the Soul and supporter of all. He leads them to the state of being one with him.

51. Kali is certainly the Store-house of all evils. But O king, there is one very great virtue and a good point in that age, inasmuch as by singing the name and the glory of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, that person is freed from all attachments and attains to the highest region (Vaikuṇṭha).

52. What one achieves by meditating upon Lord Viṣṇu in the Kṛṣṇa age, by performance of sacrifices in the Tretā age, by worship and service of the Lord in the Dvāpara Age, a person attains that in the Kali age by chanting the name of Hari.
CHAPTER FOUR

The Four-Fold Pralaya

Sri Suka continued:

1. The divisions of Time commencing from its minutest unit (Paramāṇu) and ending with the period forming the life-span of god Brahmā (consisting of two parārdhas) have been described to you, O King. The duration of four Yugas also has been narrated to you. Now listen to the periods of Kalpa (a span of time for the round of creation and subsistence of the world) and Laya (The period of the dissolution) of universe.

2. The period consisting of a thousand revolutions of the Yugas (viz. Kṛta, Tretā, Dwāpara, and Kali) is called one day (in the life) of god Brahmā. This period is known as a Kalpa, during which fourteen Manus successively reign over the world, O protector of men.

3. At the end of that period, there is an equally long period of dissolution of the universe (Pralaya). It is called the night (in the life) of god Brahmā. At the end of the Kalpa, these three worlds become due for dissolution and get dissolved.

4. This dissolution (Pralaya) is called occasional\(^2\) (as it is caused by the occasion of the sleep of god Brahmā). During this period, Lord Nārāyaṇa, the Creator of the universe, withdraws all the universe within himself and goes to sleep on the bed of Ananta’s (the serpent Śeṣa’s) body. And so does god Brahmā.

5. When the period of two Parārdha\(^3\) years forming the span of life of the highest god Brahmā, comes to a close, the

---

1. SR explains that pralaya (dissolution) is four-fold, naimittika (occasional) Prakṛti (pertaining to the primordial matter), ātyantika (eternal) and māya (constant or eternal). All these are described in this Chapter.

2. As this Pralaya of three worlds takes place due to the condition of Brahmā’s sleep, it is called ‘conditional’ or ‘occasional’—naimittika—SR.)

3. =One Parārdha = 100,000,000,000,000,000 years.
seven Prakṛtis or causal principles of the universe (viz. mahat or cosmic intelligence, ahamkāra the cosmic I-ness or ego and the five tan-mātrās—subtle elements) become due to be dissolved (and are so withdrawn) into Prakṛti or Primordial Matter. (Hence, it is called Prākṛtiḥ).

6. O King! this is called the dissolution pertaining to Prakṛti or primordial Matter. For in this Pralaya, the universe or Brahmāṇḍa which is the product of the causes enumerated as seven Prakṛtis above, gets finally dissolved as the occasion of the dissolution of these causes arrives.

7. (At that time) the god of rains does not send any shower of rain on the earth for one hundred years. Then the earth becomes bereft of food-grains and beings, tormented by hunger, prey upon and eat one another.

8. Thus harassed by the Time-Spirit, the creatures gradually perish. The fierce sun ending the world (known as Sāmvarātiśka) with its terribly scorching rays, drinks up (evaporates) all liquid (water) that is in the seas, the humids in the body and all moisture and under-ground water on the earth and does not release a drop of it.

9. Then the cosmos-destructive fire emanating from the (thousand mouths of) Saṅkarṣaṇa (the serpent Śeṣa) raging ablaze, burns down all sub-terranean regions which have been already desolate.

10. The egg of the universe is ablaze from above, below and on all sides by the flames of fire (issuing from below from Saṅkarṣaṇa’s mouth) and the scorching rays of the sun burns and looks like a ball of burnt cow-dung.

11. Tempestuous winds characteristic of the end of the universe, blow violently for a hundred years and the sky is enveloped in dust and appears smoky.

12. Thereupon hosts of clouds of various shades of colours, roaring with violent peals of thunder, pour down heavy showers of rains for one hundred years.

13. Then the universe within the cosmic egg becomes transformed into one single sheet of water. When the cosmic waters have flooded the universe and everything is merged under water, the water absorbs scent—the quality of the earth.
14. When the earth has lost its essential distinguishing quality viz. fragrance, it disintegrates and ceases to exist. The fire then absorbs the property of fluidity from the waters and they being deprived of their fluidity, cease to exist.

15. The winds thereupon swallow up the form or colour which is the characteristic property of fire (Tejas). Then the ákāta absorbs the property of the wind (viz. touch) and it ceases to exist (as it is dispersed in the sky).

16. The wind enters (and is absorbed) in the ether. Bhūtādi i.e. ego of the Tāmasic type absorbs sound which is the characteristic of the sky which gets dissolved in the Bhūtādi.

17. Dear Parīkṣit! The rājasa type of ahamkāra absorbs all the sense-organs and Vaikārika i.e. the Sattvic type of ego does the same in the case of their Presiding deities. The Principle called Mahat (Cosmic intelligence) swallows up the Ahamkāra and the attributes known as Sattva and others absorb the Mahat.

18. The unmanifest Prakṛti, being impelled by the force of the Time-spirit, absorbs the attributes (Sattva, rajas, tamas) and establishes equilibrium in them.

19. Pradhāna i.e. unmanifest Primordial matter is not subject to the states of modifications (such as birth, growth, decay, death) produced by the divisions of time. It is beginning less; it has no end; it is unmanifest, eternal, the cause of all, but not subject to decay.

20. In that stage of Prakṛti, there is no (existence of) speech, mind, modes or attributes of Prakṛti like Sattva, rajas and tamas or principles like mahat (Cosmic intelligence). There is no scope to vital air (Prāṇa) intelligence, sense or their presiding deities. There is no structure or form which can be called “the world.”

21. It is a state in which there is no dream, wakefulness or sleep. There is no sky or ether, water, earth, air, fire, or the sun. It resembles to some extent the deep sleep or vacuity itself. But it is beyond the range of thinking or imagination. The Vedas declare that (this unmanifest) state is the original root of the universe.
22. When the potencies of both Puruṣa and the unmanifest (Prakṛti) are impelled by Time and get inevitably and thoroughly absorbed into their substratum, that is known as the Prākṛtika Pralaya (dissolution into Prakṛti or Primordial matter)¹

23*. Knowledge³ or consciousness is the substratum of buddhi (reason or intellect), indriyas (the senses-organs) and artha the objects of these senses). It is in the forms of these three that knowledge shines forth. But whatever has a beginning and an end is unreal because of its perceptibility and as such it is undifferentiated from its cause³.

24. Light, the eye and colour or form are not different from the principle of Tejas (as they are the modifications of Tejas—light or fire). Similarly, the intellect, the senses and the sense-objects are not separate or distinct from Brahman. But Brahman is quite distinct from them (as Brahman exists even when the triad—the intellect, senses and objects—ceases to exist)⁴.

25. It is said that the state or wakefulness, dream and sleep are the states of buddhi (intellect). The plurality (such

1. VR points out that potencies (Śaktis) are the products or evolutes of Prakṛti. When Prakṛti remains as an undifferentiated and inseparable attribute of Paramātman, that is the dissolution of Prakṛti.

* From 23rd verse follows the description of the ātyantika Pralaya (everlasting dissolution) which is Mokṣa—final emancipation from Samādhi.

2. VR takes knowledge (Jñāna) as signifying the supreme soul (Jñāna-sabdāḥ Paramātma-vāc).

3. VR: Buddhi (reason), indriyas (senses), etc. are like a body and have no independent existence unless Paramātman abides in them. It is he who shines through them.

VJ's explanation appears to me farfetched; "During this Pralaya the Brahman who alone supports all, shines along with Lakṣmi, liberated souls (Muktas) and he appears refulgent in the form of light and has the excellent beauty that gives delight to all senses.

Behind VJ, there is, however, a tradition of interpretation of the Bh. P. from Madhva, The founder of Dvaitism.

4. Just as it is on the principle—tejas that the three—light (as a product), the eye (the receptient of tejas) and colour the property of Tejas—depend, so the reason, senses and the objects are created by the Lord and depend on him. Hence, they cannot exist apart from God. But he is distinct from these and is termed as jyotis.
as Viśva, Taijasa and Prājña) ascribed to the pure soul is purely Māyā (illusion).

26. Just as clouds sometimes appear and disappear from the sky, this universe which consists of parts and has a beginning and an end appears and disappears on the substratum of Brahman.¹

27. Of all objects consisting of parts, only parts are said to be real (in the Upaniṣads²) as they form the cause, just as threads (of cloth) can be seen (to exist) even if the cloth (is unwoven and hence) not in existence.

28.* Whatever is perceived as a cause or an effect is an illusion as causal relation is (mutually) interdependent. Whatever has a beginning or an end is unreal.

29. The effect called Prapañca (or the Phenomenal universe) though apparent or visible to us, is unexplainable at all apart from (i.e. independently of) the pure Self Pratyagātman. If it were real even to the slightest degree, it would be the same as the intelligent or conscious Self and as such identical with ātman.

30. Satya³ i.e. ātman (the Self) has no diversity. It is the real existence, one without a second or difference. One who believes in difference is ignorant. The apparent diversity

1. VJ : just as clouds appear and disappear from the sky, and the clouds and sky are different, so is the Brahma which creates and dissolves. The world is different from it.

2. Viśvāmṛtaṁ vikāro nāmadheyam mūlikasyeva satyam—Chāndogya Up.6.1.4.

* VR : The principle and its modifications are interdependent and denote the same thing in its subtle and gross state. So the distinctness of an effect or product from the general principle and its speciality in modification is nothing but misunderstanding. That which has a beginning and an end (e.g. our bodies) cannot be the Soul (ātmavastu).

VJ : A general principle is the aspect of a thing which remains constant throughout its existence. The aspect that is not so constant is the modification. These two are different, separable aspects. Hence that which has a beginning and an end is not an essential part of the thing.

3. VR : Satya means the individual soul. He quotes Tait. Up. 2.6.1 (tat Sṛṣṭiḥ tadād jyotir ad yuyogavi tam sa sacca tucchā śravat). A person who thinks that there is difference in the Jīvātman of gods, men etc. is ignorant.

VJ : "Satya" means Brahman. It is not subject to differentiation or division (satyasya Brahmano rūpānām nānātvarah satyam na bhavati).
is due to some condition (upādhi) as between the space enclosed in a pot and the unlimited expanse of the sky (both though one, appear different due to the enclosing condition of a pot), between the sun (in the sky) and its reflections in water or between the vital air or breath inside the body and the air outside the body (in the world over.)

31. Just as gold is denoted by various names according to the form into which it is shaped, so the suprasensuous Lord is called by various names by egotistic persons in the language of the world and in the Vedic parlance.

32. Just as a cloud, created by the sun (by evaporating water with his rays) and exhibited (by the light of the sun), becomes darkness preventing the eye (which is also a part of the sun) from getting the view of the sun, Ego (ahamkāra) which is evolved out of Brahman and is lighted by Brahman works as an obstruction to Jīva or individual self (which is also a part of the Brahman) becomes a bondage preventing it from having a view of the Brahman.

33. When the cloud born of the sun (by the heat of the solar rays) is dispersed, the eye is able to have a view of the sun which is its own form. The same way, when ahamkāra (ego which works) as the limiting condition (and obscures the realization of Brahman) is destroyed by investigation (into the real nature of the ātman (soul), it realizes that it is Brahman itself.

34. When the bondage of the Soul (ātman) consisting of ahamkāra which is an evolute of Māyā and which comes in the way of the realization of the self (ātman) is severed with the sword of spiritual knowledge, such a state of ever-lasting final emancipation is known as the eternal atyantika Pralaya.

35*. Some persons, having (deeper) knowledge of the subtle state of things, assert that the creation and dissolution occurs continuously in the case of all beings from god Brahmā downwards, O chastiser of enemies.

36. The continuous sequence of modifications through which changing things such as bodies of beings (a stream of

* VJ: God Brahmā and others experience birth and death every day.
VR: Here Pralaya means modifications in the body.
water or the flame of a lamp) which are rapidly being worn away by the inexorable force of the stream of time-pass, are (known as) the eternal causes of the origination and destruction of the bodies.

37. (What can be observed is only very broad stages such as childhood, youth, age). But the continuous successive states (of the body) effected by the Time-spirit which is another form of the Almighty God, and which has no beginning or end, are not distinctly perceptible every moment even as the motion (per minute) of the luminaries (the planets and stars) in their course through the sky, are beyond (our capacity of) observation.

38. Thus the four types of dissolution, viz. constant (nitya), occasional or depending on condition (naimittika), relating to Prakṛti (Prākṛtika) and everlasting or final (ātyantika) have been described to you. Such is the course of Time.

39. O most prominent of Kurus! In this way, these stories of the sportive activities of Lord Nārāyaṇa, the creator of the universe, the abode of all beings (or the centre of all power and goodness) have been narrated to you briefly. It is beyond the capacity even of the birth-less god Brahmā to narrate them in details and in their entirety (even though he is endowed with the longest span of life of two parārdha years.)

40. If a man is distressed and scorched in the wild fire of various types of griefs and miseries and is desirous of crossing this ocean of saṃsāra which it is extremely difficult to cross, there is no other boat (lit. raft) other than (the act of) constantly listening to and thus drinking the nectar-like stories of the sportful activities of the glorious supreme person.

41. In ancient days, the immortal sage Nārāyaṇa taught this compilation of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa (through god Brahmā?) to Nārada who in his turn taught it to (my father) Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana.

42. It is that worshipful sage Bādarāyaṇa who was pleased to teach me this collection (Purāṇa) describing the glories of the Supreme Lord which has the same sacred status as the Vedas.

1. Vide Supra 2.9. 43-44.

43. O best of Kurus! Sūta, when requested by sages like Śaunaka and others, will narrate this to sages during the course of a long sacrificial session in the Naimiśāraṇya (in future).

CHAPTER FIVE

Śuka's Concluding Precept Concerning Brahmān

Śri Śuka said:

1. (This Bhāgavata Mahāpurāṇa inspires fear-less-ness even from death as) herein every now and then is extolled the Almighty Lord Hari, the Soul and controller of the universe, of whose gracious joy (a trait of rajas) was born god Brahmā, the creator of the world and of whose anger was created Rudra, the destroyer of the world (and both are hence subordinate to and dependent on him).

2. O King! Please do give up this brute-like (foolish) notion (identifying the Soul with one's physical body) that you will die. Unlike (your) body (which did not exist before the moment of its birth and hence shall naturally perish), you i.e. your soul did pre-exist (your physical body), is now in existence and shall never die (irrespective of what happens to your body).

3. You are quite distinct from your body, etc., just as fire (though potentially abiding in fuel) is distinct from the fuel. Hence, on the analogy of seeds and trees, you i.e. your soul (being once a father) shall not take the form of a son, a grandson, etc.

1. ŚR. explains: The quotations from Śrutis e.g. ātīmad vai putra-nāmāsi, support physical heredity and not a continuity of one's soul—dehād deho jāyate na ātīmad. Hence in this physical continuity of the race, the soul is not involved.
4. Just as a person sees in his dream that he is beheaded (when factually he is the unaffected party or a witness to the scene of cutting the head of his body in the dream state), so also in a state of wakefulness he sees the death of his body. But as a matter of fact the Soul (atman) is neither born nor dead.

5. When an earthen pot is broken, the space enclosed within the pot becomes the same as before (the creation of that pot), in the same way when (after self-realization which destroys all Karmas) the body falls off, the individual soul becomes one with Brahman.1

6. It is the Mâyâ that creates the mind. The mind creates these bodies, objects of senses and actions of the soul. Hence it is due to the Mâyâ that the jīva (individual soul) is involved in transmigration of samsâra.

7. Just as the light (of an oil-lamp) retains its characteristic of giving light so long as the fire (the flame of the lamp) is associated with the wick soaked in oil, supply of oil to the wick, a container—a storage for this oil supply, similarly, Karma is the oil, the mind, the container of the oil, the body, the wick and its contact with fire means relation to the spirit. The body comes into existence and dies through the actions of the guṇas rajas, Sattva and tamas.3

8. The soul that is embodied does not cease to exist. For He is self-illuminating, distinct from and beyond gross (physi-

1. VR: Becomes a mukta—an emancipated soul. Vīśṇudvīpa presumes the continuity of the distinct identity of the soul even in the Mokṣa stage and not its absorption and loss in Paramātman.

2. VJ: Mâyâ is the unintelligent (jâda) matter. So its creation—the mind—is also Jâda. The use of the Ātmanepada srjate in tanmanah srjate mâyâ, in the text of this verse indicates that it is due to the mind’s contact with the intelligent being that activates it and enables it do all these (Srjata ityātmanepada-Prayógena cim-mitrām mana iti śucayati).

3. The samsâra continues as long as the contact or influence of guṇas is there and the false presumption of the identity of the body and the soul persists. The samsâra like the lamp may cease to exist but the soul persists in existence despite the non-recurrence of the body.
cal) and subtle, unmanifest (astral) bodies. Like the sky, he is the support (of everything else), eternal, endless, unparalleled and all pervasive.

9. Fully absorbed in the meditation on Vāsudeva and by means of your logical reasoning, do you yourself ponder over the self that is abiding in your body, O great king.

10. Impelled by the imprecation of that Brāhmaṇa, Takṣaka shall not be able to burn you (i.e. your soul). All the causes of death can never burn the supreme Lord who himself is the death of such agents of death.

11-12. “I am the Brahman. I am the Supreme abode. Brahman, the highest goal (to be reached) is I myself.” Having realized this and absorbing yourself in the Supreme Self which is beyond the limits or conditions, you will see neither Takṣaka who is biting you at the foot with poisonous fangs (or licking it with his poisonous mouth) nor your body nor the world as being distinct and separate from your own Atman.

13. Dear Parikṣit! All this has been elucidated to you as per enquiries made by you about the sportful activities of Lord Hari, the Soul of the Universe. What more do you wish to hear from me, O king!

CHAPTER SIX

Takṣaka Bites Parikṣit: Janmejaya’s Serpent Sacrifice:
Classification of Vedas in Different Branches:

Śūta said:

1. Having heard this exposition from the Sage Śūka, the son of Vyāsa, who had the vision of Lord Hari, the soul abiding

1. VR: You will not feel the snake-bite as the causes of death cannot affect God and you who are absorbed in his contemplation.

VJ: Due to contemplation of God, Parikṣit would be in the proximity of God.
in all King Parikṣit, who (while in womb) was protected by Lord Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa) approached the lotus-feet of Śuka and bowed down with his head bent and palms folded.

The king Parikṣit requested:

2. My purpose in life (viz. of gaining spiritual wisdom) has been accomplished. I have been graciously favoured by your worship of merciful heart, as I have been made to listen directly (to the stories etc.) of Lord Hari who is the cause of the world and have been enlightened in the means of attaining to him.

3. I do not consider it a wonder that the grace of those noble persons who have completely devoted their hearts to Acyuta (Kṛṣṇa) should be showered on ignorant beings who have been tormented by miseries.

4. We have heard from you the collection of this (Bhāgavata) Purāṇa in which is extolled and praised Lord Viṣṇu of hallowing renown.

5. Worshipful Sir! Now I am not afraid of death either from Takṣaka or from other causes. I have entered (i.e. established my mind) in the fearless and supremely blissful Brahman, as guided by you.

6. O Brāhmaṇa sage! Be pleased to permit me. I shall now control my speech and other senses and concentrate on the supra-sensuous Lord. Entering (i.e. establishing my mind which is rid of all cravings and desires into the Supreme Lord, I shall give up my body.

7. You have graciously shown to me the fearless and the supreme state of the Almighty Lord, the firm insight of the knowledge and realisation of which have completely wiped out my nescience and the effects and impressions caused by it.

Sūta said:

8. The worshipful Śuka, the son of Bādarāyaṇa who was thus addressed and worshipped by the king, took leave of the

1. Or: Who looked upon all as within himself or with equal outlook (ŚR).

2. Or: Who is eternal with no beginning or end.
king and departed along with other ascetics (who came to listen to the Bhāgavata.)

9. By force of his reason, king Parīkṣit also established his mind firmly with his Soul and meditated on the Supreme Brahman remaining breathless and motionless like a tree (trunk or a post.)

10. On the bank of the Gaṅgā, facing to the north and seated on a seat of Kuśa grass the end of which pointed to the east, the great Yogin who was completely devoid of attachment and all whose doubts had been resolved, was completely merged in the Brahman.

11. O Brāhmaṇas! when the king became absorbed in Brahman, it was unnecessary and superfluous to kill him by snake-bite. In the meanwhile Takṣaka was directed by the revengeful and indignant son of Brāhmaṇa (sage Śamika). While Takṣaka was going with the intention of killing the King, on the way he met (the Brāhmaṇa) Kaśyapa (who knew how to counteract poison).

12. With payment of money, he gratified the Brāhmaṇa who knew how to cure (all types of) poison and made him go back. The serpent who was capable of assuming any form at will, disguised himself as a Brāhmaṇa and bit the King.

13. Instantly the body of the royal sage who had become merged in Brahman was reduced to ashes by the serpent poison, while all embodied beings stood as mere witnesses.

14. There arose a loud hue and cry all over the earth, the sky and in all directions. For all gods, asuras, men, etc. became astonished at the event.

15. (But it was also a joyous occasion as King Parīkṣit was absorbed in the Brahman). Drums were sounded in the heavens; Gandharvas and Apsaras (celestial musicians and dancers) sang. Gods, expressing their approbation, sent down showers of flowers.

1. MBH : Adi. 42.36-43 describes how Kaśyapa showed Takṣaka how he resuscitated the tree burnt to ashes by Takṣakabite.

2. The MBH Adi. 43. 22-36 makes him mixed up as a worm in the fruits, presented to the King by Nāga sages.
16. Hearing that his father had been assassinated by Takṣaka, Janmejaya flared up with wrath. With the help of Brāhmaṇa priests, he started a sacrificial session in which he offered Nāgas as oblations into the fire, in the prescribed manner.

17. Seeing that even big serpents were being burnt in the raging fire-blaze of the serpent-sacrifice, Takṣaka became terror-stricken and sought the protection of Indra.

18. Not seeing Takṣaka (invoked and oblated) in the sacred fire kindled for the sacrifice, the king Janmejaya, the son of Parīkṣit, enquired why Takṣaka, the vilest of serpents, was not invoked as oblation to the fire.

19. "O King of kings! It is Indra who is protecting Takṣaka as he has sought asylum with him. He has been protected and held back by Indra. Hence the serpent does not fall into the sacrificial fire."

20. Hearing that explanation, the highly intelligent son of Parīkṣit asked the officiating priests, "Why is not Takṣaka along with Indra invoked and made to fall into the fire (by you) O Brāhmaṇas?"

21. Hearing that request of Janmejaya) the Brāhmaṇas invoked Takṣaka along with Indra in that sacrifice thus: "O Takṣaka! Instantly fall into this (sacrificial) fire along with Indra, the leader of Maruts.¹

22. In this way, due to the (superior) force in the harsh invocation of the Brāhmaṇas, Indra, along with his aerial car and Takṣaka, was dislodged from his position and became bewildered (in mind).

23. Observing that Indra, along with his aerial car and Takṣaka, was crashing down from the sky, Bṛhaspati of the Aṅgirās gotra (clan) (strongly protested and) remonstrated with the king.²

24. "O King of men! This king of serpents cannot be killed by you, as nectar has been imbibed by him and he is hence immune from old age and death.

1. Who is accompanied by Marut (wind)—gods—VR. VJ.
2. As per MBH, Ādi. chs. 56-58 it is Āstika, the Yāyāvāra who made Janmejaya to stop the sacrifice.
25. (If you still insist on burning him as he is the murderer of your father, please consider that Life and death of a being and his (consequent) position in the other world—all is determined by his own actions (Karma). Hence, O King, (it is the Karma—the result of one’s action and) no other person can be held responsible as the cause of happiness or misery of any other person.

26. When a being meets death through the agency of a serpent, a thief, fire, lightning, starvation, thirst, disease and such other causes, the victim is experiencing the fruit of his own Karma that is in the process of fruition.

27. Therefore, let this malevolently motivated sacrificial session involving violence to life be stopped, as serpents, in spite of their innocence, have been burnt O King! (I however do not blame you for what you have done so far) It is the fruit of one’s part action that is experienced by people.

Sūta said:

28. Thus appealed, the king respected the words of the great sage and said, “Let it be done so.” He desisted from that serpent sacrifice and worshipped Brhaspati.

29. Such is this notable great deluding potency (Māyā) of Lord Viṣṇu. It is both incomprehensible and insuperable. It is due to the deluding force of this Māyā that beings, though rays or anītas of Viṣṇu succumb to passions (such as anger, etc.) which are the products of guṇas (like rajas and tamas) and do wrong to other fellow-beings.

30.* (Māyā is superable if you resort to Lord Viṣṇu). The notion such as ‘This man is a hypocrite’ which exists in the mind is Māyā. But it does not figure boldly or openly in the frequent discussions held by the exponents of the self in

*VJ. is more lucid:

When persons who, being experts in investigating into Upaniṣads, repeatedly carry on their enquiry or discussion about Paramātman, Māyā which has the capacity of deluding beings, does not wield any influence over Hari, though it may remain incomprehensible to others. Brahman cannot be comprehended even by the mind which is ‘unstable’ due to its apprehensions and doubts. Here the deities presiding over the mind or speech are implied and not the physical organ. Even these deities cannot comprehend paramātman.
their investigations about the self. (It is shown to exist somehow like one in a scared state of mind and does not function as a deluding potency). With relation to God there is no scope for various discussions or disputations which are based on Mâyâ as he is above that. Nor can the mind which is of the nature of creating ideations and doubts function in respect of God.

31. In relation to Him, no scope is there for the Jiva with its adjunct ahamkāra as its component and with Karma (action), materials bringing about Karma or its instruments and the fruit to be attained through the above two. He is above and unrelated to opposition or interruption (and hence does not oppose anybody or can be opposed by anybody). That being the nature of the self, the contemplative sage should discard these waves i.e. aberrations of ahamkāra and remain in the blissful state of Ātman.

32. Persons who after due examination (of the true nature of things) desire to renounce everything that is not Ātman (using the words ‘not that’, ‘not that’) declare that the essential supreme nature of Viṣṇu is as (described) above. They have given up the false notion of (the identification of the body and soul called here as) ‘I-ness’ and ‘mine-ness’ with reference to their body and belongings. With full control over their body, senses and mind they embrace the essential nature of Viṣṇu in their heart and realize the Ātman by their power of meditation.

33. Only they can attain to the supreme nature of Viṣṇu, who are not touched by the evil notion of ‘I’ and ‘mine’ with reference to their body and house.

34. One should tolerate disparaging remarks and harsh words; he should not show disrespect to anybody; nor should he cherish enmity to any one for the sake of this (physical) body (which is to be cast off one day).

35. I bow to the worshipful and glorious Kṛṣṇa-Dvaipā-yana Vyāsa¹ whose intelligence easily grasps everything (lit. is unobstructible). It is by meditating upon his feet that I learnt this compilation of Śrīmad Bhāgavata.

1. Glorious Lord Kṛṣṇa—VJ.
Śaunaka said:

36. Be pleased to tell us into how many branches (or schools) were the Vedas divided by Paila and others (viz. Vaiśampāyana, Jaimini, Sumantu and Śuka) great-souled teachers of the Vedas, the disciples of Vyāsa!

Śūta said:

37. While god Brahmā, the occupant of the highest position in the creation, was meditating with well-composed mind, from the space (the sky-like vacuum) in his heart arose a sound. The same sound is even perceptible when the function of the sense of hearing is closed.

38. By concentrating on that sound (nāda) O sage, yogins wipe out all the impurities of the mind caused by the Adhībhūta, the Adhyātma and the Adhidaiva and attain to Liberation from samsāra (lit. the state from which there is no return).

39. From that nāda (sound) arose the sacred syllable Om which consists of three mātrās (viz. a, u, m,) the source of which is unmanifest and shines (i.e. becomes manifest in the heart) by itself. That Om is the special index of the glorious Brahman, the Supreme Soul.

40. He (god Brahmā) hears the unmanifest syllable OM even when the auditory sense has ceased to work (as when the ears are closed) and whose cognition remains unaffected even when all senses become function-less. (as in Samādhi or in deep sleep). It is that sacred syllable OM which, evolving from Paramātman, becomes manifest (audible) in the cavity of the heart and produces the great speech called the Vedas.

1. Concentration on the Nāda (sound) is a special Type of Yoga.
2. These terms are variously interpreted: Thus dvaya or adhi-bhūta is taken as pertaining to the bhūtas or elements the body; Kriyā or adhyātma as organs of actions (VJ) but karma—merit as well as sin (VR); Kāraka or adhidaiva as sense of perception' (VJ) Sense-organs (VR).
3. aprabhava (i) The source of which is too subtle to be understood by those who are not adept in Yoga (VR).
   (ii) Whose source is the unmanifest Hari (VJ).
4. This is not possible in the case of Jīva who depends on sense-organs (ŚR).
41*. It (Praṇava or OM) directly and comprehensively expresses the Supreme Soul (Paramātmā), the Brahman itself which is its source. It is the eternal seed of all the Mantras, Vedas and Upaniṣads.

42. It i.e. OM is constituted of three sounds: A and others viz. U and M, O most prominent member of the Bhṛgu clan. These sounds—A, U and M severally contain (the seed of) the triads of entities, viz. *guna*s (modes of prakṛti, viz. sattva, rajas and tamas), names (the Vedas—Ṛg, Śāman and Yajus), substances (the three spheres or worlds known as bhūḥ—the earth, bhuvah—the sky and the aerial region svaḥ—the heaven and states of consciousness (wakefulness, dream and deep sleep).

43. Out of the (above) three syllables, the glorious Lotus-born god Brahmā evolved the alphabets consisting of semi-vowels (y, v, r, l), aspirants (ṭ, ṭ, s, ṣ, h), vowels, consonants (viz. gutturals, palatals, cerebrals, dentals, and labials) short, long and prolated accents or sound measures.)

44. With the help of these sounds (letters of the alphabet) Brahmā, through his four mouths, gave expression to four Vedas together with the vyāhritis (bhūḥ, bhuvah, svaḥ) and the sacred syllable OM. He intended to lay down the duties of the priests, viz., hotā, adhvaryu, udgātā and Brahmā officiating at sacrifice.

45. He taught the Vedas to his sons (like Marici and others) who were Brāhmaṇa sages and made them experts in the Vedic pronunciation and intonation. They became the promulgators of dharma and taught the same, in their turn, to their sons.

*Both VR and VJ use the adjectives in this verse as qualifying the Brahman e.g. the Brahmā who is the most powerful in its own essential glory. VJ states that previously OM is called ‘a significant index (liṅga) of the Brahman, here it is described as its comprehensive (vdeaka) expression and the seed of Mantras and Vedas which when pronounced and articulated properly have the potency to give the fruit of all Mantras: acchinatvenoecārvya-māṇam sarva-mantrādīnāṁ jāptānām phalā-dāna-sāmarthyāṁ janayati /

1. arthaḥ. VR, as a Viśiṣṭādvaitin, proposes the following triad:

(i) Jñātman deserves to be a part and parcel of Paramātman. (ii) He depends for shelter on Paramātman and is (iii) fit to be enjoyed by him.
46. During the course of the four Yugas those Vedas were handed down from generation to generation by their disciples who were strict in the observance of Vows. These Vedas were rearranged by great sages at the beginning of the Dvāpara age.

47. Observing that men are having decreasing span of life growing less and less energetic and becoming poorer in intellectual capacity, the Brāhmaṇa sages, as directed by Lord Viṣṇu, enthroned in their heart, re-arranged the Vedas.

48. Even in this (Vaivasvata Manvantara also, O sage, the glorious Lord, the Protector of the world was prayed by the rulers of various spheres like god Brahmā, Rudra and others to protect the path of righteousness.

49. (Responding favourably to their prayers) the Almighty Lord descended as the son of Parāśara and Satyavatī, out of a ray (particle) of Sattva which is but a part of the Māyā. He divided the Veda into four parts, O fortunate sage!

50. Just as (out of a heap of mixed up precious stones) precious stones of the same kind are assorted and kept in separate heaps, he (Vyāsa) selected and classified the Vedic Mantras as belonging to the category of the Rg, Atharvan, Yajus, and Sāman and thus compiled four Samhitās or collections out of those (formerly mixed up) Mantras.

51. The vastly intelligent Vyāsa summoned four of his pupils and entrusted to each of them one of the Samhitās, O Śaunaka.

52. As the tradition goes, he taught the first compilation called Bahurca or the Rgveda to Paila and to Vaiśampāyana, the compilation called Yajurveda which (being a collection of prose texts to be recited at the sacrifice) is also called Nigada.

53. He taught the compilation of Śāma-Veda or the

---

1. ŚR corrects this statement by pointing out that it was at the end of the Dvāpara age, at the time of King Śantana, that Vyāsa re-arranged the Vedas.

2. Bahurca—so called as it consists of the biggest number of Mantras.
Chandoga samhitā (compilation of mantras to be sung according to metre in which they are composed) to Jaimini. And the compilation of Atharvāṅgirasi or the Atharva Veda to his disciple named Sumantu.

54-56. (Dividing the Rgveda into two branches) the sage Paila taught that Samhitā to Indra-pramiti and Bāṣkala. Bāṣkala on his part divided the Samhitā taught to him in four branches and taught one each respectively to (his pupils) Bodhya, Yājñavalkya, Parāśara and Agnimitra, O descendant of Bhṛgu (i.e. Śaunaka). Indrapramiti, a man of controlled mind, taught his Samhitā to the learned sage Māṇḍūkeya (who was his son). Māṇḍūkeya’s disciple was Devamitra who taught it to Saubhari and others.

57. Śākalya was Māṇḍūkeya’s son. He divided his Samhitā into five branches and imparted the knowledge of one each to his pupils, Vātsya, Mudgala, Śālīya, Gokhalya, and Śiśira.

58. The sage Jātukarṇya was another disciple of Śākalya. He (divided his Samhitā into three parts) taught his Samhitā together with its Nirukta (etymological explanation of Vedic words) to his (four) pupils, Balāka, Paija, Vaitāla and Viraja.

59. Bāṣkala’s son, Bāskali, carved out of all the above mentioned branches a new Samhitā called Vālakhilya Samhitā which was mastered and preserved by (his disciples) Bālāyani, Bhajya and Kāsāra.

60. These compilations (branches) of the Bahurça or the Rgveda were learnt and preserved by these Brāhmaṇa sages. He who listens to the classification of the Vedas is absolved of all sins. (Now follows the account of the Taittirīya Samhitā of the Yajurveda).

61. It is traditionally reported that Vaiśampāyana had pupils called Carakādhwaryus.¹ For the sake of their preceptor, they performed a penance in expiation of the sin of Brahma-hatyā (killing a Brāhmaṇa).

¹ The term is variously explained: Pupils called
(i) Carakas and Adhvaryus
(ii) Carakas who became Adhvaryus (experts in the Yajurveda)
Caraka (1) One who observed a vow
(2) Pilgrims to places of holy water (VJ)
Adhvaryus—experts in conducting sacrifices. (VJ).
62. One of his disciples, Yājñavalkya, remarked (to Vaiśampāyana). "O worshipful Sir, what (insignificant) amount of reward (in the form of expiation of the sin) can be gained through the poor performance of penance by these weaklings? I alone can undergo such austere penance as will be extremely difficult for others to perform (and will alone absolve you of the sin of Brahma-hatyā)."

63. When (boastfully) addressed thus, the preceptor (Vaiśampāyana) got offended. He (peremptorily) ordered; "Get out. Enough of a pupil like you who contemptuously speak of Brähmana sages. Give up at once whatever you have learnt from me."

64. Thereupon, the son of Devarāta (Yājñavalkya) on his part immediately vomitted out the collection of Yajurveda passages (that he learnt from his preceptor) and left the place. And the sages saw the collection of the Yajurveda texts.

65. (At that sight) the sages were so enamoured of it (and greedily wanted to master as much of it as they could. But acceptance of vomition being disgraceful to Brähmana)s they assumed the form of Tittira birds (francolines Partridges) and collected it. Hence the beautiful branches of the Yajurveda came to be known as Taittirīyas. (The origin of the branches called Kāṇva, Mādhyandina of the white Yajurveda is now explained).

66. Thereupon, in search of Śruti portions not known even to his preceptor, Yājñavalkya devoutly worshipped and prayed the sun-god, the Master of Vedas¹ as follows:

Yājñavalkya implored:

67. Salutations to the glorious sun-god denoted by the syllable OM²—The sun-god who, though one, abides in

1. ŚR's quotation :
   \[ Rgbiḥ pūrvahātō dīvi-deva śyate, Yajurvede śyati, madhyē aknaḥ \]
   Sāma-vedamāstamaye mahīyate
   \[ Vedair aśūyās tribhṛetī sûryāḥ \]

2. VJ : Salutations to the Supreme Lord denoted by the syllable Oṁ, the Brahman itself. You are endowed with six excellent attributes which show your supreme nature as applied to sages like Vasiṣṭha. You are eternal preceding all creation (ādiyād).
the form of ātman, in the whole of the universe, enthroned in the hearts of four categories of beings (viz. oviparous, viviparous, Sweat-born, sprouted from the earth i.e. the plants, etc.) beginning from god Brahmā down to a clump of grass; but who (though inside like a jīva) is not circumscribed by any condition, who like the limitless sky envelops the universe from the out-side as well in the form of Time. The almighty God maintains, all alone, the life and progress of the world by evaporating waters (during the summer) and releasing them back (as rain-showers during the rainy season) throughout years constituted of parts of time such as a moment, an instant, an eye-wink, etc. (This explains the Varenyatva stated in the first foot of the Gāyatri-mantra).

68. O Prominent god! The creator of the world! We devoutly and properly as per Vedic procedure) meditate upon that celebrated orb of yours which is shining over these. O god of blazing splendour! You burn down all the sins and (the resultant) miseries as well as their seed (ignorance) in the case of those who worship (and contemplate upon) you as per prescriptions laid down in the Vedas. We worship you thrice a day (in the morning, the mid-day and the evening) as per rules laid down in the Vedas. (This explains the second foot of the Gāyatri Mantra).

69. You of your own accord become the soul, the inner controller of the multitudes of mobile and immobile beings in this world, which depend on you for their very existence and direct their minds, sense-organs, vital breaths which are distinct from the soul and hence inert matter. (This explains the third foot of the Gāyatri).

70. Beholding that this world is swallowed up by an extremely horrendous boa-constrictor (of terrible jaws) called 'darkness' and is bereft of consciousness as if it is dead, you, being extremely tender-hearted, resuscitated it by your compassionate glance and directed it to attend to the course of performing their religious duties thrice every day which ultimately lead to the summum bonum and you go about like the sovereign of the world instilling terror in the hearts of the wicked.

71. On all sides, at every stage, you are worshipped by the guardian deities of the cardinal points with presents in their lotus-bud-like joined palms.

72. Hence, as I am desirous of learning those texts of the \textit{Yajurveda} which are fresh (i.e. not properly known to others), I approach and worship your lotus-feet which are bowed down by (Indra and other) rulers of the three worlds." Thus prayed Yajñavalkya.

\textit{Sūta} said:

73. Being thus extolled and pleased thereby, the glorious Lord Hari i.e. the sun-god, assumed the form of a horse and out of grace, imparted to that sage the knowledge of those portions of the \textit{Yajurveda} which were not stale (i.e. known to others).

74. That (spiritually) powerful sage classified hundreds of those \textit{mantras} of the \textit{Yajurveda} into fifteen branches, known as \textit{Vājasanis} (They were called \textit{Vājasani} as they were delivered very rapidly from the hair of his mane by the sun god in the form of a horse) Kāṇva, Mādhyaandina and other sages learnt those branches.

(Now begins the topic of \textit{Sāma-veda})

75. Jaimini, the Chanter of the \textit{Sāma-Veda} had a son called Sumantu who was (already) a sage. He had a son called Sunvan. To each of them, Jaimini taught a separate branch of the (\textit{Sāma-Veda}) \textit{samhitā}.

76. Jaimini had another disciple called Sukarmā who was a Brāhmaṇa of vast intellectual capacity. He classified the compilation of \textit{Sāman} hymns into one thousand branches (\textit{lit.}
he made the tree of the \textit{Sāmaveda} grow into a thousand branches).

77. Hiraṇya-nābha of Kosala (country) and Pauṣyaṇji—both disciples of Sukarman accepted (i.e. learnt) the entire \textit{Sāmaveda}. So did another disciple Āvantya (a resident of Avanti) who was the most prominent knower of Brahma (Veda).

78. Pauṣyaṇji and Āvantya as well, each had five hundred disciples. They say that Pauṣyaṇji, Āvantya as well as Hiraṇya-nābha\textsuperscript{1} had five hundred disciples who learnt as many \textsuperscript{1} ŠR quotes \textit{Vīrū} P. 3.6.4. b and 5 to support this.

branches of Śīma. They hailed from the northern part of the country and hence are called 'Northerners' though some call them "easterners".

79. Laugāksi, Māṅgali, Kulya, Kuśida and Kukṣi—the (other) pupils of Pauṣyaṇīji accepted (learnt) hundred compilations (Branches) of Śāmaveda each.

80. Kṛta, the disciple of Hiranyanābha taught twenty-four compilations (of Śīma hymns) to his pupils and Āvantya, a man of self-control, taught the remaining collections to his students.

CHAPTER SEVEN

The Branches of the Atharva Veda : Characteristics of the Purāṇas

Sūta said:

1. Sumantu was well versed in the Atharva Veda. He taught his collection (of Atharva hymns) to his disciple Kabandha who in his turn taught it to Pathya and Vedadarśa.

2. The disciples of Vedadarśa were Śauklāyani, Brahmabali, Modoṣa and Pippalāyani. (Vedadarśa divided the Samhīra in four parts and taught them). Listen to the (names of) disciples of Pathya, O Brāhmaṇa (Śaunaka). Kumuda, Śunāka, and Jājali, the expert knower of the Atharva Veda (were the pupils of Pathya who divided the Samhitā in three parts and taught them).

3. Śunaka (born in the family of Aṅgiras) had two disciples—Babhru as well as Saindhavāyana. They studied the two collections (of the Atharva) their disciples—Sāvarṇya and others also (studied the same in their turn).

4. Nakṣatra-Kalpa, Śānti-Kalpa, Kaśyapa, Aṅgiras and

1. This chapter is closely similar to VP 3.6
2. Vide VP. 3.6.9.
3. As VP. 3.6.13-14 states Nakṣatra-Kalpa, Śānti-Kalpa Veda-Kalpa, Samhitā-Kalpa and Aṅgirasā Kalpa are the collection of Atharvan hymns and others were the teachers of the Atharva Veda. O Śaunaka, now listen to the names of the teachers of the Purānic lore.

5. Traiyārūṇi, Kaśyapa, Sāvarṇi, Akṛtavraṇa, Vaiśampāyana and Hārita—these six are traditionally noted as the teachers of the Purāṇas.

6. These teachers learnt one Purāṇa collection each, by oral tradition, from my father (Romaharṣaṇa) who was a pupil of Vyāsa. While I, as a disciple of each of them, learnt them all.

7. I, Kaśyapa, Sāvarṇi and Paraśurāma’s disciple Akṛtavraṇa—We four learnt the original four collections of Purāṇa from Vyāsa’s disciple.

8. Now listen with intelligent attention the characteristics of Purāṇas as described by Brāhmaṇa sages in conformity to Vedas and Śāstras.

9-10. Those who are experts in Purānic lore declare that a Purāṇa is distinguished by the following ten characteristics\(^1\) (or topics dealt with) : (1) Subtle creation (Sarga), (2) gross creation (Visarga), (3) Sustenance (Vṛitti), (4) Protection of the universe (Rakṣā), (5) Cause or the lust for Karmas (Hetu), (6) the periods of Manu (Antara i. e. Manvantara), (7) Dynasties of Kings (Vansha), (8) Deeds of the Lord and dynastic kings (Vansānucarita), (9) Physical annihilation (Samsthā), (10) The Last support or ultimate reality (Apātraya). O Brāhmaṇa (Śaunaka), some say that Purāṇas have five characteristics\(^2\) which distinguishes between great and small Purāṇas.\(^3\)

11. Sarga (Subtle creation) is (i. e. consists of topics like) the evolution of Mahat (the principle of cosmic Intelligences like Kaśyapa, Aṅgiras preserved them. These Kalpas treat of rituals connected with the worship of Nakṣatras, Śaṅkikarma (propitiatory rituals) etc. Here the names of the Sāṁhitās stand for the authors (ŚR).

1. Bh. P. Supra 2.10.3-7 has given these ten characteristics with some different nomenclature. For the discussion of these topics vide Vol. I. Introduction, pp. XVIII-XXXIV.

2. ŚR enumerates them as follows : Sarga, Pratisarga, Vansha, manvantara and Vansānucarita.

3. As the Intro. mentioned in the above note shows these ten characteristics can be epitomised into five. Hence these need not be regarded as a differentia between a Mahā Purāṇa and Upā-Purāṇa.
gence) from the agitation of and disturbance in the balance of equilibrium of the three guṇas of the Unmanifest Prakṛti—the Primordial Matter) leading to the evolution of three-fold Ahaṁkāra (of the Vaikārika or Sāttvika, Rājasa and Tāmasa types, according to the dominance of the particular guṇa) the evolutes of which are subtle elements (bhūtas), the sense-organs and their objects (viz. gross elements and the deities presiding over the sense-organs).

12. Visarga (gross creation) is the creation of the gross mobile and immobile nature resulting from the collective effects evolved out of Mahat and other principles charged with the potency of creation by the Supreme Person and dominated by the influence of previous Karmas (of the Jīvas) evolving in the manner of the continuation of a seed from a seed.

13. The immobile creation (e.g. food-grains, fruits, roots) and some products of mobile creation also form the sustenance of the mobile creation. And in the case of human beings, the sustenance is determined by their nature, desire and scriptural injunctions¹ (the earth is the real support or sustenance of mobile creatures as described in the fifth Skandha.

14. Rakṣā or Protection of the universe consists of the incarnations and the sportive acts (exploits, etc.) of Lord Viṣṇu, from age to age appearing among sub-human beings (e.g. the Boar incarnation), human beings (e.g. Parasūrāma, Rāma) sages (e.g. Kapila) and among gods, and the extermination of the haters of the three Vedas (e.g. demons).

15. Manvantara (Manu-period) is the period presided over by the particular Manu (e.g. Vaivasvata Manu at present), the set of gods, the sons of Manu, Indra, seven sages and the incarnations of Hari. Thus a Manvantara is characterized by the above six special features.

16. Vamśa (race) is the line or race of pure, blue-blooded kings born of god Brahmā and continued throughout the three divisions of time (viz. the past, present and future). Vamsānucarita is the history of these kings, and of their descendants.

¹. VJ. The sustenance is determined according to the will of men (e.g. fruit, grain, etc.) and to the prescriptions laid down in the Śāstras (e.g. caru Pūrṇḍāra).

17. The destruction of the universe created by Māyā is of four types: (1) Occasional or brought about by a particular cause, (2) Prakṛti (of the Prakṛti), (3) Constant and (4) Absolute. This dissolution is called Samsthā by the sages.

18.* The Hetu (cause), the motive power or cause of the universe is the Jīva (individual soul). He is the doer of actions under the influence of Nescience or ignorance. From the point of those who emphasize his conscious or spiritual aspect, he is the enjoyer of the fruits of the balance of his Karmas, while from that of those who stress the Upādhi (conditioned existence) aspect, he is unmanifest i.e. without name and form before the creation.

19-20. Apātraya (The last support or ultimate reality) is Brahman. It is present as a witness to what is effected by Māyā, as in the three states of Jīva (viz. Viśva, Taśjasa and Prājña) in wakefulness, dreaming and dreamless-deep-sleep and is also quite different or distinct from them as in Samādhi. Just as the basic matter (e.g. clay) is both related to and unrelated to its products (clay is found in all things made of clay and

1. The dissolution brought about by the Māyā.

*VR Through his ignorance Jīva commits acts both of merits and sins. It is for enjoying the fruits of those Karmas that the world is there. Thus he becomes the cause of the creation. Some opine that Jīva has always a balance of Karmas to be enjoyed (bhukta-phala-karmāvaśeṣaḥ) and is full of desire to enjoy, while others say that before creation he had no name or form but possessed the impressions of Karmas (Vāsanā).

VJ Interprets anusāya as 'one who enters into Paramātmā at the time of deluge and sleeps and ayākṛta is disinterested (?) or immutable (nirvikāra) like the sky. The world is created for the Jivas to experience pleasure or pain as per their Karmas. Hence he is the cause of creation.

VR : Brahman is present in all the products of Prakṛti and the states of Jīva but is not affected by it essentially. Brahman is unconnected.

VJ : Viśnu is the only support (Apātraya) and none else. He is present in all states of Jīva but is not affected by them. He exists before, during and after these states (such as wakefulness and others). Brahman is both connected and unconnected with all states and substances. And hence their support. It, being without a second, is inferrable by invariable concomitance (anavya) or the reverse of it (Vyatireka).
still it exists apart from them); or just as Sat (real existence) forms the substratum of the name and form, Brahman is related to all the (nine) stages of living beings since their inception to death (as the substratum) and is distinct from them. (The Apātraya is the highest goal of these characteristics of Purāṇas).

21. When the mind transcends the (above-mentioned) three states (of jīva) either of its own accord (as in the case of sages like Vāmadeva who realized that this creation is Māyā and Brahman is the only reality)—or by the practice of Yoga (as with Kapila’s mother Devahūti), then a person realizes Ātman (the self) (ceases to have any Vāsanās) and desists from worldly activities.

22. Sages who are well versed in ancient lore declare that eighteen Purāṇas whether big or small are distinguished by the ten characteristics (described above).

25. O Brāhmaṇa sage (Śaunaka): Thus has been related (to you) the account of the classification of Vedas into different branches by the sage (Vyāsa) and his disciples and pupils of those disciples. It (listening to this account) enhances the glory of Brahman (of the listeners, if devoutly and attentively heard.)

1. They are as follows: Entry into the womb (as a seed) gestation, birth, infancy (upto the age of five), boyhood (upto sixteen), youth (upto fortyfive), middle age (upto sixty), old age and death—vide Supra 11 22.46.
CHAPTER EIGHT

Mārkaṇḍeya’s Penance and Praise of Lord Nārāyaṇa

Saunaka said:

1. O Sūta! May you live long. O virtuous one! You are the proper guide to men who are wandering in the endless darkness (of Samsāra) as you show them the way out of it. You are the most eminent speaker. Be pleased to tell us one thing which we earnestly desire to know.

2. People say that the son of Mṛkaṇḍa, the sage (Mārkaṇḍeya) is blessed with a very long life and that he remained alive even when the deluge indicating the end of the Kalpa submerged (lit. swallowed up) the whole of this world.

3. (As per tradition) it was in this very Kalpa that the prominent descendant of Bhṛgu was born in our very family. And as far as we know, no deluge or destruction of all beings has taken place to this day.

It is further reported that while he was drifting along on the sea of cosmic waters, he saw the Supreme Person in the form of an extraordinary babe lying on a banyan leaf (with a shallow cavity).

4-5. This (the possibility of the above tradition) is a matter of grave doubt to us. Hence, we have got curiosity (about its veracity) O Sūta. O Yogin, you are respected as an authority on Purāṇas. Be pleased to clarify (and resolve) the above doubt.

Sūta said:

6. O great sage, the enquiry made by you is such as will dispel the misapprehension (in the minds) of the people in general; for while replying to your query the story of Lord Nārāyaṇa will have to be told and that will wash off the sins of the Kali age.

7. Having received consecration at the hands of his father by the investiture of the sacred thread (as per Śāstric injunctions), Mārkaṇḍeya in due course, studied the Vedas as prescribed in religious scriptures and in due course, came to possess (the spiritual power, acquired by) penance and (mastery over) the Vedic Lore.

8. He observed the great vow of celibacy for life, was quiescent (as he brought passions under his control). He wore matted hair (on his head), bark garments, the sacred thread and the girdle of Kuśa grass. He carried a water jar of gourd and a staff in his hands.

9. He wore a deer skin and had a rosary of Rudrākṣa beads and Kuṭa grass. For the enhancement of his disciplined life and merits, he worshipped Hari present in the (sacrificial) fire, the sun, his preceptor, Brāhmaṇa and within himself both in the morning and in the evening.

10. He brought food received as alms, both morning and in the evening, and offered it to his preceptor silently. If permitted by his preceptor, he partook of the food once (in a day) and observed fast if no permission was given (due to the arrival of an unexpected guest, etc.)

11. In this way, while absorbed in the performance of penance and Vedic studies, he engaged himself in worshipping Lord Hari for millions of years and conquered death which is extremely difficult to overcome.

12. By this (conquest over death) god Brahmā, Bṛgū, god Śiva, Dakṣa and other sons of god Brahmā (such as Nārada and men, gods, manes and all other beings (in the world) marvelled greatly (at his wonderful achievement).

13. Possessed of austere penance, deep Vedic studies and self-control, he observed the great vow of life-long celibacy. All the distracting passions in his heart were destroyed. With his mind drawn within, that Yogin meditated upon the Suprasensuous Lord Hari.

14. Even as the Yogin was engaged in concentrating his mind through the great Yoga on the Supreme person, a long period of time extending over six Manvantaras had passed away.

15. It is said that when Indra came to know of this (performance of penance) in the present seventh Manvantara, he became alarmed at it and began to create interruptions in it, O Brāhmaṇa (Śaunaka).

16. (with a view to interrupting his penance and pre-icipitating his own fall) he deputed to the sage, divine musicians, celestial dancing girls, Cupid (god of Love), the presiding deities of the spring season and the gentle breeze from the Malaya mountain wafting (love-excitng) fragrance as well as greed and pride, the sons (or the products) of rajas.

17. All of them went to the northern slopes of the Himalayas where the river Puṣpabhadrā flows and to the slab of stone called Citra, O Lord (Ṣaunaka).

18. The premises of that holy hermitage were adorned with sacred trees (like Aśvattha) and creepers, densely occupied with families of holy Brāhmaṇa sages and were full of pools of holy crystal-clear water.

19. It was resonant with the melodious humming of intoxicated bees and loud with the cooing of joyous cuckoos. It was full of the vivacious movements of ecstatic dancing of the peacocks and of the flights of various birds in joy (displaying their delight).

20. Bearing with it the cool spray of mountain cascades and embraced by fragrant flowers (and hence wafting their sweet scent), the (southern Malaya) wind entered and blew gently exciting the passion of love (in the hearts of men).

21. The spring season manifested itself with the rising moon as the face of the night (i.e. evenings beautiful with the rising moon), with rows of tender leaves and branches of flowers and clusters of trees entwined with creepers (as if in close embrace).

22. Followed by the celestial singers (Gandharvas) with companies of artistes experts in vocal and instrumental music, and accompanied with a troupe of divine damsels, the god of love appeared with a bow and arrows.

23. Those servants of Indra saw the sage sitting steadfast with his eyes closed after offering oblations to the sacrificial fire, looking formidable (and hence unassailable) like fire in the human form.

24. The celestial damsels danced before him and the singers began to sing and the players of instrumental music played upon the Mṛdañga, lute, Pañavakas and horns.

25. While the spring season (i.e. its presiding deity) and son of rajas (Greed)—were trying to agitate his mind, Kāma (the god of love) set his missile of five-pointed shaft\(^1\) to his bow.

26-27. While Puñjika-sthali (a celestial damsel in her role of a temptress was plying with balls (in the presence of the sage), her slim waist was as if afflicted (and hence unstable) under the weight of her full breasts, wreaths of flowers were dropping from her hair. Her eyes were (as if) wandering (i.e. she was constantly looking) this way or that way. While she was running after the balls the wind blew away her fine garment (sāri) as the zone (which was fastened round it) got snapped (and slipped).

28. Feeling confident that the sage is now (as good as) subdued, Smara (the god of love) discharged that shaft, but like all the endeavours put forth by an unfortunate person, his attempt (against the sage) proved futile.

29. Thus while committing that offence against the sage, they were being scorched by his spiritual lustre (and being afraid of what would be the consequence of their offence) they ran away as children do after rousing a snake, O sage.

30. There is certainly nothing wonderful in the case of the great-souled ones, O Śaunaka, that the great sage, despite his being thus attacked by the minions of Indra, was not affected by anger, infatuation and such other perturbing feelings resulting from ahankāra.

31. Perceiving the paleness of expression (on the countenance) of Kāma and his troop of followers and hearing from them the spiritual splendour and power of the Brāhmaṇa sage, (even) the glorious lord of the celestial region (Indra) was extremely astonished.

32. In this way, while the sage was concentrating his mind on the Lord by means of penance, study of the Vedas and self-control, Lord Viṣṇu, in order to shower his grace on him, manifested himself in the form of sages Nara and Nārāyaṇa.

33-34. They (i.e. Lords Nara and Nārāyaṇa) were fair (white) and dark blue in complexion respectively; with eyes beautiful like fresh-blown lotuses and with four arms (each).

---

\(^1\) SR enumerates the stages of love-lornship such as fascination, agitation, intoxication or maddening etc. as the “points” of Kāma’s shaft.
They were clad in deerskin and bark garments and wore the rings of the sacred Kusa grass, and a sacred threefold thread (comprised of nine strands). They carried with them a water pot (of gourd or wood specially used by ascetics) and a straight bamboo staff, a rosary of lotus-seeds, a broom to brush aside insects (without harming them) and a handful of darbha grass\(^1\) (representing the Vedas). They were of a high stature and by their halo of golden lustre refulgent like the flashes of lightening, they appeared like asceticism itself incarnate, and were worshipped by prominent gods.

35. Beholding the two sages, Nara and Nārāyaṇa, the two forms of the glorious Lord, he rose to his feet and most respectfully prostrated himself before them like a staff.

36. His body, senses and the mind became deeply satisfied and tranquil through joy caused by their blissful sight. His hair stood on their ends (at the thrill of joy) and eyes were full of tears. He could not even visualize them.

37. He stood up with his palms folded and humbly bowed to them. Out of ardent desire, he was as if embracing them. And in faltering accents, he welcomed those two Lords with words Namo namah (Salutations! Bow-to you both).

38. He brought (and offered) seats to them and washed their feet. He worshipped them respectfully, offering them arghya (articles of worship) pigment, flowers and incense.

39. When both of them were comfortably seated and appeared disposed to shower their grace on him, he saluted them again and submitted to those eminent-most sages (as follows :)

Märkaṇḍeya submitted:

40. How is it possible for (an ordinary Jīva like) me to extol you (of infinite glory) O Almighty Lord? The vital breath (Prāṇa) can pulsate when propelled by you and speech, mind and cognitive and conative senses of embodied beings begin to function with the throbbing of the life principle. This happens even in the case of great gods like the birthless god Brahmā, god Śiva as well as of mine: (though all beings from god Brahmā are controlled by you as wooden dolls and are not free agents, but if they, with their controlled speeches or action worship you) you are the friend of the soul of those devotees (and not the friend of their bodies as the parents and other near relatives).

---

1. Some annotators opine that the broom was of darbha grass.

41. These two forms of yours, O glorious Lord, are for the protection, removal of the three types of miseries (viz. ādhyātmika, ādhibhautika, ādhitaiivika) and for the conquest of death (i.e. the attainment of mokṣa or final emancipation from samsāra) of the three worlds. For the protection of the world, you assume various other bodies (such as the divine Fish, Tortoise, Boar and others). Even as a spider, you swallow up (i.e. withdraw within yourself) the whole of the universe after creating it.

42. I resort to the soles of the feet of that Protector and controller of the mobile and immobile creation. To a person who takes permanent asylum with them (the Lord’s feet) the dirt¹ in the form of Karmas (merits and demerits) gunas (and the consequent passions like lust, anger, etc.) and Time (and sufferings mentioned in the above verse) does not contaminate. Verily those sages who know the essence and the inner meaning of the Vedas extol, pay their respects with intense devotion, constantly worship and ever meditate upon them with the desire of attaining to them.

43. We do not know any secure and blissful place (or the summum bonum) to persons beset with fear on all sides, in all the worlds other than attainment of your feet, as you are the very embodiment of Mokṣa (emancipation from Samsāra), O Almighty Ruler! Even the god Brahmā whose span of life and duration of position (as the head of the creation) last for two Parārdha years is terribly afraid of the Time-spirit (which is just a movement of your eye-brow). What need be said of other beings who are his creations?

44. This being the case, I shall give up (attachment to) the body and (home, wife, son, etc.) belongings which are futile, unreal, contemptible, transient, which obscures the self (—but which is not ultimately different from the self but is basically the self itself). And I shall resort to your feet as you are transcendental, the embodiment of the true (spiritual) knowledge, (or whose will is ever true), the preceptor or father of the Jīva (who by entering the Jīva controls him and makes him perform good acts and instructs him in spiritual knowledge). (It is only by betaking oneself to your feet that) one can attain all desired objects i.e. Puruṣārthas (such as Dharma, Artha, Kāma and Mokṣa).

¹ SR and VR note the v.l. rujāh ‘diseases’ (like karma, etc).

45. O Lord! Although the guṇas (Sattva, rajas and tamas)—the products of the Māyā—are the causes of the sustenance, creation and destruction of the universe, and are regarded as the sportive activities of yours, your Sāttvic manifestation (i.e. Viṣṇu form) alone leads to eternal profound peace in Mokṣa (Liberation from Sāṁsāra). O friend of the soul, but not the other two (viz. Brahmā and Rudra) for they are the sources of miseries, delusion and fear to men.

46. It is hence that intelligent persons who have understood the truth in this world, worship your pure manifestation (viz. Śrī Nārāyaṇa) which is so dear to your devotees. The followers of the Pāñcarātra school believe that pure Sattva (and no other guṇa) is the manifestation of the Supreme Person, and that through Sattva alone is attained the abode of the Lord which is the state of absolute fearlessness and full of the bliss of realization of the self which cannot be attained by other two guṇas.

47. My salutation to the glorious Lord (of six excellences) the Inner Controller, all pervading as well as manifesting himself in the form of the universe, the creator and the preceptor of the universe, the supreme Deity revealed in the dual form of sage Nārāyaṇa of perfect spiritual knowledge and Nara the best among men, the purest existence, the controller of speech (in the form of Vedic lore) and the promulgator of the path of Vedas.

48. Even though you are present in a person’s own sense-organs, vital airs, heart and objects of senses (coming in the range of his perception) as the Inner Controller, his understanding is so much covered (deluded) by your deluding potency (Māyā) and his intellect is bewildered in following the path of misleading senses that he cannot cognize you. But such a person (who is so much ignorant in the beginning) is able to know you directly on being enlightened into (the inner meaning of) the Vedas through you who are the preceptor of all.¹

49. You are the Supreme Person whose vision or the knowledge that throws light on your real mysterious nature, is obtained only through the Vedas. Great sages of whom the unborn god Brahmā is prominent, are bewildered about your true nature, even though they are trying to realize you. You present yourself in a form or character conforming to the theories of all schools of thought. I bow to you who are the pure knowledge itself, concealed by the limiting conditions of the body and other environments.

CHAPTER NINE

The Lord Exhibits His Māyā

Sūta continued:

1. When the glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa, the friend of (the sage) Nara, was eulogized in these words by the intelligent sage Mārkaṇḍeya, he became highly pleased and spoke to the descendant of the Bhṛgu race.

The glorious Lord said:

2. O excellent Brāhmaṇa sage, you have attained perfection (Siddha-hood) by virtue of your concentration of mind, through unswerving devotion to me and by your austere penance, study of the Vedas and self-control.

3. We (i.e. all gods) are highly pleased with you by your observance of the great bow (of life-long celibacy). May

1. According to VJ: even though a person may be deeply learned in the Vedas, he is by nature inclined to enjoyment of objects and his judgement is clouded by Māyā. It is by God's grace alone that knowledge about him is easily obtainable (tvat-prasādena tvaj-jñānam sulabham iverthaḥ.
you be happy and prosperous! Accept any desired boon from me who am the Supreme Ruler of those capable of conferring boons.

The sage (Mārkaṇḍeya) replied:

4. Victory to you. O Ruler of gods of celestials (like Brahmā, Rudra) You are the remover of the agonies of those who earnestly resort to you. O Immutable Lord, that your Lordship have been gracious enough to reveal yourself to me is in itself the greatest boon bestowed on me. And that is quite enough for me.

5. Even great gods like Brahmā regard themselves as having achieved their objective in life when they get in their minds purified (and ‘ripened’) through Yoga, a (mental) vision of your glorious Lotus feet. That Supreme Lord has revealed himself within the range of my perception (before my very eyes).

6. O Lord with eyes beautiful like lotus-petals, I would, however, like to have a vision of your Māyā, deluded by whom the world along with the Protectors of the spheres like Brahmā, experience differences (such as gods, Subhuman beings, human beings, etc.) when you are the only Reality† (without a second and there is no basis for that experience).

Sūta said:

7. Thus devoutly praised and worshipped by the sage (Mārkaṇḍeya), the Almighty Lord assured, "Yes, you will see it", and smilingly returned to his hermitage at Badarī, O sage Śaunaka.

8-9. Mārkaṇḍeya continued to stay in his hermitage brooding over the promised vision (of Māyā). While contemplating he saw Hari revealed in the sacrificial fire, the sun, the moon, waters, the earth, the wind, the sky, in his own self and everywhere around him. He worshipped him with articles of worship conceived mentally. Sometimes he forgot to worship when he was overwhelmed and lost in the flood of loving devotion.

1. VJ: How Sat i.e. Brahman or yourself is quite distinct and different from all other things.
10. O pre-eminent member of the Bhṛgu clan! On one occasion, while he was engaged in religious meditation in the evening on the bank of the Puṣpabhadra, tempestuous wind suddenly began to blow.

11. Following the furiously roaring blasts of the winds, terrific clouds overcast the sky. Attended with flashes of lightning and deafening thunders, they poured volleys of rain as big as the axles of chariots.

12. Then, following the torrential downpour, were seen oceans in all the four directions around, surging forward, overflooding and swallowing up the earth, while roaring loudly with (mountain-like) high waves tossed up by stormy winds and with terrible looking alligators and awfully big whirlpools.

13. Seeing that the fourfold world of creatures (like mammals, plant-world, oviparous beings) along with himself are afflicted both inside and outside with waters that rose sky-high, with the scorching rays of the sun, blasts of the stormy winds and strokes of lightning and the whole earth is submerged in waters, the sage was deeply disturbed and afraid at heart.

14. Even as he was looking on (in consternation), the boundless ocean terrific-looking on account of (mountainous) waves, and with its waters tossed and whirling by tempestuous winds was filled by the pouring clouds, overflooded the earth and submerged it along with its continents, sub-continents and mountain-chains.

15. All the worlds including the earth, the sky, the celestial world, and the stellar and planetary systems along with their inhabitants, and all the cardinal points were submerged and lost in that deluge. The sage Mārkaṇḍeya alone survived. He was drifting with his matted hairs scattered and hanging like a mad, blind, person.

16. Sorely oppressed with hunger and thirst, troubled by crocodiles and whales, tossed and buffeted by stormy winds and waves, enveloped in endless darkness and overcome with fatigue, the sage drifted along and could not know the directions or the sky or the earth.
17. Sometimes he fell into a great whirl-pool; sometimes he was tossed at random by waves: at times he was bitten by aquatic animals who fought with each other while trying to catch hold of him.

18. Sometimes he was over-come with grief, sometimes with infatuation: sometimes he experienced pleasure, sometimes pain and at times fear. Sometimes he felt that he was about to die, while at times, he suffered from diseases and other troubles.

19. Innumerable (billions upon billions) years passed away (he felt) while he was being drifted and tossed in that deluge and his self (mind) was hypnotised by the Māyā of Viṣṇu.

20. While being tossed about at random (and thus wandering) in the waters of the deluge, he caught sight of a young banyan tree adorned with fruit and foliage on a summit of the earth (protruding over waters).

21. On the north-eastern branch of that tree and on (the cavity of) its leaf, he beheld an infant (as if) swallowing up the darkness by its brilliant splendour.

22-23. It was like a dark-emerald in complexion; its countenance was beautiful like lotus; it had a conch-shaped neck, broad chest, shapely nose and charming brows. It appeared graceful with its locks of curly hair moving to and fro by (the wind of) its breath; its beautiful ears like (the open side of) a conch, were adorned with pomegranate-like red flowers (or ear-rings of that shape and colour); its nectar-like white (sweet) smile was rendered rosy by the reddish splendour of its coral-like crimson lips.

24. The ends of its eyes were reddish like the interior of a lotus; its smiling looks and glances captivated one’s heart; its belly, shaped like a leaf of a sacred fig tree, appeared beautiful with its deep navel covered with the throbbing folds of the belly which heaved up and down with its breaths.

25. The babe caught hold of its own lotus-foot with its hands of charming fingers, and placing it in its mouth, was sucking it.

26. The very sight of that infant, all his fatigue was removed and he felt refreshed. The lotuses in the form of his heart and eyes as if blossomed with ecstasy; (through the thrill of joy) his hairs stood on their ends. Though he was overcome with awe to see that miraculous form (the wonderful baby), he (made bold and) approached the babe to make enquiries of it.

27. In the meanwhile, along with the inhaling of the baby, ṇārkaṇḍeya, the descendant of Bhṛgu was drawn inside (the baby’s) body like a mosquito. There (in the belly of the baby) he saw the entire universe arranged systematically as it was before the deluge—at which he was extremely surprised and confused.

28. With wonderment he saw therein the sky, the earth, the aerial region, hosts of heavenly luminaries, mountains and oceans, continents along with their sub-continents, the cardinal points, gods and Asuras, forests, countries, rivers, cities, quarries or mines, villages, pastoral habitations, hermitages (or stages in life-āṭrāma), (Varṇas) of people engaged in their own respective duties.

29. He further beheld there the five gross-elements (bhūtas) and their products, the Time with its various divisions such as yugas, kalpas and everything else that can act as the cause of the world—in short the whole universe was manifested here, as if it were a reality.

30. He also espied the mountain Himālaya, that very same river Puṣpavahā and his own hermitage on its bank and sages dwelling in his neighbourhood. Even as he was keenly observing that universe, he was exhaled out of the body of the child and fell in the sea of deluge.

31. He perceived once more the banyan tree growing on the summit of the (submerged) earth and the child that was lying on the hollow leaf and that he was being observed with its side-long glances accompanied with nectar like sweet smiles (by that mysterious child).

32. Then Mārkaṇḍeya who was over-exhausted perceived that child who, entering through his eyes, had enthroned himself firmly in his heart, proceeded to embrace it who was (no other than) the Supra-sensuous Lord Viṣṇu!

33. But that very moment, the infant who was the glorious Lord Viṣṇu himself, the absolute master of Yoga who abides in the hearts of all instantly vanished from the sage like the desire (or undertaking) of an ungodly (or an unlucky) person.

34. O Brāhmaṇa sage! Following the Lord, the banyan tree, the cosmic waters that deluged the whole world (and submerged it) disappeared in a moment and the sage found himself in his own hermitage as before.

CHAPTER TEN

God Śiva’s Boon to Mārkaṇḍeya

Sūta said:

1. Having thus visualized the great magnificence of the Yoga-māyā (yogic deluding Potency) displayed by Lord Nārāyaṇa, Mārkaṇḍeya again sought asylum with him only (for protection).

Mārkaṇḍeya prayed:

2. I have be-taken myself to the soles of your feet which afford protection from fear (or Mokṣa— the real fearlessness in liberation from Samsāra) to those who resort to them as your Māyā1 which apparently appears as enlightenment, deludes even the learned people (who have not sought asylum with you) into the egoistic feeling that they are really erudite and (spiritually) wise.

Sūta said:

3. While passing through the sky on his bull along with his consort Pārvatī and surrounded by his legions (of spirits etc.) the glorious god Rudra\(^1\) noticed Mārkaṇḍeya who sat motionless (meditating Hari).

1. VR : Even the learned are deluded with their minds distracted by the ignorance caused by Māyā.

4-5. When goddess Umā (Pārvati) observed the sage, she requested god Śiva (the Lord of mount Kailāsa): "Be pleased to cast a glance at the Brāhmaṇa, O Lord, see how his body, senses and heart are perfectly controlled and unperturbed like the sea, the waters and (multitudes of) aquatic animals in which have become motionless after the subsidence of the stormy wind. As you are the bestower of (boons granting) the accomplishment of (your devotee's) objects, may you be pleased to grant him the fruit of his penance.

The glorious Lord Śiva said:

6. This Brāhmaṇa sage does not at all covet any blessing or superhuman power (like anīmā, lāghimā) or even Mokṣa (Liberation from saṃsāra) as he has developed the highest devotion to the immutable, Supreme person (Lord Viṣṇu).

7. O beloved Pārvatī! Let us however have a talk with this virtuous sage; for meeting and association with pious persons is (in itself) the greatest gain.

8. Replying thus the glorious god Śiva, who is the resort of devotees, approached the sage as he was promulgator and preceptor of all lores, and is the In-dwelling Controller of all embodied beings.

9. (Being in spiritual trance) his mental activities were so much restrained that he forgot himself, the universe around him and hence, he could not perceive (god Śiva and his consort) the Rulers and Souls of all beings, even though they approached him personally.

10. Knowing his absorbed mental condition, Lord Śiva the sovereign ruler of the universe, by his Yogic Power entered the cavity of his heart as air does through pores. The sage was surprised to see in his heart the sudden manifestation.

1. It was really Lord Nārāyaṇa who assumed the form of Śiva and consoled Mārkaṇḍeya who was exhausted (by his experience of the deluge—display of Māyā) ŚR.

2. According to a definition quoted by SD., bhagavān is one who is the knower of creation and destruction, coming and going (the past, present and future) of beings and with Īdya and Ādya.
11-13. He perceived god Śiva’s entry into his heart and was astonished at the flash-like manifestation of that god of a high stature, with three eyes, ten arms, matted locks of reddish brown hair shining like streaks of lightning, appearing brilliant like the rising sun, wearing the skin of tiger (as an apparel) armed with a trident, a Khatvāṅga (a skull-topped club) a shield and carrying in his hands a rosary of (Rudrākṣa) beads, a Damaru (an hour-glass-shaped handy drum) a begging bowl of (human) skull, a sword and a bow. Amazed at this sudden revelation of the god, he woke up from his trance to know what it was and whence it appeared.

14. The sage opened his eyes and perceived god Śiva the sole preceptor of the three worlds present (before him) along with his divine consort Umā and his attendants.

15. He respectfully worshipped god Śiva, along with his consort Umā and his attendants by giving them warm welcome offering them seats, water to wash hands and feet, sandal paste, wreaths of flowers, burning frank-incense and waving lights in the customary way.

16. He humbly submitted, “O Omni-present Lord, through your own majestic splendour you revel in your own blissful nature. It is because of you that the whole world feels happy. What service can I render to you, O Ruler of the Universe?

17* I bow to you who are all auspiciousness, devoid of guṇas (and hence tranquil), the embodiment of Satvā (in the Viṣṇu form) bestowing happiness on all. I salute you, the support of the rajas attribute (in the form of Brahmā). Hail to you (in the Rudra form) the embodiment of tāmas but not terrific or deluded.

Sītā said:

18. Praised in this way, the glorious Lord, the foremost among gods and the resort of saintly persons, was highly pleased

* VR : Hail to you the bestower of auspiciousness on the world, one devoid of the six states of life (from conception to death); conferer of great happiness on all; constituted of pure sattva (you are Viṣṇu); comprised of rajas (you are god Brahmā); and formidable as an embodiment of tāmas you are Rudra as at present.
with him. The gracious-minded god laughed heartily and spoke to the sage (as follows).

Lord Śiva said:

19. We three (gods Brahmā, Viṣṇu and myself) are the Rulers of those who are competent to grant boon. Seek from us whatever boon you please. (You should not say “No to this”) Our sight cannot be futile. A person can attain immortality (i.e. Mokṣa) through us (i.e. by virtue of seeing us).

20. Brāhmaṇas are by nature pious, tranquil, free from attachment, affectionate to all beings, constant in their devotion to us, above the feelings of envy and animosity and looking upon all as equals.

21. Guardians of the world along with the people, I, god Brahmā and the Supreme Lord Hari himself bow, worship and wait upon them.

22* We resort to (you) Brāhmaṇas as they do not perceive the slightest difference between me, Lord Viṣṇu and god Brahmā; nor do they so between themselves and other persons.

23. The sacred places (tirthas) consisting of (holy) water and gods made out of earth and stone (into which the presence of the deity is to be charged by invocation of mantras are not the real sacred places or gods as they purify after a long process of time. But you (Brāhmaṇa sages) purify at the very first sight only.

* VR: Those Brāhmaṇas (knowing that I or God Brahmā do not have a separate existence apart from Viṣṇu) do not perceive the slightest difference in Viṣṇu and us (I and god Brahmā) being connected with his body (Brāhmaṇarākṣa maccarṇarākṣa cācyute ca).

VR states that the words—ātman and jana mean two different souls in unintelligent bodies. In his long commentary, he elucidates his visisṭādvaita stance with reference to cit, acit and God.

VJ (i) Those wise Brāhmaṇas know that Hari is in me and also present in god Brahmā. Hence they do not see any difference between Hari and us (due to his presence in us). Hari abides as the Innercontroller (antar-yādmin) of all mobile and immobile creation. They see no difference in Hari and that creation (as Hari is the same in all).

(ii) They have no misunderstanding about me, Brahmā, mobile beings and immobiles. They do not identify us with Viṣṇu. They see each as is each factually (i.e. separate).
24. We pay obeisance to those Brähmaṇas who preserve (in themselves) our (verbal) representation in the form of three Vedas by concentration of mind, meditation, performance of austerities, Vedic studies and self-control (consisting of observance of silence, etc.)

25. At the very sight of and by merely listening (to your life and works) persons who have committed great sins and persons (even) of the lowest caste become purified. What need be said of persons who engage themselves in conversation with them (or praise or live in their company) ?

Sūta said:

26. The speech of god Śiva who wears the crescent moon as an adornment on the head, was so much over full with secrets of dharma and was a reservoir of sweet nectar (or was sweet like nectar to the ears) that the sage did not feel sated with it.

27. The sage was bewildered by the Māyā of Viṣṇu (and was made to revolve through the cycle of birth and deaths) and was put through an extremely severe trial. He felt that all his agonies had been completely removed by the nectarine speech of god Śiva. He addressed to him as follows:

The sage (Mārkandeya) said:

28. O how wonderful! This sportive act of the almighty Ruler (of the universe) is incomprehensible to embodied beings like us, inasmuch as the Rulers of the universe (like Brahmā, Rudra) pay respect to and praise those governed by them.

29. Generally, in order to make people perform their religious duties, these teachers of embodied beings practise them and when these duties are performed by others they show their approbation, and praise the persons performing them.

30. Just as a magician is not affected by his magic creations conjured up by his enchanting power, the great prowess of the glorious Lord (in you) is not affected (lit. spoilt or tainted) by your acts (of bowing, praising us).
31.* Having evolved this universe by his will power, he entered it of his own accord in the form of an individual soul (Jīva) who, like a man in the state of dreaming, appears to be the agent of acts which are really brought about by guṇas (guṇas are the real cause or doers of acts not the Jīva).

32. Salutation to the glorious all powerful Lord (Śiva) who is comprised of three guṇas yet is their master (or the director). I bow to Him who is absolute, one without a second, the preceptor (or father) of the universe and the very embodiment of Brahman.

33. What other boon can I solicit from you when your direct vision is itself a boon, as by your vision a man is blest with all blessings and gets all his wishes realized.

34. I, however, seek one boon from you who are perfect and shower all desired objects (as blessings on your devotees)—May I cherish constant devotion to Lord Acyuta (Viṣṇu) to persons who are his votaries and also unswerving devotion to you.

Śūta said:

35. When Lord Śiva was thus worshipped and extolled in very sweet words by the Sage, he (though willing of his own accord to confer a boon) who was urged with approbation by his consort Pārvatī, spoke to Mārkaṇḍeya.

36. "O great sages, as you cherish (constant) devotion to Lord Viṣṇu (who is beyond the range of sense-preception) all your desires will be fulfilled. May you enjoy hallowing glory, immunity from old age and death to the end of the Kalpa.

* VR : The Lord as the Inner controller abides in the Jīva (individual soul). Being thus inseparably connected, he appears as if doing the acts, when factually the Jīva is the real doer—īva-sabdena paramārthataḥ punyāy-puṇyātma-ka-Karma Karṣṭudhāvah paramātmani sūcyate.

VJ : The Lord having created this universe by his volition has entered into it as Antaryāmin (i) while abiding therein he appears to be doing acts through senses like the Jīva. As a matter of fact, he is not affected by them, just as a person creating objects (like an elephant or a horse etc.) in a dream is factually unaffected by them (liptā no bhavati).
37. As you are invested with glorious lustre of Brahman may you be blest with the knowledge of the past, present and future and possess spiritual wisdom along with non-attachment and be the master (i.e. author) of one Purāṇa (now known as Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa).

Sūta continued:

38. Having conferred these boons on the sage, the three-eyed God departed telling (on the way) the austere penance and other meritorious acts of the sage and the display of Lord Viṣṇu’s Māyā experienced by him.

39. That eminent-most descendent of Bhṛgu who has attained the glorious power of the great yoga (with spiritual knowledge and whose heart is merged in unflinching devotion to Hari (and has become as if one within) is still seen moving about on the earth.

40. In this way how the intelligent Mārkaṇḍeya experienced the miraculous power and glory of the Māyā of the Lord, has been described to you.

41. This (power exhibited by Māyā and experienced by Mārkaṇḍeya as extending over seven Kalpas as held in old tradition) was an accidental matter (a personal experience through the grace of Lord Nārāyaṇa and not a general experience of all. But some persons not knowing the working of the Māyā regard the deluge experienced by Mārkaṇḍeya as the regular process of appearance and disappearance of men (the creation and dissolution of the universe) which the Māyā of the Supreme Lord brings about repeating it from eternity.

42. O worthiest of the Bhṛgu race, he who listens to with wrapt attention or he who narrates this (account of Mārkaṇḍeya described to you and which concerns the glory of Viṣṇu) both of them will be rid of Sanśāra produced by the latent effects of Karman.
CHAPTER ELEVEN

Significance of the Various parts of the Lord’s Image,
The Retinue of the sun-God per month

Śaunaka said:

1. O (great) devotee of the Lord! You are the most prominent among the versatiles (knowers of different Śastras). You know the heart—the secret conclusions of the scriptures of different works on Tantra. (Our forebear Mārkaṇḍeśya was expert in the Ģantric way of worshipping the Lord. We want to know the Ģantric way he adopted for visualization of the Lord. Hence, we request your worship to discourse upon the following subject:

2. The Lord of goddess Śrī is essentially pure consciousness (and pure sattva). But when experts in (and authors of) Tantras deal with meditation and process of worshipping the Lord, they conceive him as possessed of limbs of the body (e.g. hands and feet) attended upon (by Gāruḍa), armed with weapons (like the discus Sudarśana), adorned with precious stones and ornaments (like the Kaustubha gem).

3. O Sūta! We are anxious to know the Ģantric course of active worship by becoming thoroughly proficient in which a mortal may attain immortality (Mokṣa as the sage Mārkaṇḍeśya did). May God bless you. But be pleased to elucidate of what principles are they (limbs, attendants etc.) presumed to be constituted (and the origin of this conception).

Sūta said:

4. Having first bowed to my preceptors, I shall describe to you the various glorious manifestations of Lord Viṣṇu (such as the cosmic form—Virāṭ) even though it is difficult to comprehend them—Forms which are (to some extent) described in details by (authoritative Tantras) teachers like the lotus-born god Brahmā and others (like Śaṅkara, Nārada) in the light of the Vedas and texts (saṁ hitās), Tantras.

5. That celebrated cosmic form—Virāṭ—consisting of the sixteen modifications (viz. mind, five cognitive senses, five conative organs and five gross elements—mahābhūtas) is evolved out of nine principles such as Māyā (or Prakṛti) and others eight, viz. mahat (the principle of cosmic intelligence), sūtra (the active aspect of mahat), ahaṅkāra (the cosmic ego) and five tan-mātrās (subtle elements). When the spirit or the intelligent Principle presides over it to activate it the three worlds make their appearance.

6. This verily constitutes the Puruṣa or Virāt (Cosmic) form. Of that Lord, the earth is regarded as his feet, the heavens, the head; the mid-air region, the navel; the sun, the eyes; vāyu (wind or air) his nostrils; cardinal points, as his ears.

7. His organ of creation, Prajāpati (the presiding deity of creation); the anus of the Lord is the (god of) death; the guardians of the spheres, his arms; the Moon (its presiding deity) is the mind; Yama, the eye-brows.

8. Modesty or Shyness, his upper lip; greed, his lower lip; the moonlight represents the (rightness of his) teeth; illusion is his smile; trees (i.e. the plant world), the hair on his body, and the clouds form the locks on the head of that Supreme Person.

9. According as the body of an individual human being is measured with reference to the dimensions and dispositions of the parts of his body, the dispositions and proportion of the personality of the Supreme Person are to be regarded similarly with reference to the spheres in the universe. (Thus a man is seven spans in height, the seven worlds such as bhūr, bhuvah, etc. are to be presumed such ‘spans’ in the case of the cosmic person.)

10. The eternal (lit. unborn) Lord wears the pure consciousness of the Jīva under the name Kaustubha and the splendour radiated from it is the well-known streak of golden hair—Śrī-vatsa on his (right part of the) bosom.

11. He wears the Māyā constituted of many guṇas (Sattva, rajas, etc.) as the Vana-mālā (garland of five kinds of special flowers). His yellow silken garment (round his loins) is constituted of the Vedas; his sacred thread is the sacred syllable OM consisting of three syllables A+U+M.

12. The God wears the systems of Saṅkhya and Yoga as the alligator-shaped ear-rings. He puts on as diadem the highest position of god Brahmā which dispels the fear of all people and affords protection to the world.

13. The seat called Ananta (serpent Śeṣa) occupied by him is the Unmanifest Prakṛti. His lotus of seat constituted of Sattva guna which includes—the six divine excellences, viz. dharma (piety), Jñāna (knowledge), Vairāgya (renunciation, non-attachment) ātisvarya (universal dominion), Śrī (affluence) and yaśas (glory) and of divine powers (known as Vimalā, utkarsini, Jñāna, Kriyā, Yoga, Pahvi, Satya, Īśāna and Anugraha).

14-15. He wields the principle of mukhya-prīna or vital air accompanied by energy, fortitude and strength as his mace; the excellent conch symbolises the principle of water; his discus Sudarsana is the principle of power or fire; His sword clear like the sky is the principle of ether; a shield represents Tamas; His Śārṅga bow stands for the Time-spirit (Kāla) and the quiver (of arrows) consists of the principle of Karma (action).

16*. They (i.e. learned experts in traditional lore) state that the (cosmic) sense-organs are his arrows; the (cosmic) mind capable of activation is his Chariot; the subtle elements (tannātrās) form the exterior of his Chariot; it is by particular positions of his fingers and hands (technically called mudrās) such as Varadā, abhayadā) that he confers blessings or gives protection.

17. The particular place where the Lord is worshipped should be conceived as the orb of the sun or the inner Agni's sphere; initiation by a preceptor by imparting a mantra is the self-consecration rendering one eligible to worship the Lord; and the act of his worship is the means of absolving one's self of all sins.

* VJ Regards Prthvi (the earth) as the chariot of Hari and the five objects of senses are his manifestations. The objects of conative organs are his physical activities.

GS is not clear on the function of tannātrās.

VJ: The spot of Hari's worship should be Cakrāhya and other sacred sport: the real consecration is the purification resulting from God's presence in the body; the worship of God is the means for absolving one's self of all sins.
18. (After explaining the ‘Lotus-seat’, the significance of the lotus play-fu}lly held on the hand is explained. The Lord (Bhagav\text{"a}n) holds in his hand a lotus sportively; the lotus concretely represents the six characteristic implied in the term bhaga in Bhagav\text{"a}n\textsuperscript{1}. The Lord has (by his side attendants holding) a chowrie and a fan representing Dharma and glory respectively.

19. O Br\text{"a}hman\text{"a}s! The umbrella held over his head stands for his abode Vaiku\text{\text{"a}}tha, the absolutely safe place (with no fear from K\text{"a}la, Karma, etc.). The Veda with its three divisions (R\text{\text{"a}}veda, S\text{\text{"a}}man, yajus) i.e. the sacrifices etc. prescribed in the Veda represents his carrier Garu\text{"a}ḍa\textsuperscript{2} who bears Yaj\text{"a}ṇa, the Supreme Person (Vi\text{"s}\text{"n}u)

20. The inseparable energy or lustre of Lord Hari is the glorious Śrī, the goddess of affluence and beauty. Viśvaksena, the well-known commandant of Viśn\text{"u}’s attendants is the concrete representation of Pa\text{\text{"n}}carātra and other Āgamic works, while the (eight) superhuman powers or attributes like animā (capacity to assume atomic size) and others are the attendants at his door like Nanda (Sunanda, etc.).

21* The Supreme Person (Nārāyaṇa) himself is manifested as Vāsudeva, Sāṅkarśaṇa, Pradyumna and Aniruddha. He is to be worshipped and meditated in these manifestations\textsuperscript{3}.

\textsuperscript{1} The six distinguishing characteristics are enumerated in the following traditional verse: asavaryasya samagrasya dharmasya yajasah ś. yaḥ / Jñāna-vairāgyaśyoktaiva satnam bhaga itirandā // They are: Rulership, righteousness or religiosity, glory, affluence, wisdom and non-attachment.

2. The vedic authority quoted for this by ŚR, viz. the mantra supar-ṇo’śi Garutmān striyutte śirahi, is found in Tait. Saṁhitā 4: 10: 5 (Vaj. Saṁhitā 12: 4 and a number of Vedic texts.)

* (The doctrine of Vyūhas, manifestation of the Lord and their worship is now explained—ŚR.)

3. VR explains that the following Vyūhas preside over the following states:

(1) Vāsudeva: Emancipated stage (Mukti-aṭasthō).
(2) Sāṅkarśaṇa: Dreaming state.
(3) Pradyumna: Wakefulness.
(4) Aniruddha: Dreamless deep sleep.
(5) Śrīndrāyaṇa eva svayam mūrītibhedair upāsyaḥ—ŚR.
22. That glorious Lord is to be contemplated (within one’s own self) as Viśva, Taijasa, Prājña and the Fourth (ātman or Vāsudeva) associated with the states of wakefulness, dreaming, dreamless sleep and self-realisation. It is under aforesaid forms that he guides the functions connected with external objects, the mind, the false notions or ignorance and the knowledge that stands as witness to them.¹

23. In this way the glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa with his aforesaid limbs of the body, attendants, weapons and ornaments and in his above-mentioned four manifestations (Vyūhas), viz. Vāsudeva, Saṅkarṣaṇa, Pradyumna and Aniruddha, assumes also the four aspects such as Viśva Taijasa and others—Yet he is the same glorious Lord Hari, the controller (of the universe).²

24. O prominent Brāhmaṇa! The above-described Lord is the source of the Vedas, the self-illuminating, omniscient, perfect in his own glory and essential blissfulness. It is (out of sportiveness) that under different designations (such as Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra) that he creates, protects and dissolves the universe by his own Māyā. But his consciousness remains unobstructed and unclouded. Though he is described (in Śāstras) as differentiated, he is really one and is realized as such by his votaries as being their own self.

1. The Lord, in the wakeful state, presiding over the Viśva stage, cognises external objects such as touch, sound. In this way this verse can be tabulated as follows :-

   (1) Wakefulness—Viśva—artha (external objects)
   (2) Dream-state—Taijasa—indriya.
   (3) Dreamless sleep—Prājña—manas
   (4) Turiya—The self Jñāna.
   (Self-realization)

2. VR thinks that the above mentioned four forms of Nārāyaṇa are for the creation, protection, dissolution and liberation of the world. Thus Aniruddha creates, Pradyumna protects, Saṅkarṣaṇa destroys and Vāsudeva liberates the world. BP repeats the same.

VJ: aṅgas—the four forms of the Lord.

Upaṅgas—God Brahmā and other gods in whom the Lord’s presence is prominent.
25. O Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the friend of Arjuna, the prominent leader of Vṛṣṇis, the fire unto the families of Kṣattriyas who were inimical to (and a burden) to the earth; O Lord of un-diminishing energy and prowess; O Govinda (Protector of cows), whose hallowing glory is sung by the cowherd women of Vraja and servants i.e. devotees like Nārada and whose name and deeds are auspicious to hear! O Lord, be pleased to protect us, your servants (Votaries).

26. He who, rising early at dawn, purifies himself by taking a bath and with concentrated mind repeats the above-mentioned characteristics (of aṅga, uṣṭha, etc.) of the Supreme Person, realizes Brahman as abiding in his own heart.

Śaunaka said:

27. As the glorious Śuka told the listening Parikṣit (one protected by Viṣṇu) that a group of seven (pairs) consisting of sages, Gandharvas, Apsaras, Nāgas, Yakṣas and Rākṣasas and presided over by the sun-god, carry out their duties each month (and are substituted by a new batch next month.)¹

28. Be pleased to recount to us who are devout and faithful the names, functions of these along with their presiding deities and of Hari's manifestation as the indwellers of the sun-god.

Sūta said:

29. This (visible) sun-god who controls the world (by maintaining the course of life in it) and revolves in his orbit, is created by the beginningless Māyā of Lord Viṣṇu who abides as an indwelling soul of all embodied beings.

30. Though one without a second, it is Lord Hari, the creator of the world, the one soul of all people who is the sun-god. He is spoken under diverse names by the sages as he is the source of different Vedic rites.

31. O Brāhmaṇa Śaunaka! It is due to Hari's beginningless Māyā that Hari is spoken of in nine forms, viz. time, place activity, the doer, the instrument, duty or performance, sacred book, material substance (rice, etc.) and the fruit (viz. celestial world, etc.)

¹ Vide Supra 5.21.18, P. 748.
32. In order to help the conduct and functions of the world, he assumes the form of Time (out of the nine mentioned above) and goes through his course in twelve months beginning with Caitra along with his twelve groups of attendants.

33. The sun-god, under the designation, Dhātā, Kṛta-sthalī (the heavenly damsel), Heti, (the demon), Vāsuki (the serpent), Rathtakṛt (the Yakṣa), Pulastyā (the Sage) and Tumbaru (the Gandharva)—all these run the world in the first month (Caitra) or Madhu.

(In the following verses the names of the sun and his attendants are given in the same order as in verse 33 above).

34. Aryamā, Puñjikasthalī, Praheti, Kachhanīra, Athaujā, Pulaha and Nārada—these run the month of Vaiśākha or (Mādhava).

35. Mitra, Menakā, Pauruṣeṣya, Taksaka, Rathasvana, Atri, and Hāhā—these run the month of Jyeṣṭha (or Sukramāsa).

36. Varuṇa, Rambhā, Chitravāna, Śukra, Sahajanya, Vasiṣṭha and Huhū—these run the month of Āṣāḍha (or Sucimāsa).

37. Indra, Pramlocā, Varya, Elāpatra, Śrotā, Aṅgirā and Viśvāvasu—these run the month of Srāvaṇa (or Nabhomāsa).

38. Vivasvān, Anumloca, Vyāghra, Śaṅkhapāla, Āsaraṇa Bhṛgu and Ugrasena—these run the month called Bhādrapada or (Nabhasya).

39. Puṣā, Ghṛtācī, Vāta, Dhanaṇjaya, Suruci, Gautama and Suṣeṇa—these run the month of Māgha. (or Tapo-māsa).

40. Parjanya, Senajit, Varcā, Airāvata, Kratu, Bharadvāja and Viśva—these run the month named Phālguna or (Tapasya).

41*. Again, Aṁśu, Urvaśī, Vidyuc-chatru, Mahāśaṅkha Tārkhṣya, Kaśyapa and Rtasena—these run the month of Mārgasīrṣa (or Saho-māsa).

* There is a change in the usual order of the names of these months. SR attributes it to the change of Kalpa though the explanation is not convincing, so do GS and GD follow SR. VR and BP suggest us to adjust the order of stokar.
42. Bhaga, Pūrvacitti, Sphūrja, Karkoṭaka, Urṇa, Ayu and Ariṣṭanemi—these run the month of Pauṣa (or Puṣyamāsa).

43. Again, Tvaṣṭa, Tilottamā, Brahmāpeta, Kambala, Śatajīt, Jamadagni and Dhṛtarāṣṭra are the presiding set in the month of Āśvina. (iṣambhara).

44. Viṣṇu, Rambhā, Makhāpeta, Aśvatara, Satyajit, Visvāmitra and Sūryavarca—these run the month of Kārttika (or Urja-māsa).

45. These constitute the glory of the sun-god, who is no other than Lord Viṣṇu himself. Those who remember them both in the morning and in the evening, day after day are rid of their sins by them.

46. This celebrated sun-god courses round this world in each of the twelve months (of the year) along with his attendants (mentioned above), and promotes and expands goodness of the mind (or intellect helping people to perform religious rites), securing their happiness here and bliss hereafter (This reminds one of the Gāyatri mantra).

47. Sages who attend the sun-god (as members of his entourage) praise him with the hymns from the Sāmaveda, Rg-Veda and Tājur-veda pertaining to his glory. Gandharvas sing songs (in praise of him). The celestial damsels dance before him.

48. The Nāgas (Serpents) bind the chariot fast (like cords), Yakṣas make the chariot ready; the mighty Rākṣasas push the chariot from behind.

49. (The group of) sixty thousand pure-minded (tiny) Vālakhilya sages (who are always with the sun-god all the year round) proceed ahead of him and extol the Almighty God with panegyrical hymns.

50. In this way, the eternal (beginningless and endless), birthless, glorious Lord Hari divides himself (into twelve forms, each presiding over the sun (for the period of one month) and protects the world in every Kalpa.
CHAPTER TWELVE

A Synoptic Review of the twelve Skandhas of Śrimad Bhāgavata

Sūta said:

1. Salutation to the great virtue in the form of devotion to Lord Hari. Hail to Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the creator of the universe. Having bowed down to Brāhmaṇas (who are devoted to God). I now enumerate the eternal courses of righteousness.

2. Here has been narrated to you the miraculous story (in the form of this Bhāgavata) of Lord Viṣṇu, about which you asked me and which is really to the good of human beings (and is fit to be related and listened to in the assembly of pious persons).

3. Here has been glorified Lord Hari who destroys the sins of all; who is Nārāyaṇa, the controller of sense-organs and is the protector of his devotees (or Sātvatas)

4. Here has been described the Supreme attributeless Brahman which is the source as well as the end of all creation; also the topic of spiritual knowledge and realisation as well as means of realising them.

5. Here has been delineated in details the Yoga or discipline of Devotion (which is both a means and an end in itself,) as well as renunciation (Vairāgya) which is brought about and thus depends on devotion. Then follows the story of the birth, etc. of king Parīkṣit which has been preceded by the story of the previous births of Nārada.

6. The vow of the royal sage Parīkṣit to fast unto death due to the curse imprecated on him by a Brāhmaṇa, the dialogue between king Parīkṣit and the prominent Brāhmaṇa Śūka (Here ends the first Skandha).

7. The ascent of the soul to higher regions when departed from the body through Yogic process; the dialogue between Nārada and god Brahmā; the description of the incarnation of god Viṣṇu in a serial order; the cosmic evolution from Prakṛti from the beginning.

8. The conversation between Vidura and Uddhava and that between Vidura and Maitreya; an enquiry regarding the compilation of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa and the dormant state of the Supreme Man during Pralaya.

9. Then follows the description of the evolution of the universe from Prakṛti by the disturbance of its guṇas, the evolution of the seven categories which are both the cause and the effect as well as their modifications; then follows the formation of the egg of the universe from which Virāṭ Puruṣa was evolved.

10. The nature of Time both gross and subtle; the blooming of the cosmic lotus; (containing 14 worlds—bhuvanas) lifting up of the earth from the bottom of the ocean and slaying the demon Hiraṇyākṣa.

11-12. Creation of the celestial world; the subhuman beings and of the subterranean regions; creation of Rudras; the constitution of one half of his person as male and the other half as female by god Brahmā, from which was born Manu called Svāyambhuva and of Śatarūpā the ideal first woman; the progeny of the wives of Kardama, the Lord of Creation.

13. The descent of the glorious Lord as the great-souled Kapila; the dialogue between the intelligent Kapila and his mother Devahūti.

14. The creation of the nine Lords of creation (Prajāpatis); interruption in the sacrifice of Dakṣa; the account of kings Dhruva, Pṛthu and Pracīnabarhis.

15. The conversation with Nārada; the story of king Priyavrata; and then O Brāhmaṇas, the account of Kings Nābhi, Rṣabha and Bharata.

16. Description of island-continents and their subsections called Varṣas and seas separating the continents; the mountain-systems and the river-systems in this continent described; the disposition of the stellar system (stars, planets, etc.) and the arrangements of the subterranean regions and of hills.

17. The birth of Dakṣa from Pracetas; the progeny of his daughters, viz. gods, demons, human beings, sub-human beings (beasts, etc.) trees, birds, etc.

18. The birth and death of Vṛtra, the son of Tvasṭṛ and that of the two sons of Diti, viz. Hiraṇyākṣa and Hiraṇya-kaśipu and the story of the noble soul Prahlāda (Here end Skandhas—VI & VII).

19. A connected account of the fourteen Manvantaras; deliverance of the king of elephants (from a giant Crocodile); Various incarnations of Viṣṇu such as Hayagrīva and others.

20. Viṣṇu’s descent like the divine tortoise, the divine fish, Narasimha (Half man—half lion); the churning of the ocean of milk for obtaining nectar by gods and demons.

21. The great war between gods and Asuras; a description of royal dynasties; the birth of Ikṣvāku and his race as also of the great-souled Sudyumna.

22. Here have been described the stories of Ilā and of Tārā; the history of the solar race of kings such as Śaśāda, Nṛga and others.

23. The narrative of Sukanyā, the daughter of Śaryāti and of the highly intelligent Kākutstha and of Khaṭvāṅga, of Māndhātra, of sage Saubhāri and of king Sagara.

24. The story of Rāma, the king of Kosala which eradicates all sins; Nimi and his giving up of his body; the origin of the race of Janakas.

25. The account of Paraśurāma, the chief of the Bhrigu clan, and his wiping out the Kṣattriya race; the account of the lunar race which started from Purūravas, the son of Ilā and of Yayāti and Nahuṣa.

26-27. The accounts of Bharata, the sun of Duṣyanta, of Śantanu and his son. The race of Yadu, the eldest son of Yayāti has been described—the race in which the Lord of the universe under the name Kṛṣṇa took his incarnation; his birth in the house of Vasudeva and growing up in Gokula.

28. The innumerable and miraculous deeds of the enemy of Asuras, viz. of Kṛṣṇa have been described: drinking up of the life of Pūtanā along with the milk in her breast, the kicking up of Śakaṭa while a child.

29. Crushing of the demon Tṛṇāvarta as well as of Baka and Vatsa and of Dhenuka along with his brother and slaying of Pralamba.

30. Protection of the cow-herds from the encircling forest conflagration; subjugation of the great serpent Kāliya and the deliverance of Nanda.
31. The observance of the Kātyāyanī vow by Gopa girls whereby Lord Kṛṣṇa was pleased (and granted a boon) : Showering of grace on the wives of Brāhmaṇa sacrificers; the repentance of Brāhmaṇas for not recognising the real nature of the Lord.

32. Lifting up of the mount Govardhana; Indra and the heavenly cow Surabhi worship Kṛṣṇa and bathe him in milk; Kṛṣṇa's pastimes (Rāsakṛiḍā) with Gopīs during several nights.

33. Slaying of the evil-minded Śaṅkhacūḍa and of demons Ariṣṭa and Keśin; arrival of Akrūra; subsequent departure of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa.

34. The wailing of Gopīs of Vraja; visit to different places in Mathurā; killing of the elephant (Kuvalayāpiḍa) and of Muśṭika, Cāṇūra, Karṁsa and others (his eight brothers).

35. Restoring to his preceptor Sāndipani his dead son; good offices to the Yādava clansmen at Mathurā.

36. Annihilation of the armies brought by Jarāsandha many times, with the help of Uddhava and Balarāma, O Brāhmaṇas; killing of the king of Yavanas through Mucakunda; founding of the city of Kuśasthali or Dwārakā.

37. Bringing of heavenly Pārijāta tree and the celestial assembly hall called Sudharmā; taking away of Rukmīṇī by Hari after destroying the enemies in a battle.

38. Yawning of god Śiva while fighting with Kṛṣṇa in defence of Bāṇa; chopping of Bāṇa's arms in the battle; killing of Naraka the king of Prāgjetiśa and taking away of the girls detained by him.

39. The killing of Śīṣupāla, Pauṇḍraka, Śālva and of the wicked-minded Dantavaktra; the destruction of the monkey Dvivida, Piṭha, Mura and Pañcajanas and others.

40. The power of the above kings and demons and their slaying; burning of the city of Vārāṇasi; lightening of the burden of the earth by making the Pāṇḍavas as his instruments.

(Here ends the Tenth Skandha)

41. The complete destruction of his own race under the pretext of Brāhmaṇa's curse; the wonderful dialogue between Uddhava and Vāsudeva.
42. In that dialogue, the entire range of the science of \textit{Atman} as well as the decisions regarding the duties of various classes of society and the stages in life (\textit{Varnas} and \textit{Astramas}); the Lord’s withdrawal from the mortal vision by the power of Yoga.

(Here ends the eleventh Skandha)

43. The characteristics of the four Yugas and the conduct of the public in them; perversity of men in the Kali age, four types of deluges (Pralaya), three types of creations.

44. Casting off his body by the intelligent royal sage Parikṣit, the classification of Vedas into different branches by the sage Vyāsa, the sacred story of Mārkaṇḍeya. The disposition of the limbs and weapons of Supreme Person and the ruler of the world as the Sun-god.

45. In this way, O great Brāhmaṇas, whatever I have been asked by you about the sportive activities, incarnations and other acts of the Lord have been described to you by me in all details.

46. A person who involuntarily and unintentionally utters loudly “Salutations to Hari” while falling (in a well, etc.), stumbling (on a staircase, etc.), being afflicted or after sneezing, become rid of all sins.

47. It is the experience of saintly persons that when his name or praise is devoutly chanted or his glory is listened to with devotion, the Infinite, glorious Lord enters their heart and definitely shakes off cleanly and completely all the sins, just as the sun dispels darkness or (if you doubt the sun’s ability to reach inside caves or cavities the Lord does so) like the tempestuous winds scattering the clouds.

48.* They are indeed futile utterances and unrighteous stories (leading to hell) which do not speak of Lord Viṣṇu (who is above sense-perception). That alone is (how really happy it is to state that) alone is auspicious and meritorious which extol the Lord’s excellent attributes.

* GS alternately explains: The stories which do not deal with the theme of the Lord may be true but are fruitless. They may be interesting but they incur sin and are the cause of hell. The stories of good persons (not related with the Lord) are also devoid of merit and the narrator though
49. That alone is beautiful and attractive (even it be like the Lord's entry in the bear Jāmbavān's den); that alone is sweet (though unpalatable to devotees such as Rāma's abandonment of Sītā); that alone is ever fresh giving newer delights every time (although the incident or the theme is age-old); that alone is the eternal festivity and source of joy to the mind (even if it be painful like the abduction of Sītā by Rāvana); that alone is the means of drying up the ocean of grief of human beings even though it creates non-attachment towards close relatives like husband or son).

50.* The speech composed of words with rhetorical beauty but which seldom describes the world purifying glory of Hari, is regarded like a pleasure worthy of enjoyment for worldly persons, where pure-minded ascetics who dwell in (are merged in the Supreme Spirit (Brahman) never like to stay, like swans from the Mānasa lake, who have beautiful dwelling places, do not find pleasure in pools that are the pleasure resorts of crows alone. Where there is Lord Hari, there are the pure sinless saints.

51. That out-flow of words which though not properly composed in every verse, makes good people (saints) hear, sing, and praise the names (which are as if) imprinted with the glory of the Infinite Lord, destroys the sins of the people.

52. Knowledge, (though) actionless and pure, (if) devoid of devotion to the imperishable Lord (Viṣṇu) does not appear sufficiently bright (i.e. does not result in proper. "direct" knowledge. And how can again the action which is always unblissful, even though (performed) without any desire of its fruit, appear expressing the truth in sweet words is not a pious story-teller. On the other hand, imaginary stories glorifying the Lord are 'True'. Though they are ruinous to the house-holder stage, they are auspicious. Stories of the Lord abducting the wives of others told by low-minded people are also meritorious as they describe the excellence of the Lord (Bhagavatah para-dhrāharanadikam adhamair apunyatvena kathitam api tadeva punyam yatas tad bhagavato gunasyaiva na tu dosasya udayo yaṁ Śrī)

* Verses 50, 51, and 52 are practically the same as supra 1.5.10,11,12. Thus repetition is made at the beginning and the end of the Bh. P. to establish emphatically the greatness of Bhakti (devotion), just as the bijas of a great mantra are uttered at its beginning and end—GS : VD.
bright (i.e. will have purificatory effect if it is not dedicated to God).

53. The exertions undergone for carrying out the prescribed religious duties pertaining to one's Vāma (class in society) and Ātrama (stage in life), penance, Vedic studies, etc. are for the sake of reputation or affluence. But by singing of and listening to the excellences of the lotus-feet of Śrīdhara (Lord Viṣṇu) unfailing remembrance thereof is ensured.

54. Non-forgetfulness (i.e. constant memory) of the lotus-feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa annihilates all evils and inauspiciousness; it deepens the tranquillity of the mind and enhances mental purity and devotion to the Supreme Soul; it promotes spiritual knowledge along with self-knowledge and dispassion.

55. Highly fortunate you are, O prominent Brāhmaṇas, in that you have enthroned in your heart the supreme Nārāyaṇa to whom no other god is superior and who is the Inner Controller of all beings and worship him with constant devotion.

56. I have also been reminded of the lucid enlightenment of (the knowledge about) the nature of the soul in the (Bhāgavata Purāṇa) which I heard from the lips of the great sage Śrī Śuka in the assembly of those great sages who assembled to listen to it, when king Parīkṣit determined to observe his vow to fast unto death.

57. O Brāhmaṇas! In this way has been narrated to you the great glory of Lord Vāsudeva whose exploits are worthy of being recounted, as it exterminates all evils and inauspiciousness.

58. He who with concentrated attention, and faith and devotion recounts this (Bhāgavata Purāṇa) continuously (every day) or for a period of three hours or for a minute and he who listens to it with faith and devotion purifies his inner soul (and not the physical body as in a bath).

59. He who hears it on the twelfth or eleventh day of every fortnight of the lunar month, will be blest with longevity; while he who reads it with devotion observing a fast (all the while) absolves himself of all sins.

60. Observing fast and exercising all the while perfect self-control, a person who reads this compilation (of the *Bhāga-at holy places like Puṣkara, Mathurā and Dvārakā, is freed from the fear of Saṃsāra.

61 The gods, sages, siddhas, manes (ancestors), Manus and Kings bestow all the desired boons and the objects on a person who chants it, listens to the chanting or glorifies it.

62 A Brāhmaṇa who reads this Purāṇa gains the same blessings technically (by the ancients as) “streams of ghee, honey and milk”, as one who gets after studying the Vedas (Ṛgveda, Sāmveda and Yajurveda).

63. O Brāhmaṇas! A person who, with a controlled and pure mind, studies this compilation called the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, attains to that supreme abode (Mokṣa or Vaikuṇṭha) which the Lord described (in this Purāṇa) as a fruit of it.

64. On studying this compilation of the Bhāgavata, a Brāhmaṇa gets insight into spiritual knowledge (known as ātambharaḥ prajñā) a Kṣatriya attains sovereignty over the whole earth engirdled by the seas; a Vaiśya becomes the Lord of wealth (like Kubera) while a Śūdra is absolved of sins.

65. Lord Viṣṇu, the Supreme Ruler of all, who is the destroyer of the mass of sins and impurities of the Kali age, is not so often extolled and sung in other Purāṇas. But on the contrary, in this Purāṇa, the glorious God who abides in all (the universe) has been glorified at every step, as the occasion of the stories (about him) demanded it (or is sung in every account of this work.)

66. I bow to Lord Acyuta who is unborn and endless or infinite, the principle of consciousness (or the Supreme Self), the embodiment of the power that is capable of creating, sustaining and dissolving the universe, and who is so great that rulers of heaven like gods Brahmā, Indra, Rudra, and others cannot eulogise him with proper comprehension.

67. Salutations to that eternal Lord, the God of gods whose essential nature is absolute, pure consciousness, who, through the instrumentalities of his nine potencies (viz. Prakṛti, Puruṣa, Mahat, Ahaṁkāra and five tan-mātrās) has evolved in himself the abode for all mobile and immobile beings.

68. I humbly bow down to Śukācārya, the son of Vyāsa, who destroys all sins Śuka—whose mind was firmly established in the Supreme bliss of ātman, and has hence given up the notion of difference and diversity, but whose heart was fascinated and attracted by the stories of the sportive acts of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the unconquerable, and who out of grace extended this Purāṇa which is a light unto the Truth about him.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

The extent of Each of the Eighteen Purāṇas:
The Glory of the Bhāgavata.

Sūta said:

1. Salutations to the Almighty Lord whom gods Brāhma, Varuṇa, Indra and Maruts extol with divine hymns; whom the Sāma-chanter sing by Vedas and their Aṅgas,¹ according to the Pada and Krama methods, and by the Upaniṣads; whom the Yogis visualize with their mind absorbed in him through deep meditation and whose end (the entire truth about whom could not be fathomed by the hosts of gods and demons.

2. May you be protected by the breaths (lit. wind created by the inhalation and exhalation of air while breathing) of the Lord who assumed the form of a divine tortoise and fell adozing as he (his back) was being scratched and consequently soothed by the ends of the rocks of mount Mandara revolving on it (as it moved while churning the ocean for nectar). As an effect of the still unexhausted impetus communicated by the (ingoing and out-coming) breaths, there take place flow-tide and ebb-tide, and constant rise and fall of waters ceaselessly continue and the sea has no respite.

3. Now you learn from me the number of verses in each Purāṇa and their total number and the main theme and the object of the Purāṇa concerned. Hear from me the procedure

1. Aṅgas: accessories of the Veda, viz. Śikṣā (phonetics) Kalpa (Pertaining to the rituals and prescription of rules for ceremonial and sacrificial, Vyākaraṇa (Grammar), Chandas (Prosody), Jyotisha (Astronomy), Nirukta (Etymology) to be followed in gifts (of the copy of the Bhāgavata), the importance of giving it and also of reading or reciting it, etc.

4. The Brahma Purāṇa consists of ten thousand verses (Ślokas), the Padma Purāṇa, fifty thousand, Viṣṇu Purāṇa twenty-three thousand and Śaiva i.e., Śiva Purāṇa, twentyfour thousands.

5. Śrimad Bhāgavata contains ten and eight (eighteen) thousand Ślokas (verses); the Nārada, twentyfive thousand; the Mārkaṇḍeya, nine thousand, the Agni fifteen thousand and four hundred verses.

6. The Bhaviṣya Purāṇa is comprised of fourteen thousand and five hundred verses; The Brahma Vaivarta Purāṇa, eighteen thousands, the Liṅga Purāṇa, e even thousands.

7. The Varāha Purāṇa contains twentyfour thousand, the Skanda Purāṇa, eighty one thousand, one hundred verses, and the Vāmana, eleven thousands.

8. The Kūrma Purāṇa consists of seventeen thousands; the Matsya Purāṇa, fourteen thousands. The Garuḍa Purāṇa, nineteen thousand verses, while the Brahmāṇḍa has twelve thousand Ślokas.

9. Thus the extent (the total number of verses) of the Purānic compilations is four lakhs i.e. four hundred thousands out of which Śrimad Bhāgavata contains eighteen thousands.

10. It was due to his graciousness that this Purāṇa was at first revealed by Lord Viṣṇu to god Brahmā who was sitting on a lotus grown out of Viṣṇu’s navel and was afraid of Sārśāra.

11. The Śrimad Bhāgavata contains, at the beginning, in the middle and at the end, discourse on the value of dispassion. It has been giving delight to pious persons as well as to celestials with the nectar of numerous episodes, glorifying the sportive activities of Lord Hari.

12. Its main theme is the quintessence of all the Upaniṣads (which form the last division of the Vedic texts) which is characterised by (the declaration of) complete one-ness, identity between the absolute Brahman and the ātman (Paramātman). It is one without a second. And its only object is to secure Mokṣa.
13. He who, on the full moon day of Bhādrapada, offers as a gift a copy of the Bhāgavata placing it on a throne of gold, attains to the highest abode.

14. Other Purāṇas impress (lit. spread their lustre) in the assembly of the righteous, so long as this great and glorious work called Bhāgavata does not appear there.

15. Śrīmad Bhāgavata is really accepted by all as the essence of all the Upaniṣads. He who is satiated by drinking deep into the sweet nectar (of its teaching) does not find delight and interest in any other thing.

16. Just as the Gaṅgā is the foremost and the holiest among rivers, or Lord Viṣṇu, among gods or as god Śiva among the devotees of Viṣṇu (Śiva is the greatest devotee of Viṣṇu) the same is the position of Śrīmad Bhāgavata among Purāṇas.

17. O Brāhmaṇas! Just as the holy place Kāśī is unexcelled in all the sacred places, similarly, out of all the Purāṇas, there is no Purāṇa which can equal (much less surpass in excellence) Śrīmad Bhāgavata.

18. (This) Śrīmad Bhāgavata is a Purāṇa without any blemish. It is so dear to the devotees of Śrī Viṣṇu. In it has been glorified lucidly and sweetly, the pure knowledge symbolizing the Supreme Brahman as characterised by Reality, consciousness and bliss, which is free from any taint of Māyā and is attainable only to the Paramahāṃsas—ascetics of the highest order. In this has been clearly elucidated withdrawal from and hence cessation of all Karmas accompanied with spiritual knowledge, renunciation and intense devotion (to God). He who with a devoted heart listens to it, reads it constantly, and is given to contemplate over it, is liberated (from Samsāra).

19. Let us meditate upon that supreme Spirit who is real, absolutely pure (unsullied by Māyā), free from impurities, untouched by sorrow, free from birth and death and hence eternal—that Supreme Spirit (manifested in the form of Nārāyaṇa) graciously revealed this incomparable Light of knowledge (in the form of Śrīmad Bhāgavata) to god Brahmā formerly, at the beginning of creation, and through him, he passed it on to the divine Sage Nārada, and through him to the sage Kṛṣṇa (Dvaipāyana), and through him to the most prominent Yogan, Śrī Śuka and through him to king Parīkṣit (Viṣṇurāta) out of compassion and grace for him.

20. Hail to the glorious Lord Vāsudeva who is the witness (to everything), who out of grace narrated this Bhāgavata to god Brahmā who was desirous of Mokṣa (Liberation from Samsāra).

21. Salutations to the sage Śuka, the Lord of Yogīs who is the embodiment of Brahman, who enabled king Parīkṣit bitten by the serpent in the form of Samsāra to attain liberation from Samsāra.

22. O Almighty Lord, God of gods, you are our protector. Be pleased to direct us that way so that (unflinching) devotion to your feet may be engendered (in our hearts) in every birth (of ours).

23. I bow to that Supreme Hari, loud chanting and glorification of whose name completely annihilates all sins, and salutation to whom relieves one of all woes and miseries.
APPENDIX

Marathi Commentators of the Bh. P.

(A Note)

In translating the X and XI Skandhas of the Bh. P., I have freely utilised two standard commentaries in Marathi—KD. or Kṛṣṇa Dayārṇava’s Harivaradā on the X Skandha, and EK. or Ekanātha’s Ekākāra Tīkā on the XI Skandha.

Maharashtra has a long tradition of the study and interpretation of the Bh. P.—even before ŚR, as ŚR. respectfully mentions Bopadeva (13th Cent A.D.) from Maharashtra. There are two schools of interpreting the Bh. P.—the orthodox, the early exponent of which is Bopadeva and this school is represented by a number of Maratha saints like Ekanātha, Bahirā (Bhairava) Jātaveda, Janī Janārdana, Śiva Kalyāṇa, Kṛṣṇa Dayārṇava and others; the other School is that of the Mahānubhāva sect like Bhāskara Bhaṭṭa (author of ‘Uddhava Gītā’) and others.

The most famous commentator of the orthodox school was EK. (Ekanātha) Circa 1533—1599 A.D. This scholar saint—social reformer of the 16th Cent. A.D. was not only the greatest writer of his time, but even to-day, he is second to Jñānēśvara in the realm of Marathi literature. EK. lived at Paiṭhaṇ, the ancient capital of Maharashtra of the Sātavāhana period. He adorned whatever he touched. He took the romantic episode of the marriage of Kṛṣṇa and Rukmini from the Bh. P. and his Rukmini Svayamvara is still unsurpassed and girls who wish to get their marriage settled at the earliest still read it devoutly. Kṛṣṇa Dayārṇava, the most famous commentator on the X Skandha of the Bh. P. has bodily incorporated the whole of this work (Rukmini Svayamvara) out of respect for EK., his spiritual predecessor. EK. wrote a number of Vedāntic treatises. But his magnum opus is his commentary on the XI Skandha of the Bh. P. He explained each and every verse of the XI Skandha in 18,000 Ovi verses in Marathi. The Pandits of Benares where EK. wrote this commentary in 1573 A.D. warmly appreciated this work. As the legend goes (as in the case of ŚR’s Com. on the Bh. P.) EK’s commentary was adjudged as the best by the presiding deity of Benares.

Though EK. pays high tributes to ŚR, he differs from him on many points, a few of which are recorded in the footnotes here. EK’s commentary is a synthesis of philosophy and poetry presented to the masses in chaste, lucid Marathi. None of the fifteen SK commentators of different schools of Vedānta (published in the Bhāgavata Vidyaapeeth Ahmedabad’s edition) could surpass him in the flight of imagination and felicity of expression. It is a fond dream of the present writer to render it into English for non-Marathi knowing readers.

EK. wrote a voluminous work on the Rāmdāyaṇa. His allegorical description of the various customs and classes of society, known as Bhāruda is sociologically important.

EK. practised the teaching of Bh. P. and is still respected as a great saint in Maharashtra.

Krṣṇa Dayārṇava (K.D.)

K.D. (1674-1740 A.D.), the author of the monumental Marathi commentary, Harivaradā (42,000 verses in the Ovi metre) on the X Skandha, is a spiritual descendant of EK. K.D’s spiritual genealogy is as fellows:—

Ekanātha→Cidānanda→Śvānanda Śvāmi→Govinda Guru →Krṣṇa Dayārṇava. His Original name was Narahari, but his habit of loudly remembering God as “Krṣṇa Dayārṇava” led people to re-christen him as KD. His two immediate (spiritual) predecessors were important officers in the service of Śivājī the founder of the Maratha Kingdom and his son Sambhājī (1680-89 A.D.). KD. himself had to go through the fiery ordeal of Aurangzeb’s ruthless attempt to crush the newly founded Hindu Kingdom till his (Aurangzeb’s) death in 1707 A.D.

KD. does not state how far he is indebted to his Maratha pūrva sūrīs like Bhāhirā (Bhairava) Jātaveda, Śiva-Kalyāṇa who wrote 25,806 Ovi-verses and 1,25,000 Ovi verses respectively on the X Skandha, and it is difficult to ascertain it as the above-mentioned works are still unpublished. But Hari-varadā shows the encyclopaedic knowledge of KD.

KD. began to write this commentary at the age of fifty-four, as he was advised to sing of the Lord as a remedy for his serious Malady. And like the ancient EK. poet Mayūra, he was cured of it by the time he completed the first half of the X Skandha. Hari-varadā reflects a high standard of achievement in blending poetry with philosophy and other disciplines then current in Maharashtra.

KD. completed X. 87.23 of the Bh.P. and passed away on 13th November 1740. The remaining portion was completed by his disciple Uttama-Śloka in 1743.

SANĀTANA GOSVĀMI (SG.)

SG. and his brother Rūpa Gosvāmī belong to the Gauḍīya school of Vaiṣṇavism. They were Brahmins from Karnataka in the South, who attained influential official positions in the Muslim Court of Gauḍa with a muslim title. This led some scholars to believe that they were muslim converts. But as S. K. De points out, “The stupendous Śāstric learning as well as the Vaiṣṇava disposition of the two brothers undoubtedly prompted Caitanya to select them as the apologists of his faith” (Vaiṣṇava Faith and Movement, P. 73 Foot note 2). The contribution of SG. in building up the Gauḍīya School of Vaiṣṇavism is substantial. Unfortunately his commentary on the Bh. P. is published in the Bengali script. I had to depend on the excerpts of SG. published in the Devanāgarī script in the Vrindavan edition of the X Skandha. And even the excerpts testify to the great scholarship of SG. In the interest of the understanding of Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavism in other parts of India, one wishes the Gosvāmis of Vrindavan to bring out a Devanāgarī edition of SG.’s work.
INDEX

In the following Index the 1st (Roman) figure indicates the number of the Skandha, the next (Arabic) figure, the number of the Chapter and the next (Arabic) figure or figures, the number of the verse or verses. In case no number be given after the No. of the Chapter, that shows that the whole chapter deals with that topic. For example on page 1, Abhimanyu III.3.17 means Abhimanyu is mentioned in the III Skandha, 3rd chapter, verse No. 17. Aila Gitā—XI.26 indicates that it is in the XI Skandha 26th Chapter (the whole of the chapter deals with it).

Abhimanyu—Son of Arjuna and Subhadra; married Uttara and Vatsalā; son of Parīkṣit—III.3.17; IX.22.33; Kilā Bṛhadāla—IX.12.8.

Action—See Karma

Adhi-bhūta ) Adhi-daiva ) —II.10.14 Adhvātma )

Ādi-Śeṣa—or Śeṣa—Son of Kaśyapa & Kādrī; described and praised—V.25. 1-15; VI.16.30-32; Citra-sena’s praise—VI.16.34-48.

Aditi—Daughter of Daśa; wife of Kaśyapa; Her sons—Twelve Ādityas (Sun-gods)—VI.6.25, 38; observed Pāyurata—VIII chs 16 & 17; Vāmana born of her—VIII. 18.1; Śrikrṣṇa restores her earrings—X.59, 98.

Āditya—The Sun-gods; 12 in no. —VI.6.39; XII.11.30—50.

Advaita—IV.7.50-54; 9.33; VII.9.30-32; X.3.18; 14.22.

Agastya—Son of Pulastya. His mother Hāvīrmtuk and brother Viśvavāh. He belongs to Svāyambhuva age—IV.1.36; gives curse to Indradyumna—VIII.4.10; destroyed by the curse of Mahādeva. Reborn in the present age in a jar of ghee from the lustre of Mitrā and Varuna. Therefore known as Kumbha-yoni and Maitrāvaruṇī—VI.18.5 His wife Lopāmudrā and son Idhavāhā.

Āgnidhra—Son of Priyavrata and Barhiṣmati—V.1.25; married Purvacci (an Apsaras) had nine sons by her—V.2.2-20.

Āhuka—Son of Puraviṣṇu; father of Ugrasena and Devaka—IX.24.21.

Āhuki—Āhuka’s sister—IX.24.21.

Aila—The celestial elephant

Aila Gitā—IX.26.

Airāvata—The celestial elephant—VIII.8.4; X. 25.7.

Ajā—(i) Daśaratha’s father—IX.10.1.
(ii) One of the eleven Rudras—son of Bhūta-prajāpati and Sarūpā—VI.6.17.
(iii) Son of Pratihārī—V.15.5.

Ajana or Jina—Father of the Buddha—I.3.24.

Ajamiṣṭha—Son of Hastin—Father of Bṛhadīṣu, Nila—Family transformed into Brāhmaṇa—IX.21.21-30.

Ajāmila—The story of—VI.1.21-68; Efficacy of God’s name—VI. chapters 2 & 3.

Aja-nābha—old name for India—V.7.3.

Ajātaśatrū—(i) Yudhiṣṭhira—I.13.30. (vide Yudhiṣṭhira)
(ii) A king in Kali age—XII.1.6

Ajitā—Son of Vairāja—became the divine Tortoise—VIII.5.9-10; Churning the ocean for nectar—VIII.7.

Akrūra—Son of Śvaphalka—IX.24.15; His sons—Devavān and Upadeva—IX.24.17; goes to Gokula to bring Krṣṇa—X.38; vision of Balarāma & Krṣṇa while bathing in the Yamunā—X.39.41 ff; eulogises Śri Krṣṇa—X.38.7-22; 40.1-30, 48.18.27—Krṣṇa visits Akrūra’s house—X.48.12-36; visits Hastināpurā—X.49; Reinvited to Dwārakā—X.57.29-34; killed by Bhoja in Yādava civil fight (Yādavī)—XI.30-36.

Ākūti—(i) Daughter of Svāyambhuva Manu and wife of Ruci—Their son Lord Yajñika and daughter—Dakṣinā—VI.1.1. ff; II. 7.2.
(iii) Wife of Prthuṣeṇa—V. 15.6.
Alakā—Kubera’s capital: Dhruva’s visit to—IV.10.5.
Alakanandā—A branch of the Gaṅgā—IV.6.24; V.17.5-9.
Alambuṣṭa—A celestial damsel; married Tṛṇabindu; sons—Viśāla, Śūnyabhāndhu and Dhumraketu, daughter—Idabīḍa—IX.2.30-33.
Alarka—Son of Dyumat—IX.17.6-8; Disciple of Dattātreya—1.5.11; 11.7.44.
Allegory of Puraṇājana—IV.25;of sheep—IX.19 (Told by Yaśāti to Devyāṇī).
Ambālikā—Queen of Vicitrāvīrya; mother of Pāṇḍu—IX.22.23-25.
Ambarāṣa—(i) Son of Nābhāga—IX.4.13; His sons—Viśrāpa, Ketumān and Sambhu—IX.6.1; Performs Aśvamedha—VI.4.22; Observed the vow of Ekaḍāsi—IV.4.29; Durvāsas created a female ogre to kill him—IX.4.46-48; Sudarśana pursues Durvāsas; praises Sudarśana—IX.5.6.
(ii) Son of Māndhātā and Bindumati—IX.6.38; adopted as son by his grandfather Yuvanāśva—IX.7.1.
Ambikā—Queen of Vicitrāvīrya; mother of Dhṛtarāṣṭra—IX.22.2-26.
Amṛta-nectar—(i) churning of the Milky Ocean for—VIII.5.11-18; creation—VIII.8.34; served to gods by Mohini (Viṣṇu)—VIII.9.17.
(ii) A subcontinent in Plakṣa-dvīpa—V.20.3.
Arṇūmān—Son of Asaṃjñasa—IX.8.15; his son Dilīpa—XI.9.2
Ānaka—Son of Śūra, Vasudeva’s brother—IX.24.28; married Kaṇkā—IX.24.41.
Ānaka-duṇḍubhi—N. of Vasudeva—IX.24.29-30, vide Vasudeva.
Anasuyā—Daughter of Kardama and Devahūti—III.24.22; wife of Atri—Sons Datta, Durvāsas and Soma—IV.1.15.
Āṇḍhra—(i) Son of Dirghatamas from Bali’s queen—XI...23.5.
(ii) Āṇḍhra dynasty—XI.2.22.
Āṅga—(i) Born of Uttānapāda lineage; his father Ulmuka; wife Sunitā; son Vena—IV.13.17; performed Aśvamedha—IV.13.25; abandoned kingdom with dejection—IV.13.47.
(ii) Born of Soma lineage from wife of Bali—IX.23.5
Āṅgada—(i) Son of Vāli—the monkey chief—IIX.10.7.
(ii) Son of Lāṣmaṇa Rāma’s nephew—IX.11.12.
Anger—See Krodha.
Āṅgiras—(i) A mind-born son of god Brahmadeva—III.12.24; married the daughter of Kardama—III.24.22; sons—Ucāthyā and Bṛhaspati—IV.1.35; daughters—Sinvāli, Rākā and Anumati—IV.1.34.
Āṅgiras—(i) a river—V.20.4
(ii) Wife of Vasu. Their son Viśva karma—VI.6.15.
Aniruddha—(i) Son of Pradyumna and Rukmavati—I.Rukmavati I.61.18; husband of Rocanā—X.61.18-25; marriage with Uṣā—X. Cha 62 son and 63; (yūha) Vajra—X.90.37.
(ii) A manifestation of the Lord XII.11.21.
Antarikṣa—(i) A heaven also bhuvan-loka—V.24.5.
(ii) N. of a prince—IX.12.12.
(iii) N. of an Asura—son of Mura, killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.59.12.
(iv) A sage, son of Ṛṣabhā—V.4.11; spiritually guided Vasudeva—XI.3.3 ff.
Anumati—(i) Daughter of Āṅgiras and Śraddhā—IV.1.34; wife of Ādiya—son Pūrṇāmāsā—VI.18.3.
(ii) A river in Śālmalī Dvīpa—V.20.10.
Apsaras—Celestial artistes arose out of Kṣīra-sāgara—VIII.8.7; Mother Muni—VI.6.27; created by Brahmadeva—III.20.38.
Arcā—(Image-worship) — III.29.21-27; IV.8.54-61; X.84.10; 86.55; XI.2.47; 11.42; 27.9-16.
(ii) Queen of Pṛthu—An arha of Lāṣmī—IV.15.2-6; 23.19-24.
Ariṣṭā—Wife of Kaśyapa; mother of Gandharvas (horses)—VI.6.23-29.

Arjuna—(i) Son of Pându and Kunti an anāṣa of Indra praised Kṛṣṇa—I.7.22-25; controls Aśvatthāman’s missile—I.7.29; Returns from Dvārakā and reports Kṛṣṇa’s departure to Heaven—I.14.39-44; I.15; Queen Draupadi—son Śruta-kirti—I. X. 22.7-29; Abduchs Subhadrā—X.86.

(ii) Son from Subhadrā Abhimanyu IX.22.33; other sons Babhrvāhana and Irāvan—IX.22.32; attended matriindā Svasayamvarā—X.83.24.

(iii) (Kārtavīrya) or Saha-sārjuna son of Kṛta-vīrya Haihayā—IX.15. 17.41; killed by Parasurāma, (ibid)

His sons IX.23.24 ff.

(iv) (Trees)—uprooted by Kṛṣṇa—X.10.23-27.

Arts—sixty-four—X.45.36.

Aruṇa—(i) Son of Kaśyapa and Vinātā—VI.6.22; charioteer of the Sun V.21.16.

(ii) An Asura siding with Naraka—X.59.12.

(iii) Son of Danu—VI.6.30.

(iv) Father of Tribandhana—IX.7.4.

(v) Aruṇas sages.1. 19.11. VIII. 13.25.

Arundhati—Daughter of Kardama Prajāpāti; wife of Vasiṣṭha—III. 24.23; Another name—Urjā—IV.1.40.

Arka—(i) One of the Vasu gods; son of Dharma Prajāpāti; wife Vāsānā—VI.6.11-13.

(ii) A king—IX.21.31.

Aryama—Son of Kaśyapa and Aditi—one of Ādityas; wife Māti-kā—sons Carṣaṇa—V.6.39-42.

Aṣarirā-Vāk—(Incorporal Voice)

To Nārada—I.6.21 (25) ; To Bharata—IX.20.20;
To Karmā—X.1.34; To Rukmin (Balarāma)—X.61.33.

Aṣramas—Stages in life—III.12.41; VII.chs 11-14; XI. ch. 17 & 18.

Aṣraya—A characteristic of Purāṇas—II.10.1-7 vide Purāṇa

Āsuri—a disciple of Kapila—I.3.10; VI.15.14.

Āsuri—Wife of Devajīt—V.15.3.

Āśvamedha—A horse sacrifice By—Yudhiṣṭhira—I.12.32 ff; III.3.18; Bali—VIII.18; Parikṣit—III.16.3; Sagara—IX.8.8; Prithu—IV.19; Indra—V.13.19; Ambarīṣa—IX.4.13; Bharata—IX.20.25; Vasudeva—X.84.42 ff.

Aśvin—twin-gods; sons of the Sun and Saṃjñā—VI.6.40; Rejuvenate Cyaṇa—IX.3.11; Born as Nakula and Sahadeva from Mādri—IX.22.28.

Atala—The first sub-terranean region—II.1.27, 5.40; Its description—V.24. The other subterranean regions—Atala, Vitala, Sutala, Talātala, Mahātala, Rasātala, Pātāla—II.5.40; V.24.7 ff. Other references to Hell—III.25.7; 30. 28.33; V.14.28; VII.6.6; VIII.4.10; X.49.24; 60.35; XI.8.7; 17. 58; 26.3; also andha-tāmidra—V.26.7-9.

Athan—a N. of a Veda—I.4.20.

Athanvan—A mind born son of Brahman; wife Śantī (Citti); son Dadhyac—IV.1.42.

Aṭīrātra—(i) A sacrifice—created out of Brahman’s mouth—III.12.40.

(ii) Son of the Manu—Cākṣaṇa and Nādvālā—IV.13.16.

Atri—A sage; born from Brahman’s eyes—III.12.24; wife—Anasūyā; sons—Datta, Durvāsas and Soma—IV.1.15-33; IX.14.2; Atri born twice like Dakṣa.

Aurva—A sage of Bhrigu clan 1.19.10; Sagara’s preceptor IX.8.8.

Avadhūṭa (Dattātreya)—Dialogue with Yadu—XI.ch. 7-9.

Avanti—N. of a city—X.45.31.

Avatāras—Incarnation of Viṣṇu:

Cause—I.1.13; 8.32-35; 10.25; III.2.15. ff; 5.16-42; 17.31; 24.10, 18, 36, 37. Series of Incarnations—I.3.1-25; II.7.1-38; X.40.17-22; XI.4.3 ff.

Avatārānuçcarita—(Description of incarnations)—a characteristic of Purāṇa—II.10.5.

Avidyā—Nescience—I.3.33; II.6.20; III.12.2; 20.18.

Āxirhotra—Son of Rṣabhā—V.4.11; Spiritual advice to Nimi—XI.3.43-55.

Ayana—a measure of Time (six months)—III.11.12; V.21.3-6.
   (ii) A son of Purūravas—IX.15.1; had five sons such as Nahuṣa & others—IX.17.1.
   (iii) Son of Puruhotra—IX.24.6.
Ayurveda The Science of medicine—II.7.21; III.12.38; VIII.8.35; IX.17.4.

(B)

Babhruc—(i) Son of Druhyu; father of Setu—IX.23.14.
   (ii) Son of Romapāda; father of Kṛṣṭi—IX.24.2.
   (iii) Son of Devaṛdha—IX.24.9-10.
   (iv) A sage knower of the Atharva; Pupil of Sunaka—XI.7.3.
Babhruvāhāna—Son of Arjuna and Citrāṅgadā—IX.22.32.
Badari or okārāna alias Viśālā—a famous holy place in the Himalayas; a favourite place for penance—III.4.21-22; IX.3.36; Uddhava goes to—XI.29.47.
Bahlāśva—Son of Dhrīti of Mithilā—IX.13.26; Śri Kṛṣṇa visits him X.86.17; His praise of Kṛṣṇa—X.86.31-35.
Baki alias Pūtanā—A demoness killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.6.2-18; another name—Utupikā—II.2.7.27.
Bala—(i) An Asura killed by Indra—VIII.11.28.
   (ii) N. of a Lord’s attendant—VIII.21.16
   (iii) A son of Mayāsura; the ruler of the subterranean region—Atala—V.24.16
   (iv) N. of Balarāma—II.7.35; IX.14.26
   (v) Son of Kṛṣṇa and Lakṣmāṇa—X.61.15.
Balārāma—Son of Vasudeva and Rohini—IX.24.16; an incarnation of Seṣa—X.2.5; Transferred from Devaki’s womb to Rohini’s—X.2.5-8; Marries Revati—IX.3.36; X.52.15; Kills Pralamba—X.57.26; Kills Rukmi—X.61.30-36; Revisit Nanda’s Gokula—X.65, diverts the stream of the Yamunā—X.65.29-28; Kills Dvivida—X.67; drags Hastaipur to the Gangā—X.68.15-41; kills Romaharṣaṇa—X.78. Kills Balvala—X.79.1-6; tries to stop the duel between Bhima and Duryodhana—X.79.30-39; Gives up his body by Yogic process—XI.30.26.
Balāhaka—N. of a horse of Kṛṣṇa’s chariot—X.53.5.
Balī—The great Asura devotee of Viśṇu, son of virocana, married to Asānā or Vindhyaśāli, had 100 sons—Bāṇa and others—VI.18.16-17; helped gods for churning the sea—VIII.6.27; fight with gods and their defeat—VIII.10.16; VIII.11.46; conquers Svarga and rules over it—VIII.15.4-33; performs a hundred Horse sacrifices—Viśṇu as a dwarf begs three steps of land—VIII.18; Viśṇu’s cosmic form and Balī deprived of kingdom—VIII.20 & VIII.21; Balī bound by Garuḍa—VIII.21.26; 22.2; Balī prays Vāmana and enters Sutala—VIII.22; Balī prays Kṛṣṇa—X.85.39-46; Balī’s prowess (stories about)—V.24.18-27; 1.3.19; 1.12.25; II.7.18; Balī—a future Indra in Sāvarṇi Manvantara—VIII.13.12.
Balī—(i) Son of Kr̥tvavarmā; son-in-law of Kṛṣṇa—X.61.24.
   (ii) Founder of Andhra Dynasty—XII.1.22.
Balivala—An Asura—son of Ilvāla—X.78.38 ff.; killed by Balarāma—X.79.1-6; also II.7.34; III.3.11.
Baṇa—An Asura—son of Balī and Kotarā—X.63.20-1; God Śiva’s protege—VI.8.18; His daughter Uśā—X.62.1-10; fight with Kṛṣṇa who cut off his 1000 arms, Śiva’s intervention—four arms saved—X.62.32-49.
Barhiṣat alias Prācina-barhis, Vediṣat—(i) son of Havirdhana and Havirdhānī—IV.24.8-10;
Barhiṣmati—(i) Capital of Svāyambhuva Manu—III.22.29.
   (ii) Daughter of Viśvakarmā; married to Priyavrata (vīde Priyavrata)—V.1.24.
Bā sklala—(i) An Asura—son of Anuhrāda—VI.18.16
   (ii) Founder of a school of R̥gveda—XII.6.54-55.
Bhadra—(i) One of the Tuṣita—IV.1.7
(ii) Son of Vasudeva and Pauravi—IX.24.47.
(iii) Son of Vasudeva and Devaki—IX.29.54.
Bhadrā—(i) Daughter of Meru; wife of Bhadrāsa—V.2.19-23.
(ii) A tributary of Gaṅgā—V.17.5, 8.
(iii) Alias Kausalyā; wife of Vasudeva; mother of Keśī—IX.
(iv) Queen of Krṣṇa; daughter of Dhṛṣṭaketu and Śrutakirtī—
X.58.56; 61.17; 83.12.
Bhadrāśva—(i) Son of Āgnidhra, married Meru’s daughter
Bhadrā—V.2.17-23.
(ii) A part (varṣa) of Jambudvīpa—V.18.1-14; conquered by
(iii) Son of Kuvalayāśva—IX.6.24.
Bhaga—Son of Kāśyapa and Aditi—VI.6.39; wife Siddhi, sons Mahīma, Vibhu, Prabhu—VI.18.2; Blinded by Virabhadra in Dakṣa sacrifice —
IV.5.20.
Bhagavān—Lord Viṣṇu, Nārāyaṇa)—
Description of His Personality— I.12.8-10; II.9.14-16; III.15.38-45; III.28.21-33; IV.7.20-21; VIII.6.3-7; X.39.45-55; Brahmā born from His navel—I.3.2; II.18.13-16; creation of the Universe from His limbs—I.1.26-39; Manifestations—To Daśāta at sacrifice—
IV.7.18; at Aghamarsaṇa Tirtha—VI.4.35-42; To Prṛthu—IV.20.
3; To Gajendra—VIII.3.31; Tāntrika way of worshipping Him—
XI.3.49-55.
Bhāgavāta—(i) Name of a Śunga
King—XII.1.18.
(ii) This mahāpurāṇa of 18000 verses; origin—Saunaka’s request to narrate—I.4.1-14; The glory of—I.1.2-3; 3.40-43; 5.8-22;
II.1.8-10; III.8.2; XII.4.40-43;
XII.12.57-58 as in Padma-
Purāṇa see Intro. pp. LXXI-
CXXIX contents of—XII.
3.45; Ten characteristics of—
II.10.1.9.
Bhagiratha—Son of Dilipa; brings down the Gaṅgā—IX.9.2-14;
Father of Śruti—IX.9.16.
Bhakta—Devotee (God’s)—greatness of :
I.1.15; 2.25-26; 18.4.13; II.
3.11; 7.42; III.4.25; 13.4; 21.17-18;
IV.20.12; 29.39-40; 30.19-20; V.
1.1-5; 13.21-23; VI.3.27, 33; 17.
27-28, 31; VII.5.32; 10.9-20, 48;
IX.4.63-71; 5.14-15; X.10.41,
84.10-13. (vide infra ekāntin)
Bhakti—(Devotion)—I.2.22; II.1.
21; III.25.28 ff.; Nine types of Bh.
—VII.5.23-24; achieves all Puruśārthas II.3.10; Bhakti as means of Liberation—I.2.7-20; 8.20; XI.
ch. 14; 19.19-27; Name of the Lord
(smaraṇa)—Glory of I.1.14; 16;
II.1.11; III.9.15; 33.6-7; IV.7.47;
V.24-20; 25.11; VI.1.30-31; 2.7-
19; VI.3.22-31; VIII.23.16; IX.5.
16; X.2.37; XII.3.44; 12.46-47;
Glorification (Kathā) of His deeds
—III.13.50.
Bhanu—(i) Daughter of Dakṣa, wife of Dharma, Her son Deva-ṛṣabha—VI.6.5.
(ii) A prince of Brāhdbala dynasty—
IX.12.10.
(iii) Son of Krṣṇa and Satyabhāmā—
X.61.10.
Bhānunā—(i) Son of Brāhadāva IX.
1.11.
(ii) Son of Keśidhvaja IX.13.21.
(iii) Son of Bharga IX.23.16-17.
Bharata—(i) Jāda-Bharata, son of Rābha and Jayanti—married
Pañcajani—V.4.8-9; 7.1-3;
Reborn as a deer V. 8—Reborn as a Brähmaṇa and saved by Bhadrakāli—V.9; Dialogue with king Raḥugāna—V. chs.
10 to 14.
(ii) Son of Daśaratha and Kaikeyi—
IX.10.3-35; Ruled as Rāma’s representative—IX.
10.35-43; sons—Takṣa and
Puṣkala—IX.11. 12-13;
Punished Gandharvas and went to Heaven with Rāma.
(iii) Son of Duṣṣyanta and Śakuntalā—IX.20.7-26; married three princesses from Vidarbha who killed their children lest the kingshould desert them—performed marut-stoma sacrifice for a son and adopted Vitatha
Bharadvāja—See above (III)
Bhārata-varṣa—alias Ajanābha —
V.7.3. India before the partition;
The real karma-kṣetra—V.17.11; Description and greatness — V. 19.7-28.
(ii) See Bhāratavarṣa.

Bhīṣu-gītā—The song of the ascetic —XI.23 (complete chapter).

Bhīma—(i) One of 11 Rudras—VI. 6.17.
(ii) Son of Vijaya; Kāncana's father—IX.15.3.
(iii) A Pāṇḍava—IX.22.29-31; married to Draupadi, Hīḍimbā, Kāli, kills Jarāsandha —X.72.33-46; Goes to Mahaprasthāna with Yudhīśthīra I.15.15.

Bhīṣma-ka—Rukmini's father—X.52. 21.22.

Bhojakaṭa—New capital of Vidarbha founded by Rukmi—X.54.52.

Bhrmara-gītā—(An apostrophe to blackbees by Gopis)—X.47.12-21.

Bṛghu—(i) God Brahmag's mind-born son—III.12.23; Married to Khyāti ; daughter Śri devi —III.24.23 ; Deputed to Test three gods Brahmag, Śiva and Viṣṇu—X.89.2; sons—Dhātā and Vidhātā—IV.1.43-45; curses Śiva's followers —IV.2.27-32; Virabhadrā punishes Bṛghu—IV.5.19, 7. 5; Prays Viṣṇu IV.7.30.
(ii) Born in Varuṇa's sacrifice in Cākusā Manvantara, called Varuṇi Bṛghu—VI. 18.4.

Bhū (The Earth)—(i) Part of Viṣṇu's body—II.1.27; 5.38-42.
(ii) The Earth-goddess—conversation with Dharma—I.16. 18-37; plighted in Kali age—I.17.26-28 ; lifted up by Varāha—III.13.16 ff; Prays Brahmag to lighten her burden —X.1.17; Prays Śri Kṛṣṇa —X.59.25-31; As Avadhūta's Preceptor—XI.7.33.
(iii) Sphere of the Earth—description etc.—III.11.39 ; 23. 43; V.1.30-33; 16.4.29; V.18.1, 15-17, 19.1, 16-18, 29-
31; V.20.1-39.

Bhūtādi or Mahāt—The Principle called Mahat—II.5.25; III.5.27-29; 26.19-22.

Bindumati—(i) Wife of Marici, her son Bindumān—V.15.15.

Bindumān—Son of Marici & Bindumātī father of Madhu—V. 15.15.

Bindusaras—A tīrtha near the Sarasvati—place of Kardama's penance —III.21.35-39; sage Kapila stays here—III.25.5; Balarāma's visit—X.78.19.

Brahmā—Four-headed god—born out of Viṣṇu's navel—I.3.2, III.8.15-16; His penance—II.9; Praises the Lord—II.6.35-45; III.9.1-25; X.2.26-42, X.14.1-40; Creates by will power 10 sons like Marici III.12.22; Lust after his daughter —III.12.28; Sva-yambhuva Manu born from him—III.12.52-53; Assumes and renounces various bodies—III.12.28-53; Viṣṇu as Divine Boar born from his nose—III.13.18 Goes to Śiva and praises him—IV.6.8-53; Expounds philosophy to Priyavrata—V.1.11-19; grants boon to Hiranyakasipu—VII.3.18; carries off Kṛṣṇa's cattle and cowherds—X.15; Requests Kṛṣṇa to return to His region —XI.6.21-27.

Brahma-datta—Son of Nipa and Śuka's daughter Kṛtvi—IX.21.25.

Brahma-rāta—Another name of Śuka—I.9.8; II.8.27.

Brahma-sāvarni—The 10th Manus, son of Upāsioka—VIII.13.21-23.

Brāhmaṇa—The 1st class out of four classes (varnas); His importance—III.14.41 ff; 16.2-11; IV.21.36-49; V.5.23-27; VII.14.41-42; X.64. 32-43; 80-28-33; 86.51-57; His duties—VII.11.13-14; XI.7.40-41; characteristics —VII.11.21; XI.17.16; livelihood—VII.11.14, 16, 18, 20; effect of curse—I.7.48; Substitute for his capital punishment I.7.57.

Brahmaṇḍa—(i) a Mahāpurāṇa of 12000 verses—XII.13.8.
(ii) The Universe—II.5.34; 10.10 ff; III.6.1-6.

Bṛhadāśva—(i) Son of Śrāvasta of of Ikvyāku race—IX.6.21
(ii) Son of Sahadeva of the Solar race—IX.12.11
(iii) A sage-visitor to Bhīṣma—1.9.6.

Bṛhadbhānu—(i) Viṣṇu’s incarnation in the 14th Manvantara—VIII.13.35
(ii) Son of Kṛṣṇa and Satyabhāmā—X.61.10.
(iii) Son of Pṛthulākṣa of the Lunar race—IX.23.11.

Bṛhanmanas—Son of Bṛhadṛṣṭa, father of Jayadratha—IX.23.11.

Bṛhadṛṣṭa—(i) Son of Devarāta of Mithilā and father of Mahāvīrya—IX.13.15
(ii) Son of Upārcara—Vasū; father of Kusānābha and Jaraśandha—IX.22.6-8.
(iii) Son of Timi in Pāṇḍava dynasty, father of Sudās—IX.22.43.
(iv) Son of Pṛthulāśva of the solar race—IX.23.10-11.
(v) The 9th Maurya king—XII.1.15.

Bṛhaspati—(i) In Svāyambhuva Manvantara, son of Anīgiras—one of the seven sages in Svārociṣa Manvantara. In the present Age, son of Anīgiras and Śraddhā—IV.1.34-35; made a calf while milking the earth—IV.18.14; The preceptor of gods, but Indra insults him and he leaves Indra's side—VI.7-2-17; Budha, born of his wife Tārā from Soma—IX.14.4.14; His son Kaca—IX.18.22.
(ii) The Planet Jupiter—V.22.15.

(ii) Name of a Vedic metre—born of god Brahmā—III.12.46.

Bṛhatena—(i) Son of Sunakṣātra, father of Karmajit—IX.22.47;
(ii) Son of Kṛṣṇa and Bhadrā—X.61.17.

Budha—Mercury (The Planet) born of Soma and Tārā, quarrel of about his fatherhood—IX.14.4-14; married Ilā—father of Purūravas—IX.15; A planet—V.22.13.

Buddha—Viṣṇu’s incarnation—I.3.24; II.7.37.

(C)

Caitra—Name of a month—XII.11.33.
Cakṣu—(i) The eye—its creation and presiding deity—II.6.3; III.6.15; 26.38.48.
(ii) Son of king Sarvatejas and Ākūti—A Manu—married Naḍvalā and had 12 sons—IV.13.15.
(iii) The Oxus—A branch of the divine Gangā—V.17.5.
(iv) A son of king Anu of the Lunar race—IX.23.1.

Cākṣuṣa—(i) The 6th Manu—son of Viśvakārma & Kṛṣṇa VI.6; but VIII.5.7 states him to be Cakṣu’s son.
(ii) Son of Khaṇiṣṭha; father of Vivīhnāti—IX.2.24.
(iii) Name of gods in the 14th Manvantara—VIII.13.34.
(iv) Name of a Manvantara (see (i) above).

Camāsā—Son of Rṣabha and Jayanti—V.4.11; XI.2.21; Teaches Bhagavatism to Vasudeva—XI.3.2.18.
Campo—Son of Hārīta; the founder of the city of Campā (near modern Bhagalpur)—IX.8.1.
Cāṇakya—The exterminator of Nanda dynasty—XII.1.2.

Candra—(i) The sphere of the moon—V.22.8-10 also see Soma.
(ii) A son of Viśvarandhi and father of Yuvanāśva—IX.6.20.
(iii) A son of Kṛṣṇa and Nilā alias Satyā—X.61.13.
(iv) Son of Atri and Anasūyā; married 27 daughters of Dakṣa—IV.1.33.

Candra-bhāgā—The Chinab, also a name of the Bhīmā—V.19.18.
Candra-bhānu—A son of Kṛṣṇa and Satyabhāmā—X.61.10.
Chandra-gupta—Founder of Maurya dynasty—XII.1.13.
Cānūra—Athlete of Kanasa—killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.43.31-44; 44.17-23.
Garika—A pupil of Vaiśampāyana—XII.6.61; performed austerities for his guru.
Cāru—Son of Kṛṣṇa and Rukmiṇī—X.61.9.
Cāru-candra—do—X.61.9.
Cāru-deśa—do—X.61.8.
Cārugupta—do—X.61.8.
Cātur-māsya—(i) Son of Savitṛ and Prśni—VI.18.1
(ii) A kind of sacrifice—V.7.5.
Cātur-varṇya—Division of society in 4 classes—II.1.37; 5.37; III.6.30-33; VII.11.13-15.
Cedi—Son of Uśīka of Romapāda race, father of Damaghoṣa—IX.24.2.
Chandas—Vedic metres like Gāyatri and others, created by Brahmadeva—II.6.11; III.12.45-46.
Churning of the sea—The sea—churning of—the story—VIII.7.9; VIII.8 to 12 chapters.
Citra-ketu—(i) Son of Vasiṣṭha & Urjā—IV.1.40.
(ii) King of Sūrāsenas—VI.14.9; Chief queen Kṛtadviti—tragic tale of her son —14.28-46; Nārada initiates him—15.27; Heads Vidyādharas—16.28; praises the Lord—16.34-48; ridicules Śiva 17.4; Pārvatī’s curse—17.11-24; born as Vṛtrā—17.39.
(iii) Son of Lakṣmanā—IX.11.12
(iv) Son of Devabhāga—IX.24.40
(v) Son of Kṛṣṇa & Jāmbavati—IX.16.12.
Citralekha—Uśā’s friend—Kumbhāṇḍa’s daughter—smuggles Aniruddha in Uśā’s palace by her Yogic power—X.62.14-23.
Cīrāgadā—Son of Śantanu and Satyavati killed by a Gandharva—IX.22.20-21.
Citra-ratha—(i) Another name of Dhruva—IV.10.22
(ii) Son of Gaya and Gayantī; married to Urpā; son Sanurā—V.15.14.
(iii) Son of Supārśva of Videha; father of Kṣemadhi—IX.13.23.
(iv) Another name of Romapāda; the foster father of Daśaratha’s daughter Sāntā whom he gave to Rṣya-śṛṅga—IX.23.7-10.
(v) Son of Ruṣekha of Yādava clan; father of Śaśābindu—IX.23.31.
(vi) Vṛṣṇi’s son; paternal uncle of Akrūra—IX.24.15-18.
(vii) Son of Nemicakra of Pāṇḍava race—father of Kaviratha—IX.22.40.
Citra-sena—(i) Son of Manu—Devasāvarṇi—VIII.13.30
(ii) Son of king Nariyanta, of the solar race—IX.2.19.
Citti—alias Šānti, Daughter of Kardama and Devaḥūti; wife of Atharva—III.24.24; IV.1.42.
Cow’s Gift—The gift of—IX.4.33.
Creation—and Puruṣasūkta—II.6.1 ff.
—of Tattvas and deities—III.5.27-37; 26.1.
—of Anā—egg of the Universe—III.6.6-11-18, III.8.13; IX.20.1.
—Tenfold; III.10 (chapter)—of the Lotus—III.8.14-21; 10-5; 20.16.
—of Brahmadeva—are, Sanaka—III.12.2.
Cyavana—(i) Son of Bhṛgu and Pulomā—blinded by princess Sukanyā who married him—IX.3.2-9; youth restored by Aśvins—3.11-23; Aśvins offered Soma, Indra’s rage, Indra disgraced—3.24-25.
(ii) Son of Mitreya of the Lunar race—IX.22.1.
(iii) Son of Suhotra of the Lunar race, father of Kṛṣṇ—IX.22.5.

(D)

Dadhici alias Dadhyān—Son of Atharvaṇa and Citti, also called Aśvaśas—IV.1.42; VI.9.52; Gives up body from the creation of Vajra—VI.10.1-12.
Dakṣa—(i) Born from Brahmadeva’s thumb—III.12.23; married Purusūti, the daughter of Svāyambhuvas Manu—IV.1.11, 47—begot 16 daughters—IV.1.48; curses Rudra at Viśva-śṛṣṭa’s sacrifices—IV.2.5-19; countercurse by Nandīśvara IV.2.20-26; coronated as the chief Prajāpati—IV.3.2; performs Byhaspati sacrifice—IV.3.3; His daughter Satī, Śiva's consort, visits this sacrifice, is insulted and commits suicide—IV.4.7-29; Virabhadra beheads him—IV.5.22-24; Revived with a goat's head—IV.7.8; this Dakṣa of the Svāyambhuva period gives up his body—IV.30.48.

(ii) Born again in Cākṣuṣa Manvantara—from Prācetasas and Māriṣa—IV.30.48-49; VI.4.17; praises the Lord—4.23-24; marries Asīkini—4.51; sons Haryaśvas turn recluse as per Nārada's advice—VI.5.1-34; curses Nārada—5.35-43; had sixty daughters and gave them in marriage to Dharma, Kaśyapa, Candraw, Bhūta, Angiras and Kṛṣṇa and Tārksya (Kaśyapa)—VI.6.1-45.

(iii) Son of Citrasena, father for Miḍhva—IX.2.19.

(iv) Son of Uṣānara—IX.23.3.

Dakṣa-sāvarṇi—The 9th Manu—son of Varuṇa—VIII.13.18.

Dakṣinā—Daughter of Ruci and Ākūti—married Yaśña—had 12 sons called Tuṣita gods—II.7.2; IV.1.3-7.

Dakṣināgni—One of the sacrificial fires. From this Bṛṛghu created the Rbhu gods in Dakṣa's sacrifice—IV.4.32.

Dāmanọsa—Son of king Cedi and Śrutaśāravā (Vasudeva's sister)—father of Siṣṭupāla—VII.1.17; IX.24.39-40.

Dantavakra—Son of Vṛddhaśarmā (king of Kuruśa) and Śrutadevā (Vasudeva's sister)—IX.24.37; killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.77.37; 78.1-10.

Dārśa—(i) Son of Dhātā (the 7th Aditya) and Sinivālī—VII.18.3.

Dāsaratha—(i) Son of Mūlaka, father of Aiḍaḥbiṣa—IX.9.41.

(ii) Son of Aja of the solar race, father of Rāma, Lalmaṇa, Bharata and Śatrughna—IX.10.1-3. His daughter Śantā married to Kaśyaśṛṅga—IX.23.7-10.

(iii) Son of Navaratha—IX.24.4.

Datta or Dattātreya—Son of Atri and Anasūya—I.3.11, II.7.4; an incarnation of Viṣṇu—IV.1.15, 33; His disciple king Kārtavirya—IX.15.17.

Deluge—Four types—XII.ch.4.

Devas—(Gods)—Praise the Lord—III.19.30; IV.1.56-57; VI.9.21-45; XI.4.9-11; 6.7-19; Report Dhrūva's penance to Viṣṇu—IV.8.81; fight with Asuras—VIII.ch.10; defeated and desert Svarga—VIII.15.24-32.

Devaka—(i) Son of Yudhiṣṭhira and Pauravi—IX.22.30

(ii) Son of Āhuśva; brother of Ugrasena—maternal grand father of Kṛṣṇa—IX.24.21.

Devaki—Daughter of Devaka; Vasudeva's consort—IX.24.23; Her marriage—X.1.29; Kṛṣṇa tries to kill her—X.1.35; imprisoned with Vasudeva—X.1.66; her six sons killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.2.4; The Lord enters her womb—X.2.18; God Brahmā praises the Lord in her womb—X.2.26-40; Devaki's eulogy of the Lord—X.3.24-31; 85.29-31; Released by Kṛṣṇa from prison—X.44.50; meets Yaśodā at Syamantapañcaka—X.82.36; Meets her dead sons through Kṛṣṇa's grace—X.85.33; Death—X.31.19.

Devamādhī—(i) Son of Kṛṣṇa (ti) ratha; father of Viṣṇu—IX.13.16

(ii) Another name of Viduratha, father of Śūra—IX.24.27.

Devala—A sage, son of Kṛṣṇā and Dhiṣanā—VI.6.20; 1.7.45; cursed the Gandharva Hūhu—VIII.4.3.

Devāpi—Son of king Pratipā—Śan-tanu's brother—Renounced the world—IX.22.12-17; stays at Kalāpagrāma to re-establish the religion—XII.2.37-38.

Devarāta—(i) Son of Suketu, father of Bhadrathā—XI.13.14-15

(ii) Another name of Śunahṣiṣṭa—IX.16.30-32

(iii) Son of Vidarbha king Karambhā, father of Deva-kṣetra—IX.24.5.
Deva-sāvarṇī — The 13th Manu—VIII.13.30-32.

Devayānī—Daughter of Śukra and Urjasvati—V.1.24-34 cursed by Kaca—IX.18.22; thrown into a well by Sarmiṣṭhā—saved by Vayati—married him—IX.18.6-33.

Devotee—See Bhakta and Ekaṁtin

Devotion—See Bhakti

Dhanvantari—(i) Viṣṇu’s incarnation—born while churning the ocean for amṛta—I.3.17; VIII.8.31-36; II.7.21
(ii) Author of Ayurveda—son of Dirghatamas—IX.17.4-5.

(ii) A Prajāpati born from Brahmā’s breast—III.12.25; married 13 daughters of Dakṣa and his progeny—IV.1.49-59; VI.6.4-10; married to Suntā—bogat Satyaśena, the Lord’s ray—VIII.1.25.
(iii) Son of Gāndhāra; father of Dṝta—IX.23.15
(iv) Son of Haihayā, father of Netra—IX.23.22
(v) Son of King Pratiśrava and father of Uśanas—IX.23.34
(vi) dharmā-sāstra—VI.1.40, 10. 45.34.

Dhātā—(i) God Brahmā—I.1.22
(ii) Son of Bhṛgu and Khyāti, married to Ayati, son of Mrkṣanda—IV.1.43-44.
(iii) One of the 12 sun-gods; parents—Kāśyapa and Aditi—VI.6.39; had 4 wives and his children—VI.6.39, VI.18.3.
(iv) The sun in the month of Caitra—XII.11.33.

Dhenuka—Name of an asura in the donkey form—killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.15.20-36.

Dhṛtarāṣṭra—Son of Vicitravirya and Ambikā (through Vyāsa)—IX.22.24-25; Queen Gāndhāri; Princes Duryodhana and others; Renounces the world and dies in the forest—I.13.18-59.

Dhrṣṭa-ketu—(i) Son of Sudhṛti, father of Haryāśva—IX.13.15
(ii) Son of Satyaketu, father of Sukumāra—IX.17.9
(iii) Son of Dhrṣṭadyumna—IX.22.3
(iv) King of Kaśyapa, married Vasudeva’s sister Śrutakirti—IX.24.38.

Dhrṣṭa-dyumna—Drupa’s son, father of Dhrṣṭaketu—IX.22.3.

Dhrūva—(i) Son of Uttānaapāda and Suniti—IV.8.8 His biography—IV. chs. 8-12.
(iii) One of the Vasus; married to Dhāraṇī—VI.6.10-12.
(iv) Son of Vasudeva and Rohini—IX.24.46.

(v) Son of king Rantibhāra—IX.20.6.

Dhyāna (Meditation)—II.1.19; 2.8-13; III.8.23-31; 15.38-42; III.21.9-11; 28.13-33; IV.7.20-21; 8.44-51; VI.4.33-40; VIII.6.3-7; X.3.9-10; 35.2-25; 39.44-55; 51.1-3; 25-7; XI.14.36-41; XI.27.39-49; XII.9.22-35.

Dilipa—(i) Son of Amūmān; father of Bhagiratha—IX.9.2
(ii) Son of Rṣya; father of Pratīpa—IX.22.11.

Dirghatamas—Son of Rāṣṭra; father of Dhanvantari—IX.17.4; Fathered Anīga, Vaṅga, Kaliṅga etc. from Bali’s spouse—IX.23.5.

Diti—Daughter of Dakṣa, married to Kaśyapa—VI.6.25; courted husband at the wrong time and gave birth to Hiranyaḥka and Hiranyakasipu—III. chs. 14 & 15; III.17.2-20; For begetting a killer of Indra observes Purnaśava vow—VI.18.23-55; Indra cuts the child in the womb in 49 parts and they are born as Marut gods—VI.18.61-72.

Divodāsa—(i) Son of Bhimaratha; father of Dyumān—IX.17.6
(ii) Son of Mudgala of Purū race; father of Satyadrīti and Ahalya—IX.21.34; 22.1.

Draupadī—Drupa’s daughter—IX.22.2-3; Her sons—IX.23.28-30; grieves for her killed sons; Arjuna consoles—I.7.15; requests Arjuna to release Aśvatthāman—I.7.42-48; see Kṛṣṇa’s queens—X.83.6; Goes to heaven—I.15.50.
Drona—(i) Name of a mountain—V.19.16.
(ii) One of Vasus; married Abhimati—children Harsha, Soka—VI.6.11; Reborn as Nanda and Yasodâ—X.8.48.
Drupada—Son of Piṣata; father of Dhṛṣṭadyumna and Draupadi—IX.22.2-3.
Durgâ—Yoga-māyâ; ordered by the Lord to incarnate—X.2.6-12.
Durmada—(i) Son of Bhadrasena, father of Krtaivrya, Kṛtvarmâ—IX.23.23
(ii) Son of Vasudeva and Rohini—IX.24.46.
(iii) Son of Vasudeva and Pauravi—IX.24.27.
Durvasas—Son of Atri and Anasuyâ—a ray of god Siva—IV.1.15-33; Indra defeated by his curse—VIII.5.16; His encounter with Ambara and discomfiture—IX.4.35-50.
Duryodhana—Eldest son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra—IX.22.26; studied under Balarâma—X.57.26; His daughter Laksâmanâ abducted by Samba—X.68; confused in Maya sabhâ—X.75-37; Thigh broken by Bhitam—I.7.13.
Dusyanta—Son of Raibhya of Purucose; married Śakuntalâ; father of Bharata—IX.20.7-26; Adopted as son by Marutta but again returned to his Paurava family—IX.23.18-19.
Dvârakâ—Old name Kuśasthali—Krṣṇa’s capital built by Viśvakarmâ—X.50; X.52.5; overflooded by the sea after Krṣṇa’s death—XI.30.47.
Dvîpas—continents seven in No. V.1.31-32; Their rulers—V.1.33.
Dyumân—(i) Son of Vasiṣṭha and Arundhati—IV.1.41.
(ii) Son of Śvārociṣa Manu—VIII.1.19
(iii) Son of Divodâsa, also called Pratardana; father of Alarka—IX.17.6
(iv) Śalva’s minister—fights with Pradyumna—X.76.26; is killed—X.77.3.

(E)

Ekacakra—A demon, born of Kaśyapa and Danu—VI.6.31.
Ekādaśa Rudras—Son of Bhûta & Sarûpâ—VI.6.16-18; but Rudra—born of Brahmâ’s angry eye—III.12.7-15.
Ekântin—The best of devotees—III.15.48-49; VI.9.48; VII.10.11-12; VIII.3.20; IX.2.11-13; X.23.26-27; XII.10.20.

(G)

Gada—(i) Son of Vasudeva and Rohini—I.14.28; III.1.35; IX.24.46.
(ii) Son of Vasudeva and Devaraksitâ—IX.24.52.
Gajendra—King elephant—VIII.1.30; King Indradyumna cursed by Agastyâ—VIII.4.6-13; The story—VIII.2 Caught by an alligator—VIII.2.27-33; prayâs Viṣṇu—VIII.3; released by Viṣṇu—VIII.3.33; references to release—II.7.15; III.19.35; XI.4.18.
Gandhamadana—(i) A Mount to the north of India—V.16.10
(ii) Name of monkey—IX.10.19.
Gandharvas—A tribe of demigods—their creation—III.10.27; 20-38.
Gâṅgâ—The river: Queen of Santanu; son Bhiṣma—X.22.19; her previous birth—V.17; Descent on the earth—V.17; Jahnu drinks up Gâṅgâ IX.15.3; Glory of Gâṅgâ—I.8.2; 19.5-6; III.5.40; IV.21.31; VIII.18-28; 21.4; IX.9.3-5, 14; X.41.15; 70.44; Parîkṣit’s last fast on I.3.43; 4.10.
Gâṅgâ-dvârâ—A holy place of Vidura and Maitreyâ’s meeting—III.5.1.
Gâṅgâ-sâgara—A holy place (Gâṅgâ falling in the sea) visited by Balarâma—X.79.11.
Garga—Family priest of Yadus, son of Manyu, father of Śini—IX.21.1, 19; performed sacred rites of Krṣṇa—X.8.1 ff.
Garuda—Son of Kaśyapa and Vinatâ—VI.6.22; defeats Kâliya serpent—X.17.1 ff; cursed by Saubhari—X.17.9 ff, carried Krṣṇa to Prâgyoṭiṣa—X.59; His wings sang Vedic hymns—III.21.34; carried Viṣṇu to Gajendra—VIII.3.32.
Gaya—(i) Son of Ulmuka of Uttānapāda race—IV.13.17
(ii) alias Sāṇga; son of Havirdhana—IV.24.8
(iii) Son of Nakta and Druti; married to Gayanti—V.15.6; sons Citraratha etc.—V.15.14
(iv) Son of Sudyumma—IX.1.41.

Gayā—A holy place—X.79.11.

Ghatotkaca—Son of Bhima and Hīdumā—IX.22.30-31.

Ghṛtācā—A celestial nymph, accompanies the Sun in the month of Māgha—XII.11.39; Consort of Raudraśva—IX.20.3-5.

Glory of Bhāgavata—See Bhāgavata.

Glories of Hari's stories (Harikathā)—I.1.16-19; 2.15-18; 5.26-28; 6.34-36; 16.6-9; 18.14-15; 19.15-16; II.8.4-6; III.5.1-13; 6.35-36; 14.4-5; III.19.32-33; IV.7.35, 44; 20.24-26; 29.40-41; IV.30.19-20; V.18.11-14; VI.3.26-32; IX.24.61; X.1–3.3; 7.1-2; 14.3; 5; 47.18; 70; 39; 86.34; 90.49-50; XI.1.36-37; XII.6.44, 48-49; 26.28-29; XII.3, 14-15; 51-52; XI.4.39-40; 12.48-51.

Go-dāna—Gift of cows by Ambarīṣa—IX.4.33; Nṛga punished for a faulty gift—X.64.10-14.

Gods—See Devas.

Gopīs—Cowherdesses of Gokula, their description—X.5.9-12; 11.33; 46.45-47; Kṛṣṇa takes away their clothes—X.22; Gopīs pray the Lord—X.29.31-41; appreciate Kṛṣṇa's flute-playing—X.21; Excitement at Akṛūra's taking away Kṛṣṇa—X.39; conversation with Uddhava—X.47; Kṛṣṇas teaching and consolation—X.82.40 ff.

Gopīs—Their dual songs—X.35; Gopī-gītām in rāsā-krīḍā (Gopīs' song)—X.31; Gopīs console by Kṛṣṇa in rāsa-dance—X.32; Gopīs and Kṛṣṇa dance (rāsa-krīḍā)—X.33.

Govardhana—A hill held up by Kṛṣṇa—II.7.32; III.2.33; X.25.19-28.

Grīṣamāda—Son of king Sohatra but became a Brāhmaṇa—I.9.7; IX.17.3.

(H)

Haihaya—Son of Śatajit; father of Dharma—IX.23.21.

Harīsa—(i) A mounted in the Meru range—V.20.4
(ii) An incarnation of Viṣṇu—X.2.40
(iii) A mind-born son of Brahmā—IV.8.1
(iv) A category in Sannyāsin—I.5.10; III.12.42.
(v) Form assumed by Viṣṇu to impart knowledge—XI.13.19 ff.

Harīsa-guhyā (secret precept of Harīsa)—VI.4.22-34.

Hell—See Naraka.

Householder's life of Kṛṣṇa—X.69.8

Hanumān—stays in Kimpuruṣa Khanda; praying Rāma—V.19.1-8; II.7.45; IX.10.19.

Hari—(i) Viṣṇu's avatāra to rescue Gajendra—II.7.15-16; His parents—VIII.1.30 ff.
(ii) Son of Ṛṣabha and Jayanti—V.4.11; XI.2.21; imparts spiritual knowledge to Nimi—XI.2.45-55.

Hari-Hara—Their one-ness—IV.7.50-54.

Harśicandra—Son of Triśāṅku, father of Rohita—IX.7.7-9; His offer of Śunahśeṣa to Varuṇa vice Rohita—IX.7.9-21.

Hari-varṣa—(i) Name of a sub-continent in Jambūdvipa—Ruler Harivarśa, son of Āgnidhra—V.18.7-14.

(ii) Son of Āgnidhra; married Meru's daughter, Ugradāṃstṛī—V.2.19-23.

Haraṣāva—(i) Son of Dṛḍhāsava; father of Nikumbha—IX.6.24;
(ii) Son of Anarāya; father of Aruṇa—IX.7.4
(iii) Son of Dīṛṣṭaketa; father of Maru—IX.13.15.

Haraṣāvīs—Sons of Dakya and Asikn. Nārada advises them renunciation—VI.5.3-21.

Hastināpura—City founded by king Hastin of Puru race—IX.21.20; washed away by the Gaṅgā—IX.22.40; dragged by Balarīma towards the Gaṅgā—X.68.41, 54.

Havir-bhuk—Daughter of Kardama and Devahūti, wife of Pulastya—III.24.22; her sons Agastyā and Viśravas—IV.1.36.

Havirdhāna—Son of Antardhāna and Nabhavati—IV.24.5; married Havirdhāni alias Dhiṣṭan and has six sons—IV.24.8.

Havirdhāni—A wish-yielding cow churned out of the sea—VIII.8.1.
(ii) Queen of Havirdhana — IV. 24.8.

Hayagriva—(i) An incarnation of Viṣṇu—II.7.11; His Mantra —V.18.2; H. praised— 18. 5.6; VII.9.37.
(ii) Name of an Asura—IV.6.30.

Himālaya alias Himavān—Marks the Northern border of India—V.16.9; (The presiding god of the mountain) married Menā IV.7.58; story of his daughter's birth, etc. —IV.7.62-65.

Hiranya—(i) Virāt Puruṣa—III.6.6
(ii) Ruler of the above Varṣa after Āgnidhra married Meru's daughter Śyāmā — V.2.19-23.
(iii) The 6th Varṣa or subcontinent in Jambūdvipa—V.16.8.

Hiranyakāśipu—Son of Kaśyapa and Diti—married Kayādhu—III.2.20; Story of his previous birth—His sons Prahlāda and others—III.15. 2.35; VII.1.37-42; Penance and praise of Brahman—VII.3.1-38; conquest of Svarṣa—VII.4.7-20; Tortures his son Prahlāda—VII. 5.33-44. Killed by Nṛṣimha—VII. 8.28-30.

(ii) Son of Śyāmaka and Śūrabhūmi of Yadu race—IX. 24.42.

Hiranya-nābha—Son of king Vidyṛti—because a Brāhmaṇa Vedic scholar, disciple Jaimini—Teacher of Yājñavalkya and his son Puṣya—IX.12.3-5; taught Śamaveda to Kṛṣṇa—IX.21.28; Regarded as a true knower—VI.15.5.

Hri—Daughter of Dakṣa, wife of Dharma Prajāpati, son Praśrava—XI.1.52.

House-holder's life—III.12.42; V.14. 32-35; VII.12.11; 14.1.26; 15. 1-11; X.70.4-19 (Kṛṣṇa as a householder); XI.17.38-54; This life censured—V.14.32.

Hūḥu—A Gandharva—son of Aṛiṣṭa; turned by Devala's curse into an alligator—VIII.4.3.

Iḍābidā or Obilā—Daughter of Triṇabindu and Alainbuṣā, wife of Vaiśravas—a Mother of Kubera.

Iṣvāku—Son of Vaiśravasva Manu and Śraddhā—VIII.13.2; IX.1. 11 ff. His sons enumerated—IX.6.4.

Ilā—(i) Dakṣa's daughter; wife of Kaśyapa—VI.6.25
(ii) Ilā alias Sudyumna, son-cum-daughter of Iṣvāku—IX.1. 16; mother of Purūravas— IX.14.15.

(iii) Queen of Vasudeva—IX.24. 45-49.

(iv) Daughter of Vāyu; Dhruva's queen—IV.10.2.

Ilāvarta—Son of Rābhā; ruled Ilāvṛta—V.4.10.

Ilāvṛta—(i) Son of Āgnidhra; ruler of Ilāvṛta
(ii) Name of a sub-continent in Jambūdvipa—V.16.7; 17. 15-24; a male entrant in this is transformed into female— V.17.15.

Ilvala—A demon—brother of Vātāpi—VI.18.15.

Indra—King of gods in each Manvantara. They are 14 as follows: Yajña, Rocana, Satyajit, Triśikha, Vibhu, Matra (dra) dyumna, Purandara, Mahābali, Adhutha, Śambhu, Vaidhkṛta, Rādhāman, Divaspati, Suci. At present Purandara rules the heaven. His wife Śaci and son Jayanta—I.14. 37. Cut Diti's foetus in 49 parts who became marudganas—VI.12.32; sends damsels to sages—XI.4.7; paid homage to Kṛṣṇa—X.25.1; An aṁśa or ray of God—XI.16.13.

Indra-dyumna—King of Pāṇḍyas—VIII.14.6-13; became king elephant: vide Gajendra.

Indra-sāvārṇi—14th Manu—VIII. 13.33.35.

Indra-sena—(i) A mountain in Plakṣadvipa—V.20.4
(ii) Son of Kurca and father of Vitihotra—IX.2.19.
Indrāṇi—Indra's queen—Śaci, Reduced King Nahuṣa to a serpent—I.14.37; VI.13.16.
Indriyas (Sense-organs)—II.1.29; senses of Vīrata and the presiding deities—II.6.1-14; 10.17-32; III.6.12-25; Presiding deities of our senses—II.5.30-31.
Irāvān—Son of Arjuna and Ulupi—IX.22.32.
Īśā-vāsya upanisad—An exposition of the—VIII.1.9-16. (F)

Jaḍa Bharata vide Bharata.
Jagati—a Vedic metre—created out of Brahmac's bones—III.12.45.
Jahnu—(i) Son of king Kuru; father of Suratha—IX.22.4  (ii) Son of Hotraka; drank up the Gangā—IX.15.3
Jaimini—Disciple of Vyāsa—Knower of the Śāma Veda—I.4.21; XII.6.53; His son Sumanta and pupil Sukarma—XII.6.75, 76; another pupil—Hiranyanābha—IX.12.3-4.
Jamadagni—Son of Rekha and Satya-vati; married Renukā, sons Parasurāma and others—IX.15.11-13; killed by Kārtāviryā's sons—IX.16.9-15.
Jāmbavati—Daughter of Jāmbavān, married Krṣṇa—X.56.32; 83.10; Her sons—X.61.11-12.
Jambū-dvīpa—India—at the centre of the earth—V.16-19; surrounded by salt seas, ruled by Āgni-ta—V.1.33; consists of nine varas—V.16.6 and eight subcontinents—V.19.30-31.
Janaka alias Vaideha, Mithila—Son of Nimi; father of Udāvus—IX.13.13.
Janamejaya—(i) Son of Parikṣit; father of Satānika—IX.22.35-37; His serpent sacrifice—XII.6.16-28.  (ii) Son of Srījaya—IX.23.2
Janmejaya—Son of Puru, father of Prācinvān—IX.20.2.
Jarāsandha—Son of Bṛhadra; had 5 sons—IX.22.8-9; His first encounter with Balarāma and Krṣṇa—X.ch.50 (VJ. cl. 51, 53), sets fire to Pravṛṣaṇa mountain in order to burn Krṣṇa and Balarāma—X.52.10; killed by Bhīma—X.72; III.3.10.
Jayadratha—(i) Son of Brhatkāya—IX.21.22  (ii) Son of Brhan-manas of Roma-pāda dynasty—IX.23.11 ff.
Jayanta—(i) Son of Indra and Śaci—VI.18.7  (ii) Son of Dharma Prajāpati and Marutvati—a ray of Vāsudeva; also named Upendra—VI.6.8  (iii) Krṣṇa's brother—1.14.28  (iv) Attendant of Viṣṇu—VIII.21.16.
Jvara (fever śaiva)—X.63.23 Vaiṣṇava
Jyāmagha—Son of Rucaka; marries
Šaibyā, son Vidarbha—IX.23.35-39.

(K)

Kalāp-grāma—A village near Badrinath where Maru and Devāpi, last kings of solar and lunar races stay to establish Dharma after Kali Age—IX.12.6; XII.2.37.

Kali—President of the Kali age, controlled by Parīkṣit I.16.4; 17.28; Beginning of the Kali age—I.15.36, 18.6 XII.2.29, Blemishes of K. XII.2.1-16; Tugdharman of K. characteristics—XII.3.24; 30; Means to counteract K. XII.3.44-51; A great virtue of K. XII.3.51 ff.

Kālindī—(i) Śri Kṛṣṇa's queen—X.58.17-29; X.83.11; Her sons—X.61.14.
(ii) Name of the Yamunā—III.4.36.

Kāliya—The serpent—Punished by Kṛṣṇa—II.7.28; III.2.31; X ch. 16.

Kalki—An avatāra of Viṣṇu—I.3.25; XII.2.16.

Kāmādhenu—The Wish-yielding cow see Havirddhāni.

Kapila—(i) Founder of Sāṅkhya system, son of Kardama and Devahūti—II.7.3; III.23.6ff, III.chs 24 & 26, imparts spiritual knowledge to Devahūti—III. chs. 25-33, burns down sons of Sagara—IX.8.10.
(ii) Name of a mountain in Kuśadvipa—V.20.15.

Karabhājana—Son of Rsabha and Jayanti—V.4.11. Teaching to King Nimi—XI.5.20 ff.

Karma—K.-Yoga—XI. ch. 20; path of K. decreed—IV.25.3; V.5.5, VI.9.49; 16.60; VII.7.28; X.23.38-52; XI.5.6; 20.9, 26-28.

Kaṛṇa—Son of Kunti and the Sun-god brought up by Adhiratha—IX.23.13.

Kāṣṭhā—(i) A measure of Time—III.11.7.

(ii) Another epic sage—XII.7.5.

Kāṭyāyani-Vrata—Vow to get a desired husband—X. ch. 22.

Kaustubha—A precious stone, churned out of the sea, worn by Viṣṇu—VIII.8.5.

Kavi—(i) Son of Rṣabha and Jayanti—V.4.11; teaching to Nimi XI.2.33-43.
(ii) Alias Kāväya—Śukrācārya—Preceptor of Asura's daughter Devayāni, sons Śanda and Amaraka—VIII.5.1; IX.18.5-25.
(iii) Son of Bhṛgu and Khyāti; father of Uśānas—IV.1.45.
(iv) Son of Vaivāsvat Manu—IX.1.12; His panance—IX.2.15.
(vi) Son of Priyavrata—V.1.25.
Kayādhu—Hiranyakāśipu’s queen—VI.18.12; stays in Nārada’s hermitage in pregnancy—VII.7.12 ff.
Kesi—(i) Son of Vasudeva and Kausalya alias Bhadrā—IX.24.48
(ii) A demon in a horse-form; killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.37.1-7.
Khāṇḍava—A forest burnt by Arjuna—I.15.8; X 58.25; 71.45.
Kimpuruṣa—(i) Son of Āgnidhra; married Meru’s daughter Pratrīpā—V.2.19-23.
(iii) A tribe of demigods—III.20.45.
Kirtimān—Son of Vasudeva and Devaki—I.1.54-57
Kratu—(i) A Brāhmaṇa sage born from Brahmap’s hand—III.12.23; married Kriyā, daughter of Kardama; sons Vālakhilyas—IV.1.39.
(ii) Son of Ulmuka—IV.13.17.
(iii) Son of Kṛṣṇa and Jámbavati—X.61.12
Kriyā—(i) Kardama’s daughter, Kratu’s wife—III.24.23.; her sons—Vālakhilyas—IV.1.39.
(ii) Dakṣa’s daughter; wife of Dharma, their son Yoga—IV.1.51.
(iii) Wife of a sun-god called Vindhāṅ—VI.18.4.
Krodha—(i) Born from Brahmap’s eyebrows—III.12.26. Son of Lobha (Avarice)—son’s Durukti (words of abuse) and Kali (Quarrel)—IV.8.3.
Kṛṣṇa—Son of Śāradvān—Brother of Drona’s wife Kṛpl, IX.21.
Teacher of Parikṣit—I.16.3. 35-36
One of the seven sages in the 8th Manvantara—VIII.13.15.
Kṛṣṇa—(i) A prajāpati; married two daughters of Dakṣa—VI.6.20.
(ii) Son of Barhanāśva; father of Senajit—IX.6.25.
(iii) Son of Sahadeva of the Solar race, father of Somadatta—IX.2.34.
Kṛṣṇa—The incarnation of Viṣṇu—story of His descent—I.3.23; II.7.26; III. chs 2-3; X.8.1-8. carried to Gokula—X.3.51; Kills Pūtanā—6.2-17; Yasodā shown the universe in His mouth—X.7.34-37; 8.35-42; Kṛṣṇa’s mischiefs—X.8.29-39; uproots the pair of Arjuna trees—X.10; kills Vatsāsura and Bakāsura—X.11; kills Aghāsura—X.12; Assumed the forms of cows and cowherds—X.13. Kāliya serpent disciplined—X.16; swallows up a forest fire—X.19.12-14; sports with Gopa women—X.21; Takes away garments of Gopis—X.22; Grace on the wives of Brāhmaṇa sacrificers—X.23; Discontinuation of Indra sacrifice and lifting up of mount Govardhana—X.chs. 24, 25; Rescues Nanda from Varuṇa—X.28; Rāsa dance—X. chs. 29-33; Rescues Nanda from a boa-constrictor and kills Śaṅkhacūḍa—X.34; kills Aṛiṣṭāsura; Akrūra’s arrival at Vraj—X.36; kills the demons Vyoma and Keśi—X.37; Trivakra’s (Kubjā’s) deformity removed—Breaking of Karsha’s bow—X.42; kills Kuvalayāpiṇḍa—X.43; kills Karisha and Devaki and Vasudeva released—X.44; study at Sāndipani’s aşrama; his dead son restored to Sāndipani—X.45; Repulses Jarasandha’s invasions—X.50.3-42; Dvārakā founded—X.50; Kālayavana killed through Mucakunda—X.51; Rukmini’s epistle—X.52; Rukmini carried away—X.53; birth of Pradyumna—X.55; Kṛṣṇa marries Satyabhāma and Jámbavati—X.56 and other six princesses—X.58; kills Narakaṣura—X.59; Bringing down of Pārijata—X.59.39-40; love-quarrel with Rukmini—X.60; Kṛṣṇa’s progeny—X.61; Bāṇaṣura vanquished—X.63; king Nrga emancipated X.64; Pauṇḍraka and Sudakṣiṇa killed X.66; Kṛṣṇa’s home life X.chs 69 and 70; gets Jarasandha killed by Bhima—X.72.45; kills Siūpāla—X.74; protects Parikṣit—
I.12.9-10; Kills Śālva—X. chs 76, 77, kills Dantavakra and Vīdura-ratha—X.78; Brāhmaṇa Kucela Śridaman blessed with affluence —X. chs. 80-81; meeting Gopas and Gopis at Syamantapañcakā —X.82.13 ff.; shows her dead children to Devaki—X.85; Sāmba gives birth to a pestle and advice to Yādavas to go to Prabhās —XI.6.35-38 spiritual guidance to Uddhava—XI. chs. 6 to 29; Internecefe feud amont Yādavas —XI.30.10-24 ; Kṛṣṇa’s ascension to Vaikuṇṭha—I.15.34-36; III. 211; 4.3-23; XI.30.28; 31.5; (ii) Son of Havirdhāna—IV.24.8 (iii) a Sātavāhana (Andhra) king —XII.1.22-23.

Kṛta—(i) The golden Age—XII. 2. 24; 3.18.27 (ii) Son of Vasudeva and Rohiṇi—IX.24.46 (iii) Son of Jaya in Kuru race; father of Haryavan—IX.17.17.

Kṛtamaḷā—A river in the South—VIII.24.12. King Satyavrata found the Divine Fish herein—V. 19.18; Balarāma’s pilgrimage to X.79.16.

Kṛta-vāmna—Son of Hrdika of the Sāttvata clan—IX.24.27.

Kṛtavirya—Son of Dhanaka and father of Sañcārījuna—IX.23.23.

Kṣatriya—VII.11.14-22; XI.17.17.

Kubera—God of wealth—son of Vîravas and Idapiḍa IV.1.36-37; IX.2.33; Gives boons to Dhrūva— IV.12.2-9.

Kucela alias Sudīman—Kṛṣṇa’s poor Brāhmaṇa friend—the story of X. Chs. 80 and 81.

Kumbhāṅga—Bāna’s minister; father of Citralekh—X.62.14; 63.8.

Kuṇḍina—Capital of Vidarbha of king Bhīṣmaka, place of Rukmiṇi’s Svayanîvara—X.53.21 ff.

Kunti—Daughter of Śūra, Vasudeva’s sister; Pāṇḍu’s queen—IX.22.27; also called Prthā—IX.24.30; praises Kṛṣṇa 1.8.18-43; Dialogue with Akrūra—X.49.7-13; . . . conversation with Vasudeva—X.82.19ff.

Kūrma—Tortoise incarnation of Viṣṇu—I.3.16; II.7.13. His mantra as the deity in Hiraṇmayā conti- nent V.18. 29-30; the same as Ajita—VII.5.9; supported mount Mandara when the sea was churned VII. chs. 6 & 7.

Kuru —(i) Son of Āgnidhra; marries Meru’s daughter Nāri—V.2.19-23. (ii) Son of Sanivarana and Tampati—IX.22.4.

Kuru-jāṅgala—Name of a country—1.4.6; 10.34; 16.11, III.1.24.

Kuru-kṣetra—A sacred place—1.10.34; IX.22.4.

Kuśa—(i) Son of Rāma and Sītā—IX.11.11; father of Atthi—IX.12.1 (ii) Son of Ajaka; father of Kuśambu—IX.15.4. (iii) Son of Subhatra—IX.17.3, 16 (iv) Son of Vidarbha and Śaibyā—IX.24.1.

Kuśāvarta—(i) Son of Rṣabha—V.4.10. (ii) A sacred place called Gaṅgādvāra. The place of the dialogue between Vidura and Maitreyā III.20.4 ff.

Kuvalayāpida—Kārmaka’s elephant—killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.43.2-15.

Kuvalayāśva—(i) alias Dhundhumā, son of Brhadāśva—IX. 6.22. (ii) 24. alias Pratardana, Satrujit, Dyumān, Ratahāvaya—son of Divodās—IX.17.5-6.

(L)

Lakṣmana—Son of Daśaratha; father of Angada and Citraketu—IX.11.12.

Lakṣmānā—(i) Kṛṣṇa’s queen—X.58.57; story of her marriage—X.83.17-39; Her sons—X 61.15. (ii) Duryodhana’s daughter carried away by Śāmba—X. ch. 68.

Lakṣmī—Also Śrī Ś. Daughter of Bhṛgu and Khyātī—IV.1.43; cursed Jaya and Vījaya—III.16.30; L.Born while churning the sea—VIII.88; Her coronation—VIII.8.10-17 marries Viṣṇu 8.24; serves the Lord III.15.21-22, Praises the Lord—V.18.18-23.

Laya—see Deluge also XI.24.20-26.

Lokālōka—Mountain dividing regions of light and darkness—V.20.36.
(M)

Madhu—(i) Son of Bindumān; father of Viravṛata—V.15.15
(iii) Son of Kārtavīryārjuna; father of Vṛṣṇi—IX.23. 27-29.
(iv) Son of Devakṣatra—IX.24.5
(v) The month of Caitra—XII. 11.33.

Madhuvana—A forest on the bank of the Yamunā, place of Dhrutā's penance—IV.8.62; Lord Viṣṇu visits it—IV.9.1; previous residence of Lavanašura.

Mādri—(i) Pāṇḍu's queen—mother of Nakula and Sahadeva—IX.22.28.
(ii) alias Laksmanā Kṛṣṇa's queen—X.61.15.

Mahābhārata—by Vyāsa—I.4.25.
Its importance—I.5.3.

Mahātala—the 5th subterranean region—V.24.7, 29; Its creation—II.1.26; II.5.41.

Maitreya—A sage; his dialogue with Vidura—I.13. 1-2 and from III.5 to the end of the Skandaḥ.

Malaya—(i) Name of a mountain—V.19.16; X.79.16.
(ii) Son of Rṣabha—V.4.10.

Mandara—Name of a mount used for churning out Amṛta I.3.16; V.16.11; VIII.6.33.

Māndhātā—alias Trasad-dasyu, son of Yuvanāśva—IX.6.25-33; His family—IX.6.38-45; II.7.44.

Mantra—sacred formula (for repeating). Pertaining to: (1) Vāsudeva—IV.8.54; (2) Nārāyaṇa—VI.6.6; (3) Viṣṇu—6.10; (4) Hayagriva—V.18.2; (5) Nṛśimha—18.8; (6) Hṛṣikeśa—18.18; (7) Matsyamūrti—18.25; (8) Kūrmamūrti—18-30; (9) Varāha—18.35; (10) Rāma—V.19.9; (11) Nara-Nārāyaṇa—19.11 (12) Rudra—V.17.17.

Manu—(i) Son of Kṛśṇa and Dhiṣanā—VI.20.
Manvantaras—Epoch presided by Manu—III.11.24; VIII.1.17-30; 5.2-10; ch. 13; 14.1-11.

(ii) Son of Samrāj of Bharata race; marries Bindumati; Son Bindumān—V.15.15.

Mārkandeya—Son of Mṛkṣanda—IV. 1.45; His penance etc.—XII. chs 8 to 10; was shown Pralaya—XII. 98.34; Rudra's boon to M—XII. 10.

Marutta—Son of Āvikṣit-Samvarta performed his sacrifice—IX. 2.26.

Mātali—Charioteer of Indra—VIII. 11.22; brought Indra's chariot to Rāma—IX.10.21.

Mathurā alias Madhupuri, Madhurā
(i) A city founded by demon Madhu—conquered by Śatruṅga—I.11.14; the capital of the country Śurasena. Kṛṣṇa visited M—X.41.20-52; Vajra coronated as king here—I.15.39.
(ii) The capital of Pāṇḍya's—now called Madurai—X.79.15.

Matsyāvatāra—Fish incarnation of Viṣṇu—I.3.15; 15.35; II.7.12; brought up by king Satyavrata—VIII. ch. 24.

Māyāvari—Kāmadeva's wife; reared up Pradyumna and married him—X.55.8-13.

Meditation—See Dhyāna.

Menaka—A nymph accompanying the sun in the month of Jyeṣṭha—XII.11.35; Mother of Sakuntala—IX.20.13.

Meru—Name of a mountain—V.16.7-26; His daughter Ayati and Niyati—IV.1.44; His other 9 daughters married to Āgnīdhra's sons—V.2.19-23.

Mitra—(i) The Sun-god; A son of Kaśyapa and Aditi—VI.6.39; married to Revati—His sons agastya and Vasiṣṭha—VI. 18.5-6.
(ii) A son of Vasiṣṭha and Arundhati—IV.1.41.

Mitra-vindā—(i) Daughter of Jaya- sena and Rājādhī-devi; Kṛṣṇa's queen—X.58.30-31, 83.15-16; his sons—X.61.16.
(ii) A river in Kuśadvipa—V.20. 15.

(ii) Daughter of Kali, wife of Bhaya—IV.8.4.
(iii) God of death—Yama—I.16.8; accompanies beings from the birth—X.1.38, 48.

Mucakunda—Son of Mândhātā, brother of Purukṛṣṇa and Ambariṣa—I.X.6.38; Killed Kālayavana—X.51.14-23; Praises Krṣṇa—X.51.46-58; Repairs to Badarikāśrama for penance—X.52.4; II.7.44.

Mura—A five-headed demon—a friend of Naraṇa—killed by Krṣṇa—X.59.6-11; III.3.11.

Nābhāga—(i) Son of Vaivasvata Manu—VIII.13.2
(ii) Grandson of Manu—became Vaiśya—I.X.2.23
(iii) Son of Nabhağa, father of Ambariṣa—X.4.13.

Nābhi—Son of Āgnidhra and Pūrvacittī—I.3.13; II.7.10; V.2.3, 19; married Merudevi—V.3.1; The Lord praised in his sacrifice—V.3.4-15; Viṣṇu incarnates as his son Vṛṣabha—V.3.20; Penance and goes to heaven—V.4.5.

Nahuṣa—Son of Ayus—IX.17.1; his progeny—IX.18.1; Rules over Svarga—VI.13.16.

Nakṣatras: Constellations—Daughters of Daśa, married to Candra (the moon-god)—V.23.6-7; VI.6.23; the stellar region—V.22.

Nala-kūbara (and Manigriva)—Sons of Kubera—X.9.23; Nārada curses them to be trees—Krṣṇa rescues them—X.10.1-23; Praise Krṣṇa—X.10.29.36.

Nanda—(i) The cowherd—fosterfather of Krṣṇa—X.V.20; His wife Yaśodā gives birth to Yoga-māyā—X.3.47; celebration of Krṣṇa's birth and Vasudeva's visit—X. ch. 5; His previous birth—X.8.46-50; Praise of Krṣṇa—X.26; Rescue from Varuṇa by Krṣṇa—X.28; 11.7.31; Rescue from a boa-constrictor—X.34
(ii) Son of Vasudeva and Madirā—IX.24.48.
(iii) Name of Viṣṇu's attendant—VI.4.39; VIII.21.16.
(iv) A king of Magadha—born of a Śūdra woman—XII.1.89.
(v) A mountain in Kraukacavipa.

Nandiśvara—Rudra's bull, curses Dakṣa—IV.2.20; attacks Bhaga—IV.5.17.

Nara—The brother of Nārāyaṇa, son of Dharma and Mūrti—I.2.4; II.7.6; IV.1.52.

Nara-Nārāyaṇa—Sages—Incarnations of Viṣṇu—I.3.9; II.7.6; sons of Dharma and Mūrti—IV.1.52; Their eulogy by Mārkaṇḍeya—XII.8.40-49.

Nārada—The Divine sage; born from Brahmā's lap—III.12.23; Teaches the Bhāgavata to Vyāsa—I.8.82; His previous birth from a slave-girl—I.5.23-27; Initiates Dhrūva spiritually—IV.8.25-61; narrates the story of Puraṅjana to Prācinabarhis—IV. chs. 25-29; gives spiritual guidance to Dakṣa's sons and cursed by Dakṣa—VI.5.5-44; Reports Dhrūtārāṣṭra's death to Yudhiṣṭhira—I.13.37-59; explains the reason of Śiṣupāla's union with the Lord—VII.1.22 ff.; initiates Citraketu—VI.15.27; praises the Lord—V.19.10-15; 25.9-13; X.37.10-24; 70.37-39; reports to Kaṁśa reality about the birth of Krṣṇa and Balarāma X.36.16 ff.; sees the domestic life of Krṣṇa—X. ch. 69.

(ii) Name of a demon—born of the Earth goddess and the Divine Boar—killed by Krṣṇa—IX.10.29; III.3.6; X.59.21.

Nara-sinīha—Man-Lion incarnation of Viṣṇu—I.3.18; II.7.14; kills Hiraṇya-kaśipu—VII.8.18-36; eulogized by god Brahmā and others—VII.8.40-56; His Mantra—V.18.8; prayed by Prahlāda—VII.9.8-13; V.18.7-14.
Nārāyaṇa: The Deity—
(i) Lord Vāsudeva—I.2.26-30; Derivation of the word—II.10.10-11; for the rest see Bhagavān
(ii) Son of Dharma and Mūrti—an incarnation of Viṣṇu—I.3.9; II.7.6; gods obstruct his penance XI.4.6-16.
(iii) Son of Ajāmila—VI.1.24-29.
(iv) Son of Bhūmitra—XII.1.20.

Nārāyaṇa-mantra—VIII.6
Nārāyaṇa-kavaca—VI. ch. 8.

Nila—(i) A mountain; boundary between Ilāvṛta and Ramyaka regions—V.16.8
(ii) Name of a monkey—IX.10.19.
(iii) Son of Ajāmiḍha, father of Śānti—IX.21.30.
Nimi—(i) Son of Ikṣvāku—IX.6.4; N’s body destroyed by Vasīṣṭha’s curse—IX.13.1-4; hence called Vidēha—IX.13.11; his son Mithila—IX.13.12-13; was taught the Bhāgavata philosophy by sons of Ṛṣabha—IX.2.24ff.
(ii) Son of Daṇḍapāṇi, father of Kṛṣṇaka—IX.22.44.

Nṛti: The demonic spirit—born of Brahmadeva’s anus—III.12.26; adopted Adharma and Dambha as sons—V.8.2

Nṛṣa: Son of Vaiviṣṭava Manu—IX.1.12; father of Sumati—IX.2.17; Turned a frog and rehabilitated by Kṛṣṇa—X.64; praises Kṛṣṇa—X.64.26-29.

(O)

Oghavān: Son of Pratika, brother of Oghavati—IX.2.18

Oṣadhis: Medicinal herbs—III.6.18.

(P)

Paila—Vyāsa’s disciple—master of the Rgveda—I.4.21; XII.6.52; His pupils: Indrapramit and Bāṣkala—XII.6.54.

Pālaka: Son of Pradyota, a king of Magadha—XII.1.3
Pāṇcajana—(i) A conch-shaped demon killed by Kṛṣṇa—III.3.2; X.45.40-41.
(ii) A Prājāpati, father of Aśīkni—VI.4.51.

Paṇca mahābhūtās—Gross elements—1.2.25-30; for the rest see Bhagavān Paṇḍu—Son of Vṛṣṇi from Viśvāvyā’s queen—IX.22.29; married Kunti and had five sons from deities—IX.22.27-28.

Parāśara—(i) Vyāsa’s father—I.4.14; 19.9; II.7.45.
(ii) Pupil of Indrapramit—XII.6.54-55.

Pārijāta: A heavenly tree churned out of the Milky ocean—VIII.8.6; Kṛṣṇa takes it to Dvārakā—III.3.5 vide X Skandha Appendix 65th ch. in VJ.’s Text.

(ii) Son of Kuru and Tapati—IX.22.4-9.

Parāśurāma—Viṣṇu’s incarnation—Son of Jamadagni and Renukā—I.3.20; II.7.22; IX.15.12-13; kills Sahasrārjuna—IX.15.35; kills his mother and brothers as per Jamadagni’s order—IX.16.5; Future member of Saptarṣis, in the 8th Manvantara—VIII.13.15; Future Veda-Vyāsa—IX.16.25.

Paundraka: King of Karuṣa—X.66.1; killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.66.21-28.

Pingalā: A courtesan—her story—XI.8.22-44.

Pippalāyana: Son of Ṛṣabha and Jayanti—V.4.11; XI.2.21. teaches Bhāgavatism to Nimi—XIII.3.5-42.

Pippalāyani: Teacher of the Atharva Veda pupil of Vedadarśa—XII.7.2.

Pitṛs—Manes—have Svadhā, a common wife—IV.1.63-64; Their creation—III.20.43; VI.6.19.

Prabhāsa: A sacred place on the west coast near Dvārakā—III.3.25;
XI.6.35; Arjuna stayed as a Tri danjan at —X.66.2; Vidura’s visit —III.1.20; Vidura dies here I.15.49; Place of Yadava internecine fight—X.30.6.
Pracetasa—(Ten) Sons of Pra cinabarhis and Satadruti—IV.24.13; their austerities—IV.24.17-49; The Lord’s manifestation—IV.30.4 ff; praise the Lord 30.22-4; burn the tree world—IV.30.44 ff. VI.4.4ff —Marry Mārisa and birth of Dakṣa
—IV.30.47-51; VI.4.15-17.
Pradyota—Son of Sunaka; a king of Magadha—XII.1.3.
Pradyumna—(i) Son of Kṣiṇa and Rukminī—X.55.1-2; thrown by Śambara into the sea and reared by Māyāvati (Rañi) kills Śambara—X.55 & 56;
maries Rukmavati and their son Aniruddha—X.61.18;
fights back Śālva—X.76 and 77;
Killed at Prabhāsa XI.10.16
(ii) Son of Cākuśa—IV.13.16.
Pratay—(Deluge)—III.11.27-31;
VIII.24.32; four types of—XII.
4.3-22; Märkaṇḍeya’s vision of
—XII.9.
Prabhāda or Prabhāda—Son of Hiranyakasipu and Kayādiḥu
—VI.18.12-13; his greatness—VII.
4.30-42; III.14.44-49; His education—VII.5.1-32; his advice to fellow students—VII.6.1-28; Eulogizes the Lord—VII.9.8-50; tortured by his father—VII.5.33-45;
coronated—VII.10.33; Praises
Vāmana—VIII.23.6-8; A student of Datta also —I.3.11; worships
Nīsinha in Harivarśa—V.18.7. A great devotee—VI.3.27; Dialogue with sage Ājagarā—VII.13.11.
Priyavrata—Son of Śvāyambhuva
Manu and Satarūpā—VI.1.1;
teaching by Brahmā—V.1.11-19;
His family—V.1.24-25, 28; He circumambulated the earth seven times—III.12.55.
Ptṣni—(i) Devaki’s previous birth—son Prṣni-garha, Lord’s incarnation—X.3.32-41.
(ii) Wife of Savitr, sons Agnihotra
etc. VI.18.1.
Prthū—See Kunti
Prthu—Lord’s incarnation, son of Vena—I.3.14; II.7.9; IV.15.1; marrred to Arcis—IV.15.3-5; had five sons—IV.24.1-2; praises the Lord—IV.20.23-31; coronated IV.
15.7-21; levelled the earth—IV.
17; “milked” the earth—IV.18;
performs a horse-sacrifice—IV.19;
Sanatkumāra’s spiritual guidance
—IV.22.17-40; death—IV.23.
(ii) Son of Anenas, father of Viśvarandhi—IX.6.20;
(iii) Son of the Manu Tāmasa—
VIII.1.27
(iv) Son of Rucaka—IX.23.35;
(v) Son of Citraratha—IX.24.18.
Pulāha—A Brāhmaṇa sage born of Brahmā’s navel—III.12.24; mar-rried to Kordama’s daughter Gati
—IV.1.38.
Pulahāśrama—or Śālagrāma, a sacred place—X.79.10.
Pulastya—A Brāhmaṇa sage born from Brahmā’s ear—III.12.24; Father of Agasty and Viśravas—
IV.1.36.
Puṁsavana—A vow explained by Kasyapa to Diti—VI.18.47-54 and to Aditi—VIII.16.22-62; its details
—VI.19.
Puṇānas—List of the—XII.7.22-25;
characteristics of—XII.7.8-22;
II.10.1-2; No. of verses in—XII.
13.
Puṇājana—The Allegory of—IV.
chs. 25-29.
Purāṇjana—Queen of Purāṇjana—IV.
27.1
Pūru (i) Son of Cākuśa Manu—
VIII.5.7
(ii) Son of Yavāti and Śarmiṣṭhā
—IX.18.33; coronated—IX.
19.23; his genealogy—IX.20.
1-49
(iii) Son of Jalmu, father of Balāka
—IX.16.3
Puruṣit—(i) Son of Sanadvāja and father of Ariṣṭanemi—IX.13.
22-23.
(ii) Son of Rucaka—IX.23.35
(iii) Son of Anaka and Kankā—
IX.24.41
(iv) Son of Kraṇa and Jāmbavatī
—XI.61.11.
Puruṣvas—Son of Budha and Ilā—
IX.1.35; contract marriage with Urvāsi—IX.14.15-47; His ‘song’
—XI.26.
Puruṣa-sūktca—or Interpretation of—
I.3.4; II.ch. 6.
Puṣkara—(i) A continent ruled by
Vithotrama—V.1.32-33
(ii) Son of Sunakṣattra, father of Antarikṣa—IX.12.12
(iii) Son of Vrka—IX.24.43.
Bhāgavata Purāṇa

Pūtanā—alias Ulūpikā—II.7.27; Karṁa’s nurse killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.6.2-18.

(R)

Raghu—Son of Dirghabhāhu, father of Prthuṛavas—II.7.44; IX.10.1.
Rahūgaṇa—King of Sindhu Sauvira—spiritually enlightened by Jaḍa Bharata—V. chs. 10-13.
Raivata—(i) Another name of Kakudmin, Revati’s father—goes to consult god Brahmarshī for a son—in-law—IX.3.29-30.
(ii) Ruler of the 5th Manvantara—V.1.28; his sons Bali and Vindhyā—VIII.5.1-2.
(iii) One of the Rudras—VI.6.17.
Raivatāka—(mount Girnar) Balarāma visited for sports—V.19.16; X.67.

Rājādhīvī—Śira’s daughter, Vasudeva’s sister—IX.24.31; Queen of Jayaśena of Avanti—IX.24.39; her daughter Mitraṇvī, Kṛṣṇa’s queen—X.58.31.

Rāma—(i) Son of Daśaratha—IX.10.3; His story—IX.10.4-56; after coronation—IX.11; An incarnation of Viṣṇu—I.3.22; II.7.23-26; His mantra—V.19.3; Eulogy of—V.19.3-8.
(ii) Abbreviated name of Balarāma.
(iii) Parāśurāma—son of Jaimadagni and Renuka—IX.15.16.

Rambhā—A celestial nymph—accompanies the Sun-god in the month of Aṣāḍha—XII.11.36.

Rasāṭalā—6th nether-world, its creation—II.5.40; V.24.7, 30, I.12.6; Hiranyākṣa arrived at—III.18.
Rāśi—A sign of Zodiac—V.21.3-6.
Rati—(i) Wife of Madana—stayed at ‘Māyāvati’ in Śambara’s house—X.55, 6-7.
(ii) Wife of Vibhu—V.15.6.
Rantideva—Son of Sāṅkṛti of Pūru race—I.12.24, II.7.44; the story of—IX.21.2-17.
Rāvana—A demon, son of Viśravas—IV.1.37; originally an attendant of Viṣṇu—VIII.1.35-44; taken captive by Kārtavirya—IX.15.21-22.
Renuka—Wife of Jaimadagni—IX.15.15.12; killed by Parāśurāma, made alive again by Jaimadagni—IX.16.2-8.
Revati—(i) Wife of Balarāma—IX.3.36.
Righteousness—See Dharma (i).
Rohini—(i) Vasudeva’s queen, Balarāma’s mother—IX.24.26.
(ii) Name of Kṛṣṇa’s queen—X.61.18.
Romaharṣaṇa—Vyāsa’s disciple, master of Purāṇas—I.4.22; killed by Balarāma—X.78.22-28; his son Sauti or Romaharṣaṇa.
Ruci—A mind-born son of Brahmarshī—father of Yajñavalkya and Daksinā—I.3.12; II.7.2; IV.1.4.
Rudra—His birth and names—III.12.6-15; His form described—III.14.23-28; IV.5.10; 6.33-39; His consort, Satī—IV.1.65; Daksinā curse—IV.2.9-17; Rudra’s incarnation Virabhadrā—IV.5.2-6; consoles Satī—IV.3.16; Destroys Daksinā’s sacrifice—IV.5. Praise of Rudra—by Brahmarshī—IV.6.42-50; by Prajāpati—VIII.7.21-35; by Diti—III.14.33-35; Rudra’s greatness—III.14.24-28; 34-35; IV.2.2; 4.11.14.16; 5.10-11; 6.32-42; IV.24.17-18; X.88.3; Rudra’s mantra—V.17.17; Rudra praises the Lord—III.14.34-35; IV.24.33-68; V.17.24-20; VIII.12.4-12; X.63.34; 45; explains greatness of the Lord’s devotees—V.17.27; drinks the poison Hālahāla—VIII.7.18-46; tempted at the sight of Mohini—VIII.12.24; Donates sacrificial remnants to Nābhagā—IX.4.5-10; gives boon to Bhasmāura—X.88.14-40.
Rudra-gitā—Rudra’s spiritual guidance to Pracṛtāsas—IV.24.17-79.
Rudras—Petty Rudra gods born of Bhūta and Sārūpā—VI.6.17.
Rukmavati—Daughter of Rukmi, wife of Pradyumna, her son Aniruddha—X.61.18-19.
Rukmi—Rukmini’s brother—fights with Kṛṣṇa to rescue Rukmini and is humiliated—X.54; founded Bhoga-kaṭa, a new capital of Vidarbha.
Rukmini—Kṛṣṇa’s chief queen—the story of her marriage—X.52.21 ff; sends an epistle to Kṛṣṇa—52.31-34; Kṛṣṇa carries her off and marries her—X. chs. 53-54; X.83.8; Kṛṣṇa’s love quarrel with R. X.60.10-57; Her sons etc.—X.61.8-9; enters fire after Kṛṣṇa’s death—XI.31.20.

(S)

Sādhū—A saint : characteristics of a S.—I.5.24; 18.50; III.25.21-24; IV.11.10; 20.3, 5-6, 29; 22.14, 19; V.1.2-3; VI.5.44; 9.48; VII.4.30-42; VIII.7.39,44; X.21.5-16; X.2.30-31; 24.4-5; 32.19; their greatness—X.84.11; the efficacy of their association—XI.12.
Sagara—Son of Bāhuka—IX.8.4; Indra carries off his sacrificial horse—IX.8.8; Sagara’s sons excavate the earth and are burnt down by Kapila—IX.8.9-12; V.19.29-30.
Sages—(i) A set of seven per Manvantara e.g. Kaśyapa and others in this Manvantara—VII.13.1-6.
(ii) Ursa Major—V.22.17.
Sahadeva—(i) Son of Pāṇḍu and Mādhri—I.7.50; IX.22.28; His sons—IX.22.30, 31.
(ii) Son of Jarasandha—IX.22.9; coronated by Kṛṣṇa—X.7.12.
(iii) Son of Haryavana—IX.17.17.
(iv) Son of Mitrāyu—IX.22.1.
Śākadvipa—Name of a continent—V.1.32-33; 20.24-28.
Śakaṭāsura—Killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.7.4-17.
Śakuni—(i) Son of Hiranyakāśipu, father of Vrkāsura—VII.2.18.
(ii) Son of Daśarath of Kṛta dynasty; father of Karambh—IX.24.4-5.
Śālmali-dvipa—Name of a continent, ruled by Yajñabahu—V.1.32-33; V.20.7-12.
Śālva—A king gifted with Saubha—an aerial car, invades Dvārakā—killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.77.10-37.
Sāmaveda—I.4.20; its master Yadava—XII.6.52.
Sāmba—A son of Kṛṣṇa and Jāmbavati—X.61.11; carries off Durvyodhana’s daughter and is rescued by Balarāma—X.68. Put on a woman’s garb and was cursed—XI.1.14-17; An incarnation of Skanda—III.1.30.
Śambhara—(i) A demon—son of Danu—IV.6.30; carried off newly-born Pradyumna—X.55.3; killed by Pradyumna—X.55.17-24.
(ii) Name of Hiranyakāśipu’s son—VII.2.18.
Samudra—Presiding deity of the sea—II.1.32; His daughter Satadru married to Pracinabarhis—IV.29.9-13; Praives Rama—IX.10.13-16.
(ii) Seven seas—V.1.33.
Sanaka—A mind-born son of Brahmā (the brothers Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanātana and Sanatsujata are generally mentioned in a group)—Their creation III.12.4; IV.8.1; their praise of the Lord—III.15.46-50; They curse Jaya and Vijaya—III.15.12-16; VII.1.36 ff; their query on Yogic problem to Brahmā—XI.13.17.
Śanaśiśara—The planet Saturn son of Vivasvān and Chāyā—VI.6.41; VIII.13.16; His sphere—V.22.16.
Sanatkumāra—vide Sanaka; also III.8.7; His spiritual guidance to Pṛthu—IV.22.
(ii) An incarnation of the Lord—I.3.6; II.7.5.
Sandhyā—Presiding deity of twilight; her creation and description—III.20.28-53; III.14.22-23; 1826.
Sandipani—Teacher of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma—XI.45.31; III.3.2; Kṛṣṇa restores his dead son—X.45.38-46.
Saṅkarṣaṇa—(i) Son of Vasudeva—IX.24.54.
(ii) A manifestation (Vyūha) of the Lord—praised by Rudra—V.17.16-24; VI.16.29-33; also X.2.13; V.16.34-48; III.8.4-6; X.39.44-45; Description of his Person—V.25.1-13.
(iii) See Ādi-Śesa.
Śaṅkhacūḍā—A Yakṣa killed by Kṛṣṇa—II.7.33; X.34.25-32.
Saṅhvaraṇa—Son of Kṛṣṇa, father of Kuru—VI.6.41; IX.22.4.
Sañjaya—(i) Son of Gavalgaṇa; advisor of Dhitaraṣṭra—I.13.31, 36.
(ii) Son of Kṣattravṛddha, father of Jaya—IX.17.16.
(iii) Son of Bhrumyaśva—IX.21.32.
(iv) Son of Raññayā—IX.12.13.

Sāňkhya—Kapila's school of thought—I.3.10; II.1.6; III.25.31; 26.3-68; 28.39-41; VII.7.22-27; XI.20-22; 22.12-16; 21-24, 29-32; 23.48-55; 24.2-28.

Śāntanu—Son of Pratipa—IX.2.12-13; had Bhisma from Gaṅgā—IX.22.19; and others from Satyavatī—22.20; brought up Krīpa and Krṣṇa—IX.21.36.

Śānti—(i) Daughter of Kardama and Devabhūti, wife of Atharva—III.24.24; IV.1.42.
(ii) One of the Tusita gods—IV.1.7.
(iii) Daughter of Daśa, married to Dharma—IV.1.51.
(iv) Son of Nila; father of Susānti—IX.21.30-31.
(vi) A sage expert in Atharva Veda—XII.7.4.

Sarasvatī—(i) A river—Vyāsā divided Vedas on its bank I.4.15-27; The Bhāgavata composed there I.7.2-8; Kardama's penance on its bank—II.9.44; III.1.21; 21.6; V.20.10.

Sarga—(i) A characteristic of Purāṇas—II.10.

Śarmiṣṭā—Daughter of Vṛṣaparvā; Yayāti's queen—VI.6.32; threw Devayāni in a well—IX.18.6.17; Her sons—18.33.

Śaryāti—Son of Śraiddhadeva—VIII.13.2; IX.1.12; His daughter Sukanyā marries Cyavana—IX.3.2; His sons 3.27.

Saśabindu—Son of Citra-ratha—IX.23.31; His progeny—IX.23.32-23.

Śatadhanu—(i) Son of Hṛdika—IX.24.27; killed Satrajit—X.57.3-6; killed by Krṣṇa—X.57.21; II.7.44.
(ii) The 8th Maurya king—XII.1.15.

Śatājīt—(i) Son of Krṣṇa and Jāmbavatī—X.61.11
(ii) Son of Sahasrajit; father of Haihaya—IX.23.21
(iii) Son of Viraja—V.15.15.

Śatarūpā—Wife of Svāyambhuva Manu—III.12.53; See Svāyambhuva Manu also.

Sati—Daughter of Dakśa; Rudra's consort—IV.1.1-47, 65; Her story IV.1.1—requests Rudra's permission to attend Dakśa's sacrifice—IV.3.8-14; gives up her body when insulted—IV.4.9-27; Reborn as Himālaya's daughter—IV.7.58-65.

Śatrājīt—Son of Nimmā—IX.24.12-13; His daughter Satyabhāmā married to Krṣṇa—X.56.1-43; Gets Sūyamantaka gem—X.56.1-2; killed by Śatadhanva—X.57.3-6.

Śatrughna—(i) Son of Daśaratha and Sumitra—IX.10.3 His sons—IX.11.13, kills Lavaṅsura—11.14.
(ii) Son of Svaphalka—IX.24.17.

(ii) Son of Āyu—his descendant clans—Andhaka, Mahābhōja etc.—IX.24.6

Satya—(Truth
(i) I.16.27; 17.24; II.7.18; VIII.20.4; XI.19.37
(ii) Name of Havirdhāna's son—IV.24.8.
(iii) A sage in the 10th Manvantara—VIII.13.22.

Satyā—alias Nilā—Krṣṇa's consort—X.58.32; 83.13-14; his sons—X.61.13; I.14.37; III.3.4

Satyabhāmā—Krṣṇa's queen—X.56.44; 83.9; her sons—X.61.10-11.

Śatyaki alias Yuyudhāna—son of Satyaka; father of Jaya—IX.24.13-14; I.10.18.
Satyavrata—A royal sage—VIII.24.10; became Śraddhadeva Manu—24.11; penance on the Kitamalā—VIII.24.12; His praise of the Divine Fish—VIII.24.46-53.
Saubhārī—Disciple of Devamitra—XII.6.50; marries 50 princesses of Māndhātā—IX.6.38; His yogic powers—6.39-54; cursed Garuḍa—X.17.9-11; II.7.45.
Śaunaka—(i) Chief sage in Naimisāraṇya—I.1.4; requested Śāta to narrate the Bhāgavata—I.4.1 ff; was born in Mārkandeyas's family—XII.8.3.
(ii) Son of Sunaka—I.X.17.3.
Śāvarni—(i) Son of Vivavān and Chāyā—VI.6.41; the 8th Manu—VIII.13.11
(ii) A sage, knower of the Atharva Veda—XII.7.3
(iii) An epic knowing sage—XII 7.5.
Śiddhi—(i) Supernatural Powers—XI.15
(ii) Wife of the Sun-god Bhaga—VI.18.2
Śiśunāga—A king of Magadha—XII.1.5.
Śiśupāla—Son of Damaghoṣa and Śrutasravā—IX.24.39; killed by Kṛṣṇa—X.74.43; originally the Lord's attendant—VII.10.35-46; Emancipated—VII.1.13 ff.
Śitā—(i) Queen of Rāma—IX.13.18; her marriage—IX.10.7; her abandonment—IX.10.70; sons—Lava and Kuśa—11.11; enters the earth's womb—11.15.
(ii) A branch of the (heavenly) Gaṅgā—V.17.5-6.
Soma—The Moon-god; son of Atri and Anasūya—IV.1.15, 33; born from Atri's eye—IX.14.2-3; performed Rājaśūya sacrifice—14.4; his affair with Tārā and birth of Budha—IX.14.4-14; married 27 daughters of Dakṣa—IV.6.23; II.3.9.
Soul—Individual: See Jīva
Śraddhā—(i) Wife of Śraddhadeva Manu—IX.1.14
(iii) Daughter of Dakṣa, wife of Dharma—IV.1.50.
Śraddhadeva—The seventh Manu—VI.6.40; His sons Ikṣvāku and others—VIII.13.2-3; IX.1.11-12 also 1.13-16.
Śī—see Lakṣmī.
Śīśāla—Name of a mountain—V.19.16; X.79.13.
Srṣṭi—Creation (of the Universe) Ten types—III.10; its order—IX.1.8 ff; its description—II.15 21-42; 6.1-10; 11.10.1-32; III.5.23-36; 6.1-33; 920-25; 10.11-28; XI. ch. 24.
Śrutadeva—(i) Kṛṣṇa's Brāhmaṇa devotee from Mithilā; Kṛṣṇa visits his house—X.86; He eulogizes the Lord—86.44-48; II.7.45.
(iii) A Yādava—I.14.32.
Subhadra—(i) Son of Vasudeva and Pauravi—IX.24.47
(ii) Son of Kṛṣṇa and Bhadrā—X.61.17.
Subhadrā—Kṛṣṇa's sister—IX.24.55; married to Arjuna—X.86.1-12; I.10.9; Her son Abhimanyu—IX.22.23.
Śudāmā—A flower-dealer—received Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma—I.41.43-53; praises the Lord—41.45-47.
Śudāma—(i) The discus of Viṣṇu protects the Sun and the Moon from Rāhu—V.24.1-3; Retaliated Asvatthāman's missile—1.8.13; Ambaraṇa's praise of S.—IX.5.3.11.
(ii) Son of Bharata—V.7.3
(iii) Son of Dhrusavandhi—IX.12.5
(iv) A Vidyādhara cursed to be a boa-constrictor relieved by Kṛṣṇa—X.34.12.
Sudymna—(i) Name of Ilā after transformation into a man—IX.1.22; becomes a woman again 1.26—Arrangement about his manhood and womanhood—1.39; His sons—IX.1.41—see Ilā.
(ii) Son of Cākṣuṣa Manu. VIII.5.7
Śūka—The son of Vyāsa; his greatness—I.2.2-3; 4.4-8; Approaches Parīkṣitā—I.19.26-28; Praises the Lord—II.4.12-24; was taught the Bhāgavata by Vyāsa—I.7; his equality of outlook—I.4.5; Kṛtvi is regarded as the daughter of Śūka's shadow—IX.21.25.
Śukra—Uśanā, son of Kavi, a planet—V.22.12-13; daughter Devayānī—I.24.34; sons Śaṅdha and Amarka —VII.5.1; dissuaded Bali to offer any land to Vāmana—VIII.19.30ff.

Sumanu—(i) Vyāsa’s disciple—known of the Atharva Veda—XII.6.53; I.4.22.
(ii) Son of Jaimini—a Sāma singer—XII.6.75; 7.1

Sunabhiṣepa—Son of Ajigarta—offered by Hariscandra to Varuṇa—IX.7.21; Viśvāmitra adopts him as a son—IX.16.30.

Suniti—Wife of Uttānāpāda, Dhrūva’s mother—IV.8.8-9; goes to heaven—IV.12.32.

Śūra—(i) Son of Vidūratha, father of Bhajamāna—IX.24.26;
(ii) Son of Devamiṣa; queen Māriṣa; 10 sons (Vasudeva and others) and 5 daughters—IX.24.27-31.
(iii) Son of Vasudeva and Madirā—IX.24.48.

Śūrya—The Sun-god; praised by Jāda Bharata—V.7.14; goes round the Meru—V.22.1 ff.; description of his chariot—V.21.13; praised by Yājñavalkya—XII.6.67-72; taught him (Y) white Yajurveda XII.6.73-74; his monthwise forms—XII.11.30-50; his charioteer Aruṇa—VI.6.22.

Śūrya-varīśa—IX. chs. 1-13.

Śūta—alias Ugraśravas—Son of Romahāraśana—requested to narrate Purāṇa by Saunaka—I.1.6-23; his praise of Vyāsa and Suṅka—I.2.2-3: Begins the story of Parikṣit—I.7.12 ff.

Sutala—The third subterranean world, its creation—II.1.27; 5.40; V.24.7; description—V.24.18.

Svadbā—(i) Daughter ofŚvāyambhūva Dakṣa—IV.16.63-64.

Śvāhā—(i) Dakṣa’s daughter; Agni’s wife—IV.1.60.
(ii) Uttered while oblatting to gods—II.7.38.

Śvapahka—Son of Vṛṣṇi, father of Akṛūra—IX.24.15.

Śvārociṣa—Agni’s son—second Manu—VIII.1.20.

Śvāyambhūva Manu—The 1st Manu—born of Brahmā—III.12.53. His progeny—III.12. 54-55; IV.8.7; III.12.54; Dialogue with Brahmā III.13.6-17; goes to Kardama for Devahūti’s marriage—III.21.36; teaches religion to sages—22.38; teaches Dhrūva—IV.11.7-34; prays the Lord—VIII.1.9-16; saved by Yajña from demons—9.17-18.

Syamantaka—a precious stone given by the Sun god to Satrājit—X.56.1-3; the story about its change of hands—56.32-44.

TaittiriyaŚākhā—of Black Yajurveda—XII.6.65.

Takṣaka—(i) Name of a serpent—bit Parikṣit—XII.6.11-13
(ii) Son of Prasenajit—IX.12.8.

Talātāla—The 4th nether world, its creation—II.1.26; 5.40; V.24.7-48.

Tamas—(i) The attribute—darkness—I.2.23; 13.55; II.4.5; 5.18.
(ii) Nescience—this creation—III.10.17; 12.2; 20.18.

Tāmasa—The 4th Manu—V.1.28; his ten sons—VIII.1.27.

Tāmasa ego—II.5.24; III.5.31.

Tāmasa creation—III.10.17.

Tāmraparṇi—A river in the South India—IV.28.35; V.19.18; X.79.16.

Tapaś—(Penance)
(i) Its greatness—I.13.50; II.9.22; IV.8.71-80; IV.23.4-7; 28.35-38; VI.1.49-46; XI.17.37.
(ii) The 6th heaven—II.1.28; its creation—II.5.39.

Tārā—Brhaspati’s wife—her affair with Soma—Buddha’s birth—IX.14.4-14.

Tattvas—Principles (of Sāṅkhya)—II.5.22-34; III.5.26-37; their enumeration—III.26. 10-15; their presiding deities praise the Lord—III.5.38-50.

Time; See Kāla

Tirthayātrā—(Pilgrimage) of Vidura—III.1.17 ff., of Balarāma—X. chs. 78 & 79 of Parsurāma—IX.15.41.

Tretā—(i) Name of a Yuga—period: characteristics of—XII.3.20-23.
(ii) The three fires—IX.14.49.

Trīkūṭa—(i) A mountain in India—V.19.16; VIII.2.1.

Trīśaṅku—alias Satyavrata—father of Hariscandra—IX.7.5-7.
Trivakrā—Karṣaṅa’s maid servant—
Karṣaṅa removes her deformity—X. 42.1-13; Karṣaṅa goes to her—X.48. 1-10; her son Upakroṣa—X.90.34-1.
Trāṇabindu—Son of Bandhu; married to Alāṁbūṣā and his Progeny—
IX.2.30-31.
Trāṇavarta—A demon killed by Kṛṣṇa—
X.7.18-33.
Tvāṣṭā—Son of Kaśyapa and Aditi—
VI.6.39; married Prahlāda’s daughter—6.44; created Vṛtra to kill Indra—VI.9.11-12.

(U)

Uddhava—Kṛṣṇa’s minister and devotee; visits Vraja—X.46; taught spiritual lore by Kṛṣṇa—XI.6 ff; praises Kṛṣṇa—XI.29.3 ff; Dialogue with Vidura—III. chs. 2 to 4; goes to Badarikāśrama—III.4.32; XI.29.47.
Ugrasena—Son of Āhuaka and father of Karṣaṅa—IX.24.21-24; coronated—X.45.12.
Ūdṛghva loka—Upper regions—II.1. 27; 5.38-39.
Urjaśati—(i) Daughter of Priyavrata—V.1.24; Wife of Śukra, Devayānī’s mother—1.34;
(ii) Wife of Praṇava, a Vasu.
Urvasī—Born of Nārāyaṇa’s lap—
XI.4.15; cursed by Mitra and Varuṇa to stay with Purūravas—IX.14.16-49; seen by Mitra and Varuṇa—VI.18.5-6; her sons—IX.15.1; her advice to Purūravas—
IX.14.36-39; XI.26.14-16; Accompanies the Sun-god in Mārgaśīra—III.11.41.
Ūśa—(i) Daughter of Bāna married to Aniruddha—X.chs. 62 and 63.
(ii) Wife of Vibhāvaṇu, a Vasu—
VI.6.16.
Uttama—(i) Son of Uttānapāda and —V.8.9; killed by Rākṣasas —IV.10.3.
(ii) The 3rd Manu—V.1.28; His sons—VIII.1.23.
Uttānapāda—Son of Śvāyambhuvā Manu—IV.1.9; father of Drhuva—
The story of—IV.chs. 8 & 9.
Uttāra—Wife of Abhimanyu, mother of Parikṣīt—III.3.17.
Uttarāyaṇa—V.21.3-6.

(V)

Vahni—(i) Presiding deity of speech—
II.6.1; 10.19
(ii) Son of Kṛṣṇa and Mitrawindā—
X.61.16
(iii) Grandson of Yayāti, son of Turvasu—IX.23.16.
(iv) Son of Kukara and father of Vilomā—IX.24.19.
Vaiṣṇava—(i) Name of Viṣṇu—
VIII.5.4
(ii) The Lord’s region—VIII.5.5; its description—II.8.9-14; III.15.12 ff; X.28.15-16 ; X. 88.25-26; Sanaka etc arrive at V.—III.15.12 ff; Lord’s form in V. 15.38-45.
Vaisampāyana—Vṛṣaṇa’s disciple, master of the Yajurveda—I.4.21; XII.6.52; his disciples expiate his sins—6.61-63; Narrator of Puruṣas also—XII.7.5.
Vaiśya—The 3rd class in society—their characteristics and duties—
VII.11.15; 11.23; X.24.20-31 ;
their nature—XI.17.18.
Vājasana—The Veda given by the Sun God to Vājaśvālvya—XII.6. 73-74.
Vajra—(i) Son of Aniruddha—X. 90.37; coronated at Mathurā—
I.15.39.
Vāk—(i) Goddess of Speech—born of Brahма’s mouth—II.6.1;
10.19; III.6.12; 12.26; Brahmacourts her—12.28-34
Vālakhilīyas— Sons of Kratu and Kṛiṣṇa—IV.1.39 ; praise the Sun-god—V.21.17.
V.—sahhitā—A branch of the rgveda—XII.6.59.
Vāmana—(i) An incarnation of Viṣṇu—I.9.19; 11.7.17; his story—VIII. ch. 18; begs three feet of land to Bali and vanquishes him—VIII. ch. 19; married to Kirtū, son Bhṛacchloka—VI.18.8.
(ii) Name of the elephant supporter (dig-gaja) of the world in the west. V. 20.39.
Varāha—Viṣṇu’s incarnation—I.3.7; II.7.1; Born from Brahmac nose—III.13.18; His description
—13.27-30; His eulogy—13.34-Vatsara—(i) A measure of time—
—III.11.13-14; V.22.7
(ii) Son of Dhrutu & Bhrami—
IV.10.1; coronated—IV.13.11; his progeny—IV.13.12 ff.
Veda—Their classification—I.3.21; 4.19-25; XII.6.49 ff; their names—
—I.4.20; helps revelation of Brahman—III.12.34-37; women and Śudras ineligible to study—
—I.4.25.
Vena—Son of Anśu—IV.13.18; coronated—IV.14.2; killed by sages—
—14.30-34; Pṛthu created out of his body—IV.15.1-5.
Vi(Bi)bhiśana—Younger brother of Rāvana—I.1.37; coronated as a king of Lanka—IX.10.32-33; Lord's devotee—II.7.45.
Vibhūti—The Lord's forms—XI.16.10-41.
Vicitra-virya—Son of Śantanu; Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Pāṇḍu born of his queens—IX.22.21-25
Vidura—Son of Vicitravirya's mistress through Vyāsā—IX.22.25; an incarnation of Yama—III.5.20; I.13.15; His pilgrimage—II.1.6-17; dialogue with Uddyava—III.1.24 to 4.36; dialogue with Maitreyā—III.5 to the end of IV Skandha; returns to Hastināpura—I.13.1; IV.31.30; dies at Prabhāsa—II.15.49.
Vidyādharā—A tribe of demi god created by Brahmā—III.20.44; Citraketu their ruler—VI.16.28.
Vīnatā—Dakṣa's daughter; Kaśyapa's wife; sons Aruṇa and Garuḍa—
—VI.6.21-22.
Vindhyāvalī—Bali's queen, other names Asanā, Koṭarā—VIII.20.17; praises the Lord—VIII.22.20; had a hundred sons such as Bāna—
—VI.18.17; X.63.20-21.
Virabhadrā—Born of Rudra's lock of hair—destroyed Dakṣa's sacrifice—IV.5.1-26.
Vīrūt—The cosmic form of the Lord—
—III.6.9; 7.21-22; Method of meditation—II.9.24-39.
Viśvāmitra—Son of king Gādhi, attained Brāhmaṇahood—IX. 16.28-29; adopted Sunahśēpa—IX.16.30-35; his other sons—IX.16.36; His sacrifice protected by Rāma—IX.10.5; His Menakā affair—IX.20.13 ff.
Viśva-rūpa—(i) Son of Tvaśṭa, married Rocana—VI.6.44-45; requested by gods to be a sacrificial priest—VI.7.27-36; Indra cuts his three heads—VI.9.1-4; Brother of Vrtra—9.11-18.

Vitala—The 2nd nether world; its creation—II.1.27; 5.40; description—V.24.7,17.

Vivasvan—The Sun-god, a son of Kaśyapa and Aditi—wives and progeny of—VI.6.38-41; VIII.13.8-10.

Vṛṣṇi—(i) Son of Madhu—IX.23.29
(ii) Son of Satvata—IX.24.6; his sons—24.12, 18.
(iii) Son of Yugandhara, father of Svaphalka—IX.24.14.

Vṛtra—Created by Tvaśtra to kill Indra—VII.9.11-18. His fight with Indra—VI.10.15 ff.; V. prays the Lord—VI.11.24-27; Indra kills him V.12-32; and contracts Brahmacaryā—13.10 ff. was Citraketu in former birth—VI.14.10

(Y) Yadvavas—The descendants of Yadu—X.90.40-46; cursed by sages—III.3.24; XI.1.12-17; killed each other in internecine strife—X. ch. 30.

Yadu—Son of Yayati and Devayāni—IX.18.39; his sons—IX.23.26; his dialogue with Avadhūta—XI.7.24 ff.

(ii) Viśvānu—III.37.
(iii) Son of Ruci and Akuti—adopted by Śvayambhuva Manu, married Dakṣīṇā—IV.1.3-8; I.3.12; II.7.2; protected Indra and Manu from demons—VIII.1.18.

Yājñavalkya—(i) Son of Devarātā—Vaisampayana’s pupil of Yajurveda—XII.6.62-64; renounced old Yajurveda and praised the sun—6.64-72; learnt new (white) Yajurveda from the Sun (X.III.6.73-74) also VI.15.13

(ii) Pupil of Hiranyakābha—IX.12.4
(iii) A teacher of the Rgveda—XII.6.54.

Yajus—The Yajurveda—I.4.20; the first teacher—Vaisampayana—1.4.21; also called Nigada—XII.6.52; its branches—6.61-65.

Yama—Son of Vivasvan and Sarijñā—VI.6.40; cursed by Māndavya to be a Sudra (Vidura)—III.5.20; explains the importance of God’s name—VI.3.12-33; spiritual advice in the form of a child—VII.2.37 ff.

Yasodā—Wife of Nanda—was Dharā, the wife of Vasu Droṇa (now Nanda in previous birth—X.8.48; gives birth to Yogamāya and exchange of babies—X.3.51—ties down Kṛṣṇa to a mortar—X.9.14-20; shown His cosmic form—X.7.36 and 8.37-38.

Yayati—Son of Nahuṣa—IX.18.3; helps Devayāni out of a well and marries her and Sarmiṣṭhā—IX.18.19, 31-32, His progeny—18.33; cursed by Śukra and Puru, accepts his decrepititude—IX.18.36-45; renunciation and tells the allegory of a goat to Devayāni—IX.19.

Yudhishthira—A son of Pāṇḍu; performed three horse-sacrifices—I.8.6; consoled Gāndhāri—I.9.48; his repentance for the Bhārata war—I.8.46-52; protected kingdom well—10.3-6; 12.4; Arjuna reports Kṛṣṇa’s death and he with brothers last departure—I. chs. 14 & 15; query to Nārada about Śiśupāla’s absorption in the Lord—VII.15-20; Nārada’s exposition of various Dharmas—VII. ch. 11 to 15; His sons Pratīvindhyā and Devāka—IX.22.29-30; Praise of Kṛṣṇa—X.74.2-5; 83.5-4.